human living in which a caritas supported by concrete institutions could become embodied as a factor in the life of society, a 'caritas' such that its activities would not necessarily be 'charitable' in the usual sense of the term. On the other hand this would be a question which practical theology should not evade. Let us then use the term 'social work' to cover all this field as a whole, together with the achievements, works and institutions belonging to it, and let us also subsume under this head the work of charity (caritas as traditionally understood) as a part which is important indeed, but not as the whole of 'social work'.

The Church has the right and the duty to engage in this ministry of social work for, constituted as she is as a social and historical entity, she is not merely the recipient and the witness to the world of the truth in faith and of the future in hope (from both aspects she is the basic sacrament), but also the basic sacrament of unity in the ministry of love.

The subject of social work in this sense is the Church. In laying down this principle we must bear in mind that the word 'Church' in it contains many different shades and levels of meaning. Church in the sense envisaged in practical theology and in the nature of the case itself is certainly not ipso facto present where the individual Christian, while continuing to act as a 'private' individual in his Christian life, does 'social' work and finds himself compelled to act in the unique place belonging to him within the society of his fellow men, a place which he shapes by his own free and responsible decisions. Nor is the Church yet present in the work of the individual Christian when he discharges this personal task of his as a 'private' individual living in the world, sharing in the communal responsibility for its well-being, or actively co-operating as a member of the community in the social work which it needs at the worldly level, even though in so doing he may be making real at one and the same time the caritas which flows from the grace bestowed on him and his task in the world.

[359] Despite this, however, the statement that the Church, both in her activities and through her institutions, has a social work to perform has several different levels of meaning. One example of the Church's social work in this sense would be those instances in which the pope and bishops play an active part in social measures in the world but precisely as official representatives of the Church as, for instance, has already in fact been the case in the encyclical Populorum progressio. This is also true of those cases in which the pope and bishops ensure that their social activities as hierarchically constituted officials of the Church shall be carried out by individual Christians or institutions officially commissioned for the purpose. But a further instance of the social work of the actual Church as such is to be found in those cases in which the local communities at the parish level go out from the altar to work actively and to set up institutions (for instance through the caritas organisation of the parish etc.) in order to make real the love that exists between the individuals belonging to the community of the faith. In doing this such local communities also make an important contribution to ensuring that the social organisation of secular society shall be sound and healthy.

A further and indispensable instance of the social work of the Church as such is that in which Christians as such come together of their own free initiative to set up an institution with the following characteristics: on the one hand it is quite unnecessary that it shall be the outcome of any initiative on the part of the Church's official authorities. It is by no means to be thought of simply as an organ for carrying out the enactments of these ecclesiastical authorities, and properly speaking it does not act as such at all. On the other hand its status as an institution of this kind is due to the free collaboration of Christians and in this sense does have its place within the Church. In other words as an institution of this kind it does recognisably pertain to the Church, and can unreservedly be accounted 'ecclesiastical' at least to the extent that the official authorities of the Church, by their tacit agreement, give free rein to the exercise of the Church's own free charisms. Not everything 'ecclesiastical' is set up by a positive juridical authorisation on the part of the Church's official authorities. Of course it is possible in the concrete for institutions to be set up, the forms of which represent a perfectly reasonable mixture of the official on the one hand and the free charismatic on the other, but which are still ecclesiastical institutions. The manner in which these function has to be guaranteed by positive juridical prescriptions of a sensible kind. But in any case 'Church' matters are not identical with 'episcopal' matters in a juridical sense. For even the free charisms are, or can be, integral elements in [360] the Church as such. Of course there are continual transitions and interplay between the two kinds of institutions catering for social work, those which we have mentioned, which are ecclesiastical but inspired by the free charism of the Church on the one hand, and the 'worldly' institutions on the other, which, however, are still either exclusively or principally supported by Christians, and which explicitly appeal to the inspiration of the gospels, even though the Church as such, together with her officially constituted authorities, cannot play any active part in them. This does nothing to alter the basic principle that that which pertains to the 'Church' and that which pertains to the 'official authorities of the Church' are not identical but partially distinct, because the process by which the Church as such (even in those areas which are to be distinguished from Christian modes of existence and the life of Christians) realises her own nature implies something more than the activity of the official authorities, and further because the Church has to become the basic sacrament of the presence of God's grace in the world not merely in virtue of what is done by the official authorities in the Church in the form of teaching, sacraments and official ministries.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is only at this point, however, that we come to the decisive part of our third statement. Probably it is impossible in principle to draw once and for all any firm, rigid material line of division between the respective areas of social work belonging to the world on the one hand and the Church on the other. Indeed it is probably impossible to devise even a formal principle on the basis of which this borderline can be deductively worked out and established with any certainty, in the particular situation prevailing at any given time and on the basis of this, in the sense of a principle as distinct from a prudent and calculated practical decision and as essentially different from theory.[4] To draw a material borderline of this kind, whether directly or in virtue of some formal principle, is impossible and also unnecessary. It is impossible because (sin apart) *every*body can be and should become a medium for fulfilling and manifesting caritas as grace – albeit in a process which develops asymptotically, which only attains to its final point in the kingdom of God, and so is continually acting as a sort of counterpoint to the growing worldliness of the world. Thus all social work can be the means and the medium for bringing the caritas of the Church to its fulness, apart, of course, from those cases in which, whether in principle or in practice, it would tend to do away with the autonomy of the world together with its institutions and the social [361] work that is proper to it. But even this proviso (already formulated in the second statement) does not yield any principle on which to establish unambiguously the material line of division between secular and ecclesiastical social work. Furthermore, even from the point of view of the world and the state, the drawing of a material line of division of this kind is impracticable. For everywhere where the secular social activities of the community contribute to the abiding dignity of the person, his freedom and his liberation from a state of alienation from himself, where they enable man to be himself and to pursue his earthly and eternal lot in self-responsibility, where they free him from as much as possible of the burden of the pre-personal element in order to lay upon him the heaviest burden of all, himself in his own freedom – in all these areas factors are objectively present in the life of society which are also capable of embodying love, and often actually do so. And in doing so they are capable of belonging to the form in which the Church manifests herself, even though this significance in them is quite

[4] cf. K. Rahner, 'Grenzen der Amtskirche', Schriften zur Theologie VI (Einsiedeln 1965), pp. 499-520.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

unrecognised. Where this is not the case there is no social work or institution either. Whether it remains at so worldly a level as this, so that it is impossible to discern whether it can constitute caritas in the theological sense, or whether it really does constitute that manifestation of love which proceeds from a heart filled with the Spirit of God – this is something known only to God who alone judges the hearts of men. But this also applies to all social and historical phenomena in which caritas is objectively made real through the Church.

In all this it remains true that it is impossible to find any principle on the basis of which to draw a material line of demarcation. Of course in the course of history attempts have been made again and again to make permanent all the lines of division between the Church and the world which have de facto arisen: in the field of marriage, education, the special liberties of the clergy, the taxation of Church property etc. The drawing of material lines of demarcation of this kind might be put forward as deduced (whether in a direct and material sense or an indirect and formal one) from principles, and might be attempted by both sides, the Church and secular society, or by only one of these. But in any case such attempts have always constituted an unconscious mixture of two factors: first correct (or incorrect) theoretical principles which, however, taken by themselves, and strictly applied, did not yield (even though their exponents thought they did) the desired conclusion of establishing a material line of demarcation, and second a resolve and a decision arrived at in concrete history as a freely calculated act and even in circumstances of [362] conflict. But it was supposed that all that was being done was to make effective and real certain immutable principles. In fact, however, this problem of establishing lines of demarcation, however true it may be that we have to respect certain general principles (cf. the second and third statements) is a matter of calculation, of agreement freely entered into on both sides, of historical power in a shifting situation, of creative imagination and even of conflict. It is a matter decided in history precisely as ever unique, ever surprising, which can never be explained in any adequate sense in theory, but is rather ‘practice’ in a sense which implies something more than the mere execution in time of theoretical principles and plans. Once we realise this, and in doing so accord due importance to the second statement we have enunciated from the point of view of the Church, a significant lightening of the burden is achieved in the difficult decisions which the Church has to take with regard to the question of what particular social work she should engage in in the particular situation prevailing at any given time. This is arrived at from two different aspects. On the one hand the Church can freely and to some extent ‘without recourse to principles’ leave to the world in its growing worldliness much social work which at one time she did perform, for in fact she herself wills the world to develop along these lines. She does not need to be anxious, as it were, lest she should be surrendering something which she is bound to perform for all time. In such cases she is merely giving her assent to a world which, so long as it is rightly performing what is necessary for society, is always in fact creating the objective conditions in which an unrecognised grace can be embodied, conditions, indeed, in which Christians as such can and should collaborate, albeit not precisely as ‘Church members’, for they should not suppose that the realities signified by the terms ‘Christian’ and ‘ecclesiastical’ are co-extensive. On the other hand the Church must be equally ‘emancipated from principles’ in taking over new forms of social work in the sense that she must not suppose that she is faced with the question of whether or not she has a duty and obligation to undertake them arising from her own ‘principles’ (abstracting from the principle of prodigality in love which is no longer any ‘principle’ in the true sense). Free from any excessive calculation, she can develop initiatives without check or hindrance, give free rein to creative imagination and to the boldness of love, recognise and seize upon tasks with shining eyes and a ready heart, tasks which no-one else has yet recognised and undertaken. Nor is any such rigid drawing of lines of demarcation based on pre-established principles necessary. For in a society that is free and pluralist in character the state must in fact, of its very nature, will that 'the same' activities shall [363] be performed by the individual groups within it, and shall be incorporated into the society as a unified whole by a process of free competition. For society as a unified whole in this sense is not a closed system directed in a totalitarian way from one single point. Rather it is the 'system' which is maintained by a balance of forces which has constantly to be established afresh. A further factor is that it is precisely here that we should apply the principle of the subsidiary role of the state even though it is not suitable to be used as a principle for establishing the lines of demarcation in our present problem. This principle is that the state as such, without actually becoming a 'night-watchman' of mere legality, must, precisely in the area of social institutions, set in motion on its own initiative only that which the free individual groups within the society cannot perform themselves. This remains true even though the work of the 'social state' or the 'social welfare state' of today must necessarily be great. These are factors that must be borne in mind, and in addition to these it must be remembered, and in fact by both sides, that the free groups, and so the Church too, are becoming more and more suitable as the practitioners of social work. For this is actively pursued not so much in the area of what can be achieved and organised materially through legislation, and hence compulsorily, but rather in the manner of a help that is given swiftly, spontaneously at the 'personal' level and without complications (though admittedly this does not exclude the institutionalising process). Now the more this is true the more readily it can be perceived that in this question of how the necessary task should be divided in the concrete between the social work of the Church and that of the secular state, there is no need to fear that any insoluble conflicts need arise. The will to arrive at a solution in the concrete can be present on both sides so long as the state for its part has no intention of acting in a totalitarian manner while the Church for its part does not imagine that any development in the worldly world ipso facto and of its very nature represents a threat to her own effectiveness. On the contrary she must freely accept the mode of life open to her at the sociological level in a pluralist society and send out her believers into this world as genuine collaborators in order that there they may fulfil their Christian task without any reservations of an integralist kind.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

IV

What has been said in the third statement is not intended to deny, and must not obscure, one further point. This is that there can be a form of social assistance which can be fully and legitimately exercised only by the [364] Church and by the Christian as a member of her. In any case this fourth statement would only contain an implied contradiction of the statement made above if the social work of the Church either could or should be confined merely to that which she can achieve by herself. Obviously it is only on the basis of an adherence to Christian truth that this fourth statement can have any light to throw upon the question, and in order to understand why it should be justified certain further considerations have to be borne in mind.

Human life is subject to a continuous plurality in respect of its dimensions, its origins, its awarenesses, impulses and its involvement with society. But in spite of these factors, and in the midst of them, man is essentially one, so that there is a constant mutual interplay between each dimension and every other, and so that no one of them is realised in total independence of another and no one of them can be altogether sound unless the other too is sound. The plurality of the dimensions of human living (whether interior or exterior) in which man exists is such that they can never wholly be controlled from any one point within man's own capabilities. But this also implies that each dimension has laws of its own and a force of its own, and therefore not every upset in one dimension has an effect of the same magnitude in some other dimension. Nevertheless the effect of the real unity which is present in all these manifold dimensions is that, fundamentally speaking, an upset in one dimension can still make itself felt as a factor of disturbance in another dimension. Now the result of this is that it is possible to have disturbances in one dimension such that they can be removed only by the removal of a disturbance in another dimension. This remains true even though, while the difference between the two dimensions still remains, it is justifiable to attempt to remove some upset in one specific dimension (and a certain measure of success may even be achieved in so doing) by means appropriate to itself – as it were as a 'therapy of the symptoms' – without, and prior to, any removal of the true and initial source of the upset concerned, which is to be found in a different dimension. Admittedly this is not to dispute the fact that the same symptom may be the outcome of several causes working together to produce upsets in various dimensions, and that there can be a mutual conditioning and intensifying process between the upsets in various dimensions. 'Chain reactions' may be set in motion in the cycle of causes that exists within a system that is, to a certain extent, 'closed' and in which all depends on each among the elements constitutive of the system.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

What we have so far stated in abstract terms necessarily arises from the inalienable dialectical unity to be found in the unity and plurality of man [365] and of his world. Now let us apply this to our particular case. Disturbances do exist or are at least in principle conceivable – even at the social level – which can only be removed by the removal or diminishing of disturbances in the dimension of the religious, of faith, hope and love in the strictly theological sense. Because of the 'chain reaction' (and also abstracting from this) 'therapy of the symptoms' is fully justified and also has certain chances of success in exactly the same way as, for instance, a case of insomnia can be removed by soporifics, or at least an attempt can be made to achieve this even though this insomnia derives from a disorder which cannot be controlled. But this does not in the least alter the fact that social conflicts can, and actually do exist – both at the more individual and at the collective levels – which also constitute (though probably they are never merely this) the consequences of the upset of the religious relationship between man and God and (because love of God and love of neighbour are one) of the specifically religious relationship at the human level and between man and man. This basic 'theological' disturbance can be situated in the original and basic relationship between man and God and between a man and his neighbour and also at the ecclesiastical level in the conceptual and so cultic forms in which this basic relationship is socially objectified, a level which is not the same as that of the relationship itself. But disturbances at both levels can have, and in principle actually do have, their further effects in other spheres of human living, and so too precisely in the social dimension, even though not necessarily and not always in a measure which is empirically ('clinically') noteworthy.

In fact: anyone who is not in ultimate harmony with the most ultimate and uncontrollable mystery of existence called God in faith, hope and love cannot accept and endure as he must the human interrelationships and the concrete social conditions in which these are realised either, as these exist with all their hardships and disappointments, the ever-fresh tasks and responsibilities they entail, and the concrete modes in which they are realised in history and society. It is only in the breadth of the freedom of the children of God that man can sustain the narrowness of human intercourse as a whole in all its aspects and in the spatial and temporal conditions to which it is subject in all their length and breadth. It can often be the case that this is attained to by the individual in a Christianity that is 'unacknowledged'. And truly we cannot maintain that it is only those who are explicit Christians who are capable of managing their human intercourse in a manner that is 'clinically' adequate. Still less do we maintain that man can manipulate the 'religious' element as a means for regulating social conflicts without thereby destroying its true nature. God becomes a [366] genuine help in life

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

precisely and only provided that man sees him as he really is, as holy and worthy of adoration in himself, and provided that man makes him a goal and meaningful in himself, and not merely a means for achieving something else. But all this does nothing to alter the fact that social conflicts can, and actually do derive from a distorted relationship with God. Hence Christianity and the Church have a special task in social work proper to themselves, one which no-one can take away from the Church. Certainly she cannot herself establish this relationship of man to God, for this is something that every individual has to do for himself in freedom and grace. But she is, nevertheless, the mediatrix of this relationship through the effective sign of her word and sacrament, and also of that love which is made effective and manifest in the community of the believers.

Now this certainly implies that the Church precisely through her specifically religious activities, and as mediating salvation, is also socially effective. But this precisely does not mean that the Church could ever be restricted to this properly religious area of social effectiveness. On the contrary, if we bear in mind what has been said in the third statement, and also precisely with regard to the 'chain reaction' of the various dimensions in human living upon one another, then we must come to the following conclusion: an area of social work is opened up for the Church initially in those situations in which the specifically religious problem is entered upon and so a specifically ecclesiastical and missionary task becomes necessary, and on the other hand such an area is opened up in a situation of specifically social conflict when this represents – at least in part – the consequence and at the same time an intensification of some religious conflict as well as simultaneously constituting that situation in, and on the occasion of which the religious problem is, for the most part first borne in upon man and made the subject of his conscious decision. In other words: when there is a specific work of love to be performed or expected, a work which, in the long run, can never be performed at all without a love that is reinforced with faith and hope, and when there is a failure to perform such a work, then the situation arises in which the religious question can be explicitly and consciously borne in upon man in the concrete, and this is the place for a kind of social work which is specifically appropriate to the Church. This is to put the matter in terms which are still very abstract and can be no substitute for that creative imagination which is capable of revealing situations of this kind. But still it remains true to say that a pastoral activity that is 'purely' religious in character and expressed in preaching and the sacramental ministry alone is, in a certain sense, too abstract.

[367] Taken by itself this does not make itself felt – or does not do so sufficiently – in those cases in which man is involved in a social conflict having a religious background and religious undercurrents. For these emerge more effectively in the concrete instance of social conflict than in some kind of 'abstract' situation in which action is confined to the 'purely religious' sphere and mediated by the Church. The very fact that a conflict of this kind is, in concrete fact, never purely religious in origin, and that a justifiable 'therapy of the symptoms' does actually exist, means that it is never possible unambiguously to demarcate it materially, dividing it off from the areas proper to secular social work and aid. Nevertheless in principle it is a 'case' of social work belonging specifically to the Church.

Properly speaking what has been said should in itself be enough to make it clear first that the practitioner of the Church's social aid in precisely this sense does not necessarily have to be an ordained priest – indeed that for the most part the earlier formation of priests is, or may be, quite inadequate for this, and second that the lay 'social worker' of the Church acquires, by that very fact, a character and a task which has a specifically religious and ecclesiastical relevance such as has hardly been recognised sufficiently clearly up to the present.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This aspect of the matter could shed fresh light upon the problem of the social worker of the Church as an ordained deacon.[5]

A further point which still remains to be made is this: the social work of the Church upon which we have now focussed our attention certainly has, of its very nature, an extremely 'personal' character. But this does not necessarily exclude a permanent system of organisation and institutionalisation which does justice to its specific nature. If the actual sacramental aids to living, e.g. in the sacrament of penance, exhibit an extremely significant element of institutionalism and 'organisation', then this cannot ipso facto be impossible in the case we are considering either.

A special sub-species of this specifically ecclesiastical social work, but one which may perhaps be extremely important today, would be the collaboration offered in overcoming those factors of social disintegration which are manifesting themselves at present for the most divers reasons within the local and parish communities of the Christian body itself. This [368] task is certainly the concern of pastoral activity in general, but the social activity we are considering can lend it a support which is quite essential. A first point is that the Christian community must be something more than the embodiment of a parish-dominated ideal, a regionally demarcated human group organised according to essentially pastoral conceptions, or the assembly of many unattached individuals at the same place and the same time to satisfy individual religious needs. A second point is that the community of the Church assembled for divine worship is precisely not now, as it was formerly, ipso facto a group that is integrated in terms of secular society. And a third point is that this integration cannot be achieved solely through the actual practice of divine worship as such. And all these reasons are in themselves sufficient to make it necessary for the Church to undertake a kind of social work that is specifically ecclesiastical in character, though probably it is still far from being sufficiently clearly recognised as such.

The Christian community as it exists today (and regardless of whether it is organised on regional or functional lines) is a communal as opposed to a national Church. And because of this it may sometimes be forced to adopt structures which (in terms, for instance, of the sociology of religion) seem almost to be those of a sectarian Church, even though the only point of really vital importance is that she shall not allow herself to fall into the mentality of the sect, but shall rather be missionary in outlook, committing herself boldly and without reserve to share in all aspects of the life of contemporary society, pluralist and secular as it is. But for the most part she has in fact not even the status of a genuine community Church, but rather hovers in an undefined no-man's land between the earlier 'national' Church (and she still calls her members from an environment which, sociologically speaking, provided the prior conditions for this) and a community Church in the genuine sense, constituted by individuals who have arrived at a genuine religious decision of their own, an idea which has not yet been realised.

The integration of the community itself in ecclesiastical and social terms, which cannot solely be achieved by mere 'preaching' in the normal sense of a theoretical indoctrination, is a specific task for the social work of the Church of today, and one which cannot be performed by the 'spiritual element' alone. This can be expressed in terms of images: the diaconal ministry of caritas by the deacons and deaconesses as practised today must provide for something more than merely that when the community is already assembled at the 'table' (Acts 6:2) everything shall proceed in a right and orderly fashion. It must also, and primarily

[5] Of course this must not be taken – and precisely for the reasons adduced in the present explanation – as meaning that the social work of the Church would have to be returned to clerical control. On the problems entailed here with regard to the diaconate cf. K. Rahner, H. Vorgrimler and J. Kramer, 'Zur Erneuerung des Diakonats in Deutschland', Stimmen der Zeit 180 (1967), pp. 145-153.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

see to it [369] that the union of believers whose state of integration is still weak or inadequate shall become a 'com-union' or 'table-fellowship' in fact.

And further – does not something of this also apply in its own way, today being the age of oecumenism, so far as a certain integration of groups which are confessionally divided is concerned, an integration which must come before the unity of the Churches in the strictly theological sense for which we are striving, and which alone will make this possible? Is not something of this kind too a social work of the Church which no-one except the Church or the Churches can perform? Must it not be recognised and performed, seeing that the division between the Churches has arisen precisely from sociological grounds in the broadest sense, and not merely from theological ones?

V

I know that everything which I have been able to say is, and must be, not only liable to criticism and contradiction (which is obvious), but has also remained at so abstract and formal a level that the practical exponent will ask: 'What can this lead to?' I am acutely conscious of the fact that I have only been able to contribute very little by way of an answer to those questions with which we find ourselves confronted in the concrete today, from the very nature of the case. But can the theologian, detached as he is from specialised knowledge and practical experience in these matters, do much more? Perhaps formal considerations of this kind do, after all, provide something approaching a system of co-ordination between the various points within which the real specialists both in theory and practice will be able, given sympathy and good will, to find and to locate a little more easily what they themselves have to search out and discover.

What I have sought to say was properly speaking simply the following:

First: Today the concept of caritas as a science and as a part of scientific theology could and should be thought of as an integral element in practical theology, which is itself a theological science in its own right and not simply a 'practical' supplement to the other theological disciplines. This being its status, therefore, 'caritas as a science', which derives its name from caritas as a reality, should be thought out afresh in such a way as to become the most sublime consummation and perfection of all Christian activity, the science of how Christians are to fulfil their responsibilities to the world in the concrete precisely as these arise at any given point, a 'theological cosmology'. In this way it would also be freed from the fatal suspicion that it is merely the theory of that kind of welfare which [370] becomes ever more problematical in a welfare society and in a state which itself is and must be a 'social state' or a state committed to social welfare, because in such a case the welfare services of the Church can at most perform a service of filling in the gaps where secular society unexpectedly fails.

Second: In the second and third statements an attempt has been made to show that the co-existence of ecclesiastical and secular social work is demanded by the very nature of Christianity itself, and that the problem of drawing the line of demarcation between the two is at basis not a problem to be solved by theoretical considerations and a priori deductions, but a problem demanding ever fresh decisions as history unfolds. In these decisions the Church can both boldly surrender earlier social functions which she once had, and at the same time boldly recognise and engage herself in fresh tasks of social work in the world and secular society. Fundamental considerations, therefore, prompt us to refer the problem of drawing the line of demarcation to the practitioners themselves, even though these may find it unwelcome since it lays upon them a task and decision which they would certainly gladly leave to others. But at the same time it does mean that a greater freedom is achieved for the practice of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

caritas and for its practitioners. They do not need to wait for concrete imperatives from some centre of direction which would be run merely by theorists pursuing principles. The practitioners could themselves decide, by discovering for themselves imperatives which would not merely be the transference of principles into practice, but would constitute historical, indeed charismatic decisions. In these the truth would be made manifest that practice, in contrast to theory, cannot simply be deduced, and that in such cases the practical reason takes priority over the speculative.

Third: Without prejudice to the co-existence of ecclesiastical and secular social work and the mutual influence of the one upon the other, there is a specifically ecclesiastical social work to which quite new tasks accrue today to be performed both in the world and also in the Church herself.

It has not been possible to say more. I would console myself with the ancient saying, In magnis voluisse sat est, for it still always remains true that the greatest factor of all is love. If we have attempted to speak of this and to praise this, then we may hope and entreat for pardon.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[371] THE PEACE OF GOD AND THE PEACE OF THE WORLD

IT is extraordinary how many different levels of significance can be found in this subject. For this reason a few preliminary observations may be permitted in order to indicate the almost incalculable breadth of the questions and tasks implied by this title, and at the same time to make clear the limits of what is here being attempted.[1]

1. If we are to speak of peace theologically, then we must speak of peace with God, peace with ourselves, peace in the contacts and relationships between man and man, and within these relationships peace between the generations, the classes, the age-groups and the sexes. We should also—because this too is of concern to theologians—have something to say with regard to peace in the international sphere and of the old-fashioned idea of peace. And finally we should give some consideration, precisely as theo- logians, to that political peace which is implicit in the current situation, in which the tendency of world history is towards an ever-increasing and ultimately total unity.[2] The question of how these various kinds of peace, [372] with God, with one's self, in human relationships, in more private contacts and at the political and international levels, are related to one another is, of course, in turn, a question in itself for the theologian, for manifestly he has the impression, even after reading the scriptures, that these various modes in which peace is realised have an intrinsic relationship and unity among themselves, and that on a radical view one kind demands the other. Only the individual who is conscious in some sense of being interiorly at peace with himself, and who—as we Christians say—lives ultimately at peace with God, can truly and radically maintain that attitude which can also contribute to peace among men.

2. In all its dimensions, therefore, this peace—and this is something that opens up a whole range of further levels in the theology of this con- cept—has forms which are subject to wide variations. At a later stage we shall have to see still more clearly that the concept of 'conflict' and 'war' in a metaphysical sense and in terms of existential ontology, and probably also in a theological sense, is not so simple or obvious that we could react to it with a simple refusal in favour of peace as the obviously right attitude to assume. To that extent there are necessarily genuine forms of peace and true forms of conflict. And hence even from this point of view the theolo- gian will have to

---

[1] It has been necessary to keep the actual article concise. For this reason it has been attempted in the notes to draw attention to certain phenomena and certain problems in order to make apparent the whole perspective in which the author has intended his fragmentary observations to be understood.

[2] On this cf. the observations of C. F. v. Weizsacker, Bedingungen des Friedens (Göttingen '1964); idem, Gedanken iiber unsere Zukunft (Gottingen 1966); idem, 'Zumutungen der Freiheit', Gber die Freiheit, M. Horkheimer, K. Rahner, C. F. v. Weizsacker edd. (Stuttgart [2]i965), pp. 53-76; idem, 'Ethische und politische Prob- leme des Atomzeitalters', Integritas. Festschrift fiir K. Hol^amer, D. Stolte, R. Wisser edd. (Tubingen 1966), pp. 337-355. cf. also the further studies by Weizsacker mentioned in the notes which follow. See also T. Brocher, W. Gerlach, R. Lowen- thal, N. Sombart, P. G. Walker, R. v. Weizsacker, Der Zwang %um Frieden (Stuttgart 1967). On the concept of peace and the idea of peace in the context of politology and history cf. the following works: H. J. Morgenthau, Macht und Frieden (Giitersloh 1963) and R. Aron, Frieden und Krieg (Frankfurt 1963). On the history of the movements for peace cf. K. v. Raumer, Ewige Friede. Friedensrufe and Friedensplane seit der Renaissance (Freiburg 1953); H. J. Schlochauer, Die Idee des ewigen Friedens (Bonn 1953); cf. also U. Nerlich (ed.), I. Krieg and Frieden im industriellen Zeitaker and II. Krieg und Frieden in der modernen Staatenwelt (Giitersloh 1966). The comprehensive Catholic literature of recent years bearing on our problem is not explicitly adduced because it has been reviewed in certain excellent bulletins of the periodical Concilium, cf. R. Coste, 'Pacifism and Legitimate Defence', Concilium 5/1 (1965), pp. 45-52; F. Bockle, 'Peace and Modern Warfare; Theological Discussion in West Germany" 5/2, Concilium (1966), pp. 69-75; cf. also below, n. 7.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

exercise great prudence in his work with regard to the question of war and conflict on the one hand, and of peace on the other. Certainly there have already been times at which Christians became, to a greater or lesser extent, the representatives of the sort of quiet that belongs to the graveyard, times, moreover, at which a pseudo-Christian ideology[3] was actually invoked in support of the thesis that the primary duty is to ensure that the citizen shall have quiet. And there is a modern anti- Christian ideology according to which the sole possible realistic form of peace consists in an equilibrium of fear.[4] All this shows how widely vary-[373]ing in form that phenomenon can be which is so commonly characterised as peace. From the time of the Fathers of the Church onwards Christianity and the Church have always and actively concerned themselves with the question of the relationship of Christianity to the soldier's calling,[5] to war in the concrete sense, to nationalism,[6] to the question of conscientious objectors,[7] and always in very varying ways and with very varying results. Today the refusal to rely on physical force is certainly on the way or is actually being pressed as a watchword within Christendom itself.[8] This again shows how many theological problems are connected with the question of peace. [374]

3. A more important idea, and one which has a quite direct connection with our understanding of peace, belongs to that which we call 'power'.[9] It is manifest that Christians or theologians are not simply at one with regard to their judgments upon

---

[3] On the erroneousness of this ideological interpretation of the understanding of peace cf. the radical statements of principle in Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/2 (Freiburg 1966), pp. 148-180 (with bibliography).

[4] cf. ibid., pp. 142, 184 f.

[5] For the early period cf. H. v. Campenhausen, 'Der Kriegsdienst der Christen in der Kirche des Altertums', Tradition und Leben (Tubingen 1960), pp. 203-215 (bibliography); J. M. Hornus, Politische Entscheidung in der Alten Kirche (Munich 1963). On the connected questions cf. also A.A.T. Ehrhardt, Politische Metaphysik von Solon bis Augustin I-II (Tubingen 1959).

[6] On this cf. the still always interesting expositions of E. Peterson, Theologische Traktate (Munich 1951), pp. 45-147.

[7] cf. the Pastoral Constitution, 'On the Church in the World of Today', No. 79. On peace and co-operation between nations cf. No. 77—90. B. Drees, 'Das Konzil zur Frage des Krieges, des Friedens und der Volkergemeinschaft', Umkehr und Erneuerung. Kirche nach Jem Kon^il, T. Filthaut ed. (Mainz 1966), pp. 393-403. More comprehensive studies on the teaching of the Council are to be found in a symposium of studies on the interpretation of the Pastoral Constitution 'On the Church in the World of Today' published by Paul Brand Verlag (Hilversum), a work which will also be brought out in translation by other publishers: L. J. Lebret O.P. on social and economic life and on the demand for co-operation between nations; J. Y. Calvez S.J. on the life of the political community and D. Dubarle O.P. on the position of the Council with regard to war and peace, cf. e.g. the French edition, L'eglise dans le monde de ce temps. Constitution [l]Gaudium et Spes'. Commen- taires du Schema XIII (Paris 1967), especially D. Dubarle, 'Le Schema XIII et la guerre', pp. 327-393- Reference must be made in quite general terms to the com- mentaries on the Pastoral Constitution (cf. Das Zweite Vadkanische Kon^il I—III [Freiburg 1966—1968]; the commentaries belonging to the series 'Unam Sanctam [Paris 1966—1968] etc.); W. Dirks, 'Die Entdeckung des geschichtlichen Risikos und die Folgen. Zum Verhaltnis zwischen Politik und kirchlichem Lehramt', Hochland 59 (1967), pp. 280-285.

[8] This could be demonstrated for the Catholic side also by pointing to a certain difference in teaching or development in teaching leading up to the acceptance of the Council documents. Apart from the works already mentioned in n. 7 cf. also R. P. Regamey, Gewaldosigkeit (Vienna 1966). On the history of the developments leading up to the conciliar document cf., apart from D. Dubarle, a further work by R. Regout, La doctrine de la guerre juste de St. Augustin a nos jours (Paris 1935); R. Coste, Le proileme du droit de guerre dans la pensee de Pie XII (Paris 1962); idem, Morale Internationale (Paris 1964); G. Gundlach, 'Die Lehre Pius' XII vom modernen Krieg', Die Ordnung der menschlichen Gesellschaft I (Cologne 1964), pp. 637-651.

[9] For an initial orientation with regard to the concept of power cf. R, Hauser, 'Macht*, Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe II (Munich 1963), pp. 98-111 (bibliography); Handbuch der Pastordltheologie II/z, pp. 358 ff., 362 ff., 365 ff. (Bibliography, PP- 337-340).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

power. Is power something which, on any ultimate view, belongs ipso jacto from the outset, and necessarily, to the sphere of sin? Does the basis on which power rests consist solely and exclusively in the sinful world and in the fact of its sinfulness, or is there initially a power such that, even though in the concrete conditions of the world it is always, as it were, corrupted by sin, it nevertheless has properly speaking and of its true nature a different function and a real justification for its existence in the world?

In any such question we would first have to explain what is meant by power. Now we may take this concept of 'power' to mean the process in which one man is influenced by another, and the possibility which he has of determining that other's course, this act of determining his course being prior to the free decision of the man so acted upon. For my part I believe that this is more or less correct as a concept of power. Now if this is correct then we may perhaps be forced to say that the presence of some such phenqmenon as power in the world is necessary, and that power of this kind belongs to the essential conditions of human living; that although—as the theologians will say—it is true that power is always sinfully misused as well, nevertheless this sinful misuse cannot on that account be totally overcome simply by adopting the attitude of an absolute renunciation of power. On the basis of a conception of power of this kind the question would then have to be raised of the inevitable existence of conflict and-in a metaphyscial and theological sense—of war. On this showing the specifically Christian question would he more concerned with the concrete forms and manifestations of power and of conflict in so far as these could, from certain aspects, be considered the responsibility of the Christian alone. The question of how the Christian might gradually attempt to overcome this inescapable 'existential' or condition of human living as defined by power and conflict in history, or at least how he can impart to history a tendency towards such a conquest through that love which, in the last analysis he alone can have who knows that he is loved by God—this is a question the answer to which will only be attempted at a later stage. Here too we shall confine ourselves simply to making clear how the theological [375] problems involved in peace become lost in a whole range of connected questions which is far broader in its extent.

4. A further question is how to achieve a right approach to peace considered as a theological phenomenon. In this we must not simply postulate some false Utopian or romantic image of absolute rest and permanent equilibrium, something which does admittedly represent a lofty ideal in the concrete cirumstances of our life, but which, nevertheless, does not provide us with very much force with which to realise it. And if this is the case, then at the same time we must seek for that concept which, in terms of theological meaning, constitutes the opposite pole to that of peace. The moment, for instance, one formulates the theological concept of concupiscence[10] it carries with it ipso facto and in each case the further idea of an interior dissatisfaction on man's part, a state of inward conflict, a plurality of the forces within him of which, ultimately speaking, he is not in control, and which he cannot reduce to any state of definitive integration.[11] What is being spoken of, therefore, is a 'war' and 'conflict' of man within [10] This is enough to show, at least by way of indication, why it is inadvisable to present the concept of 'sin' without further distinction (to the extent namely that there is a difference between this and the concept of 'concupiscence'!) as the opposite of'peace'. On the concept of concupiscence cf. K. Rahner, 'The Theological Concept of Concupiscentia', Theological Investigations I (London and Baltimore 1961), pp. 347-382; J. B. Metz, 'Konkupiszenz', Handbuch theolagischer Grundbegriffe I (Munich 1962), pp. 843-851; cf. also the observations which follow.

[11] Apart from the literature already mentioned cf. Handbuch der Pastorahheologie II/i, pp. 22-24 (with references).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

himself, and this involves as its counterpart the opposite idea of peace with himself that comes through God and from God.

5. The theological and Christian problem of peace is further associated with the question of what the idea of'peace' is really intended to conjure up. What does it mean to conceive of this as 'the order of justice',[12] seeing that 'order' and 'justice' are, and continue to be, in a certain sense extremely obscure concepts? What does such a concept of peace signify when we raise the question of a dynamism of history which will certainly not be held at any one specific point in an equilibrium of power, of social relationship etc., which is wholly predetermined? What must we say with regard to peace seeing that the question of a theology of revolution can be raised and that the young people precisely are today inclined, even in their Christian representatives, to invoked Christian watchword to the effect that under certain circumstances revolution may be necessary.13 This in itself is, of course, enough to indicate the question of how a theology of history on the one hand and the theology of peace on the other are related to one another since they are two factors which can be taken as having a necessary connection with one another and so reveal a further range of theological problems into which the question of peace leads us.

6. Today the peace which we seek in the international sphere is depen- dent to an extraordinary extent upon the growing unity of the history of the world, upon a situation of secularism in the sphere of culture, of society, of the state and of politics, and also upon the rationalisation and technical manipulation of the world. And in view of this it is obvious that any question of the theology of peace invariably implies also something in the nature of an enquiry into the theology of the worldliness of the world, the unity of contemporary world history in general, a theology which consists in analysing the contemporary situation in world history and the factor of the rational and the technical in human living.[14] This in turn entails a further and almost incalculable range of problems associated with the question of the theology of peace.

7. Properly speaking if the theologian sets himself to consider the question of peace he must also consider his theology of justice and his theology of love, his theology of the mutual relationship between justice and love. He must enter into a problem which, in current theology, is once more becoming very clear: the problem, namely, of how we should conceive of the unity and the distinction between love of God and love [377] of neighbour upon an originally and authentically Christian

---

[12] The definition of peace in this sense is essentially connected with our basic understanding of the western concepts of state, justice and order. For a few witnesses to this cf. H. Kriiger, Allgemeine. Staatslehre (Stuttgart 1964), pp. 714 ff.; cf. H. Fuchs, Augustinus und der Friedensgedanke (Berlin 1926); F. Wiesenthal, Die Wandlung des Friedensbegrijfs von Augustinus iu Thomas von Aquino (Diss. jur. Munich 1949); A. Brecht, Politische Theorie (Tubingen 1961), pp. 484, 494 ff.; B. de Jouvenel; Ober Souveranitat (Neuwied 1966), pp. 169 ff. Further bibliography in the Staats/exi-kon der Gorresgesellschaft III (Freiburg 1959), p. 605.

[13] The critical attitude of the Christian towards the world as a matter of positive and creative activity is becoming a focal point for the consideration of theologians (cf. e.g. the theologies of hope by J. Moltmann, J. B. Metz, W. D. Marsch), and a point inevitably arising from this is the need for a ‘theology of revolution’. The problem appears still more urgent in the recent theologies (chiefly Protestant in character) which can be recognised as just emerging in Asia, Africa and South America. On this subject cf. especially H. Arendt, Über die Revolution (Munich 1963)[5] Guerre revolutionnaire et conscience chretienne (published by Pax Christi, rue de 1’Abbaye [Paris 1964]); D. Dubarle, Le Schema XIII et la guerre, pp. 337 f.; J. B. Metz, ‘Religion und Revolution’, Neues Forum XIV (1967), pp. 460—464; cf. Ev. Tkeol. 27 (1967), Nos. II—12.

[14] On the problems mentioned above as a whole cf. the comprehensive analysis by the author and others in the Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/i-2.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

conception.[15] Undoubtedly the question of peace is not wholly unconnected with the Christian message of love of neighbour, and this love of neighbour has manifestly something to do with that which we call the love of God for us and our love for God. In the biblical concept of agape the various aspects of both kinds of love are already indissolubly interconnected.16 According as each theologian views the love of God and love of neighbour as a unity he will undoubtedly modify also his concept of that peace which is achieved through this single love of God and love of neighbour. In fact a further problem which arises for theology is that of Christian and secular humanism, and this too in turn has connections with a theology of peace. Is there such a thing as a unity between men such that they become one in their humanity and one in their humanism?17 Is there a material content belonging to a humanism of this kind such that in it Christians and non-Christians could be at one, so that on this basis they could achieve a common concept of what they really understand by peace? These too are problems and questions which are evidently not so easy to solve, and which can serve in turn to throw light upon the whole multidimensional character of a theology of peace.

II

With regard to the biblical concept of peace only a few indications should be given.[18] On any showing 'peace' as presented in the Old and New [378] Testaments is one of the most important religious concepts. Shalom in the Old Testament signifies, ultimately speaking, a state of wellbeing, of having overcome an evil of some kind. It therefore signifies a state of good fortune, precisely a 'being whole', so that a man can salute his fellow with the greeting Shalom, 'Peace be to you'. And even on this basis this state of 'wholeness', precisely in those cases in which it is applied to an area involving human relationships, also acquires the significance of peace, and is therefore translated in the Sepruagint as eirene. In this connection, how- ever, we must constantly keep clearly before our eyes the fact that this specifically Old Testament concept originally had a far broader, deeper and more comprehensive meaning than that which we attach to the term 'peace' today, thinking of it in a sense

---

[15] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Reflections on the Unity of the Love of Neighbour and the Love of God", Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), pp.231-249.

[16] On this cf. the well known investigations on the New Testament concept of agape by C. Spicq, V. Warnach etc.

[17] On this cf. the Council documents 'On the Church in the World of Today', Nos. 21, 8;, 88, 90, 'Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity', No. 27, 'Decree on the Missions', No. 41.

[18] On this aspect pertaining to biblical theology cf., apart from the concordances, W. Foerster, G. v. Rad, T.W.N.T. II (Stuttgart 1935), pp. 398-418; W. S. van Leeuwen, Eirene in net Nieuwe Testament (Wageningen 1940); J. J. Stamm, H. Bietenhard, Der Weltfriede im Licht der Bibel (Zurich 1959); J. Comblin, Theologie des Friedens I (Graz 1963); H. Gross, Die Idee des ewigen und allgemeinen Weltfriedens im Alten Orient undim Alten Testament (Treves 1956); E. Biser, Der Sinn des Friedens (Munich 1960); H. H. Schrey, 'Krieg und Frieden im N.T.', Fur Arbeit und Besinnung 5 (1951), pp. 466—480; S. Herrmann, Die prophetischen Heilserwartungen im A.T. = Beitrdge %ur Wisszn schaft vom A.T. und N.T. 5th series, No. 5 (85) (Stuttgart 1965); cf. also the relevant treatises in L.T.K. V (Freiburg "1960), 366-369, and in R.G.G. II (Tubingen [1]i958), 1133-1135, and in X. Leon-Dufour ed., Dictionary of Biblical Theology (London 1970), pp. 312-315; also in the Theologies of the Old and New Testaments (W. Eichrodt, L. Koehler, P. v. Imschoot, T. C. Vriezen, M. Meinertz, R. Bultmann etc.). On the concept of peace in the New Testament cf. also P. Mikat in his address on the occasion of the conferring of the peace prize of the German book trade on Augustin, Cardinal Bea and Willem A. Visser't Hooft (Frankfurt am Main 1966), pp. 23—39, C. Westermann, Shalom: Der Frieden 1st unter uns (Stuttgart 1967—Preparatory number for the Conference of the Protestant Church at Hannover 1967), pp. 29-31. H. Bacht, 'Dimensionen des Friedens', Geist und Lelen 40 (1967), pp. 4-12; 194-303; Frieden (Kreuz-Verlag, Stuttgart 1967).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

that is based on politics or merely on human relationships. This peace in the Old Testament is, of its very nature and right from the outset, something that has to be supplicated from God, because without God there can be no peace. And in the Old Testament prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel peace in this sense precisely becomes the key word for what is central to the content of salvation in all its aspects, and as such also becomes in the case of Isaiah the key word for messianic expectation. Because of this peace already comes, under certain circumstances—by including, as it were, protology and eschatology within a single conspectus—something approaching the restoration of the para- disal peace which was destroyed by original sin,[19] and on this view the Messiah is the princeps pads, the prince of peace. But even here peace is, once more, interpreted as the all-inclusive content of salvation.

In the New Testament too, therefore, the Christian message (Eph 6:15) can be called the 'gospel of peace', that peace of which God is the author and Jesus Christ the mediator. Peace is, then, that which is mediated by Christ in the Spirit through a new creation as the fruit of the Pneuma, so [379] that he is our peace. And this peace is regarded as the peace which exists between God and men (Rom 5: 1). Hence peace then ensues between men but in such a way that this peace is also really and effectively the appease- ment of that interior conflict which has arisen in man through sin.

On this basis we might pursue the concept of peace through all depart- ments of theology. When we came to consider the doctrine of creation we would have, as it were, to regard the openness of the creature to salvation, the ability to be saved, the possibility of attaining to its own 'union with God' as peace, as well as the counterpart of this from God's side. In Christology, when we speak of the plenitude of grace in Christ then Christ is precisely he who is in his own person this peace between God and the world, and from whom the new order of the world as recon- ciled with God is initiated. In any presentation of ecclesiology we might wholeheartedly follow the Second Vatican Council in viewing the Church as, so to say, the sacramental sign in history, the historical manifestation, of this self-utterance of God which unites the world with God and in itself, and so gives it peace.[20] In a presentation of ethics peace could be regarded as the goal at which work for the kingdom of God is aimed, and in a presentation of eschatology we could speak of a hope for the eternal rest, and in that case once more this peace would be being regarded as the content of eschatological hope.

III

We must now turn to a further point and attempt to say something on the theology of peace and of the peaceable attitude or state of mind. A thesis might be formulated, however untimely it might sound, which would not give a very Christian impression and yet perhaps would be extremely Christian: the 'conflict' which is a 'war' so long as this world in which we live endures, so long as the 'kingdom of God' is not made present by the act of Godhimself— is an abiding reality, and insuperable 'existential' of human living. In spite of this the Christian—in precisely the same way as mankind in general—has an abiding task to create peace, and so both must constantly be expressing the demand that humanitarian principles shall prevail.

This thesis derives from a realism that is Christian and anti-ideological. As has [19] cf. especially the eschatology of the prophets: Hos 2: 20; Amos 9: 13; Is 9: 5; Zech 9: 9 f.; Is 9: 6; Mic 5: 4; Is 2: 2, 11: 1, 32: 15-20, 65: 25, 66: 12, 48: 18. For alayses of these cf. S. Herrmann, Die prophetischen Heilserwartungen im A. T. (cf. n. 18).

[20] cf. the Constitution on the Church of the Second Vatican Council, Nos. 1, 9, 48, 59 etc.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

already been said, any genuine Christian theology can and must recognise the inescapability and the necessity of that which is called and is power. Every individual is, to a certain extent, in virtue of his very existence, and in the very act of his self-fulfilment within the general sphere [380] of existence common to all men, one who alters the situation of freedom, the sphere of freedom open to his fellow, restricting it in some measure prior to any agreement on the latter's part21 After all this is, more or less, what power means, and a power more or less of this sort is unmistakably present. Of course the Christian will always recognise that this natural 'existential' of human living, which is inevitable and which, therefore, since man is not merely sin, is perfectly legitimate, is de facto always conditioned by sin as well, in other words by the sinful uses to which this inevitable power is put. But if such a power is present not merely in the sphere of our private lives, in which we mutually restrict the field of liberty open to one another, but is present also in the dimension of society and of peoples, then it is quite impossible for Christianity, maintaining as it does an anti-ideological realism of this kind, to escape from something like a war in this sense, that is to say conflict or contradiction. For the situation is that many human lives, each of which is multidimensional in itself, are in process of achieving their self-fulfilment in many ways. All of them exist within a single finite sphere of freedom, and therefore necessarily mutually restrict one another within this sphere of freedom. And it is this that constitutes the exercise of such a power, which ultimately speaking cannot be guided or controlled by any earthly authority. The reason for this is that any such central and totalitarian administration, or any division of this single sphere of existence of the kind that this would imply, would in fact represent the greatest exercise of power, in fact the most radical use of force by man.

When applied in an anti-ideological sense, therefore, Christian realism soberly recognises the existence of power and therefore of conflict as one side of human living. It does not raise this power to the status of an ideo- logy or accord it an absolute value. It precisely does not want this power to be administered by an ultimate and central tribunal within this present world.[22] It is, therefore, against any ideological or any practical monopoli- sation of this power, but at the same time it also recognises that it is [381] inevitable that there shall be something in the nature of conflict, contradic- tion and war. The Christian, therefore, is sufficiently realistic to take his stand in principle at a point halfway between a total rejection of power, an absolute hostility towards it on the one hand, and an attitude on the other in which power is accorded an absolute value raised to an ideology and monopolised.

The Christian is in principle opposed to both extremes, for ultimately speaking

---

[21] On this interpretation of freedom and the scope of freedom cf. K. Rahner, 'Ursprlinge der Freiheit', Über die Freiheit, M. Horkheimer, K. Rahner, C. F. v. Weizsäcker edd. (Stuttgart 1965), esp. pp. 35-44.

[22] On the whole cf. K. Rahner, 'The Theology of Power', Theological Investiga- tions IV (London and Baltimore 1966), pp. 391—409. The extent to which modern psychology, sociology and anthropology too regard the state of 'readiness to be unpeaceable', the situation of conflict, 'covetousness' etc. as almost insuperably powerful as factors in human life is made plain in the following studies: J. von Graevenitz, 'Personliche Voraussetzungen der Friedferrigkeit', Streit um den Frieden, W. Beck and R. Schmid edd. (Munich/Mainz 1967), pp. 11-30; T. Brocher, "Psychologische Aspekte des Friedens', T. Brocher et al., Der Zwang [um FrieJen (Stuttgart 1967), pp. 17-31; T. Brocher, 'Angst und AngrifF, Der FrieJen ist unter uns (Stuttgart 1967), pp. 21-24; K. Lorenz, Das sogenannte Base. Zur Naturgeschichte der Aggres- sion (Vienna 1964); E. Denker, Aufklärung iiber Aggression (Stuttgart 1966); H. Schoeck, Der Neid. Sine Theorie der Gesellscha.fi (Freiburg 1966); H. R. Liickert, Der Mensch als konflikttrachtiges Wesen (Munich 1964); idem, Konfliktpsychologie (Munich 1965). In interpreting this situation, which pertains to the nature of man as it de facto exists, greater emphasis should be laid upon the factor of 'concupiscence'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

they come to the same. For the absolute abrogation of power and of the conflict or contradiction ensuing from it, the abrogation of a situation of struggle in general, would be possible only through an abso- lute monopolisation of power, and this would precisely be absolute tyranny.[23] The Christian cannot agree to any easy compromise, but must maintain a genuinely central position between these two extremes, be- cause precisely in virtue of his awareness of his own creatureliness he must recognise from the outset that he, the individual, must not set himself up as the absolute representative of God in the world,[24] since he cannot be this. A further reason is that neither the Church or state on the one hand, nor any different body on the other, representing science or some other finite concrete entity in the world, can or should set itself up, as it were, as absolutely acting in God's place, and so as having absolute authority to decide how the sphere of freedom should be divided between men.

The Christian's attitude is that any attempt to develop the ideal of an absolute peace in this present world into an ideology would imply the death, the end of history, a fellahin culture or rather lack of culture, and precisely the state of absolute tyranny.[25] In other words the sober anti- ideological realism of the Christian, who takes due account of conflict, contradiction and war, provides what is precisely the sole genuine possibility of coping with the problem of war and conflict in general in a [382] manner that is fully human, because any attempt at radically abolishing conflict and war would precisely imply the ultimate in tyranny, the most extreme concentration of power.

Nevertheless the Christian has the most solemn duty and task, and one which radically and vitally affects his salvation, of restraining this inevit- able conflict, of inculcating humanity, and, to the utmost of his power, of avoiding it. Obviously he has also, as one who knows about sins and in fact about his own sins, a critical attitude towards power and authority. He knows that this authority is one of the forces in the world which are indeed created by God, but which, nevertheless, can at the same time constitute the greatest possible temptation to man to put them to a wrong use and perhaps actually to rebel against God by means of them. To that extent he has always the task of bringing humanitarian standards to bear upon the struggle, just as, for instance 'blood feuds' and individual acts of retribution against private enemies have actually been eliminated from our society today.

When, therefore, it is asserted that theology, on the basis of a sober Christian realism which is anti-ideological in character, maintains that power, and therefore conflict too—that is war in the abstract sense—cannot be eliminated this obviously does not mean that the old and seem- ingly immovable forms in which power has been customarily applied in the past need always remain the same as they were, or even that we can allow them to do so. The opposite is true.[26] Precisely the struggle against these forms of war, forms which are still less than human, must be con- ducted precisely in the light of the anti-ideological realism of the Christian with its capacity for sober criticism.

IV

Now if we ask as Christian theologians how and in what way this effort or this task to [23] cf. ibid., pp. 497 ff. etc.

[24] In greater detail, ibid., pp. 503 ff. (the temptations of power.)
[25] On this cf. also R. Dahrendorf, Gesellschaft und Freiheit (Munich 1961), pp. 85 ff., 237 ff., 321 ff., 363 ff. On this problem cf. also H. Steubing, Der Kompromiss als ethisches Problem (Gutersloh 1955).
[26] cf. the conciliar decrees mentioned in nn. 7, 17.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

achieve a humanisation of the struggle and of power is to be conducted, then what first comes to mind—at least as far as Catholics are concerned—are the two Christian key words of 'justice' and 'love'. It is in fact stated in a noteworthy manner in the Second Vatican Council that peace is not the outcome of any human dictatorship or a balance of power between opposing forces, but is in a true and proper sense the work of justice.[27] Now obviously we cannot here embark upon an attempt to [383] present a theology of the nature of what is here meant by justice and love considered as the means by which the conflict is to be humanised.[28] This would go beyond the scope and the limitations of the present considera- tion. Thus only a few indications may be made at this point.

It could in fact be said that peace exists where 'each individual is accorded his due' in justice. Certainly some kind of description of justice could be given by explaining the phrase suum cuique, but in that case what is right and fair for 'each individual'? The question still remains, how can we in this one finite sphere of freedom, attain to that equality in which no one individual receives less than his due. Justice is constantly in danger of stopping short at the level of an organised egoism, and thereby, once more, providing the occasion for that conflict and war which has to be overcome and humanised. Whereas justice says, in a certain sense: 'to each according to his due', 'Let me have what is mine and you keep what is yours', Christian love says: 'What is mine is yours.'

Now certainly if we wish to remain realistic as Christians we must always keep clearly before our eyes the abiding fact that justice and love are two distinct entities. In this concrete world in which there is a plural- ism even of virtues, justice cannot simply be elevated into that love which never counts the cost to itself, and which is self-forgetful in such a way that all the Christian would have to do for everything to be well would be to practise that prodigality, that self-forgetfulness of love, in which he no longer sought to assert any claims on his own behalf. There remains too a pluralism in our Christian attitudes which itself cannot adequately be integrated or elevated into a higher synthesis—for instance precisely that of love. This is a pluralism which, in a true sense, must be endured by the Christian so long as this present age lasts. This sounds terribly abstract, yet it is an extremely practical matter.

Certainly there is and must be that love in the life of the Christian in which he abandons himself, renounces himself, surrenders his own rights, allows his fellow to have his way with him, achieves the folly of power- lessness, and really rises above the level of organised self-interest to the folly of self-abandonment according to the model which God has set before him in Jesus Christ. But Christian love as applied in the concrete in all that plurality which cannot be controlled by man, and which is to be found even in the virtues belonging to man, also means precisely that under certain circumstances it can be not merely a possibility, not merely morally permissible, but an actual duty for man to establish that kind of [384] justice which at some specific point precisely does not put into practice the holy foolishness of love, but rather seeks soberly, intelligently and empiri- cally to create conditions in which rights may be distributed between all concerned. This is what is so fearfully difficult and at the same time once more what is utterly realistic and down to earth in this Christian attitude.[29]

---

[27] cf. the Pastoral Constitution 'On the Church in the World of Today', No. 78 (Is 32:17: Peace as a 'work of righteousness'; cf. also p. 375 n. 12.).

[28] On the basic determining factors in the classical concept of justice or righteous- ness cf. J. Pieper, Über die Gerechtigkeit (Munich [3]1950). cf. above p. 375, n. 12.

[29] On how love is related to the other virtues cf. K. Rahner, 'The "Command- ment" of Love in Relation to the Other Commandments', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore 1966),

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If I may so express it, it cannot reduce love to justice. Love is, from the Christian point of view, really something different from the intelligent organisation of human living such that each receives at least a portion from the cake of worldly prosperity. Love is really something more like the element of madness, of the improbable, of that which does not pay, that through which we continue to be the ones who do the paying and in which we let ourselves be exploited.[30] Love is, therefore, something too in which we are bold enough to make experiments—of the kind, for instance, which our politicians are always so frightened of making.

On the other hand, however, we cannot turn Christian living into some kind of marvellous and blessed paroxysm of love in which we strip our- selves of all power. This task of coming to terms with both aspects for the sake-of peace is one that is incalculable and that changes according to the changes in the particular situation concerned. It is the task of the Christian, and one for which, ultimately speaking, neither the Churches nor the letter of the gospel can supply any readymade or concrete formula. Admittedly the Christian will again and again have to tell himself- in the spirit and meaning of the Sermon on the Mount—that in a true and ulti- mate sense it is his duty to keep his eyes fixed upon the folly of God on the Cross, and so in all cases of doubt, whether at the individual or personal level, or at the collective and political one, to opt for the folly of love in that situation in human life in which he is placed in concrete history, which makes demands upon him and yet all the time remains ambiguous. And yet so long as the age of this present world lasts justice, so sober, realistic and hard as it seems, and even when it involves the use of power, whether in private or in public life, can precisely be the earthly form in which an extremely selfless love is embodied, which perhaps even for the sake of another may have to find courage enough to appear as though it were devoid of love.

A further point must be added to this: the experience of man shows [385] again and again that mere justice, however strict it may be in not claiming more than its due, always fails, is always reduced to absurdity arid, taken by itself, can never provide a basis for peace.

The sphere of freedom open to us in our mode of living becomes ever more restricted and, from the point of view of sociology, ever more com- plicated systems of dividing it are required. Because of this it will become, in a certain sense, ever less possible to establish solely as an end in itself an ideology by which to divide this sphere of freedom realistically in order to create peace. The world is a place in which all men are, as it were, justified in living and claiming their own due, and in which they actually seek to assert their own sinful egoism. But this world will become more and more the danger area in which a highly explosive mixture is present. And the more we seek to divide this restricted sphere of living in an equable manner the less peace will prevail. Wherever this sphere of human living is growing ever narrower, and wherever a frenzied will to be just asserts itself as an absolute, there naturally and inevitably an ideology will come into force and will proclaim intolerantly and again and again as a fresh message that there is nothing to wish for, no peace and no justice to achieve, unless it yields power and ‘right’ to a single absolute autonomous totalitarian centre to determine what is due to each individual, and thereby to achieve a just distribution of the one source of prosperity to be found upon earth.

Man after all is not an animal, and even in the empirical world belonging to him there is a vital need for that folly and mystery of love. But when he comes to this pp. 439-459.

---

[30] Here we might recall an interpretation of love in the sense of 1 Cor 13.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

point the Christian asks how man can really manage, in a manner that is fully justified, to renounce something to which he has a right or at least supposes that he has a right. I know that regrettably I am forced to speak in very abstract terms, but I believe that thereby we really are attaining to a point of central importance. There is much that an indivi- dual can renounce simply because, for instance, he wants to be left in peace; because under certain circumstances he may feel that egoism as practised by a group of two or of many is of greater advantage than being egoistical in a more primitive, solipsist or individualistic sense. But in the human living of the individual and also in political and national life moments will arise again and again in which something should be and has to be renounced such that the renouncing of it no longer benefits the renouncer, where, as it were, he feels himself threatened and injured in [386] the most personal claims which he makes upon existence.[31] Precisely in the Protestant theology of the Reformation period great emphasis was laid upon this, and in the Catholic theology of the natural law perhaps too little attention was paid to the fact that here, in these matters, there is a difference—we cannot examine it in greater detail at this point—between the private sphere and the political and national sphere. But in this case the situation is such that we have to entertain that love which is capable of renouncing that which seems to belong to one as a necessity, a necessity of life, and even a necessity of salvation. And the question is what resources man can find within himself really to achieve this.

Among this world's goods I can only as a last resort renounce that which seems to be a necessity of life if I am conscious of being so radically loved by someone that that which is mine is constituted by the infinite fulness of life that is his. Thus, as it were, in him and in his love is to be found the only place in which I can give way and allow my fellow his due within this present world. And this is precisely the point to which any rationally organised and intelligent egoism no longer extends. On the other hand a man cannot, in any true sense, adopt a position of sheer paradox by taking his fellow more seriously than himself,[32] and ultimately speaking he can only take himself and his fellow seriously, and concede something to him which is truly his, if he is conscious that both he and his fellow are already at rest in, and encompassed by the infinite land, in the infinitude of love and freedom, in peace with God. Only then can there no longer be any question of whether I have this or that, whether I am a little more or a little less fortunate, more or less solitary. Here peace with God, his love bestowed in the event of his self-utterance, becomes that which opens the way to and makes possible that other love which is also precisely that which opens the way to peace among men.

Obviously this is not to provide a formula which, if it were applied in this sense, would bring the world once and for all into a condition of peace, that is of a sheer absence of disagreement. In fact all this takes place in a changing history. All this takes place in a synthesis which is ever new, and which has to be discovered in ever different forms, between a love which commits itself and offers itself and a justice which asserts itself even rightly so that under certain circumstances this love can even initiate [387] the use of force or even revolution and a state of 'non-peace'.[33] Thus it can be a correct view that the first duty of the citizen is unrest. All this is possible if

---

[31] cf. also in this sense the Pastoral Constitution 'On the Church in the World of Today', No. 79. (Bibliography cf. p. 373, n. 7.)

[32] The problem of 'love of self cannot be treated of at this point. On this cf. R. Volkl, 'Selbstliebe', L.T.K. IX (Freiburg ^{2}i9<54), 926/927 (with copious biblio- graphical references).

[33] It surely does not need to be explicitly demonstrated that in this context a great number of variations is to be found. On the subject itself cf. also p. 376, n. 13.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

love accords justice its right and proper status, confines it within this proper status, and commands it. If the just man is conscious that he can and should be the man who hazards himself and commits himself, the man who dares to make experiments, then this will only be possible in the hope that in this process which is still unfolding—not through the efforts of men but through the deed of God—the kingdom of God is actually present, and in it that peace which surpasses all under- standing,[34] a peace which is no longer built upon a synthesis of the kind of which we have been speaking, always unstable, always to be established afresh, or upon a precarious balance of all the elements which constitute human living in the here and now so long as history is still unfolding. It is obvious that against this background of theological considerations we ought, as men and Christians, to set ourselves to consider specific problems which are necessary in this world as we experience it in the concrete: as a world of hunger, of illiteracy, of atomic bombs, of ever increasing inter-involvement on the part of nations and the histories belonging to them; the world of the technical mastery and the media of communication of the present, of the present needs of man and of the population explosion. It is necessary to consider these specific problems in order thereby to preserve and to establish something at least which holds out some prospect of a tolerable peace.[35] What, therefore, is the final impression which the Christian as he exists in the concrete will receive precisely from the sort of theological considerations set forth above? He [388] may think that he can leave them as they were before. He may think that precisely because he has to be one who loves and serves selflessly, one who has to work out his own salvation in the concrete reality of his own existence, he must apply himself to the concrete and contemporary questions regarding peace. And in that case we agree with him. After such theological considerations the theologian as such once more returns to the ranks and leaves to Christians as men with concrete human lives to live[36] their due place and their task which he of course for his part also recognises as his own.

---

[34] On the relationship between the kingdom of God, peace and Christ cf. X. Leon- Dufour, Dictionary of Biblical Theology (London 1970), pp. 254-258, 312-315, 364- 367. On the deeper christological aspects involved cf. K. Rahner, 'Peace on Earth', Theological Investigations VII (London and Baltimore 1971), pp. 132-135.

[35] At this point, and precisely in connection with the Council, a whole series of quite concrete measures for peace might be mentioned, cf. the study by B. Drees mentioned on p. 373 n. 7. On the whole cf. also—apart from the studies already cited by C. F. v. Weizsacker (cf. p. 371 n. 2)—G. Howe, H. E. Todt, Frieden im wissen- schaftlich-technischen Zeitalter. Okumenische Theologie und Zivili^ation (Stuttgart 1966) and A. Etzioni, Der harte Weg ^um Frieden. Eine neue Strategie (Gottingen 1965); W. Dirks, 'Erziehung zum Frieden', Diakonia 2 (1967), pp. 65-80,- 1st der Weltfriede unvermeidlich? (C. F. Freiherr's review of Weizsacker with a discussion appended) = Bergedorfer Gesprachskreis zu Fragen der freien industriellen Gesellschaft No. 24 (Hamburg 1966); J. Kuhn ed., Frieden. Das Abenteuer des Brilckenscklags (Stuttgart 1967).

[36] For this reason the humanity of the Christian as applied in concrete living mani- fests his will to achieve peace in very varied forms, cf. e.g. R. Schneider, Gedanken des Friedens (Freiburg [6]i9J7); J. Lasserre, Der Krieg und das Evangellum (Munich 1956); H. Gollwitzer, Forderungen der Freiheit (Munich [2]1964*);* A. Schweitzer, Friede oder Atomkrieg? (Munich 1958); M. Niemoller, Reden (Frankfurt 1961); E. Gross, Das Geheimnis des Pazifismus (Stuttgart 1959); C. F. v. Weizsacker, 'Zumutungen des Friedens', Streit um den Frieden, W. Beck, R. Schmid edd. (Munich/Mainz 1967), pp. 31-52. We should also recall Martin Luther King, the strivings for peace on the part of Paul VI, the figure of Dag Hammarskjold and the 'Oppenheimer case', to mention only a few very different strivers for peace, cf. also U. Miehe (ed.), Thema Frieden. Zeitgenossische deutsche Gedichte (Wuppertal 1967). For a brief orientation cf. J. Beckmann, 'Friede', Theologie fur Nichttheologen I (Stuttgart "1955), pp. 111-117.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

VOLUME 10

LIST OF SOURCES

THE NEW IMAGE OF THE CHURCH
Delivered as a lecture on 3 January 1966 at Koblenz (The Academy of Theology), on 8 January 1966 at Mülheim/Ruhr (Wolfsburg), on 11 February 1966 at the invitation of the Faculty of Protestant Theology at the University of Tübingen, on 13 February 1966 at a theological conference of the Catholic Academy of Bavaria in Munich, as an invitation lecture to the Philosophical and Theological College of Paderbom on 19 February 1966, on 26 February 1966 at the Institute for Catholic Culture Emmendingen (Baden), on 21 March 1966 at Brussels, on 27 June 1966 at the Loyola Academy in Chicago (USA), on 22 April 1966 at Pforzheim (Institute for Catholic Culture), on 27 June 1966 at the Technical College at Munich (The Society of Catholic Academies), on 27 July 1966 at the first Study Week at Ottobeuren, as one of several invitation lectures delivered during a study course of the Ecumenical Council at Bossey/Geneva from 12 to 16 October 1966, and on 25 October 1966 at Betzdorf (Institute for Catholic Culture). First published in Geist und Leben 39 (1966), pp. 4-24 (also published as a special paper).

CHURCH, CHURCHES, AND RELIGIONS
Delivered as a lecture in the course of a conference on the 'Theological Academy' at Cologne on 6 January 1966, and in the Cathedral of Frankfurt on 9 February 1966. Also on 7 January 1966 in Bielefeld. First published in Theologische Akademie III, edited by K. Rahner and O. Semmelroth (Frankfurt 1966), pp. 70-87.

ON THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE POPE AND THE COLLEGE OF BISHOPS
An essay designed for the Festschrift in honour of Archbishop Pietro [390] Parente (now Pietro, Cardinal Parente), a special number of the Roman periodical, Euntes Docete.

THE PRESENCE OF THE LORD IN THE CHRISTIAN COMMUNITY AT WORSHIP
A Latin version was delivered at the 'Congressus Internationalis de Theologia Concilii Vaticani II' at Rome (from 26 September to 1 October 1966). The Acts of the Congress, together with the report in Latin, are appearing very shortly. First published in German in Die neue Gemeinde, edited by A. Exeler, Festschrift für TA. Filthaus zum 60. Geburtstag (Mainz 1967), pp. 11-22.

ON THE PRESENCE OF CHRIST IN THE DIASPORA COMMUNITY ACCORDING TO THE TEACHING OF THE SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL
Originally prepared as an article for the periodical Lebendiges Zeugnis, October 1966 (Vol 2-4); a special volume published as a Festschrift für Lorenz Cardinal Jaeger zum 25. Bischofsjubiläum (Paderbom 1966), pp. 32-45.

DIALOGUE IN THE CHURCH
Lecture given at the Fourth Plenary Conference of the Advisory Council on Culture of the Central Committee of the German Catholics at Munich on 2 December 1966. First published in Stimmen der Zeit 179 (1967), pp. 81-95

THE SACRAMENT OF PENANCE AS AN ADDITIONAL ACT OF RECONCILIATION

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

WITH THE CHURCH
Originally written as an article for the Festschrift in honour of Alfredo, Cardinal Ottaviani, entitled Das Volk Gottes. Sein organischer Aufbau im Alten und Neuen Testament (Rome 1967/68), it then bore the title 'Das Busssakrament als "Versöhnung mit der Kirche"'.

A BRIEF THEOLOGICAL TREATISE ON INDULGENCE
This essay initially appeared under the title 'Über den Ablass' in Stimmen [391] der Zeit 156 (1955), pp. 343-355. It was deliberately left almost unaltered (cf. the author's remarks on p. 150f. of this volume) in order to maintain a clear view of the specific position it occupies in the sequence of the author's works on the problems involved in the doctrine of indulgence. The only part to be completely revised was the introduction. The original essay was supplemented by a longer insertion on p. 349, cf. above pp. 157-158 ("We have spoken above. . . left behind") and again an insertion was made on p. 361 of the earlier article, cf. above p. 160 ("The treasury of the Church. . . is precisely not").
All the remaining alterations affect merely the style and method of subdividing the article as a whole.

THE CURRENT OFFICIAL TEACHING OF THE CHURCH ON THE DOCTRINE OF INDULGENCE
This study was initially composed for a second edition of the volume published in Italian and entitled La penitenza della chiesa. Saggi teologici e storici (Rome 1964, 2nd ed. 1968). Here the works by the author on both the history and the systematic theology of the doctrine of penance and indulgence are assembled. Apart from being intended as an 'apologia' for the author's own position, this article is also intended to contribute towards an analysis of the Constitution on Indulgence by Pope Paul VI of 1 January 1967. First published in German in Catholica 21 (1967) Vol 4.

MARRIAGE AS A SACRAMENT
A lecture given at the invitation of the advisory committee on education of the Catholic Action Movement of the Archdiocese of Vienna on 7 March 1967 m the Great Hall of Music at Vienna. First published in Geist und Leben 40 (1967), pp. 177-193.

THE TEACHING OF THE SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL ON THE DIACONATE
The present brief essay is the outcome of a lecture which the author delivered (as a free version from notes) at the International Conference of Studies, 'The Deacon in the Church and in the World of Today' at Rome (22 to 24 October 1965). All that the author had in mind here was to give a presentation of 'The Teaching of the Second Vatican Council on the [392] Diaconate'. This explains the restricted subject-matter of the present article. First published in German under the above title in Der Seelsorger 36 (1966), pp. 193-199. The account of the conference as a whole has been published under the editorship of P. Winniger and Y. Congar in Le diacre dans l'église et le monde d'aujourd'hui = Unam Sanctam 59 (Paris 1966). A more comprehensive account in German of the conference held by the International Association for the Diaconate (Freiburg in Breisgau) is to be found in Vol II (1966) of Diakonia (= Dokumentation des Internationalen Informationszentrums für Fragen des Diakonates).

A FRAGMENTARY ASPECT OF A THEOLOGICAL EVALUATION OF THE CONCEPT OF THE FUTURE
The published excerpt constitutes the first part of a paper entitled 'Das Christentum und die Zukunft' which the author read on 11 September 1966 at the Darmstädter Gespräch 1966:

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'Der Mensch und seine Zukunft', first published in Darmstädter Gespräch. Der Mensch und seiner Zukunft, edited by Professor Dr E. Schlechta (Darmstadt 1967), pp. 149-160. The other parts of the lecture delivered at Darmstadt are in substance equivalent to the article already published at an earlier stage under the title 'Marxist Utopia and the Christian Future of Man' in Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), pp. 59-68.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ON THE THEOLOGY OF HOPE
An initial version was delivered as a lecture on 6 March 1967 to the Association of Higher Studies at Graz, and on 8 March 1967 to the Association of Higher Studies at Vienna. Besides this an English Version was given in October 1967 at several universities in the course of a journey through the United States. The article appeared in revised and expanded form in the first number of an International Periodical published by Verlag Herder (Freiburg) in 1968 and entitled Internationale Zeitschrifi für das Gespräch zwischen den verschiedenen Humanismen, edited by Karl Rahner and Herbert Vorgrimler (the latter also being the chief editor).

ON THE THEOLOGICAL PROBLEMS ENTAILED IN THE IDEA OF THE NEW 'EARTH'
Initially composed for a symposium volume, Knowledge and the Future of the Man, edited by W. J. Ong (Verlag Holt, Rinehart and Winston, [393] New York 1968) on the occasion of the 150th anniversary of the St Louis University (USA). Delivered as a lecture several times at American Universities in the course of October 1967. First published in German under the title, 'Mitarbeit an der Neuen Erde', Neues Forum 14 (1967), pp. 683-687.

IMMANENT AND TRANSCENDENT CONSUMMATION OF THE WORLD
A lecture delivered at the annual conference of the Institute of the Görres Society for Achieving an Encounter Between Natural Science and Theology held at Feldafing (Starnberger See) on 21 September 1966. At the same time it was designed for publication, together with the ensuing discussion, in the Report of the Conference of the Society (Verlag Alber, Freiburg 1968).

ON THE THEOLOGICAL PROBLEMS ENTAILED IN A 'PASTORAL CONSTITUTION'
Composed for the commentary which appeared in Dutch entitled Schema dertien. Tekst en commentaar (in collaboration with J.-Y. Calvez, N. D. Chenu, K. Rahner, E. Schillebeeckx etc.) = Vaticanum 2. No. 2: De kerk in de wereld van deze tijd (Verlag Paul Brand, Hilversum/Antwerp 1967), pp. 315-336. First published in German in Volk Gottes. Festgabe für Josef Höfer, edited by R. Bäumer and H. Dolch (Freiburg 1967), pp. 683-703.

THEOLOGICAL REFLECTIONS ON THE PHENOMENON OF SECULARISATION
Lecture at the Congress on the Theology of the Renewal of the Church (20-25 August 1967) at Toronto (Canada). It was repeated at the invitation of the Institute for Catholic Education at Salzburg on 26 September 1967, and at the Conference of Academics of the Diocese of Hildesheim at Hanover on 22 November 1967. First published in the Acta of the Congress.

PRACTICAL THEOLOGY AND SOCIAL WORK IN THE CHURCH
Delivered as a festival lecture on 13 June 1967 at the General Assembly [394] of the Swiss Caritas Association at Lucerne. First published in Caritas. Zeitschrifi des Schweizerischen Caritasverbances 45 (1967).

THE PEACE OF GOD AND THE PEACE OF THE WORLD
Lecture at a Conference for the Directors of Colleges of Advanced Engineering held by student chaplains and industrial chaplains of the Evangelische Landeskirche at Württemberg in September 1966 in the Evangelische Akademie Tutzing. The original lecture was delivered freely from notes and recorded. Subsequently it underwent several revisions and expansions, and was supplemented with notes. First published in the Report of the Conference edited by

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

W. Beck and R. Schmid, and entitled Streit um den Frieden (Munich and Mainz 1967), pp. 64-85.

In the list of sources given above no mention has been made of a number of excerpts or special papers which were printed in German. Broadcast talks are mentioned only when the article concerned was specially written for these. Nor has there been any special mention of the numerous translations which have been made. Only the work in which they were initially published is mentioned, whether this was in German or in a foreign language.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

FOREWORD

In the foreword to the ninth (eleventh and twelfth in this English edition) volume of my collected writings it only remains for me to repeat what I have already said in the forewords to the earlier volumes. For this reason I may confine myself to referring primarily to the foreword to the eighth volume. The ninth volume contains the lectures and articles which have been composed over the last two-and-a-half years. I have to acknowledge my heartfelt indebtedness to all my colleagues in the faculty of Catholic theology of the Wilhelms University of Munster, Westphalia, for their help in the work of collecting these articles and preparing them for publication in this volume. My thanks are due, therefore, to Dr Elmar Klinger, Dr Leo Karrer, Herr Heribert Woestmann, Herr Kuno Füssel and Fräulein Annerose Köster. Without their help it would have been impossible to publish this volume so quickly. For the provenance of the individual articles I may once more refer to the List of Sources at the end of the volume.

Munich, March 1970

Karl Rahner

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[1]

PART ONE

Tasks and Problems for Contemporary Theology

[3]

1

PLURALISM IN THEOLOGY AND THE UNITY OF THE CREED IN THE CHURCH

The theme enunciated in the title to this essay is certainly extremely relevant to the present. For pluralism is making a deep impact in the life of the Church right down to its concrete details, and especially when this pluralism is conceived of in the broadest sense, and without exaggeratedly scholastic restrictions. Now this pluralism confronts the authorities of the Church and her believers alike with the question of how it can be maintained side by side with a true unity of creed, the question of what this unity can mean at all in more precise terms on this showing, and how it can be set apart and preserved from a pluralistic interpretation of the creed itself, while allowing for a legitimate pluralism in theology.

The problem is new. It is a genuine ‘quaestio disputata’. We are still far from having obtained a clear enough view of the question to give any clear answer to it, or even an answer which is unambiguous enough and universally accepted enough to provide an immediate solution at least to the practical difficulties to which the problem has given rise in the life of the Church.

This being the situation, it cannot really be expected that in so brief a study as this all aspects, even of the problem in itself, can be brought to view. The author is aware of this impossibility. He knows that he himself is immersed in the midst of these problems without really having mastered them, and that this means that he can only set forth the problem itself in fragmentary form, and that his suggestions as to the lines along which an answer can be found are questionable in the extreme. Indeed on a closer inspection they may even appear false.

One of the consequences arising immediately and precisely from theological pluralism today is that we cannot allow a well-considered answer to mature in the silence and privacy of our own individual minds. Rather we must have the courage to think aloud and in public in order to have [4] any unequivocal results to offer. On this basis the reader may also understand why this study should strike a more personal note than is usual in scholarly essays of this sort.

I

First it is of the utmost importance to recognize that the problem of really does exist, and that it is new. Even among specialist theologians there is all too often a failure to recognize both of these facts clearly and unequivocally. For it is precisely the specialist theologian who is aware that all along in the history of theology there have been different schools; that there has been a lack of unity among the theologians upon many questions, and that the Church has tolerated, or even made necessary, the differences between the schools, actually taking

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

disputed positions in theology under her protection and guarding them against the accusation of heterodoxy on the part of their opponents.

This and much more besides gives rise again and again to the impression that what we are dealing with in this pluralism among the theologies is an old phenomenon, one which has been with us all along, so that the Church and her magisterium have already long since worked out the right principles and the sound practice for dealing with it in such a way that she has easily been able to reconcile her attitudes on the one hand of tolerance of, and even actually requiring, the existence of the many theological schools, and on the other of upholding unequivocally the common creed.

But on this point appearances are deceptive. Until we recognize this and admit it, until we realize that to a certain extent the earlier quantitative proliferation which this pluralism has entailed has led to a qualitative shift, and given birth to a pluralism of a totally different kind – until all this is recognized we are failing to see the real problem and the fresh difficulty which has emerged for the Church and for maintaining the unity of her creed.

What then was the situation (always viewing it as a whole) in earlier times? Certainly in those earlier times there were different schools and orientations in theology. But the divisions between these were in part (e.g. as between the patristics of the east and the west) geographical and due to a sort of intellectual no-man's land dividing the different schools from each other. In some cases, even, the differences between them were not reflected upon in any really effective sense. Or, when they really were [5] recognized and adverted to in the minds of the individual theologians, the opposing theses were set against one another as 'yes' and 'no', and the controversy over them took place within a common intellectual ambience constituted by principles, ideas, and ways of approaching questions which were common to all the parties involved. And in those cases in which later historians have come to recognize that this was not the case, or was only partially so, still the differences these have discovered have been such as those earlier schoolmen, actually engaged in the living and historical controversies, were themselves totally unconscious of.

Formerly it was possible to proceed from the basic principle that one could know the position of one's opponent. One could understand it and could oneself explain to him why one could not share it. The fact that despite having this common ground of understanding, whether real or supposed, with one's opponent, one still could not achieve unison with him was a sheer unanalysable state of affairs, something at which one could only shrug one's shoulders without any further attempt at analysis, recognizing it as a brute fact. At best one could explain it simply in terms of the difficulty of the subject-matter involved, very often in terms of the stupidity of the other theologian or the obstinacy of the heretic. In any case one was convinced either that one knew what one's theological opponent was saying, that one had understood him, or else one was not even aware of his existence and did not recognize him at all. Terminology, philosophical presuppositions, fields of discourse, unanalyzed attitudes and feelings, were either held in common or such differences as did exist in these areas remained unreflected upon.

Today all this is in a real sense essentially different. Very many factors have contributed to this quantitative change, which, to a certain extent, has led to a qualitative transformation. But it is quite impossible to analyze these factors with any precision at this point. The accumulation of historical material which the theological disciplines have to work upon has become so great that it is no longer possible for any one theologian to cope with it. Furthermore the individual theologian (differing in this from his forbears) is actually aware of this. The methods of the individual disciplines have become so complicated that no one theologian can still avail himself of them all. Philosophy itself; as the instrument which the theologian employs of necessity in pursuing his discipline, has itself become so pluralistic that no theologian has any longer any overall mastery of philosophy as a whole. Instead he works with one specific philosophy, and perhaps too with a very eclectic one.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Today philosophy is no longer, as it formerly was, the sole and [6] sufficient meeting-place where those theologically relevant findings which man gleans from his everyday experience, from his intellectual life as a whole and from his scientific pursuits can be handed on to theology. The modern sciences (the historical and intellectual disciplines, natural sciences and social sciences) have emancipated themselves from philosophy (rightly or wrongly, it makes no difference here), and although ideally speaking with all of these, in the concrete this is to a very large extent impossible for him, and hence he is in no position to say that something of which he himself is ignorant is theologically irrelevant.

Today the relationship in which a Catholic theology stands vis-à-vis other Christian theologies, whether exegetical, historical or systematic, is quite different in kind from what it formerly was. The Christian theologies today are not diametrically opposed as affirmations and denials of the same simple propositions. Today the real theological frontiers cut across, at least in part, the confessional divisions. This in itself entails a theological pluralism, and one which cannot be overcome merely by teamwork, however necessary such teamwork may be today, and however intensively it may have to be organized. For in fact no team can embrace all the theologians in the world, and even the most broadly conceived team possible in terms of numbers cannot be adequate to cope with the pluralism indicated above.

An additional point is that intellectual disciplines, and so theology too, differ from the natural sciences in that the ‘conclusions’ cannot really be taken over and understood simply as they stand. Rather it is a necessary condition for any true understanding of the actual conclusions that have been achieved that those who take them over should themselves go through the reasoning process by which they were arrived at. For this reason in theology even teamwork does not help in the last analysis against that pluralism which exists precisely in theology. Today this difficulty is insuperable because there is this difference between the present and former times, that even the substance of the theology and the theologies which are possible and actual today can no longer be contained even approximately by the mind of any one individual theologian, or assimilated in the time available to him. Now this state of affairs is not merely an objective fact, but is something of which the theologian himself is aware and, as a consequence of his own ignorance with regard to a knowledge which he knows exists and yet which he himself has not grasped, it sets the theology of the individual in a strange situation of insecurity and unease.

From what has been said up this point it will be clear that when we [7] speak of a pluralism in theology the decisive factor in this is not that the theologians involved contradict one another, so that according to the simple principle of non-contradiction they cannot both be right at the same time since their respective theses are opposed as the affirmative and negative poles in a contradiction. Such a situation would not constitute any genuine pluralism in theology-at any rate not that pluralism which causes such disquiet today, and which is being referred to here. For when a man is aware of being confronted by two theses which are contradictory alternatives, and when he can recognize them as such, he can, at least in principle, decide between them, and thus both in virtue of the fact that they are alternatives, as also, and still more, by the decision he makes upon the question he finds himself confronted with in this way, he is in a position to overcome the pluralism.

The pluralism of which we are speaking here, rather, consists precisely in the fact that it is quite impossible to reduce the theologies and their representative theses to a simple logical alternative in this manner, in the fact that they exist side by side with one another as disparate and mutually incommensurable. Hence that position of transcendence from which, as being one and common to both a judgment might be arrived at, is totally unattainable to the individual theologian. In other cases there can be some common intellectual ground or

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ambience of ideas, one which can be accepted as held in common by the rival theorists and recognized, albeit unconsciously and tacitly, right from the first by both of them, so that on the basis of this common ground individual propositions can be discussed. In this case, however, there is nowhere near sufficient common ground of this kind, and this means that the representatives of the different schools cannot achieve, even indirectly, a position in which they can explain to one another consciously and unambiguously in what precisely the difference between their respective intellectual outlooks consists. This difference is only sensed as something vague in virtue of the experience of a mutual state of alienation and disparity through the experience that one's partner in the dialogue constantly proceeds in the dialogue from starting-points which are alien to oneself, or which seem less important to one, and that he presents the subject-matter under discussion, in other words speaks of points which he regards as established, which likewise seem alien or less important to oneself. The result is that the discussion very often, or even in the majority of cases, fails to arrive at any conclusion arising from the subject under discussion itself, but is rather broken off because either the time or the physical resources made available for it make it impossible for it to proceed any further.

[8] In order to clarify what has been said up to this point I must ask to be allowed to strike a somewhat more 'personal' note. In what follows I am speaking of what I know from my own experience. A more senior theologian, one who grew up while the old scholastic tradition was still in force, that tradition which reigned more or less unassailably right up to the time of the Second Vatican Council, cannot easily understand what has been said so far. What approach, then, used we older theologians to adopt, brought up as we were in the orthodox tradition of scholasticism?

If we were obtuse, or somewhat over-convinced of the absolute value of our scholastic theology, we rejected whatever was alien or alienating which we came across from any other theology as false or at least as unimportant, and without really having felt the material weight or the living relevance of an opposed position we found reasons enough and distinctions enough to cope with any such position which struck us as alien, though obviously without really having achieved any clear awareness of the questionable element in our reaction.

If we were cleverer, or more open and alive to new ideas, then we revised our previously held positions, expanded our intellectual horizons, enriched our terminology, and introduced fresh nuances into our points of view and outlooks. We learned to use modern exegesis and a more modern, or a really modern philosophy as the basis for our thought. We arrived at clearer and less prejudiced evaluations of the changing history of dogma and theology (without losing sight of a certain ultimate continuity and consistency in it) etc., and thus we succeeded, to an extent which was certainly significant, in assimilating that which was alien and ran counter to our established ideas, and in making a genuine element in our own theology that which we came across from a different theology (especially a non-Catholic one) or from the theology implicit in the modern understanding of human living. This latter approach, surely a legitimate one, has its due need of success and certainly must not be abandoned. But I cannot escape the impression that today we are experiencing the limitations even of an approach of this kind. The alien is close to us. It is making us aware of itself as such, and yet can neither be assimilated within our own existing framework of thought nor legitimately be rejected as that which is false (or as one-sided, something which we have already advanced beyond in the broader vision and finer distinctions of our own system).

Today it very often happens that we no longer simply succeed in arriving at any fixed or immovable attitude towards the basic theological positions of other theologians when these are specifically different from [9] our own, especially (but not only!) when these belong to other Christian confessions.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In those cases in which another theologian of this sort explicitly and directly denies a proposition of our own Church which has the force of an official ecclesiastical dogma, we still find the position relatively easy. In that case we can, initially at least, counter such a denial with an equally decisive rejection. But then the tormenting question begins to impose itself upon us once more of whether our opponent has really understood the official dogma which he has contested, and therefore whether it was the proposition itself which he rejected and not merely the wrong interpretation of it. The tormenting question begins to impinge upon us of whether we orthodox theologians, taking the proposition which we adhere to, and in the sense in which we understand it, have transposed it explicitly enough into a broader ambience of ideas in such a way that we are reasonably justified in expecting that we have communicated an understanding of this kind of the proposition concerned to the 'opponent' who has rejected it. Have we done this in such a way that we can really expect him to accept it?

But this case is by no means the real one which provokes disquiet with regard to the difficulty in assimilating alien and disparate elements from a different theology. In these alien theologies we encounter basic positions which are far from being in contradictory opposition to our own theology in this sense, but which have been developed within a basic intellectual ambience which their representatives held in common with ourselves. Yet even in such cases as this we have still been unable to achieve any clear or unambiguous analysis of the original disparity which exists between us and them. Now in such cases as this we are no longer in the least capable of arriving at a position in which we can give an unambiguous 'yes' or 'no' to such basic positions.

For instance who among us today can say with sufficient sureness whether the basic conception of the doctrine of justification put forward by Karl Barth is Catholic or heterodox? Anyone among us who believes that he has the precise answer to this is to be congratulated indeed. But what are we to do if we fail to arrive at this position? Who can say precisely that the basic positions held by Rudolph Bultmann are, in the last analysis, really un-Catholic, or whether it is merely that the propositions themselves have not been understood or developed with sufficient precision, and that this is why conclusions have been derived from them by Bultmann or his followers which seem to run counter to the ultimate basic principles of Catholicism and so can no longer be acceptable to Catholics?

[10] What course should we adopt when, for want of time, through the limitations of our physical resources, or because of the other tasks in theology to which we are committed, we are no longer in a position to form any clear or responsible opinion upon this point?

Both in terms of thought and action it would be to evade the real problem involved here if we were simply to say that we could, after all, set these questions aside with untroubled consciences in order to pursue our own theology, and in order to express for ourselves, and in terms of our own theology what we hold theologically with regard to our own Christian and Catholic faith, and to have analyzed this sufficiently to make it understandable for ourselves and to some extent for others also. For a fact that precisely cannot and must not be overlooked is that side by side with our own theology there are other theologies which remain alien to ourselves, and which, nevertheless, claim to be theologically analyzing the same creed. Certainly if this creed were simply presented to one in total independence of these disparate theologies everything would be quite simple. But since it is quite impossible for this to be the case (seeing that faith and theological understanding of the faith cannot simply and unequivocally be separated from one another) how then can one man ascertain whether his faith is the same as that of another when that other's theology is alien to him and existing side by side with his own, unexplored and uncomprehended?

Another example: the discussions between Dutch and Roman theologians with regard to the doctrine of the Eucharist and the interpretation of transubstantiation are well known. Any idea that the Roman theologians are more stupid or uneducated than their Dutch 'opponents' is totally foreign to my thoughts. But nevertheless I do have a suspicion that even with the best will in the world they are simply incapable of mastering the philosophical presuppositions, the ontological categories of thought as they actually exist, which lie behind any serious exposition of the doctrine of trans-signification etc., and that for this reason these discussions remain barren. Of course such an understanding is 'in itself' attainable, and of course if it were in fact to be attained to one would have to use this position to test in turn whether in the concrete case supposed the dogma, even when subjected to the critical judgement of a tribunal, does not give rise to these ontological assumptions, and whether in turn these assumptions cannot be accounted simply as manifestly possible interpretations of the dogma. But what is to be done when we presuppose positions which are not in fact held on the 'Roman' side and which perhaps, while they are indeed maintained on the 'Dutch' side in a real and effective [11] sense, have even there not found any clear or articulate expression? Some such position is possible, and it implies no reproach for any lack of intelligence or will to achieve mutual understanding (how long, for instance, have we had to wait until philosophy in the ecclesiastical sphere has been able, to some extent, to cope with modern philosophy from Descartes onwards?). What are we to do in order that both sides may achieve the initial mastery of the basic assumptions which disparate doctrines of the Eucharist of this kind presuppose?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Nor can it be objected that to establish an incommensurability of this kind as present, at least provisionally, between such doctrines in itself implies that a bridge has been built between these two alien and opposed positions on the grounds that a third and detached standpoint has been arrived at, one from which the presence of this incommensurability has been established, and from which an 'understanding' of both sides has been achieved. For even supposing that someone from this third and detached standpoint can justifiably hold the opinion that he has an equal understanding of both positions, and so has overcome the disparity between them, still the one holding this third position must then presumably anxiously question himself as to whether in other cases he too is not exposed to a similar impossibility of really being able to cope with opposed positions, an impossibility such as, in the case supposed, he actually believes that he has been able to recognize from his own standpoint even though each of the two opponents involved is convinced that he has in all good will tested and really understood the position of the other party.

A third example: How do we manage today when we enter into discussion with contemporary Catholic intellectuals who, though they have no formation in scholastic theology, are nevertheless interested in theology and well read? Very soon we come across a whole complex of theological views which is, in certain cases, extremely rich and profoundly thought out. This complex has a quite different structure and different perspectives from those to which we scholastic theologians are accustomed. For the most part, in the statements deriving from this complex, propositions are enunciated which sound to us, and perhaps actually are, heresies of the grossest kind. In this complex we may perhaps discover lacunae which are astonishing even to us, omissions which, judged by our outlook, are indefensible and, on the other hand, an over-emphasis upon factors to which great weight is attached yet which seem to us utterly secondary. We discover that in such a 'theology' as formulated by an intellectual of this kind the system of ideas involved assumes a quite different form from that which we tacitly presuppose to be present in the minds of an [12] intellectual who wills to be and is a 'practising' Catholic. We always assume that the orthodox answers of the catechism are present in his mind. We expect that from this catechism, which after all is nothing else than the full and valid emanation of our standardized scholastic theology, while there may be some omissions for which the 'fides implicita' of the subject may have to compensate, still on the whole even in this intellectual our own theology will have maintained more or less its own form from the religious instruction which he has had at an earlier stage.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In reality it is quite otherwise. Even in his case we find ourselves confronted with a 'theology' which seems alien and disparate to us. Very soon we recognize that it is impossible, within the space of time available and with the 'technical' equipment available to bring our own theology into harmony with the alien one. The alien theology of the sort of intellectual we have in mind, to a far greater extent than our own, is influenced by his personal lot in life, his distinctive psychological make-up, the intellectual and social milieu in which he lives, in other words by factors which are different and take effect in different ways in the case of the professional theologian, and which are quite impossible to overcome in his encounter with the intellectual through the fragmentary dialogue and instruction which is all that is possible for them in the limited time available. Thus when we encounter a 'theology' which is alien to us and which remains alien we must, as specialist theologians, actually ask ourselves whether among us too, in the form which our theology assumes, the same theological 'proportions' are present which strike us as so alien in the case of an intellectual of this kind: lacunae, deficiencies, oddness of emphasis and perspectives which are anything but obvious etc. We have to ask ourselves whether the only reason why we orthodox scholastic theologians do not notice this clearly is that we discuss these matters too exclusively among ourselves alone, taking it for granted that we should confine ourselves to the terminology and horizons of thought which we hold in common.

II

What then is to be done in this situation in which we are confronted with an insurmountable theological pluralism? This is the real and difficult question, which can put to ourselves only insofar as we really have learned to regard this pluralism genuinely without prejudice or anxiety of any kind. It is only with great difficulty, if at all, that we can supply any answer to this question that is to some extent adequate. It cannot really be [13] expected that any such answer will be wholly satisfying either at the theoretical or at the practical level. For in fact an answer that was completely satisfying could only be given in the form of a solution which itself in turn transcended this pluralism and so in principle overcame it. As has already been emphasized at the outset of this study, it is only quite modest statements that we can attempt here, and even these with all due provisos to the effect that it may later become necessary to revise them.

To begin with, however, two points have to be laid down. First: Obviously, however true it may be that pluralism in theology is, and will continue to be an inescapable fact, it nevertheless does not signify a mere static state of affairs which we simply have to accept. Obviously we have to strive again and again and in every possible way to overcome it, to conduct a dialogue between all theological schools and outlooks, to subject our own thought-world to critical examination and to expand it, to learn from others etc. The theological pluralism of today is, if we may actually express it in this way, the self-realization of the individual Christian and theologian as well as of the theological awareness of the Church of the situation in which they stand in terms of epistemology and 'concupiscence'. Once we understand this then properly speaking it must be clear to us theologians that pluralism in theology can neither be eliminated nor simply accepted, but that it belongs to that category of human realities which are entailed by the historical dimension and the abiding contingency of the human state. These can never be overcome in such a way that they no longer exist, and yet at the same time we are compelled to strive again and again to overcome them in the future.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Second: Obviously while recognizing the abiding factor of, we are not denying to the Church, whether to her awareness of her faith or to her teaching authority, the right to draw new and unequivocal boundaries, under certain circumstances to reject the teachings of a given theology as heretical or (for reasons and in a manner which have still to be described) as not to be tolerated in the Church. The function of the teaching authority as, under certain circumstances actually pronouncing anathemas, is not abolished by the factor of pluralism in theology. This pluralism does not give licence for any kind of weak tolerance of everything and anything, because otherwise in dealing with the mutual interrelationship of creed and theology, and in recognizing the distinction which exists between the two entities – a distinction which can never adequately be analyzed or defined – we could no longer maintain, in the concrete individual case, that unity of the creed in the Church which is constitutive for her. For even the most enlightened understanding in [14] terms of the psychological, historical and sociological factors involved of how and why an individual arrives at an 'insuperably' heterodox view is still very far from requiring that such a view should be upheld within the Church. This latter position is not required for the very reason that the Church by her rejection neither denies the 'bona fides' of the upholder of a heterodox view of this kind, nor denies him any chance of salvation any more than she denies that such heterodox views have a positive function for the further development of the Church's awareness of her own faith when she maintains her separation from other Christian creeds. Now while we must uphold the right and duty of the Church's teaching authority in this matter quite uncompromisingly, still it must be recognized on the other hand that this is not to deny, but rather positively to maintain, that the manner in which this right and this duty are exercised must, at least in many respects, acquire a quite new form in the concrete, seeing that the contemporary pluralism of which we speak is not merely a present factor, but one which in its intractability has arrived at the stage of being consciously reflected upon. The question is, therefore, how in, and in spite of, a situation of theological pluralism which is consciously being reflected upon and recognized as insuperable we can still maintain the unity of the creed in a form which is at least partially new. And this brings us to the real question which concerns us here. The manner in which the unity of the creed must be maintained is new because this pluralism is itself new, and yet at the same time has manifest consequences for the attitude of the Church and her teaching authority in preserving the unity of the creed. Such observations as we can make upon this question are extremely fragmentary, and will be expressed in a few individual statements without any intention of uniting these within a single 'system'.

III

We are wholly failing to grasp the nature of this theological pluralism so long as we fail to recognize that the formulae in which the teaching authority of the Church expresses her creed always include amongst other things an implicit element of linguistics. These formulae have been subjected to rules of language which might have been different. But the formulae have not simply and solely been dictated by the reality itself which they express. Rather they are conditioned by sociological and historical factors in the development of human thinking. These factors, therefore, provide the setting in which the formulae come to be articulated, and the [15] formulae themselves justly demand to be respected in their own right even though the respect we accord to them is not simply identical with our assent of faith to the truth itself which is expressed with dogmatically binding force. Up to this time there has hardly been any conscious reflection upon this element of linguistic conditioning in the formal statements of the Church's magisterium, which are designed to preserve the unity of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the creed (even though an inkling of this conscious reflection does appear here and there, cf. DS 1515, 1642, 1652). Formerly it was not possible to recognize this by any process of conscious reflection because we held more or less the same field of linguistic discourse in common with our heretical opponents (even when this field of discourse itself was changing gradually and in a way which was hardly adverted to). Because of this the different doctrines were formulated in the same terms as so many affirmations and denials. Today, however, we have only to reflect for a moment on the terms 'person' and 'nature' in the doctrine of the Trinity and christology, and concepts such as 'original sin', 'transubstantiation' etc. (though we cannot do this in any explicit sense in the present context) in order to see that in such dogmatic teachings certain specific rules of language are actually being applied which in other circumstances could have been different, and that the formulations are not simply determined by the truth which they express as such and exclusively. Indeed dogmatic teachings of this kind actually become problematical and provoke great misunderstandings when the secular field of discourse in which such concepts are applied, and on the basis of which they have been understood, is changed without the Church having the power autonomously to guide and control the linguistic development of the concepts themselves which are involved. Viewed from this aspect the unity of the creed and the pluralism of the theologies, together with the mutual interdependence of these two entities can manifestly no longer be conceived of or applied in practice today as it was formerly. Formerly on the one hand it was not only the truly basic statements of the creed alone, but those of theology as well which were encountered within this system of linguistic rules, while on the other hand the 'explanations' of such concepts of the Church's teaching authority, though of course always necessary and also actually given in earlier times, appeared and were felt to be merely secondary, and were clearly distinguished from the concepts themselves, as commentaries appended to the theological statements properly so called. What earlier appeared to be, and was thought in theology and by theologians to be, mere subsequent and secondary commentary upon such concepts and statements of the official teaching (for it was these that [16] constituted the true corpus of theological statements as such) can today actually acquire a different status and significance in the theologies as such. It can be included as an intrinsic element in the true corpus of the statements of such a theology.

To put the matter simply and once and for all: whereas earlier the really important theses in a theology were themselves statements of the Church's magisterium, this will no longer necessarily be the case in the future for theology itself. Indeed it is probably impossible that it shall be so if a theology of today is effectively to come to grips with its true past. The linguistic rules governing the expressions of the Church's teaching authority have this status primarily and in principle so far as the creed is concerned, and they do not have it in the same basic and binding manner for the actual theologies themselves. These theologies do of course remain attached to the official doctrine of the Church, and thereby to the linguistic rules which are maintained with this. But these linguistic rules must be viewed more clearly than in earlier times as having their force so far as the Church's creed is concerned and as not having the same basic force so far as theology is concerned. So far we have been aware that behind these linguistic rules lies a history stretching into the past, a history in which they themselves first came into being so that they were not always in force. Today in the same way it becomes clear that these too, at least so far as theology as such is concerned, have a further history extending into the future. The attempts which are discernible in 'Humani Generis' and 'Mysterium Fidei' to represent such theological concepts and the linguistic rules which they involve, despite their past history, as indispensable for the future also are ill-conceived and fail to carry conviction. Even if some such approach were right so far as the creed is concerned (and on this point we shall have something to say at a later stage), still this certainly does not also apply in every case to theology and the theologies. The theologies

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

have a basic and intrinsic right from the outset to express even the pith and essence of the realities they are enunciating as theological, and ultimately as official, in a different way from the manner in which they are expressed in the formulations of the Church's magisterium. This does not of course mean that they may also simply as such tacitly neglect these formulations of official teaching with the linguistic rules they entail, or that they are not bound by that which is expressed in these formulations in a truly binding manner.

Presumably in a contemporary presentation of the theology of the Trinity one could express that which is dogmatically binding in the Church's faith in the Trinity, one could make it intelligible, one could [17] set it within a framework of thought which has become necessary today, in such a way that in doing so the statement about the 'Three Persons' and 'One Nature' would not occupy the central place with everything else merely converging upon it as so much commentary. What is meant by original sin could presumably be expressed in a theology of the 'sin of the world' in a manner which was orthodox and did justice to the Church's creed without thereby having to speak of original sin in the terms of the theological statements as such (for all the binding force of the classic Tridentine doctrine of original sin), and without thereby having to obscure the actual content of the specifically credal element, at any rate any more than in the classic formulation, which in fact also 'obscures' because it fails to bring out the merely analogous relationship between personal and inherited habitual sin. The factor of linguistic conditioning present in the expression of the Church's doctrine and now able consciously to be reflected upon makes it clear that it is both possible and justified for there to be a pluralism among the theologies, and for these to exhibit great differences in their formulations from the formulations of the Church's official teaching.

IV

This in turn, however to, serves to bring out still more clearly the real problem with which we are here concerned: How can we ensure that the unity of the creed is maintained, while allowing for a pluralism of this kind in the forms of language used by the theologies?

On the one hand, however, it is impossible to get beyond any one specific theological language in formulating the creed, for even the formulations of the official teaching themselves are inevitably (to some extent at least) ipso facto theology and so draw upon one specific theology. Moreover the degree to which the different theologies are commensurable, the degree to which they converge in the unity of the creed, is something that, as has already been said, cannot adequately be established in the concrete by the individual.

In view of this situation, and of course with the provisos already mentioned above, there can be no escaping the conclusion that today the Church and her teaching authority are forced, to a notably greater extent than formerly, to leave to the individual theologies the responsibility for seeing that they genuinely do maintain themselves in agreement with the Church's creed; that their interpretation of this creed is not such as to interpret away the creed itself while paying it mere lip-service, not such [18] as to empty it of its content, but such as really to maintain its truth. Today it must surely be recognized that even the Church's teaching authority is confronted with this situation and the consequences arising from it. For either it is the case that it is upheld by the representatives of one specific individual theology, or else, if its upholders are appointed as far as possible so as to be representative and to include a fair cross-section of the adherents of the different theologies, then the council thus formed simply reproduces the pluralism of theologies which exists in the Church herself; and which cannot be transcended in any adequate sense. The Church of today must, to a far greater extent than formerly, leave to the individual theologies the responsibility of ensuring that they genuinely do preserve the common creed.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Despite the proviso stated above, it is of course still possible that in specific cases the teaching authority of the Church will pronounce specific statements put forward by a particular theology as irreconcilable with the creed itself. But in this it is surely impossible to lay down a priori norms which make it clear by the purely formal directives which they provide what the cases are in which a given theology has to bring its own self-responsibility (that is always as limited by the magisterium itself) to bear, and what the cases are in which even today the magisterium itself has to intervene to draw a possible line of division between orthodox and heterodox theology.

But even in this second case, a point which we must fully and unreservedly take into account is that to a notable extent, and perhaps even in its real heart and centre, certain rules of theological language are implied. We have to reckon with the fact that when such a line of division is drawn it is a fact, whether consciously adverted to or not, that it is not primarily and immediately a question of truth that the distinction bears upon, but a phenomenon of epistemology and sociology that is involved. In other words when such a line of demarcation is drawn what is really happening is that the Church is making the following pronouncement (albeit in the form of a doctrine bearing upon the truth content itself): 'Such-and-such an assertion cannot be made in the Church without the one making the assertion bringing himself or at least others with whom he has to live in the unity of the faith into the danger of mistaking the reality signified in the creed.' And then the Church once more leaves it to the theology concerned to interpret the common creed for itself and on its own responsibility while paying due respect to this ruling in the matter of language.

Presumably the old credal formulae and doctrinal decisions of the [19] Church achieve in this contemporary situation a new status and a different significance from that which they formerly had. They are of course (and this applies even to those already contained in the New Testament) conceived of in the language of a specific theology (though this is not to deny that already even in them a certain theological pluralism is objectively present. Only it is such that the reality of it has not yet plainly been reflected upon or adverted to). But these ancient statements of doctrine were after all precisely the common and sole expressions in which the common creed was expressed. And this means that these ancient statements of doctrine, in virtue of the uniqueness of the realities signified in the creed, of the unity of the creed itself, and of the continuity that had to be preserved in the Church's awareness of her faith, the abiding and binding points of departure and the norm (albeit norma normata) for the manifold theologies which are only now really emanating from them, and which can no longer adequately be contained within an overall unity. The teaching authority of the Church cannot in principle arrive at its expressions of doctrine except by availing itself of a theology, even though what it refers to is the actual creed itself, and even though, varying, naturally, according to the particular case being treated of, the difference between the creed in what it really signifies and the theology which expresses and interprets it is very great. Moreover the pluralism among the theologies of today can no longer adequately be subsumed under any overall unity. Now because of this we presumably have to reckon with the fact that in the future the magisterium will hardly be in a position to arrive at any fresh positive expressions of doctrine. The unity of theology which such expressions would presuppose is no longer present. Presumably it must be expected that in the future the teaching authority will intervene in particular cases as these arise in defence of doctrine, and undertake to define the boundaries in the manner already described. Meanwhile she will protect and encourage the individual theologies which, each in its own way, are striving to make the creed which all hold in common comprehensible and relevant in a manner corresponding to the needs of the particular epoch. In the future, then, the magisterium will regard this pluralism among the theologies as an enrichment of the Church and as something which is necessary today. And under certain circumstances, by a certain expansion of the function it has exercised hitherto, it will be inspired by the abiding gospel to permit pastoral movements, prophetic impulses to arise in the Church, which will guide the Church's actions in a particular concrete historical situation.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But presumably the dream which not a few theologians have been [20] indulging in in the very recent past, namely that by a process of ever more refined development of dogma the Church herself will develop her teaching ever further and ever more swiftly in a series of individual pronouncements, has now proved devoid of reality.

For pressed to its logical conclusion such a procedure would only still be possible if some one single theology were at her disposal and were to be accepted by all as the immediately obvious presupposition for such a development in this explicative sense.

The relinquishment of a 'development of dogma' as understood above need not entail any impoverishment of the life of faith in the Church, or any ossification of her awareness of her own faith. This life of faith is simply concentrated all the more clearly upon the ultimately decisive points contained in the Christian faith, and in the contemporary intellectual situation in the world there is every occasion for this concentration. And these most central and most radical points in the content of the Christian faith will be considered, interpreted, and applied to the present by theologies which are, and which will continue to be, very different in character. Both these factors taken together, however, signify an enrichment of the Church's awareness of her faith in terms of content and application which is at least as great as that which would accrue if the 'development of dogma' were taking place in the manner which probably not a few theologians in the last hundred years have thought of it as taking place when they strove to achieve a 'new dogma' as the goal and crown of such a development. Probably too we can understand from this that the earlier and positive doctrinal statements of the Church now acquire a somewhat different function from that which they formerly had. They no longer constitute so much the terminus a quo for a further development leading to fresh dogmas through and within a single unique theology, but rather constitute the initial expression of a common creed to which many theologies, while retaining their pluralism, refer, and which they are intended to serve.

V

Presumably, however, we should approach the problem of how the unity of the creed is to be reconciled with the pluralism among the theologies from yet another point. This is necessary if we are really to make it plain how difficult it is to convince ourselves of the uniqueness of the common creed; seeing that on the one hand this conviction is not ipso facto achieved by the verbal equivalences between the formulae of the creed as applied in [21] the individual theologies and as recognized and respected by them, while on the other hand the pluralism among the theologies (in which nevertheless it is an understanding of the one creed that is being maintained), cannot adequately be overcome or transcended.

In order to achieve any further advance at this stage the following point must be reflected upon: As understood in the Church faith and creed can certainly not be present apart from words or in a state of emancipation from words. This means that the unity and uniqueness of the faith and the creed can certainly not be realized and adhered to by many simply and exclusively at a level which is beyond words, for instance that of common sympathy, common action, or a common cult etc., quite apart from the fact that even such human realities are in any case never simply beyond words. But precisely this word has at the same time a further character as of its very nature pointing us on to realities, achievements and experiences which are not present to us simply through this word alone. Faith and creed do not constitute a 'verbal event' in such a way that this word is, in a certain sense, simply sufficient to itself. Men communicate with one another and form a unity with one another. But although certainly they never do this apart from the word-event, still this as such never constitutes in itself alone the whole reality of this unity. Rather it points on to a further unity which it indeed initiates but never constitutes of itself alone. The word itself in its comprehensibility points on to the mystery of God, to the historical reality from which man derives, to the common way and the common activity of humanity, and thereby to realities which are indeed never present without any word at all, but which are not simply identical with this word, and which are communicated by this word not as absent but as matters of present experience. To this extent, then, even in the word the assurance of a unity of the word is possible which is not simply or solely achieved by the word itself alone. Now the Christian faith presupposes such a possibility as already given quite independently of the question which is raised by the pluralism among theologies which exists today. For how otherwise could any one individual school of thought assure itself sufficiently of agreement with any other, seeing that this assurance with regard to the attitude and conviction of the other school of thought is, after all, invariably possible only through the medium of one's own awareness? This assurance is never achieved in the processes of human thought merely by establishing a correspondence between the content of conceptual awareness between the two parties. Life in common at the physical level, the same statement (as distinct merely from the same ideas), concrete action in common – these are [22] necessary elements in the process of assuring ourselves of identity of conviction among many parties.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The fact that in Christianity the same baptism exists as a concrete mode of action, that a form of worship is celebrated in common at the physical level, that all words point on beyond themselves to a single historical reality, and in this precisely to that which can no longer be expressed conceptually, that is treated of in community within the concrete dimension of a world that is subject to space and time – these and much else besides are not merely the consequences of a conviction held in common which one has previously assured oneself of as common prior to any action by the process of theoretical discussion. Rather they too are just as much so many elements through which this common conviction can be realized and conceived of as present. In the last analysis there can be no breaking out of the circle. Concrete action (in the broadest sense) is, as common, not merely the consequence of a conviction previously arrived at and already held in common, but the mode in which such a common conviction is brought to its fulness and achieves its realization and its certainty. This means that the maintenance of the unity of the creed within the pluralism of the theologies and the assurance of this are also (though not only!) dependent upon the fact that the community and the unity which are being achieved do not exist simply or exclusively in the dimension of the word as such and at the conceptual level. If we want to bring the unity of the creed to its fulness and to assure ourselves of this unity (of course always with an assurance which remains at the human level, which is never attained to in the absolute, which must be worked out in hope, and which is not even communicated at the theoretical level), then we must express this one creed in common, celebrate the Death of the Lord in common in the physicality belonging to this, celebrate the sacraments in their physicality, serve the world in common in action, and then through all this process community of creed is achieved in the midst of all the pluralism of the theologies.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In conclusion the question can be posed – still without any real answer – of what all that has so far been said signifies for an ecumenical theology and for the ecumenical strivings that are made to achieve unity between the Churches. Proceeding from what we have said so far, surely the question is this: Can it perhaps be the case that the theologians of the separated Churches have already, without our really noticing it, entered into that [23] pluralism among the theologies which certainly has its place in the one Church? Has this taken place (and this is a point which is, for the most part considered in isolation) not because these theologies have themselves undergone further development since the Reformation, but, on a deeper and more exact view, because in the awareness of faith of the individual Churches of today they are accorded a different status, i.e. the difference between them and the creed proper is seen and recognized as greater than was formerly thought because in each of the Churches concerned, even in those in which these theologies are maintained, they are from the outset expressed and interpreted in a broader context, i.e. precisely as such as can have other theologies existing side by side with them in an abiding pluralism of such theologies? A situation has been arrived at, at least in part, in which these theologies of the different Churches are, in this new context, not in the least incompatible with one another. Perhaps we can be tolerant enough to accord to them, at least in part, that self-responsibility of which we have spoken above without requiring from them, over and above the ancient formulae of faith, or, it may be quite new and original statements of the Christian faith, a common theological mode of expression as the condition for these theologies existing together in common in the one Church. Perhaps there is a genuine theological possibility not only of achieving the unity of the Church on the basis of the unity of the creed as theologically formulated, but also a further possibility of arriving at unity of creed on the basis of unity of life and action in the Church or of acquiring sufficient assurance of the fact of this unity. Our intention is merely to pose these questions, not to answer them. We have no intention of offering a potent recipe for producing a mere seeming solution to all the differences between the creeds. Let us simply put the following question: What significance does it have for the strivings of the ecumenical movement for a workable unity among the Churches, if within the Catholic Church an effective pluralism of theologies exists and has a positive right to exist?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[24]

2

ON THE THEOLOGY OF THE ECUMENICAL DISCUSSION

The subject of this article[1] is the theology of ecumenism. This has the unusual advantage that in a certain sense the subject under consideration and the considerations themselves coincide: an ecumenical dialogue which treats of ecumenical dialogue. Given a subject of this kind it would be perfectly conceivable to fasten upon one specific question in terms of theological content from the whole group of associated subjects, and thereby to demonstrate by means of one specific example what we mean when we speak of ecumenical theology.[2] But surely [25] it is still possible, albeit in an abstract and formal manner, to consider the actual nature of this. It may be that in adopting this method we shall never advance beyond the level of very general principles, and perhaps we shall lay ourselves open to the objection that the difficulties lie in the details. But I cannot escape the impression that even so abstract an approach to the essence of the matter as this has tasks and problems enough to offer, at any rate to attempt it. Since it is not easy to provide a preliminary plan such as would be enlightening in itself of the considerations which will be attempted here, I may be permitted simply to embark upon my subject.

I

Let us measure ecumenical theology against a background in space and time of the divisions which exist within western Christendom, in other words that constituted by the period of the last 450 years. Against this background, then, is the task of ecumenical theology old or new? Are we to say that ecumenical theology has been in existence since

[1] The Considerations which follow originally served as a double lecture delivered in the course of a lecture tour in the Scandinavian countries lasting from 21st March to the 4th April 1968, and which was held at the invitation of the deans of the theological faculties of Copenhagen, Lund, Oslo, Uppsala, Helsinki and Abo/Turku. The text was subsequently revised and some additional notes were added to it.

[2] The author must here refer to the different studies which he has published in another context on particular questions in ecumenism. In these it would be possible to see in greater detail what possibilities there are, in the opinion of the author, for ecumenical discussion, even in difficult areas of detail, and how a theology really cornmitted to the realities of the situation can bring life and movement to positions which have become petrified. On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Protestantismus', LTK VIII (2nd ed. 1963), 827-831; idem, 'On Conversions to the Church', Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 373-3 84; idem, 'The Presence of the Lord in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 291-311; idem, 'Questions of Controversial Theology on Justification', ibid., pp. 189-218; idem, 'Some Remarks on the Question of Conversions', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966) pp. 315-335; idem, 'Justified and Sinner at the Same Time', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 218-230; idem, 'Zur "Situationsethik" aus ökumenischer Sicht', Schriften zur Theologie VI (Einsiedeln, 2nd ed., 1968), pp.537-544; idem, 'Katholische Besinnung zum Reformationsjubiläum', Gnade als Freiheit (Freiburg, 1968), pp. 177-186; cf. also the further studies on indulgence, Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore, 1963), pp. 175-201, and X (London and New York), pp. 125-199. To achieve a general survey of the literature reference will be made to Internationale Ökumenische Bibliographie ed. by L. Gerken, H. Weissgerber et al., I-II (1967), as also to Oecumenia 1969. Jahrbuch für ökumenische Forschung (Gütersloh, 1969).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the Enlightenment and the awakening of historical awareness in the nineteenth century – in other words, so far as we Catholics are concerned, since Möhler and Newman? Or does ecumenical theology only begin to exist since the modern ecumenical movement in the strict sense of the term, since there has been a World Council of Churches and, so far as we Catholics are concerned, since the Second Vatican Council has been in existence with its Decree on Ecumenism? Or should we perhaps even go so far as to say that ecumenical theology is still more or less something to be desired, a hope rather than a reality? It will be best not to opt for any one of the alternatives presented, or to give any wholly decisive and unambiguous answer to this question. Here rather we must let it remain an open question. Every living reality has a history, and often too a pre-history, and for the most part it is not possible to draw any unambiguous boundaries between history and pre-history, especially since in the case we are considering the mentality of the individual theologians, even in earlier ages, was not the same, but rather exhibits profound differences, so that perhaps in any distinction we might draw between controversial theology and ecumenical theology it might be said that from the Reformation to the [26] present day there have been ecumenical theologians and controversial theologians.[3]

E. Stakemeier defines controversial theology as the theological treatment of doctrines considered as the official proclamations previously put forward by confessional groups and as reduced to their underlying principles-doctrines, that is to say, which form the basis of the differences which divide the Churches and which exist between the confessional bodies conceived of as Christian and ecclesiastical.[4] This definition of his points the question of whether in any such description of the nature of controversial theology we could not work out a still less ambiguous and more vital difference between this and ecumenical theology, or whether 'ecumenical' as distinct from 'controversial' serves merely to describe the greater hope and a more ironic and understanding approach by which to describe one and the same discipline, a discipline which we call 'controversial theology' or precisely today prefer to call 'ecumenical theology.'[5] We intend actually to abstract from the question of how far ecumenical theology in a given Christian Church is of its nature and inevitably distinct from that of another Christian Church even in respect of its formal essence through the different understanding which is involved of revelation, faith, and thereby too of theology itself in its general nature. But even abstracting from this it can certainly be said that a 'controversial theology', or probably better 'ecumenical theology' in every Church has first and foremost the task of

---

[3] At this point it is impossible to enter in any detail into the history of ecumenical theology. On this cf. in greater detail R. Rouse/S. Neil edd., Geschichte der ökumenischen Bewegung (Göttingen, 1957); G. Thils, Histoire doctrinal du mouvement oecuménique (Paris, 2nd ed., 1963); G. Tavard, Geschichte der Ökumenischen Bewegung (Mainz, 1964).

[4] E. Stakemeier, 'Kontroverstheologie', LTK VI (2nd ed., 1961), 511-515, esp. 514; cf. also R. Kösters, 'Zur Theorie der Kontroverstheologie', ZKTh 88 (1966), pp. 121-162.

[5] For a definition of the concept 'Ecumenical' cf. W. A. Visser't Hooft, Der Sinn des Wortes "ökumenisch" (Stuttgart, 1954); Y. Congar, 'Ökumenische Bewegung', LTK VII (2nd ed. 1963), 1128-1137; W. Beinert, Um das dritte Kirchenattribut, 2 Vols (Essen, 1964), esp. II, pp. 532-572; W. Seibel, 'Ökumenische Theologie', Gott in Welt II (Festschrift für K. .Rahner) , ed. by J. B. Metz, W. Kern et al. (Freiburg, 1964), pp. 472-498; P. Wacker, Theologie als ökumenische Dialog (Munich, 1965); H. Volk, 'Katholische ökunaenismus', Gesammelte Schriften II (Mainz, 1966), pp. 161-178; P. Bläser, 'Ökumenische Theologie', Was ist Theologie? ed. by E. Neuhäusler and E. Gössmann (Munich, 1966), pp. 358-415; J. Brosseder, Ökumenische Theologie (Munich, 1967).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

providing a presentation of that Church's own teaching in all its breadth and depth. In this connection the theologians [27] of the other Christian Churches must be borne in mind and included in the considerations to the extent that the ultimate self-understanding of the particular Church's own theology allows for this. The second task would be the attempt at a thorough presentation of the doctrinal views of the other Churches in respect of their origins, their historical development, and their current positions, and in this deep consideration would have to be given especially to the connection between the individual doctrines, to the roots and sustaining principles and prior assumptions of these, and, in particular cases, to the different concept of truth which lies at the basis of this other theology right from the outset. Third the theologians concerned must submit themselves with an unreserved will for truthfulness and unreserved obedience to the revealed will of God, and this implies that they have a duty, and must have the courage, should the need arise, to qualify the particular point of doctrine of the other Church as running counter to the revelation of God in Christ and so without any false irenics, as an error.

That such a theology – whatever name we may give to it – must be concerned with serving the unity of Christians in the one Church of Jesus Christ, that above all in western ecumenical theology the way that must be trodden is above all (if indeed not exclusively) that of exegetical and biblical theology and also the theology of the Fathers which these Churches recognize in common as such -all this seems to be obvious. Nevertheless we must not disguise from ourselves the fact that in agreeing in this way to recognize the formal principles and methods to be used the ecumenical theologies in the individual Churches will appear very different from one another, especially since they are precisely theologies, and should not be official confessional pronouncements considered as part of the general or religious phenomenology of the individual Churches taken as a whole. Today, perhaps, there is in fact no longer any agreement as to the premiss which this involves, that in all the Churches which have been separated from one another there either should be or can be any such thing as a unifying doctrine binding upon each of the individual Churches. We have only to consider the radical differences which in fact exist between the individual Churches, at least in part, in their understanding of what theology can be or should be at all,[6] to realize that ecumenical [28] theology considered as a discussion between the theologies of different Churches constitutes an immensely difficult problem. It could in fact be the case that these theologies, regarded from their ultimate understanding of themselves, are so disparate that they no longer speak with one another, confront one another, or can be measured by one another at all, and, at least in theory, an ecumenical theology would almost be something like a 'contradictio in adiecto'. And in that case the only insight that could help us to overcome this state of doubt and questioning would be to remember that we are men, that we do recognize one another mutually as Christians, and that for both these reasons we must bend ourselves again and again to the task of speaking with one another, because there is no other way whatever for us to conduct our human lives. We must do this even if we are still far from knowing in what the ultimate prior assumptions and contexts of ideas consist which we

[6] The actual plurality of the Churches themselves is reflected in this different interpretation of the meaning of theology, and in this way this in turn becomes a subject for ecumenical discussion.

On the problem of pluralism in theology on the basis of the numerous philosophical approaches of the parties to the discussion cf. K. Rahner, passim in Theological Investigations IX and X (London and New York). What has been said there may analogously be applied here also in our present context.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

hold in common, and even though without this knowledge any discussion seems to be quite inconceivable.[7] It might be said that our de facto existence as men and Christians has from the first decided the question for us and told us that there can be discussion between us. In an ecumenical theology, therefore, we must consider the question of how this is possible, because prior to all conscious insight on our part this possibility does de facto already exist as a present reality.

II

When we turn back to what the Second Vatican Council has to say with regard to ecumenical theology in the Decree on Ecumenism we come across the key word 'dialogue' again and again.[8] Certainly it can be said that controversial theology and ecumenical theology, even if both have ultimately speaking a common nature, differ from one another in virtue of the fact that the old controversial theology consisted of a controversy, whereas the current ecumenical theology is intended to be a dialogue and is recognized by all Christians of today as having this purpose.[9] However [29] old the word 'dialogue', and even the element of dialogue in human life may be, still it is, after all, only in very recent times that this word has come to be a key word standing for the manner in which discussion between Christians belonging to separate Churches is meant to be conducted. What this word means is made plain in No.9 of the Decree on Ecumenism, where it is stated that an attitude of 'par cum pari agere' is required of all in ecumenical discussion. Ecumenical theology is intended to be a theology of open dialogue between those who have equal rights. But can theology really want this to be the case above all among Catholic Christians? Can it be this? The attitude of anxiety and mistrust with which non-Catholic Christians often encounter their Catholic partner in ecumenical meetings must not be straightway condemned as unjustified. It is not to be eliminated even when the Catholic Church declares that according to her understanding too the ecumenical movement and work, and thereby (as we may add) ecumenical theology as such (among Catholics) should not be accompanied by the intention of winning over individual converts to the Catholic Church.[10] The real and ultimate ground of this mistrust lies far deeper, and must clearly be recognized if the nature of ecumenical theology as a 'dialogue theology' is rightly to be understood.

If by dialogue we understand nothing else than the imparting of our own respective opinions to one another, as a mere interchange of information, then naturally no problem exists. Even in that case it may still remain obscure whether in such an interchange of information theological opinions really are made comprehensible, since the task of understanding them is certainly more difficult than in an interchange of information, e.g. on economic views and enterprises. Surely it is not absurd from the outset to hazard the thesis that in the sphere of faith and theology the opinion of the other party will be

---

[7] On this cf. also K. Rahner, 'A Small Fragment on the Collective Finding of Truth', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 82-88.

[8] cf. the Decree on Ecumenism, 'Unitatis Redintegratio', Nos. 4, 9, 11, 13, 14, 18, 19, 21, 22, 23, and further the Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity, 'Apostolicam Actuositatem', Nos. 17, 31.

[9] On current ecumenical theology's interpretation of itself cf. G. Thils, La Théologie oecuménique (Louvain, 1960). cf. also n. 5.

[10] cf. the Decree on Ecumenism, 'Unitatis Redintegratio', No. 4.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

understood only when it too is accepted as having been fully assimilated as one's own and accepted as one's own faith. For there are certainly truths the meaning of which is really borne in upon us only in the very act of giving our practical assent to them, and in positively acting upon them so that to understand their meaning and to give our practical and living assent to them are acts that cannot be separated one from another.

But if for the moment we abstract from this question, and presuppose, at least provisionally, that we can to some extent abstract from it, then ecumenical theology, understood as an interchange of information with regard to the opinions of the partners to the dialogue, raises no initial difficulty. One supplies information, as far as possible exhaustively, with [30] regard to one's theological ideas. Each party apprehends the meaning of this information as supplied by the other just as in other contexts too we experience and understand the opinion of another without thereby being brought to share it. But manifestly ecumenical theology cannot be confined to this interchange of information however much this may constitute the initial stage in it, and however important it may be for it not to be aimed at gaining individual converts for one's own Church. Theology has to do with truth. It is not intended merely to inform but rather to communicate truth – truth which makes valid claims upon the other party and therefore can and should be communicated by the informant only in such a way that he identifies himself with this claim to truth. One may think as one will about the nature of truth, the nature of theoretical reasoning, the nature of truth in the context of faith, truth as universal and as particular. Evidently theological dialogue too is not intended merely to communicate information to the other party of what one thinks oneself, but rather to speak to him that truth which is intended to lay claims upon him. If we were unwilling to attribute this purpose to ecumenical dialogue, then it would be degraded into a mere sociological phenomenon in which mutual information was supplied with regard to attitudes and opinions on either side because this is necessary in order to live peaceably together, and in this every kind of opinion and attitude would at basis be simply a psychological fact on the same level and of the same importance as all the rest, independently of any question of truth. Even if someone feels compelled to hold the view that he cannot regard ecumenical dialogue as consisting in what has just been described, and even if, in view of the account given of themselves by specific theologies, he might legitimately raise the question whether these can attribute the purpose we have mentioned to ecumenical dialogue, we would still have to make two points in reply to his question. First, the mutual presuppositions of ecumenical dialogue are such that they could only have a social significance. For how could the opinion of another be of interest to me if it were not from the outset claiming to be or to become my truth quite apart from the fact that it is also a social reality which plays its part in determining my sphere of existence. Further, the Catholic Christian at least, so far as his theology is concerned, cannot surrender this claim to truth in ecumenical dialogue according to his understanding of his faith. The Protestant partner to the dialogue, therefore, will take this attitude and this purpose into account and ask himself whether he believes that he is open to conduct a dialogue with a partner of this kind to the discussion.

There is yet another way of throwing light upon the problems which [31] ecumenical dialogue entails. Dialogue presupposes a pluralism of attitudes, convictions and aims in the partners to the discussion. Where there is complete identity of opinion dialogue, at least in the dimension of theoretical reasoning, is superfluous to scientific investigations,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and therefore to speculative theology too even at the purely informative level. Now in this pluralism there are on the one hand opinions which are de facto particular and, moreover, are not intended to be anything more than this. On the other hand, however, there are opinions, the outcome of theoretical reasoning, which, while they certainly cannot be shared by all, are still put forward with the theoretical claim and the practical aim of winning over all as their adherents. That opinion which is in principle and of its very nature particular implies at most the theoretical problem of whether such a particularist attitude, the holding of an 'opinion only for myself' is, in specific cases, reasonable in the very nature of opinion, i.e. whether this 'modesty' does not constitute a gradual death of the opinion of all. For properly speaking, as emanating wholly from the personal inclinations of the individuals concerned it is no longer really relevant even to those to whom it is communicated. And in practice the only problem which is recognized in this particularism is that of how to achieve a 'technical' harmonization and mutual co-operation between the parties involved, in order that such basically particularist opinions can be given concrete application at the social level and within the activities of one and the same social group. The real problem of pluralism of opinions only arises at that point at which de facto particular convictions have in principle and of their very nature to lay claim to a universal validity. They must do this unless they are willing to surrender their own nature. For example: a society of entomologists and a society of aquarium enthusiasts uphold a particular opinion with regard to the significance of what they are doing. But they do not claim that all must share their opinion. In contrast to this Christianity, a Christian confession (at least if it understands its own significance in the classic sense), and the ideology of a militant dialectical materialism are conscious of being (provided they do not deny their own nature) endowed with gifts and with a vocation which gives them a special claim to truth and a mission which is directed to all. For what they represent is a radically universal conviction, a comprehensive view of the meaning of the cosmos or (if we wish to phrase it so) a faith. To teach that it is in principle impossible for there to be any system of beliefs having such a universal claim, and that these are from the outset always, and in every case false, would itself in turn constitute such a universal opinion with practical consequences for all.

[32] Let us take then as our starting-point the fact that Christianity too, as it exists in the specifically confessional form which it has acquired, and as the outcome of a process of ecclesiastical institutionalization, is indeed de facto a particularist phenomenon, yet in terms of its radical understanding of itself and the claim it makes, a universal conviction with a claim to truth directed to all. Now if this is the case, then the problem arises of whether it is still possible at all to conduct an ecumenical dialogue with this as our premiss, even when it is only one of the partners to the dialogue (in other words the Catholic one at least) who conducts the dialogue with such a claim that his convictions have this universal validity.[11] The principle that an ecumenical dialogue must be conducted without force is clear, and is not in question here even though this renunciation of every form of force has not always been so self-evident, as a glance at the history of western Christianity reveals. But this still does not provide any solution to the question of whether a real possibility of dialogue exists between those who hold convictions of which

[11] On this cf. also K. Rahner, 'Reflections on Dialogue within a Pluralistic Society', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 31-42; idem, 'Dialogue in the Church', Theological Investigations VIII (London and New York), pp. 103-125.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

at least one (if not both) claims to be absolute, i.e., in our case, demands to be affirmed with an absolute assent of faith such that it involves salvation – something which we must not lose at any cost. The basic reason why the earlier controversial theology was so sharp is that it involved this assertion of the absolute value of one's own convictions. And while we can no longer in the least enter into the mentality which made the earlier controversial theology so hard and bitter, still we must begin by asking ourselves whether this lack of understanding on the part of us of today is not conditioned by a relativism deriving from our liberalism, an attitude in which we are quite incapable of understanding what an absolute assent of faith, acquiring a life-and-death importance for us, can signify for the individual's own personal creed as that which alone brings salvation. But can one whose faith is of this kind really enter into any open dialogue, or with such an attitude can he merely be willing to instruct, to bear witness, and to convince, insofar as he is capable at all of advancing beyond the stage of merely supplying information? This is a serious question. At this point we leave it open because probably we shall be in a better position to answer it when we have considered that which constitutes the ultimate theological basis of ecumenical theology.

[33]

III

The question I have posed is what constitutes the ultimate basis of ecumenical theology. My answer to this question will initially take the form of a brief thesis which I shall then attempt to explain more precisely. The thesis runs as follows: the ultimate basis of ecumenical theo1ogy is that unity, apprehended in hope, which consists in a belief in justifying grace, a be1ief which, even though in its theological formulation and its explication in credal form it is still in process of being arrived at, is nevertheless already in existence as one and the same belief in both of the parties involved in ecumenical theology.

Now what is meant by this thesis in more precise terms? First it must be unreservedly conceded that for ecumenical dialogue and ecumenical theology in the form in which it appears today a liberal humanism, with its defence of freedom of opinion and faith within a pluralistic society, has been, and still is, the occasion and the context without which the pursuit of ecumenical theology as it de facto exists today is inconceivable. This historical necessity for this liberalism, for the relationship which the separated Christians of today have achieved with one another, does not need to be denied, and must not be glossed over. Certain further observations must be made on this point. This liberalism, however, is hardly the true ground, the ultimate fons et origo, of the ability which the separated parties have of conducting a dialogue today. So we must not confuse the essential basis for a given phenomenon with the historical situation in which such an essential basis becomes effective. Now what is the true and effective basis for ecumenical dialogue such that it is constitutive of its essential nature? It is to this question that the thesis formulated above is attempting to supply an answer. When we conduct an ecumenical dialogue, or pursue ecumenical theology with one another despite the fact of our being divided among many Churches, then the ultimate necessary condition which we presuppose for this is that each of us recognizes the others as Christians. But what does this mean in precise and genuinely theological terms? Certainly it does not merely mean that we accept and acknowledge the fact that the other partner to the dialogue regards himself as a Christian. Nor does it merely mean that we mutually credit one another with the fact of all having validly been baptized – provided we are thinking of baptism here first and foremost in its empirical reality as an external fact of cult. Nor does it merely mean that in spite of all the differences between us with regard to the creed we can establish as a matter of empirical fact that there is agreement between us on certain of our tenets, in the sense, [34] for instance, that is implied in the basic formula of the World Council of Churches. What it means, rather, is that we are convinced as a matter of hope, if not of knowledge at the explicit and theoretical level, that the partners to the dialogue on either side live in the grace of God, that they are truly justified by the Holy Pneuma of God and are sharers in the divine nature.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now there have been ages in which this conviction, in which we mutually recognize in hope the real and triumphant presence of God's grace in one another, has not been felt with the force of a self-evident truth. When for instance Augustine upholds the validity of baptism among 'heretics' against Cyprian and the Donatists, and even outside the 'Catholic' sphere, he is certainly not including in this doctrine of his the conviction that this baptism actually communicates to the baptized individual an effective forgiveness of his sins and the sanctifying Spirit of God. Probably, indeed, right down to the age of the Enlightenment, the prevailing opinion on both sides has been that in the case of the heretic (and both parties have mutually regarded each other as such) it is to be presumed that his heresy must be accounted as guilt, and therefore in controversial discussions each side must presume that the other has not lived in God's grace. It may be that it was not until the eighteenth century that this question was the subject of any close thought. Distinctions may have been drawn between the educated and uneducated, and there may have been a tendency to attribute 'bona fides' to the latter more than to the former. It may be that the interpretation of one's opponent from the other confession as depicted above may not always and everywhere have been raised to the level of an explicit thesis. Nevertheless men lived and acted upon the basic feeling that their opponents could not be living in God's grace as justified and sanctified when nevertheless with regard to the faith that is saving, and without which (according to the Epistle to the Hebrews) man cannot be pleasing to God, they deviated in certain vital points from one's own convictions of faith, points which one regarded either as at least belonging absolutely to one's own faith or even (as in the case of the 'sola fide' doctrine) as the heart and centre of that faith.

Today, no doubt, the situation is different. This is a point which I do not really need to substantiate where Protestant Christians are concerned, especially since if I were to do so I should have to raise the question of whether this attribution of a state of justification to my partner in the dialogue who is confessionally separated from me derived from a liberal and relativist interpretation of my own creed, or whether it exists side by side with, and is to be regarded as reconcilable with, the conviction of the [35] absolute truth and universal claims of my own creed. But for all this I believe that the Protestant partner to the dialogue will not only credit the Catholic one in some sense with 'bona fides' and a genuine conviction at the human level, but also accept that the grace of Christ permeates the innermost roots of his being. And conversely the Catholic will do the same. The Second Vatican Council explicitly teaches that the Protestant Christian too is one who has received grace and justification provided he has not in any way sinfully denied God. The Council recognizes just as unequivocally that such an interior state of grace on the part of the Evangelical Christian can obviously be present even in those cases in which he decisively rejects specific elements in the teaching of the Roman Catholic Church, following in this the claim of his own conscience with regard to truth, since according to his belief they are irreconcilable with true Christianity. This conviction may be utterly obvious from the standpoint of a mere tolerant humanism. But in those cases in which the individual concerned is at the same time convinced of the salvific meaning of his own specific creed, a creed that differs decisively from that of another (and this applies at least to the manner in which Roman Catholic believers think of their faith) this conviction is anything but self-evident, and it is only very gradually, and with great efforts, that it has been brought to maturity in this Church's understanding of her own faith, to the point where it has been given clear expression in the Second Vatican Council. Nevertheless this conviction does now exist on the Catholic side as well.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

At this stage we do not need to discuss in any direct sense the question of how the significance of the Catholic creed, salvific and necessary to salvation as it is according to the Catholic understanding of faith, can be reconciled with the simultaneous conviction that one who does not share this faith still does have salvation. The question that we have to ask here is simply what this conviction implies on both sides with regard to the possibility of ecumenical dialogue and ecumenical theology, and to this question the thesis formulated above does supply an answer. This dialogue is possible because, despite the differences in our respective creeds in terms of objective formulation and verbal expression (in other words despite the differences of faith which exist between us in this sense) there is, nevertheless, a unity of faith such that we not only seek it but actually mutually concede it as already present and given in one another, because each of us is aware of the other as believing, hoping, and loving in the power of the Spirit of God possessing us, without whom there can be no belief and with whom there can be no unbelief. This statement naturally forces us to a decision as to what true faith really means. In this we must [36] neither overlook nor neglect the importance of the differences between the forms of words in which our respective creeds are expressed. At the same time, however, each side must credit the other with the presence of the divine Spirit of unity, together with the truth of God, enlightenment and faith. Each of us must recognize in the other the interior witness of the Holy Spirit. And if we do this, then a distinction of the kind we are suggesting here becomes inevitable if we are not simply to allow two contradictory positions to exist side by side. That which we Catholics call sanctifying grace, and that which Protestant theology calls justification and sanctification may still have as many different interpretations placed upon it as there are different theologies. Nevertheless it still remains in any case an act of God wrought upon us in his grace which truly alters us, transforming us from sinners to justified men, regardless of how we may interpret this sanctifying event of justification in more precise terms, whatever concepts we may use to express it, and however different the provenance of these concepts may be. Now precisely upon the Protestant understanding of grace, and at the same time on any truly rational Catholic ontology of grace, the reality involved here cannot be conceived of as though it had nothing to do with 'faith', or as though it could coexist with a mere state of unbelief. Thus if each of us credits the other with justifying grace, then we also credit one another with a real and true faith, and one which we may certainly not regard as merely empty in terms of the formative impact which it has upon our lives in the concrete, in other words as mere credulousness. Now if we credit one another mutually with true faith in this way, and if at the same time we take due cognizance of the very radical differences between the interpretations of faith put forward by the various Churches to the extent that this faith is objectified in conceptual and verbal terms, then there must be a faith with which we mutually credit one another as true, and yet which is different from this faith that is given objective expression in concepts and words.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This conclusion cannot be evaded merely by saying that even at the level of conceptual and verbal objectification of the content of faith there are, after all, certain fundamental points which all hold in common, which thereby ensure that there shall be one and the same faith common to all despite other secondary points of faith on which these Christians differ. For in the first place it is in fact questionable whether such common principles really are to be found held in common by all Christians. It is questionable whether if there are such, there is sufficient common understanding of what they mean – over and above the mere verbal formulations which are common to all – and whether they have not been so much [37] altered by the further theological statements which have been made and which are opposed to one another that it is no longer possible to speak of any real or effective unity of mind with regard to these more fundamental principles. And finally it may be questioned whether even in those cases in which – as with the Catholics – other points of faith are adhered to with the absolute assent of faith even though they are disputed by other confessions, these do not so intrinsically influence and modify those other points too which seem to be held in common (at least supposing that they are held with this absolute assent of faith) that we can no longer speak of any real fundamentally common mind with regard to the Christian creed. The questionableness of all these points is such that one is certainly forced to conclude that the oneness of mind that is postulated with regard to one and same true faith cannot consist – or at least cannot consist exclusively – in agreeing upon certain fundamental Christian principles (as for instance after the pattern of the basic formula of the World Council of Churches).

The postulate arrived at in this way of one and the same true faith held in common by all (despite the fact that the Christians involved differ from one another in the verbal expressions of their faith in their creed) is not an entity of which man is incapable of forming any idea merely on the grounds that manifestly it must be something that exists beneath and beyond any dogmatic principles which can be formulated in conceptual terms. When we Christians, projecting our ideas beyond the confessional boundaries, credit one another with the presence of the Holy Spirit of grace, then manifestly what we are saying is, after all, that the ultimate and most interior ‘testimonium spiritus’ is present in all, or at least must be presumed to be so present, that all of us are endowed with the ‘illustratio et inspiratio’ of the Spirit (concepts with which tradition throws light upon the movements of grace), with the wordless groanings and utterances of ‘Abba’ of the Spirit within the depths of our hearts, with the anointing of the Spirit spoken of by John which instructs us -all this is present even though this innermost reality of the Spirit and faith is objectified and interpreted differently in terms of words and ideas between the individual confessions. Thus we still accept that in any anthropology of man as spiritual and free which is capable of looking rather deeper into him a difference always prevails (and one which can never adequately be overcome or transcended) between two factors in man’s consciousness of himself: on the one hand an ultimate self-possession of the subject as free, i.e. a presence to himself which is never consciously explicated, a self-

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

understanding on man's part which is never fully reflected upon; on the Other man's objectified awareness of himself his subjectivity and his [38] capacity for free decision as objectified to himself.[12] Now if this is true then the postulate we have put forward on theological grounds of a true faith held in common between separated Christians through and beyond that faith which can be objectified in concepts and words does not signify something of which man himself is totally incapable of forming any idea. All of us 'know' in the Spirit of God something more simple, more true, and more real than that which we are capable of knowing and expressing in the dimension of our theological concepts.[13]

At this point we must, of course, pass over the question of why faith in the form in which it is objectified in conceptual terms is not rendered meaningless by a true faith of this kind present in the midst of our lives in the power of the Spirit of God himself, yet pre-conceptual in form.[14] This faith which we hold in common at the heart and centre of our lives through the grace of God is the same true faith in all and incapable of deceiving. And it constitutes the true basis and the ultimate prior condition for ecumenical dialogue and an ecumenical theology. Once we recognize it as the basis and prior condition for such dialogue and theology in this sense then, even when one or both parties to the ecumenical dialogue have given their absolute assent of faith to the particular propositions of faith which they uphold, the ecumenical dialogue can never be the sort of discussion in which one or both sides seeks to communicate purely ab [39] externo to the other parties to the discussion at any given time some doctrinal point which those other parties have so far simply failed to recognize or which is rejected as an erroneous belief. Ecumenical discussion consists rather in the attempt through dialogue to render intelligible to the other parties the fact that what is being expressed to them in conceptual terms is simply a more correct, a fuller and a more precise expression of something which they have already apprehended as their own faith through the Spirit in the ultimate depths of their lives as already justified, and which they have laid hold of as their own truth.[15]

---

[12] On this distinction cf. J. B. Metz, 'Befindlichkeit', LTK II (2nd ed. 1958), 102-104.

[13] On the distinction between the reality of faith and faith as consciously reflected upon cf. K. Rahner, 'Reflections on the Experience of Grace', Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 86-90; idem, 'Theology in the New Testament', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 23-41; idem, 'What is a Dogmatic Statement ?', ibid., pp. 42-66; idem, 'Universal Salvific Will of God: General', Sacramentum Mundi V (New York/London, 1969) pp. 405-409 idem, 'Heresies in the Church Today?', Theological Investigations XII.

[14] This question is also to be met with in a different form. It recurs once more in the distinction which is drawn between 'personal' and sacramental devotion, private and liturgical prayer, personal sacrifices and the sacrifice of the Mass, existential and essential morality, sacramental and extra-sacramental justification, charism and institution, the act of faith and dogma, particular and universal revelation, personal and universal saving history, Church and world, and also in a theological context it is once more a particular form of the general problems involved in the relationship between transcendentality and the 'this worldly' categories of being in human life in general. Again it plays a central part with regard to the possibility of ecumenical discussion. On the positive function of the institutional factor cf. amongst others K. Rahner, 'Dialogue in the Church', Theological Investigations X (London and New York, 1973), pp. 103-121 idem, 'Die neue Kirchlichkeit der Theologie', Gnade alt Freiheit (Freiburg, 1968), pp. 131-143.

[15] On this cf. also the discussion of anonymous or unacknowledged Christians as a whole. In this connection cf. especially 'Anonymous Christianity and the Missionary Task of the Church', Theological Investigations XII. The critical evaluations of my interpretation [cf. H.U.von Balthasar, Cordula oder der Ernstfall (Einsiedeln, 1966), pp. 85-97 or (2nd ed. 1967), pp. 84-96; L. Elders, 'Die Taufe der Weltreligionen', ThGl 65 (1965) pp. 124-131; H. van Straelen, The Catholic Encounter with World

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

On this basis an answer can also be given to the question which we have posed but left unanswered so far in section II, the question namely of why an ecumenical dialogue is still possible even without any liberalizing prior assumptions, i.e. even when an absolute assent of faith has been given to a controversial proposition of faith on the part of one or both parties. Even under these conditions ecumenical dialogue can be carried on as open to further decisions and results. For even an absolute assent of faith on the part of one party to an article of belief that is controversial can and must presuppose the difference we have indicated between faith that is absolutely basic on the one hand and faith as objectified in words and concepts on the other. Such an absolute assent of faith, therefore, is perfectly compatible with the recognition that even a true objectification of the faith that is absolute and basic never adequately or fully expresses this, so that it is always open to further and fuller expression. For this reason precisely this growing understanding of ourselves and of our own faith as objectified [40] in concepts (even when these concepts are correct) can be promoted in an open dialogue by our partner in the discussion even though heterodox. Even when an absolute assent of faith has been given, this need not mean that the party to the dialogue must either be able to indoctrinate his partner through the propositions which he firmly upholds without any alteration, or else, if he cannot succeed in this, the dialogue must again and again be broken off without result, or be degraded to the level of a mere mutual interchange of information between the two sides with regard to their respective beliefs. Even one entering into dialogue when he has already given his absolute assent of faith to controversial articles of this kind can in a true sense learn from his partner in the discussion and thus conduct a dialogue that is open and that can yield fresh insights and results.

IV

We may permit ourselves to draw yet another conclusion from what has been said above with regard to ecumenical theology, one which is for the most part overlooked in ecumenical dialogue. We have seen that a necessary prior condition for this dialogue is the distinction that must be drawn between that basic and ultimate faith which is present in the midst of our lives through the Spirit of God on the one hand and that faith of the Church on the other which is expressed in objective concepts. At the same time we must recognize that what is being treated of here is an ecumenical dialogue between Churches whose faith must necessarily be formulated in concepts for sociological reasons. Now if we recognize this then those participating in the ecumenical dialogue must take into account the fact that at least on the Catholic side it is circumscribed by certain official Religions (London, 1966): H. Kruse, 'Die "anonymen Christen" exegetisch gesehen', MThZ 18 1967), pp. 2-29; E. Biser, 'Ausgegrenzt und eingewiesen', MThZ 19 (1968), pp. 1-16, esp. 7 f.]. simply overlook the fact that this 'Christianhood' of man., which is already present as a concomitant of grace, is precisely the condition for any proclamation of truth on the part of the Church, while conversely this grace itself only achieves its full consummation and becomes fully apprehensible as a historical phenomenon when it achieves and sustains an explicitly Christian creed, and a state in which it is embodied in the social life of the Church. Furthermore such an authority as Balthasar himself puts forward the very same doctrine as that which he disputes in my interpretation, cf. idem, Cordula (2nd ed. 1967), p. 95; idem, Wer ist ein Christ (Einsiedeln, 1966), p. 100; idem, 'Spiritus Creator', Skizzen Theologie III (Einsiedeln, 1967), pp. 160 ff., 318 ff.

---

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

definitions the terms of which are laid down by the Church's magisterium.[16] For Catholics these are indeed binding, but nevertheless different in quality from the absolute truths to which an absolute assent of faith has to be given.

The parties to the discussion need to bear in mind that in an official and conscious sense at least on the Catholic side and, it may be, in an unconscious sense, and one that is merely conditioned by the facts of history on all sides, there are certain theological definitions which on the one hand are present and on the other are nothing more than (however [41] reasonable and perhaps necessary they may be in terms of religious sociology) definitions which are to some extent conventional in character. Now if we were to recognize this then, it may be presumed, ecumenical dialogue could often be conducted more freely and with a greater hope of being fruitful. Words such as 'person' and 'nature' in christology, 'original sin' in the theology of sin, 'transubstantiation' in the doctrine of the Eucharist, 'infusion', 'habitus' ,'increase of merit' etc. in the doctrine of justification certainly do point to a reality of faith and of binding conviction. But they also always imply the influence of certain linguistic conventions and language in the forming of definitions within a given confession which are not necessary and could in principle be altered without any surrender of what is really being expressed in such definitions.

If, for instance, someone put forward the proposition (as Emil Brunner has) that there is no such thing as original sin then this need not necessarily imply for a Catholic understanding of faith that something heretical in the true sense is being expressed. Certainly all that would initially be taking place in such a case is that a particular ecclesiastical definition, in some sense binding for Catholics, would be being rejected. For the question would in fact still remain completely open as to whether the rejection of me term 'original sin' really entailed a rejection of the reality signified by and under the term original sin in a Tridentine formulation of a proposition of faith.

Let us pay due heed, therefore, to the difference which has been explained above between the two levels of faith. And let us further consider that the formulations of Catholic dogma on the part of the authorities of the Catholic Church always involve a concealed element of a definition in linguistic terms addressed to that particular community even when there has been no real conscious reflection upon this fact. Finally let us not lose sight of the fact that every theological expression, however acute and profound it may be, is, nevertheless, measured by the reality to which it points, inadequate (which is not the same thing as false) to express this. Now if we recognize all these factors then we must take into account the possibility that in ecumenical dialogue what we are disagreeing about is not the truths and realities signified but simply the words in which they are expressed. We should consider that it is only rarely that the true subject of a dialogue of this kind is the question of whether the parties involved can advance beyond that unity which is already in principle achieved with regard to the actual matter concerned so as to arrive at a common definition. This question, therefore, is not so devoid of hope, because Catholic theology too is aware that concepts of this kind which [42] have been officially laid down in the Catholic Church and the definitions thereby produced are in need of explanation and interpretation, and that obviously this [16] On this cf. J. Feiner and M. Löhrer, edd., Mysterium Salutis I (Einsiedeln, 1965), pp. 693-696 and in the present volume the chapter entitled 'Pluralism in Theology and the Unity of the Creed in the Church', pp. 3-23.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

can be achieved only through the use of different words and concepts. This means that even ideas and definitions of this kind which have been produced by the official Church are not thereby exempted (by the fact of having an official status of this kind) from the process of historical development.

V

I believe that those involved in working out a theology in the form of an ecumenical dialogue should all in common have the courage and, more-over, today actually do have the common task of pronouncing a common 'No', under certain circumstances, to real heresies, for probably such heresies are emerging today in all the Christian Churches, albeit with varying degrees of clarity, and are threatening the gospel of Christ.

Certainly in the individual Churches there can be a pluralism of theologies without prejudice to the particular creed held by each.[17] Certainly this pluralism of theologies has also grown up in the Catholic Church – especially in connection with the Second Vatican Council. Certainly as a result of fresh questions, such as the Reformation period alone was not of itself sufficient to bring to the surface, the leading currents in theology today not infrequently cut across the confessional boundaries and the theologies that correspond to these. Certainly, without prejudice to an abiding question of truth, many of the old questions which were matters of controversy between the confessions have ceased to have that weight attached to them which is always subject to historical conditions and particular concrete situations, and have lost their significance in the theology of today. But in the midst of, and in spite of all this the theologians of the different Christian Churches who are conscious of their responsibility to uphold the gospel and the Christian faith whole and untruncated can help and encourage one another in certain circumstances to pronounce an unambiguous 'No', a 'damnamus' (as for instance the Confessing Church in Germany did with regard to the teaching of the German Christians within the Evangelical Church) against heresies which also threaten the stock of basic doctrines of the Christian faith which all hold in common.

Of course these different theologies, as upheld in the individual [43] Churches, all have to begin by helping one another mutually within the framework of an ecumenical theology to distinguish in such new questions and doctrines between that which on the one hand constitutes a justified and perhaps necessary expression of Christian faith, and so genuine progress in the history of dogma or theology, and on the other that which for any genuine Christian and theologian, and for any genuinely Christian Church, must uncompromisingly be accounted as heresy. Certainly such a distinction will require consideration, prudence, restraint, patience, and finally time. Obviously in an ecumenical discussion the theologians of the Christian Churches can be of assistance to one another in this discerning of the spirits, and under certain circumstances too can exhort one another to prudence and tolerance in the face of such new currents in theology. In this connection it is in fact interesting that, for instance, such a theologian as Karl Barth believes that he has discovered in not a few representatives of contemporary Catholic theology in Germany an excessively favourable attitude and leaning towards the school of Bultmann, that in fact even Bultmann himself confirms that there is such an [17] On this cf. also 'Perspectives for the Future of the Church', Theological Investigations XII.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

understanding among these Catholic theologians, and considers that it is greater among them than on the right wing of German Protestant theology. But what I am speaking of here is rather that over and above all this, however necessary and urgent it may be, the theologians of the different Churches should work together in ecumenical collaboration to the point where they can define unambiguous boundaries upheld by all towards attitudes and doctrines which are simply no longer Christian at all, although their practitioners still claim a right to exist within the Churches and are unwilling of their own volition to leave the Churches. So long as the Churches are in a state of pilgrimage in this world they can only pronounce their assent to the gospel and no less to the Deutero-Pauline Epistles and the First Epistle of John if they also have the courage to pronounce their dissent. An ecumenical theology could make it easier for the theologies in the different Churches to achieve that clarity of insight and that courage to arrive at a decision at the appropriate point and in the appropriate manner, and with sufficient practical down-to-earth effectiveness within the Churches, actually to pronounce a 'No' to false interpretations or invalidations of the Christian message. Certainly in doing this they would not be depriving the leaders of the various Churches of their proper task and function. Rather they would be lightening this task and function and giving it a practical effectiveness within the communities. An act of dissent of this kind, made in common by all, even if it entailed a loss of some or of many who would thereupon leave the Churches, [44] could also promote the aims of the ecumenical movement, the unity of the Churches, because in this way the least that would be achieved (this is a point to which we shall be returning at a later stage) would be that the unity between the Churches in the fundamentals of the Christian creed would already be made clearer here and now.

This demand should not be taken as an incitement for ecumenical theology to become a sort of heresy hunt and persecution on the part of the united Christian community. But the Churches must not be degraded to mere umbrella organizations, supplying, by the historical conditions under which they have grown up, a specious appearance of Christianity within which the upholders of absolutely any opinion, however arbitrary, can be gathered. It must not be thought that that principle which has its basis in Christianity, namely of absolute freedom of conscience and tolerance, should actually be pressed so far as to include absolute freedom for any kind of opinion within the Church so long as its upholder does not wish to leave that Church of his own volition. If we were to fall into this error then an ecumenical theology likewise would be degraded into a mere conversation between the upholders of any kind of opinions, and the Churches would only survive as separate entities from one another at the organizational level, no longer at the level of theology and creed. And ecumenical theology would have lost its purpose, because in fact that purpose would, at basis, long since have been achieved. Or, to put it better, it would have vanished. The ecumenical movement would no longer have any content in terms of faith and theology, it would only still continue to survive in the discussions of the official functionaries of the various Churches as to what better arrangements might be made between the Churches in terms of religious organization, or even how they might amalgamate. And the only function which the ecumenical movement could have beyond this would consist in a mutual acclimatization process in which the points of dissimilarity due to psychological and historical conditions, but ultimately speaking theologically irrelevant between the Christians of different confessions, would be smoothed out.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now if ecumenical theology and the ecumenical movement is to be something more than this, then the Churches must have, and must maintain, a substantial nucleus of beliefs as the necessary prior condition for this 'something more' regardless of whether this substantial nucleus is interpreted more in terms of the nature of Christianity, its doctrines, its application in human life, its concrete realization, or in some other way. This substantial nucleus of Christian faith, however it is conceived of, is certainly not identical with that which is present in every upright and [45] human individual in the dimension of his conscious thought and sense of social responsibility. Otherwise the opinion might be upheld that the Christian Churches as such have long since absolutely outlived their usefulness and should be transformed as quickly as possible into a humanist and democratic society purely secular and a-religious in character, and only having the function of providing a field of intercommunication between individuals. If, on the other hand, there is a genuine substantial nucleus of Christian faith of the kind we have referred to, then certainly it will, in the end, be the task of an ecumenical theology to support the different theologies and Churches even as separate from one another in upholding this substantial nucleus.

VI

In what follows a confrontation will be attempted between ecumenical theology and the situation in terms of religious sociology[18] in which all Churches rind themselves today.

The question of truth as between the separated Christian creeds is certainly the concern of ecumenical theology as such. We can say this even while not overlooking the fact that the separated theologies are disunited not only on the question of whether the statements made by any given theology are true or false, but also on the question of what truth and error mean at all in this context. This latter point is in fact strikingly illustrated by the very fact that in the last few decades the focus of interest has been transferred (at least in Protestant theology) to the question of hermeneutics. At the same time, however, this does nothing in the last analysis to alter the fact that ecumenical theology consists of a dialogue with regard to the truth or erroneousness of propositions which are expressed in the separate Christian confessions.

But however seriously ecumenical theology may be taking what is certainly its legitimate task in this sense, it is still insufficiently aware of the situation in which it is pursuing its activities in terms of religious sociology. What then was the position of the earlier controversial theology with regard to the situation in the sociology of religion in which it was pursued? It consisted of a discussion, more or less irenic or controversial, [46] between theologians and churchmen of the separated Churches who, so far as their theological convictions were concerned, justifiably felt themselves to be the legitimate spokesmen and representatives of their Churches. Now the reason why they were able to feel themselves to be the representatives and spokesmen of the Church community standing behind them in this way was on the one hand that this Church community, to the [18] On this situation cf. K. Rahner and N. Greinacher, 'Die Gegenwart der Kirche. Theologische Analyse der Gegenwart als Situation des Selbstovllzugs der Kirche', Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/l (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 178-276. Further, N. Greinacher, Die Kirche in der städtischen Gesellschaft (Mainz, 1956) esp. pp. 293-369; A. Jansen, Kirche in der Grossstadt (Freiburg, 1969).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

extent that it had any theological opinion at all, by and large neither could have, nor did have, sociologically speaking, any other opinion whatsoever than that of these representatives and spokesmen who were authorised as such even as a matter of civic and state appointment, and because, moreover, it was the prerogative of these spokesmen and representatives to an extent which was certainly not inconsiderable, to impart this distinctive confessional creed of theirs to this Church community, and so also de facto to inculcate a single homogeneous confessional awareness with a specific stamp of its own in the Church concerned. In this sense the Evangelical Churches too were themselves, right down to the end of the nineteenth century, clerically dominated Churches. And they were this despite their avowed belief in the universal priesthood, despite the sectarian and revivalist movements which arose again and again from within the rank and file, and despite notable differences of opinion between the Evangelical Churches and between their theological representatives themselves. In other words a distinct formal group, separated sociologically and institutionally from the rest, was in respect both of its claims and its effective influence, the channel for the particular Church community concerned in every detail of its life, and, moreover, was in a position really to be this. This group could speak with the other Churches us representative of the people belonging to its Church in discussions either in controversial theology or in the more irenical ecumenical theology. Today, however, this situation manifestly no longer exists, a point which we shall shortly have to develop in somewhat greater detail. Yet it is still tacitly and unreflectingly assumed to exist because in fact even today this ecumenical theology is de facto still engaged in almost exclusively by such churchmen and theologians although these have a quite different relationship towards the confessional creed which has been handed down to them. In fact they still act as the representatives of their Churches in ecumenical theology even in those cases in which they adopt an extremely critical attitude towards the creed of their Church, while still acknowledging it and taking it seriously and still remaining constantly under its influence, and so still constantly feeling themselves at variance with the creed of any other Church.

[47] But what is the real situation today in which ecumenical theology is engaged in by these theologians and churchmen? If we want to express it in terms of popular sociology, and without any claims to religious sociology in the specialist sense,[19] then we might perhaps state it somewhat as follows: For historical reasons a series of human groups is living, each under the umbrella of a specific religious organization, as a so-called Church community. Each of these organizations, religiously separated as it is from the rest, has a ‘unifying constitution’ recognized as more or less binding and called its creed. This ‘unifying constitution’ in its specifically distinct character, and its differences from other Christian and religious organizations, is, however, in practice known only to the functionaries and specialist theologians of the organization concerned, while the actual people belonging to that Church remain, to a very large extent, ignorant of it. But if and to the extent that the actual people of that Church recognize and assert that their religious organization is separated from the rest in this way, and feel that it is different from, and must reject the other religious organizations as alien to it, this is in very large measure due to historical, cultural, psychological and institutional factors which, precisely according to the agreed judgement of the functionaries and theologians, are not

[19] For an initial orientation in this field reference may be made to J. Matthes, Religion und Gesellschaft (Reinbek bei Hamburg, 1967); idem, Kirche und Gessellschaft (Reinbek bei Hamburg, 1969) (Bibliog).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

such as to justify a division of the Churches at all. An example of this is the external differences in forms of worship, in religious usages, differences of a cultural kind etc. What a Church community of this kind de facto derives from its particular Church is to a large extent common to all Christians: belief in God as providing the assurance and goal of the moral order, hope in the forgiveness of sins, acknowledgment of Jesus Christ as the mediator of salvation in which it is recognized (though perhaps only vaguely) that he has this function in some sense, prayer for, and hope in eternal life. If we may permit ourselves a general estimate in terms of religious sociology which is of course to some extent rough and ready, we may say that the different Church communities are not aware, or are hardly aware of the official and institutional reasons for the separation between the Churches, and that the real and de facto reasons at the level of the sociology of religions for the separation between the Churches are to a very large extent theologically and institutionally irrelevant. It is in fact only in this way that we can explain, for instance, the fact that in Holland, in very recent times, Eucharistic [48] intercommunion has been taking place in many areas between communities which are institutionally separated, and even between Catholics and Protestants. This is because the Christians involved, though officially separated from one another, experience themselves as not separated at all in the creed as they de facto realize it to themselves. Again this is the only possible explanation of the fact that the question is already seriously being canvassed in the communities of Catholic and Protestant student in Germany of whether these communities should not be amalgamated. This situation in terms of the sociology of religions does not, of course, imply that ecumenical theology as understood by churchmen and theologians has been false in its approach, or that the real question of truth with regard to the traditional points of theological controversy have simply disappeared. But nevertheless the question must be raised of what the situation as depicted above implies for ecumenical theology. We can perhaps divide this question into two: (1) What are the implications of this situation in religious sociology as it exists today and as presumably it will become still more acute in the future in its immediate bearing upon ecumenical theology? (2) What does this situation also imply for the question of truth as such?

With regard to the first question we are surely compelled to assert the following principle: In the future the difference between the institutional status of the individual Churches on the one hand (which in fact also defines the attitude they ought to have and the creed which their members ought to uphold) and the de facto attitude, the de facto content of faith on the part of their members on the other, will become very much wider. This is to be expected among the Protestant Churches or, on a Catholic view, has actually already come about. Because on this view it is actually possible openly to express theological opinions such that they retain nothing or almost nothing of the traditional credal position of the particular confession concerned, and to do this quite openly in the Church without any contradiction on the part of that Church's authorities. But a widening of the difference of which we have been speaking in this way is also to be foreseen as coming in the future concrete life of the Catholic Church too as a phenomenon of religious sociology, even though, measured by this Church's understanding of herself, and in view of the greater exercise of her teaching authority it raises great theological difficulties, and even though the authorities of this Church have probably more means at their disposal than the Protestant Churches of excluding heterodox opinions from the Church, or at least of preventing them from being disseminated among the Church's

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

members. In the Catholic Church [49] too there are today, and presumably will be still more in the future, not a few of those to whom the doctrine of the seven sacraments, the infallibility of the pope, the veneration of the saints and of Mary, the doctrine of indulgences etc., are matters which play no part in their real religious practice and, moreover, these are to be found not only among the adherents of the new heresy of indifferentism or among those who are merely baptized and pay the Church's dues and nothing more, but also among those who actually practise Christianity in its basic elements within the Church. There are those who doubt, deny, or simply ignore in practice all these things, without thereby feeling any cause for leaving the Catholic Church; and they remain within the Church (at least so long as these differences are not unequivocally proclaimed in public in the Church) without the official authorities of the Catholic Church excluding such people 'from the official body', even though they do have the practical powers necessary for this ready to hand.

Now if, by reason of the pluralism at the intellectual and political levels which exists today and will exist in the future, by reason of the constant mutual interpenetration of Church and world, this difference remains as a constant factor for the future and is, indeed, increased and made more acute – what then? Several possibilities are conceivable. First it must presumably be expected that a not inconsiderable number of these peripheral groups within the individual Churches will, after all, separate themselves officially and in terms of civic and religious organization from the Churches to which they have traditionally belonged. The manner in which such separations will be effected will of course vary from country to country according to the particular relationship which a given Church bears in a specific country to the civic society and the state. For our present purposes, however, the manner in which such separations will take place have no further interest for us. Such a separation from the Churches at the level of religious organization need not ipso facto imply that the separated totally remove themselves from the sphere of spiritual influence of their Churches and of the Churches in general, or that they will become committed enemies of the Churches and of Christianity. They can perhaps very well remain as 'sympathizers' with the Churches, and indeed may in some cases find it easier to maintain a positively favourable attitude to the Churches 'from a distance', and pass in and out of the Churches through the 'open doors'. A situation may arise similar to that which prevails in missionary countries today with highly developed cultures, as for instance in Japan or India. A relatively large group of individuals may perhaps be formed in this way which, without any fixed connection with [50] any specific Church, no longer maintains any very exclusive adherence to a specific Christian confession but takes its stand round the Christian Churches as a whole as a kind of 'Christian orientated' group; and in such a case this group may regard itself from its own standpoint more or less as a unity with differences which, so far as it is concerned are unimportant.

A further course is conceivable for events to take in the future. In the course of being transformed from national Churches to Churches of individual believers the Churches may more easily discover and apply resources of their own: the courage and also the to draw clearer dividing lines between those who really believe in them, acknowledge them, and fully adhere to them in the life of the Churches themselves on the one hand, and on the other those who only still continue to regard themselves as Christians and members of a specific Church in virtue of having belonged to them as a matter of social tradition. If the individual Churches were to find within themselves the courage and resolution to draw such distinctions (we have already spoken of the contribution which ecumenical theology could make towards stimulating so bold a course), then surely the difference which we have taken as our starting-point in this consideration would once more be diminished (though admittedly only on condition that one section of those traditionally belonging to an ecclesiastical community would be separated from the Churches concerned).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

What we are envisaging for the future, therefore, is a twofold process (active and passive) by which the Churches would be concentrated each upon themselves, a concentration which in fact already seems to be in process of being arrived at even now. For this seems to be the significance of what we see in the swiftly advancing process of secularization in society at the civic level in the so-called Christian countries. Now if this is true we must once more ask the question what thee outcome of this should be for ecumenical theology. If this took place would we once more arrive at a situation in which the distinctive confessional form of the individual Churches would once more be asserted in terms of religious sociology, and not merely in the official theory of the churchmen, with the result that the possibility of the unification of Christianity as realized in the Churches would once more be relegated to an indefinite and remote future, and still more than at present? I believe not. This twofold process of concentration of the Churches (in German it would be possible to express this somewhat ironically as a 'Gesundschrumpfen' or 'contraction for the sake of health') could, if it was carried through successfully and not made the occasion [51] on the part of the individual Church of each becoming ah encapsulated sect closed in upon itself, have a positive significance for ecumenical theology and, on the basis of this, for the unification of the Churches, and this for two reasons. First, as a result of their greater interior unification and the greater homogeneity they thereby achieved in the awareness of their respective faiths such Churches, each in its own right, would be able to commit themselves to a binding assent to the effective findings of an ecumenical theology to a greater extent than at present, because then they would be subjects conducting an ecumenical discussion on behalf of their own real selves, and not merely through individual theologians representing them. It is important to perceive the ecumenical significance of such a process in terms of religious sociology, and ultimately of theology too, of each of the individual Churches of today concentrating upon a clear – and decisive creed. And in order to do this we have in fact only to ask ourselves the simple question of from where, on this showing, the Churches, and above all the non-episcopal ones, derive their official authority, by and large, that authority in virtue of which they can commit themselves with real effectiveness to such an assent to any possible positive findings arising from ecumenical theology. Finally it is, after all, only Churches which in some sense know what beliefs are and should be held and acknowledged within their folds that can conduct on behalf of their members, and with a certain binding force, an ecumenical discussion leading to the unification of the Churches which will not be endlessly prolonged and never achieve such binding force.

What we are envisaging, then, is a concentration, at once theological and democratic, on the part of the individual Churches, a process of radicalization and a serious commitment to a binding creed, as well as the effectiveness in terms of religious sociology of such an attitude upon those members still remaining within the Churches.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now this process of concentration will not be focussed upon the traditional doctrines which divide the individual Churches because in the world as it actually exists today those who are de facto the members of these Churches, or who will be so in the future, have, after all, too little interest in these, and also because many such controversial doctrines from former times no longer constitute real points of conflict at all, or at least the interpretation of such controversial doctrines from former times within the individual Churches is no: compelling in such a sense that they must perforce constitute in some sense an official ground for separation between them. The process of radicalization, and the serious commitment to a binding creed as developed within these individual Churches will in the future be concentrated [52] upon far more central factors within the 'hierarchy of truths'.[20] Even if, for instance, an individual is a dedicated Catholic, one for whom the whole dogmatic teaching of his Church is felt in its totality to be binding upon his personal faith as an individual, and even when such an individual has the fullest possible interior understanding with regard to the claims which every dogma of this Church has to be truth, and with regard to the value and significance of truth in itself, without any undervaluing of the question of truth as such on existentialist, dogmatic, or utilitarian grounds, still such a one can commit himself unreservedly to the position that not every truth has in itself always, and in every age, in relation to others, the same significance and concrete effective force in the realities of human life. Let us take a small example, in itself unimportant, yet significant as illustrating the fact that even in the Catholic Church of today it can be recognized more clearly than formerly that an individual dogma can vary in the significance it has in particular sets of circumstances in human living. For this we may point to the fact that Pope Paul VI has reiterated what is more or less traditional Catholic teaching on indulgence, yet at the same time has added that every Catholic Christian enjoys the freedom of the children of God as to whether he avails himself of such indulgences or not.[21] In spite of particular examples which might be adduced, and which either seem to point in the opposite direction or really do so in fact, we can, without embarrassment, assert the following: The de facto situation as it exists today is such that it is not on the basis of the really classical points of controversy between the Churches that an individual Christian (apart from certain specialist theologians whose theological conscience is precisely differently constituted from that of the rest of men) either enters or leaves a specific Church. At a later stage we shall have to consider further the theological relevance of this fact. But to express it in different terms: With regard to the really effective forces which constitute membership of a Church as distinct from their theological claim to truth, which exists merely 'in itself and in the absolute, the basic truths of Christianity which will really be constitutive of Church membership in the future (within the mass of genuine 'sympathizers') will be first and foremost belief in the living God and in Jesus Christ as Lord and as absolute mediator of salvation, in other words basic truths upon which, in spite of the pluralism in the interpretations of them which will presumably [53] remain, there are no longer any serious differences between the Churches.

Whereas formerly these basic truths were simply presupposed on all sides as given and self-evident, in the future it is precisely these which will be the sole body of truth

[20] For an initial orientation in this field reference may be made to J. Matthes, Religion und Gesellschaft (Reinbek bei Hamburg, 1967); idem, Kirche und Gessellschaft (Reinbek bei Hamburg, 1969) (Bibliog).
[21] cf. Paul VI, 'Indulgentiarum', AAS 59 (1967), pp. 5-24; No. 11, p. 20.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

constituting in all the Churches the power to form a Church. The doctrines which have been matters of controversy hitherto are, in the process of history, being removed from the body of those principles which are socially effective forces in constituting the Church. But this precisely gives rise to a quite new situation for ecumenical theology and the ecumenical movement. For once the questions and ideas which have hitherto been matters of theological controversy have lost their force in this sense as at once constituting the Church and also separating the Churches (even though their claim to truth has not thereby been eliminated) then, surely, it will after all be easier to arrive at the possibility of setting aside these questions for theological, and above all for practical purposes, even though in theory they still continue to be matters of controversy. The very fact that the situation has been altered means that they are rendered less acute, because in the case of no one party to the discussion do they any longer have any real effective force as constituting the Church, although they do of course retain their significance in theory as constituting the Church and as dividing the Churches. We are dealing with a truth such that it no longer enters, or at least does not enter so directly, into our hearts, and is no longer capable of so entering, because the situation for this does not exist, or does not impinge so much, and in view of this it is possible to conduct our discussions quietly, 'sine ira et studio' and to achieve unity more easily. This is all the more true in view of the fact that in such a fresh situation too the precise interpretation and the practical concretization of a point of controversy of this kind (as for instance that of the primacy of the Pope) will differ to a not inconsiderable extent from the interpretation and concretization formerly attached to it.

There is a further point. The Churches, and above all the Roman Church, for all the necessary unity of creed and the courage to maintain this, are accustoming themselves to a greater pluralism in the theologies and modes of life which take place within them. Thus in the case of us Catholics, for instance, the element of Roman legalism and the scholastic element are no longer the sole form in which the dogmatic nature of this Church has to be presented in the concrete for those outside it, and which make it notably more difficult for him to arrive at the possibility of distinguishing between the nature of this Church as presented [54] dogmatically and the form in which he encounters her in the concrete. In this new situation too it will be easier both for the authorities of the Catholic Church and for Catholic theology itself effectively to 'realize' in spirit what the Decree on Ecumenism of the Second Vatican Council calls the 'hierarchy of the truths of faith', a hierarchy which is both an. objective and abiding entity, and at the same time conditioned by the epoch in which the Church is living at any given time. Once this distinction between the objective significance and the epochal significance even of effectively true and dogmatically binding statements within the Catholic Church is clearly realized, it will presumably be easier to make the meaning and force of Catholic dogmas which are still matters of controversy in interconfessional discussion more understandable and more accessible for non-Catholic Christians. When we think of the process, so largely achieved, of the 'enfranchisement' (sit venia verbo) on the Catholic side of the threefold 'sola' of the Reformation during the centuries which have elapsed since Trent, and especially today, we no longer need to regard such ideas and hopes for the future as utopian. With the altered situation of the Churches in terms of religious sociology it may perhaps be easier in the future to achieve agreement on some points of theory as the outcome of this new situation, and from these it may be that practical consequences too will develop. And this may be the case in the future even though theological progress in ecumenical theology towards a consensus has not produced any alteration in the 'immobility 'of the Churches as they exist in the concrete, and has not advanced beyond irenical words and friendly gestures. In brief: The situation of the Churches in the future in terms of religious sociology can, if it is rightly interpreted and exploited, in itself signify a positive opportunity for ecumenical theology.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

At this point, however, we must pass on to a second stage in which we consider the real theological relevance of this situation in terms of religious sociology gradually advancing upon us to the question of truth as such. This situation as it de facto exists induces in a large section of the membership of the Churches a sort of confessional relativism. A great number of the members of the Churches are ignorant of the classical points of controversy separating the Churches, or regard them, insofar as they do recognize them at all, as so much wrangling between the theologians, and as such quite uninteresting. In itself this is not very surprising. For it is not astonishing to find that the average Christian does not succeed in so reflecting upon and articulating that faith of his of which we have spoken earlier present at the depths of his existence but ex supposito still quite unreflected upon, that anything arises from this so far as he is concerned [55] with regard to these classic points of controversy. Thus it is almost impossible for him to take any other course than to regard these as un-important and so to become confessionally speaking a relativist, one who feels able to choose any particular confession he likes, or to change from one to another at will as though they were so many businesses of different proprietors, where one could purchase the same goods or refuse any longer to accept goods which had fallen out of fashion.

Now certainly the theologian or (may I say?) at least the Catholic theologian cannot identify himself with any such a priori confessional relativism, even though he may concede that much in his Church does de facto lend support to such a relativism in historical terms, even so far as the perspectives and formulations of that dogma are concerned which he recognizes as inseparable from the Church and as binding upon himself. Surely there is no need to treat of this point at any greater length here. At least so far as the Catholic theologian is concerned he is once and for all bound beyond all shadow of doubt to reject any such confessional relativism when lie acknowledges that according to the faith to which he is committed the Church of Christ 'subsists' in the Roman Catholic Church, and this Church considers herself as constituted, among other factors, by the totality other dogmatic teaching taken as beyond dispute.[22]

But when we reject any such confessional relativism as an illegitimate consequence arising from the situation in religious sociology described above, has this no significance whatever for the question of the actual truth of those propositions which are matters of theological controversy, and which divide the Churches, and therefore no significance either for ecumenical theology as such apart from that indirect one which we have already attempted to formulate? This is the question which we must now consider in still greater detail. Obviously this more detailed consideration leads us into an almost incalculable series of problems, such as we cannot survey here. Thus surely the problem of the relationship between truth and institution would have to be discussed, for in fact we with our western individualism are presumably being over-hasty if we take it for granted that me bearer of knowledge and therefore truth is in fact the particular individual [22] Cf. the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, 'Lumen Gentium', No. 8.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in each case. Obviously any knowledge can exist only in the real physical individual. But this still leaves the problem open as to whether particular truths are not so orientated to human societies, and in fact even expressed in an institutional form, that they can only be expressed in them, and in the individual to the extent that he belongs to this [56] community and, moreover, in an institutional manner. Let us presuppose for the moment – more is not possible here – that we can give a positive answer to this question. In that case the further problem emerges of how the individual in his individual awareness shares in knowledge, the true bearer of which is the community to which he belongs. Manifestly this sharing does not necessarily have to consist in the fact that the individual awareness completely and adequately reproduces the collective awareness of this community. Surely on the principle we are invoking here it is perfectly legitimate to distinguish between individual and collective awareness in general, and therefore a distinction of the same kind is also conceivable in our particular case.[23] This distinction could certainly not legitimately or de jure consist in the fact that the individual awareness of faith simply contradicted the collective awareness of faith of the Church. Yet the former does not necessarily have to be the total and adequate repetition of the latter. It could legitimately be narrower in extent, it could be compatible with some subjective choice, it could justifiably be in part only fides implicita, and not merely de facto remain distinguished in this sense from the total faith of the Church, but actually recognize such a distinction, be aware of it and accept it freely as such, provided only that it remained open in principle to the greater and collective awareness of faith of the Church.

In this connection we should then also have to consider, at least as a question, whether in that case every disparity which exists between the individual and the collective awarenesses of faith really is of the same kind, and therefore illegitimate at least in principle. The scholasticism of former times already drew a distinction between a ‘judicium’ properly so called, i.e. a proposition taken over and adhered to by an act of radical assent and decision on the one hand, and an ‘opinio’, i.e. a mere opinion on the other, this latter being conceived of in an experimental sense, with an awareness of its provisional character and vulnerability, and with a certain readiness to abandon it should the need arise. Now if we were to apply a distinction of this kind in the present context, the legitimate difference which we have described above between the individual and collective awarenesses of faith might perhaps be rendered still more precise. Perhaps we would only be transgressing the limits of a justifiable distinction and reaching the stage of an individual state of error and heresy if at that point at which some personal conviction which we held in our individual awareness of faith, and which ran counter to the collective [57] awareness of faith, was put forward as "judicium” and not merely as "opinio".

On the basis of these and similar considerations, which we have only been able to indicate here, the situation in terms of the sociology of religion which we have depicted at an earlier stage could be subjected to a theological interpretation in terms of which it would no longer appear as a mere state of affairs, but could be justified in positive terms at least in part. On this basis it would perhaps be possible to imagine, at least in many instances, that an ecumenical dialogue and an ecumenical theology might in all patience admit of many differences of doctrine between the various parties. In such a case a [23] cf. ‘Heresies in the Church Today?’ Theological Investigations, XII.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

dialogue and theology of the kind we are thinking of would not have to be excluded totally by theoretical theology to a point where it was no longer possible to arrive at even a form of words expressing agreement. Nor, on the other hand, would the differences of doctrine involved have to be regarded as still making it necessary for the Churches to remain separate. After all in pastoral practice at the individual level these presuppositions are acted upon, albeit quite unreflectingly. In other words the pastor concerned, when faced with 'difficulties of faith' on the part of an individual, rightly refrains from trying to overcome these in any direct or total manner, and merely says to him: 'For the time being just quietly leave the question open and do not close yourself rigidly to the Church's explicitations of faith. Rather live without straining in the hope that your individual experience of faith and that of the Church will be able to grow towards one another. In this sense you can in all honesty retain your own subjective position and still be a member of the Church.' One cannot, it is true, transfer an approach of this kind at the individual level, designed indirectly to meet the difficulties of faith which may be felt by an individual in relation to his Church, to the relationship between the Churches themselves. But conversely it still does not seem certain that many differences of doctrine between the Churches in ecumenical theology might not be overcome in an analogous manner at least for the time being.

The situation in religious sociology which we have taken as our starting-point surely entails, in its bearing upon the question of truth, not merely the problem of the relationship between truth and membership of an institutional community, but also the problem of the relationship between the objective status and the concrete existential application of theological propositions which are true, but at the same time always importing salvation. Propositions of faith are always and in all cases propositions of salvation too. It is perfectly true that we can never neglect [58] the 'objective' truth in our quest for salvation because man precisely as spiritual asks himself, and must ask himself, in a 'selfless' manner what the nature of reality is 'in itself. But while recognizing this to the full, it still remains equally true that the truth which is pointed to in theological propositions cannot really be apprehended unless it is understood as salvation. There is, therefore, both a difference and a radical interpenetration of two elements here, the element of 'objective' truth and subjective salvific significance in theological propositions. But while recognizing this we must also say that these propositions have a subjective significance which has nothing to do with any subjectivism. All theological propositions remain in their truth (as recognized) orientated towards concrete individuals who as individuals and as belonging to particular epochs and particular human groups are situated in history.

The situation in religious sociology of which we have been speaking should be thought out anew in theological terms from this basic stand-point. The question should be formulated in the concrete and faced up to as to what significance is to be found for ecumenical theology and the dialogue that goes with this (and that too precisely with regard to the question of truth) in the fact that theological propositions, both as compared with one another and also in the developing process of history, do not always have the same bearing, whether remote or proximate, to the subject in his subjectivity and so to his salvation. This question has, after all, in a genuine sense been envisaged in the Decree on Ecumenism of the Second Vatican Council when an explicit exhortation is included in that document to pay heed in ecumenical dialogue to the 'hierarchy' of truths, and to their

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

different bearings upon the fundamentals of faith. After all such an exhortation only has any real meaning if, in striving for the unification of the separated Churches on questions of faith, the purely formal equality of status in the definitions of dogma by the Catholic Church, for instance, and the formal equality of authority of the Catholic Church which is prior to all these dogmas is not taken to mean that any possibility of distinguishing between them is ruled out from the outset in the manner in which agreement upon them is arrived at. Now if this is the case then even on a Catholic interpretation of faith and of the Church the question should perhaps be asked whether from the Catholic point of view particular Churches, hitherto separated, should not be allowed to retain their existing forms while achieving union, since, despite the fact that they do not accept all propositions defined by Rome, provided only that they do not positively deny these as irreconcilable with the substantial nucleus of Christian teaching held [59] in common by all. I believe (to give a still more precise example) that even a Roman theologian can concede the following position: a member of his Church certainly cannot decisively contradict a papal definition without thereby ceasing to be a Catholic. But still this does not mean that he is bound to give any positive agreement to the material content of the definition involved. Rather this content can be left to his fides 'implicita'. Now if this is correct, what are the consequences of it for an ecumenical discussion? Surely that is a question which has not yet received sufficient detailed consideration in Catholic ecumenical theology. Yet even abstracting from the subject of ecumenical dialogue it is a question with which the Catholic really finds himself confronted the moment he considers the situation in terms of religious sociology for his own Church as it is in itself. For after all in this Church there already is a very notable difference, which is at least in part legitimate, between that which belongs to the collective awareness of faith of this Church as such and is explicitly stated to do so in the definitions other teaching authority, and that which de facto is explicitly believed by the individuals belonging to this Church. If we were not content merely to accept this situation as already de facto existing, and if instead of this we really thought out its theological relevance, surely this would have the effect of opening up many insights and possibilities for an ecumenical theology which, at least so far as we Catholics are concerned, have hardly been considered at all as yet, yet which could open up more fruitful prospects for ecumenical theology.

VII

Perhaps I may be so bold as to put forward the following proposition: Ecumenical theology is for the most part the theology of the future, which has to be worked out by all the Churches, each from its own starting-point as previously determined by its past history.

When I speak of 'the theology of the future' what I mean by this in the present context is not a theology of the futurology of mankind, the element of the 'apocalyptic' which is hoped for in the Christian faith and the question of how this should be realized, or the element of political involvement etc. What I mean by the theology of the future is something far more simple: that theology which is necessary as a prior condition for any proclamation of the gospel in order that the gospel may appear credible in a future

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

conditioned by science, technology, cybernetics, the [60] social unification of mankind on a global scale, a future which has already begun.

When one has participated for many years in ecumenical discussions between specialist theologians belonging to the various separated Churches it is not very easy to achieve a mood of hopefulness with regard to the outcome of such ecumenical theology. Whereas ecumenical discussion between everyday Christians all too easily goes astray and leads to a confessional relativism, and the doctrines which divide the confessions are all too cheaply and too hastily by-passed, ecumenical discussions between specialist theologians on the other hand are for the most part still concerned with the traditional and classic doctrines which divide the Churches as these have come down to us from the past. The result is that these discussions do not advance any further in the problems involved even when the theological premises conditioning the formulation of these divisive doctrines today are those supplied by modern exegesis, the historical sciences, and the differences in modes of expression at the philosophical and conceptual level of today, differences which have become almost too complex for the human mind to cope with them. Certainly in the last few decades we have, to a greater extent than formerly, been able to speak with one another. The theologians of the separated Churches have achieved a new interest in one another's views. A greater exchange of subjects, viewpoints, methods etc. has been achieved and still is being achieved. But if we ask what results have been achieved from this ecumenical dialogue with regard to the unification of the Churches we are forced to reply with sober realism: these results are very slight. The reason for this is certainly not that we have not come much closer to agreement with regard to the traditionally controversial doctrines. The main reason for the paucity of results is perhaps to be sought in the following fact: on the one hand the scholastic theology of the Roma: Church is still as a whole very far from having arrived at a position in which it can make the dogmas of this Church sufficiently clearly comprehensible to the average Protestant Christian. On the other hand, within the Protestant Churches such differences exist with regard to the most fundamental interpretation of Christianity, differences which the leaders of those Churches cannot overcome or which, perhaps they are simply willing to accept (because it may perhaps be that to attempt to overcome them would itself be regarded as running counter to the principle [61] Protestant freedom of faith) that for this very reason any collective union between these Churches as they now exist and the Roman Church is impossible. For from the standpoint of her own faith the Roman Church is forced to reject many of these interpretations of Christianity as heretical, even though they are tolerated in the Protestant Churches and in fact, to a certain extent, recognized as legitimate.

In this situation, setting aside that hope against all hope which is enjoined upon the Christian, there is only one real chance. Only if the theologians of the separated Churches devote themselves intensively to the of shaping the theology of the future, does any hope or prospect exist of these theologies arriving in the future at one and the same meeting-point. This is not to say that the direct and immediate discussion of questions of controversial theology should be broken off. This is necessary, and in fact does achieve certain partial results in the 'public opinion' of the theologians, even though it has achieved as good as nothing to alter the immobility of the Church leaders beyond producing irenical words and friendly gestures. But in the last analysis it seems tome that the greatest chance for ecumenical theology will consist in working for the Christian theology of the future, when the adherent of all theologies and Churches, each in his own way, have learned to bear witness in a credible and comprehensible manner to the gospel of Jesus Christ as addressed to the man of that future age which has already commenced, no longer demanding of him as a condition for being a believer that he shall grapple with unnecessary difficulties in addition to that attitude of metanoia involving the whole man which he must embrace; and when furthermore the adherents of these theologies of the future avoid betraying the true gospel by accommodating it to the fashions of the moment then, as I hope, these theologies of the future as upheld in the separated Churches will increasingly approximate to one another and draw closer to one another than the traditional theologies which are immediately conditioned controversial questions of the past. Thus I like to feel that the most important work for ecumenical theology consists not in the least in a theology which is to be developed as an explicit dialogue side by side with the rest of the theologies of the separated Churches, but rather one which is pursued in them as a whole, and in all the disciplines pertaining to them. For in the last analysis and taken as a whole this theology has, after all, no other task than to think out to the flail the question of how the gospel can be preached in away that arouses and demands the response of faith – and that too not merely for a traditionally minded remnant of mankind who, on historical ground; have still remained believers, [62] but for those men who have to become Christians in the future and from their own special situation in the future. From this point of view ecumenical theology absolutely coincides with theology as such. If therefore ecumenical theology is understood in this sense as the theology of the future, and if it actually becomes the theology of the future because wherever it is practised it has this one and the same task, and because it is pursued in the closest possible collaboration between the theologians of all the confessions, then it will of itself become ecumenical theology.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In conclusion a few further considerations may be put forward with regard to the limits which must be recognized in determining the meaning and the possibility of ecumenical theology. In this we shall take as our starting-point the recognition of the fact that that which constitutes concrete history and that which constitutes a concrete decision both at the individual level and also at the level of social groups can never be brought about solely by rational speculation as such, and that the nature of history as concrete and the attitudes freely adopted within it cannot be comprehended in any adequate sense either by any process of subsequent reflection. Certainly it is true that an element of reflection and speculation always belongs to concrete history as this is imposed upon us by the past. The explicitation of objectively lively real motives and the assigning of theoretical reasons constitute in themselves an intrinsic element in this history. But the history itself is always something more than that which is brought to light in its scientific awareness of itself. This is not merely because the whole of reality at the material and biological level belongs, in all its dimensions to history also, or because in this there is something more than man is conscious of in it, so that the computer which sought to record and store the whole of this reality as so much data of human knowledge would have to be richer in content than the structure of the material world in itself. It is also because that element of self-command which is intrinsic to the act of personal freedom (setting aside the intrinsic prior orientation of this) is, of its very nature and as such, incapable of objectifying in any adequate sense its own intrinsic significance. Human knowledge, therefore, considered as the science of nature and of the human spirit, is in principle always that which is incomplete, that which can never adequately objectify the intrinsic self-possession of reality. For this reason historical decisions are never merely the outcome of scientific speculation; which in fact is not only incapable of stating unambiguously and in an ultimately concrete formula what will be, or should be the case, but is even incapable of stating what unequivocally and really is the case. This applies to the context with which we are concerned also. [63] The Church, the separated Churches, and the unity which ought to exist' between them can never adequately be comprehended in the science of theology by a process of human speculation. This science is not the mistress of history. She cannot even legitimately claim any such dominion within the history of the Churches themselves. On the contrary in this history of the Church and of the Churches she is simply one element among many, one which remains dependent upon the whole of this history which can never adequately be analysed by her, for only he who stands outside history altogether can be said not to be subject to it. Now certainly the science of theology and ecumenical theology in particular cannot be said to stand outside history in this way. However important and necessary this may be in the life of the Church, it can never produce any such theoretical project of an ideal unity and unification of the Churches of this kind such that the real unity and unification would be nothing more than the mere transposition of these theories into reality. It is here that we come to the ultimate limits of ecumenical theology. It always derives from those concrete historical conditions belonging to the individual Churches which can never adequately be analysed or reflected upon, and it remains confined within these limits as imposed by its own origins, so much wider in scope than it is itself. It still remains restricted in this way even in those cases in which, and even at that stage at which, a theologian might bring about in his theology some kind of revolutionary break: with his own past and contradiction of it. This theology takes as the starting-point for its speculations an existing situation in the intellectual life of the Churches and their theologies as these extent here and now, a situation which always contains something more than that which can be reflexively apprehended and reflexively criticized by it. This theology puts forward ideas for the future with regard to the relationships of the Churches to one another which, so long and to the extent that it is only the exponents of theoretical theology who pursue them and make themselves responsible for them, can never remove that difference which prevails between the real and the conceivable, nor yet the difference between the conceivable and the reality that lies in the future. Ecumenical theology as a science, therefore, is ultimately addressed, incapable as it is of ever achieving a total analysis of its own subject, to the element of the incalculable in history, which is also the sphere in which the Spirit of God moves and exercises his freedom, a freedom which cannot be subjected to man's control. Ecumenical theology at the theoretical level, therefore, while never pronouncing its own nature to be meaningless or superfluous, is constantly reaching out anew beyond itself [64] into that wider sphere which is constituted by the concrete history of the Church. To the extent that the Church has humanity as its subject at all, it will in fact never properly speaking be represented by the theologians, the 'doctores', but rather by the prophets and bishops in the Church. And although the unity between these is likewise something that can never be calculated, still they do together constitute first and last the upholders of the history and the decisions of the Church. This is, of course, not to deny that in the concrete instance a 'doctor' of theology in a certain sense in a personal union of roles, can also be a prophet or bishop in the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

What we have stated in abstract terms with regard to the limits of ecumenical theology will also constantly be confirmed by the experience of our work in ecumenism. In fact it is a strange phenomenon: all speak of unity, declare their will to achieve unity between the Churches and their conviction that it is a duty to work for this unity. Nor have we any right, at least in principle, to doubt the honesty of this attitude and this will to work for the unification of the Churches. And yet in historical fact nothing, or almost nothing, actually takes place. For the umbrella organization of the World Council of Churches is not itself a Church and is not intended to be such, and all friendly contacts and discussions between the World Council of Churches and the Roman Catholic Church have still not yet achieved any effective unification. This in itself would in fact be understandable, but more than this they have not even discernibly drawn any closer to one another. In spite of all the ecumenical good will, the real frontiers are still very rigidly and immovably maintained. And yet given such good will and the ecumenical courage to call our own convictions in question, it might properly have been expected that however the Churches themselves might maintain themselves in their traditional positions, still at least among those engaged in ecumenical work in theology, and not merely among other Christians, some real and not inconsiderable degree of interchange would necessarily take place to and fro across the confessional boundaries. Yet in fact the cases of such 'individual conversions' between the individual Churches among the practitioners of ecumenical theology are so rare as to be almost non-existent. And surely this phenomenon cannot wholly be explained by the fact that it cannot be the task of ecumenical theology as such to achieve individual conversions from one confession to another, or that many of these theologians hold from the outset that the time for individual conversions of this kind between the Churches is past because of the real and serious hope of a collective unification of the Churches, or because [65] each theologian can and must work best for this collective unification by remaining within the Church in which he has grown up. For firstly this opinion too could and should in fact also be subjected to the judgement of an ecumenical theology as practised by the individual confessions, and examined as to its validity. And furthermore it would have to be considered that any ecumenical theology is itself confronted with two alternatives: either it takes tacitly and ultimately as its starting-point the position that objectively speaking all the individual Confessions are equally justified as they stand before the judgement-seat of the gospel (in which case it itself stands revealed as unnecessary or at least it reduces its aims once more to something that is entirely secondary) or else – the second alternative – it still remains a recognized truth that in the very last analysis the real unity of the Churches, which is after all the goal of this theology, cannot be brought about except through individual conversions take place. And in this, so far as the purely abstract nature of ecumenical theology is concerned, it makes no difference in which direction they do take place, and these individual conversions must be such as to bring what is validly and abidingly Christian in one confession into the other.

Now if we abstract from the higher providence of God at work in the history of his Church we must surely recognize that ultimately speaking we cannot explain the fact that such conversions do not take place merely by the fact of the weight of the past and the de facto present situation of the individual Churches, factors which have not been, and cannot be consciously analyzed or reflected upon. We cannot simply point to the fact that the individual ecumenical theologians have in fact been born in these Churches and have experienced the living power and grace of Christianity within them. At this point the limits of ecumenical theology at the theoretical level become palpably clear. This witness may appear alarming. But without either underestimating or denying the alarming element in this, it can still once more serve to console us too. For if the 'doctrinal structures' set up in the individual confessions were nothing more than so many elaborations of theological reasoning at the purely speculative level, they would certainly be just as unstable, just as much in [66] a constant state of flux in the mode in which they have been realized in history, just as subject to change under one another's influence, as the systems of the philosophers. The fact that this is not the case is only intelligible, and can only be explained on the basis that despite the contradictions between them they all live in some degree from that original and true faith brought about by the Spirit of grace in the heart and centre of their lives, and at the same time also that all of them contribute to this original state of being in the truth as that in which God communicates himself in his justifying grace in all the confessions. This positively salvific function of the original faith common to Christians and already present from God and for God can also be recognized as present in the various confessions even by one who rejects any kind of confessional relativism and is convinced of the fact that the real, legitimate, historical and social objectification of the Church of Christ is present (in a manner not to be defined any more precisely here and now) in his Church in contrast to other confessions and Christian Churches. It is true that the Roman Catholic Church is the one who, as a result of her own understanding of herself, finds it most difficult to ascribe any such positive significance in terms of salvation and faith to the other Christian confessions. Nevertheless she has struggled through to a position where she can clearly achieve such a recognition in the Second Vatican Council. And if this is the case, then surely the other Christian Confessions must find it still more easy, again without any danger of falling into a confessional relativism, to arrive at such a judgement and such a recognition, which is an important presupposition for ecumenical discussion as such. Even when, for the sake of conscience and for the sake of the Gospel, they do not acknowledge the 'popish Church' as such, and cannot recognize it, from this point of view, as a legitimate objectification of the nature of Christianity and of the Church of Christ, still today they will no longer find it necessary to view the Roman Church as the synagogue of the Antichrist in which man cannot find his salvation, and from which he cannot receive that which is most true and most ultimate, namely the absolute fundamentals of the Christian faith of which we have been speaking, as present in the heart and centre of his human life.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Thus our consideration of ecumenical theology returns for its answer to the question of what truly and ultimately constitutes its prior theological assumption. This is that faith which transcends all theological speculation, all objectification at the theoretical and social level, in virtue of which justifying grace is already present in all Christians of good will. On this basis ecumenical theology can and must say: We must arrive at the unity [67] of faith in the dimension of conscious thought and social living too, because we already possess this unity at the level of the justifying grace of God. The unity of faith already present at this level, points both to the possibility and also to the necessity of ecumenical theology. For obviously we cannot say: Because we already possess the unity of faith, being basically constituted in grace as Christians, we no longer need the unity of faith at the level of theological objectification and social living. Rather we must say: Because we have the former unity we must also strive for this latter one, which is the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

incarnational consummation of that more fundamental unity. On this basis the Catholic will think of the Lutheran as already being, at the heart and centre of his life, an anonymous Catholic, while the Lutheran will regard the Catholic as being at the heart and centre of his life an anonymous Lutheran. Which of us two is right is a point on which we are not at one, and this is the point which ecumenical theology has to consider in any genuine dialogue between Christians. But the fact that we can think of ourselves in this way, that what we are seeking is not to attain to unity from a position of absolute and total division, but rather to achieve it from a unity already existing in grace and in the truth of God as already apprehended by us, means that we can and must strive for that unity of truth in the one Church which constitutes the value and the hope of ecumenical theology.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[68]

3

REFLECTIONS ON METHODOLOGY IN THEOLOGY

I

The task I have been given of providing some exposition of my theological methods at first threw me into considerable confusion.[1] My initial reaction to this request was to ask, 'Have I, in fact, any theological method which is in some sense peculiar to my theology, or is my theological method simply that which any Catholic theologian conditioned by tradition applies, and that too without any further or more far-reaching reflection upon it? Certainly it might be said that I too have put forward some views in writing with regard to theological method and with regard to theological hermeneutics. But in comparison with the multiplicity of theological topics which I have considered and written about over the last thirty years, any reflections I have put forward with regard to theological method in general, and still more with regard to my own personal methods, represent only a very small and modest part of this work. Perhaps I can add to this the further point that in the first years of my appointment as professor of dogmatics I did explicitly concern myself to some extent with the history of dogma, i.e. my written works were chiefly concerned with penitential theology as found in the Fathers, and besides this I did write an outline (unprinted as yet) of the history of the theology of penance. But it is now about fifteen years since I was [69] either able or willing to concern myself any further in a strictly scientific manner with the history of dogma and theology (unless we include in this a sketch, likewise still unprinted, of the history of the dogma and theology of the doctrine of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin into heaven – in other words of the dogma defined by Pius XII in 1950). My constant and overriding preoccupation, especially in the last twenty years, has been with systematic theology. Yet this has been characterized by the fact that I have had to treat almost exclusively of individual schemes in an unsystematic manner and as dictated by the needs of the moment. Actually this state of affairs is reflected in the ten volumes of my Theological Investigations, in which my particular studies have been collected. The only book which I have published with a systematic overall plan is that entitled Hörer des Wortes, and consists of a small outline of a philosophy of religion written more than thirty years ago. The same lack of systematic planning in my theological work is likewise reflected in my work of editing the theological lexicons, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche and Sacramentum Mundi, and likewise in the work of editing the Quaestiones Disputatae. Such individual questions as I have treated of in the volumes in this series of which I personally have been the author do not alter in any essential respect the picture of my theological work as outlined above. I have also striven to achieve a development and deepening of Pastoral Theology and of Practical Theology within Catholic theology in general. But these surely must be left out of the present consideration from the outset. All this may perhaps serve to explain the fact that it has not been possible to allow questions of methodology to play any major part in my theological interests, at least in [1] This study was originally prepared for a theological symposium which was held in Montreal in the summer of 1969. On what follows cf. also in general the following articles of the author's: 'The Concept of Mystery in Catholic Theology', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 5966), pp. 36-73; 'Theological Principles Governing the Hermeneutics of Eschatological Statements', ibid., pp. 323-346; 'Theology and Anthropology' ibid. IX (London and New York), pp. 3-101 (with bibliog.); 'Dogmatik', LTK III (2nd ed. 1959), 446-454; 'Formale und fundamentale Theologie', ibid. IV (2nd ed. 1960), 205-206; 'Dogmatics', Sacramentum Mundi (London and New York); 'Theology', ibid.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

any attempt to define those interests as a whole, or measuring them by what has been achieved and worked out on the Protestant side in theological hermeneutics. On this basis it appears reasonable and justifiable to adopt an approach in these three lectures in which I do not so much reflect upon my own theological methods, which I have either put into practice or already reflected upon elsewhere, but simply to attempt to put forward a few observations with regard to theological method such as seem to me to be demanded by the direction which Catholic theology is taking today quite independently of the question of how far I myself have sufficiently mastered this method or consciously reflected upon it up to now. In view of the brevity of these three small lectures it is necessary and justifiable that these reflections on theological methods as practised today should not attach any particular value to a strictly systematic approach, but should seize upon one point or another from a far wider range of subject-matter which might have [70] been investigated and to allow myself a certain arbitrariness in doing this.

The first particular area of the general subject-matter to which some thought must be devoted here might be entitled The Situation Which Provides Current Theology with its Starting-Point. In this first lecture we shall properly speaking have only two points to make about this:

1. In contrast to earlier ages this situation has, for the individual theologian, a special and peculiar element which renders it less capable of analysis and calculation. This point will be clarified to some extent in what follows.

2. This situation is, however improbable it may at first appear, precisely determined by the ecclesiastical context in which the theology of today must, more than ever before, be practised.

The situation in which a systematic theologian has to pursue his theological investigations today is in certain respects markedly different from earlier ages which, so far as Catholic theology is concerned, extends perhaps as far back as the first decades of the twentieth century. This new situation, then, is characterized by the fact that it has become in the highest degree incapable of analysis and, so far as the individual is concerned, incapable of being grasped and apprehended as a whole, Such was the situation in earlier times. I can still remember those who taught me theology then, and so can still perceive how they felt about themselves and their theology, and how they understood their situation. In this connection it is no idle question to ask whether their personal understanding of their role as theologians was ‘objectively speaking’ altogether justified, or whether, on the other hand, it failed wholly to correspond to the real factors with which they were confronted and which they did altogether succeed in realizing. These theologians of the generation before our own went about their work in a theological territory which was already defined for them, one with which they were familiar. They spoke a common language. They had almost a fixed repertoire of ‘quaestiones disputatae’, and if they disagreed about these they did so in a manner such that each of them knew why and in what respect they did disagree, and that in these respects they actually could disagree without the teaching authority of the Church being invoked against them. At the same time they were likewise aware of those areas in which they were and had to be in agreement, namely on a number of particular theses traditionally defined, and which could be expressed in precise theological terms. They developed their scholastic theology along lines which were already determined by tradition It was a sort of ‘Denzinger theology’, and they were [71] convinced that they had at their disposal in the practice of this a sufficiency of clear, exegetically unassailable ‘dicta probantia’, and at the same time a sufficiency of assured knowledge from the history of dogma and theology to confirm their own propositions as the outcome of a permanently valid tradition. Certainly they were more or less adequately aware of modern and scholastic philosophy since the time of Descartes down to the present day, and also of Protestant theology from the Reformation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

down to the present, although for the most part their knowledge of this was over-simplified and they availed themselves of it only to the extent that it helped them to justify their own personal standpoint in terms of scholastic theology and apologetics. But nevertheless both these areas of thought were, after all, simply that which was alien, that which had to be contested. In no sense did they constitute that which, in the very doubts and questionings which it raised, in its questionability (in the original sense of the term), was something which was itself present and intrinsic to their own proper 'system' itself as the seeds of a greater future that involved both threats and promises. One could put it in this way: as little as thirty years ago the state of Catholic theology was that of a system closed in upon itself in such a way that any further developments that took place within it took place according to laws which were both already given within it and also already known to the upholders of the system, namely the theologians. In the light of this we can also understand that it was taken for granted that any further developments in dogma and theology would constitute so many further logical explicitations and articulations of propositions already given. So much was this the case that it was only really possible to conceive of these further explicitations as taking place on the periphery of the system of ideas, as for instance in the sphere of Mariology. It was hardly possible to imagine that the substantial nucleus of the faith itself (which was, of course thought of as the object of devout mediation) could once more be thrown afresh into the area of theological questioning. Certainly there was an awareness that this central nucleus was also contested, but it was so contested precisely by enemies from without. And against them the only duty the Catholic theologians had was to defend this central nucleus of the faith.

Today all this is quite different. And if we are to speak of any theological method which is to conform to the current situation, then it is worthwhile to reflect upon this new situation. The matter might be expressed somewhat as follows: Unless we undertake some systematic arrangement of the material involved in this situation by enumerating the elements which characterize it, then there can no longer be any common philosophical [72] or theological language which can serve as a straightforward basis for theological work and a theological dialogue. Obviously so far as Catholic theology is concerned there are certain definitions by the teaching authority of the Church which are binding, and to which every theology must continue to adhere. But today precisely these doctrinal formulations of the official Church seem to a large extent to be no longer simply the sort of statements which are already formulated in a truly theological language. Rather they give the impression of being statements which, for all their binding force, need to be interpreted, translated, transposed into a different theological language, in order to be assimilable at all in any effective sense in their application to the world of ideas characteristic of the present day. In any case the theological language used within the framework of Catholic theology is no longer one and the same. Considered as a philosophical instrument of theological thought, and as one and the same entity understood by all in the same sense and ready to hand to each, to be used in the same sense, neo-scholasticism has ceased to exist. It has undergone so many transformations and new interpretations under the influence of the most varied systems of modern philosophy that it itself has come to be dissolved and lost in the whole complexity of philosophies which have grown up, for these no longer constitute a unity in virtue of the very fact that they are all still aware of the heritage which has come down to them from the scholastic philosophy of the Middle Ages. Now this situation of philosophical pluralism is not, as philosophical, transformed into a unity in virtue of the fact that the practitioners of these various philosophies all adhere to a single common credo in a single Church. For the articles of the creeds as such are not, in any true sense, philosophical. And the ultimate question still constantly remains open as to whether they themselves are interpreted in the individual philosophies in such a way that the unity of faith they express can still assure a sufficient unity of philosophical thought. This is not, of course, to maintain that these different philosophies (considered as instruments of different theologies) cannot stand in any relationship to one another in terms of dialogue, or that simply of their very natures they must, once they are clearly apprehended, contradict one another. But to say this is not remove that pluralism of philosophies which exists today even within the Church herself, and it remains in practice too much for the individual to gain a comprehensive view of all this, because the prior factors in terms of the history of philosophy and of human thought, culture, and much else besides entailed in this pluralism are so great and complex that they can no longer be mastered by any one individual. Only those remaining at an intellectually primitive stage, or [73] the victims of their own fancy, can deceive themselves with regard to this situation, which in itself alone and of its very nature produces the conditions of an uncontrollable pluralism of theologies. This philosophical and theological pluralism, this situation of gnoseological concupiscence, constitutes a situation in which the individual theologian has to perform his task. This situation is rendered still more acute in the pluralism it entails, and which cannot be controlled or mastered, by numerous further elements. Here it is only possible briefly to draw attention to a few of these.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

When we consider the position of the systematic theologian we recognize on the one hand that even as such he cannot avoid being a biblical theologian. He cannot simply leave the work of biblical theology to the exegete alone. On the other hand, however, present-day exegesis and biblical theology, in the problems they have raised, in the complexity of their methods and their presuppositions, have become so complex and difficult that the present-day practitioner of systematic theology finds himself in a totally different situation from that in which his predecessors were placed a few decades ago. Where today can he still find those ‘dicta probantia’ from scripture which he could avail himself of in earlier times to prove his own theses? Today it has become evident as a result of historical and critical exegesis that it is no longer so clear what the genuinely binding message of scripture to us really is, as distinct from the conceptual models and modes of expression belonging to it which are conditioned by history, and what does not constitute this binding message. And precisely because of this the situation in which the systematic theologian stands in relation to exegesis is quite different from that of a few decades ago, when for instance, he could, with a few simple and briefly stated arguments, establish a firm bridge extending from Mt. 16 to the dogma of the First Vatican Council.

Even the material and the methods of work in the field of the history of dogma have come to involve so many fine distinctions and have become so complex that the assertion of what is dogmatically binding, and the process of distinguishing this from mere theologumena as conditioned by the history of particular epochs in tradition, have become different in kind and essentially more difficult than in earlier ages; for then on the one hand we always had ready to hand a few sentences from the Fathers to prove the positions of current theology and of the official pronouncements of the Church, while on the other we could always overlook in a calm and broadminded way other opinions in the Fathers which were less suitable to our purpose. Today the position is to a large extent such that [74] theology must engage consistently in a direct dialogue with the modern natural and social sciences, and that this dialogue, in the very nature of the subject-matter involved and the manner in which the modern sciences are presented, can no longer be communicated through what was earlier called philosophy, the nature and function of which in the light of current unphilosophical sciences, is more obscure and more threatened than commonly admitted among us. Finally it is also a special problem in its own right, whether modern man’s understanding of himself (a factor which is always involved in theology, and which in fact enters into theology as such, as distinct from revelation, as an intrinsic element in it) is communicated to the theologian at all through mere words, as he still always tacitly presupposes, or whether this self-

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

understanding even theologians has original sources of knowledge of its own such that they cannot be replaced by words, and which consist on the one hand in imaged and on the other in the concrete exercise of the practical reason, something which can never adequately be communicated or expressed merely through the insights offered by the speculative reason.

This situation in which the individual theologian stands and has work, then, is conditioned by an uncontrollable pluralism of theologies and by a state of affairs in the development of human thought which is likewise incalculable, and it is something that must be recognized soberly and without any inhibitions, and from which the due consequences have to be drawn The individual theologian in his work today is the theologian who is alien, alone, and isolated. Today it is no longer so easy for him as it formerly was to think of himself as a worker on a common building site on which a single building is being erected according to a plan which has already been worked out and is known to all. He works on the basis of a world of ideas, from certain premisses, and with certain philosophical preconceptions as his tools, yet is well aware that these are subject to historical conditions and the limitations of particular epochs. Yet for all this formal awareness of his he is incapable of eliminating or overcoming these limitations For the first time in the history of theological thought theology is not only conditioned by history, but is also aware of being so conditioned, and besides this is aware of being unable to avoid this conditioning. It is only in the second part of this first lecture that we shall be able to consider what all this implies for the ecclesiological element in the theology of today. At this initial stage we must simply concentrate upon the situation itself, the fact that it cannot be overcome and the isolating effect which it has.

The alienating effect of this situation in present-day religious belief [75] is rendered particularly acute because in theology what is being treated of is a discipline which, more than any other, has to uphold the rightness of its propositions with a certain absolute binding force. Certainly this does not simply mean that they can claim the same absolute commitment as faith itself. Yet at the same time, in a manner which is far from being clear, they do participate precisely in the nature of this absolute commitment, for it is quite impossible to arrive at any completely clear dividing line between the propositions of faith and the propositions of theology. In any case in this situation, to the extent that theology should be, and is intended to be, the justification of the intellectual honesty of faith, a theological method is necessary which is itself in turn rationally justified, one which, in contrast to so many which have commonly been practised hitherto, avoids from the outset adopting many of the approaches by which the theologians of earlier times sought to overcome all the problems of philosophy, exegesis, and the history of dogma upon the pretext that all these difficulties could be overcome positively and in a way which the individual could understand by means of a frontal attack upon them. Now it is of course in principle possible to solve all the philosophical and historical problems entailed in theology in a direct and positive manner (at any rate to an extent which is sufficient). But while recognizing this we must also say that this possibility, so far as the individual theologian is concerned, and therefore so far as the individual Christian is concerned also, in practice no longer exists because of the immense variation in all the scientific methods which are employed, and because of the impossibility of acquainting oneself with all the literature that has been produced, within the space of any one finite life. Yet having recognized this we must also say that in all intellectual honesty we must provide the justification for faith both as a whole and in its individual propositions. In view of this, then, it is necessary for theology today, in this contemporary situation in which it stands and which it can no longer control, to develop indirect methods of achieving a justification of faith such as will satisfy the demands of the individual conscience on the question of intellectual truth. These methods will be indirect in the sense that they will legitimately bypass the particular material problems involved, and that they will apply first and foremost in the particular concrete situation of the individual in the development of his

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

thought, and not lay claim to any permanent or universal validity. But what all these methods will assume in the concrete depends on the concrete material which is being treated of at any given moment. Now obviously this indirect form of justification will assume one form when it is applied to some intellectual decision to be [76] taken in a context involving metaphysical problems which have not yet directly been tackled or positively solved, and will assume a different form when it is some specific historical question which is being treated of. For instance I may concern myself with the question of why, in all intellectual honesty, I can assent to the existence of God even though the most recent linguistic philosophy and the systems of modern structuralism remain closed books to me, while at the same time they manifestly do have a bearing on the question of God. But this is a quite different question, and demands a different indirect method of approach, from the question, for instance, of how I can accept the claims of the Catholic Church, including the doctrines of the papal primacy and the apostolic succession of her episcopate, to be founded by Christ even though I cannot perceive how this Church developed from the historical Jesus to the stage of early Catholicism, and even though I know, or at least suspect, that much must have taken place in the social development of the Church during this interval.

All that has been said up to now still has not made it clear what the special quality is of these various indirect methods considered as justifying the Christian faith. Before we go on to invoke at least one example intended to throw light to some extent upon such a method, we must begin by establishing two points: First: that a methodology of this kind, worked out by a process of conscious reflection, does not yet exist in Catholic theology, or at least that it exists at the semi-conscious level the sphere of apologetics. Moreover this apologetics is of such a kind that it undervalues itself considering itself merely as an 'argumentatio ad hominem', and with an exaggerated modesty imagining that its achievements are less than those of the supposedly higher discipline of 'scientific' fundamental theology. In reality, however, such apologetics represents a more direct approach and achieves more than this fundamental theology. The second point is this: When we apply indirect methods of the kind of which we have been speaking these can very well serve to yield insights into the actual matter itself which is being treated of in the concrete case, insights which would have remained unrecognized if we had attempted to apply only those methods which seem to be at a higher level, because they involve a more direct and positive approach to the work. Now let us pass on to a particular example of what we mean, because we have reached a point at which it is no longer possible to treat of these indirect methods of theological investigation and justification with all their manifold complexities at a purely abstract level. How, for instance, can we attempt to make it clear that it is justifiable to belong to the [77] Catholic Church as distinct from the Churches of the Reformation? If we were to attempt to work out all the points of controversy in exegesis, biblical theology, and the history of dogma positively and in particular, we would, presumably, never come to an end, and never achieve any conclusions. And in fact (this is the decisive point) it is not merely the normal Christian today, but the learned theologian too whose contemporary situation is in fact such that any such line of investigation would manifestly be (to say the least) as difficult for him as for any ordinary Christian. This aspect alone will serve to demonstrate in the concrete that the indirect method, as applied in the present context, does not constitute any merely supplementary or secondary theological approach such as is applied only by way of additional support in those cases in which no further progress can be made when dealing with some concrete individual. Rather it is a method which, whether consciously reflected upon or not, constitutes an intrinsic element in theological methodology as such. For today even the learned have to see and recognize in all honesty how impossible it is for them to work out exhaustively all the aspects of the problems with which they are dealing by a direct and positive approach. They must recognize this because they too (to express the matter in the parlance of the 'analysis fidei') can no longer perceive any essential difference between themselves and the 'rudis'. In other words they have explicitly to allow for, in all their considerations and calculations, the fact that their own recognition of truth is subject to historical conditioning, and they must make this an explicit subject of consideration.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now to concentrate in greater detail upon our example. The first point that should be made is that every Christian has the right to presume, until the contrary is proved, that his own Christianity and his adherence to the Church in the concrete are valid on the basis of the power of grace and the workings of the Spirit which he feels within him. Why this is so, and why such a presumption does not produce a state of absolute immobility among the Christians of the various denominations so that any passing from one Christian Church to another becomes impossible – this is a point which does, of course, also need to be made clear.

A second stage in the indirect methods which we are envisaging here as applied to our particular question (and abstracting from a point that would also have to be established, namely that of its very nature Christianity is always and necessarily in some sense embodied in a Church) would consist in the recognition of a further fact, namely that the nature of any conceivable Church of Christ and of the ultimate eschatological validity to which it lays claim is such that that Church has the best chance of [78] authenticating itself as the Church of Christ which stands more clearly, more fully and, from the historical and sociological point of view, in a manifestly more unbroken line of continuity with the Church of the origins, provided only that the Church in question does not also stand in clear and manifest contradiction to the basic essentials of Christianity at the theoretical level as recognized universally and as applied in practice by every individual in the particular concrete circumstances of his life.

From this point a third step would then have to be embarked upon in which it would have to be established that the threefold 'sola' of the Reformation, as understood rightly, and precisely in the sense, and with the due distinctions of contemporary Protestantism, certainly has its place in the Catholic Church, and that for this reason the Catholic has no-grounds for withdrawing from his Church in the name of some pure Christianity, seeing that he is aware of this Church of his as standing in a more unbroken line of historical continuity with the Church of the origins than the other Christian Churches.

These considerations are absolutely basic. But of course a whole series of other supplementary considerations would have to be added to them, which it is necessary here to pass over, as for instance the question of how such a recognition, in which a considerable degree of historical relativity is involved, is adequate as a rational justification for an assent of faith that is absolute, or that other question of how this way in which Catholics justify their Church might be transposed and reapplied in an (ecumenical) enquiry among the Protestant Christians, for whom the whole problem equally exists in a manner corresponding to our first stage, yet in a predominantly different form. But these indirect methods which we are considering here do take into consideration and allow for the situation in terms of concrete human living of the individual right from the outset, and if in our question these methods are taken as our starting-point, then surely it is still clear that in this way a whole range of particular historical questions can be bypassed right from the outset, which today would otherwise, at least in practice, be insoluble. A more detailed working out of such a methodology would surely serve too to show what has already been indicated, namely that in itself it actually carries with it certain implicit insights into the actual matter under consideration which would) presumably never have been won in any other way. This indirect methodological approach would, for instance, in the case we are considering here, be able to make it clear that there is an element of historical contingency in the constitutional law of the Church without this element of historical contingency either on the one hand removing the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

jus divinum [79] of this constitution, and without on the other hand this jus divinum as rightly understood necessarily ruling out this genuine element of historical contingency in the constitutional law of the Church. The indirect methods which we are aiming at, and the very structure of the matter itself, could be understood as having a mutual bearing upon one another.

Evidently it is not possible at this point to enter any further into all this. Only one further particular example may be invoked in order to show what is meant in general by this indirect methodological approach in theology, which has been suggested by the contemporary situation in theology in which the theologian himself is placed, and which he can neither master nor control. The only further point which we can still make in passing is that this indirect method precisely as indicated also has a vital bearing upon the methods employed in the 'course of basic theology', the 'cursus introductorius' recommended by the Second Vatican Council as providing the foundations of the study of theology in general.

Clearly although we have actually mentioned only one consequence arising from the contemporary situation in theology, this does not mean that there are not many other consequences also, just as important for the work of theology. Many of these are such that we cannot enter into them any further here. Here we shall attempt to throw light only upon a single further consequence when we shall have occasion to speak in the second part of this first lecture of the ecclesiological element in theology as this is demanded by contemporary circumstances. Ecclesiology has always been an essential element in Christian theology. Here we cannot repeat what has been said with regard to the permanence and fundamental significance of this ecclesiology of theology. Hence we shall not be speaking of verbal revelation in general, of scripture and tradition and the bearing which each has upon the other as a result of their interrelationship, of kerygma and faith on the one hand, and theology on the other, and the manner in which these mutually condition one another, of the Church's teaching authority and theology, of the immutable element and the historical element in the truth of revelation within the Church. All this is presupposed here. Here we shall be treating simply of specific aspects of the ecclesiological element in theology as these arise precisely from the contemporary situation in which theology stands.

First it can readily be understood that in a situation in which it has come consciously to be recognized and reflected upon that every kind of knowledge, including theological knowledge, is subject to the vicissitudes and the conditioning process of history, the ecclesiological element in theology [80] is confronted both with greater threats than formerly and at the same time with fresh opportunities. The first point is self-evident. The factors of the Church, the authority of her official teaching, the ecclesiological element in theology, are factors in a more general awareness which has itself become the subject of conscious reflection in its state as in a real sense subject to the conditioning processes and the vicissitudes of history, and which, therefore, has limitations of its own. This means that we feel that even these specific factors have to be enquired into from a quite fresh point of view. The point we are making here does not need to be developed any further. But this contemporary situation implies at the same time a fresh opportunity for the ecclesiological element in theology. Contemporary man, who consciously reflects upon and recognizes the fact that his own knowledge is subject to historical conditioning, and that it is impossible for him to achieve any completely adequate reflection upon the presuppositions of his own knowledge, can achieve a typical standpoint with regard to his own self in a way which was quite impossible in earlier times. He can realize more clearly that his views are in danger of being influenced by his own subjective inclinations the very moment they cease to be confronted with the convictions of society as a whole in an open and effectively maintained dialogue at a fundamental level. Today he is in a better position to understand that truth actually has something to do with institutional life and practice; that even in respect of his knowledge man cannot be an individual subject in isolation; that truth can, to an extent greater than was formerly supposed, be measured by its effectiveness as a social force; that practical reasoning and decision-making are not simply derivatives from the speculative reason, but also entail factors which are autonomous and original to themselves even so far as knowledge is concerned. For in themselves these are only conceivable within the context of social living.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

From these and similar considerations, which cannot be developed further at this point, the contemporary situation in which theology finds itself has acquired, precisely in respect of its ecclesiological element, a quite new importance in terms of human living in the here and now, a new understanding of itself, and a new opportunity. The statement that theology either constitutes a process of responsible reflection upon the faith of the Church or ceases to be theology at all has, on a fundamental view, acquired a new intrinsic meaning and a new importance for the theologian himself such that today he is, less than ever before, in a position to regard his own personal opinion taken in isolation as important and worthy of consideration because less than ever before is he able to hold [81] that be has, on his own personal responsibility and of his own resources, evolved what he feels to be the correct view of the world in which he lives. For today, less than ever before, has such a view any prospect of being accepted by many others. Theology is only of interest when it constitutes a process of reflection (though obviously of course critical reflection) upon the faith of a Church which is actually using this faith as the basis of its activities. This does not mean that we are canonizing a collective (as opposed to an individual) subjectivism or pragmatism, but simply that we are applying to the nature of theology the insight that that which is subjective in a radical sense (which is necessarily the inter-communicative subjective) is also that which is most objective, and that the highest truth remains in practice only attainable in that love which is most all-embracing and free. From this point of view it is obviously part of any sound theological method to take as its starting-point the average and representative awareness of faith to be found in the Church as it exists in the concrete. This does not mean that we do not have to subject this to a process of critical questioning. It does not mean that it is obvious from the outset what the real and true meaning of this representative awareness of faith actually is. It does not imply any denial of the fact that it is necessary to bring to bear upon it a constant process of critical discrimination between that which is really meant and asserted in the absolute and that which, while connected with this essential nucleus of real meaning, nevertheless belongs to the category of presuppositions, patterns of thought etc. which are subject to the conditions of particular epochs (naturally when we speak of such a process of discrimination we do not mean one that leads to a ‘chemically refined’ residue of true and proper meaning of the object of belief in itself and for itself alone. Such a process leads rather to this object of faith in itself being presented in a new form which is, no less than formerly, conditioned by the circumstances of history).

But unless a theologian is willing to take as his starting-point this awareness of faith of the Church as it exists in the concrete today, autonomous and capable of providing a safeguard against any deviations in the subjective awareness of the individual theologian himself, he will necessarily remain pent up in his own personal subjectivity even in those cases in which, for instance, he is in principle ready to submit to the authority of scripture or the material arguments of some intellectual discipline. If this were to be his attitude he would never be able to achieve any standpoint as a starting-point for his active work which would be really independent of his own subjective awareness as an individual theologian.

[82] Now what we are about to describe is precisely such a standpoint. The situation today is that those universal auctoritates which were earlier tacitly presupposed are less than ever before present in a form that is clear and beyond all contradiction. And in this situation it has become more necessary than ever before to apprehend and to recognize as a matter of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

conscious reflection the specifically ecclesiological element in theology. Of course this is not to assert that the authority of this ecclesiological element could ever be present and effective otherwise than in virtue of the fact that it is also recognized and apprehended as such at the subjective level also. What we are saying, rather, is that the most objective form of knowledge is bound up with the most insuperable subjectivity at the same time, so that we cannot escape from the circle in which the processes of our thought move to and fro between both these two elements.

Thus at the level of the question of truth too an ecclesiological element in theology is making itself felt, just as the individualism of the recent past – is giving way to a higher form of socialism in the future. But to say this is not to dispute the fact that precisely this ecclesiological element must constitute a fulfilment of that enduring and permanent essence of the ecclesiology inherent in theology in a quite new situation and in a quite new form. First and foremost the critical function with regard to the Church's awareness of faith has become more necessary and come to play a greater part. For this awareness of faith as it exists in the concrete in the present-day Church entails an unconscious interplay of the most varied elements: real faith in all its radical openness to the absolute mystery called 'God' and in its unequivocal attachment in history to Jesus of Nazareth as the eschatologically definitive and historically manifested self-communication of this mystery; the models, thought-patterns and modes of expression in the concrete in which this fundamental faith is objectified and, rendered communicable in the social life of the Church; the numerous opinions, theologumena etc. which are concomitant with, but not intrinsic to the faith, yet which are all unreflectingly accepted as part and parcel of the faith. Now the process of discriminating in this way, or of reformulating the elements of one and the same faith and the same creed into various theologies each differing from the others, and either appearing one after the other or existing side by side, inevitably and invariably causes theology to stand apart from the Church and her teaching authority with a certain attitude of criticism. For in this situation two things are possible: in this process of critical discrimination and reformulation of truths and realities which belong inalienably to the Christian faith and the Church's creed, the individual theologian may go astray, and second it is equally possible [83] that the Church in her magisterium may seek to resist a process of this kind even when it takes forms which are perfectly legitimate. This situation gives rise to a dialogue between the theologians and the Church which is never finally completed. The reason why this dialogue is never finally completed is that even in the case in which a particular theologian puts forward an interpretation of this awareness which the Church has of her faith to be subjected to the judgement of the Church in this same awareness of faith of hers, and if the Church then, with a greater or lesser degree of authority, herself rejects this interpretation in one or other of the various ways in which this can be done, even then the theologian must still in fact continue to ask himself what such a decision on the part of the Church rejecting his interpretation does or does not mean in precise terms. Because of this the dialogue between the theologian and the Church is never brought to a definitive conclusion even by a definition on the part of the Church's magisterium. The only way, therefore, in which the theologian can actively engage in theology is for him to be prepared again and again to incur the risk of involuntarily finding the Church against him in his interpretations. If he is unwilling to incur this risk, and confines himself simply to repeating the formulations of the Christian faith put forward by the Church's teaching authority or in other traditional formulae in order to achieve safety in his work, then he runs the (greater) risk of uttering formulae which he only imagines that he has understood. From this point of view the theologian's conviction that his personal theology does include this necessary ecclesiological element is, in the last analysis, an act of hope which, ultimately speaking, can only prove justified by its own results.

In conclusion two further supplementary points must be made: First it must be explicitly

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

reiterated yet again that the pluralism of theologies in the Church as it exists today is such as can no longer be controlled or mastered, though this is not to assail the unity of the Church or the unity of her creed. For the implications arising from this I must refer to another study in this volume,[2] in which I have attempted to set these forth.

Thus I may be permitted to express my decided and radical mistrust of any attempt to reduce theology in any adequate sense to the methodology employed in it, or to reformulate it in these terms. Theology always is, and always will be, even in the future, something more than its own hermeneutics. Certainly we must constantly reflect also on those methods which at first were not reflected upon, and which we applied when we [84] were enquiring into the actual subject-matter of faith in itself. And to this extent the teaching of theological method, hermeneutics, fundamental and formal theology etc., are themselves necessary themes for theology to investigate. And certainly it is regrettable that in Catholic theology as it is de facto practised far too little attention has been paid to these themes. Is it true that it is impossible to know what 'fides qua' is without defining 'fides quo'. But however true this may be, it is no less true that theology cannot be reduced merely to theological hermeneutics or a formalized system of teaching on the subject of speaking about God. Of course the converse is also true. If we want the knife to cut we must first sharpen it. But if we confine ourselves to sharpening the knife alone then we have not yet done any good cutting. It is the same with theology, although in this case the two processes do enter more closely into one another than in the case of the knife which we use in everyday life. In the long run theological methodology will only be convincing when it brings man into immediate contact with the subject-matter itself, and in the last analysis this is, once and for all, not faith and the theology that goes with it, but that which is the object of faith, because faith itself is only itself insofar as it surrenders itself to that which it itself is not, even while the man of faith is convinced that this greater entity which he cannot comprehend, can become an event in this faith of his.

II

The second lecture could be entitled 'transcendental theology'. Certainly transcendental theology is not simply the whole of theology and must not claim to be anything more than one part or one aspect of it. Certainly transcendental theology is a theology in which the specific themes of traditional theology (the doctrine of God, Christology, the doctrine of grace etc.) are considered under one quite specific aspect. In other words this discipline is not concerned simply or exclusively with theological method. Nevertheless it does imply a quite specific line of enquiry and methodology with which it approaches the material subjects of theology, and to that extent the term 'transcendental theology' can also unreflectingly be used for one specific theological method. It is in this sense that we shall be speaking of it here, though at the same time what is meant by transcendental theology considered as a method must once more be clarified by examples which we shall at least be able to point to of transcendental theology as a theology with a subject-matter of its own.

It is not easy to say what is really meant by the theology thus designated. [85] The concept is, of course, based upon an analogy with the term 'transcendental philosophy'. But it is not merely a verbal analogy that is indicated here. Transcendental philosophy and transcendental theology are interconnected in terms of their subject-matter, and it is quite impossible for them to be separated one from another. From the historical point of view a transcendental philosophy consciously conceived of as such made its appearance prior to the advent of any

[2] 'Pluralism in theology and the unity of the creed in the Church,' pp. 3-23.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

transcendental theology, likewise as consciously reflected upon. Because of this it is conceptually impossible to begin simply with the following statement: transcendental theology is that theology which uses transcendental philosophy as its method. Philosophy is not merely an instrument for the practice of theology introduced into theology from without. Rather it is an intrinsic element in theology itself. This being the case, we can say that the provisional definition of transcendental theology which we have just put forward in terms of transcendental philosophy does not represent any alienation of theology from its own true nature. This definition does not constitute any merely external specification of theology which has nothing whatever to do with its intrinsic nature. This is not to say that this definition of transcendental theology as the theology which involves transcendental philosophy in itself comprises the total and fundamental nature of transcendental theology. But it is only at a later stage that we shall have to speak of this.

When we define transcendental theology as that theology which involves transcendental philosophy we have admittedly still not come very much nearer to an understanding of transcendental theology, in terms either of history or of systematic thought. For everything now depends on what is to be understood by transcendental philosophy, once more in terms of history and systematic thought. Now in both respects this is a very difficult question. Let us take as our starting-point the principle that every philosophy, i.e. every genuine metaphysics worthy of the name must proceed along the lines of transcendental philosophy, or else is not philosophy in this authentic sense at all; then it is of course possible to reply that every theology which really involves conscious reflection and, thought, and is intended to be something more than a mere record of saving history – in other words which is philosophical in character – is ipso facto at the same time that theology which involves transcendental philosophy – is, in other words, transcendental theology. And since on any showing there is a certain entirely correct element in this identification of metaphysics with transcendental philosophy in terms both of subject matter and of historical development, it must not be disputed for one [86] moment that certain qualities of transcendental theology can be discovered in every genuine theology, for instance that of an Origen, an Augustine or a Thomas Aquinas. It is not necessary to maintain that transcendental theology is an absolutely new discovery of an area investigation which did not exist in former times.

But if we regard transcendental philosophy as some special and peculiar form of philosophy which has existed as a matter of explicit and conscious reflection only from the time of Descartes onwards, subsequently emerging still more clearly in the philosophy of Kant and of the German idealism, then it is likewise permissible and reasonable to say that a theology, involving transcendental philosophy could only have emerged since Descartes, and indeed that a transcendental theology in this sense could exist, insofar as it existed at all, only because modern philosophy has at last been accepted – admittedly very tardily – within the faith of the Catholic Church more or less today, and since Catholic thought has emancipated itself from neo-scholasticism.

But whether we hold this opinion or another, whether we allow both developments to exist side by side or argue that this is impossible, it remains true on any showing that the concept of transcendental theology is still obscure, and we are leaving it in this state simply because no one universally accepted and unequivocal concept of transcendental philosophy exists, and because even from the historical point of view – i.e. if we characterize the whole modern and metaphysically orientated developments in philosophy up to and including existentialism as transcendental philosophy, it is evidently clear that the most contradictory systems can be brought under the general ‘umbrella’ concept of a transcendental philosophy, as is shown by the history of philosophy in the last few centuries.

Now within the framework of the present theological consideration there can be no question of developing a concept of transcendental philosophy (whether from the historical

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

or the systematic points of view or from both) which fulfils the requirements of a philosophical concept in all their rigour. It would be too much to demand such a thing of a theologian who, after all, can only be a philosopher in a very weakened sense, and furthermore any concept of transcendental philosophy which he might develop would be one which could not possibly be very useful, since it would be open to dispute with regard both to the understanding of and to the practical application of a transcendental theology. For this reason we have the right to take as our starting-point a somewhat less precise, an almost popular concept of transcendental philosophy, yet one [87] which for this very reason is also broad enough to cover the very heterogeneous manifestations of the modern history of philosophy. A further point is that it is possible to develop a concept of transcendental philosophy of this sort from the lines of enquiry which are followed immanently within theology as such. This is a point which we shall have to clarify at a later stage. But because of it we do also have the right to take this sort of concept of transcendental philosophy as our starting-point. In other words it is not in the least dependent upon a general consensus of the philosophers as such.

Quite simply, therefore, and in a sense that is almost pre-philosophical, we shall make the following statement: A transcendental line of enquiry, regardless of the particular area of subject-matter in which it is applied, is present when and to the extent that it raises the question of the conditions in which knowledge of a specific subject is possible in the knowing subject himself. The fact that an enquiry of this kind is in principle possible, legitimate, and under certain circumstances even necessary hardly needs to be discussed in general terms or at any length. In any act of cognition it is not only the object known but also the subject knowing that is involved. It is dependent not only upon the distinctive characteristics of the object, but also upon the essential structure of the knowing subject. The mutual interconnection and the mutual interconditioning process between the subject knowing and the object known precisely as known and as knowable are in themselves the object of a transcendental enquiry. The a priori transcendental subjectivity of the knower on the one hand and the object of knowledge (and of freedom) on the other are related to one another in such a way that they mutually condition one another, and they do this in such a way that knowledge of the a priori conditions which make knowledge possible in the subject necessarily constitutes also an element in the actual knowledge of the object itself both with regard to the question of what the nature of the object known is as a matter of metaphysical necessity, and also with regard to the question of what the concrete historical conditions of this object are, factors which are precisely not intrinsically necessary. Thus a transcendental enquiry constitutes not merely the posing of a question which is supplementary to the question of the object in its autonomy and as it is presented a posteriori and at the empirical level. Rather it is only in this transcendental enquiry that knowledge of the object as it exists in itself achieves the fulness proper to it. Knowledge on the part of the knowing subject in himself is always at the same time a knowledge of the metaphysical (and in an objective sense transcendental) structure of the object in itself.

[88] At this point we cannot devote any further consideration to the metaphysical presuppositions and implications of this statement. But in order to guard from the outset against any fundamental misunderstanding as to the nature of a transcendental enquiry of this kind certain further observations are, nevertheless, necessary.

There is a basic thesis, commonly attributed to the German school of idealism, according to which the subject as such in his act of apprehending himself transcendentally constitutes the event of the absolute spirit in itself at least in those cases in which that subject, in a real and radical sense, apprehends itself in its own transcendental purity and pure subjectivity, and realizes itself at this level. Now it would be wrong to suppose that this basic thesis is implicit in a transcendental enquiry or method of the kind which we are considering here.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This basic thesis, therefore, is not as such present in the transcendental enquiry, because the transcendental subject even in the boundlessness of his own transcendentality, ultimately apprehends himself and must apprehend himself as a question. For he always experiences himself in this transcendentality of his as open, as of himself an empty question, as that which refers beyond and outside of himself that which he himself precisely is not. Now he experiences the act of self-realization of his own transcendentality as communicated to him through the a posteriori experience of the object which of itself manifests itself to or refuses to manifest itself to him. As an object in this sense the subject is not master of it. Nor does the transcendental enquiry in the sense which we are using the term here signify any devaluation of history or of the experience of that which is factual and irreducible to the transcendental. For when the subject turns in upon himself to recognize the transcendental conditions of the possibility of his own knowledge (and his freedom) this in fact means precisely that he apprehends himself as inescapably anchored in history, and realizes the a posteriori nature of his experience something which precisely cannot be reduced to the transcendental dimension. To the extent that in the transcendental mode of cognition man reflects upon his own historicity as a factor of this kind, and one that is transcendentally necessary, and to the extent that he achieves reflection upon himself at this level, the full rigour and inescapability of his history is borne in upon him. And conversely, anyone who says that man is that being which is inescapably pent up in the concrete experience of his own history has thereby either sought simply to put forward an assertorial proposition (in which case it can be hoped that it will eventually turn out to be invalid), so that he has utterly failed to express the real historicity of man's nature, or alternatively, by saying this he has expressed an apodictic [89] proposition which as such can be attained to only by a transcendental approach and methodology. In other words he has practised transcendental philosophy. Perhaps it is also useful to isolate and to emphasize one further point, namely that transcendental philosophy in the broader and to some extent pre-philosophical sense in which it is conceived of here does not constitute any true object for an anthropology of freedom either, for in this man considers himself as a subject of the hope and promise of a future to be created and made real of his own resources. On this approach, then, he is not the subject which, in its a priori aspect, has already all along anticipated its own future. No such opposition exists, therefore, for the precise and simple reason that a futurologist anthropology of this kind, if rightly understood, is rendering itself transcendental to the statements on which it itself is based or is rendering itself blind to the radical nature of the human reality which it is attempting to express. Of course this is not to deny that any transcendental philosophy is in constant danger of interpreting the a priori element as that which alone is important, of being intolerant of the historical element and failing to take it into account, and instead seeking to approach it theoretically or aesthetically and so to neutralize its effects. But in that case precisely this transcendental philosophy is entertaining a false understanding of its own nature.

Nor does our interpretation of transcendental philosophy involve any denial of the fact that in the concrete situation of a particular epoch or a particular individual it may be necessary, in coming to a decision of the practical reason, in concrete practice to be 'one-sided' and in a certain sense to forget the prudent balancing of one factor against another in the dialectic of a transcendental philosophy, because otherwise it would deprive the legitimate one-sidedness of the concrete decision of its force.

For our present purposes we must satisfy ourselves with this quite modest pre-philosophical concept of transcendental philosophy. Properly speaking it is sufficient for us to achieve the insight that the question of the knowing subject signifies not one particular department of knowledge which exists on an equal footing with many others, but a reality which is prior to every kind of knowledge which introduces material divisions of the subject-matter into particular departments as the prior condition making this possible. We must also recognize that we have only arrived at the level of real philosophy and metaphysics in the strict sense of the term, and that we can only make apodictic judgements at that stage at which, while according all due recognition to the objectivity of the reality Investigated, we also include as an object of conscious reflection as such the subject which is always and in every case also involved in every act [90] of cognition as such, albeit without always being explicitly adverted to as an object of investigation. It is in this sense, then, that philosophy is necessarily transcendental philosophy, even though that stage at which its true nature is explicitated as a theme in its own right is arrived at of only later in the history of philosophy. And it is also true that theology is necessarily and of its innermost nature in the truest sense also philosophical theology. For otherwise it would comprise faith and creed indeed, but no longer theology precisely as such. Indeed it would no longer even comprise faith and creed in any real sense unless it also included this philosophical element. Now if this is true then it is in principle evident that theology must be transcendental theology. As has already been said this does not mean that all theology is transcendental theology. For it is clear that theology must restate and reflect upon the propositions of faith with regard to saving history as such. And the account of that history contained in it does not become a scientific discipline only at that stage at which this history is subjected to philosophical reflection as to the transcendental conditions which make it possible. On the contrary there is a science of history as such (although the theology of the Middle Ages was unwilling to concede this). Now if this is true then theology already exists as a science at that stage at which, prior to any explicit transcendental reflection, it records saving history and considers its significance. But conversely this does not exclude the fact that theology, in virtue of the element of philosophy necessarily immanent in and intrinsic to it of its very nature must also necessarily be transcendental theology. In this connection it is ultimately of little importance whether the statement that theology is necessarily transcendental theology and yet is not developed solely and exclusively in this form as such leads to the setting up of distinct theological disciplines divided from one another materially and departmentally (somewhat in the sense of the distinction between positive and speculative theology within one and the same discipline of dogmatics and fundamental theology), or whether the effect of this statement is merely that different aspects and methods are mentioned which must be considered in their mutual interconnection in any one investigation of the material subject-matter of theology.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

After all these considerations all that we have achieved by way of beginning still remains a very abstract concept of transcendental theology. We must now deepen this somewhat further and fill it out with content by showing that a transcendental enquiry must constantly be undertaken afresh and, as a matter of concrete history, has been so undertaken, from the very nature of theology itself, though it is far from following from [91] this that any explicit recourse need be had to a transcendental philosophy. The second way in which we shall deepen and fill out our initial concept of transcendental theology is to show, by means of a few small concrete examples from theology itself, how urgent such enquiries in transcendental theology are today if contemporary man is genuinely to be able to assimilate the propositions of faith. In both cases we must not tacitly presuppose (thereby becoming entangled in insoluble problems) that a transcendental enquiry into how some specific reality can be known must as such, either in principle or in fact, come before the de facto knowledge of the object in question. Since in an enquiry of this kind it is always the a priori conditions which make the knowledge of a specific reality possible that are being enquired into, it is always true that in practice and in the concrete it only becomes possible at that stage at which the object involved has already come to be known. Thus for a transcendental theology it is neither surprising nor scandalous that theology has all along been practised even before its character as transcendental theology has been conceived of in explicit terms and made the object of conscious reflection. It is also evident that, throughout theology and from the first, statements are made and have been made which of their very nature belong to the context of transcendental theology and have come to be recognized as such precisely at that moment at which an enquiry in terms of transcendental theology has explicitly been undertaken.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Perhaps the presence of such statements in traditional theology can be established most easily and directly in the case of the teaching on faith. In the 'analysis fidei' it is in fact not merely the question pertaining to fundamental theology) of the connection between the 'preambula fidei' and the absolute assent of faith that has to be treated of. Also and in addition to this an answer has to be given to the question of why revelation as heard should constitute and should remain not merely a human word about God, albeit one brought about by God himself, but actually God's word itself, even though it has still entered into the world of ideas proper to man. After all it has its existence in man's own conscious thought and hence is subject to the a priori structure of human knowledge. Now if theology says that any act of hearkening to God's revelation is possible only in the power of the growth of faith, and if theology interprets this growth of faith ultimately as 'uncreated grace', in which, therefore, God himself becomes in himself the constitutive principle of the subject of faith, then in principle a theological answer has been given to a question of transcendental theology: the act of hearing divine revelation as the Word of God himself, as something more, therefore, than a word uttered [92] about God and caused by God, presupposes, as the condition which makes it possible in the subject, that God himself through his own act of self-communication upholds this act of hearing as an intrinsic principle. And this is precisely what we are accustomed to call the supernatural grace of faith.

Although there may be no conscious reflection on this, such statements are, in the nature of the case, statements of transcendental theology, and they still appear in manifold ways precisely in the context of the teaching on grace and the supernatural theological virtues. In this respect as in the example just given it might be shown again and again that the answer to any such enquiry in terms of transcendental theology is arrived at not simply ab externo by some theological datum which is initially foreign to this enquiry itself. Rather it derives from this actual question of transcendental theology. For it is from the limitless a priori transcendentality of knowledge and freedom in themselves that we come to know what is really meant when we speak of God as absolute being and absolute good, recognizing that the absolute goal of this transcendentality is not something additional to, or external to itself, but rather something that is present all along and in its very origins, albeit without being recognized as a conscious theme of thought. And the same is also true in the dimension of a transcendentality and freedom to which man is raised by grace. Here too the goal of this transcendentality is not some point of refuge towards which this transcendental movement of knowledge and freedom tends as something that remains for ever asymptotically unattainable to it. Rather it is that which as such freely communicates itself to the finite spirit to the point of being immediately present and proximate to it at its very roots. Let us therefore take as our starting-point the idea of transcendentality as understood here, to which man is raised by grace (in the usual theological parlance this would mean God's universal will to bring men to supernatural salvation). And taking this as our starting-point we can make clear that in which supernatural grace and the theological virtues properly consist. Once they are recognized as having a transcendental derivation and significance of this kind these concepts also acquire a point of contact with the transcendental experience of the human spirit. They can be 'verified', albeit in a manner corresponding to these realities, because what they express is neither more nor less than the absolute radicalization of the transcendentality of the human spirit in knowledge and freedom.

We must now invoke a few more concrete examples in order to throw light upon the question of how such transcendental theology can be made [93] effective in treating of the themes proper to dogmatic theology, however varied these may be. In this connection it is obvious that the concept of a transcendental theological method is modified very considerably according to the particular subject to which this method is applied. Such modifications may indeed be so considerable that it might be disputed whether one or other application of such a method to a specific subject can or cannot be said to belong to transcendental theology at all. However all the examples which we are about to adduce are intended to render intelligible and assimilable that particular object in them which is actually being called in question here by attempting to point out in the knowing subject an a priori reference to this object. And because of this they can all be understood in a transcendental-theological sense despite the variations between them.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In this attempt it is not merely obvious (as has already been emphasized) that this transcendental-theological disclosure of an a priori reference on the part of the knowing subject to its specific object is de facto possible only after this object itself has revealed itself and so communicated to the subject the knowledge of its own reference to that object as a matter for conscious reflection. While explicitly abstracting too, for our present purposes, from the problem of the precise relationship between nature and grace, still we can and must say that this transcendental reference to a reality of supernatural verbal revelation, to a mystery that has been revealed, is thought of throughout as constituted by God's grace itself. Thus the attempt at achieving a disclosure of this kind in terms of transcendental theology of an a priori reference on the part of the subject to a reality of supernatural salvation freely posited by God is not to be objected to on the grounds that we are attempting to deduce the mystery of this unmerited reality of salvation a priori from the mere nature of man as such. At an earlier stage it has been argued that the acceptance of the saving mystery of God by faith as it is revealed in his word is possible only in virtue of the self-communication of God himself. Now in the very nature of the case it has already thereby been laid down that the acceptance of the realities of salvation through the word of revelation ab externo takes place in the power of the saving reality itself as communicated to the a priori and transcendental subjectivity of man.

An initial example of such transcendental theological methods can be adduced from the theology of the Trinity. Here this example can, of course, only be presented in the briefest possible terms. We shall take as our starting-point the following principles, which derive partly from a metaphysical anthropology and partly too from an ultimate and utterly [94] irreducible experience of grace which explicates itself in Christian revelation and in the history of revelation itself: 1. In respect of his knowledge and freedom man constitutes absolute and limitless transcendentality. 2. This in itself has a historical process of explicitation of its own which belongs essentially to itself and only communicates an awareness of itself to man in the total history of man considered as a historical being precisely in its transcendentality. 3. In this transcendence man is radically orientated to the absolute mystery which we call 'God', and which, in a free manner (which we call creation), opens up this transcendentality of man and sustains it. 4. In respect precisely of this (grace-given) transcendentality the abiding mystery of God is not merely the asymptotic point of refuge which provides it with its goal, and towards which (as the 'unmoved Mover') the transcendental movement of knowledge and freedom in man tend, even while it always remains remote from him; rather this infinite point of orientation of the transcendental movement discloses itself, at least in the mode of that which is offered, as a free miracle of a love that reaches out beyond itself in self-communication to man, to achieve a state of absolute immediacy and proximity to him, and in this act of self-communication itself sustains this transcendental movement on the part of man himself. 5. In accordance with the second statement this self-communication of God to man in the transcendental dimension of his being has a history of its own within the history of man, and as such becomes the history

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of God's self-communication which we call saving history and revelation history, taking the offering of salvation and revealing of the word as together constituting a unity. Where this history of God's self-communication to the world attains its absolute highest point, its point of irreversibility, and where the offering of God's self-communication to the world as a whole as endowing it with grace at the transcendental level has brought about the definitive acceptance of this offering on the part of the world itself, there is achieved that which is designated as the hypostatic union and also (naming it according to its concrete realization in history) that which we call the absolute bringer of salvation, Jesus as crucified and risen, the Son of the Father.

What we have expressed in these five statements is the mode in which man is constituted in a state of grace-given transcendentality, and the historical process in which this takes place. On the basis of this we can now acquire an understanding of the doctrine of the Trinity in terms of transcendental theology. First on the basis of the principles we have formulated we can recognize a threefold presence of God in the economy of salvation. In the self-communication of the one God this constitutes [95] that incomprehensible mystery which never ceases to be such even in a really radical act of self-communication. To that extent the God who imparts himself in a (forgiving) love is called 'Father'. Now this God imparts himself in such a way as to be in himself in a state of absolute proximity to man, and as a sustaining principle of the transcendentality of man in his act of knowing and loving. To that extent he is called 'Holy Spirit'. Now this self-utterance of the one God to man is manifested in history as the irreversible faithfulness of God in Jesus Christ, and as such is called the incarnate Word of the Father.

Only under all three of these aspects, all three of these modes of God's giving of himself to the world, is the one act of self-communication on the part of the one God fully achieved, though this does not mean that these three aspects can either be thought of as identical or considered independently one of another.

On the basis of a transcendental approach, then, we have acquired an idea of the Trinity on the level of the economy of salvation. From this we must now advance a stage further to the idea of the Trinity as immanent, in the knowledge that unless this Trinity at the level of the economy of salvation were not that of God in and for himself we could not really speak of any true self-communication of God. For any distinction in this act of self-communication such that it was not attributed to God in and for himself would appear as merely creaturely. The 'self-communication of God' would be mediated through a creaturely act. We would have God not in himself and for himself, but merely as he is reflected in a creaturely reality. We would have failed to pass beyond the sphere of the merely creaturely so as to attain to God himself as he is in himself in his own divine glory, and as he wills, precisely as being this, to be for us as an act of free grace which is not ultimately a creaturely reality at all, even though it does have creaturely effects and creaturely modes in the manner in which it reaches us. But for all that this free grace is God himself. All these considerations do of course presuppose 'faith' in the self-communication of God. But this faith is not merely indoctrinated into us ab externo. Rather it is an experience of a transcendental kind (called the grace of faith) such that the reality of it cannot be denied merely on the grounds that it is only through revelation ab externo that it is brought to its full self-realization and certainty at the level of conscious thought.

In a similar manner too we can develop a transcendental christology, and for this too we must take as our starting-point the principles already mentioned above. Such a transcendental christology, which develops the 'idea' of a bringer of salvation in the absolute, a manifestation in history [96] of the irreversibility and the victory of God's self-communication over the denial of the unbelief of the world, can of course never be a substitute for the historical experience of Jesus of Nazareth – in other words of that reality in which this 'idea' has been made real, and only precisely in virtue of this permits the idea as such to become real in history. Nevertheless there is, and necessarily must be, such a thing as a transcendental christology. Without it the traditional christology would today be in the gravest danger of being regarded as a mythology which is no longer capable of being made real to the man of today. Admittedly explicit plans for such a christology at the level of transcendental theology are extremely rare. In addition to certain attempts which I myself have made, I may refer to the article by Bernhard Welte in the third volume of the work entitled 'Chalkedon' (Würzburg, 1954) edited by Heinrich Bacht and Alois Grillmeier. And surely a christology of this kind at the level of transcendental theology would have two tasks to achieve which of course are closely interconnected.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

First, therefore, taking as its starting-point the principle of God's will to save all men, in other words a self-communication on God's part which supports the whole of history and supplies it with its goal, and also taking as a starting-point the principle of a historical development in this transcendental self-communication of God to the world which is necessary of its very nature, such a christology in transcendental theology would have to develop the concept of an absolute mediator of salvation. In other words it would have to show that a historical development of the transcendental self-communication of God in this sense (provided that it does not lead to the absolute perdition of the world) must necessarily be developed to a point at which this self-utterance of God appears as addressed to the world irreversibly (as 'effective' and not merely 'sufficient' grace for the world in its power to lay hold of this grace in the dimension of history), and at which it is freely accepted as such. Further a christology of this kind in terms of transcendental theology would of course have to do something more than to enable men to understand that the event of God's self-communication as posited in history and as made irreversible on the one hand, and the definitive acceptance of this on humanity's part on the other, implicitly expresses in the unity of both these aspects precisely what the classic doctrine of the hypostatic union, on any right understanding of this, is intended to convey. Over and above this this transcendental christology would also have to enable men to understand how the endowment of the world as a whole with grace and the hypostatic union constitute the necessary unity of a mutually conditioning [97] relationship, how, in other words a supralapsarian christology and a universal christocentricity are the necessary postulates for any christology to be credible today. Such a christology would also have to enable men to understand, likewise in terms of transcendental theology, why a hypostatic union exists only in a single instance, and how this fact does not mean that the universal God-manhood inherent in the spiritual creature as such is not in some sense degraded to a secondary category such that in and for itself it could conceivably be surpassed.

Secondly, the christology of transcendental theology would also have to develop what might be called the 'christology of awareness' (understanding this term in the right sense) such that the hypostatic union of the Logos with the human reality would be described not merely in the ontic categories of the traditional theology of the hypostatic union, but actually with concepts that are onto-logical in the true sense. In other words it would have to be made intelligible why and how the human being in the transcendentality of its constitution as such is the 'potentia obedientialis' for the hypostatic union. Then this would no longer appear merely as a unity between two substances conceived of on the analogy of material things, between the hypostasis of the Logos on the one hand and a creaturely substance on the other, thought of in material terms, for this kind of unity could just as well have been achieved with a sub-spiritual substantial reality as with the Logos as it exists in itself. But in the 'christology of awareness' of which we are thinking here we could then go on to give an account of the interior grace with which the human reality of Jesus is endowed such that this no longer appears as a 'fitting' equipment bestowed upon the human nature hypostatically assumed by the Logos, but rather as something which was already present as a matter of ontological necessity in the hypostatic union itself. Once this 'in itself' was understood ontologically, in terms of a transcendental christology, this point would become clear. Admittedly what we would be presupposing in all these considerations would be an understanding of the fact that spirit and spiritual quality in their true and original essence are not secondary epiphenomena added onto a substantiality conceived of in material terms, but rather constitute the authentic existence of a being as such (here we are not treating of the negativity of matter as such) and so too the constitution of an existing entity as a being can be expressed in its ultimate and radical reality by means of the concepts of a transcendental ontology. All this is of course merely to indicate in barest outline the task of a christology worked out in terms of transcendental theology.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Probably too (if we may mention one further and final example) [98] something like an eschatology of transcendental theology would have to be developed, and only by means of this would it be possible for the man of today so to transpose the dogmatic statements of eschatology (which right down to the present day still remain stuck fast in the imagery of a vanished world of ideas), and that too at a radical level, and not merely through subsequent re-touching undertaken only with reluctance, that these statements really would be intelligible and credible. An interpretation of these eschatological statements in terms of transcendental theology, therefore, is both conceivable and necessary for the very reason that the eschatological statements of scripture and tradition certainly do not constitute any anticipated descriptions, as though by an inspired journalist, of God and in the light of that which will one day come to pass. Rather they are anticipations of final consummation based upon that which, considered as God's deed of salvation, is already present, or which implies simply and precisely a state of radical openness to an absolute future the nature of which cannot be calculated beforehand. An interpretation of eschatological statements in terms of transcendental theology is also demanded for the very reason that that final and definitive salvation which finds expression in eschatology precisely does not signify any secondary and departmentalized specification of man on the basis of, and within the framework of the human possibilities which he already experiences, but rather the radically transformed reality of man as one and whole who, as subject to time and in process of dying, is utterly incapable of conceiving his salvation as the outcome of this reality of his as he experiences it empirically within the framework of human existence. If therefore eschatological statements about the salvation of man as understood here are still to be possible at all, they can only be formulated in the concepts proper to a transcendental ontology, i.e. as statements about a force inherent in man (remaining at a very abstract level) in his 'body-spirit' nature considered as transcendentally necessary and as the radical and ultimate realization of this achieved through the self-communication of God (this remains true however legitimate it may be to retain the imagery of apocalyptic language which also still has a significance of its own for metaphysical concepts, since these too can be conceived of only in a 'conversio ad phantasma'). Until that end has come in which history is consummated, in which that consummation does not consist simply in its own reality, all eschatological statements are simply propositions which on the one hand express the fact that man, as he who exists in grace through God's self-communication and so precisely as historical, will one day achieve his consummation, and which on the other hand guard [99] against any filling out of this hope and this anticipation in more concrete terms, seeing that the future to which it points is absolute and inconceivable, which is God himself and which can only be laid hold of in an act of freedom which is itself intelligible only if, and when it is actually achieved. The dissatisfaction which is so generally felt with the existing state of traditional eschatology could be removed by an eschatology expressed in terms of transcendental theology, if this eschatology conceived of man as a being destined to an absolute future in a transcendental

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

anthropology which included within its purview the self-communication of God to man.

In concluding this lecture the following further point may be made: it is of the utmost concern to theology to recognize the limitations which transcendental philosophy imposes on itself by the nature of its 'own' proper work. If a transcendental philosophy were to present itself simply in the absolute as the exclusive basis, without any further presuppositions, of human existence in, the concrete, if it were to lay claim solely and exclusively to express that which is 'necessary' for this human existence and in this sense salvific, then, any 'positive' revelatory religion based on a saving history which as such affects the existence of man as a whole (in other words salvation itself) would be impossible from the outset. This limitation of itself on the part of transcendental philosophy (as the outcome of reflecting upon the historicity of human life, something which cannot be thematized systematically, or on the nature of dialogue, language, and hermeneutical experience) is itself an essential element in any true transcendental philosophy. Without this self-restriction philosophy would fall into the error of hybris and the crudity of claiming to solve all things in terms of reflective thought. If this self-restriction were not the work of philosophy itself this would lay claim to be able of its own nature to enquire into everything, and would thereby destroy itself. This self-restriction which man's transcendental understanding of himself imposes upon itself is, however, at the same time (in principle, and above all in the current situation of philosophy and theology) a task of fundamental theology. For this must show proof of the positive possibility of a saving history and revelation – that history as such and in the concrete, and not as susceptible of analysis by reflective thought, affects man in his ultimate and essential nature as subject. In other words that it is capable of being either saving history or the history of perdition. But when fundamental theology exercises this function it ipso facto constitutes transcendental theology: the act of consciously reflecting upon the fact that the creaturely subject as such is of its very nature rooted in that [100] history which is precisely that of the subjectivity most proper to its own nature as such. The self-communication of God in grace in virtue of God's universal will to save all men is certainly (initially at least in the form of something offered) a transcendental existential modality of man. But it achieves the fulness of its own nature precisely in the history of salvation and revelation (both at the individual and collective levels), and in this history as that which mediates it comes to its own realization and to us. The metaphysical nature of a reality and the history belonging to it, and therefore grace considered as an existential modality on the one hand, and the history of salvation and revelation on the other, are not merely entities existing concomitantly with one another. Rather they mutually condition one another, and this is something which must be shown precisely in terms of a transcendental theology. This means that transcendental theology neither can nor will constitute theology as such, but is rather an element in it, because theology (or better and more precisely faith, the element of reflective thought inherent in this, and the elements which are ultimately incapable of being reflected upon in it which theology has to consider) are always intended to express that which is concrete and historical in its irreducibility, and in this must precisely render intelligible the fact that this concrete element in history can really affect man at the ultimate level of his existence and his subjectivity. The significance in terms of concrete human living (i.e. as affecting the whole of man in his salvation) of historical facts is something which man is quite incapable of rendering intelligible without transcendental theology. This is so for the very reason that the knowledge of the factuality of such saving events cannot be achieved merely a posteriori. If they are intended to affect man as such, man himself must achieve contact with himself as a whole. In other words he must discover that he is, of his very nature, orientated to them. Insofar as he recognizes their bearing upon himself he engages in transcendental theology. Reflection upon the transcendental reference of man to these saving events is not rendered impossible by their historicity or the fact that they are freely posited, by their a posteriori

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

character, or by their factuality as freely posited by God. For that which is initially and in the truest sense freely posited by God is precisely the enduring and supernatural existential modality of grace considered as the offering of God's self-communication – in other words a transcendental state in which man is constituted. And this free grace, considered as a transcendental determination of man, has a history of its own in that which we call the history of salvation and revelation, which it is quite impossible to conceive of precisely as such without this a priori possibility on man's part.

[101] Now it is this that is the object of consideration for transcendental theology.

III

A single phrase could be used, a title to sum up the theme of this third lecture: reductio in mysterium. Obviously such a theme does also constitute a special area of subject-matter in theology. At the same time, however, and over and above this, it also expresses a methodological pointer for the theologian, serving to warn him against falling into a certain kind of illusion, at least so far as theology is concerned. This is the illusion that the mystery of reality as such is merely that part of it which still remains obscure for the time being even though in principle it is comprehensible, a part, therefore, which is constantly being diminished as the various branches of science advance, and which is destined ultimately to disappear completely at least in the 'visio beatifica'. Now this illusion, this radical misunderstanding of himself on man's part, is de facto constantly asserting itself again and again in theology, and for this reason when we come to speak of the reductio in mysterium of all theological proposition which takes place in theology, this also constitutes a methodological guide which is of fundamental importance. Precisely today it is of the utmost importance that we shall understand the significance which theology has as reductio in mysterium, i.e. we must understand that this reductio constitutes not a regrettable imperfection in theology, but rather that which is most proper to it of its very nature. Theology must be bold enough to make it clear to modern man that this reductio in mysterium is its positive distinguishing characteristic and at the same time the task most proper to it – something, in fact which arises as a matter of transcendental necessity from the very nature of man himself. If theology fails to do this, then in an age which sets a premium upon scientific knowledge, men will inevitably receive the impression that theology is the mere external facade for an intellectual discipline which increasingly dissolves and frees itself from theology itself. It is all too easy for modern man to receive the impression that theology supplies answers of a mythological kind or otherwise unscientific answers to questions which either have no communicable meaning or which in reality will only be answered by the sciences of the day. It is all too easy for modern man to receive the impression that theology is a mere interweaving of ideas which are, of their nature, incapable of any verification, which remain at the level of poetical concepts and can still be upheld, at most, simply by pointing with a certain arbitrariness to those dark and subconscious levels in man [102] which have not yet been illumined by the anthropological sciences and so, for the time being, are not yet really capable of being used in any constructive system of thought. Now in reply to such an attitude on the part of modern man what can the theology of faith say when it sets itself resolutely to stand and to make a direct counter-attack upon this attitude, i.e. when it manifests its position with the utmost conscious rationality of which it is capable as a transcendental discipline? It can only assert that this reference to the absolute mystery which it involves is in fact the condition which makes all the perceptions available to the human reason possible. It can only point out that 'mystery' is not merely another word for that which for the time being has not yet been comprehended and perceived, that it is both

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

possible and meaningful explicitly to come to terms with mystery as such and in itself, so that we precisely do not have to say with Wittgenstein that we should simply be silent about anything concerning which we cannot speak clearly. Theology then is to be understood as the 'science' of mystery as such (though admittedly it is this as sustained by that proximity of this mystery to man which is designated by Christians as grace etc.). Furthermore the only chance which theology has of providing for the future is for it to show itself openly and with the utmost resolution true to its own nature in this sense, and for it to refuse to conceal its true nature for fear of modern man's opinion. And if all this is true, then theology must not forget this nature which it has in the manner in which it is practised from day to day among the theologians themselves either. It must understand itself not as that science which develops itself more and more in a systematic drawing of distinctions down to the last possible detail, but rather as that human activity in which man, even at the level of conscious thought, relates the multiplicity of the realities, experiences, and ideas in his life to that mystery, ineffable and obscure, which we call God. How strange it is in fact! We are accustomed to understand the history of revelation and dogma according to the conceptual model of a logically developing system in which ever finer distinctions are drawn. There may be some element of truth in this, and it may be that those phases in the history of dogma and theology which now lie behind us can to a large extent be rendered comprehensible in terms of a conceptual model of this kind. After all even Thomas Aquinas regarded the true nature of theology as consisting in a progressive exposition in terms of concepts of this kind, and the same idea still dominates the modern interpretation of the history of theology. And yet the question may be asked whether it really does constitute the basic principle of development of the history of dogma and theology as such, or merely that [103] of one specific epoch in it, and one which, even though it has lasted for almost two thousand years, is in our own days drawing to its close. And further, is it not possible to understand even the history of dogma and theology up to the present as a reductio in mysterium constantly renewed, constantly made more radical, of all theological statements, so that precisely the believer actively engaged in theology knows better than anyone else that every theological statement is only truly and authentically such at that point at which man willingly suffers it to extend beyond his comprehension into the silent mystery of God?

First an attempt must be made very briefly to say something about mystery as such, before we undertake the further attempt to understand theology itself as reductio in mysterium (in all this it is, of course, self-evident that theology as such constitutes such a reductio in mysterium only in a derived sense, since the original act by which man surrenders himself to the mystery is as such the act of faith). Again in defining what mystery means the declarations of the Church's magisterium, and still more the general tendency in theological thinking, take as their basis that which is not mystery at all. Thus mystery is made to appear in a purely negative guise as that which has not been comprehended, that which can only with difficulty avoid giving the impression of being contradictory, and yet at the same time that which is destined to be illumined for man too one day, and as mystery to be dissolved at latest in the 'visio beatifica', or perhaps only at that stage. Mystery is restricted almost inadvertently to a pilgrim mode of existence here below. Thus mystery is presented under a merely negative aspect. In comparison with that which man can comprehend that which he recognizes as mystery may be in its own objective reality for the most part or even always of greater importance for his salvation. But even so the very fact that he is still aware of it precisely as mystery makes his present knowledge of it negative by comparison with any other knowledge which he has, and still more by comparison with knowledge of this mysterious entity in itself, for he thinks of this as in principle possible and as something that he will later attain to, so that then this knowledge will itself dissolve the element of mystery in his earlier knowledge and in the entity that was mysterious in itself. The measure and ideal

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation of knowledge that is applied to knowledge of mystery is that which comprehends and thoroughly sees into the object known.

In reality, however, this is not the case. The concept of mystery that is commonly accepted is false, or at any rate superficial. This is implied even by the dogmatic teaching of the abiding and essential incomprehensibility of God, which is not eliminated even in the 'visio beatifica', but on [104] the contrary is borne in upon us in its most radical, most infinite, and most blessed form precisely there. In this statement the word 'blessed' needs special emphasis. For manifestly the incomprehensibility of God as made immediately present to the creature signifies not the limit, the mere borderline showing the finitude of the beatific vision of God. Rather it is a positive element in this vision in itself, because clearly man can achieve the truest fulfilment of his own nature at that point, and only at that point, at which he reaches beyond himself and oversteps the limitations of his own knowledge, being definitely drawn out of himself and ecstatically attaining to the incomprehensibility of God as such, which we only truly grasp in its immediacy when it is accepted by us as that which abidingly blesses us. This in itself is sufficient to reveal every kind of comprehensive knowledge for what it really is: the knowledge appropriate to a finite reality considered as that which is provisional, part of our pilgrim mode of existence, not bestowing any blessing upon us. The dogma of the incomprehensibility of God is in itself enough to show that comprehensive knowledge is a deficient mode of knowing when measured by that knowledge which is beyond all doubt the highest, the most intensive, and that which bestows the deepest blessing upon us, that which takes place in the immediate vision of the incomprehensibility of God.

Now the same conclusion which we have been able to demonstrate on the basis of a direct dogmatic datum can also be arrived at by approaching the question rather from the standpoint of the philosophy of transcendentality. Man is the subject of a transcendentality that is limitless. As such he apprehends each of the objects of his knowledge and freedom in a prior awareness, itself not contained within any finite limits, of the original and infinite unity of all possible objects. Yet at the same time man as subject in this sense of a transcendence that is limitless must not, even as such, be understood as the absolute subject, for this would be God. Now if this is true then the condition which makes any individual act of cognition possible is this prior awareness of that horizon of all knowledge and freedom which is absolute. In other words it is that which, while not simply identical with the knowing subject, is the condition which makes any act of cognition on his part possible. It can never be known in the same way as the individual objects of cognition which are rendered intelligible and comprehensible precisely in virtue of the fact that they fall within the ambience of this horizon of all knowledge. This horizon, then, which makes knowledge possible within its ambience, this ultimate point of reference towards which all knowledge tends, is itself radically beyond all comprehension, and its incomprehensibility is such that it is not [105] removed even when, in accordance with the Christian doctrine of the 'finitum' considered as 'capax infiniti', the absolutely original cause and the ultimate goal of this transcendental awareness, prior to all knowledge, actually imparts itself directly to man. Indeed it is precisely at this moment that this first cause and ultimate goal really manifests itself as incomprehensible in the most radical sense. Thus the mysterium reveals itself as the condition which makes it possible for us to know that which is not mysterious. The relationship in which man stands to the mysterium is a primary and an ultimate datum of his own nature and his mode of existence, one of which, in his transcendence, he is constantly aware, though not as the object of his conscious' thought, and one which cannot be deduced from any other datum as a secondary phenomenon. The mysterium, therefore, is that which alone is genuinely self-evident, and for that very reason that too which can always be overlooked and misinterpreted as a negative phenomenon belonging to the periphery of human living.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Taking the concept of the mysterium in the sense in which we have presented it here (though admittedly we have only given a brief indication of what we mean by it) we can now begin to understand the nature of theology as reductio in mysterium. The fact that Christian theology has to do with mysteries (in the plural) is something that this theology itself regards as immediately obvious. Moreover this point has been formulated still more explicitly and precisely in the official teaching of the Church by Pius IX and the First Vatican Council in answer to a kind of rationalism which had come to regard every theology of revelation involving faith as constituting merely the prelude to a philosophical vision. In this official teaching of the Church, however, these mysteries as such continued to be viewed in their relationship to the situation of man as pilgrim, and hardly any attempt was made to bring this teaching about the mystery explicitly into connection with the eternal and abiding incomprehensibility of God. And even abstracting from this point, no consideration was ever given to the strangeness of the fact that the mysteries of faith as such should be manifold. The question of whether in fact there could be many real mysteries in the strictest sense of the term such that they were really distinct from one another was hardly touched upon, if indeed it was adverted to at all. It seemed more or less obvious that this question would have to be answered in the affirmative in view of the many mysteries with which theology de facto has to deal. And yet it is perfectly possible to lay down the following thesis: there is, and there can be, only one single absolute mystery in the strictest sense of the term, namely God himself and in relation to him all those aspects under which man with his finite [106] knowledge has to conceive of God to himself are specified in the same manner by this character of the mysterium. The thesis can also be formulated negatively: a finite being as such can never be a mysterium in the strict sense of the term, but is, of its very essence, merely that which has not yet been fully understood. On any correct ontology of the relationship between being and knowledge, which ultimately speaking consists in the confrontation of a being with itself, it belongs to every finite being necessarily and of its very nature that it should be endowed with a kind of cognition appropriate to itself such that for its own cognitive powers this being cannot be a mystery to itself (apart from its radical orientation to the one mystery which is God). The reason for this is that this mode of cognition is either simply identical with the being concerned or, in virtue of its unlimited transcendentality, it offers every finite being sufficient scope for it itself to be understood within this. Every finite being, therefore, as such, and in its very nature as positive is (abstracting from its intrinsic reference to God) non-mysterious. For this reason it also constitutes as such a mere object for the sciences to investigate to the extent that these are different from theology. Just as all worldly realities are withdrawn from the sphere of the numinous through recognition of the fact that they have been created and are different from God, so too they must in themselves also be removed from the sphere of any ideologizing, i.e. they must be radically submitted to the control of the sciences in the knowledge that no being accessible to the categories of human cognition can be mysterious, unfathomable or obscure. It cannot be this except of course through and in its reference to the incomprehensible horizon of all apprehension in terms of human categories, namely God. Now this reference of which we have just been speaking (and it is this alone that renders the particular being mysterious and at the same time non-mysterious in that special ‘quiddity’ which is proper to it in itself) can be a twofold one: the reference to God as remote and the reference to God as making himself near by an act of self-bestowal. It is the first of these two aspects that constitutes the element of mystery inherent in the world and in worldly knowledge. The second ultimately speaking constitutes (a point which we still have to develop) the whole content of the Christian mysteries.

In the light of this it is in a true sense clear that theology cannot contain as many mysteries as one wishes to ascribe to it. Basically speaking there can only be one mystery: God as he is

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in himself. This means that theology has the task of reducing the mysteries which manifest themselves, or appear to manifest themselves in it to this single mystery, in order thereby [107] to avoid the danger of invoking mysteries in those areas in which all that is really needed is a more penetrating consideration, or perhaps even the 'de-mystification' in some respect of a given proposition of theology. Now this process of reducing the many mysteries in theology to the single mystery which is God is not particularly difficult. The fact that God in and for himself constitutes mystery in the strictest sense of the term and eternally – even, therefore in the 'visio beatifica' – this is a point that needs no further explanation here. Insofar as there are propositions in theology over and above this which do constitute mystery in the strict sense, this can only mean two things: on the one hand, in accordance with what we have said, they must refer to God himself, while on the other, in order for them not simply to be identical with the mystery thus mentioned, even formally speaking so far as we are concerned, they must signify God himself in his reference to us. This reference cannot simply be that which is constituted by the relationship in which God stands to the world and the individual elements in this as their creator. For abstracting from the scholastic principle that as creator God has no real relationship to the world, and that it is only the world that has the relationship to him, the content of this relationship, over and above the element of mystery in it deriving from its single point of reference, God, would be identical with the reality of the creature itself, and therefore in principle no true mystery at all. The relationship of God to the world in which God is mystery, therefore, can only consist in the fact that it is constituted by God himself and not by any created reality distinct from himself. In other words this means that over and above his 'intrinsic' status as mystery, God can be mystery only in virtue of a quasi-formal causality in which he makes not some entity different from himself, but rather himself (in his freedom and abiding sovereignty) the specification of the creature. Let us put the same point in a different way: over and above the mystery intrinsic to his own nature God can only be a mystery in virtue of his self-bestowal, in which that which is bestowed is formally speaking God himself as mystery. Probably there is no need to spend any further time in demonstrating the point that here we have arrived at the key mysteries which are pointed to in traditional theology. For in the very meaning of this concept of God's self-bestowal both that which is designated as the hypostatic union is signified and at the same time that which is referred to as supernatural grace and 'visio beatifica'. The reason is that in both of these what takes place is truly one and the same act of self-bestowal on God's part, an act which cannot be subsumed with other acts under the concept of the power of God's efficient causality as creator. This means that we are in a [108] position to make the following assertion: That mystery which Christian faith acknowledges consists in the sheer fact that the absolute reality of God himself (of course understanding this as personal, loving, and grace-giving) cannot only achieve a creative confrontation with that which is other to itself, but actually wills to commit itself to, and bestow itself upon this. Then, from the point of view of the creature we can go on to say: the mystery here consists in the fact that it truly is, in the radical sense already referred to, 'capax infiniti'.

In order to clarify still further this unity which belongs to the one mystery, we would have to go on from this point to work out in detail the unity and the mutually conditioning relationship between the Incarnation and the process by which the world is assimilated to God by grace, a development which we cannot undertake at this point. We may say here, however, that both of these factors constitute the free act of God, yet that at basis they constitute only one single object of the exercise of his freedom as such. Here then we have a theology of the one mystery of God's self-bestowal upon the world with its two mutually conditioning aspects of Incarnation and grace. Now if it is clear what is meant by this theology then the mystery of the Trinity is ipso facto given in such a theology and rendered intelligible as mystery. All that has to be done -and that too precisely on the basis of the concept of God's self-bestowal is to show that the Trinity as present in the economy of salvation through the two 'missiones' (of grace and the Incarnation) necessarily embodies also the Trinity as immanent.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Once the two central mysteries of Christianity are recognized as constituting the single mystery of God's self-bestowal upon the world, then we might go on to ask in more precise terms whether other mysteries apart from these do not arise in dogmatic theology such that on the one hand they cannot be subsumed under the one mystery of the self-bestowal of the absolute mystery which is God, while on the other they can justifiably be claimed to be absolute mysteries in the true sense. In my opinion we can unhesitatingly answer this question in the negative. This opinion is based not only on a priori considerations put forward above, but also on certain a posteriori considerations in which the assertions of dogmatic theology are put to the test to see whether they can justifiably be claimed to be mysteries in the true sense without constituting an element in the mystery of God's self-bestowal and coming to be recognized as such. At most the question might be raised whether the character of mystery is not so unambiguously ascribed by tradition to transubstantiation that in this particular case we have to recognize a mystery in the strictest sense, and [109] one that is supplementary to and distinct from the mystery of God's self-bestowal. But surely we can at least leave this question open, for it can at least be asked whether on the one hand tradition does not cling to an exaggeratedly 'physical' understanding of this mystery, and on the other whether we do not have to regard the real presence of Christ as so closely bound up with the mystery of the Incarnation that from the outset it is only possible to conceive of any transubstantiation at all insofar as it is related to the reality of Christ in general. Here we have only been able to indicate the considerations which we feel to be relevant, yet precisely on the basis of these transubstantiation does nevertheless seem not to tell against our general thesis, namely that there is only one single mystery in the strict sense, that of God's self-bestowal by which he extends himself into the dimension of that which is most interior to existence (Spirit) and into the dimension of the history of man (Incarnation).

Now to reduce the actual statements of revelation in this way to the one single mystery has a further significance beyond that which it has for the development of a distinctive theological system as such. The true significance of this reductio in unum mysterium is to be found elsewhere. We are taking as our starting-point the intrinsic unity and the mutually conditioning relationship between Incarnation and the grace by which the world is assimilated to God, and we are not overlooking the fact that of his very nature as a historical being man necessarily seeks for the concrete historical manifestation of that which he is as a transcendental being in his own history. This is because history is precisely that process in which the fulness of his own transcendental being is progressively made over to him. On the basis of all this, then, we can here concentrate upon the process by which man is endowed with grace and so assimilated to God without thereby losing sight of the single mystery of salvation in its totality. But on this basis we are compelled to state the matter as follows: that supernatural grace which has supernaturally orientated the transcendentality of man to the immediacy of God must not be conceived of merely as a material addition or supplement such that the only kind of knowledge which can be had of it is that which comes through indoctrination from without. Rather it is something of which man himself must necessarily be aware, even though he does not consciously objectify it to himself. Now if and to the extent that this is true it follows that the totality of the message of the Christian faith is in a real sense already given in a transcendental experience. This does not of course make the history of revelation or the act of bearing witness to the faith, which comes from hearing, superfluous. It is precisely this history of revelation and history of faith at the social [110] level that constitutes the historical process by which this grace-given transcendental experience, constituted and upheld as it is by the self-bestowal of God, is brought to the stage

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of self-realization. It is precisely in order to arrive at the most ultimate and transcendental dimension of his own nature that man is orientated towards his own history at both the individual and collective levels. But precisely as such this is the history of his own transcendental nature itself. Hence it is that revelation as the transcendental experience of grace and revelation as history do not mutually contradict one another but rather are the mutually conditioning elements in one and the same event. In this sense, then, theology constitutes the reductio in mysterium and in fact in unum mysterium. But this still does not mean that what we are treating of here is merely a process of unifying and systematizing at the conceptual level the various dogmatic statements in which revelation is expressed. Equally, and in a more basic sense, we are concerned with the attempt to interpret all these various statements as a summons to that ultimate and transcendental experience of grace which is implicit in all these statements and which signifies the ultimate verification of them all.

What is meant by this is already to be perceived in scripture itself. For theologians scripture is indeed the absolute norm. But it is this not because the revelation imparted by God takes place originally and for the first time in these human statements as such, but rather because in them the original experience of the Spirit and of its eschatological address to man in Jesus Christ has been objectified in a form which has abiding validity and with a purely normative force. Measured by this original experience scripture is in itself theology, albeit at the normative level, and even though obviously an original and basic experience of this kind never takes place without some kind of conceptual objectivation in terms of human categories. Thus the task of theology must precisely be to appeal in all the various conceptual forms in which it is objectified, to this basic experience of grace, to bring man again and again to a fresh recognition of the fact that all this immense sum of distinct statements of the Christian faith basically speaking expresses nothing else than an immense truth, even though one that has been explicitated throughout all the levels of man's being; the truth namely that the absolute mystery that is, that permeates all things, upholds all things, and endures eternally, has bestowed itself as itself in an act of forgiving love upon man, and is experienced in faith in that ineffable experience of grace as the ultimate freedom of man. So long as theology remains stuck fast at the merely conceptual level – however necessary this may be in itself – it has failed in its true [111] mission. And if we seek to take refuge in the consoling thought that after all the statements of theology still speak constantly of God, and therefore of mystery, then it must be rejoined that this alone is not enough to avoid the danger of sticking fast in this sense. It is not only the 'fides quae' that must come to terms with God as mystery, but also the 'fides qua'. The act of faith as such in itself, and not merely its conceptual objectifications, must in some sense come to terms with the mystery as such. For this too theology (considered as a whole) should offer guidance and direction. It should constitute a 'mystagogia' leading men to the experience of grace, and should not merely speak of grace as of a material subject which is present in man's life solely through the conceptions which he formulates of it. Theology as science must certainly not be confused with kerygma, with parenesis, with the immediate utterance of the Spirit. But at the same time it must not forget either, as it all too often does, that it derives from the utterance of the Spirit and has to serve it. For unless this utterance of the Spirit and the theology deriving from it are related to the ultimate experience of the Spirit in the life of man they lose their distinctive subject-matter altogether.

This task of theology, then, can be defined as a reductio in unum mysterium, and that too in terms of its own subject-matter and in the concrete circumstances in which it is currently formulated. From this very many consequences can be drawn for the practice of theology today. Here we can mention only very few of these, which we have selected at random. The propositions of theology must constantly be referred back to the single indefinable mystery

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and the ultimate and grace-given experience of this. In fact all of them express, ultimately speaking, nothing else than the fact that this mystery has imparted itself so as to achieve a state of absolute proximity to man, in which it becomes his authentic consummation and the future that lies before him. The process by which the connection between these propositions and the mystery itself is firmly established belongs to the true nature of theology as such, and this ultimately speaking constitutes the true difference between these propositions and those pertaining to the secular sphere. For these latter too do indeed express realities related to God, but in what they express the actual mystery remains unaffected and still more fails to reveal the reference latent in them to the immediacy of God. This, however, is not to deny, but on the contrary once more to reiterate, that the statements of theology are different from that which they point to, even though the difference here is not self-evident, as it is in the case of statements belonging to the secular sphere. This means that theological statements have a special and [112] peculiar theological relativity of their own, i.e. their radical reference to that which infinitely transcends them, such that without this reference they become meaningless. Now this distinctive relativity in theological statements is something constantly to be enquired into anew in a peculiar and special form of dialectic. It is one that cannot be replaced by an attitude of silent adoration, by a 'theologia meditativa' which effectively reduces itself to silence. Nor can we express these statements in a form which suggests that the actual formulation of them in human words is the ultimate goal at which we are aiming. Rather it is the attitude of trembling and silent adoration which is intended to beget these statements, and this belongs to that deathly silence in which man's lips are sealed with Christ's in death. It is, therefore, a very difficult task with which theology has to cope in these statements. They must be expressed in words in order that we can arrive at the authentic silence which we need. They must be borne with in patience and hope in respect both of their necessity and of their incommensurability, in which they attempt to utter the ineffable. I believe that theology today has still very much to learn before it speaks in such a manner that men can achieve a direct, effective, and clear recognition of the special quality of this language.

It always remains true, then, that theological statements only authentically become such in a process in which they reach out to a point radically beyond themselves. And if this is true, then, so it seems to me, we in the Church could often show ourselves far more favourable and tolerant with regard to those statements which we may be tempted to qualify as 'heresies' on the grounds that they seem so inappropriate to the reality they express. This applies both to ourselves and to a magisterium in the Church which may be excessively self-confident in the manner in which it does its work. Of course the Church has a right and a duty to reject certain theological statements as irreconcilable with her own conviction of her faith. And indeed properly speaking anyone who is suspected of 'heresy' in this way should not be so very resentful that his statement has been rejected provided that in this statement of his he too really has arrived at the reductio in mysterium without which his statement certainly would be a heresy. This reductio is certainly neither prohibited nor rendered impossible by the fact that his statement has been subjected to censure. The situation today is that every statement of the Church's magisterium includes an element of regulating the actual language of theology, something which, fundamentally speaking, has nothing to do with the actual reality in itself. Moreover our position today is quite different from that of earlier times. Today we have to take into account a situation in which [113] on the one hand loyal believers and adherents of the Church, with the best will in the world, cannot come to terms with specific statements of the official teaching of the Church, while on the other they have not de facto simply arrived at an interpretation of such statements of their own such as could find acceptance on the part of the teaching authority of the Church. Now in this situation it is surely justifiable and necessary for the Church's magisterium to show more patience and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

prudence than it probably brought to bear in practice in earlier times in many cases in which its authority was exercised. We must really and effectively practise theology on the basis of a reductio in mysterium in terms of its material content and of the actual concrete circumstances in which we practise it. We must genuinely, effectively, and radically realize the incommensurability of our own theological formulations, a point which in itself is self-evident. And if we do this, then, so I believe, we will very often find it possible to be more modest in presenting our own theology and more indulgent in considering that of others which we are tempted to qualify as heretical. Certainly we cannot hasten at will the gradual advance of history. But did not individuals on both sides already find it possible, even at the time of the Reformation, to perceive that the really fundamental positions of both sides with regard to justification, scripture, faith, etc. certainly did not positively contradict one another, a fact which today is, after all, conceded by both sides? I believe that in a theology which genuinely and effectively, and not merely verbally, realized its own nature as reductio in mysterium we of today could in many cases be more patient with so-called 'heresies', of course always with the proviso that the theology suspected by anyone of being heresy is intended in itself to be a reductio in mysterium. In fact in the theology put forward by many individuals this actually has been achieved with a notable degree of effectiveness. The theology in question must not merely be a superficial rationalism intended to preserve the individual from having to commit himself to the unfathomable depths of the mystery. And of course a further proviso must be that a theology which is 'under suspicion' in this sense must itself not represent any schismatic tendency, any attitude of arrogance in which it refuses to pay heed to the formulations of traditional theology. Rather it must in a right manner and in the right place pay due heed to the prescriptions with regard to language put forward and maintained for theology by the Church's magisterium in order to preserve the unity of the Church's own creed. With these provisos, however, we of today both can and should show ourselves generous, patient, and tolerant with regard to theological statements which do not immediately strike us as being [114] 'orthodox'. We should adopt this attitude in view of the fact that the pluralism among the theologies of today is too great for us to control or comprehend. Moreover we ourselves should have a little trust in the power of the reality itself which is being referred to, i.e. in the one single mystery of the proximity of the incomprehensible God who sets all things free to come to himself and to be drawn into his infinitude.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[115]

4

THE NEW CLAIMS WHICH PASTORAL THEOLOGY MAKES UPON THEOLOGY AS A WHOLE

There can no longer be any doubt that pastoral theology, at least on the radical view taken of it at the Second Vatican Council,[1] and especially in the formation of future priests, has achieved a far higher status among the theological disciplines and a greater importance than it [116] formerly possessed.[2] Pastoral theology is a relatively young discipline.[3] It derives from the age of the Second Empire, and for this reason has, up to very recent times, really been able to exercise any effective influence only in the central European sphere.[4] According to the document 'Optatam totius' of the Second Vatican Council, however, it should not only be one distinct discipline among other special branches of theology, but should be accorded a role in the shaping of theological studies as a whole and should permeate them throughout their whole extent.[5] So far not much progress has been made in the fulfilment of this task in the Church, however, and it is rendered particularly difficult by the fact that among the theologians and those responsible for arranging the programmes of theological studies there

---

[1] The pastoral task laid upon the Council from the outset was repeatedly given expression, and also formulated in programmatic terms by John XXIII; 'Neque opus nostrum, quasi ad finem primarium, eo spectat, ut de quibusdam capitibus praecipuis doctrinae ecclesiasticae disceptetur, adque fusius repetantur ea, quae Patres ac theologi veteres et recentiores tradiderunt . . . Etenim ad huius modi tantum disputationes habendas non opus erat, ut concilium oecumenicum indiceretur . . . oportet ut haec doctrina certa et immutabilis cui fidele obsequium est praestandum, ea ratione pervestigetur et exponatur, quam tempora postulant nostra . . . scilicet eae induendae erunt rationes res exponendi, quae cum magisterio, cuius indoles praesertim pastoralis est, magis congruant', AAS 54 (1962), 791-793.

However obvious this exhortation may seem – for nothing is more obvious than to preach the faith according to the particular needs of the day – there are certain problems of scientific theory which underlie it and which must now be coped with, and certainly these were not presented to the Counci1 in their full difficulty. Yet they did find expression with all the clarity that could be desired even within the Council and, as it appears, with unprecedented acuteness in the official sphere. This was in the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World. The sustained conflict which took place over the various forms of the text between the rival claims of dogmatic content and understanding of the contemporary situation must here be regarded as particularly symptomatic. On this cf. Ch. Möller, 'Die Geschichte der Pastoralkonstitution', LTK Suppl. Vol. III (revised and expanded, Freiburg, 1968), pp. 242 ff.

On the problems referred to here cf. J. B. Mets (ed.), Weltverständnis in Glauben (Mainz, 1965); K. Rahner, 'On the Theological Problems Entailed in a "Pastoral Constitution" ', Theological Investigations X (London and New York), pp. 293-318; idem, 'The Church and The World', Sacramentum Mundi I (1968), pp. 325-327; E. Schillebeeckx, 'Kirche, Lehramt und Politik', Gott – die Zukunft des Menschen (Mainz, 1969), pp. 119-141.

These unsolved problems appeared in a still more acute, and apparently still more intractable form in the post-conciliar situation. But the true task of pastoral theology, to which it is urgently summoned at the present moment, is for the Church both at the universal and the individual levels, to develop a strategy which gives a precise theological formulation to, and at the same time advances further, the contemporary situation.

On the efforts which have been made in recent times to recognize these problems and (at least incipiently) to find a way of overcoming them, cf. n. 7.

[2] cf. 'Optatam totius', No. 16-21. Here too it is emphasized that formation in pastoral theology must equally include practical exercises within its scope. We shall not be entering any further into this question in the present study, because it is concerned with formation in pastoral theology as such and not directly with the 'demands' which pastoral theology makes upon theology as a whole.

[3] On the history of pastoral theology cf. especially H. Schuster, Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie I (Freiburg, 1964), pp. 40-92.

[4] What we mean is a scientific pastoral theology as a theological discipline in the true sense, and not as a practical introduction to catechesis, preaching, and practical work in the confessional ('casus conscientiae') etc.

[5] cf. No. 19

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

is, and has been, a total lack of unanimity as to what the essence of pastoral theology actually consists in. This appears from the history of pastoral theology and the considerations of the specialist theologians as to its true nature. It is true that Anton Graf, the theologian of Tübingen (1811-1867) developed an idea of pastoral theology which has only been taken up once more in very recent times.[6] But apart from this the average idea which prevailed in the nineteenth and in the first half of the twentieth centuries amounted to saying that pastoral theology (insofar as it was accorded the status of an intellectual discipline at all) consisted of a collection of practical instructions for the cure of souls such as chaplains and parish priests (and apart from these [117] at most only the 'spiritual directors' in the confessional) have to exercise. It is not surprising, then, that a widespread opinion was that these pieces of practical advice for the concrete cure of souls at the level of the parish could already be imparted by the practitioners of other disciplines (chiefly moral theology and spiritual theology) as part of their courses without constituting any distinct discipline in its own right. It was felt, therefore, that the special functions which, after all, pastoral theology still really does have to achieve could in practice be achieved in several other branches of the more practical kind more or less independently of one another, as for instance in homiletics, catechetics, pastoral liturgy, so that it would be superfluous to have any special pastoral theology existing side by side with these more readily understood branches of instruction or practical work.

Against this view an essentially different and deeper concept of pastoral theology was developed in the Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie[7] which appeared in four volumes between 1963 and 1969, and also in the preliminary studies leading up to this. At the same time it still remains to be seen whether the new and deeper concept will achieve general acceptance at the levels of theory and above all of practice in the Church. In this conception [118] pastoral theology or 'practical theology',[8] as it should more rightly be called, consists in scientific and

---

[6] cf. A. Graf, Kritische Darstellung des gegenwärtigen Zustandes der praktischen Theologie (Tübingen, 1841), and on this H. Schuster, op. cit., pp. 56 ff.

[7] F. X. Arnold (Vol. III: F. Klostermann, K. Rahner, V. Schurr, L M. Weber edd., Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie. Praktische Theologie der Kirche in ihrer Gegenwart, Vol. I (Freiburg, 1964), Vol. II/1-2 (Freiburg, 1966), Vol. III (Freiburg, 1968), Vol. IV (Freiburg, 1969). Several translations are being prepared.

Apart from the studies by H. Schuster and K. Rahner in this manual (cf. especially I, pp. 93-114, 117-215, 323-332, 333-343; II/1, pp. 181 ff., 233 ff., 256; II/2, pp. 19 ff., 46 ff.) cf. also, especially on the whole range of problems treated of here, H. Schuster, 'Pastoral Theology: Nature and Function', Concilium I 3 (1965), pp. 4-9 idem, 'Pastoral Theology', Sacramentum Mundi 4 (New York and London, 1969), pp. 365-368: K. Rahner, 'Zur gegenwartigen Situation des Christen, Theologische Deutung der Position des modernen Christen in der modernen Welt', Sendung und Gnade (Innsbruck, 4th ed. 1966), pp. 13-47; idem, Theological Investigations X (London and New York, 1973), pp. 293-371; 'On the Theological Problems Entailed in a "Pastoral Constitution"', ibid., 'Practical Theology and Social Work in the Church', ibid.; cf. also F. Klostermann, 'Pastoraltheologie heute', Dienst an der Lehre, ed. by the Faculty of Catholic Theology of the University of Vienna = Wiener Beiträge zur Theologie X (Vienna, 1965), pp. 51-108; F. X. Arnold, 'Was ist Pastoraltheologie?', Wort des Heils als Wort in die Zeit (Treves, 1961), pp. 296-300; K. Delahaye, 'Überlegungen zur Neuorientierung der Pastoraltheologie heute', Gott in Welt II (Festschrift für K. Rahner), edited by J. B. Metz, W. Kern, A. Darlap, H. Vorgrimler (Freiburg, 1964), pp. 206-218. In addition cf. the general summary in the article by K. Rahner entitled 'Pastoraltheologie', Was ist Theologie? edited by E. Neuhäusler and E. Gössmann (Munich, 1966), pp. 285-309.

[8] Protestant theology has long since given preference to this term (particular reference should be made at this point to as early a writer as Schleiermacher). It is also better because the term 'pastoral theology' always suggests the idea that it is only the clergy (the 'pastors') who are the upholders of the Church's active work which 'pastoral theology' is designed to study scientifically. But it is precisely this point that is contested by the new and more comprehensive conception of 'pastoral theology', and for this reason it ought to be called 'practical theology' as being less liable to misapprehension.

In accordance with the fundamental ontological difference between the theoretical and the practical reason, we might go on at this point to conceive of the two basic branches of theological investigation each according to its own distinctive nature: on the one hand those theological disciplines which are pursued at the level of the theoretical reason (in other words systematic and historical theology), and on the other hand precisely 'practical

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

theological research into the task laid upon the Church in the present of achieving the fulness of her own nature as Church. Two main features distinguish this concept of pastoral theology from the earlier conceptions which prevailed: first, it is not confined exclusively to the work of the clergy (and especially the 'lower ranks' of them) or to the 'cure of souls' exercised by these in the narrower sense of the term. Rather it extends to everything with which the Church as such has to do, beginning from the worldwide Church and extending right down to the local churches and the individual communities of believers.[9] Thus (to select a few examples at random) among the questions pertaining to a pastoral theology of this kind would be, e.g. a scientifically conducted investigation into the form which a Roman congregation should assume today, where as a matter of concrete practice a balance can be struck between centralization and decentralization in the Church of today, how large a diocese ought to be today having regard to the particular circumstances in particular societies in which it exists in any given case, what ecclesiastical institutions ought to exist at the supra-parochial level apart from the curia attached to the bishop of a diocese, what the constitution of a national conference of bishops ought to be.[10] Such questions as this [119] and others almost beyond number belong (of course in addition to those already customarily regarded as belonging to it) to a pastoral theology of this kind[11] because today these questions can no longer be left solely to the prudent estimation of the higher authorities of the Church or to mere practical experience to decide.[12]

The second characteristic of a pastoral theology as understood here consists in the fact that an exact scientific investigation must be made into the concrete situation of the Church both interior and exterior, since in practice the achievement of her own fulness depends upon this. Moreover this investigation must be conducted in a theological manner since while the analysis of the contemporary situation does indeed presuppose the findings of the secular sciences, still for the purposes of pastoral theology it must be conducted in a specifically theological way.[13] If pastoral theology today is to take into consideration something more than the activities of the parish priest, having rather to work out in a process of scientific theology', which properly speaking once more transposes the whole of theology from the level of the theoretical reason to that of the practical reason.

---

[9] On what follows cf. the author's study, 'Die Grundlegung der Pastoraltheologie als praktische Theologie', Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie I (Freiburg, 1964), pp. 117 ff.

[10] In addition to the study in the Handbuch just mentioned cf. also on these particular specific questions K. Rahner, 'The Episcopal Office', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 313-360; idem, 'Pastoral-Theological Observations on Episcopacy in the Teaching of the Vatican II', Theological Investigations VI, pp. 361-368; idem, 'On Bishops' Conferences', ibid., pp. 369-389.

[11] In making this point here we do not forget that the actual practice of the Church in all such questions always remains in itself one element in the decision in which a choice is implied. It is an element which cannot be replaced by any process of speculation, even as this is applied in practical theology. Nevertheless there still remains an essential difference between the two kinds of speculation: that of the theoretical reason, which is concerned with that which is and always must be the case (or alternatively speculation on the historical past insofar as this is presupposed in 'systematic theology', as for instance in the history of dogma or theology), and speculation upon the contemporary situation and on the question of what the appropriate action of the Church is to be in the present and future arising from this situation. Moreover while this kind of speculation does not lead unequivocally and of itself to a concrete imperative, still it does open up the field and define the limits within which a decision becomes possible and reasonable.

[12] In other contexts too in the sphere of secular politics etc. we notice an inevitable tendency to reduce everything to 'scientific method' through the 'social sciences', which are intended not merely to yield 'factual findings' but also to use the elements of creative imagination and critical speculation in order to provide patterns for social decision.

[13] On this cf. likewise the contribution of K. Rahner and N. Greinacher entitled 'Die Gegenwart der Kirche. Theologische Analyse der Gegenwart als Situation des Selbstvollzugs der Kirche', Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1 (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 178-266.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

speculation the 'higher strategy'[14] of the Church in the fulfilment of her salvific task, then the findings of the secular sciences must be brought into theology and subjected once more to examination from the theological point of view in a way which certainly has not been achieved [120] in any traditional pastoral theology so far. It is this theological analysis of the contemporary situation which radically distinguishes pastoral theology in this sense for instance from ecclesiology, which investigates the nature of the Church, or even from canon law, to the extent that this has as its proper field merely that law which is actually in force and the history of this but not the 'jus condendum'[15] At this point, however, we cannot go any further in developing and justifying this new conception of what pastoral theology must mean. For this we may refer to the Handbuch already mentioned, though this is not to assert that this manual has already achieved anything more than a fairly modest progress in working out its own basic conception.

Before we can go on to consider the old and new conceptions of pastoral theology in their relationship to theology and the study of theology in general we must refer to yet 'another' theology which is new, and which can by no means be passed over in the question of the relationship of pastoral theology to theology in general. We are referring here to 'political theology'. It is not possible at this point to provide an account of the nature of this 'political theology', still less to give an account of the various interpretations of it which have been put forward by Catholic and Protestant theologians.[16] Here we must content ourselves merely with characterizing this theology in completely general terms by saying that it is intended to overcome the tendency to restrict theology as a whole exclusively to the private sphere of the salvation of the individual taken in isolation, and to consider the relevance of all theological statements to the politics of society and to sociology in general. Political theology is not, however, intended itself to practise 'politics'. For precisely on its own terms this must be left to a world which has 'become worldly' and autonomous. All that interests us here in view of the special subject with which we are concerned is the relationship which political theology bears to pastoral theology on our own understanding of what pastoral theology means. Now any theological statement can have its points of relevance to, and its implications for social politics and sociology in general – including, therefore, those statements which pertain to the essential theological disciplines which are distinct from pastoral theology itself. To this extent, [121] therefore, and despite the fact that it is the activities of society as such that constitute the special concern of political theology, it does belong to the essential theological disciplines precisely because it is not in fact intended to be a special discipline with a particular 'area' of its own, but is rather conceived of as an essential element in all 'systematic' disciplines. To this extent, then, political theology constitutes no difficulty for pastoral theology, since the latter is in fact conceived of as a special theological discipline distinct from the others. An additional point is that political theology is orientated towards the task of the Church in the 'world' and secular society in the sphere of social politics and sociology. In other words it itself even if it is not intended to be thought of as purely investigating an aspect of the actual 'nature' of the Church, is still concerned with a specific area in which the Church achieves the fulness of her own nature in the concrete. Nor would it make any difference to the points which we have made if it were to be pointed out that everything which the Church does also has a social significance and must be subjected to theological investigation from this aspect also.

---

[14] On this concept, and the problems it involves cf. K. Rahner, 'Das Verhältnis der Kirche zur Gegenwartssituation im allgemeinen, ibid. II/2, pp. 19 ff.

[15] If canonists were to consider their work as also and primarily concerned with scientific speculation on the 'jus condendum' as this is required on the basis of a theological speculation on the present and future of the Church, then this kind of canon law (or this part of it) would constitute an element in pastoral theology.

[16] For a summary of this cf. J. B. Metz, 'Political Theology', Sacramentum Mundi 5, (1969), pp. 34-38.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now if we accept the existence and special nature of pastoral theology, what are the consequences of this for the study of theology as a whole? What claims[17] does pastoral theology make on theology in general? Two points are obvious from the outset, and they are also points which are brought out in the documents of the Church with regard to the reform of theological studies.

First, in our own times pastoral theology must certainly constitute an important and significant branch of study among the other branches which are included in the theological formation of future priests.[18] This at least must be granted if the division of theology into its various branches which has been customary up to the present is by and large taken as given. Let us consider the normal formation of a young theologian on his way to becoming a priest, one who is destined to work at the cure of souls in the ordinary sense. Obviously the emphasis here will firmly have to be laid upon those sub-disciplines within this general subject entitled 'pastoral [122] theology' which are particularly important for the practical activities of a priest of this kind, that is e.g. on catechetics, homiletics, pastoral liturgy, the scientific application of caritas, and (so far as priests working in the missions are concerned) missiology. At the same time, however, it would be regrettable if even in the formation of priests of this kind pastoral theology were, in practice, to be reduced from the outset to the specific department of 'practical' work which we have mentioned, and others of the same kind, and if the future priest were not made familiar with the other problems which belong to pastoral theology on a modern and more comprehensive view of what this means. Attempts are constantly being made to educate the members of a society to a point where they can become active supporters of the life of the society equipped with a critical awareness of the problems involved, and moreover, they must become this (with the due and necessary reservations) by scientifically thinking out the problems involved. On this view, then, every priest too ought to have the sort of formation which does not merely equip him to fulfil the immediate pastoral task to which he will be committed, but also, and more than this, to take an active share in the responsibility of the Church as a whole in the process of achieving the fulness of her own nature. He should have a social and political awareness sharpened by scientific training with regard to the life of the Church as a whole. He should be able to contribute actively in his own way to the great decisions of the Church etc. Now the necessary equipment to do this could be imparted to him through pastoral theology, provided that the true nature of this is understood and realized to the full, and provided that pastoral theology is not reduced simply to the level of mere useful ideas and relegated to those sub-disciplines which alone, so it is alleged, are interesting and important for the normal pastor.

The second point which is immediately obvious is the need for all theological disciplines to be given a certain pastoral orientation. All of them must, each in its own way, be ready to contribute to the man, the Christian, and the future priest and the task which he will subsequently have to fulfil. In the formation of the theologians our attitude towards the theological disciplines in which we are engaged should not be research for research's sake, or any kind of lofty 'l'art pour l'art'. Rather those engaged in these disciplines must have an awareness of the fact that in this formation of future priests the function they have to fulfil is one of contributing to that pastoral work. This does not imply any cheap popularization of the intellectual disciplines involved, nor, properly speaking, any 'haute vulgarization', any 'adult education courses' in the sphere of theology. For the first consideration must be that the priest

---

[17] On this cf. E. Jüngel, 'Das Verhältnis der theologischen Disziplinen untereinunder' = Studien zur praktischen Theologie edited by R. Bohren, K. Frör, M. Seitz (Munich, 1968), pp. 11 ff.; M. Seitz, 'Die Aufgabe der praktischen Theologie', ibid., pp. 65 ff., and on this W. Herrmann and G. Lautner, Theologiestudium. Entwurf einer Reform (Munich, 1965).

[18] On the need to include pastoral theology already in the first semesters cf. the memorandum on the formation of students of theology in pastoral theology in Diaconia 3 (1968), pp. 372-375.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

must be [123] educated in a conscious critical awareness of what his task involves, and this implies that he must be shown how to think out theological questions in a critical and scientific way, and the second consideration is that theology itself and the problems which constantly arise in it must be 'translated' in a manner that really is appropriate to the subject-matter involved and to the particular epoch. Now to express these matters in a way that is suitable to the times, and which makes it possible to preach them, is itself in turn a task to be scientifically worked out, and one which often demands more in terms of living awareness and strength on the part of the specialist theologian than if he confines himself merely to contributing to his own special branch of theology at the scientific level. Yet in the way in which these particular subjects are studied this process of orientating all theological disciplines towards the practical work of the future priest still remains to a large extent an unfulfilled need. We cannot enlarge any further at this point on the question of what is implied in particular detail by this need for all theological subjects to be orientated, in this way, towards the practical pastoral activities of the priest.[19]

All that we have said so far, however, is totally inadequate as an explanation of the claims which pastoral theology makes upon theology in general. In order to achieve any further progress in this direction we must present certain preliminary considerations with regard to specific aspects of the reform of theological studies in general which has been recognized as due in our own times.

Let us consider first the theory of the nature of a university. In this a justifiable distinction is drawn with regard to the tasks of a university or university faculty and a teacher of academic subjects between teaching and research. The teacher of academic subjects has not merely to teach, not merely to hand on a certain amount of scientific knowledge which he has already gained, or to transmit this to his students with didactic skill He should also undertake 'research', i.e. he should make a critical and positive further contribution to the problems which arise in his particular science. These two tasks are of course intrinsically connected, and ultimately speaking mutually condition one another. But the teachers at the academic level need not merely to strive to fulfil them and to achieve them by their own personal work. Most tasks also need the institutional conditions necessary for their fulfilment as also does research itself. Now among these institutional conditions we have today to include, and that too [124] in a higher degree than formerly, the factor of 'teamwork'. This need not necessarily consist solely in the collaboration of researchers at the same level of formation, but can be conceived of in the form of a collaboration of those who are still at the formative stages in their scientific work ('doctorandi', 'habilitandi') working with an experienced researcher. Here too this collaboration can in its turn assume the most varied forms. At this point a special kind of contact is achieved between teaching and research such that they can actually constitute a practical unity. Nevertheless teaching and research are ultimately speaking not simply identical with one another. For even instruction at the academic level in the universities is, in the vast majority of cases, aimed at the formation of individuals who themselves are not in turn destined to become scientific researchers as their own vocation for life. Rather they are intended to apply what they have learned in some 'practical calling' outside the university itself. It is of course a question in itself whether in view of the immense mass of scientific material which has been accumulated, the increasing complexities in scientific method in research etc., we should not introduce a new kind of school intermediary between the high school (secondary schools designed to mature the students to the point where they are ready to enter university) on the one hand, and the universities themselves on [19] On this cf. also the idea of a basic course in theology which I have developed extensively in connection with 'Optatam totius': K. Rahner, Zur Reform des Theologiestudiums = Quaestiones Disputatae 41 (Freiburg,1969), pp. 51 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the other (considered as institutions for research and for the introduction of the new generation into research as such). These intermediary schools, then, would be 'schools for advanced specialist studies', and in them the material findings of science aimed at by research properly so called would be communicated to those who were intended to apply it in the sphere of a practical calling not designed to make any practical contribution to research itself. In other words it is certainly an open question today whether research and teaching can still remain united institutionally in a single university or university faculty without one or other of the two tasks having to suffer by this. But even if we hold firm to the idea of the university as a single institution sustaining both tasks at once, research and teaching together, and even if we do not regard this idea of the university as utopian in the conditions prevailing today, it must still remain clear that research and teaching do constitute two tasks which, both at the personal and institutional levels, are very different.

Everything which has been said precisely with regard to the university or university faculty in general applies also to a theological faculty and the tasks with which it is confronted. In earlier times in the majority of countries in the Catholic world the theological institutions were more or less identical with the seminaries, and very often these served only to [124] teach, to impart material scientific knowledge, to the next generation of priests, so that in them the teacher of theology was not a researcher in the real sense. By contrast with this the recent pronouncements of the Church with regard to the study of theology do show a certain tendency (to express it prudently) towards the position that all theological study should take place at an 'academic level' after the manner of the theological faculty in a university.[20] Of course this has a positive importance of its own which is very great. But at the same time it also raises, of its very nature, all those problems which are today connected with the ideal of a university as combining research and teaching and pursuing them as a unity. It is of course obvious that in instructing future priests a teacher of theology must not simply provide a higher level of catechetical instruction – in other words that he can only impart the kind of knowledge required for this if he himself is also in some sense a researcher in the sphere of theology. But however true this may be, it still does appear today that in the sphere of theology too research and teaching (considered as the formation of future priests who are not destined to be specialist theologians) can be practised in combination only with great difficulty.

This difficulty is not merely that difficulty which threatens the unity of research and teaching at the university in general. There are special reasons, over and above this, that apply to the study of theology in particular. The chief of these consists in the multiplicity of disciplines which have accumulated in the course of the last hundred years as special subjects of instruction within the single discipline of theology, all of which are of obligation. These special subjects are there. They have almost universally been taken as given in the considerations and dispositions which have been put forward for a reform of the studies. And on this [126] view, and with these presuppositions the only question which can still be raised and solved with regard to a reform of the studies is where the individual disciplines should [20] By way of example we might adduce the following: Sacra Congregatio pro Institutione Catholica, Normae quaedam ad constitutionem apostolicam 'Deus Scientiarum Dominus' de studiis academicis ecclesiasticis recognoscendam (Rome, 1968). While the term 'Theologia pastoralis' does occur in this programme of studies, nevertheless the reality signified by this does not constitute a principle by which the whole of theology is structurally organized (p.69). Moreover it can hardly be accepted that the pastoral theology signified in these normae is in itself aimed at 'practical theology' as briefly outlined above. With regard to these normae, therefore, the question has to be raised whether a central theological discipline is not needed in order that there may be an overall orientation of the Church in modern society, and whether this theological discipline should not be developed in terms of scientific theology precisely in the sense intended by the Council with a view to the organization of the Church and her overall strategy (e.g. with regard to the 'political' effectiveness of the central organs of the Church) for the world of tomorrow.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

come in the course of the years of study, and how many semesters and lecture periods should be devoted to each particular discipline. Now it must not be contested here that all these disciplines have their own justification as branches of theological research. The question is, however, whether it is equally necessary for all these numerous branches, autonomous as they are and therefore inevitably coming into rivalry with one another, to constitute particular subjects in the teaching and formation of future priests. I may suggest that this is in fact not the case, even though at this point I shall not be putting forward any more detailed arguments in support of this view.[21]

Provided a clear distinction is drawn between research and teaching there is at any rate no need to maintain the view that every area of research must also constitute a special branch of teaching different from the other branches, and which, without much regard to the other branches, is accorded a position governed by laws of its own within the general formation of young theologians. A different approach must be adopted, particularly today, because otherwise the proliferation of such special subjects, the material content of which has increased beyond all bounds, is brought to a point at which in studying all of them the theological student knows nothing of any. The organization and presentation of the subject-matter pertaining to the formation of the theology student for his future pastoral activities, and which has to be suitable for this end, must not be determined according to the branches into which theology is divided for the purposes of research. Insofar as it is meaningful at all to regulate the study of theology in terms of the various branches of research, it has at most a certain significance in the formation of future researchers. Though there has been a certain awareness of this in earlier attempts at working out the curriculum of studies, it has not been explicitly reflected upon. For in these earlier attempts there has been an intense concentration upon dogmatic and moral theology, and the other special subjects have been much neglected in favour of these – insofar as they have been accorded any place at all in the official timetable of study. Alternatively [127] a so-called ‘seminarists’ course’ has been provided side by side with the academic one, in order thereby to orientate the subject-matter and mode of presentation of theological instruction to the real goal of this formation, at least to some extent.[22]

We may speak of the unity of theology and its pastoral orientation, but in reality the unexpected pluralism of the theological disciplines as they have developed in history has

---

[21] On this cf. the ‘Quaestio Disputata’ by K. Rahner already cited, Zur Reform des Theologiestudiums = Quaestiones Disputatae 41 (Freiburg, 1969), pp. 19 ff. and the positive counter-proposal on pp. 48-50.

‘Optatam totius’, No. 17 does indeed warn us against any ‘nimia disciplinarum multiplicatio’, but seems at least to accept the usual subjects as a fact which is inevitably given and which raises no problems.

[22] An attempt is actually made to justify this in terms of ‘scientific theory’ by drawing a distinction between an ‘academic’ and a ‘kerygmatic’ theology. On this cf. J. A. Jungmann, Die Frohbotschaft und unsere Glaubensverkündigung (Regensburg, 1936); F. Lakner, ‘Theorie einer Verkündigungstheologie’, Theologie der Zeit 3 (Vienna, 1949), pp. 1-63; J. B. Lotz, ‘Wissenschaft und Verkündigung’, ZKT 62 (1938), pp. 465-501; H. Rahner, Eine Theologie der Verkündigung (Freiburg, 2nd ed. 1939) and against this E. Kappler, Die Verkündigungstheologie (Freiburg, 1949). While this distinction is not actually justified, since every theology must be scientific in its approach, and at the same time every theology as ‘intellectus fidei’ must also be orientated towards preaching, still the whole range of problems raised in the thirties of the present century [on this cf. also K. Rahner, ‘Kerygmatische Theologie’, LTK VI (Freiburg, 2nd ed. 1961), 126; idem, ‘Über die Verkündigungstheologie. Eine kritisch-systematische Literaturübersicht’, Pazmanita Tudósitó (Dunaszerdahely, Hungary) 16 (1941-42), pp. 3-10] does show that even today a considerable part of theology as de facto practised is still not making a clear enough contribution to a form of preaching that is really relevant to the times, one which reaches modern man and touches his need for faith, and educates the young pastoral cleric in his particular tasks. One expression and cause of this deficiency, however, is also the excessive pluralism of the subjects included in the course of theological instruction. Unless this excessive pluralism is eliminated all reform of the curriculum of theological study remains at the level of mere theory. One might regard the determination to overcome this excessive pluralism, which is dictated by the subjects chosen as areas of research, as a touchstone for determining whether the will to undertake a far-reaching reform is real and sincere.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

been left unaffected by this in the anxiety to achieve a course of studies which is as far as possible 'academic'. And so long as this is true any reform of theological studies is foredoomed to failure. For the purposes of teaching theology, as distinct from researching into theology, the traditional theological disciplines must be broken up, and the subject-matter which has to be taught must be organized on quite different principles. In demanding that the subject-matter of theology shall be presented according to a single unifying principle of organization[23] we are not, of course, implying that henceforward anything and [128] everything which a young theologian has to hear and learn in the course of his studies must positively be integrated into this intrinsically structured corpus of his theological formation. Not only is this impossible from the technical point of view, but also it would lead to the forcing of a 'system' upon him, or at least the setting up of a 'system' which existed merely formally and on paper. Moreover to demand this would be to do violence to the very nature of human knowledge as such, and to the 'gnoseological and concupiscent' conditions to which the individual is subject and in which he is from the outset constantly exposed to a pluralism in the various branches of knowledge such that these do not mutually throw light upon one another.

When we say, therefore, that the special subjects in theology which have become traditional must be broken down in order that an intrinsically articulated structure may be imparted to the corpus of theological teaching, and in order that this teaching may be effectively imparted, this demand is not invalidated when the corpus properly so called comes to be surrounded by a whole circle of 'ancillary' subjects, 'special lectures', 'special courses', or even by particular courses of lectures in which at least a certain idea of the 'pursuit' of theological research and the methods and problems it entails is imparted to the student of theology. Hence we can leave open at this point the question of which precise special subjects in theology as taught up to now will have to be transformed so as to be included in this corpus of theology properly so called, and which other subjects as taught up to now can continue to exist as formerly, but now more or less as autonomous disciplines in their own right, i.e. as 'ancillary subjects' attached to the corpus of theology.[24] It is of course likewise impossible to enter here into the question of whether any consequences arise from the considerations we have put forward so far with regard to the relations between philosophy and theology on such a view of theology as this, and what those consequences are.[25] A further [23] The old and famous question of the 'formal object' of theology (in its unity and presupposed as constituting that unity) would provide a starting-point for investigating the question of a principle of structural organization for the whole course of theological instruction. But presumably it could never be anything more than such a starting-point.

[24] There will be no attempt artificially to force such subjects, for instance, as Church history or history of philosophy, introduction to textual criticism of the New Testament etc. into this course. Rather they will firmly be allowed to remain as special courses in their own right. Otherwise there will in fact be no place for a corpus of teaching in which everything which the student of this body of doctrine needs to know can be integrated within a single discipline.

[25] In the 'Latin' scheme of studies, which was different from the 'German' one, it was taken for granted that some years of the course of studies should be devoted to philosophy purely as such before the theologian began his theology. The justification for this Latin scheme is anything but obvious. It proceeds from a fundamental idea of the relationship between nature and grace, philosophy and theology, which was tacitly assumed, but which can surely no longer be accounted as self-evident, at any rate today. This is not in any way to deny the possibility of an independent, relatively autonomous philosophy, or the necessity for distinguishing in principle a 'duplex ordo cognitionis' (DS 3105). But surely we must object to the procedure of a superficial departmentalization of philosophy and theology in which one is made to follow upon the other in the formation of a theologian. For today it is quite impossible for him any longer to be a 'philosopher' in the sense in which this was formerly conceived of. On this cf. K. Rahner, Theological Investigations IX, (London and New York, 1973) passim; and the author's article, 'Philosophy and Theology', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 71-81, and most recently 'Philosophy and Theology' in Sacramentum Mundi (New York and London, 1969) (bibliog.).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation question of which [129] we shall not be speaking here is concerned with exegesis, and that too not merely from the point of view of its very nature as theoretically conceived of, but also in view of the fact that it is not only the specialist, but every priest who must be a reader and interpreter of scripture as such.

In exegesis, then, we cannot avoid the responsibility of ensuring that it shall not consist of an artificial and a priori interpretation of prescribed texts in answer to questions set for it by systematic theology. But the question concerning exegesis of which we shall not be speaking here is whether it can be incorporated into this newly structured corpus of theological teaching, and if so how, or alternatively whether it should exist autonomously side by side with this corpus as an independent discipline equal in importance to the corpus itself.[26] Thus a question which now arises is what, in more precise terms, the structure of this corpus of theological teaching should be, given that the process of working out this structure must not be prejudiced from the outset by the traditional disciplines of theology. Here we must mention two principles for working out a structure of this kind. They are not simply two principles among many other conceivable ones which we might perhaps have selected. Rather they have to be understood as arising fundamentally from the very nature of the question as the only two possible ones. A priest has to be trained for his future priestly tasks. But that which he has to impart to others as an official priest of the Church is precisely that which also constitutes his own personal existence as a man and a Christian. If both of these aspects are borne in mind then we can perhaps say that two and only two basic conceptions and principles of organization are possible for a [130] course of studies of this kind. For want of a better terminology we shall call the first of these the 'existentielle' concept of theology, and the other the 'vocational' concept of theology. The first concept seeks to organize the corpus of theology on the basis of a 'Christian anthropocentricity'[27](which does not imply any opposition to a theological theocentricity) in that it seeks to awaken the student and to cause him constantly to reflect upon the question constituted by man himself (from the philosophical point of view and drawing upon the other anthropological sciences of the present day), and to answer this question in terms of the message of Christianity. Of course it might be said that this too has been, and continues to be, the task and the achievement of the theological disciplines as practised up to now. But what we mean here is that by presenting the question in this way a structured development can be achieved of the subject-matter which has to be taught in theology without referring back to the theological disciplines as formulated in earlier times. To this structured development of the subject-matter which has to be taught in theology the specialists in the particular branches of theological research have to make their contribution precisely at that point at which it is demanded by this 'system' as a whole. They do not make this contribution on the basis of each particular theological discipline as such taken autonomously and in isolation from the rest. This 'existentielle' concept of theology cannot be considered any further at this point; for this reference may be made to considerations which the author has put forward elsewhere.[28]

As a result of this long and apparently devious development we have now arrived at a point at which we are in a better position to clarify the demands which pastoral theology makes upon theology as a whole. The 'vocational' concept of theology as a whole means, in material terms, nothing else than that the structural organization of the whole corpus of theology must be provided by pastoral theology.

---

[26] On this cf. the discussion between N. Lohfink, 'Text und Thema', Stimmung der Zeit 181 (1968), pp. 120-126 and K. Rahner, 'Die Exegese im Theologiestudium', ibid., 181 (1968), pp. 296-205 and in general my study, Zur Reform des Theologiestudiums Quaestiones Disputatae 41 (Freiburg, 1969).

[27] cf. K. Rahner, 'Theology and Anthropology', Theological Investigations X (London and Freiburg, 1973), pp. 28-46, and also the literature cited in n. 25.

[28] cf. K. Rahner, Zur Reform des Theologiestudiums = Quaestiones Disputatae 45 (Freiburg, 1969).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The fact that a project of this kind need not remain at the level of pure theory is demonstrated by the new theological faculty at Heerlen (Hoogeschool voor Theologie en Pastoraat) which was founded a few years ago in the diocese of Roermond in collaboration with certain members of religious orders and societies.[29] In this faculty the scientific and theoretical [131] formation is provided in a 'basic course' lasting five years, followed by two years of directly practical pastoral formation. To give only one example of how such a 'vocational' concept of pastoral theology can supply the principle of organization for the whole of theology considered as teaching a brief outline may be given of the 'basic course' provided by the Heerlen faculty.[30] In the first year of this 'basic course' (the 'propaedeutic year') the organization of the subject-matter is aimed primarily at an exposition of the student's understanding of himself (to the extent that he is aiming precisely at making a pastoral contribution to the Church's mission). This is achieved by giving a description of society and of the Church of today, together with a special philosophical and theological evaluation of this. In addition an introduction is given to the methodology of scientific thought. The subject-matter in the second year is the wellbeing of society: problems such as work, technology, welfare, leisure-time, catering for the welfare of the individual in the contemporary developments of industry, the progressive unification of the world, salvation and perdition, politics, communism, the consummation of the world and eschatology. All these questions are treated of in an inter-disciplinary manner by a team of lecturers (sociologists, psychologists, exegetes, dogmatic and moral theologians). Iii the third year the development of the person in society is treated of. Light is thrown upon the various aspects of man as sinful, as free, and as redeemed, by the various specialists. The subject-matter of the fourth year falls under the heading of 'Man in the Christian and Religious Aspects of his Life'. Here [132] such questions are raised as the existence of God, the nature of God, and religion, and all of these are treated of in an interdisciplinary manner. In the fifth and final year of the 'basic course' the subject treated of is the Christian and religious community. In this year an extensive treatment is given to such subjects as the Church, the sacraments, liturgy, preaching, and other means of communication, and a treatment of these questions is given on the basis of the various disciplines. In this connection too it is obvious that, as has already been laid down as a matter of principle at an earlier stage, the corpus of these courses of lectures is supplemented and surrounded by special lectures, the subject-matter of which, so far as the Heerlen faculty is concerned, has an explicitly missionary character.

Here we have given only a fragmentary account of the programme followed in this theological faculty. But even so, when we view this programme, the first point that immediately becomes clear is that the classic theological disciplines are no longer provided as special subjects for instruction, but are rather accorded an 'interdisciplinary' status in [29] cf. e.g. Over de nieuwe opleiding tot priester en pastoraal werker aan de Hoogeshool voor Theologie en Pastoraat te Heerlen (Heerlen, 1969).

---

[30] We should not, of course, overlook the great difficulties which such a conception entails. For certainly we should not fall into the mistake of seeking absolutely to transform all theology into practical work. Such a thing would be quite impossible in view of the difference between the two spheres, which is radical and irremovable. But even abstracting from this, it is also necessary to accord 'pure' theory its own due place in the concrete development of the course of studies. Nevertheless we cannot overlook the fact that in the discussion of the reform of studies which has taken place in the central European sphere there has been pressure to give a greater place to practical work. In this respect we should have to regard the Dutch scheme described above and the Roman scheme which has prevailed hitherto as at opposite extremes to one another in the Catholic sphere. For my own conception, which bears more on the concrete existing circumstances, cf. the Quaestio Disputata already referred to, Zur Reform des Theologiestudiums = Quaestiones Disputatae 41 (Freiburg, 1969), p. 48; in addition reference may be made to my study in Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie IV (Freiburg, 1969), pp. 497-515; for other attempts of this kind we should mention the survey of studies in the article entitled 'The Renewal of Training for the Priesthood', Concilium 3/5 1969, pp. 91-98, especially note 1 and note 14, and also H. E. Hess and H..E. Tödt, Reform der theologischen Ausbildung, I-II (Stuttgart, 1968-69).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which they assist and make a contribution towards a. single unified subject matter to which all of them are subordinated. In practice, perhaps, this 'vocational' concept of theological formation is, after all, not so far removed from the 'existentielle' concept of theology as indicated above, so that perhaps the two conceptions do not necessarily have to be presented as mutually exclusive alternatives so far as the concrete development of the studies is concerned. The conception of the course of theological studies at Heerlen as set forth in the small programme published in April 1969 still remains at a very general stage, although it is clear that the process of using the subject-matter of pastoral theology to determine the structure of theology as a whole has been carried through uncompromisingly and without any false concessions. A possible criticism might be, however, that it does not yet appear from this programme whether the traditional subject-matter of dogmatic and moral theology has been included.[31] Other special subjects, such as the history of philosophy and [133] Church history can be interpreted even now as permanent 'ancillary subjects' supplementary to the corpus of theology proper, and this procedure does not constitute any special difficulty. But the subjects covered in dogmatic and moral theology as previously understood must certainly also be included in the corpus of this unified theology in itself (though this is certainly not to exclude the possibility of holding individual courses of special lectures in these areas), and here a difficulty does arise which has probably hardly been overcome as yet.

Our reason for referring to this order of studies at Heerlen at this point is simply that we wish to point to a concrete example of how pastoral theology can be something more than merely an important special subject within theology, and one that as such has to be taken into account in all the other special departments of theology too. Pastoral theology, rather, or the subject-matter and function belonging to it, can provide the principle according to which the whole of theology is structurally organized. Certainly the way in which this is done precisely at Heerlen is not the only possible way. In principle other concrete approaches are conceivable in which pastoral theology can be made to provide the structure and unifying principle of theology as a whole. Nor let it be said that all these considerations are so much word-play, serving only to organize into a formal system a multiplicity of subjects or courses which in any case do exist and always have existed from the first, without doing very much to alter the realities of the studies that are undertaken. There is very much that is changed in the practical application of the studies when a principle of structural organization of this kind is really put into force clearly and decisively. It becomes clear how specific subjects must necessarily be included in the curriculum, even though they were hardly treated of at all in the earlier disciplines. Other areas of subject-matter recede into the background which formerly simply took up too much time, attention, and energy, and imposed too great a strain on the memories of the students. A division of the number of periods available can be arrived at which is effective and realistic, being decided by the individual themes themselves, and not according to the already established division of the theological disciplines. As for the fresh themes for theological investigation which arise, we need only recall the whole range of subject-matter in pastoral theology mentioned at the beginning of this study, which [134] extends far beyond the themes which have already become traditional in this particular [31] There is no need to deny that in a 'vocational' concept of this kind the danger does exist of orientating the work of teaching theology in too pragmatic and utilitarian a manner towards something which – all other problems apart – already no longer exists or will no longer be the case if the priest is constantly engaged in pastoral work. For those problems which are most immediate and urgent today may soon perhaps no longer be so. Thus we would certainly be doing no service to the future priest if in dogmatic and moral theology we were to treat merely of what is the subject of discussion in all 'public circles' precisely today and is of 'burning' interest to young theologians. But while recognizing the truth of this principle it still does not justify the practice of continuing to hand on questions which have become obsolete in theological teaching. In view of the fact that the Second Vatican Council itself warns us against this ('Optatam totius' No. 57) the suspicion of this cannot be based on mere fancy.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

discipline, and extends to all those questions which fall under the heading of 'political theology'. By introducing a clear and unambiguous structural organization into the corpus of theology in this way we could also avoid the burden and waste of time entailed by the fact that certain themes tend to reappear again and again in different disciplines (for instance in the case of the sacraments, they are treated of very extensively in dogmatic theology, but also in moral theology, canon law, pastoral theology and liturgy).

Of course we might consider the demands which a pastoral theology of this kind makes upon theology as a whole from certain quite different points of view.[32] For instance it would have to be shown in the concrete how practical theology can and must be the critical conscience of the other theological disciplines (taking these also in their role as branches of research). What we mean by this is that practical theology should provide the particular disciplines with an awareness of the element of practical theology inherent in themselves, and which must be taken into account by themselves (something which in practice is often neglected). If, for instance, homiletics is to be something more than mere rhetoric as applied to preaching, it must in principle also be a material homiletics, i.e. it must make actual and relevant to the present, by means of a 'hermeneutics appropriate to the existing situation of the world' the message of the gospel in the teaching of the Church with a view to proclaiming it in a manner appropriate to the needs of the present day. A major part of this material homiletics, however, will in principle and for practical reasons (to avoid repetition etc.) have to be included in the study of dogmatic theology itself. And practical theology must again and again draw the attention of the dogmatic theologians to this point. It must raise the relevant questions in a more acute form and promote active consideration of them – those questions with which dogmatic theology is confronted as a result of practical experience. A similar point could also be shown to apply to Church history, exegesis, and biblical theology, canon law, and the study of the liturgy (considered primarily as instruction in the liturgia condenda).[33] This is not to say that it is only in a formal sense that practical theology constitutes the conscience of the other theological disciplines, rousing them to activity in a critical and creative way. But there is in fact much which must be considered necessary precisely in [135] order that the Church may achieve the fulness of her own nature in the concrete (in other words for her 'practical life' in the specific situation prevailing 'today'), and yet which cannot be achieved in pastoral theology taken as an individual discipline in isolation. In other words it must be achieved in the other theological disciplines. But it is precisely practical theology itself that must ensure that this is in fact done.

A further question might be raised, this time from the standpoint of the history of human thought in general. It concerns the fact that today the theoretical reason has lost a certain primacy which it once enjoyed, and pride of place has come to be accorded to the practical reason. The reason is that the world itself, even so far as the mind of man is concerned, has become dynamic, with the result that man and his environment are no longer merely the object of contemplation, but constitute rather the object and the material of human activity itself. What, then, it may be asked, are the implications of this for the theology of today and tomorrow and for practical theology in particular. The moment we consider this question from the point of view which we have only been able to indicate here we can conjecture that theology will inevitably be transformed to a far greater extent than we of today can yet perceive. A further general perspective within which our question must be considered is provided by the growing recognition that today, for all the unity of the creed in the one Church, a pluralism of theologies[34] has inevitably come to prevail within the one Church, [32] On this cf. also my study in Theological Investigations X (London and Freiburg, 1973), pp. 293-317.

[33] cf. ibid., passim.
[34] On this subject cf. also Theological Investigations IX and X, as also idem, 'Pluralism in Theology and the Unity of the Creed in the Church' in this volume pp. 3-23.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which is far deeper, more far-reaching and more uncontrollable than formerly. This is something which in principle must by all means be considered a positive enrichment of the Church herself. From this point of view a further distinction would have to be drawn within the questions we have raised, so that it would lead to the further question of whether perhaps there must be, and will be, another theology besides those already existing (the theologies of the theoretical reason, of contemplation, of an 'aesthetic' interpretation of the world, of a transcendental metaphysic etc.). This other theology would be the theology of the practical reason, of human activity, of the decisions which have to be taken in the Church and in the world at the social level. The effect of all this would be that while these theologies would certainly have a unifying point of reference among themselves in the common creed and in the unity of the Church's hope and love, still it would no longer be possible in any adequate sense to produce a single overall [136] concept of theology to cover them all and relate them all to one another. When we view the question in this perspective surely we can no longer doubt that two consequences follow: on the one hand, even if we produce a single universal theology structurally organized in terms of the practical reason and of practical theology, it will still not be the only theology in the Church. On the other hand, however, it is surely true that it will be this theology that will most clearly make the nature of our own times subject to conscious reflection. And it is this reflection on the special nature of our own times that will constitute the signature of the Church of tomorrow, and therefore of her theology as well.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[137]

5

THE FUTURE OF THEOLOGY

The man who seeks to look into the future of theology is in the same position as anyone else attempting to say in other contexts how the future will turn out. All he can do is to throw onto the screen of the future a broader and vaguer projection of certain special features of the present. But whether these features he projects really will be included among the distinguishing characteristics of the future is something that ultimately speaking no-one knows.

So it is too with regard to the future of theology. Everything which we are about to say is subject to this proviso. Let us attempt, without systematizing, and in the knowledge that the selection we make must necessarily be extremely arbitrary, to depict certain traits of that future of theology which has already begun.

The Catholic theology of the future will be a theology of the one abiding creed of this Church. We do not know how large this Church will be in terms of numbers, or what influence it will have upon society in the future. But in any case it will endure, and it will always be constituted by its proclaimed belief in the living God who, by his act of gracious self-bestowal, has penetrated into the world to become the ultimate strength underlying the unfolding process of its history and to be the absolute future towards which it tends. This is achieved through acknowledged belief in Jesus Christ in whom this absolute proximity of God to the world has achieved its climax in history and the manifestation of its eschatological victory. It is achieved through that creed which leads to unconditional love of neighbour and hope for eternal life.

This ancient creed of the Church is of course itself something that has constantly to be thought out afresh, to be made actual, and to be expressed in a manner appropriate to the times. Yet it endures. It can endure because what it proclaims as creed is precisely belief in an infinite future; belief in the immediacy of man's confrontation with God considered as the absolute point of reference by which every ideology bound up with [138] history and subject to its conditions is to be judged.[1] And it is to this creed of the Church abiding, yet ever new, that the theology of the future in the Catholic Church also remains ceaselessly attached. It will continue to be the task of that theology to reflect upon this creed with all the energy of the spirit and all the power of the heart in the light of each new situation as it arises in the life of believing and thinking man.

The Church's creed is the creed of a Church which constantly adheres to the basic structures with which she was founded, a Church which retains a living historical continuity with her own origins, a Church which has her officially constituted authorities, and therefore a teaching authority also. And to the extent that all this is true the theology of the future also retains a permanent connection with the teaching authority or magisterium of this Church, the upholders of which are the pope and the whole body of bishops considered as the unity.

The critical function which theology as a science obviously has can only be exercised by it precisely insofar as it acknowledges this necessity of adhering to the creed of the Church and

[1] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Das Christentum und der "neue Mensch"', Schriften zur Theologie III (Einsiedeln, 7th ed., 1967) , pp. 159-179; idem, 'Marxist Utopia and the Christian Future of Man', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 59-68; 'Ideology and Christianity', ibid., pp. 59-76; also the chapters entitled 'The Function of the Church as Critic of Society' and 'The Question of the Future' in Theological Investigations XII.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

to her teaching authority. This abiding connection which theology has does not exclude, but rather includes the fact that the concrete forms which it assumes are themselves subject to a process of historical change, so that theologians must constantly show themselves anew bold enough to commit themselves to a future that is still unknown.

The theology of the future, for all the unity of the abiding creed, will include a very high degree of pluralism in theology,[2] and one which can no longer be mastered by any one mind. It may be true that as a result of modern rationalization, technical skill, and the intermingling of all those spheres of human living which were previously kept distinct, a single world civilization has emerged. But however true this may be, still, by reason of the interior differences which still exist within this single world civilization a far more manifest pluralism of theologies will develop such that, however firmly they may remain attached to the one creed of the Church, still they will remain quite different from one another in [139] respect of their methods, their structural developments, their outlooks, their terminologies, and the practical trends to which they give rise. These differences will be so great that as theologies it will be quite impossible for them to be covered by, or subsumed under any one single homogeneous theology. It must be recognized that in terms of sheer time and energy it is quite beyond the resources of any one individual Christian and theologian to achieve a comprehensive grasp of all the material with which each theology has to work at the scientific, social, and cultural levels, and so to incorporate it in his own theology. And this fact alone makes it impossible for the pluralism of theologies which will exist to be subsumed within a single homogeneous theology in this way.

It is of course necessary for these theologies to maintain a constant dialogue among themselves. But however actively this may be pursued, still there will no longer be any one theology of the Church. Rather there will be theologies of the Church in the plural, each of them having a different bearing upon, and approach to the one creed, though this does not of course mean that they will be in contradiction to it. All this will be borne in upon us more clearly and more forcefully than formerly, so that it will become clear that we can no longer achieve a comprehensive view of all the differences involved. This also has implications for the teaching authority of the Church. The function of this in preserving the unity of the creed must be maintained to the full. But for all this it will have to accord to all these various theologies a greater degree of self-responsibility in the particular bearing which each has upon the single abiding creed of the Church. Presumably this pluralism among the theologies of the future will also open up quite new possibilities, for then there will be no attempt at falsely smoothing out the differences between them and so reducing them to a single uniform theology in order to cope with the danger of a confessional pluralism among the theologies leading to illegitimate divisions within the Church.[3]

Nor will the theology of the future be able to dispense with a certain boldness in which all the powers and resources at man's disposal are brought to bear in seeking out the problems involved — a boldness, therefore, in applying philosophical thought to these problems in the broadest sense of the term. Yet the theology of the future will no longer be able, as in former times, simply to presuppose a single philosophical system common to all which is already more or less worked out and ready [140] to hand when theology enters upon its own specific province.[4] These theologies will, to a certain extent, have to manage for themselves in working out the particular philosophies with which they will have to work. Obviously they will not be able to presuppose or to develop on their own account a philosophy which is

[2] cf. the chapter entitled 'Pluralism in Theology and the Unity of the Creed in the Church' in this volume, pp. 3-23.
[3] cf. esp. the article entitled 'On the Theology of Ecumenical Discussion', in this volume, pp. 24-67.
[4] cf. K. Rahner, Theological Investigations X (London and Freiburg, 1973), pp. 235-242.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

consciously opposed to or contradicts some other philosophy which has been presupposed or developed in another theology within the Church. But the theologies of the Church in the future can freely commit themselves to different philosophies existing side by side and allow for the fact that they may, to a certain extent, be disparate and alien to one another. And in this situation it may be quite impossible in the concrete to achieve any higher level of integration at which all these various philosophies are subsumed within a single system of philosophy which is regarded as absolute. This insuperable pluralism of the philosophies which are in turn pursued within the theologies is in itself a cause and a factor in the pluralism of the theologies in the Church.

The theology of the future considered precisely as theology, and so not primarily in its bearing upon the future but in its enduring validity as such, will concentrate very decisively upon the heart and centre, the ultimate and basic questions of the Christian message. Certainly this does not mean that we shall have to abolish, or interpret in a quite different sense than formerly, certain expressions of the Church's awareness of her faith which were formulated at some point in the past as claiming an absolute commitment of faith on the part of the Church, and so considered as having the force of official dogma. But this concentration of the theology of the future on the most radical questions and the most ultimate content of revelation surely does imply that the future developments in theology itself, and so too in that understanding of the faith which it helps to condition in history, will consist less than formerly in drawing further distinctions at the conceptual level within the existing statements of the faith; that the aim of the theology of the future will be not so much to produce 'new dogmas' as to achieve a radical understanding of what it means most ultimately and most fundamentally to speak of divine revelation and grace, of the one mediator, of the Church's responsibility for the world, and of eschatological hope.

However regrettable this may appear at first sight, the theology of the future will be one that speaks at what is, comparatively speaking, a very abstract level. This statement is not intended to decide the question of [141] whether and how the man of the future can regain a new and unconstrained attitude towards images, symbols, and therefore too towards myth in the true sense of the term, and so too in his theology, despite his critical rationalism. But even if this were to be successfully achieved the language of the theology of the future would still necessarily be a very abstract one. It must be remembered that in the secular sciences concerned with man, and even in those concerned with the world as subject to sense perception, the treatment of these subjects is always and necessarily an abstract one.[5] This fact alone makes it not so very surprising that theology too has to be treated of at a very abstract level.

Right from the first there has always been, in the treatment of theology, a certain awareness of the fact that all theology can only speak of its subject in analogous terms; in all its statements a difference has to be recognized between the idea and its expression, the image and that reality which it properly signifies. Theologians have had to be aware of this even though they can never overcome the situation in which vision and expression are simultaneously one and distinct. But this distinction is recognized more clearly today than it was formerly. It constitutes the basis, materially speaking justified, for a programme of demythologizing which is for the most part misunderstood or falsely applied. Once this distinction is more clearly grasped at the conscious level it will have the effect of making the language of the theology of the future more abstract. It is true that we have consciously to be aware in theological language of a figurative element which is not simply a quality inherent in the reality signified in itself. It is true that ultimately speaking this figurative element can [5]We might for instance adduce the example of the Quantum Theory in Physics, the subjects of which can only be referred to by means of complicated comparisons.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

be expressed only in statements which themselves in turn have to work with a figurative approach of this kind. Moreover this criticism must precisely be applied to every statement of this kind, since it points to a factor inherent in theological expression in itself. It involves a constant movement to and fro between various conceptual patterns. It means that in seeking to understand such statements we must constantly subject our hermeneutic methods to fresh questioning. Now it is precisely this that forces upon us what at first sight appears as the pallid abstraction of theological language. We will have to accustom ourselves to this just as we have accustomed ourselves to the formal abstractions involved in modern physics. We will have to learn freely to allow the vivid imagery of the ancient formulations of the creed to retain their force as being still [142] significant for us in the future also. But we will have to stand back from them, so to speak, at a greater distance than was formerly the case, in order to express in relatively abstract theological terms what is truly meant by such credal formulae, yet at the same time we must not imagine that that single reality which is signified in both modes of expression can be attained to and lived by solely by a process of mere theological abstraction.

The theology of the future will bear an ecumenical stamp. In the future ecumenical theology will be not so much a special discipline existing side by side with others, but rather an intrinsic element imposing its stamp upon all theological thought and work. The very fact that every theological discipline has a duty to contribute to the life of the Church, and that it belongs to the life of the Church to maintain always and everywhere the ecumenical will to achieve the unity of the Churches and at the same time a living multiplicity within the one Church[6] — this fact in itself is enough to make it necessary for all theology to bear this ecumenical stamp.

One factor will make it more and more possible to impart an ecumenical character of this kind to each specific discipline within the future theology. It is that the methods of work adopted in the theologies of the particular confessions are coming increasingly to approximate to one another. This is because biblical theology is coming to be recognized in all of them as the starting-point and the norm for theological work, and also because nowadays the real theological frontiers to a large extent cut across the confessional boundaries. Again the theologies of the particular confessional groups the ultimately basic positions and basic attitudes (as distinct of course from the further consequences which are drawn from such basic positions, these being still matters of genuine controversy between the confessions) have perhaps already everywhere overcome the limitations inherent in maintaining schools of theology proper to particular confessional groups. Hence with regard to these basic attitudes and basic positions the various Churches no longer differ so very much among themselves. The differences still outstanding between them are concerned rather with some real factor in the life of another Church which makes it different from one's own. In saying this however we do not deny that precisely this difference of attitude towards the realities which divide the confessions from one another has in its turn a certain theological relevance. The theology of the future will have an ecumenical quality. The theologies of the various Churches will be conscious of their responsibility to maintain [143] a constant dialogue with one another, and will be ready mutually to learn from one another.

Again with regard to the choice of subject-matter, the emphases in the theology of the future will be very different from those of the theology of the last century. The greater pluralism among the theologies of which we have already spoken will in itself be enough to ensure this. Of course it is difficult, or even impossible, to say what the central subject-matter of these individual theologies will be. In theology too it is justifiable to allow for something like a fashion. For this means nothing else than the attitude of according due importance to a [6] cf. n. 3.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

specific historical situation which is not always the same, which implies fresh tasks for man at any given time, and therefore too which justifiably imparts to theology itself a form appropriate to the particular epoch. But how this will take place is something which we can hardly guess at in advance. For the present itself is always ambivalent and susceptible of more than one interpretation, and hence in itself lays special claims upon theology. Yet we have to recognize an inescapable circle here such that theology in its turn has itself to interpret this claim which the present makes upon it. Moreover however justified futurology may be in itself, the real future, and that too precisely as the situation in which theology has to develop, remains obscure.[7] Thus with regard to the choice of subject-matter, and the preference given to special subjects in the future theologies, we can perhaps only raise questions, even though we know that these future theologies, even in respect of their content, will have a different structural organization from the theology of the past.

Will the theology of the future be intrinsically anthropocentric in character? This would not imply any contradiction of the fact that theology in itself is radically theocentric, provided only it is borne in mind that man only realizes the theological dimension in his nature in the act of totally committing his own existence to the ineffable mystery which we call God. But concentration upon the anthropocentric element of this kind could mean that in all theological statements the fact that their contents refer to man as subject, as the embodiment of freedom, and as the formative agent of his own world, constantly remains clear.

What will be the principle of structural organization in the theology of the future, and the preference given to specific theological themes which this will quite inevitably entail? Will the principle here be a theology of the practical reason, of action, a political theology of the social responsibility [144] of the Christians and of the Churches towards the secular world?[8] Will the structural organization of the theology of the future be determined by its task of maintaining a constant ideological critique of the secular ideologies and false social utopias, and also of any attitude of ideological mistrust towards the message of the gospel and of the Church herself? Will the theology of the future maintain a far more direct and explicit dialogue with the modern sciences, in which the subject-matter will be arranged by the parties involved instead of being imposed from without, seeing that today and in the future these sciences will have to be understood as existing autonomously in relation to a philosophy which stands apart from the individual sciences? As a result of this these sciences no longer allow philosophy to be the sole sphere in which ideas are exchanged bearing upon man's understanding of himself at the secular level, or upon revelation and theology. Will the theology of the future be organized on different lines in terms of its subject-matter too, in view of the fact that like the other sciences it will have to work out in far closer detail its own methodology and its own hermeneutics? For in a certain sense it has itself to become the theology of theology, even though here it is threatened by the mortal danger of sticking fast in barren reflection upon its own nature, and never coming to terms with the actual reality to be investigated. This is a danger which must at all costs be overcome. Will the theology of the future have to adopt a more transcendental approach in reflecting upon the formal historicity of saving history, towards which of course it remains constantly orientated, or will it rather very quickly find that it has to commit itself with a new freedom to history itself with its openness to the future?

These and similar questions might be raised with regard to the choice of subject-matter in the theology of the future, and many further ones might be added to these. Today, surely, we are hardly yet in a position to answer them, and the multiplicity of such questions, which presumably cannot possibly be decided in terms of any one individual question and answer,

---

[7] cf. esp. the chapter entitled 'The Question of the Future', Theological Investigations, XII.

[8] cf. the chapter entitled 'The Function of the Church as Critic of Society', Theological Investigations, XII.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation points once more to a pluralism of theologies which we must expect for the future.

In its own way this theology of the future must give the Christians and the Churches of the future the courage to take decisions and to engage in concrete action in shaping the future. It can only do this in its own way provided that it ascribes to itself a prophetic function of advising, exhorting, and summoning, while recognizing that the practical sphere has an intelligibility of its own. For it itself is once and for all committed to work [145] in the sphere of speculative reason, and concrete decisions and actions can never be forged solely and exclusively on this anvil. At the same time theology itself is recognizing this more clearly, and conveying it to the Churches. Of itself it justifiably attributes a certain primacy to the practical reason, to freedom, to action, to the future. And at least in virtue of this fact it can make the Christians and the Churches more clearly aware of the truth that Christianity consists in something more than a mere contemplation of essences or an attitude of passively waiting for the advent of the kingdom of God. Rather it consists in bold decisions, in action, in transforming the world, and in these alone is the eschatological hope for the advent of the absolute future made real.[9] Of its very nature as a science theology must constantly be pointing the way on from itself towards a Christianity of action, one which is life and not merely the outcome of theological speculation. In this way theology itself must be that which maintains a living awareness of the fact that Christianity is something more than merely the upholding of a given dogmatic statement as true and something more too than contemplation, cult, and right moral conduct in the world.

The theology of the future will discover in a fresh and more living way that ecclesiological element which is proper to it and which belongs permanently to its very nature. In the future humanity will achieve a higher degree of social organization, and in these conditions the sense of community in the Church's awareness of her own faith, and also in the indissoluble connection which truth itself has with social institutions, will once more become clearer in theology itself. Again in this theology that indispensable element which is the individual's own sense of truth will have to be actively and manifestly engaged. But precisely through this sense of truth which he has the individual will experience more clearly that it is abidingly related to community, to society, and so also to the Church as socially constituted. He will experience that this sense of truth of his will never achieve its due fulness so long as it is allowed to wander alone in the isolated sphere of private opinion. On this basis, I believe, the theology of the future will come to acknowledge with a new freedom, and also with a new firmness of resolve, the ecclesiological element inherent in its own nature.[10]

It is to be hoped that the theology of the future will become more [146] clearly aware that of its very nature it is meant to contribute to Christian living in the concrete and to the self-fulfilment of man in a truly religious sense. It is not a science for its own sake. Having this function, it should perhaps not be a theology of praying and bowing the knee. For it will have to be a critical theology. Yet at the same time it should proceed from prayer more than it has done in the past hundred years. It should not exhaust its resources in mere theological, historical, or speculative learning. As far as possible it should throw light upon the existence of man in the real circumstances of human living, and give him the boldness to commit himself in adoration to the incomprehensibility of existence, at the very roots of which God

[9] Also on this cf. the literature mentioned in n. 1.

[10] cf. K. Rahner, 'Die neue Kirchlichkeit der Theologie', Gnade als Freiheit (Freiburg, 1968), pp. 131-143; Concerning our 'assent to the Church as She Exists in the Concrete', Theological Investigations, XII.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

rules with his grace. It should give him the courage to commit himself to this incomprehensibility with courageous hope and in that love which, in a single act, reaches out to God and man.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[147]

PART TWO

Natural Theology and Christology

[149]

6

THE EXPERIENCE OF GOD TODAY

If we are to speak of the experience of God today we must, in the very nature of the theme we have set ourselves to explore, presuppose two points:

1. That there is such a thing as an experience of God, and
2. That it has a special and peculiar quality of its own, which it derives from our contemporary situation.

In this context the phrase 'experience of God' implies two things: first that what we call God is a reality, and a reality with which we have to do, and therefore that three attitudes on this point are false: (a) atheism, (b) a sceptical positivism which restricts man exclusively to the data accessible to him from the natural sciences, (c) the theology of the absolute remoteness of God, the 'Death of God' theology in the popular sense of the phrase. All these positions imply a denial of man himself and his reality. The second thing that is implied in the phrase 'experience of God' is that there is something more, something different, and something more fundamental than that knowledge of God which can be acquired through the so-called proofs of God's existence, though this is not to deny that these are possible and meaningful in their own right. But in terms of human living in the concrete they are possible and meaningful only as the outcome of an a posteriori process of reasoning as the conceptual objectification of what we call the experience of God, which provides the basis and origin of this process of reasoning. At the same time, however, these proofs of God's existence should not be conceived of as mere intellectual indoctrination informing man of an objective state of affairs which (as for instance in the case of existence of a subparticle in the physical sphere) lies outside and beyond his basic human experience, and of which, therefore, he cannot possibly become aware otherwise than through an indirect and a posteriori knowledge of this kind.

Now let us turn to the second word in our title, the word 'today'. At this preliminary stage we have only two points to make about this: first [150] that it is no part of our intention to try either to assert or to prove that there is an experience of God such that it is absolutely new and proper to the present day, and which, therefore, simply did not exist in earlier times. If God exists, if it is rightly understood what is meant by the term 'God', and if man himself, for all the radical changes which have taken place in his history, does still continue throughout to be precisely man, then it is inconceivable from the outset that some experience of God should have arisen today which did not exist in any sense in earlier times. Our second point with regard to the term 'today' is this: it is equally obvious that the present-day situation of man, in which he has to achieve the total fulness of his own selfhood (for apart from this there is no experience of God), also in a very essential sense imposes its own distinctive stamp upon this experience, more so even than the subsequent process of rational reflection upon it, whatever name we may give to this process, 'proving the existence of God'

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

or anything else. But surely both together, the initial experience and the subsequent reflection, make it justifiable to speak of the 'experience of God of today' without thereby restricting our considerations exclusively to the mere fact that this experience takes place in the present day.

The difficulty of, and at the same time the necessity for these considerations of ours derive from the fact that we are seeking to reflect upon an experience which is present in every man (whether consciously or unconsciously, whether suppressed or accepted, whether rightly or wrongly interpreted, or whatever the way in which it is present), and which involves the following factors: on the one hand it is more basic and more inescapable than any process of rational calculation in which we follow a line of causality leading from the egg to the hen, from the lightning to the thunder, in other words from the world to an originator, but which can also be broken off, leaving the conclusions which might have been arrived at unrecognized. On the other hand, however, this experience does not impose itself upon us irresistibly (as does the physical existence of a datum of sense experience or an organic sensation) in such a way that the transition from the experience itself to an explicit recognition of it in which we reflect upon, interpret, and express it, imposes itself upon us irresistibly. There are other basic experiences also, as we shall shortly have to show, in which the transition from the experience itself (even though it is inescapably present) to a recognition of it at the conceptual and reflexive level is more difficult for the actual subject undergoing the experience, so that this subject can actually prevent this transition from taking place. Moreover the interpretation of these basic experiences which [151] is achieved in this transition can be more or less successful and clear, or the subject can even fail to make the transition at all. Such considerations, therefore, can only serve as pointers or appeals inviting the listener to make the attempt to discover this experience, previously perhaps quite unrecognized within himself, to admit it and to accept it instead of suppressing it, and to ask himself whether he can understand that this appeal to his experience is actually to some extent interpreting it correctly. It is possible for someone hearing a word addressed to him by another not to be ready to listen to that other word uttered from within himself, to become aware of the silent word which his own existence addresses to him. It is possible for him to be unwilling to allow himself to be drawn out of a kind of knowledge in which he is in control of himself, which he has at his disposal, and which is therefore called 'clear', into that mystery which reduces us to perplexity, which controls us and is not controlled by us, and in cases in which we meet with a reluctance of this sort all such appeals to this kind of experience are doomed to failure from the outset. But in that case the subsequent reflection upon this experience at the conceptual level, which we call the proof of God's existence, likewise falls into a void.

Such experiences do exist, and the very mode of their existence is such that they are inescapable. They exist in addition to our sensible experiences of objects in the external world and our vital sensations of joy, sorrow, etc., and quite apart from the experience of God, even though this too has a unique quality of its own which prevents us from grouping it under a single concept together with the other experiences and ascribing the same meaning to it as they have. What joy is, what anxiety, faithfulness, love, trust, and much else besides are, what constitutes logical thinking and responsible decision – these are things which man has already experienced before he reflects upon them and attempts to say what it is that he has all along been experiencing as an intrinsic part of his life. Indeed the expression of these experiences arising from his reflection upon them can actually be false or inadequate. It is possible for someone to achieve and to experience a love that is genuine and personal, a radical faithfulness and responsibility even though what he says about these experiences of his when he is asked what really takes place in them may be very mistaken. On the other hand a man who has been instructed by indoctrination from without can perhaps give a very clever and correct account of this even though properly speaking he has as yet not really experienced anything, or hardly anything, of them. Experience as such and subsequent reflection upon this experience, in which its content is conceptually objectified are never absolutely separate one from the other.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[152] Experience always involves at least a certain incipient process of reflection. But at the same time the two are never identical. Reflection never totally includes the original experience. Indeed there are experiences which the subject really undergoes as such even though in his reflections upon them they are wrongly interpreted, denied, or suppressed. For instance let us take the case of someone who asserts that there is no logic and no truth such that they are fundamentally different from error, such that they can properly be so called; one who asserts that so-called logic and truth are merely the product of specific mechanical processes of the brain, or due simply to social pressures, all of which could no less justifiably be different from what they actually are. In making an assertion of this kind such a one is by implication declaring the opposite of it to be false. But in the very act of doing this he is achieving and experiencing in his turn, whether he admits it or not, the meaning and the claim of that very truth and logic in the absolute which he denies in his conscious assertion. Of course in the unfolding course of an individual's life an experience of the kind we are speaking of, as for instance that of love and faithfulness, is capable even in itself (and not merely in his reflection upon it) of growing, of becoming more radical, of being accepted more totally in his free decision. Or alternatively it can become atrophied and be frustrated in its proper tendency to become more clearly objectified through the process of reflection. Or it can almost cease altogether.

Even such experiences as these take place in a certain mode proper to the particular age. It is true that such basic experiences are prior to any conceptual objectification or interpretation of them, and are in principle independent of these processes. But however true this may be, still we cannot regard this process of objectifying reflection as superfluous, or say 'If such an experience is inescapably present in itself there is in fact no need for us to expend our efforts in reflecting upon it. Rather we can let such experiences remain as they are.' Such an opinion is just as false as if someone were to say that in the sphere of medicine a theoretical knowledge of the nature of a micro-infarct of the heart is superfluous, seeing that even without this knowledge he may perhaps have undergone this experience and never noticed it at all. The actual experience of love is indeed absolutely basic and absolutely indispensable. But despite this fact the experience itself as such can in itself be accepted more profoundly, more purely, and with greater freedom when we achieve a knowledge of its true nature and its implications at the explicitly conscious level.

An experience of this kind can also be related to God, and this experience of God is inescapable. It precisely does not depend upon whether we [153] do or do not call the reality to which it refers 'God', whether or not we express the experience to ourselves in conceptual terms in a theoretical statement about God, whether the individual concerned freely identifies himself with his experience or denies it, suppresses it, or leaves it unexplored. The experience of God which we are pointing to here is not some subsequent emotional reaction to doctrinal instruction about the existence and nature of God which we receive from without and at the theoretical level. Rather it is prior to any such teaching, underlies it, and has to be there already for it to be made intelligible at all. This experience of God is not the privilege of the individual 'mystic', but is present in every man even though the process of reflecting upon it varies greatly from one individual to another in terms of force and clarity. Of course it is an experience of a unique kind, and the interpretation of it at the philosophical and theological level is extremely difficult, so that it cannot properly speaking be achieved here. Otherwise we would have to go on to consider in more precise terms the peculiar and unique mode in which the 'object' of this experience is made present, in other words that reality which we call 'God'. On the one hand, therefore, we would have to say that that which we call 'God', considered 'as' the object of this experience is not present in a manner which should be thought of as analogous to that in which we view an object immediately confronting us (the manner, therefore, which so-called 'ontologism' ascribes to this experience). We should say, rather, that God is present as the asymptotic goal, hidden in itself, of the experience of a limitless dynamic force inherent in the spirit endowed knowledge and freedom On the other hand, however, we should have to emphasize that this dynamic force which the spiritual subject experiences within itself is experienced not as an autonomous power of this subject, but rather as initiated and sustained by the goal towards which it tends. We should have to emphasize that this dynamic force is experienced as 'grace-given' in virtue of the fact that it also includes within itself the powerful hope of achieving a state of ultimate proximity and immediacy to that goal towards which it is tending, so that this goal does not remain merely the power that draws it yet remains eternally asymptotic and remote from it, but really does constitute a goal that can be reached. In this way it would have to be shown that even in the dimension of human awareness itself 'God' is present in a manner which does not have to be defined in terms of either of the two following alternatives: either that 'God' can be present merely as 'conceived of' (almost 'ideologically') or that he can be present in an immediate vision in the sense implied in ontologism. But, as we have said, it is not possible [154] here to enter into these and similar questions concerning the correct metaphysical and theological interpretations of this experience.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

A further point is that it is also meaningless to subject this experience, in a manner which is, theologically speaking too hasty, to the question of whether it belongs to 'nature' or 'grace'. Such a distinction belongs to the subsequent process of reflection, and does not need to be treated of systematically in dealing with the experience itself. In the very nature of the reality we are concerned with we would have to describe this experience in the concrete situation of our human lives as belonging both to 'nature' and to 'grace' at the same time, though in saying this the 'grace' aspect of this experience does not signify a privilege belonging only to particular individuals, while conversely the question of whether this experience is freely accepted in the concrete circumstances of the individual's life remains completely open. This experience of God must not be conceived of as though it were one particular experience among others at the same level, as for instance an experience of pain at the physiological level can be regarded as at the same level as the experience of an optical reaction. The experience of God constitutes, rather (though here we should perhaps abstract from certain mystical experiences in the true sense) the ultimate depths and the radical essence of every spiritual and personal experience (of love, faithfulness, hope and so on), and thereby precisely constitutes also the ultimate unity and totality of experience, in which the person as spiritual possesses himself and is made over to himself.

But how does man undergo this experience? At what point does he begin, if not actually to make this experience for the first time, still to recognize that it has been present all along in his life? Only at this point do we arrive at the true heart and centre of our subject. Once again it must be reiterated: we can only point to this experience, seek to draw another's attention to it in such a way that he discovers within himself that which we only find if, and to the extent that we already possess it. It is however possible to have it and to discover it in oneself even when one has never yet called it the experience of God. In pointing to, and attempting to describe this experience we are constantly faced with a dilemma: in pointing to it and appealing to another to discover it within himself we either attempt to touch the spirit and heart of the individual concerned in the most concrete possible way, and in the particular situation which belongs to him personally – and in that case an appeal of this kind gives the impression of expressing something subjective or poetic, a mood which is too vague to be verifiable. And then our appeal is open to the objection that after all it cannot be taken seriously on any realistic view at the 'down-to-earth' [155] level of everyday life. Alternatively the appeal in which we point to this experience is formulated in terms of the greatest possible philosophical exactitude and at the strictly conceptual level. In that case we shall be discussing it in such very abstract terms that they are difficult to understand, and we are faced with the objection that we are indulging in mere subtle word-play, so that in the end the discussion is abandoned from sheer weariness. In order at all costs to avoid being defeated by this dilemma it will perhaps be best for us to try and express what we mean without indulging in any separate speculation as to the actual language itself which would be employed. In appealing to this experience in our fellows we must ourselves be aware that it is impossible for our words to avoid meeting with a blank wall of incomprehension in those cases in which they are not genuinely ready to open their minds to them, and this must be our consolation. We must remind ourselves that that which we are appealing to, namely the unrecognized experience of God, is present, whether accepted or denied, even in those cases in which any discussion of it meets only with incomprehension. We must remember that what we have to say necessarily presupposes a certain experience of life on the part of our hearer. And in view of this we must not be surprised to find that if he is one who, from a spirit of youth, still feels compelled without misgiving to conquer the external world, he continues to reject or to disregard what we have to say. He has not yet been able to put the question to himself of what it means to have met with disappointment and failure in the effort to conquer the world.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

A potent factor in every life is a certain element of the ineffable, namely mystery. This does not signify that part of reality which still remains to be explored, which we have not yet thoroughly understood or achieved or made real to ourselves. Mystery, rather, is the underlying substrate which is presupposed to and sustains the reality we know. For the condition which makes it possible for man to achieve the fulness of his own existence, and which gives it its special character, is precisely a certain prior apprehension which transcends every particular concrete reality which we conceive of or make real to ourselves, a certain radical limitlessness inherent in every movement of knowledge and freedom even though this stops short at some finite level of significance and is initiated by some specific and individual reality. We exist, think and act in freedom only in virtue of the fact that we have already all along transcended that which is specific and particular, that which we can comprehend, in a movement which knows no boundaries. The moment we become aware of ourselves precisely as the limited being which in so many and such radical ways we [156] are, we have already overstepped these boundaries. Admittedly in doing so we step, as it were, into a void. But nevertheless we have overstepped them. We have experienced ourselves as beings which constantly reach out beyond themselves towards that which cannot be comprehended or circumscribed, that which precisely as having this radical status must be called infinite, that which is sheer mystery, because as the condition which makes every act of apprehending, distinguishing and classifying possible, it itself cannot in turn be experienced in that mode which it itself makes possible and of which it is the condition. It is present as the abiding mystery. This ultimate and original reality, therefore, which has no other basis beyond itself even though the experience of it is mediated through our apprehension of some concrete object, cannot properly speaking be explained in terms of anything else than itself. It is the experience of that mystery which abides, which has been present all along, and precisely as such is both the inconceivable and that which alone is self-evident both at the same time. The dynamism of this limitless movement, and in it the ultimate point of reference towards which it tends, are of course experienced in a single act, and at the same time are in this experienced as distinct. But the 'ultimate point of reference' of this movement is per definitionem precisely not, and cannot be, an 'object' in the same sense as the object aimed at in acts of knowledge and freedom at other levels, so that it can be brought under the control of the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

knower as the preliminary stage in this movement in such a way that he can assign it a specific place in a co-ordinated system. Moreover this ultimate point of reference is experienced in the infinite movement of the spirit and in terms of it, even though it is also precisely that which in itself initiates and sustains this movement. And for these reasons the question of where this movement culminates is ultimately a secondary one. One man may say that the infinite sphere opened up without bounds or end in this movement is the void which, in order to be able to exist at all, points on to an infinite fulness, because nothingness, if the term is taken seriously, cannot be extended so as to become the sphere within which this movement takes place. Another may say that this ultimate point of reference is the infinite fulness itself which is aimed at. Which of these two alternatives we choose is secondary. Hence too it is also a secondary question whether we decide to speak of an experience of God or of the experience of an orientation towards God. Certainly we must always maintain the distinction between the 'objective' and 'subjective' sides of the experience in this context (if man is to avoid making himself God), but nevertheless these two sides are, in a unique and radical manner, inseparable one from the other.

[157] In accordance with the warnings which we gave at the beginning of this study, what we have just said is extremely abstract, and it must never be forgotten that a statement of this kind does not bring about the experience referred to, but refers to it retrospectively as something that already exists. We do not therefore bring about the experience itself by speaking about it retrospectively and in the abstract. The form in which it impinges upon us is extremely concrete, even though it manifests itself as the element of the ineffable in the concrete experience of our everyday life. While it is present unacknowledged and unexpressed in every exercise of our spiritual faculties, it nevertheless manifests itself more clearly and in some sense as an object of enquiry in those episodes in which the individual, normally lost amid the individual affairs and tasks of his everyday life, is to some extent thrown back upon himself and brought to a position in which he can no longer overlook those factors in his life which he customarily evades. Thus it is when man is suddenly reduced to a state of 'aloneness', when every individual thing recedes, as it were, into remoteness and silence and disappears in this, when everything is 'called in question', as we are accustomed to say, when the silence resounds more penetratingly than the accustomed din of everyday life. Thus it is when man suddenly experiences that he is inescapably brought face to face with his own freedom and responsibility, feeling this as a single and total factor embracing the whole of his life and leaving him no further refuge, no possibility of acquittal from guilt. Thus it is in those cases in which man can no longer find any approval or support, can no longer hope for any recognition or any thanks, in which he finds himself called to account for his actions to that silent and infinite reality which is not ours to shape or control, which exists and is not subject to us, that which is most interior to us and most different from us at the same time. Thus it is when man experiences how this reality silently extends itself, as it were, throughout the whole of existence, permeating everything, unifying everything, while remaining itself incomprehensible; when he experiences the fact that this reality which calls him to account is ultimately speaking not that which is, and which takes effect because we ourselves freely posit it, but is rather that which lays claims upon our freedom, that from which there is no appeal, that which is still present in the form of judgement even when we deny that we are answerable to it and seek to escape from it. Thus it is when man suddenly makes the experience of personal love and encounter, suddenly notices, startled and blessed in this both at once, the fact that he has been accepted with a love which is absolute and unconditional even though, when he considers himself alone in all his finitude and frailty, he [158] can assign no reason whatever, find no adequate justification, for this unconditional love that reaches out to him from the other side. Thus it is too when man experiences the fact that he himself likewise loves – loves with an inconceivable audacity that overcomes the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

questionability of the other even though he is aware of this, when he experiences that this love of his is so absolute that it commits him to finding support in a reality which is no longer subject to his control, which is most interior to the love itself in its inconceivability and yet at the same time is different from it. Thus it is when death silently directs its gaze towards a man – that death which causes all to fall into its own nothingness and precisely in doing this, provided only that it is willingly accepted (thus and only thus), does not strike man dead but itself transforms him, liberates him, endows him with that freedom which no longer appeals to or finds support in anything beyond itself, and yet at the same time is unconditional. This is a line of thought which we could and should follow further so as to point out how this single basic experience of man is present in a thousand different forms, and in this experience it is borne in upon him that his existence is open to the inconceivable mystery. In it he remarks that he is the prisoner of his own terrifying finitude (which does exist, and which cruelly torments him) only so long as he turns his eyes away from the infinitude and inconceivable reality which encompasses him on every side, or when he shrinks from it in terror because its power silently and uncontrollably pervades all. It is at this level that we should speak of joy, of faithfulness, of the ultimate angst to which man is subject, of the yearning which transcends every individual reality, of the fear which we feel at the inexorability of truth – that truth which is still there even when it is denied or mocked at. This is the level at which we should speak of the peace that comes from that detachment which never clings onto any individual reality in the absolute, and so gains all of the experience of the beautiful which is the assured promise of that which still lies in the future, of the experience of that radical and inescapable guilt which is nevertheless suddenly and inconceivably forgiven. This is the level at which we should speak of our experience of the fact that that which seems simply to belong to the past nevertheless in truth having come to be, A and in a true and sacred sense is still in force. This is the level at which we should speak of our experience of the infinite openness of the future which is inexhaustible promise. We might proceed still further along this line of thought, and our vision would have to become far more concrete still -concrete not in the sense that it would cause us to lose ourselves in the particular realities of the external world, but rather in the sheer density [159] of that experience which is ultimate and yet present at the same time everywhere in our everyday lives, for in these man is forever occupied with the grains of sand along the shore where he dwells at the edge of the infinite ocean of mystery.

Admittedly we should now go on to bring out more clearly two further truths: first that all these experiences of the absolute imply an original and ultimate unity among themselves, second that these experiences really do point to that which – or better him whom – we call God. Now this second question should in fact be approached from two different directions. We should not merely confine ourselves to saying that what is experienced in this way signifies God, for in that case we should be presupposing that it is clear from the outset what is meant by God. We should also have to state the converse of this: what is meant by God is to be understood on the basis of this experience, because otherwise we are in constant danger of supposing that the term God stands for something meaningless, and so of rejecting this, and then believing that we are compelled to be atheists. However, since we still have much more to speak of apart from this, yet still in the very nature of the case have to make some reply to both these questions, let us take it as given here that both questions are to be answered in the sense we have indicated.

But before we go on to ask ourselves what that special quality in the experience of God is which is peculiar to the present day, two further points must first be noticed: this experience of God should not be discredited as a mere mood carrying no conviction, or as an unverifiable feeling. Nor is it merely a factor in our private interior lives. On the contrary it has a fully social and public significance. This experience is no mere mood, no matter of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

mere feeling and poetry carrying no conviction. It is of course different from that knowledge which the individual achieves at the conceptual level, and within the sphere of knowledge. In fact it bears upon the totality of knowledge and freedom as such. But this is still far from implying that the experience in question consists in a feeling devoid of conviction. For it is present irremovably, however unacknowledged and unreflected upon it may be, in every exercise of the spiritual faculties even at the most rational level in virtue of the fact that every such exercise draws its life from the prior apprehension of the all-transcending whole which is the mystery, one and nameless. It is possible to suppress this experience, but it remains, and at the decisive moments of our lives it breaks in upon our awareness once more with irresistible force. Nor can we say that we should be silent about it on the grounds that we cannot speak 'clearly' about it. For what is clarity? Have we not already spoken [160] about it the moment we say that it is illegitimate to speak about it, that properly we must not speak about it? And if the rationalist philosophers and positivists are unwilling to speak about it, does this mean that the saints, the poets, and other revealers of the fulness of existence as a whole must also be forbidden to speak? The term 'God' is there, and it asserts itself even in the struggle which the atheist wages against God. And will this term 'God' not raise the question ever anew of what is meant by it? And even if this term were ever to be forgotten, even then in the decisive moments of our lives we should still constantly, though silently be encompassed by this nameless mystery of our existence, judging us and endowing us with the grace of our ultimate freedom, and we would discover the ancient name for it anew.

Nor let it be said that this experience is of no account for the social and public areas of our lives. Religion, which constantly draws its life from this experience, is a social reality even though the atheist may believe that it would be better if this reality did not exist. This experience of God would not be made irrelevant in its social aspects even supposing that those realities which we call religions, and which consist in a conceptual reflection upon, and a social institutionalization of this experience of God, were totally to disappear. For even in that case the transcendentality inherent in human life is such that man would still reach out towards that mystery which lies outside his control. The experience of God itself would still take effect, however unconsciously, in terms of faithfulness, responsibility, love and hope, extending beyond all those particular realities which justify such attitudes in human life, and it is these attitudes which, even though they seem to be wholly non-political and private in character, and not susceptible of being directed or controlled from without, do in fact sustain the social level of human living.

Finally we must apply ourselves to the question of what the special characteristics of this 'experience of God today' may be which are proper to our own times; the question, therefore, of whether, despite the fact that up to now we have been describing this experience of God in almost 'supra-temporal' terms, it does not, after all, derive certain quite special characteristics from the special situation in which man stands today. Four brief indications must suffice by way of reply to this question to the extent that any such reply is possible at all here.

1. First the following consideration has to be borne in mind with regard to the 'transcendental' character of the experience of God: the man of earlier times assigned a place to God precisely as a factor in his world even though in doing so he did say that this 'factor' was the highest and [161] most perfect, upon which everything else depended, and even though the philosophers and theologians did teach, in their statements at the theoretical level, that properly speaking it was contrary to the 'nature' of God and of the experience of him to think of God in this way. In spite of this God was thought of in the world as an element of it, and not as that which supported it or as the unfathomable depths beyond it, such that from the outset it could not be accounted as itself belonging to it. God was one particular reality in the world (however much it might be asserted that he had caused all of it to exist), a contributory cause engaged in a constant mutual interchange of activities with the other realities in it. In this way God was rendered 'comprehensible', and the teaching about him was such as every man could readily apply at the practical level. He was the 'good God' who acts as a ruler of the world, acting to ensure the good moral conduct of its inhabitants and at the same time capable of restoring it to his grace. The ultimate content of man's beliefs was indeed valid and true all along. But the actual manner in which he applied those beliefs was less so. This is something that we have only come plainly to recognize today. For now it has become clear even to the average man (who in earlier times still restricted himself to the practical level even in his more lofty speculations) that this kind of God does not exist, that he is not to be found within the world, that he has no heaven above the clouds, that he does not work miracles in order to remove any disturbances in the machinery of the world. The average man of today has come clearly to recognize that God is absolutely incommensurable with the world, and that he cannot be included as one item within our calculations – and so on. It is no wonder, then, that the death of a more primitive idea of God has come to be interpreted as the death of the true God himself, or that God has come to be thought of as unspeakably remote. In truth, however, the position is this: the deepening of our rational comprehension of the world, which has the effect of eliminating the divine from it, is wholly legitimate provided only that this elimination of the divine from the world gradually comes to be experienced more and more as supported and upheld by that transcendence of the world and of the finite subject in which the true experience of God takes place. This experience of God, precisely as it exists today is, much more clearly and radically than in earlier times, an experience of transcendence, a transcendence which eliminates the divine from the world and is thereby enabled to let God be God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

2. A further peculiarity of the experience of God today consists surely in the distinctive character of the medium in which it is communicated in [162] the present. Every experience of God has its medium of communication in virtue of the fact that there always has to be some starting-point from which the process of transcending the world and the subject himself can proceed. And that which constitutes the medium in this sense can change at least in respect of the outward stamp which it bears and which is borne in upon us at the public and social levels of human life and thought. The first point that strikes us is that today, in contrast to earlier times, the medium of this experience has shifted from the world to existence. In earlier times it was the external world with its order and harmony that provided the initial start for man's experience of transcendence. Today it is his existence with its unfathomable depths and it may be conjectured – though perhaps there is some small element of prophecy here – that the mode of existence which is typical precisely of this present age, and which is destined gradually to fulfil this role of being the medium in which the experience of God is communicated, is not so much the existence of the saint with his wisdom and contemplation, but rather that of the man whose life does not appeal to our feelings, who bears responsibility for himself in silence and solitude, yet who exists selflessly for the sake of others.

3. A third element serves further to characterize the distinctive nature of the experience of God of today, with the dangers which threaten it and the new function which it has to fulfil. Formerly religion reigned undisputed at the social level, however many different forms it may have assumed. For there were no nations without gods. And so long as religion had some public expression of this kind the individual who admitted and accepted this experience of God at all had no further special problem in finding it possible to communicate with this God at the personal level, to call upon him and to adore him. Now today this is, perhaps, the real and central problem for man, even when he clearly undergoes this experience of God. Given that this God is radically different from ourselves, and at the same time that which upholds our own activity – including, therefore, the attempt to speak to him and freely to respond to him – can we then really address him and achieve a personal relationship with him? Certainly we should not say that we are too insignificant for him to be able to 'interest'

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

himself in us, for such a line of thought in fact makes him precisely one element in our world, so that his relationship with a smaller element in it would be more tenuous than his relationship with a greater one, whereas in truth he is able voluntarily to enter upon the most immediate possible relationship with us as we are.

[163] But this in itself is not enough to solve the problem. Here we cannot enlarge upon it at any length. But the first point is that this question must be taken seriously. But in that case it has an extremely positive effect in itself in helping to determine our attitude towards God. It makes this attitude something which, in the traditional terminology, is called adoration, total commitment in which man falls into silence, in which the word he addresses to God is merely the prelude to his silence, in which he veils his countenance before the majesty of the ineffable mystery, and in which he is aware that contrary to all appearances today man cannot contend with God. Further: if man feels that actually to address God in this way is unheard of audacity, if indeed he feels the concrete act of venturing upon such a thing as a pure grace, in which God, by his own free act, empowers man to undertake this venture, this is nothing but good. For in that case he will feel that it is anything but obvious that God should empower him to do this, yet at the same time he must not deny the possibility of God doing so, for otherwise he would once more be thinking of God according to human standards. And finally: it is no matter for regret, if we find the courage to address God in this way only by keeping our eyes fixed upon Jesus, seeing that even in death he still managed to call this Mystery ‘Father’, and to surrender himself into his hands even as, in slaying him, it withdrew itself from him and threw him into the most inconceivable state of dereliction from God.

4. It seems that we should include one further factor among those marks of our ‘experience of God today’ which belong particularly to our own times. At first sight it seems as though there were hardly anything specifically Christian in this experience of God, and this seems particularly to be the case in those cases in which it either remains alive or comes to live once more in our conscious awareness, even though all the trends of the time are against it, and even though it receives no significant support from the tradition of Christianity as this survives at the merely social level. We ourselves have in fact treated at length of this experience of God, and in doing so have spoken of it apparently almost without any reference to Christianity or to the Christian message as it has emerged in history. And today there is no lack of religiously motivated individuals – even Christians – who bring their own basic experience of God to the stage of conscious awareness and reflection with the help of witnesses which they are convinced that they perceive everywhere throughout the history of humanity and of the nations and religions of the world, and which they feel to be genuine and inspiring. On this point too we can only make a few brief remarks. We may take two contrasting lines of approach here.

[164] First, the ultimate depths of this experience of God to which we have sought to appeal are precisely the experience of an ineffable nearness of God to us such that for all the adorable inconceivability which abides throughout he bestows himself upon man with an immediacy that brings him forgiveness and a share in his divine life. This experience, therefore, is something more than that of an ultimate point of orientation for all the movement in human life that remains eternally remote from it. Now it is precisely in Christianity that these radical depths of the experience of God are clearly grasped. They are grasped as grace and as something that imposes itself victoriously in Jesus Christ, something that is borne witness to and apprehended in the dimension of history. The experience of God to which we have appealed, therefore, even in the form in which we encounter it in our own times, is not necessarily so a-Christian as appears at first sight. On the contrary, among the religions which de facto exist (considered as historical and social phenomena) it is precisely Christianity which makes real this experience of God in its most radical and purest form, and in Jesus Christ achieves a convincing manifestation of it in history.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now let us approach the same point from the opposite direction and under a different aspect. Today it is becoming clearer, and that too within Christianity at the doctrinal and institutional level, that this experience of God (admittedly as rightly interpreted and in its most radical form) really constitutes the very heart and centre of Christianity itself and also the ever living source of that conscious manifestation which we call 'revelation'. Now if this is true then through this experience of God Christianity itself simply achieves a more radical and clearer understanding of its own authentic nature. For in fact in its true essence it is not one particular religion among others, but rather the sheer objectivation in history of that experience of God which exists everywhere in virtue of God's universal will to save all men by bestowing himself upon them as grace. Today, therefore, Christianity recognizes more clearly than formerly, and makes real in the concrete conditions of human living, the fact that it constitutes the historically pure realization of God's self-bestowal upon mankind which takes place everywhere and in every experience of God, even where, without any fault on the part of the individuals involved, this experience is wrongly interpreted. Christianity, then, is this achieved fulness of God's self-bestowal upon mankind as made definitely victorious in Christ. Now if this is true then recognition of it signifies one element by which Christianity itself can realize its own nature more effectively. It is, therefore, a task precisely for Christianity itself to point [165] ever anew to this basic experience of God, to induce man to discover it within himself, to accept it and also to avow his allegiance to it in its verbal and historical objectivation; for, in its pure form and as related to Jesus Christ as its seal of authenticity, it is precisely this that we call Christianity.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation [166]

7

THEOLOGICAL CONSIDERATIONS ON SECULARIZATION AND ATHEISM

By way of introduction I may be permitted a brief remark concerning the functions and methods of the Secretariat for Unbelievers which has recently been instituted.[1] Since in fact there is also a Secretariat for Non-Christian Religions as well as the Secretariat for Ecumenical Questions we can in practice conclude that the unbelievers with whom this secretariat is intended to deal comprise only the atheists. This secretariat, therefore, must concern itself with atheism and atheists, with maintaining a dialogue with these, and with the struggle against atheism as such in the world. But what is it really intended to do in this respect?

In accordance with the exhortation of 'Gaudium et Spes' of the Second Vatican Council we can of course distinguish the most varied forms of atheism. We can study its roots and origins at the theoretical, historical, and social levels, and in the concrete conditions in which it actually exists.[2] We can attempt to learn more about the various forms of atheism too by entering into dialogue with their representatives, and by arriving at an understanding with these atheists on this or that point which may actually be of real and great importance at the social level, for this clears the way for the subsequent decision which has to be taken between theism and atheism, and is something that can be striven for as the goal of a real and workable humanism which we can join with them in aiming for. But in doing all this are we really achieving anything else than what has been done all along in Catholic theology, in Christian philosophy, and fundamental theology, and in the Christian kerygma? Of course it is [167] possible to say that all these undertakings must be pursued more intensively today, that in order to achieve a form in which they can be more vigorously pursued these interests must be co-ordinated within the Church, that contact with Christian and non-Christian theists must be strengthened in this struggle, and that in all these tasks the Secretariat for Non-Believers must lend its assistance. All this is certainly true and important.

Yet the impression is borne in upon me that, abstracting from the organization and technical aspects of these movements, which must not be underestimated, we cannot say in any real sense to what extent and in what way these movements are effectively aimed at something that is new at the theoretical level,[3] something that has not been recognized or put into practice hitherto. Finally it does after all seem to be the case that we are simply putting forward once more the old and certainly important teaching of a philosophical and theological theism, albeit in a form which is somewhat deeper and more precise, and that we are hoping thereby, by bringing to bear the necessary patience and zeal in our preaching, actually to win over those who were formerly atheists. To this factor of a certain stagnation, present though unadmitted in the theoretical teaching in defence of theism and against atheism, a further one must be added, one to which, after all, we have as yet hardly given any

[1] AAS 56 (1964), p. 560. See also F. König, 'Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil und das Sekretariat für die Nichtglaubenden', Internationale Dialogzeitschrift 1 (Vienna, 1968), pp. 79-88.
[2] On this cf. the Pastoral Constitution of the Second Vatican Council 'Gaudium et Spes', Nos. 19-21, with the commentaries in J. Chr. Hampe (ed.), Die Autorität der Freiheit III (Munich, 1967), pp. 574-615.
[3] On the question of God cf. the author's 'Gott', LTK IV (2nd ed. 1960), 1080-1087; 'Gotteslehre', ibid., 1119-1124; 'Meditation über das Wort "Gott" ', Gnade als Freiheit (Freiburg, 2968), pp. 11-18; 'Gott ist keine naturwissenschaftliche Formel', ibid., pp. 29-23; 'Gott, unser Vater', ibid., pp. 24-29; 'Remarks on the Dogmatic Treatise "De Trinitate", Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore,1966), pp. 77-202; 'Observations on the Doctrine of God in Catholic Dogmatics', Theological Investigations IX, (London and New York, 2972), pp. 127-145 and 'The Experience of God Today', in this volume, pp. 149-165.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

serious consideration. For today we are confronted with the task of bringing about a change at the level of social psychology and, if we may so put it, inherited psychology, in the awareness of the broad masses of society, a change which has become necessary in view of the worldwide atheism which has come to prevail at least at the practical level. The question is, therefore, what form our attempts to bring about this change should take in order to achieve the necessary prior conditions for a theism that is really powerful and effective in men's eyes and at the social and public level. The two questions we have raised and the two deficiencies we have pointed to are of course intrinsically connected. And since in respect of both we do not really have any new idea to offer, we are in no position either to develop any [168] effective strategy for the struggle against atheism.[4] Neither of course is it possible for me, and within the scope of this study, to devise remedies for the two deficiencies I have indicated. Nevertheless we should have an awareness of them, and moreover, for our present purposes this awareness will be presupposed, while we must also hope that the extreme problematical considerations put forward here will meet with sufficient good will and a sufficient readiness to understand the problems involved.

Absolutely speaking it would be my task to discuss that form of atheism which is conditioned by the movement which we of today are accustomed to call the process of secularization. Properly speaking, therefore, in order to describe the characteristics of the atheism to be treated of here, I would have to begin by speaking of this process of secularization in itself, to say what is meant by this, to give an account of its causes and origins in history, to distinguish the various forms which it assumes, to work out the difference between two factors within it: on the one hand a worldliness of the world which has been brought about in a long process of development by Christianity itself, a de-numinization and de-sacralization of the world which is in accordance with the nature of Christianity itself, and on the other hand a secularism which is at basis identical with atheism and is the mortal enemy of Christianity itself.[5]

In all this we would have to draw far more precise distinctions. For instance we would have to raise the question of a justifiable and a false distinction between Christian faith and religion. We would have to investigate what is really involved in the 'Death of God' theology.[6] We would also have to enquire more precisely at the level of empirical sociology into the question of whether this secularization of the world in which we live today is in fact so intense as is often maintained, or whether [169] what is referred to in these terms is often simply a change in the outward form which religion assumes, which we and others are simply confusing with secularization because this religious element no longer falls within our traditional theological and religious categories. But so much has already been written on all this that here we shall not have anything further to say about the process of secularization as such.

Here, therefore, we shall proceed straight away to enquire into that form of atheism as such which corresponds to this state of secularization in the world of today. We shall adopt this

---

[4] On the idea that it is necessary for the Church to have a strategy cf. the author's 'Das Verhältnis der Kirche zur Gegenwartssituation im allgemeinen. Globale kirchliche Strategie', Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/2 (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 19-24.

[5] cf. K. Rahner, 'Theological Reflections on the problem of Secularization', Theological Investigations VIII (London and New York, 1973), pp. 318-349. Here of course we cannot enter any further into the theses of Schillebeeckx, Metz, Schlette et al with regard to this problem.

[6] On the whole it is true to say that even in the Church herself the understanding of God is beginning to change. cf. A. Vanneste, 'Le problème de Dieu de Vatican I à Vatican II', Revue Clergé 22 (1967), pp. 234-251.

In recent times the discussion of the 'Death of God' theology and the efforts to achieve a fresh understanding of God by changing our understanding of transcendence have resulted in such an increase in the literature on this whole complex of questions that it would exceed the limits of a footnote if we were to give even an introductory list of references.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

procedure even though in doing so we are aware of the fact that our starting-point, namely this state of secularization, is a phenomenon that is very obscure, has many different levels, and many different shades of meaning. We shall say therefore quite crudely: there is today an atheism which exists in virtue of the fact that the world has become worldly, i.e. so far as man's feelings are concerned it is not easy for him to discover anything which he can call God in the sphere of his manifold experience of a world that has become ever more complex, but at the same time too ever more comprehensible and controllable. For contemporary man every element in his world which he can experience seems to point on to some other element of the same kind, so that no element ever seems to stand outside this process of functional interplay. In its individual elements the world seems to be a system closed in upon itself which has no outlet leading to a reality which is real and yet at the same time does not belong to the world. And even if we achieve a metaphysical plane of thought at which, by some kind of supreme effort of mind, we seek to say that precisely this closed system called the world, in which these individual elements are closed in upon themselves, points on to a sustaining and originating cause of an absolute kind, with a unity of its own that transcends the world, and that it is this that we call God, still even then the man of today all too easily receives the impression that so lofty a line of thought, which transcends the whole, is demanding too much of him, no longer has any message for him, is unrealizable in the concrete conditions of his existence, and leads only to a mythological reduplication of his world. Yet, as has been said, this is the kind of secularism we are assuming to be present and we believe that it enables us to understand a specific kind of atheism which exists at least at the practical level, and in particular that atheism which from the outset declares that it is incapable of achieving any understanding of a metaphysical question even considered merely as a question.[7]

[170]

I

The first point which has to be made with regard to this atheism that derives from the secularization process is this: that it does exist as one specific phenomenon of this secularized world, yet that in principle, and even today, it should be regarded as the sole form of atheism.[8]

The positive part of this statement surely does not need any separate treatment in order to explain it in greater detail or to prove it. The only further point which we have to make on this is that in their practical lives men have the impression that they can manage even without God (we shall have to speak further on this at a later stage) and that the sciences by which the men of today live – independent of any philosophy – and which appear to the men of today as providing the standards by which they conduct their lives, are in principle, at least so far as their methods are concerned, a-theistic. In other words every phenomenon which engages their attention is reduced by them to another empirically verifiable element in the world as to its original cause. The second part of our introductory statement is initially and for our present purposes somewhat more important: it would be superficial and false to regard the atheism which proceeds from secularization as the only important form of the atheism of today. There are forms of atheism which are quite different in their nature and origins even though in a world that has become secularized these atheisms manifest themselves more easily at the social level and have become more numerous than formerly, and these different atheisms have of course been able to combine in the mind of the individual in the concrete to [7] The historical, philosophical, psychological and sociological assumptions of atheism are treated of at great length in the symposium volume edited by J. Girardi, L'Athéisme dans la vie et culture contemporaine, 2 vols (Paris, 1968/69).

[8] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Atheism', Sacramentum Mundi I (New York and London, 1968), pp. 116-122.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

form a single atheistic mentality and way of life.

Now if these various atheisms really do differ from one another right at their very roots then it is false from the outset to maintain that they can all be reduced to a single common system of so-called atheism in the singular, for since the various systems grouped under this heading spring from quite different roots, any one of them has little more in common with the rest than the name 'atheism'. From this it clearly follows that the struggle against the different atheisms must be conducted in quite different ways. The atheism that springs from secularization, therefore, requires a quite different treatment from that which we accord, for instance, to an atheism springing from an attitude of despairing pessimism which declares that after Auschwitz it is no longer possible to believe in God, or to an atheism which consists merely in an aversion from any [171] thematic treatment of the transcendental reference which man bears to the absolute mystery in and over his own existence, which is merely afraid of adoring an idol once he begins to speak of God and to allow him to enter into his calculations or to have a place in his life. Such an atheism as this seeks to be Godless out of respect for God, and to remain Godless honestly and courageously in the desert of an existence within which no such reality as God is to be found or may even be sought for at all if God is to remain God. Of course between these different atheisms, only a few aspects of which have been indicated here, there is a constant mutual interplay and inter-influence both at the theoretical level and in their application to human living in the concrete. Nevertheless it must still clearly be recognized that they differ from one another in their roots, and so too in their essence, and hence too in the struggle we wage against them our approaches to them must be different. So great are these differences indeed that it would almost be true to say that it is only the label 'atheism' that they have in common. Anyone who is not prepared to recognize this truth must allow the question to be put to him of what precise and really credible idea of God he has. He must allow us to ask him whether what the term 'God' represents for him cannot, in some sense, really and validly be denied or called in question, and whether on this account the atheism which he rejects is not an extremely obscure and dubious entity.[9]

The seriousness and effectiveness of the considerations, proofs, means and methods put forward at the theoretical level and proposed to be used in the struggle against the various forms of atheism, which differ so much from one another, must therefore be measured by this standard: whether on the one hand they really do relate specifically to one particular form of atheism, and whether on the other they do not express mere self-evident truisms which have been and are valid always and everywhere, whereas the specific form of atheism concerned has origins and a background of its own in the history of human thought which have by no means been present always and everywhere, but which are present today, and therefore cannot be overcome in their atheistic developments solely by those considerations, means, and methods which have been put forward and applied always and everywhere. Considerations of this kind at the [172] theoretical level, therefore, and means and methods of this kind at the practical level, must surely be worked out from the first. They are not simply weapons which have all along been there ready to hand in the arsenal of the Ecclesia militans, so that all that we have to do now is at most to polish them somewhat more brightly and to give them a somewhat sharper edge. But if such considerations means and methods need to be worked out afresh, then it is inevitable that any suggestions in this direction must give due and serious consideration to the fact that some of them may be problematical and liable to be contested, that they will have to stand up to discussion or possibly to practical

[9] For a more extensive treatment of this point cf. K. Lehmann, 'Some Ideas from Pastoral Theology on the Proclamation of the Christian Message to Non-Believers of Today', Concilium 3/3 (Pastoral Theology) 1967, pp. 43-52, and the revised and expanded version of this study in Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie III (Freiburg, 1968), pp. 638-677.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

testing insofar as such a thing is possible, and even to a determined attack upon them. All that we shall have to say in what follows is to be understood in this sense and with this proviso. What we are treating of is mere material for discussion and nothing more, though admittedly we shall be treating of this at a very serious level.

II

Against the atheism that derives from secularization, with its pragmatic and positivist mentality which we have already pointed out, there is little sense and little prospect of success in conducting our defence of theism and our struggle against this atheism either explicitly or implicitly merely from the general standpoint 'we cannot manage without God'.

Even on the basis of a true understanding of God it is extremely questionable whether we should attempt to assign to God so utilitarian a place in the struggle for a better world (whether at the individual or the collective levels). The world as God has created it, and as it has been even under the dominion of a theism which has been generally accepted, at least in public, has been an extremely wretched world. It has been this even in those areas in which Christianity has held sway in public life with what is, at least according to the theory of its high-minded theologians, its sublime concept of God. And the very fact that it has been pitiful in this sense means that in principle we cannot use the idea of God in this way. Atheism lays great emphasis on this simple fact of the world's wretchedness, and even if against this we were to rejoin that this wretched world is so as a consequence of man's own guilt, still the atheist could in turn reply that this pitiful state of the world, its anguish and strife, the alienation of man from himself taking place within it, in very large measure does not derive from his own guilt, but on the contrary is itself the cause of this guilt to the extent that there really is any guilt at all. And the [173] atheist might go on to point out that it is precisely the Christian who is least of all in any position to maintain that God has been able to create the world and freedom only at the risk of man falling voluntarily into sin so that no real problem of 'theodicy' exists at all. But even if we abstract from the problems of principle involved in this line of argument that the world cannot prosper without God, still the man of today at least has the impression that wherever, and to the extent that, any improvement has been achieved in the world and that progress has been made, this has been achieved by man himself and that he has done it of his own initiative even without God.

There is a question which we intend to set aside here even though it is no merely theoretical one, but of the highest practical importance as well; the question, namely, of what would happen if the idea of God were to be totally eliminated in the world, if theism were to disappear not merely in its explicit, but in its anonymous form as well. On this question we should certainly have to say that taking human life as a whole we certainly cannot manage without the idea of God, at least – in order to be completely prudent – not if we include within this idea of God those unexplicitated and anonymous forms of this encounter with God also which do exist and which are transcendentally necessary so long as man continues to exist at the spiritual dimension and has not degenerated to the level of an intelligent animal. Certainly we should have to refer, in this connection, to C. G. Jung's statement according to which all human conflicts in a man of over thirty-five have a religious origin, whether he is aware of it or not.[10] But, as has been said, for our present purposes we shall be abstracting from this question, ultimately crucial though it is.

Prior to this, however, and apart from it, even if this ultimate and fundamental question has to be answered in the affirmative, still there is very much that is possible in the world which,

[10] C. G. Jung, Die Beziehungen der Psychotherapie zur Seelsorge (Zürich, 1948), p. 16.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

it was formerly believed, required an immediate and explicit basis in theism. There is much in human life at the individual and social levels which in earlier times derived its stability from the idea of God, yet which today can in fact be aimed at as a goal, even without any recourse to an explicit theism by means of a liberal and humanistic education, by consciously aiming to develop psychic mechanisms and social methods of training, by means of social pressures and conditions of interdependence, and finally by the police. It is true that today at least not enough experiments have yet been carried out for us to be in a position to lay down what can be achieved in the way [174] of a genuine humanism and a tolerable mode of social living among men by a genuinely atheistic society in which all the surviving elements of an earlier mode of living based on theism have effectively been eliminated. Nevertheless, while not calling in question the fact that the idea of God has an ultimate significance of its own, we may perhaps be permitted to doubt whether there are any very notable differences between the average morality of an atheistic society which can already be observed, to the extent that such a phenomenon does exist, and the morality of an average theistic society, i.e. one in which the idea of God has a certain validity for the purposes of public life and remains undisputed at the public level. It is true that we can produce definitions, at the speculative and theoretical level, of the pure atheist and the absolute theist, and compare them with one another, and on the basis of this we can probably give an unambiguous preference to the theist not merely with regard to the question of truth as such, but also with regard to the practical effectiveness of his tenets in producing a humane and tolerable way of life. But this theoretical construction and comparison has only a very limited effectiveness so far as the working out of a practical apologetics for theism is concerned. For first we are unable to produce this pure atheist at the experimental level, since in fact such an individual does not yet exist today. Indeed, in view of the factor of a certain anonymous and unexplicitated transcendental theism even the avowed atheist cannot be said to be a pure atheist in this sense. And second, it is only with great difficulty that we can produce that kind of theist who shapes his whole life radically and exclusively on the basis of his theist convictions.

So far as the practical apologetics for theism are concerned, therefore, we shall have to recognize that that approach in which we invoke the idea that we cannot manage either at the individual or the social level without the idea of God has to be viewed with the utmost caution and critical realism. The actual position at present is such that at least so far as our external empirical observations are concerned, atheists die peaceably and without any particular fear, and that morality considered as an empirical and statistically calculable entity in a society does not seem, in any very clear sense, to be dependent upon our position with regard to the existence of God, whether we still verbally acknowledge this, or call it in question, or positively deny it. So far as the maintenance of liberal and humane morality in society is concerned we must not, precisely as Catholics, be too hasty and over-zealous in using the idea of God as a weapon in our argument. In fact we are upholders of the idea of the ‘natural law’, whatever interpretation may be placed upon this concept, so very controversial [175] as it has once more become in the present day. Now on any showing this means that there are basic principles of moral conduct such that they have to be discovered first and foremost in the nature of man himself, and in the structures of the society and the environment in which he has to live, even though any binding force which we may attach to these human norms immanent within our own world does include a theism that is postulated at least at the implicit and non-thematic level. This in itself should cause us to observe the greatest prudence and reserve in adopting the approach to apologetics described above.

To this a further and rather different point must be added. When theism is invoked as a postulate for shaping the world in a way that ‘makes the course of human life in it reasonably humane and tolerable, it almost inevitably arouses the suspicion in the mind of modern man of being a fictitious ideology. It is quite useful, but for that very reason incurs the suspicion

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation of being a mere fiction. The question of whether we believe in God certainly has some importance too for human living in its fully concrete reality. But if we attempt to persuade either ourselves or another to believe in God precisely in order that these very real advantages ensuing from belief in God may be gained, then hi the majority of cases today the psychological mechanism which we seek to set in motion in this way will fail to function in view of the fact that the world as we experience it is so terrible. Some will say that the idea of God is 'too beautiful to be true'. Others will always regard the element postulated in it (and even Kant freely invoked this in his work) as the fictitious element, and will say that a God who is postulated to exist on the grounds of human needs is and remains in all cases a projection of man himself, something which is conjured up by him to help him. They will say that this postulated element is the opium of the people, valid only so long as they cannot find the help they need elsewhere, a neurosis of humanity which has gradually to be broken down.

III

The positive message that there is a living God, and that he wills to save mankind, is in principle directed to all men. Certainly there are in principle no explicitly definable boundaries for Christianity and the missionary movement of the Church at which her proclamation of the living God should be brought to a halt, no boundaries beyond which live men to whom theism is from the outset and in principle of no concern. It is no less obvious, and in principle still more important, that there is no form [176] of human living in which an encounter with God does not take place at least anonymously, non-thematically, and transcendentally (or however we may wish to express the reality referred to). For everywhere where a truth is asserted as absolute there, as a matter of transcendental necessity, albeit, perhaps, in a quite anonymous and unacknowledged manner, God is present, even in those cases in which the individual involved is unable consciously to recognize this transcendental implication or to express it in words, or when, by a culpable misuse of his own freedom, he denies or excludes this radical mystery of his own existence.[11] The more firmly a Christian theism has to stand by the two principles just mentioned, the more it must guard against the danger of drawing from them conclusions which are over-hasty and ultimately false. What we mean by this is that without being false to its own nature or adopting an attitude of cowardly defeatism, and without allowing itself to be intimidated by the atheism of today, Christian preaching can be realistic enough to take into account the possibility that de facto even the message of theism as such, and not merely the more complex and detailed tenets of Christianity, will remain more or less ineffective so far as a great part of the future order of society and mankind is concerned. Contrary to the tacit assumptions of scholastic theology we cannot see why any fundamental distinction has to be drawn in this question on theological grounds between the chances of survival for an explicit theism on the one hand and those which may be ascribed to Christianity in the full sense on the other. Formerly the necessity for such a distinction was regarded as axiomatic, even though the problem involved was not clearly recognized. The reason for this was first that it was held that as many individuals as possible must have a real chance of salvation, yet without any theism this was regarded as inconceivable (in accordance with Hebrews 11:6), and second that it was not possible to conceive of an anonymous theism, a theism which had not been objectified at the conceptual and verbal level so as to become an object of conscious thought, yet which could also be accepted in freedom and which had power to justify. Today, however, the Second [11] For a similar thesis of the author's with regard to the possibility of an anonymous Christianity in the atheist cf. 'Atheism and Implicit Christianity', Theological Investigations IX (London and New York, 1972), pp. 145-164.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Vatican Council has laid down that even the atheist has a genuine chance of salvation so long as he is true to the promptings of his own conscience. In asserting this the Second Vatican Council was manifestly thinking too of the kind of atheist who throughout the course of his life will never become a theist at the explicit and thematic level, yet at the same time it still remains true that [177] without any encounter with God salvation is impossible. Now in view of all this there must be a theism of the sort which I have described, a theism that is anonymous, non-thematic, and even as such capable of really existing and being accepted in freedom. I cannot enter into the nature of this theism here in any closer detail.[12]

But if this is the case then I can no longer see why the chances of Christianity surviving at the historical and social level have to be regarded as less than those of theism as such; why for instance – to put it in more concrete terms – the established theology up to now finds it easier to recognize the possibility of an inculpable failure to recognize the truth of Christianity, the Church, and the obligations which these impose than to see that the same must apply with regard to the explicit recognition of the existence of God. Of course certain differences may exist even in this case. But they are certainly not so fundamental or so great as was supposed by the former established theology right up to the point at which the Second Vatican Council began. To put the matter for the moment in an exaggeratedly hostile way, and one which perhaps goes beyond the facts, it would be perfectly possible to imagine that in some future but wholly conceivable age the opportunities of survival for a Christianity that exists in concrete form are actually greater than those to be ascribed to a theism in the abstract, one which exists apart from the concrete reality and practice of a Christianity embodied in the Church. However this may be, we can at least say this much: Just as the specifically Christian message recognizes from the outset that in the case of many individuals and social groups it will de facto fail to make them Christian in any explicit sense, and yet in spite of this regards it as possible that such individuals will find salvation in an 'anonymous Christianity', so too a similar situation may freely be expected, or at least taken into account as possible, for the future with regard to theism as well.

In the future, therefore, it may be presumed that atheism of the explicit kind will be extremely widespread (though of course there will be very many different shades and degrees of this) ranging from an atheism of irresponsiveness and indifference towards religion as a matter of living practice to one that is very thoroughly worked out at the theoretical level, and in fact a militant atheism (admittedly, for reasons which cannot be developed in any greater detail here, an atheism of this kind, as it exists in the concrete individual, is under certain circumstances perfectly compatible with an implicit and anonymous theism). There will be a widespread atheism of this kind in the future because the situation in which the [178] world has become secularized cannot be reversed. Now this situation is constantly renewing its impact upon men and so generating an atheism of this kind in very many of them, not indeed with any justification at the theoretical level, but nevertheless with a certain psychological compulsion.

Without prejudice, therefore, to the fundamental universality of its message of the living God, a universality which we are bound to strive for, Christianity and the Church can reckon with this prospect of an extremely widespread and enduring atheism as a 'must' of saving history in their proclamation of this message, just as the Church always reckons with the 'must' of saving history that she and her message will always remain the sign that is contradicted, and even with the fact that this contradiction is becoming more acute. However true it may be that this 'must' relates to something that should not be the case, the fact still remains that Christianity and the Church can allow this prospect to enter into their calculations and turn it to good account by allowing it to produce a kind of reaction within

[12] cf. n. II

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

them. In this sense, therefore, they can allow the methods and tactics they adopt in the preaching of theism to be influenced by this factor. In other contexts also factors of a similar kind are already taken into account, as in the methods and tactics of pastoral work. For instance these may determine how certain finite forces are to be applied in the pastoral field and used to determine the specific directions in which pressure is applied in pastoral work. This takes place in cases in which the pastoral effort has a smaller chance of being effective and the mode and direction of such pastoral work are ordered accordingly.

IV

In the light of all this it would be perfectly conceivable for explicit theism, both in the account that it gives of itself and in its methods, to be thought of and presented as the 'wooing' of an 'elite'. Of course such a thesis is only intended as a basis for discussion with all due reservations. It is also obvious that the term 'elite', both in respect of its content and in its applicability to our present question, is highly problematical, and never at any stage intended to refer to specific social groups.

An initial objection might be that objective truth can have nothing to do with an 'elitist' awareness since truth is either valid for all or else does not exist. But against this the point that we must constantly keep in the forefront of our minds is precisely which truth is being treated of. There are truths which from the outset relate to the totality of human existence, and the recognition of these depends upon many prior factors, and a certain [179] vision of human nature in its totality. These are truths, moreover, which always involve an element of decision and the process of objectifying them at the conceptual level also presupposes very many intellectual conditions such as can, in effect, be achieved only with great difficulty in those situations in which they are not supported by a public opinion that is homogeneous throughout a given society. Such truths as these may very well have something to do with the kind of awareness that may be called 'elitist', and however true it may be that such truths and convictions have an objective validity of their own in virtue of which they are in principle of concern to all, still as they exist in the concrete they do have the character of being orientated towards an 'elite'. Moreover such truths and convictions do exist quite apart from, and independent of the problem of theism. The loftier perceptions in the fields of aesthetics, logic, ethics etc. are in themselves truths for all, yet de facto they only come to be apprehended by a minority endowed with the necessary equipment for receiving them, and in this sense 'elitist'. The theism of the future can de facto – though this does not mean de jure – have an 'élitist' character in this sense. Formerly we closed our minds to any such possibility because of our belief (this is a point which has already been emphasized) that we necessarily had to accept an element of culpability in any atheist who remained obstinate in his atheism. We have already briefly indicated that this assumption is theologically invalid.

To this the following consideration must now be added. In earlier situations in the history of human thought some idea of God was certainly present in most minds, mainly because it was supported by public opinion in society as a whole. But the moment we put the question seriously to ourselves of what part this concept of God effectively played in the lives of very many of these earlier 'theists' both inside and outside of Christendom, then surely we can justifiably ask whether precisely this idea of God really had so very much to do with the true, living, and inconceivable God as he really is. From this we can go on to raise the further question of whether the abandonment of an idea of God of this kind, which has been brought about by the new situation which has arisen in public thought and social life, truly has altered so very much with regard to the real chance of salvation which men of this kind have. And if in reply to this it were to be objected that even

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in so shockingly primitive and degenerate an idea of God some kind of very decisive reference to the true God was still always present, some notion of the true God was still always guessed at, then we must rejoin that an unexplicitated reference to God of this kind still remains constantly present even in those cases in [180] which it is no longer labelled with the term 'God' in the mind of the individual concerned through the influence of public opinion in society as a whole. In the light of this, and so far as a great part of the men of the future as they will tie facto exist are concerned, there is no need whatever to present true theism as that which is, both at the theoretical and the social level, simply self-evident, that which would already have to be explicitly present even in a human group which had only reached a very 'primitive' stage of development. In stating this principle we are of course presupposing that rational thought, even in its highest stages of scientific and technical development, can be perfectly compatible with a stage of development within mankind which is only very 'primitive' to the extent that development here consists in finding within oneself the courage explicitly to face up to the one question which is entailed by the very nature of man as a single whole, and by the world in general.

Even the teaching of the First Vatican Council with regard to the possibility of recognizing the existence of God by the light of the natural reason does not invalidate the theory of the 'elitist' character of the theism of the future. For what is being treated of in this definition is a possibility in principle which applies to man as such. But nothing is said here about the possibility or impossibility of an individual man in his concrete situation coming to recognize God by the power of his own capacities as an individual. Even Thomas Aquinas has emphasized how very much the individual man in the concrete is dependent, even for this knowledge, upon his social situation. Now if it is true that in the present and future this situation entails a greater danger than formerly of raising difficulties or obstacles to prevent man from knowing God, then it will not be surprising if many men fail to arrive at any explicit knowledge of God with sufficient clarity and firmness. Moreover this statement is not irreconcilable with the declaration of the First Vatican Council.

On the basis of all that we have said, therefore, there is nothing which makes it illegitimate for us in conducting an apologetic on behalf of theism in the future to proclaim this theism as the specially exalted gift of the wise who are impelled to advance to an ultimate understanding of their own existence in a way which, other things being equal, cannot possibly be accessible to the 'profanum vulgus' even though no-one can in principle and from the outset be excluded from this matured experience of existence. And surely there is a further reason too for regarding a theism of this kind rather as the especially exalted gift of the wise. In a world which has become so complex that it is almost impossible to gain any comprehensive view of it, and in which the methods employed in all science proceed [181] along a-theistic lines (even though this in itself is justified) it is immensely difficult to view the one and ultimate question of truth as a single whole, and to make it a subject of investigation in itself, to dare explicitly and in a spirit of adoration to come to terms with that mystery which, almost per definitionem withdraws itself from man into its own ineffability. I believe that an explicit theism of the future will more readily be made 'attractive' even for the many if it is considered and presented as 'elitist' in character than if, contrary to all appearances and contrary to a widespread public feeling, it is presented as a doctrine which only the stupid or malicious will reject.

If the considerations which we have just put forward are to some extent correct then, while explicit theism would not have to regard every form of atheism as 'narrow-minded', it would have to regard that form which proceeds from secularization as being this; as the attitude and perspective in terms of thought and life of those who, for reasons which are very varied but also very understandable, have not – at any rate not yet -advanced to the stage of being able to achieve an overall view of the functional interconnection between the individual elements

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in their existence and in the world and explicitly to objectify this at the conceptual level. Because they have not yet reached this stage they cannot yet face up to the absolute mystery which ultimately, but silently encompasses this totality of the world, within which their own activities are confined. This attitude in which the theist of the future feels atheism to be 'narrow-minded', 'uneducated' and 'primitive' actually can and may (though all possible caution and educational discretion must be brought to bear here) help to determine the form of the apologetics which theism develops against this kind of atheism. The attitude here is to some extent analogous to that which is adopted by one who is genuinely expert and very highly educated in musical matters towards one who feels that the marches of a brass band or a popular song represent the supreme point of his musical experience. This attitude, in which theism justifiably feels itself superior to this kind of atheism, should come to be accepted as obvious. The theist should no longer feel himself to be the one who is defending an old theory against a modern viewpoint, but rather as the one who humanly speaking and in the concrete conditions of human living, has advanced farther than the atheist. And if this attitude were adopted then we should perhaps more easily and more quickly overcome the shock which many theists of today feel from the fact that on the one hand they assume that it is theism that constitutes the self-evident truth which all understand and are able to recognize, while on the other it is borne in upon them as a matter of [182] experience that many do not share this theism, are opposed to it from the outset as being unintelligible, even though at the same time they cannot be described either as stupid or as ill-willed.

V

To the extent that theism is actively opposed to this atheism that stems from the secularization process it requires something more than a mere indoctrination on the lines of the old scholastic proofs of God's existence, however correct these may have been viewed as a whole. Over and above this it requires an 'initiation' in which it attempts from the outset to appeal to man as a single totality.

In the manner in which the old proofs of God's existence were put forward they were very remarkable in character. On the one hand they were presented in a way that suggested that they were seeking to prove to the individual a truth of which he had hitherto never heard anything at all. The effect they had was as if in treating of God and the knowledge that could be gained of him they were dealing with a matter which could be brought home to man from without in the same way as, for instance, the existence of a distant land to which the hearer had never yet journeyed. These proofs did not really take into account the fact that the subject of which they were treating had been latently present all along in the hearer in a manner corresponding to his particular capacities and the resources of freedom and knowledge inherent in the human spirit. They failed to take into account the fact that under certain circumstances the truth they were proposing had actually already freely been assented to. In other words what these proofs of God's existence were seeking to achieve was to objectify in the form of a conceptual statement something of which the hearer had all along been aware at the transcendental, implicit, and non-thematic level rather than to indoctrinate him ab initio with a completely new truth which had never been present in him in any sense at all. On the other hand, however, these proofs of God's existence were put forward by people who had never been assailed by the slightest doubt of God's existence by anything deriving from the course of their own personal lives, or still more from the milieu in which they lived. In this respect too the situation was, and for the most part still is, similar to that which prevails in moral questions. If as a result of a certain global instinct inherent in human living, and of consistently acting upon a given moral maxim in practice, the individual is already convinced of the rightness of this maxim, then he will be very quick to receive the light of the a posteriori [183] justification of this maxim at the theoretical level, even though it remains true that these proofs, viewed in their true perspective, do not amount to much more than a repetition of the thesis in different terms. When the hearer is already himself a 'practising theist' and is this in a social milieu that is homogeneously theistic in its turn, the proofs of God's existence do not constitute any particular difficulty for him. But if this is not the hearer's situation then, even if he is not, as he very well may be, the better philosopher, while he may perhaps not raise many objections against these proofs, they will nevertheless fail to make any real or effective impact upon the hearer in the concrete conditions of his life.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In order to achieve such a thing something more is needed than an indoctrination of this kind at the conceptual level. What is needed is an initiation, an 'inauguration' into an experience of God that is ultimate and basic. What is more, this is needed precisely in the case of an atheist who has been influenced by the secularization process, because precisely this kind of atheist, as informed by a positivist and pragmatic mentality, is most of all remote, at least so far as any conscious reflection upon them is concerned, from those experiences which the proofs of God's existence in the usual sense assume as obviously having been present in him all along. Of course when we speak of initiation and inauguration we are initially simply enunciating a term which in its turn raises a problem without solving it. Nevertheless if any understanding has been achieved of that reality which we have already often designated as man's transcendental reference to the mystery[13] called God, if this transcendental reference is not once more confused with the concept corresponding to it and objectifying statements about it, if we do not speak of this transcendental reference in merely abstract and formal terms, but rather point it out to man in his concrete life (for it is precisely here, in his own life, that he makes this experience all unnoticed and undefined, whether he wills it or not) then it is no mere empty talk to speak of the possibility of and necessity for inaugurating him into an ultimate experience of God. This is not to deny that we have spoken of this initiation only in very abstract and formal terms, because at the moment nothing more is possible here.

It is a fact that a great number of those who proclaim the message of Christian theism basically speaking take as their starting-point a sense [184] which is still sustained by a (mere) general social acceptance that their theism is self-evident. Basically speaking they themselves are aware only of God as an idea indoctrinated ab externo. They are far from having achieved with sufficient clarity a truly ultimate religious experience of their own radical reference to the ineffable mystery which we call God. Alternatively in those cases in which, and to the extent that, such an experience is present in them, they are unable either to express it in genuine and credible terms, or to combine it in an effective and living way with their indoctrinated theism. And because of this the majority of those who uphold this Christian theism are at most in a position to teach this to others at the theoretical level, and even this is something which they do only in an extremely inadequate way in their dealings with really educated atheists. Still less do they succeed in advancing from this point to achieve a truly genuine initiation into the ultimate mystery of human existence or, to put it more precisely, to instil others with the courage to face up to this experience and accept it. In the light of this it would often be better if the preachers of the message of explicit theism had experienced in the concrete conditions of their own lives more of those temptations from which the various forms of atheism, especially that form which springs from the [13] cf. K. Rahner, 'The Concept of Mystery in Catholic Theology', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 36-73; idem, 'Science as a "Confession"?', Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore, 3967), pp. 385-400; idem, Worte ins Schweigen (Innsbruck, 10th ed., 1967), and the study entitled 'Reflections on Methodology in Theology', in this volume, pp. 68-114.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

secularization process, emerge.

I cannot refrain from adducing one example of this inadequacy, this inability to speak of theism – which, after all, is the basis and centre of the Christian faith – in a way that really springs from the situation of modern man. I am referring here to the credal formula which has recently been published at the end of the 'Year of Faith' by Paul VI[14] It has much to say about God which is extremely acute and profound. But a truly modern credal formula of this kind, should also declare how a man of today can really arrive at belief in this God, and of this we hear nothing.

[14] AAS 60 (1968), pp. 433-445.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[185]

8

THE POSITION OF CHRISTOLOGY IN THE CHURCH BETWEEN EXEGESIS AND DOGMATICS

Preliminary Remarks

In order to make the problem intelligible some preliminary approach will first be necessary. The faith of the Church, and so fundamental theology and dogmatics too, recognizes the existence of a saving history, something, therefore which takes place in the 'space-time' dimension of our existence, something which is unique and unrepeatable. In this history that which we call salvation is achieved, the turning of God to man. Moreover it takes place in such a way that this turning of his really does take place in history, and is dependent upon certain quite specific events to provide it with its proper dimension and reality. That which theologians call salvation is not a truth belonging to the realm of knowledge, always the same, eternally valid, elevated above history. And it is not a summons or turning of God to mankind such that it has always been given in the same way. Nor is it merely man's reaction in the dimension of history to an offering of salvation on God's part which itself always remains the same. Rather salvation itself takes place precisely as history, the history of God's action upon man. There is a more precise question, the question of how God the eternal, with his will to save which is ultimately the same, is related to that history in which this will to save achieves its historical manifestation. But this is a question to which we cannot give any deeper consideration here.[1] In any case the exponents of [186] fundamental theology and dogmatics assume as the basis for their specific statements that there is such a thing as saving history, that God acts in history, and that the distinctions to be drawn within this action of his are not based merely upon the different reactions of men to it. They assume rather that within God's saving action in history there can be events of such a kind that in them something is achieved once and for all, that even though this action of his is in principle posited in the dimension of space and time it nevertheless imports salvation for mankind in the future, and indeed under certain conditions (as the Christ-event shows) for the whole of humanity, even those sections of it which come before the event itself.

Now in such deeds of God in saving history the word as word of God in the mouth of man is (for reasons which we shall not be treating of within the scope of the present study) a constitutive element in the saving event itself such that without it an event could not really belong to saving history at all.[2] From this it may be concluded that the practitioners of [1] Admittedly in any theology of saving history this is a problem which would have to be treated of at length. For a summary cf. K. Rahner, 'Universal Salvific Will. General', Sacramentum Mundi 5 (London and New York, 1969), pp. 405-409.

The fact that here too different conceptions of history are possible, and so different theologies, is self-evident and needs no emphasis. A good survey of the conceptions of history which are influential in the contemporary theological sphere is to be found in W. Kasper, 'Grundlinien einer Theologie der Geschichte', TQ 144 (1964), pp. 129-169; J. Ratzinger, 'Heilsgeschichte und Eschatologie. Zur Frage nach dem Ansatz des theologischen Denkens', Theologie im Wandel I (edited by the Faculty of Catholic Theology of the University of Tübingen) (Munich, 1967), pp. 68-89; F. Schupp, 'Die Geschichtsauffassung am Beginn der Tübinger Schule und in der gegenwärtigen Theologie', ZKT 91 (1969), pp. 150-171.

[2] It is important to emphasize this because in the Protestant sphere, for instance, there is an explicitly verbal theology which is in contrast to the various theologies orientated towards saving history. In this verbal theology the 'word character' of history and 'the reference to history' inherent in the word have a contrasting

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Catholic fundamental theology and dogmatics cannot dispense with the conviction that in the historical Jesus there was an awareness and an assertion of the significance of his own function and his person such that, in the fulness and authentication which they achieve through the Resurrection, they effectively constitute the basis and the adequate point of departure for those beliefs which are proclaimed by Christian and Catholic dogma in the christology of Jesus Christ. The exponent of Catholic fundamental theology and dogmatics, therefore, must hold firm to the fact that there was a Jesus of Nazareth who, in his own understanding [187] of himself even at the pre-Easter stage had something to do with what Christian faith believes and proclaims of Jesus Christ the risen Lord. Otherwise the life of Jesus and his death would not have constituted a saving event. The post-Easter faith would, in itself and taken in isolation, be the saving event, and in the last analysis would have no necessary connection with Jesus himself or with his death.[3]

Of course – and it is only here that we really touch upon the problem with which we have to concern ourselves – Jesus' understanding of himself, his mission, and his person were not necessarily of such a kind that there is, so to say, a verbal identity between it and what is stated about Jesus Christ in the subsequent christology of the Church. But if before Easter Jesus had been only a man who, in virtue of some kind of religious inspiration and a certain consciousness of his mission, appeared as some kind of prophet or religious genius, and if in the last analysis the message he upheld had nothing whatever to do with his own person, his reality and his death, then the post-Easter christological teaching of the New Testament, and a fortiori that of the later Church, would after all be precisely nothing more than a religious idea which had adventitiously been projected onto this Jesus. Nor would Easter alone be of any assistance in narrowing the gap between the pre-Easter Jesus and the post-Easter christology unless it had been the seal set upon a claim of Jesus himself rather than merely the abstract experience of that validity in the life of any individual we like to choose which endures beyond his death. Indeed it would be perfectly possible to imagine a prophet who, having suffered a prophet's fate, is thought of after his death as one whom God had delivered, and is in this sense risen from the dead. But thereby he would in fact cease to be what he formerly was, a prophet, a religious genius, a man inspired by God, who perhaps expressed certain very important truths with regard to the relationship which man bears to God. Even if he had undergone a 'resurrection', his life and his death would not themselves achieve the status of an eschatological event of salvation with a significance for all men. Certainly the apostles were able to express the ultimate truth with regard to the function and person of Jesus in saving history only in the knowledge that he is not only the crucified Lord, but the risen Lord as well. But conversely the experience of an individual having undergone some kind of abstract resurrection cannot be any substitute for a knowledge of his function and person, which must be supplied from elsewhere.

[188] Of course we can say that the Resurrection of Jesus is the enthronement of this individual, in which he is accorded the status of the bringer of salvation in the absolute, and the entire christology of the Church might be developed on the basis of this. But even then the question would still remain of whence this interpretation of the Resurrection acquires its significance. cf., among others, R. Bultmann, 'Heilsgeschichte and Geschichte. Zu Oscar Cullmanns Christus und die Zeit', TLZ 73 (1948), 659/660.

---

On the problem of the connection between saving truth and the truth of history a very precisely worked out prise de position on the part of the official Church is to be found under Nos. 11 and 12 of the Constitution 'Dei Verbum' of the Second Vatican Council. On this cf. the detailed commentary by J. Ratzinger in LTK II, revised and expanded (1967), 544-557.

[3] The concept of 'retrospective interpretation' does not seem sufficient of itself unambiguously to eliminate a misunderstanding of this kind. For the validity of such an interpretation has itself in turn first to be established in theological terms.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

justification, and how it has emerged at all. This question becomes more urgent today in view of the fact that a contemporary exegesis and theology will not accept that the post-Easter Jesus has expressed and formulated a christology defining the significance of his own Resurrection. Moreover if the Resurrection of Jesus is not to be viewed merely as an external apologetic argument from miracles, in other words if it was itself a witness, an element in what is being borne witness to, then Catholic theology still cannot dispense with the truth that the pre-Easter Jesus recognized and stated so much about his own mission and function in saving history that this, when confronted by and combined with the experience of his definitive fate of having been delivered by God, provides the starting-point for that christology which is already present in Paul and John, and then extends further to the christological dogma of the Church. The question of precisely what understanding of himself in the pre-Easter Jesus is being referred to here is one which we shall have to spend a little further time in investigating.

For the historian the question of what significance the pre-Easter Jesus perceived in himself with regard to his function and his person is not so simple to decide. And hence even in the New Testament itself, when we meet with the titles of glory and concepts of exaltation etc. in which the explicit post-Easter faith of the Church in Jesus Christ is expressed there, we cannot ipso facto assume that it is Jesus' own understanding of himself at the pre-Easter stage in his life that has been expressed in these.[4] For everything which we read about Jesus in the New Testament, and moreover even in the gospels (including the earliest of them, that of Mark), which purport to record Jesus' own words, is already an avowal of faith in Jesus Christ (if we may reduce this avowal to a single clear and simple formula).

Now the exponent of fundamental theology and dogmatics tells us that in order to enquire into the self-understanding of the pre-Easter Jesus we must discern what lies behind this avowal of faith, though at the same time this does not imply any withdrawal from the faith of the early Christian preaching to a purely neutral and secular standpoint in which we view the [189] matter merely in the light of historical science. And the exegete too does not in principle dispute the fact that it is possible to enquire into what lies behind the avowal of faith in this sense,[5] or the fact that there are words of Jesus himself which are absolutely authentic, so that it is possible for us to some extent to isolate them with a sufficient degree of historical certainty from the whole complex of sayings attributed to Jesus in the New Testament in which he is already being interpreted by anticipation as the Christ of Easter. On the other hand, however, this same exegesis makes it clear to us today that this self-understanding of the pre-Easter Jesus which we can still to some extent discern is not so immediately or obviously identical with what is asserted of him by the post-Easter community and the later dogmas of the Church, and what the New Testament itself has introduced into this self-understanding of the pre-Easter Jesus by a process of interpretation (even though objectively speaking this process of interpretation is perfectly justified). And thus the more precise question, and the one that is crucial for the exponent of fundamental theology and dogmatics, is this: whether the findings which contemporary exegesis has been able to arrive at with regard to the pre-Easter Jesus' awareness of himself and his own understanding of his task and person are still sufficient as a point of departure for the New Testament christology to be found in Paul and John, and for the Church's dogmatic teaching about Jesus Christ. This is the question with which we are concerned here, and to which – even at this stage I must assert this much in anticipation of my argument – an affirmative answer is justified.

[4] On this cf. also F. Hahn, Christologische Hoheitstitel (Göttingen, 2nd ed. 1964).
[5] The 'Bultmann' school itself has recently discovered the historical Jesus and the significance which he has for the early Christian preaching. cf. the relevant works by E. Käsemann, G. Ebeling, H. Bornkamm, H. Braun.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Before we attempt to enter directly into the question which we have just posed it may perhaps be appropriate to say something further about certain more general assumptions and broader perspectives without which it is quite impossible to answer such a question at all. The first point that we must bear in mind is that historical certainty and the sort of certainty which we can achieve in the concrete conditions of our human existence (if we may so express it) are two different things. And the difference between them is something which we should clearly recognize and freely take into account in our faith.

We may begin by invoking a quite simple example to illustrate what we [190] mean by this. Someone has a mother. He has a quite specific and unique relationship to this woman. He accepts all the consequences that ensue from a relationship of this kind. Now if we were to ask him what real grounds he has for knowing that this individual, in relation to whom he behaves and acts as a son, really is his mother, whether he really has any certainty of this at the levels of natural science or metaphysics, or even merely of scientific history, then surely he would in the end be forced to answer: 'At this level I have no such certainty'. Certainly we can see no reasonable grounds for calling this personal conviction of his of this mother-son relationship in question. But at the same time we have never yet reflected, at the level of 'scientific exactitude' upon this conviction of his. In other words we have no scientific or absolute certainty of the genuineness of this relationship. We could if we wished make a scientific problem of this relationship involving a whole range of difficult questions.

Without having to analyse this 'case' in any greater detail at this point we can easily perceive in the light of an example of this kind that the two kinds of certainty are two different things: the attitude which prevails at the level of the individual's own existence in the concrete, and which involves this immanent and personal certainty, together with all the radical consequences ensuing from this on the one hand, and the process of scientifically reflecting upon the grounds and presuppositions for such an attitude of 'existentielle' certainty on the other. This process of scientific reflection is important and indispensable. But it can never adequately include or replace that more ultimate and global certainty which belongs to human living in the concrete and the actual experience of this. We cannot demand this from the process of scientific reflection, because it is in principle incapable of achieving any such thing, since in any given instance the explicit content of knowledge arrived at as a result of scientific consideration is only given in an act of cognition which as such is not in its turn made the subject of reflection, and which at least in the case of those kinds of knowledge which are of 'existentielle' significance, at the level of concrete human living, inevitably plays its part in influencing the actual content of the considerations involved. This difference between the certainty of science and the certainty which belongs to the ultimate dimension in which we achieve the fulness of our own existence cannot be eliminated. The individual must learn to live with this difference. He must not use it as a weapon to destroy that other, and more ultimate certainty inherent in life itself (in our case the certainty of faith), whenever this certainty, which may be more ultimate, becomes unacceptable to him for some reason or other.

[191] Now let us apply the insight which we have merely been able to indicate above, to our present problem. All the statements of exegesis considered as a historical science belong to the category of theoretical reflection and speculation, and of historical criticism, and here they have a legitimate place of their own. But even in this case we must not suppose for one moment that the human, global, and total conviction of Jesus Christ as the absolute bringer of salvation would not be legitimate so long as that other certainty arising from theoretically reflecting upon the historical assumptions implicit in this faith has to be qualified as a lesser

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

certainty in terms of epistemological theory. We have in principle the right to say, 'Of course in exegesis many questions remain open. There is much that continues to belong to the sphere of mere historical probability, and subject to a discussion among the exegetes which is endlessly prolonged. But this cannot and need not represent any attack upon the believer in the absoluteness of his faith. For this faith is in fact based not merely upon the data of exegesis and the certainty belonging to these, but is also sustained by the experience of personal grace, by a certain interior self-assurance in the Christian understanding of existence which has never been consciously reflected upon to the full, by the totality of Christian living in the concrete, by the collective experience of Christendom, in a history extending over two thousand years. In accordance with the saying attributed to Peter in the sixth chapter of John (6:68 f.) this faith can always remind itself that anyone who abandons the Christian faith cannot find anywhere else to go where he will be able to discover a brighter light to illumine the meaning of existence.'

While on the one hand it is justifiable to ask, at the level of historical reflection, what data can be found with regard to the pre-Easter Jesus and what degree of certainty these have to offer, still on the other hand we must not assume in this that these data to which we can attain are the sole factors by which the absolute assent of faith in Jesus Christ is sustained. Now the converse of this is also true. It does not imply that this absolute assent of faith in Jesus Christ has nothing whatever to do with the data of history with which exegetical speculation is concerned. If someone came to us and proved to us positively and unambiguously that for instance Jesus himself either never existed at all or certainly understood himself merely as having some kind of religious mission to arouse his fellow men with a message which had nothing whatever to do with himself, his own person, and what he himself did, then our faith would no longer have that reality of saving history as its content, then our faith would be vain. Faith in saving history has an historical content. It cannot dispense with [192] a content of this kind, and therefore it cannot dispense with the historical element in it either, or with the process of reflecting upon history, even though we can never adequately carry this through. At the same time, however, this faith is not born of scientific speculation alone. It would certainly be a heresy, and one which could not be tolerated within the Catholic Church, if anyone sought to maintain that faith in Jesus as the Christ is absolutely independent of the historical experience and self-interpretation of the pre-Easter Jesus. But it would also be false to suppose that the content and the certainty of faith in Jesus Christ are the mere product of historical speculation as practised in exegesis.

A second preliminary principle must be mentioned, which is necessary if we are to supply a reasonable answer to our basic question. It is obvious, yet still for the most part forgotten, that that utterance of God which we call his revelation requires our own capacity to hear it for it to take place at all.[6] To state the matter once and for all in globo: the statements which God addresses to us exist only in the statements which we receive with our minds. Basically speaking this is a truism, even if we take into account the fact that the revelation of God also takes place in the events of our own historical environment. For in order for these to be capable of being revelation events at all they must include an element of verbal interpretation of the purely factual element in them, and one which is not merely applied to these events from without, but is an intrinsic and constitutive element in these events themselves, necessary for them to have the status of revelation events at all.

If therefore the statements which God addresses to us exist only in statements which we

[6] On this idea cf. K. Rahner, J. Ratzinger, Revelation and Tradition, Quaestiones Disputatae 17 (Freiburg, 1966); K. Rahner, 'Propheten', LTK VIII (2nd ed. 1963), 800-802; idem, 'Wort Gottes', LTK X (2nd ed. 1965), 1235-1238; idem, 'Theology in the New Testament', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 23-41; idem, 'Scripture and Theology', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 89-97.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ourselves formulate in our minds, then this clearly raises the problem of how we can know that these statements which we formulate in the subjectivity of our own minds are statements of God with an objectivity of their own. We cannot enter into this problem at this point in our investigations. Here we must confine ourselves to pointing out that it is merely one instance, albeit the most radical, of a general range of problems that arises in epistemological theory, that namely of how we can apprehend the objective element in reality without standing outside the subjectivity of our own acts of cognition (something which is [193] precisely impossible). But on the basis of this special quality which belongs universally to all subjective cognition in which the objective is apprehended, we can at any rate understand that the subjectivity inherent in knowledge, and which can never be overcome, is the mode in which the objective is presented to us and not that which causes this objective element to be veiled by the merely subjectivist factors. This is also true of faith. The objectivity of the revelation of God always exists in the subjective expression of an individual, in other words in his 'hearing', his 'faith' which, in a very extended sense of this term, also includes the attitude of listening obediently to the message of God as brought to us by the bearer of revelation. The history of revelation and the history of faith are ultimately speaking two sides of one and the same process. The very fact that the address of God takes place in the concrete only in the mind of the individual who bears it in history means that the revelation of God is a historical process, a history such that what takes place in it is not always the same. All this is at basis a self-evident datum of Catholic dogmatic teaching, which is constantly aware of a saving history and also of a history of revelation.[7]

It is only now, however, and after these preliminary considerations, that we arrive at a point which is especially important in its bearing upon our basic question. We have to recognize that even Jesus, as man and in his special character as the bearer of revelation, likewise utters the revelation of God to the extent that he himself in his human subjectivity hears and accepts what he has to say. And in all this this subjectivity of his can have, and has had, in its turn, an individual history. The nature of divine revelation then is such that its ultimately basic acts take place solely in the mind of the individual who hears it. However the process of human hearing in this sense has a collective, and even more an individual historicity of its own. And again this applies to the humanity of Jesus too, which is real and true. And in the light of all this it is not only not difficult in principle, but actually and positively necessary, to recognize that that revelation which takes place in the subjective human consciousness of [194] Jesus and in his preaching is also a historical entity. What contemporary exegesis establishes a posteriori with regard to the self-understanding of the pre-Easter Jesus is, at basis, something which the dogmatic theologian has had to postulate all along a priori on the basis of the principles indicated above with which he has to work.[8]Of course what applies throughout the history of human thought applies in this case too: we can only reflect upon and explicitate the implications inherent in our own position when a posteriori the historical situation is given, and also some concrete stimulus from without impelling us to do this. But this does not alter the fact that given these conditions we can then recognize implications of this kind precisely as such. Thus it is not surprising that in dealing

[7] Hence too one of the points with which the Constitution 'Dei Verbum' of the Second Vatican Council is explicitly concerned is to demonstrate the unity which exists between word and deed in the revelation event. On this cf. the commentary mentioned in n. 2, and also the projected schema worked out by myself in collaboration with J. Ratzinger: 'Le schéma du P. K. Rahner. De la révélation de Dieu et de l'homme faite en Jésus-Christ', Vatican II: Unam Sanctam 70 b (Paris, 1968), pp. 577-597, and also H. Waldenfelds, Offenbarung. Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil auf dem Hintergrund der neueren Theologie (Munich, 1969).

[8] On this cf. also A. Vögtle, 'Revelation and History in the New Testament. A Contribution to Biblical Hermeneutics', Concilium I/3 (Dogma), 1967, pp. 20-26.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

with certain implications in the basic conception of the Church's christology with regard to the historicity of revelation, and also the historicity of the human awareness of Jesus as the bearer of revelation, we only explicitate these at that stage at which exegesis, with its a posteriori approach, discovers this historicity.

Exegesis, therefore, establishes that Jesus expressed his own understanding of himself in terms which are far from being identical with those of the later christology of the Church, and indeed not even identical with those of the christology of the primitive community or the gospels of Paul and John. And exegesis further establishes that in expressing the significance of himself Jesus may have avoided certain terms used in the theology of his environment, indeed that he could not use them at all, even though they do subsequently reappear – albeit in altered form – in the christology of the primitive Church. Finally exegesis actually establishes that a certain historical development is to be observed in this self-understanding on Jesus' part (e.g. with regard to the fact that he came to include his own death as an integral element in this self-understanding of his). Moreover this historical development is actually such that it is wholly reconcilable with the Church's dogmatic teaching to the effect that God was immediately present to Jesus in his human subjectivity (this is what the established dogmatic theology means by saying that the 'vision of God' was present from the outset in the human soul of Jesus, though in order to reconcile this with the findings of modern exegesis we must understand this 'vision' as consisting in a 'basic content' in the human subjectivity of Jesus which was only gradually objectified, though also with complete clarity, in terms of the a posteriori material of the theology of his [195] environment). Now all these theses or hypotheses of exegesis, strange though they may seem to us at first sight, turn out, on closer examination, but also in the light of the basic data of the christology of the New Testament and the Church herself, to be such as we should have expected.[9]

We may therefore explicitly draw attention to the fact that the position today regarding the relationship between historical and critical exegesis and its findings concerning the self-understanding of the pre-Easter Jesus on the one hand and the dogmatic and fundamental theology of Jesus as the Christ on the other, does not, in the last analysis represent an uneasy compromise between the two which is maintained through thick and thin in order that critical exegesis and traditional Christian faith may to some extent be able to co-exist with one another. Rather, on a deeper view, the position between the two is one that we should expect on any really genuine understanding of the faith, and from a christology which is that of the Church but at the same time one that is the outcome of a process of radical self-realization. This interpretation of the current position is not invalidated by the fact that the dogmatic theologian only recognizes the a priori implications of his own position at the radical level when he encounters them a posteriori in the findings of exegesis. In the encounter between dogmatics and exegesis, therefore, the position is, in the last analysis, far from being as critical as is sometimes assumed, though of course this position will only gradually become clearer in the course of further discussions between exegetes and dogmatic theologians. We shall have to accustom ourselves to this situation, and it is only gradually that we can do so. But when we have achieved this we shall no longer be surprised to find that Jesus of Nazareth does not explicitly put forward a christology of the kind maintained by the Church herself. We shall achieve an ever-better understanding of the fact that while the formulations of the [9] On the question of the self-awareness of Jesus in dogmatic theology cf. chiefly K. Rahner, 'Dogmatic Reflections on the Knowledge and Self-consciousness of Christ', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 193-215; also H. Riedlinger, Geschichtlichkeit und Vollendung des Wissens Jesu, Quaestiones Disputatae 32 (Freiburg, 1966); E. Gutwenger, 'The Problem of Christ's Knowledge', Concilium II/1 (Dogma) (1966), pp 48-55; and from the exegetical point of view A Vögtle, 'Exegetische Erwägungen über das Wissen und Selbstbewusstsein Jesu', Gott in Welt I (Festschrift fur K. Rahner), J. B. Metz, W. Kern et al edd. (Freiburg, 1964), pp. 608-667.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Church's christology remain justified and indispensable, still they are not of such a kind that it is precisely they which, simply as they stand, constitute that which is self-evident and clear to the utmost possible extent, while that which is presented in the New Testament as christology, and [196] above all as the self-understanding of the pre-Easter Jesus, is merely that which is ambiguous, 'elusive', and obscure in its expression, and less developed by comparison with the firmness and lack of ambiguity in the christology of the Church. Rather we must learn to view the intrinsic convergence of the two kinds of statement in such a way that the moment we reach that point in unfolding the formulations of the Church at which they become perplexing, this brings us back once more to the formulations of the New Testament, while conversely the formulations of the Church have done nothing else than to take seriously, and really to investigate radically, the quite homely and simple and humanly assimilable statements of the pre-Easter Jesus and the statements about him in the New Testament. Exegesis and dogmatics are not two enemies seeking to engage in a life-and-death struggle against one another, and yet precisely still allowing one another to survive. We often express the matter by saying that one or other of the findings of modern exegesis are 'still sufficient' for dogmatic christology. But this precisely does not mean that the dogmatic theologian would 'properly speaking' have expected something more from the exegete. If he really takes seriously the historical nature of revelation, and therefore the history of Jesus himself, he cannot want or expect anything more at all from the exegete.

This brings us at last to the real theme, the central question, of our considerations. We have seen that with regard to the self-understanding of the pre-Easter Jesus modern critical exegesis has isolated and established this by setting aside the interpretations superimposed upon it in the post-Easter christology. Now as we have already said at the outset of this study, what we are seeking to establish as the basic thesis of these considerations of ours is that once we presuppose the experience of the Resurrection this self-understanding of the pre-Easter Jesus as isolated and established by modern exegesis provides a sufficient basis and starting-point for the dogmatic christology of the New Testament and of the Church. In other words the present-day exponents of fundamental theology and dogmatic christology have no need to feel themselves abandoned by modern exegetes. They must not have the impression that the axioms and assumptions necessary for their work have been withdrawn from them by this exegesis. Of course it cannot be the function of the systematic theologian once more to recapitulate at this point the data yielded by modern exegesis, and which represents the 'residue' (sit venia verbo) of Jesus' understanding of himself, once the subsequent accretions of christological interpretation have been set aside. This is something which we are assuming here, and we are seeking only, to the extent that [197] such a thing is possible within the scope of a brief study, to justify the thesis formulated above.

For this we must take as our initial starting-point a really correct understanding of the Church's dogmatic teaching on christology. It is necessary to build a bridge to unite present-day exegesis, with its critical methods and findings, to that body of dogmatic teaching on Jesus Christ developed by the Church which must be retained as permanently valid. And the two halves of this bridge must be projected outwards from both sides at the same time – including, therefore, the side represented by systematic theology. Both departments must refuse to content themselves with any facile compromise, but rather each proceeding from its own axioms must seek to achieve a new encounter, so that a genuine and intrinsic reconciliation may be achieved between the ancient dogmatic teaching and the findings of modern exegesis. For this ancient dogmatic teaching is in fact that of the Catholic exegete too and, moreover, precisely as such.[10] But for this purpose fresh ground will also have to be

[10] The first steps in this direction have already been taken. cf. e.g. H. Vorgrimler (ed.), Exegese und Dogmatik (Mainz, 1962); K. Rahner, 'Biblische Theologie und Dogmatik in ihrem wechselseitigen Verhältnis', LTK II

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

broken from the side of the systematic theologian. He too will have to think out afresh those formulations of this dogmatic teaching which, though ancient and self-evident to him, still need constantly to be subjected to fresh questioning, in order to achieve a fresh apprehension of his own essential message. This implies that the dogmatic theologian must be prepared to make a fresh start on the basis of the ancient and radical statements of christology itself as these have been defined, so as to eliminate from this christology as he de facto conceives of it all those distortions and misunderstandings which have crept into it and which are ultimately Monophysite in character.

The very manner in which a systematic theologian recognizes, formulates, and emphasizes at a specific point within his system these ultimate principles, and chiefly that concerning the true human nature of Jesus, entails a certain danger, and one which has not yet really and permanently been eliminated. This is the danger that at some other point, or in other connections within the same christology, or perhaps because of the religious mentality it entails and the expressions appropriate to this, he may once more forget these principles and – if we may be permitted to [198] formulate it in these terms – fall back into the attitude of an average Christian, who all too often is still either partly or wholly a Monophysite, even though he knows and repeats the sound and correct formulations of the catechism. In the mind of this 'ordinary consumer', orthodox though he may be, a strange and unconscious line of thought all too often and too easily asserts itself, by which Jesus comes simply to be identified with God who, in some remarkable manner, avails himself of the 'humanity' of Jesus as a sort of livery which he wears, or an instrument, in order to render himself 'noticeable' to us here below.

In truth, however, the Christian dogma of Chalcedon lays down that without prejudice to what we call the hypostatic union, Jesus really and in very deed is a man. The word 'is' as employed by us in the formula 'Jesus is God, is the Son of God, is the Logos' suggests a further 'is', a further synthesis between the subject and the material content of the predicate as, for instance, when we say 'Fritz is a man', asserting thereby not merely that this humanity is one with the subject Fritz, but that there is a real identity between the two. In the case of Jesus, however, his humanity is precisely not identical with God in this way, and on any right understanding of the Church's dogma this is precisely not what is being maintained, but rather what is excluded. We might put to the 'ordinary consumer' Christian who intends to be orthodox the following question:

'Can Jesus tremble before the inconceivability of God? Can he, radically thrown back upon his own feeble creaturehood, adore God as the inconceivable? Can he go to meet a fate which is dark so far as he is concerned?' And then, even though this 'ordinary consumer' has himself all along been saying that Jesus is truly man, he will suddenly be brought up short and the 'yes' which he must pronounce in reply to this question will not come easily to his lips. And yet this 'yes' belongs to Catholic dogma right from the outset, and not merely to the findings of a modern exegesis. The Jesus of the Chalcedonian dogma, which was directed against Monophysitism and Monothelitism, likewise has a subjective centre of action which is human and creaturely in kind, such that in his human freedom he is in confrontation with God the inconceivable, such that in it Jesus has undergone all those experiences which we make of God not in a less radical, but on the contrary in a more radical – almost, we might say, in a more terrible – form than in our own case. And this properly speaking not in spite of, but rather because of the so-called hypostatic union. For the more radically any given individual is related to God existentially, and so mo in his concrete mode of existence as a (1958), 449-451: idem, 'Biblische Theologie und Dogmatik', Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe II (1963), pp. 523-525; R. Schnackenburg, 'Konkrete Fragen an die Dogmatik aus der heutigen exegetischen Diskussion', Catholica 21 (1967), pp. 12-27.

---

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

creature, the more such a creature achieves the state of self-realization; again the more radically any [199] given individual is able to experience his own creaturely reality, the more united he must be with God?[11]

Thus we have genuinely to eliminate from the christology which we actually live this element of Monophysitism and Monothelitism (though today we should more properly call it Mono-subjectivism), not merely in the explicit verbal formulations of its tenets, but in our own ultimate and uncircumscribed understanding of our religion. Once we have achieved this we shall find it all the more easy to acquire a free and uncircumscribed understanding of what modern exegesis has worked out with regard to the pre-Easter Jesus. For when we can freely allow our interest in Jesus (to put the matter somewhat paradoxically) to be in a genuine sense concentrated more on his significance for the kingdom of God and for God himself than on his actual status as a 'person', we can recognize that in his own individual history real questions arise for him, and that he is surprised, that he achieves insights and realizations at the conceptual level about himself which are only gradually articulated and expressed, and which surprise himself. At the same time, however, we understand that these are always discovered in the process of developing an understanding of himself which is based upon that element which ultimately lies at the very roots of his existence, and which dogmatic theologians are accustomed to call the 'immediate vision of God present in the soul of Jesus'. The fact that this is the only way in which the dogmatic theologian can do justice to the data of modern exegesis is not the sole reason why he has to take into account the fact of a genuine humanity in Jesus. He must do this because otherwise his position would be contrary to the dogmatic teaching of Catholic theology, in other words to his own principles.

There is one point which the dogmatic theologian must again and again make clear to himself on the basis of his own principles and data. It is that however true it may be that according to these dogmatic principles Jesus constitutes a unique reality in saving history such that he must not be placed on the same level as any other prophet, religious personality or inspiring leader, still it is also true that he must be fitted organically into a basic conception of saving history as a whole, even though in fitting him [200] in in this way we only realize his position at the supreme point of saving history viewed precisely in this way as a totality after we have achieved the a posteriori experience of Jesus. He does indeed constitute the supreme point of this saving history, unique and unsurpassable, but he is this precisely within this saving history itself. We are presenting the uniqueness of Jesus in a false light if we regard him merely as the Son of God, setting him in this sense over against men as though initially these had nothing to do with God, or when we view him simply as a messenger from the other world of the divine, entering a world which again has nothing to do with God.

Against this the real position is that whatever place we occupy throughout the whole history of mankind, we are children of God. God himself never ceases to dwell and to hold sway in his own divine nature at the innermost centre of this history throughout its course in virtue of an absolute, albeit a completely free and grace-given act of self-bestowal, thereby constituting the ultimate principle and the ultimate driving force of the history of this present world. Whether we always recognize this, whether we arrive at a conceptually objectified and consciously formulated statement of this basic grace-given mystery of the world and its history or not, whether we open ourselves in faith and in love to this ultimate reality of our own existence, or alternatively incur mortal guilt by closing ourselves against it (though even then we cannot banish God and his will to bestow grace from our world) – these are yet further questions, and ones which we shall not be treating of here. The process by which this [11] On this axiom cf. also F. Malmberg, Ein Leib – ein Geist (Freiburg, 1960), pp. 315-333; K. Rahner, 'On the Theology of the Incarnation', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 105-120; B. Welte, 'Zur Christologie von Chalkedon' Auf der Spur des Ewigen (Freiburg, 1965), pp. 429-45 8; K. Rahner, 'Incarnation', Sacramentum Mundi 3 (New York and London, 1968), pp. 110-118.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ultimate and grace-given mystery of God's self-bestowal instilled into the very roots of human nature and into the very roots of history itself achieves its own due fulness – a process of self-realization achieved in knowledge and love – constitutes the single history of revelation and salvation, because the history of knowledge and the acceptance of this basic mystery of the world which consists in God's self-bestowal is itself the history of this self-bestowal of God as imparting revelation. God is not to be thought of as merely 'over against' the world and its history in virtue simply of being its first 'cause', untouched by the world itself and transcending it. Rather in the outward movement of his love he has inserted himself into the world as its innermost entelecheia, and he impells the whole of this world and its history towards that point at which God himself will be the innermost and immediately present fulfilment of our existence in the 'face-to-face' presence of eternal beatitude.

Without prejudice to the uniqueness of Jesus he must be viewed in his place in this saving history which is the history of God and the world [201] both in one.[12] Such a view need not obscure this uniqueness of his, but it will eliminate from it that element of the exaggeratedly miraculous, the mythological, which comes to be associated with the idea of an intermediary whom God sends from another world constituted by his own life into a merely secular world. Let us therefore take as our starting-point a conception of saving history of the kind we have described; one in which God, in an act of gracious self-bestowal, is always at work from the heart and centre of the world itself, and which is co-extensive with the history of the world in general. Let us set clearly before our eyes the fact that a saving history of this kind, which is always the history of God's freedom and man's freedom, presses on towards a point at which this history of God's self-offering and the free acceptance of this in the world becomes irreversible, and manifests itself in the dimension of history in this irreversibility that belongs to it. If we approach the question in this way then, on the basis of this realization of its own significance which is achieved in saving history, we have obtained a view of that point at which Jesus stands, at which God accepts the world in such a way that he can no longer let it go, and at which the world, through this self-bestowal of God, obtains as its own gift that deed of creaturely freedom in which this freedom of the world definitely accepts God's offering of himself. Then we are standing at that point at which a man, from the ultimate roots of his own being, signifies the definitive address of God to the world, and at the same time the assent of the world to this God.[13]

Assuming that an understanding of the question has been achieved from both these perspectives, we can now apply ourselves directly to the consideration of our basic thesis. According to the findings of contemporary exegesis it can be said even today that the pre-Easter Jesus understood [202] himself as the absolute eschatological event of salvation and the eschatological bringer of salvation.[14]

---

[12] In this connection cf. especially my article, 'Christology within an Evolutionary View of the World', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 157-192, and also the study entitled Christology in the Setting of Modern Man's Understanding of Himself and of his World', in this volume, pp. 215-229.

[13] On this cf. the author's article, 'History of the World and Salvation History', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 97-114; 'Church, Churches and Religion', Theological Investigations X (London and New York, 1973), pp. 30-50; idem, 'Jesus Christ', Sacramentum Mundi 3 (New York and London, 1968), pp. 192-209; idem, Ich glaube an Jesus Christus = Theologische Meditationen 21 (Einsiedeln, 1968); in addition to these, A. Darlap, 'Fundamentale Theologie der Heilsgeschichte', Mysterium Salutis I (Einsiedeln, 1965), pp. 3-156; K. Berger and A. Darlap, 'History of Salvation (Salvation History)', Sacramentum Mundi 5 (London and New York, 1970), pp. 411-419; E. Klinger, Formaler Vorentwurf und geschichtstheologische Einführung zu Mysterium Salutis III/1 (Einsiedeln, 1970).

[14] In this connection critical exegesis speaks of an 'implicit christology'. Cf. R. Bultmann, Glauben und Verstehen I (Tübingen, 1952), 204/205; also idem, Theology of the New Testament I (London, 1952,) pp. 42 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Of course for this statement to represent the findings of modern exegesis it is not necessary for absolutely all exegetes to subscribe to it. In any historical science, in view of the complicated nature of the facts under investigation, this is something which from the outset we should not expect. In this connection we may remind ourselves once more of that difference between the relative certainty or probability of historical knowledge, even as a presupposition of faith on the one hand, and the absolute assent of faith as such on the other. What the precise terms were in which Jesus made this self-understanding of his real in his life, and in which he actually expressed it, whether and how far he drew upon religious ideas and concepts which were already present beforehand in his environment for expressing this significance which he saw in himself – these are questions which the dogmatic theologian can freely set aside, seeing that the exegete tells him that while there are indeed many particular unsolved questions and difficulties with regard to the details of the self-understanding of the pre-Easter Jesus, still it can be stated with a sufficient degree of reliability that Jesus understood himself as something more than merely some kind of preacher with a mission to arouse men to a sense of religion such that his message merely pointed to a relationship between God and man, a relationship itself already existing independently of the message pointing to it. He understood himself, rather, as one in whose message (precisely as his), and in whose person that which he preached was actually made present in a new and irrevocable form as a new and unsurpassable summons of God. In this sense we say that the pre-Easter Jesus (including in this concept his actual message in itself) understood himself as the eschatological event of salvation and the eschatological bringer of salvation,

The self-understanding of Jesus in this sense is something that we must take with the utmost seriousness and realize in the full depths of its significance. We must take seriously the fact that in Jesus' understanding of himself his message constitutes that which is new, that which has not always been present. At the same time, however, despite the infinity of the possibilities open to God, and the openness of history itself to that which is new, this message constitutes also that which is ultimate and unsurpassable, as well as that which is inseparable from his own person. Once we have [203] realized all this, then we have arrived at a point of departure from which we can attain to the Church's dogmatic teaching on christology, provided only that this is not itself misinterpreted in a Monophysite sense. What we call the divine Sonship of Jesus of Nazareth as a metaphysical and substantial reality in fact has no further content whatever beyond what can be expressed in the affirmation: Jesus is the eschatological, i.e. the unsurpassable and abiding, Mediator of our relationship with God. This precisely can never signify a prophet, an inspiring religious leader, or a religious genius. For the message precisely of this kind of individual is in principle always capable of being separated from his person and his religious works. This is because the reality to which he points in this preaching exists independently of himself. Moreover, since he is a mere man, existing at one isolated point in history, the truth which he proclaims always is, or always should be, expressed with the proviso that this message will be made out of date once those further possibilities are realized which are open to God and which also exist in history. Now if on his own understanding of himself Jesus is not one of the prophets in this sense, and if it is obvious that on any Christian understanding of God he cannot be interpreted as a demi-god either, then, when the christology of the Church speaks of the unity between this event of salvation in the concrete and this Mediator of salvation in the concrete – a unity involving the duality of two natures as distinct, the divine and the human – it is simply stating in different terms this self-understanding of Jesus as the eschatological bringer of salvation. The converse of this is of course likewise true.

When, therefore, exegesis emphasizes that the pre-Easter Jesus speaks in the first instance not so much of his own person but of the advent of the kingdom of God which has become quite new and actual, then this should not surprise the dogmatic theologian in the light of his position either. For if this kingdom of God has come definitively, victoriously, and in a manner which can no longer be surpassed by any fresh events of salvation in his person and message, and if Jesus himself declares precisely this to be the case, then ipso facto he has spoken about his own person. If he has come, as we confess, 'propter nos et propter nostram salutem', then the message he had to convey to us first and foremost was: 'Your salvation is there now as judgement and grace.' And if it is true that he possessed a genuinely human subjectivity, which achieves the truth most proper to it precisely at that point at which it looks away from itself to the inconceivable God and his love, and to mankind as brothers, and in a certain sense loses itself in both directions, then we should precisely not expect [204] him to speak of himself in that explicitly self-reflecting manner which is employed in the dogmatic christology of the Church. We understand his true nature only when we see it as absolutely one with his function in saving history. If therefore he speaks of this function of his, ipso facto he has spoken of his own 'nature'. If he says that in him God has uttered his ultimate assent to the world in a way that is ever more unsurpassable and irrevocable, and that in virtue of this the kingdom of God is irrevocably present in the world (though at the same time it still constantly has to impose itself in history) then, at basis he has already spoken more clearly of himself than if he had spoken of himself in isolation, presenting us, so to say, with a mirror image of himself by a certain process of introversion after the manner of the christology developed by the Church. Certainly this latter is inevitable and good at the retrospective stage. But it is such that even then it can only really be understood by us when we make real to ourselves in our faith what he is for us, and what has taken place through him and in him in that saving history which is our own. We must understand that a dogmatic formulation, however much it is, and continues to be, binding upon us, is not something which simply has to be defined in order that everything may be 'clear'. We must recognize that in the case of any dogmatic formula, in order really to understand it and make it real to ourselves in our faith, we must think back to that in which it properly originated as well. And if we realize all this then we will no longer listen to what we are told about the self-understanding of the pre-Easter Jesus with that attitude of slight mistrust and surprise with which we ask ourselves how in that case he did not express himself 'more clearly' about his own significance. The true meaning of the dogmatic teaching of christology has already been grasped (indeed it may perhaps actually be more assimilable to us in our concrete human lives in this form) when for instance we have really understood that saying of Jesus which runs: 'Whatsoever you have done to one of the least of these my brethren, you have done it to me' (Mt. 25:40). There is no conceivable claim which could be more radical than this, that he himself is always and in all cases involved in the ultimate relationship between two individuals.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We have still to justify in fuller and more precise terms the thesis that the concept of a bringer of salvation in the absolute ipso facto implicitly contains the dogmatic teaching of christology, once it has been taken with the full and radical seriousness due to it, thought out and re-stated in different words. At this point, however, lam compelled to refer to expositions which I have put forward elsewhere.[15] Here therefore I may confine [205] myself to reiterating once more this one point which I have already made: everyone who is genuinely a Christian will concede that the message which Jesus addresses to him is unsurpassable. We must, however, recognize the immensity of the implications ipso facto contained in this statement, for all its apparent innocuousness. For it might be said: Every prophet, however much he may appear as a messenger of God with a momentous and stirring message to convey, must still retain an awareness of the fact that in this message of his he is forming only a single tiny drop from the boundless ocean of the eternal Godhead. Furthermore he can

[15] cf. n. 13.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

only utter this message precisely as the messenger of God so long as he submits himself in the most radical manner to the fact that tomorrow another messenger will come who, from the boundless fulness of God, in which all eternity and the future that still lies before us is comprised, draws some quite different message, yet one that is no less momentous and that renders the old one out of date. In other words every prophet must, in a true sense, allow for the fact that saving history remains open to further, unforeseeable and sometimes revolutionary developments beyond any to which he can point. Nevertheless in a very real sense that one brief statement which we have just taken as our starting-point, and to which every Christian subscribes, puts a definitive end to all this. Otherwise it should not be taken seriously at all. In itself and without any further addition this one brief sentence states that no single word that Jesus utters can be surpassed or invalidated in its further application to the world even by God himself. The message which Jesus utters through his person and through his words can be the unsurpassable and abiding word of God only if the reality that it constitutes (including in this the words that he utters and the fate that he endures) is God's own reality in the manner which we seek to express by the term 'hypostatic union'. Otherwise saving history would be open to further extensions into the future which would no longer stand under the law of Jesus Christ. Alternatively, if we wish to deny that this one brief sentence has the definitive finality which we have ascribed to it, we would have to subscribe to that completely distorted anthropomorphism according to which God, the infinitely wise and powerful, is thought of as breaking off the history of revelation and salvation at a certain point in a completely arbitrary manner ab externo, even though in itself, considered as God's own history, infinite further possibilities still remained open to it. Or again we would have to postulate that through his person and his words Jesus had, after all, only expressed what is true always and everywhere, and attainable from any point in history. And this would mean that there would in truth [206] be no history of revelation and salvation. Even taken by itself, therefore, this brief statement which we have taken as our starting-point as a statement which, after all, every Christian can surely make his own, implicitly, but in a very true sense, contains the whole christology of the Church. Admittedly this point would require a more extensive development and justification than we can accord to it here.

Once more we may formulate our basic thesis: If Jesus understood himself to be the eschatological event of salvation in the absolute, and the Mediator of salvation in the absolute, and if this self-understanding on the part of the pre-Easter Jesus can, with sufficient certainty be recognized as present in him even by modern historical and critical exegesis, then we have found an adequate point of departure for the christology of the Church. At the same time this is not to deny, but on the contrary to imply, that in the dimension of Jesus' own conscious reflection upon himself, this self-understanding of his can in its turn have a history of its own. And this history in itself only attained its definitive fulness in his Resurrection. Only through this event did it become credible in a definitive sense for us.

If it is true, then, that a christology of the Church is possible on these premisses, it is equally true that these premisses for a christology of the Church are themselves unalterable. It is perfectly justifiable for an exegete to point out the historical problems which these premisses entail. But if he goes beyond this, if he seeks to say, rather, that he has come to recognize with positive and unambiguous historical certainty that the realities presupposed here simply did not exist at all, then the premisses of fundamental theology and dogmatic theology for the Christian faith would really be destroyed. But I believe that no exegete would claim to be able to substantiate such a position. On the contrary, even a very critical approach to exegesis, so long as it remains open to what is unique and peculiar to Jesus, will conclude that the self-understanding of Jesus presupposed here is to be affirmed.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If we are to speak of the Resurrection of Jesus and the credibility attached to it, then properly speaking we should explicitly state and make clear certain principles at the level of existential ontology and anthropology upon which we shall be basing our arguments. We are accustomed to think of man to some extent in a dualistic sense, and because of this we find it difficult to grasp the fact that what is meant by the definitive state [207] of man, his state of being redeemed and having attained to salvation, is basically speaking the same as that which we call the Resurrection of Jesus and of man in general. For basically speaking it is inconceivable either in terms of modern anthropology or biblical anthropology that there should be any absolute division between a fate which we attribute to the physical side of man and the fate which he undergoes at the spiritual level and in his personhood.[16] Now if we evaluate and understand this point correctly, then the following two statements have exactly the same meaning: first, 'This crucified one is he who has been received by God in such a way that he, together with his fate and the decision which that fate involves, has been ratified by God as having an eternal validity', and second, 'He has risen'. It is necessary for us to recognize the fact that for ourselves too we can hope for no other definitive form of deliverance than that which, on any correct understanding of Christian terminology, we call Resurrection. And if we did perceive this more clearly then we would see that right from the outset the individual may justifiably and confidently ask this question of history itself: Is there any point within this history at which I find an event which makes it possible for me confidently to assert, 'So-and-so is the one who has been accepted and saved by God, in other words the one who has risen from the dead'? We should begin by reminding ourselves of all these general perspectives and prior assumptions for our understanding if we intend seriously to enquire into what is truly meant by the Resurrection of Jesus, and why it is worthy of belief. Even here it is not a question of a miracle of God being inserted into a spiritual situation in which nothing of the kind could possibly be expected at all. It can perfectly well be the case that it is only through the a posteriori experience that an a priori perspective of hope already transcendentally present within us is brought to the stage of conscious and explicit realization. But when it is brought to this stage we recognize it as something which has been present all along, although, it may be, in a very unexplicitated way. This is the one principle which should be borne in mind from the outset and all along in seeking what the Resurrection of Jesus means.

Secondly we should achieve for ourselves a clear understanding of what [208] really can be meant in theological terms by resurrection. The moment we picture to ourselves a dead man returning once more into our temporal dimension, with the biological conditions belonging to it, we have conceived of something which has nothing whatever to do with the Resurrection of Jesus, and which cannot have any kind of significance for our salvation either. In fact to say that any individual has risen from the dead must precisely be tantamount to saying: 'This man in this fate of his which seems so absolutely negative, has in a true sense, as himself, and together with his history, really attained to God.' What it does not say, however, is this: He has once more extricated himself from the process of death, and is once more there on the same plane as ourselves. This is in fact precisely not any sort of concession to the modern spirit of the time, after the manner of the demythologizers, but belongs so obviously to the very content of dogmatic teaching that this dogmatic teaching itself would otherwise have no Christian meaning whatever.

---

[16] For fuller details on this cf. my articles ,'Auferstehung Christi', LTK I (2nd ed., 1967), 1038-1041; 'Resurrection', Sacramentum Mundi 5 (1969), pp. 323-342; 'Dogmatic Questions on Easter', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 52 1-133; 'Experiencing Easter', ibid. VII (London and Freiburg, 1971), pp. 159-168; 'Encounters with the Risen Christ', ibid., pp. 169-176.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Once we recognize this, then, precisely on this basis, and not merely on the basis of contemporary exegetical criticism, it becomes evident that the question of whether we could touch the risen individual, whether he could eat, etc., is absolutely secondary, and this not merely because it suits us of today to take this line, but because it is positively demanded by any true understanding of the ancient dogmatic teaching of the Church. One who has achieved the definitive finality of his own existence cannot be subject to the material changes we undergo. He cannot exist in a temporal dimension such as belongs to us. He cannot remain dependent upon other physical entities such as temperature, tactibility etc. In other words, even if we were to take all these stories in an extremely literal sense, we would still even then have to interpret them as meaning that in terms of the range of experience and understanding open to us the individual risen from the dead had undergone 'in himself' a process of transposition. It should be clear that this 'transposition' sets the risen individual 'in himself' on a different plane just as much as it attests the fact that he has been eternally and definitively saved by God. To questions such as whether if we were already even now in a glorified state we could see the marks of the wounds of the risen Lord, whether then we would still have a head and hands in the same way that we do now etc., we should in principle reply: This is something which we do not know and the reason that we do not know it is not that we adopt an attitude of critical scepticism and are no longer willing to accept very much by faith, but rather that the intrinsic meaning of the dogmatic teaching itself does not admit of answers being found to questions of this kind. Whether Christendom [209] has or has not always recognized this fact so clearly as is entailed by the radical nature of resurrection – this too in its turn is a secondary question.

As Catholics we believe in a development of dogma, that as the awareness of our faith becomes more and more developed, we achieve a deeper understanding of the dogma itself. And under certain circumstances certain conceptual models, or perhaps even errors which have crept into our understanding at an earlier stage are gradually eliminated in this process. The ultimate goal of the process itself is not that in this way we shall gradually argue away the very substance of the dogma itself, so as to leave no room for it in our world, but rather that from its own true and innermost centre an ever better understanding may be achieved of what it truly signifies. Even Paul recognized that all realities, and so too the conceptual models we use to understand them, undergo a radical transformation that extends right to the ultimate roots of their nature. Hence we cannot, on the basis of the models we currently use to understand existence, vividly portray to ourselves what eternity is like. On any radical view this is just as impossible in the case of the soul or spirit of man as it is in the case of the physical side of his nature. Yet because we are inclined to accord a certain priority of value to the spiritual side, we find it easy to suppose that at the spiritual level we can live on throughout all eternity in the same mode as that in which we are living in the present. Yet this is quite untrue. We know nothing of the eschata beyond the fact that we are and that we receive the history of our own reality and free decision and our relationship to God as something that is permanently definitive. We have no conceptual models to explain to ourselves precisely how this comes to be. All we know is that we cannot conceive of man as a sort of space rocket with two stages, in which the lower stage, that which is called the 'physical side' will one day fall away so that then a 'spirit', with the special dimension of reality belonging to it, will continue on alone to enter definitively into the glory of God. We know that man is one and cannot be separated into two compartments. If we believe in a consummation then we believe in our consummation. The fact that in accordance with the intrinsic complexity and historical development of human nature this consummation must appear different in respect of each particular element in man – this too is, admittedly, a point that is clear. But as for any positive conceptual model showing us how we should represent this to ourselves – this is something which we do not and should not have, for if we did have

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

it then quite certainly we should be misinterpreting the meaning of 'eternity'.

[210] All this is very obvious to man when he is thinking of his own resurrection according to the affirmation which we make in the creed. But obviously it also applies to the case of the risen Lord. For in fact he is risen in that which we call his human nature, his human reality. If he then manifests himself to the disciples in a quite specific mode, then inevitably this has the force of a 'transposition' of that which he himself is into our conceptual world. Yet it is clear from the outset that we can never adequately separate this 'for us' aspect of the risen Lord from the 'in himself' aspect of him. I cannot work out for myself whether or not the glorified wounds of the physical side of Jesus actually exist in the 'in himself' dimension which belongs to him as risen. I do not even know whether one who has been glorified has a head. I have no positive grounds for denying it, but ultimately speaking I do not know it, and, moreover, it is a matter of indifference. All this still does not in the least alter the fact that I believe that I am not simply some transitory element in this world, but rather, that as this particular individual, the physical side of whose nature I must include in my concept of myself, I have a kind of existence which is destined to endure, for which I am answerable to God, and which will have an eternal validity in his life.[17]

If we have ever devoted any intelligent consideration to these matters, then, while of course not all those particular questions are immediately clear which we can raise with regard to the Resurrection and manifestation passages, still many of these questions will cease to appear to us of such acute and radical importance. Of course this in itself is still not enough to provide an answer to the question of precisely how the disciples really did experience, at the ultimate heart and centre of this Easter experience, the existence of Jesus as delivered from death, and so in some sense having an abiding and eternal validity in God. This too is a point on which not much can be said. Why is this? It is because we ourselves have precisely not undergone this experience. But even in an experience of this kind of one who, having been delivered, definitively possesses his own history, the true heart and centre of this experience is of course, in the very nature of the case, not something which can initially be verified by touching him with our hands etc., or laying them upon a wound in his side. It is obvious from the outset that we cannot weigh and measure the risen [211] Lord, cannot photograph him with our cameras, that even a team of television reporters could not make a documentary about him. He does not belong to the world of our experience. For this reason it is extremely difficult now to express in more precise terms exactly how the apostles made this experience. Nevertheless we can from the outset say this much:

If they had been able to touch him in the same way that we touch things at the everyday level, this would in fact not have constituted the true experience of the definitive state which this man Jesus had attained to at all. For in that case the more solid the disciples would have felt such experiences to be at that time, and within the dimension of this world, the less they would have experienced that in which the essence of resurrection in fact consists: the fact that this man is he who has been definitively delivered. We must simply say: These disciples did maintain that they had undergone this experience, and these individuals actually described this experience. But in these descriptions of theirs it is clearly apparent that they were very conscious of one fact, and actually point to it with what is relatively speaking considerable exactitude, the fact namely that their experience was no mere subjective impression of some abiding validity in Jesus, such that it still maintains a permanent force for us, the fact that the point of departure in this experience was him and not their own subjectivity; that it constitutes something quite different from visionary experiences in other contexts with which [17] Hence, despite the very extensive 'historical' attestation of the Resurrection it would certainly be false to confine our attention solely to these accounts as such. H. Schlier rightly regards the Resurrection of Jesus as constituting a borderline problem between exegesis and dogmatic theology. cf. his 'Über die Auferstehung Jesu Christi' = Kriterien 10 (Einsiedeln, 1968), pp. 69-71.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

these men were perfectly familiar. In the case of Paul too we find him on the one hand uncompromisingly presenting himself as a mystic gifted with visions and similar phenomena, and yet at the same time on the other being plainly conscious of, and emphasizing (even to the point of using a different terminology) the fact that the experience of the risen Lord is something quite different.

The question still remains: Is the experience which these disciples attest for us susceptible of abstract investigation and explanation in rational terms, or is any such rationalizing abstraction contrary to the experience asserted by them to have taken place on the grounds that if we do subject it to this rationalizing process even that which they do record of it in all honesty thereby ceases to have any further validity? At this point the Christian says: 'Well, I accept this experience from themselves as being unique, but at the same time as something which has really been attested. I believe with them.' If we say, with the exegetes of our own time, that the Resurrection is not an event that took place in historical fact,[18] but that [212] the historical fact consists rather simply in the faith and the conviction of the apostles and disciples about the Resurrection, then this again is not a statement which the dogmatic theologian, on any right understanding of this statement concedes to the exegete and the historian only reluctantly and with a 'gnashing of teeth', The situation is, rather, that here too we have something which is at basis obvious from the very nature of the case, and, moreover, from the very nature of the case as the dogmatic theologian views it from his own standpoint. For one to rise from the dead in such a way as to rise into the inconceivability of God obviously in the very nature of what is signified by this is not something which is intrinsically included, or should be included, in the dimension of historical experience as found in other contexts. This, however, is in no sense to exclude the fact that this experience involves some reality which is not identical with itself as such.

The disciples do not create the Resurrection of Jesus by their experience. Rather they experience (this is a witness that we must accept from them if we are willing to believe at all) the Resurrection of Jesus. The Catholic interpreter of the apostles' experience of the Resurrection says, 'What I accept from them is that they had experience of one who had risen'. He does not say, 'I postulate the experience of Jesus in virtue of the fact that I postulate an experience of faith'. And it is in this sense too that Paul understands the Resurrection. If we wish to deny this experience to the apostles and Paul, then that is a matter for our own free decision. But what we cannot say on any showing is what Bultmann and others have said in their interpretation of the Resurrection, namely that the apostles themselves would also have understood it in this sense. What the witnesses of the Resurrection intended to convey was that in the risen Lord they experienced a reality which is immediate, radical, and inseparable from the saving significance which this event bears for us. On the other hand, however, God would have had no reason to cause an individual to rise from the dead unless that individual had some significance for us. Thus we can uncompromisingly state that Jesus properly and radically became he who had risen from the dead only when he had attained precisely to that point towards which everything tends as its goal, and at [213] which he is present in my faith too as he who has risen from the dead. The very fact that reality quite in general is a single reality which is intended to be made present in the subject endowed with spiritual faculties – this fact in itself is enough to justify us in making the assertion we have just made. Whether we refuse to accept the apostles' witness to [18] For an orientation from the Catholic side on this question the following studies are particularly suitable: J. Kremer, Das älteste Zeugnis von der Auferstehung Christi = Stuttgarter Bibelstudien 17 (Stuttgart, 1966), and idem, Die Osterbotschaft der vier Evangelien (Stuttgart, 1967). On the whole cf. also the relevant studies in the volumes which have recently appeared, Mysterium Salutis III/1, 2 (Einsiedeln, 1969/70), and also the comprehensive discussion of the early Christian tradition of the creed in K. Lehxnann, Auferwecks am dritten Tag nach der Schrift = Quaetiones Disputatae 38 (Freiburg, 2nd ed., 1969).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this experience of theirs or not – that is a matter for ourselves.

But in any case if we are honest we must not assert, as the sceptics so often do, that it is possible in the twinkling of an eye to provide a serious explanation of this experience of the apostles (which, after all, is on any showing a piece of historical data) even without according to the experience as its subject matter that reality which it is intended to have in their eyes. If anyone says they were precisely people who were religiously inclined, who could not bear to be parted from their Master, and so precisely ended by conjuring up the idea that he had risen from the dead – if anything of this kind is intended to be taken as a serious explanation of the apostles' experience, then this again belongs to the realm of uncritical rationalism. And even though nowadays this 'explanation' is usually formulated in somewhat loftier and more polite terms, it still belongs to this realm of uncritical rationalism. If anyone understands the Resurrection aright, if at the centre of his own existence, he yearns for his own 'resurrection' since on any true anthropology, he can only understand himself as a man who hopes for that which is described in terms of resurrection, then, in my belief, he has also achieved an a priori perspective such that, while it certainly does not excuse him from the free decision of faith in the Resurrection of Jesus, still at the same time it does justify him in believing in such a thing as the Resurrection of Jesus, i.e. in accepting the Easter experience of the disciples as a matter of his own intellectual honesty. Incidentally it may be said that the disciples were precisely not stupid or primitive men. We have only to represent their concrete situation to ourselves. There is someone who was a very nice man, put forward very remarkable ideas, and who was yet condemned and killed by the legitimate political authorities and also by the religious authorities accepted by the disciples themselves. How on this showing are the disciples, without something more than this happening to them, to arrive at the idea that it is all quite otherwise than it seems, that the reality has, after all, turned out gloriously? The Easter experience of the disciples really cannot be explained away as simply as the sceptics suppose.

But let us put the question to ourselves once more: If we are sceptics and doubters, have we any positive meaningfulness to offer for our lives and the lives of others? Anything which makes life itself more meaningful?

[214] And if in reply to this we sought to say, 'Oh yes, all that about the Resurrection of Jesus would certainly be very beautiful, but it is too beautiful to be true', then the reply to this would be to ask, 'Why should not man prefer the darkness of his existence to consist in faith in an absolute light than to commit himself to this darkness as one who has been banished from the light'? This is all the more true in view of the fact that man as he is does not, after all, basically speaking, or in his life as he lives it in the concrete, allow himself to fall into the void of the absurd. For, in spite of everything, he is, in his existence, one who is decent, loving, faithful. In the very act of achieving the fulness of his existence he still says again and again, 'There is a light'. And basically speaking is not the attitude of Christians precisely tantamount to saying, 'Despite all that is unintelligible, dark, cruel and brutish, there is a hope justified even prior to any theoretical process of reasoning, that existence has a meaning'. Now if this meaning is such that it affects the whole man, and not merely a spiritual element within him, then it thereby asserts that man will be the risen one. But once he achieves this plane of thought, then once more it does not involve any 'hara kiri' of the intelligence when he believes that message of the apostles, on which they have staked their lives, that they have made the experience of the risen one as the instance of resurrection that is radically first and provides the foundation for all the rest. And it is he who justifies us in hoping for our resurrection.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[215]

9

CHRISTOLOGY IN THE SETTING OF MODERN MAN'S UNDERSTANDING OF HIMSELF AND OF HIS WORLD

Christian revelation certainly claims to be God's word, to be addressed by God to man, a word which does not depend upon any historically conditioned perspectives of human understanding as its prior condition, a word which in its message goes beyond all such perspectives, and in which that which we call the grace of faith itself creates the true perspectives of understanding for that which God wills to utter to man as his word in the form of human words. Nevertheless it is still not the case that the perspectives of understanding which are developed in human history and subject to change have no significance for the manner in which divine revelation is communicated and comes to be understood. At the beginning of the Epistle to the Hebrews (1:1) we are told that God has spoken at various times and in many ways. And this statement serves to express and to emphasize the historicity of the revelation event itself, the fact that divine revelation has a history of its own such that neither the content nor the mode of revelation remain always the same. Now one of the factors that plays a decisive, though not an exclusive part in shaping this historicity of revelation itself is the historical situation in which revelation arises. Ultimately speaking, therefore, the divine sovereignty of revelation consists not in the fact that it presupposes no conditions already existing in history, that it has no perspectives of understanding such that they are historically conditioned and subject to variation and change, but rather in the fact that it is not, ultimately speaking, subject to these historical conditions even though it is posited in them. From the divine standpoint all these prior conditions in history are actually conditions designed to make revelation possible, which God himself as revealer creates and himself foreordains as the condition of his deed of revelation. In this sense, therefore, secular history must be thought of as a secular element in the divine revelation in which God himself is [216] communicated. Even if as Christians we say that revelation closed with the end of the New Testament age, with Jesus Christ and the eye-witnesses to him, and with his apostles, so that no new public revelation can any more take place, even if we say that all that still remains to be done is to preserve and hand on through 'tradition' that which has definitely taken place in Jesus Christ, still this does not mean that from the apostolic age onwards this revelation is to be conceived of as an entity which has been 'frozen' into its definitive form so that all that we still have to do is to push it on through the dimension of future time and space.[1] Nor does this statement imply that that development of dogma, that further unfolding of the revelation that has been 'closed' which does undoubtedly take place is independent of the historical situation. The historical situation and the historical process in which particular perspectives of understanding are changed and altered are, on the contrary, demonstrably something more than the mere external situation for the development of dogma. Rather they are the ferment within this such that without it such development would be totally inconceivable.[2]

[1] Hence right down to the Middle Ages the inspiration of Ecumenical Councils and a revelation of the Holy Spirit have been spoken of almost as self-evident factors. On this cf. H. Bach; 'Sind die Entscheidungen der ökumenischen Konzilien göttlich inspiriert?', Catholica 13 (1959), pp. 128-138. Y. Congar, Tradition and Traditions (London, 1966).

[2] cf. the author's articles, 'History of Dogma', Sacramentum Mundi 2 (New York and London, 1968), pp. 102-108, 'History of Heresies; ibid., pp. 18-23; 'Theology II. History', ibid 6 (New York and London, 1970), pp. 240-246.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In the light of this it is obvious that theological work consists to a large extent in answering the question of how the perspectives of any given age give rise to fresh problems for the traditional dogmatic teaching that has been handed down, and how this teaching must be interpreted afresh (which does not mean circumvented while pretending to interpret it) in the light of such perspectives. This has been the case right from the first. But surely what is specifically new in the theological work today as contrasted with that of earlier ages consists in the fact that today the situation for theology is not merely unreflectingly lived through and allowed to exercise an influence on theology unconsciously. Instead this situation itself becomes the object of conscious reflection and can therefore be related explicitly to the theological work itself. Formerly there was no scientific awareness of the developing history of ideas in the present, and of course a fortiori no futurology either. And because of this theology was merely passively influenced by the historical situation in which its work was done and this passive influence was unconsciously [217] introduced into the theology itself. Today, on the other hand, this encounter between theology and the contemporary situation must take place at an explicit and conscious level, though of course only to the extent to which the individual from his place in history is capable of achieving such a level of conscious reflection on his own situation, for the attaining of it always remains an asymptotic goal. As a pointer to this new situation in theology we may regard it as a significant fact that in the decree 'Gaudium et Spes' of the Second Vatican Council a description was included of the contemporary secular human situation certainly for the first time in a decree of the official Church carrying such authority.

With these prior assumptions, therefore, let us put to ourselves the following question: Having regard to the contemporary situation of human thought, the view which modern man takes of the world, what are the implications of this for christology? What impulses could this contemporary situation give rise to for christology in terms of fresh currents in theological speculation? This question is raised in view of the fact that for many centuries the officially authorized christology of the Church has hardly made any progress at all, at any rate not such as has been made clear in the average Church member's awareness of his faith. In answering such a question we are faced from the outset with the hard problem that it is only with great difficulty that we can describe this contemporary situation in secular thought. And this is a difficulty which we must labour under from the outset in striving to answer the question of what the implications of this situation are for christology. Hence only a few quite primitive characteristics of the contemporary situation in terms of ideas can be mentioned here, and our question will be related to these. It is in these terms, then, such as they are, that we shall be attempting to answer the question of what this situation may demand of a christology that is in keeping with the times. It is also obvious that the reply we give to this question could strictly speaking only be arrived at by working out a fresh christology, and this of course is something which cannot be accomplished here.[3] Again we cannot claim either that the order in which the characteristics we have in mind will be presented is based on any well founded system, or that the order in which they appear here will correspond to the degree of importance to be attached to each particular landmark of the contemporary situation which we shall be mentioning.

Our age is certainly characterized by a profound conviction of the [218] unity between spirit and matter.[4] In fact our own times are to a large extent decisively influenced by a dialectical materialism. For a large section of mankind this represents an ideology which has

[3] On the questions with which a new christology of this kind is confronted cf. K. Rahner, 'Current Problems in Christology', Theological Investigations I (London and Baltimore, 1962), pp. 149-200, and also idem 'Jesus Christ', Sacramentum Mundi 3 (New York and London, 1968), pp. 192-209.

[4] This idea is developed more deeply in my article, 'The Unity of Spirit and Matter in the Christian Understanding of Faith', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 153-177.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

been constitutionally imposed, protected and propagated, and because of this, and in addition to its dominance in this sphere, it has also had a very profound effect in influencing the situation in terms of human thought in the rest of the world as well. Even if as philosophers and Christians we decisively reject this materialism, still the element of truth in this error (for unless there was such an element of truth the importance of materialism in the present age would be totally incomprehensible) can be regarded as consisting in a recognition of the unity between spirit and matter. For in the traditional 'ideology' of earlier Christian ages this unity had, after all, not been recognized with sufficient clarity.

This unity of spirit and matter in a sense which is philosophically and theologically acceptable to a Christian, cannot of course be established here in extenso, or in its own right. If this were possible, we should be putting forward the following thesis as its content: Spirit and matter have necessarily an intrinsic connection with one another, because both of them derive from the one infinite Spirit which is God as their Creator. All creaturely spirituality has an essential connection with matter, because ultimately speaking, although in very varied ways, creaturely spirituality is a receptive and intercommunicative spirituality (even in the case of the 'angels'), and matter in the metaphysical sense is the necessary condition for finite spiritual beings to exercise an intercommunicative influence upon one another. We must assume here the concept of an essential self-transcendence on the part of an existing creature sustained by God as its ultimate cause, and on the basis of this assumption we can freely assert that the development of biologically organized materiality is orientated in terms of an ever-increasing complexity and interiority towards spirit, until finally, under the dynamic impulse of God's creative power, and through a process of self-transcendence of this kind, it becomes spirit.[5]

[219] Now assuming a unity of this kind between spirit and matter, then (quite apart from other treatises such as that of eschatology) this has a direct significance for christology. One instance of this is that on this assumption it is easier to understand why the Incarnation has a significance even for the angels, namely because these too belong as such to the cosmos which is one and material at the same time. But more than this there is a further problem (one which is already to be found even in Origen's works), which can be rendered more intelligible, the problem, namely of why the Logos becomes man without also becoming an angel. For in finding a solution to the problem entailed in this state of affairs we must not invoke any arbitrary dispensation on the part of God. Again on the basis of this unity between spirit and matter it also becomes clearer for christology why the assumption of a spirit-creaturely reality by the Logos actually constitutes a hypostatic union with matter, an Incarnation of the Logos in the true sense, which attains to and commits itself to matter itself as such – in other words the radical potentiality of the world as such – and why the total reality of the world is ipso facto touched to its very roots by the Incarnation of the Logos precisely in virtue of the fact that matter must be conceived of fundamentally and from the outset as one. Finally there is one further point which can be made still more unambiguously clear on the basis of this unity between spirit and matter. This is that in the de facto free ordering of this total reality the creative deed of God, and that too in its bearing upon the material world, was from the outset an element in that wider and more radical decision of God's will to impart himself to that which is other than himself and not divine.[6] There can be

[5] A similar line of thought, though developed from a different starting-point, is to be found in Teilhard de Chardin, Man's Place in Nature (London, 1966). On the author's conception cf. chiefly K. Rahner and P. Overhage, Das Problem der Hominisation = Quaestiones Disputatae 12/13 (Freiburg, 1961), esp. pp. 43 ff., and also 'The Secret of Life', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 2969), pp. 141-152.

[6] On this cf. the author's contributions entitled 'On the Theology of the Incarnation', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 105-120; also 'Incarnation', Sacramentum Mundi 3 (New York and London, 1968), pp. 110-118.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

no doubt that in accordance with Augustine's phrase relating to the humanity of Jesus, 'Assumendo creatur' the humanity of Jesus is the object of God's creative will because it is through the hypostatic union that the Logos wills to utter itself into the external world.[7] [220] Nevertheless because of the unity between spirit and matter, and because of the ultimate unity of the world constituted by matter as such, this humanity of Jesus constitutes an element in the world as a whole, while conversely this world constitutes in a very radical sense the environment, the concomitant setting, indeed the very physicality demanded by the Logos in its act of uttering itself into the non-divine. Now if this is true then it must also be said that the whole of creation in the de facto order imparted to it is from the outset posited as the condition enabling God to impart himself to the non-divine by becoming the addressee and the recipient of this self-utterance of his. On this showing the entire supernatural reality constituted by grace and Incarnation (taking both of these as mutually conditioning elements in a single act of self-bestowal on God's part) no longer appears as a subsequent addition to a world that is considered merely as having been created by God. On the contrary, the creation, considered as the constitution of the non-divine 'out of nothing', is revealed as the prior setting and condition for the supreme possibility of his imparting of himself 'to the outside world' to be realized, a self-bestowal in which he does not constitute some other being, different from himself, but imparts himself, and thereby effectively manifests himself as the agape that bestows itself.

An essential trait in modern man's understanding of himself and of his world is the conviction that the world is not a static reality, but rather a world in process of becoming, subject to the process of evolution and history. It is not our task here to distinguish evolution and history from one another in any more precise terms, even though it is of the highest importance, in other contexts at least, to draw the lines of demarcation between the two, and even though we are in danger of denying the true nature of human history itself, if in our conception of it we make an exaggerated or over-facile use of the conceptual model of physical or biological evolution. The fact remains, however, that in this connection in his understanding of himself and his world modern man conceives of the reality involved in terms of evolution. In former times the basic conception of the world and of man was that they were created by God at the 'beginning of time', and never lost this radical reference to their own origins and basis. But this abiding reference to the transcendent and ultimate basis of all reality was unquestioningly interpreted as a state of being sustained in being, as 'conservatio'. God creates a world and maintains it in being. And however much the phenomenon of becoming takes place within it, this process of becoming consists in the reproduction, constantly renewed, of what was already there before; or at any rate it is [221] a becoming which unfolds on a stage which has been firmly and immovably established once and for all, and in such a way that this firmly established sphere of the world, this stage of the theatre of the world, itself remains unaltered. From ancient times, and from the beginning of the Christian age right down to the theology of the baroque period, the image of the world was such that the basic constituent of reality was not time but space considered as a static entity, and history in the truest sense – in other words the history of salvation and perdition – was the movement of reality towards a specific and definitive point within this system as spatially conceived. Of course even prior to the advent of the modern interpretation of the world and of man these basic ideas were interwoven again and again with perceptions and expressions of belief which ran counter to this basic conceptual model involving a static interpretation of the world, and which could only be made to conform to it with difficulty and

[7] A fuller treatment of this is to be found in F. Malmberg, Über den Gottmenschen = Quaestiones Disputatae 9 (Freiburg, 1969); cf. also idem, ' "Ipsa assumptione creatur". Ein Versuch scholastisch-theologischer Glaubensinterpretation', Ein Leib – ein Geist (Freiburg, 1960), pp. 315-353.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

to a limited extent. But this does not alter in any respect the fact that the activity of God was regarded primarily as consisting in the upholding of a static world, one which, insofar as it had any 'movement', moved in cycles, ultimately turning back upon itself and not achieving any linear advance of history towards a future that remained open before it. In accordance with this God was also thought of as he who belongs to another world, he who, as unmoved Mover, does not contribute to bringing history to its fulness by impelling it towards new and different points.

In contrast to this the man of today experiences the world as a becoming, a changing, and a history. He thinks of space rather as a function of time,[8] history as a process of linear development which leads to ever more complex systems, systems which are at the same time present in the subjective awareness of those involved in them. Hence the question naturally arises for Christian faith of how in more precise terms we should conceive of God and his relationship to the world if we take this model of a dynamic and evolutionary world as our premiss. In order to pave the way for our answer to this question we must explicitly draw attention to a further point, namely that there is much which Christian faith has recognized all along and which in reality stands opposed to the ancient conception of the world, even though this was long preserved in christendom, and even though the opposition involved was with difficulty [222] concealed. At the same time these very factors, recognized from the first by Christian faith, exhibit a positive affinity with the basic conception of the world and man which belongs to modern times. Christianity has never been merely a doctrinal system of eternal ideas, pointing on to realities with an eternal validity and prescribing a mere mystical sinking into God which involves a withdrawal from history. On the contrary Christianity is the proclamation of a saving history in which the true absolute which is significant for man is the historically concrete. At least on the religious terrain which is most proper to it Christianity has all along constituted an ideology which is evolutionary in character. The only point was that the Christian tradition represented this saving history as being played out on the fixed and static stage of the material and biological world, and as a result saving history itself was in constant danger of being conceived of in terms of this static concept of the world, and so of being undervalued as being, in the last analysis, an epiphenomenon in the world and nature of a very secondary kind, this in turn leading ultimately to it becoming incredible and so denied. Some awareness of a future new earth, an eschatological consummation of the material world as a whole, a consummation to which man too could actively contribute, was indeed included at one point or another in the conscious faith of Christianity. But it did not emerge as a distinctive trait in its own right in any theological cosmology or cosmic eschatology. Instead it constantly remained submerged beneath a conception of salvation in which the individual spiritual subject was considered to be delivered from the world and its history and taken into that other world of the eternal God who is outside all history. Properly speaking, therefore, what is needed is not so much a transposition of the Christian understanding of the world and man into an evolutionary view of the world, but rather the bold and radical carrying through to its logical conclusion of that view of the world which essentially and in principle has been present all along in Christianity, and still is present in it, as opposed to those portrayals of the world which have been superimposed upon it and are alien to it, and to which Christianity itself has formerly been exposed as a result of the influence of a Hellenistic view of the world.

Admittedly in establishing this basic point we have still not answered the real question with which we are concerned, that namely of how in more precise terms we should

[8] We are not concerned here to produce an exact scientific description of the relationship between space and time in the sense appropriate to physics. Such a description is, after all, not required in the present context. On this cf. also my article, 'Theological Observations on the Concept of Time' in this volume, pp. 288-308, esp. n. 1.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

understand the relationship of God to the world. In answering this question we must inevitably touch upon the old metaphysical problem of the immanence and transcendence of God in relation to the world. In principle the philosophical and theological teaching of Christianity about God has always also been aware of and spoken of an [223] immanence of God in the world, even though in doing so it has always fought against the danger of interpreting this immanence in a pantheistic sense, and making God in some way simply identical with the world as a whole. But this immanence of God in the world precisely as above and beyond the world and in this sense transcendent, was nevertheless in some respects abbreviated in the traditional theology of the seminaries, and in two respects its characteristic traits were not fully brought out: this immanence had, so to say, a static character. It was not understood (at any rate not clearly enough understood) as the immanence of the divine dynamism in the world as a becoming, but rather as the immanence of God as conserving and maintaining the abiding orders of being. Certainly over and above this teaching of the divine 'conservatio' a further teaching was presented of the divine 'concursus', God's collaboration with the activities of his creatures. But this divine collaboration was, nevertheless, merely the providing of the necessary divine assistance for the 'actus secundus' of a stable and unchangeable being to be brought to its own due fulness. It was not conceived of as the dynamism in virtue of which the world advances and develops its own nature to the point of producing essentially new and different realities.

But it is precisely this that we must straightway go on to treat of if we are to discuss with all due seriousness an evolutionary view of the world. Certainly this modern view of the world is to a large extent corrupted in its own basic conception in that it seeks to interpret the element of the new appearing in the history of the natural order and of the spirit as being constituted once more merely by the chance variations and combinations of basic elements which have been present all along. Again that view of the world which is presented as modern all too often proceeds from the basic misconception that something radically new, qualitatively different and higher, cannot be the outcome of an evolution from below (on this showing, therefore, there would never really be any such radically new element), and that what really emerges in such an evolution from below is not something genuinely new, but rather something that is quantitatively more complex. Against this, however, whether we be Christians or philosophers or natural scientists, we must genuinely and freely accept the element of becoming in the world for what it is. We must recognize the possibility of a genuine development from below into something higher, denying neither that this 'something higher' is genuinely new in time, nor that it has connections with what already exists in time. And if we do this then in the very nature of the case we cannot escape from the concept of becoming as a genuine process of self-transcendence. All [224] creaturely being is being in process of becoming, but all becoming, if it is really worthy of the name, is the becoming of that which is qualitatively higher, and which, nevertheless, is the act of that which is lower. And it is precisely this that is signified when we speak of self-transcendence. That which is higher is not merely added on to the lower stages in the world's development, but is actually enacted and attained to through these lower stages in a process of genuine self-transcendence. What was formerly signified by the terms 'conservatio' and 'concursus' in Christian theology is nothing else than the dynamic impulse towards precisely this self-transcendence present in all being in virtue of the immanence of God.

It is not possible here to pursue any further the dialectical relationship between the immanence and transcendence of God in relation to the world. But on any showing the immanence of God in the world must be conceived of as of so radical a kind that the process of self-transcendence inherent in being in process of becoming genuinely is and remains an active process of self-transcendence. At the same time, however, the transcendence of God must be maintained, and that too not merely by reason of God's sovereign independence of the world, but in order to ensure that what emerges from this process of becoming is that which is genuinely new. And this too must be maintained in such a way that that which comes to be is genuinely new and not merely an explicitation of that which has been present all along. Thus we can see that the state of becoming genuinely inherent in the world of itself postulates the fact that God is simultaneously immanent and transcendent in it in a single act.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Probably the account of the immanence of God provided in the traditional theology of the seminaries is inadequate in a second respect also. We cannot here treat of the philosophical question which we already find arising again and again in the philosophy and theology of the Middle Ages, the question, namely, of what precisely constitutes the relationship between the 'esse' of God and the 'esse' of the creature, or, to express it more exactly, what the consequences are for this relationship when we consider that the creation of finite being by God does not presuppose nor, properly speaking, even create, the difference between God and the creature, but rather, from the standpoint of God, that God himself through his own being precisely is this difference in himself. Taking this as our starting-point, it would once more be possible to attain to an immanence of God in the world or an immanence of the world in God. And such a consideration would also have its significance in enabling us to realize those further truths with regard to the immanence of God which have to be stated on the basis of a specifically theological premiss.

[225] But this difficult approach must be set aside here. We can achieve a still more radical understanding of the immanence of God in the world by more directly theological methods. We have already said that the creation can and should be conceived of as an element in, and prior setting for, the self-bestowal of God, that act in which he does not create something different from himself and set it over against himself, but rather communicates his own reality to the other. If and to the extent that we have understood that the created world is the subject to whom the divine self-bestowal is addressed, and is the condition and prior setting posited by this self-bestowal of God in itself, and enabling it to take place, if, in other words, the world emerges within the process of God's self-bestowal, then it naturally follows that there is an immanence of God in the world (though always, of course in a way that allows for the difference between it and that which belongs intrinsically to the world). This immanence is not merely that of the Creator in the creature, but rather that the recognition of which comes to be developed in Christian theology in dealing with the question of the indwelling of God in the spiritual creature through grace. But once this recognition is achieved, then this indwelling of God is no longer understood merely as constituting a particular phenomenon occurring here and there within the world, but rather as a fundamental relationship which God bears to the world in general. The proper topos for achieving an understanding of the immanence of God in the world in theology, therefore, is not a treatise on God worked out in abstract metaphysical terms, but rather the treatise on grace, admittedly taking this as teaching not that some created quality of grace is instilled by a creative act, but rather as teaching that the existence of God bears a quasi-formal relationship to the world such that the reality of God himself is imparted to it as its supreme specification.[9]

It seems to us that we have strayed far from the proper theme of our investigation. What has all that we have said to do with christology? We have attempted to perceive a more radical theological significance in the modern understanding of the world as a world of becoming that exists in a constant process of self-transcendence. The world can really be a world of becoming in the unity of spirit and matter that belongs to it, and in a linear process of history in which an ever higher degree of self-transcendence is achieved, precisely because the mystery most interior to it, and as such precisely elevated above it, is the absolute being [9] On the manner in which this connection between grace and history etc. is to be thought of more precisely cf. E. Klinger, Offenbarung im Horizont der Heilgeschichte (Zürich, 1969).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of [226] God, whose basic act (an act which also includes God's creativity) is the self-bestowal of God upon that which is not divine. The whole history of the becoming of the world, therefore, proceeds in ever higher stages of self-transcendence towards that point at which this self-bestowal of God can be and is accepted as such. Now in this history of the world considered as the history of self-transcendence that being which appears as a subject capable of accepting such a self-bestowal on God's part is called man. The acceptance of this self-bestowal of God by man and in conformity with the nature of man (considered as a transcendental subject endowed with ultimate freedom on the one hand, and as a historical and inter-communicative being on the other, such that these two factors mutually condition one another) has, as it has de facto taken place, a twofold aspect: on the one hand it takes place always and everywhere where a transcendental subject in this sense takes possession of himself in freedom. This is because this subject is always endowed with the offering of God's self-bestowal even when, in the exercise of his own subjective freedom, this self-offering of God and the acceptance of it at the level of an 'anonymous Christianity' remain quite unexplicitated and unconscious. On the other hand, however, in accordance with the historical nature of man, this acceptance of God's self-bestowal must in increasing measure achieve an historical manifestation. It must be explicitly objectified, and that too not of course merely in words, but in acts in which the real fulness of human existence and of history is achieved – precisely in that which we call saving history and revelation history. For this is nothing else than the historical event of that transcendental self-bestowal of God and the acceptance of it in the dimension of human freedom.

This brings us to a point in our argument at which christology can be fitted into a modern understanding of the world and history taken as a whole.[10] If the history of matter and spirit in the unity constituted by these two is a history of an ever renewed process of rising to self-transcendence, then the supreme, ultimate, and 'eschatological' self-transcendence is that in which the world freely opens itself to the self-bestowal of God himself as Being and Mystery in the absolute, and in which the world accepts this in the power of this self-bestowal of God itself. The acceptance of the world by God in his act of self-bestowal then, and the acceptance of God in his act of self-bestowal by the world are manifested historically in such a way that these two acceptances are seen to constitute a unity. Moreover, [227] this manifestation achieves its irrevocable climax at that point at which these two acceptances become definitive and irrevocable (however much further saving history in general is prolonged). Now if we accept this, then we have precisely accepted what we call the Incarnation of the divine Logos, the Mediator of salvation in the absolute. The fact that this event, in which man attains to God in an ultimate act of self-transcendence, and in God's own self-bestowal upon man in its most radical form, has taken place precisely in Jesus of Nazareth – that is a fact that cannot, of course, be deduced in a transcendental christology which recognizes the idea of the God-man as the supreme point, and at the same time the point of intersection between the ultimate self-transcendence of the world reaching out to God and the self-bestowal of God upon the world in its most radical form (both taking place in history). On the contrary, the fact that this event has taken place in Jesus of Nazareth is ascertainable only through the historical experience of the crucified and risen Jesus, an experience which as such cannot in its turn be communicated any further. But this does nothing to alter the fact that an 'evolutionary view of the world' can conceive of the idea of the Incarnation as the asymptotic goal of a development of the world reaching out to God, provided only that such a view of the world conceives of the self-transcendence of the world in the power of God and God's own immanence in the world in sufficiently radical terms for us to realize that this process of self-

[10] On what follows, therefore, cf. also K. Rahner, 'Christology within an Evolutionary View of the World', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 157-192.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

transcendence only attains its end at that point at which it recognizes and accepts the self-bestowal of God as the supreme and unsurpassable apogee of the dynamic immanence of God.

Nor is a transcendental christology of this kind, within an evolutionary and dynamic conception of the world in general, invalidated by the consideration that de facto such a transcendental christology is only developed a posteriori and after the experience of the God-man has already been achieved. This sort of (ultimately mutually) conditioning relationship between a posteriori experience on the one hand, and the transcendental interpretation of the experience on the other, is also to be found in other contexts. In a transcendental christology of this kind, as fitted into the totality of an evolutionary view of the world, the Christ-event is not something which is enacted upon a sort of cosmic stage which is static and unaffected by what is taking place in him, but rather constitutes the point to which the becoming of the world in its history is from the outset striving to attain. An objection that might possibly be raised against a transcendental christology of this kind, and against the christo-centricity of the world and its history which it entails, is that the de facto history [228] of Jesus of Nazareth, circumscribed as it is in terms of space and time, and, after all, empirically speaking, so limited, cannot in any way be adequate for what is claimed for it by this transcendental christology. To this we should first and foremost reply that the ultimate and the greatest of all conceivable histories, namely the radical commitment of the creaturely spirit in faith, hope, and love to the infinite mystery of God, always makes a modest impression, and seems to be a peripheral event within the world's course on any view which is restricted to the superficial dimension of everyday empiricism, and yet for all this constitutes the ultimately real and ultimately decisive in that which takes place in the world. It must further be said that we are not viewing the Christ-event in Jesus of Nazareth in a way that is in conformity with its true meaning and essence unless we bear in mind two factors: the First and Second Coming of the Incarnate Logos must be understood as a unity, as a single event still in process of achieving its fulness, such that in it the Life, Death and Resurrection of Jesus constitute merely the first beginning of an event which will only have achieved its fulness and definitive state when the world as a whole is illumined by, and brought face to face with, the immediacy of God, and in this sense when Jesus himself will have 'come again'. This in itself implicitly contains the second point which has to be borne in mind: Christ can only rightly be understood if in him the 'head and body' which is the Church, and ultimately the world itself, are apprehended in their unity as constituting the one and whole Christ.

The irrevocable self-bestowal of God upon the world which has taken place in Christ, and the definitive acceptance of this by the world in Jesus Christ, do not simply bring history to an end. Rather they merely confer upon it its proper sphere, within which alone it can be unfolded. Hitherto (following the secular and Marxist view of history) history has been thought of as developing in the manner of a pre-history to that point at which man liberates himself from his own self-alienation, and only so begins his own true history, in which he freely disposes of his environment and of himself. Now to this view we should have as Christians to reply that this freedom which man himself has to work out in the course of his history is conceded to him as in fact legitimate and attainable (admittedly at the 'this-worldly' level, and always in a merely asymptotic sense) precisely in virtue of the fact that he is now fulfilling this task of his in history (even here it is still always possible for him to go astray) in the dimension of that which has been irrevocably addressed to him and which has achieved its historical manifestation in Jesus Christ, namely the self-bestowal of God as the absolute future. It is in the light of this that there [229] is real hope for the 'this-worldly' history in this sense, and it is also made free, whatever catastrophes may befall, to cling onto this hope because precisely it achieves its fulness in the dimension of God's uttering of himself to it as the absolute future. Now this self-utterance of God is present as such, and God does not merely move the world in its history as its unmoved Mover, as such unattainable to it.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[230]

10

REFLECTIONS ON THE PROBLEMS INVOLVED IN DEVISING A SHORT FORMULA OF THE FAITH

A point that has been under discussion for some years among Catholic theologians is whether it is not necessary today to have some brief new basic formulae in which the Christian creed can be expressed in a manner appropriate to the contemporary climate of ideas.[1] It is pointed out that the apostolic creed actually had a function of this kind, chiefly as the baptismal confession of the adult catechumen, and indeed that such quite brief formulations of the creed are already to be found in the New Testament.[2] Emphasis is laid upon the fact that, even assuming that a full and basic religious instruction has been given, a summary of this kind is still necessary today, in order to preserve what has been learnt at the catechumen stage of instruction, and in order to achieve a clear organization of the 'hierarchy of truths' without which the content of the Christian faith all too easily becomes amorphous, or alternatively the believer comes very easily in his religious practice to attach an exaggerated value to what is merely secondary. It is argued with some justice that it is necessary for the Christian layman to have at his command some [231] brief formulation of his faith and his creed orientated towards what is essential in it. For although there is no need for him to be a specialist theologian, he nevertheless has to take responsibility for his faith in the non-Christian environment in which he is placed. It is also significant that in the 'Year of Faith' Paul VI published a 'Confession of Faith of the People of God',[3] and even though it must be admitted that on the whole this has turned out to be too detailed, and to draw too much on the language of seminary theology for it to serve as a short formula of the kind we are thinking of, still for all this it does in its own way bear witness to the need for a short credal summary of the faith of the kind we have in mind.

The assumption underlying all these considerations is of course the idea that the Apostles' Creed, however old and honourable it may be, however important it is for it to be used at appropriate points in all the Christian Churches, and however true it may be that it will always constitute a permanent and binding norm of faith, is, nevertheless, simply incapable today of fulfilling the function of a brief formula of this kind in any adequate manner, precisely because it has too little direct contact with the contemporary intellectual situation for its claims to be attended to.[4] Chief among the factors which make this apparent is the very fact that the existence of a God transcendent above the world or, at any rate at first, the

[1] In this connection the author may refer to an attempt which he himself has already submitted at an earlier stage, cf. 'The Need for a "Short Formula" of the Christian Faith', Theological Investigations IX (London and New York), pp. 117-127; in the same connection reference should also be made to the following: P. Brunner, G. Friedrich, K. Lehmann, J. Ratzinger, Veraltetes Glaubensbekenntnis? (Regensburg, 1968), and H. Schuster, 'Kurzformel des Glaubens und seiner Verkündigung', Rechenschaft des Glaubens (edited by E. Hesse and H. Erharter) (Vienna, 1969), pp. 117-135; also 'Bemühungen urn eine Kurzformel des Glaubens', Herder-Korrespondenz 23 (1969), pp. 32-38 and the extensive bibliographical survey, 'The Creed in the Melting Pot', Concilium 6/1 (1970, Dogma), pp. 131-153.

[2] A penetrating discussion of these credal formulae in the New Testament is to be found in K. Lehmann, Auferweckt am dritten Tag nach der Schrift = Quaestiones Disputatae 38 (Freiburg, 2nd ed. 1969).

[3] AAS 60 (1968), 433-445.

[4] An attempt to interpret afresh the ancient formulae themselves is to be found in G. Rein (ed.), Das Glaubenshekenntnis. Aspekte für ein neues Verständnis (Stuttgart, 1967). The credal formula devised by D. Sölle in his 'Credo', Meditationen und Gebrauchstexte (Berlin, 1969), pp. 24-25 is intended to be taken as a programme for future discussion.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

meaning of the word 'God' is, or has been able to be, taken as self-evident. Now in an age of anti-metaphysical pragmatism and world-wide atheism it is, after all, manifest that this has ceased to be possible without further justification. Hence a desire evinces itself for a new basic formula, or new basic formulae, of the faith.[5]

[232] Even if we assume that such a desire is justified, a whole series of questions do of course still remain unanswered with regard to the postulate itself, and even prior to the actual composing of one or several such new basic formulae. And these questions must be clarified. Perhaps it is only in attempting to compose the formulae themselves in the concrete that we can clarify questions of this kind. Alternatively it may be that such questions should be clarified even before we undertake the composition of such basic formulae. Whatever the connection may be between the two stages, such questions must be recognized and solved.

At least some of these questions may be indicated at this point. First we should mention the question of whether such formulations at the conceptual and doctrinal level really are so important today. For this is an age in which pride of place is given to the practical rather than the speculative reason, and in which precisely in the religious sphere men are positively allergic to speculation and theorizing. It is an age in which men commit themselves to decision and action in preference to adopting a contemplative attitude towards life. In such an age, then, may it not be that the feeling is that there is no urgent need whatever to produce doctrinal statements of this kind with regard to the nature of Christianity? And in view of this may it not perhaps be that any attempt to compose such basic formulae cannot in fact have any real success? Here we are presupposing that Christianity, in contrast to other religions, cannot dispense with a certain conceptualized statement of its beliefs as an element inherent in its own nature. Assuming this, then, to be the case, we must adhere to the opinion that even in the contemporary situation the demand for a basic formula of this kind is far from being antiquated or out of date, the more so since such a basic formula can certainly be understood precisely as representing a critique of, and a counter to, any excessive conceptualizing, over-defining, and so 'dissecting' of what is properly signified in the Christian faith.

A further question is whether we can seriously count upon being able to compose a single basic formula of this kind which will be acceptable to the whole of christendom (at least Catholic christendom), and indeed such a formula as can perhaps, like the Apostles' Creed, have the character of expressing the official teaching of the Church, and which in virtue of this [233] fact could actually replace the Apostles' Creed in the Church's religious practice and liturgy, or whether alternatively it is from the outset no longer possible to conceive of any such single formula finding universal acceptance. I believe that this question must be answered in the negative, and in accordance with the second of these two alternatives. There will no longer be any one single and universal basic formula of the Christian faith applicable to the whole Church and, indeed, prescribed for her as authoritatively binding.[66] In this sense the Apostolic Creed will never have any successor, and is therefore destined, for certain purposes, to endure.

---

[5] The intellectual climate of the new age is in fact such as again and again to compel theology to give fresh presentations of Christianity in its 'essence'. cf. among others C. H. Ratschow, 'Wesen des Christentums', RGG I (3rd ed. 1957), 1721- 1729; A. von Harnack, Das Wesen des Christentums (Leipzig, 1913); G. Ebeling, Das Wesen des christlichen Glaubens (Hamburg, 1964); R. Guardini, Das Wesen des Christentums (Würzburg, 1938); M. Schmaus, Vom Wesen des Christentums (Westheim b. Augsburg, 1949); G. Söhngen, Die Einheit in der Theologie (Munich, 1952), pp. 288-304; K. Adam, Das Wesen des Katholizismus (Düsseldorf; 13th ed., 1957); K. Rahner, 'Christentum', LTK II (2nd ed., 1958), 1100-1115; H. U. v. Balthasar, Glaubhaft ist nur Liebe = Christ heute 1 (Einsiedeln, 3rd ed., 1966); idem, 'Summa summarum', Spiritus creator (Einsiedeln, 1967), pp. 322-344; J. Ratzinger, Einführung in das Christentum (Munich, 8th ed., 1969), In this connection the author may draw attention to a more large-scale publication which he himself is preparing for the immediate future on the subject of 'An Introduction to the Concept of Christianity'.

[6] On this cf., in the present volume, 'Pluralism in Theology and the Unity of the Creed in the Church', pp. 3-23.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

To show how impossible it is to produce any such new, single and universal basic formula of the faith we may begin by pointing to the fact that certain attempts which have been made to compose and officially introduce a world catechism to be enforced throughout the world have failed and have met with unanimous resistance on the part of preachers and exponents of catechetical theory; and this despite the fact that at one stage a Tridentine catechism was actually produced with this kind of official authority (although despite its advantages it never succeeded in imposing itself as a schoolbook for practical use), and despite the further fact that under Pius XII Gasparri actually attempted to compose a new world catechism of this kind. Against all such attempts it is justifiable to point out again and again that the differences between the individual peoples, cultures, and social milieux, and also those which arise from the different mentalities of the hearers, all have a bearing on the concrete situation in which the faith has to be preached. And nowadays these differences are too great for us to be able to address these hearers in all parts of the world through the medium of one and the same monotonous and uniform catechism. And if this is true then the same also applies to basic formulae of the kind we are thinking of, but in this case not merely because of the differences between the hearers themselves, but also because of the very brevity of such formulae.

Any basic formula of this kind must, precisely in spite of its brevity, as far as possible be directly intelligible to the hearer, and capable of being 'brought home to' him without much commentary. Now in view of the immense differences between the various outlooks it must be concluded that it is quite impossible that any one basic formula can be produced such that wherever it is used in the world it will be understood in the same sense and have the qualities indicated above. Already in the [234] New Testament itself a great difference is apparent between the basic formulae which it includes. We have only to think of the differences between the attributes of glory by means of which the reality of Jesus and his saving significance for us are expressed.[7]

Certain further and different considerations must now be added to this principle which we have enunciated that in view of the differences in the situation in which the gospel has to be preached it is necessary to have precisely different basic formulae in the Church. The consideration put forward so far should in itself have been enough to make it necessary for basic formulae of this kind to be devised afresh already at that stage at which Christianity emerged from the Hellenistic and Roman civilizations, and also from that which belonged homogeneously to the West. Thus taken in themselves those brief formulae of the faith which were adequate for the situation in the West should not merely have been 'exported' as they stood. Probably we can only fully explain the fact that they were 'exported' in this way if we take into consideration the repellent sense of superiority characteristic of European colonialism and imperialism, Now the moment the authority of this European imperialism in the sphere of theology ceases to be accepted without question, and the moment the Western civilization, formerly homogeneous as it was, falls into an intellectual and cultural pluralism that is extremely far-reaching, it immediately becomes clear that despite the unity of the Church herself, and the fact that this Church adheres to one and the same creed, it is no longer possible for us of today to count upon having one and the same homogeneous theology. Even in theology (taking this to signify a process of systematic reflection upon the Christian faith in the light of the total situation and the self-understanding of man as a whole) there necessarily emerges today a pluralism of theologies which, while they certainly may not contradict one another, are nevertheless, as they exist in the concrete, no longer capable of being integrated into any single system of theology by individuals or particular groups. In the universal Church of today it is recognized as legitimate that there should be a pluralism of [7] Cf. F. Hahn, Christologische Hoheitstitel (Göttingen, 2nd ed., 1964).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'situations' constituted by the different theological schools of thought, such that all of them are equally justified, and that they are no longer dominated or presided over by a European outlook. And this has perforce given rise to a pluralism of theologies such that it is beyond the powers of any one theologian to master them all. Now while it is true that creed and theology are two very different entities, that they have been so all along, and that [235] a fortiori they will continue to be so in the future, still at the same time it is no less true that there is no such thing as a creed which is capable of being formulated in total independence of any system of theology. Even formulae of the faith bear the characteristic imprint of some specific school of theology to such an extent that even in the New Testament itself, for all its unity as the expression of revelation, it is possible to discern several different theologies. In view of the fact, therefore, that the differences between the various theologies of today are too many and too wide for us to master them all, we must not expect that any one uniform basic formula can be produced such that it carries equal authority for all members of the Church.

Perhaps the Second Vatican Council constitutes, to some extent, a sign of this fact in itself. Certainly it has been able to achieve a certain eclectic amalgamation between the traditional neo-scholastic theology of the nineteenth century and the beginning of the twentieth on the one hand, and modern movements in theology on the other, and on this basis to produce certain universally accepted statements of doctrine. And in view of the contemporary pluralism of ideas the possibility of achieving this even at the public and official level was far from self-evident. From this point of view alone it has been a remarkable phenomenon. But even the Second Vatican Council itself has not attempted to produce any new official definitions of doctrine. What prompted it to refrain from this was probably not merely the more sympathetic, understanding and tolerant attitude which it adopted towards 'heretics', but also the feeling that a lengthier statement of doctrine, expressed in positive terms and in a single homogeneous theological language equally intelligible to all, is something which the Council can no longer so easily be expected to produce today. Moreover, in this way the Church avoids exercising her authority to the point of exhaustion by producing definitorial decisions of doctrine, and is able to continue to restrict the exercise of her authority to negative anathemas. For even in earlier times the great majority of such official definitions of doctrine were couched in this form.

In view of this it can be said that we are justified in attempting to produce many such basic formulae. These can be different from one another not merely according to the differences between the nations, the areas of cultural and historical influence, and the world religions, all of which play their part in shaping any one specific situation, but also according to the level of social development, the degree of maturity etc. of those to whom any given basic formula of this kind is addressed,

These various basic formulae will also differ among themselves [236] primarily in respect of that which is taken to be already recognized and accepted in any given milieu, and that which is asserted in these formulae as new and hitherto unrecognized so far as their particular milieu is concerned. For the differences between the various basic formulae must be in conformity with the differences between the various situations of the hearers themselves, and these differences of situation make themselves felt precisely in respect of what the hearer can accept as obvious in any given situation, and which can be used as a principle and point of departure for giving him an understanding of what is addressed to him as new. When therefore a basic formula of this kind appears more or less unintelligible in a milieu that is different from that for which it is designed, this state of affairs still does not invalidate the basic formula concerned, but on the contrary precisely justifies it.

Among the basic questions which have to be raised in connection with such basic formulae is of course to be included the special question of what is properly being expressed in a basic

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

formula of this kind and what can be set aside. It is surely clear that any such basic formula must not be presented as a brief summary of a systematic dogmatic theology. It cannot express all at once everything which constitutes the Church's explicit awareness of the content of her faith. In none of the creeds prior to the Council of Trent was everything expressed which belongs to the Christian faith. The teaching of the 'hierarchy of truths' in the Second Vatican Council asserts, in fact, that not everything which is true must necessarily and ipso facto be equally important on that account, but a basic formula should contain only that which is of fundamental importance, and on the basis of which the totality of the faith can in principle and in itself be attained. We should add to this the further consideration that it is surely possible to draw a justifiable distinction between an objective hierarchy of truths and one that is conditioned by the concrete conditions of life prevailing in a given human situation. Thus in a basic formula which is intended to be only one among many the emphasis must be laid on expressing that which can truly and effectively constitute the point of access and departure for the whole content of the faith in the specific situation and the specific concrete conditions of human life actually envisaged in that particular basic formula. In view of this, then, it is clear that such basic formulae can vary very greatly even in respect of their content, and that this content should consist primarily and chiefly in that which, so far as the hearers actually involved are concerned, represents an initial point of departure, though one that holds out a prospect of success, for achieving an understanding of the Christian faith as a whole.

[237] A further question would of course be how much to include in a basic formula of this kind purely in terms of quantity. Such a basic formula should certainly not be as long as the confession of faith of Paul VI, But even in this respect it is possible to conceive of very notable differences between the various basic formulae, ranging from a basic formula consisting of a few words, as in the Apostolic Creed, to one that consists in a few sentences, similar to that which I myself once attempted to formulate a few years ago.[8] Presumably in this respect too it is by no means necessary for the various possible basic formulae to be equivalent to one another.

We must now go on to draw attention to a further question with regard to the basic formula in general. In order for such a formula really to constitute a confession of Christian faith it must express belief in the historical Jesus as our Lord, the bringer of salvation in the absolute. And it must be related to this as a matter of historical fact. There can be such a thing as an anonymous Christianity in which grace, the forgiveness of sins, justification and salvation do take place even though the individual concerned sees no explicit relationship, so far as his conscious awareness is concerned or as an explicit object of enquiry, between himself and the historical event of Jesus of Nazareth.[9] Again it is possible to say very much with regard to the most central reality of the Christian faith without doing this directly from the point of view of Jesus Christ. This is particularly true because in fact not even every explicit relationship to the historical Jesus is ipso facto that entailed in faith or, in other words, needs itself in turn to be explained in its distinctive theological character. Moreover under certain circumstances this can be achieved on the basis of quite different fundamental statements of the faith which 'quoad nos' can initially be made without any explicit reference to Jesus Christ. This applies for instance to the first article of the Apostles' Creed. Nevertheless it is obvious that even a mere basic formula of any explicit Christianity must explicitly contain the reference of what is expressed elsewhere to Christ or the reference of Jesus to this other truth which is expressed, and this means that it must have the structure of an affirmation of faith that is

[8] cf. n. 1.
[9] On this cf. also the study entitled 'Anonymous Christianity and the Missionary Task of the Church', Theological Investigations, XII.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

christological.

In order to express all this in a slightly more concrete form, and to illustrate what has been said up to this point, we may adduce three brief theological formulae and explain the particular intelligible content which [238] it is possible to arrive at in them. Why there should be precisely three such brief formulae can perhaps better be explained at the conclusion, and hence for the time being this question must remain open.

These three brief formulae attempt to achieve the utmost possible within a very brief compass. For this reason alone they are extremely 'abstract' in their formulation. They attempt briefly to express the innermost nature of that saving history in which, whether it be taken in a collective or an individual sense, Christianity consists. The abstract formulation entailed in this is obviously not of itself accessible to everyone. It is therefore evident that these brief formulae, even on their own terms, cannot claim any universally binding force. It is likewise necessary to emphasize that these brief formulae have been devised in the light of a western milieu, and in view of a European situation corresponding to this. Hence taken by themselves they cannot claim to be applicable in the same manner, for instance, to the situation in terms of culture and history of thought that prevails in Japan. In this respect they could only be understood as requiring that something similar should be attempted which would then be suitable to apply, for instance, to the situation in terms of ideas that prevails in Japan.

The first brief formula, which we can call the theological one, runs as follows: The incomprehensible point of reference towards which human transcendence is orientated, and which cannot, either absolutely or in the concrete conditions of human living, be attained to by speculation alone, or in merely conceptual terms, is called God. And it imparts itself to man in the concrete and historical conditions of his existence by an act of forgiving love as his true consummation. The- supreme- eschatological point of God's self-bestowal in history, in which this self-bestowal is revealed as irrevocably victorious, is called Jesus Christ.

Let us add a few observations by way of commentary on this first brief formula, which we have called the 'theological' one.[10] It contains three [239] fundamental statements: a preliminary one with regard to what is meant by God. It seeks to communicate an understanding of God (in his nature and his existence) in which God is designated as the point of reference of human transcendence, and precisely in being so as the Mystery which remains incircumscribable.

In connection with this it is emphasized that this experience of God implicit in the experience of transcendence is not initially or ultimately achieved in a process of theoretical reflection, but in attaining to the ultimate fulness of knowledge and freedom in our everyday lives - in other words this experience of God is on the one hand inescapable, on the other can take place in a profoundly anonymous and preconceptual form. In this way it is intended to summon the individual to discover this experience of God which is present in any case within him by reflecting upon himself and to objectify it in conceptual terms. This first brief theological formula, therefore, must not merely say that God exists, so that from this it will be clear (as even Thomas Aquinas supposed) what he is. The brief formula is intended rather [10] The following studies by the author may also serve as commentaries on this formula: Worte ins Schweigen (Innsbruck, 10th ed., 1967); 'The Concept of Mystery in Catholic Theology', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 36-73; 'Christology within an Evolutionary View of the World', ibid. V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 157-192; 'The Church and the Parousia of Christ', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 295-312; 'Christology in the Setting of Modern Man's Understanding of Himself and of His World', in this volume pp. 215-229; 'Der dreifaltige Gott als transzendenter Urpsrung der Heilsgeschichte', Mysterium Salutis II (Einsiedeln, 1967), pp. 317-401; 'Incarnation', Sacramentum Mundi 3 (New York and London, 1968), pp. 110-118; 'Jesus Christ', ibid., pp. 192-209.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

to point out also how we can arrive at an understanding of what is really meant by God.

The second statement in this theological brief formula declares that this God who has thus been made accessible to man's understanding is not merely man's eternally asymptotic goal, but - and it is at this point that the first unambiguously Christian statement is made - that he gives himself to man in an act of self-bestowal to be his true consummation, and that too even though it is presupposed in this that man is a sinner, so that this act of self-bestowal entails an attitude of forgiving love. This self-bestowal is stated to take place both in the concrete conditions of the individual's own existence and at the same time in the dimension of history. In this way two realities are included (and moreover in such a way that the two are seen as elements mutually conditioning one another). The first is that which (at least as offered) is in the usual theological terminology called justifying grace (the self-bestowal of God in the 'Holy Spirit' in the concrete conditions of the individual's own existence). The second, concomitant with this, is what is called saving and revelation history, which is nothing else than history as the medium in which the self-bestowal of God is achieved; the historical objectivation, therefore, continuing to unfold through history, of that self-bestowal which, at least as offered, is inserted by grace into the very roots of history to remain abidingly present there. This then is a statement of the twofold self-bestowal of God upon the world, in other words of the two 'missions' in the economy of salvation, the mission of the 'Spirit' in the concrete [240] conditions of the individual's existence, and the mission of the 'Logos' (Son) in the dimension of history. And in this statement it will be noticed that mention has already been made of the ultimate and incircumscribable Mystery of God as abiding ('Father'). This statement, therefore, contains first an expression of the Trinity as manifested in the economy of salvation, and ipso facto in this the Trinity as 'immanent' too because without this the reality referred to would not constitute any real self-bestowal on God's part.

The third basic statement consists in the fact that this historical self-bestowal of God, of which the deed of grace in the individual's own existence is the historical objectification and the medium, achieves its supreme and eschatologically victorious point in Jesus of Nazareth. Although the need for brevity prevents us from providing any fuller exposition of this point here, this much at any rate must be said: If the historical self-bestowal of God achieves its supreme point, in which it is present not merely as directed and offered to human freedom (at the individual and collective levels) but as accepted in humanity as totally irrevocable, victorious and definitive (though this does not mean that saving history had already attained its absolute end at this point), then what is present here is precisely that which in the dogmatic theology of the Church is called the God-man, the hypostatic union (including in this the Death and Resurrection of this God-man). The third statement of this short formula thereby avows the truth that this eschatological supreme point in the historical self-bestowal of God upon the world has already taken place in the concrete in the historical person of Jesus of Nazareth. Since this eschatological event cannot be conceived of at all without including in our concept of it the fact that it has an abiding historical force in the further prolongations of saving history, an adequate starting-point for the theology of the Church is already present also in this brief formula. For in fact this can only be understood in its ultimate essence as the abiding sacrament of the saving deed performed by God in Christ for the world.

The second short formula, which we may perhaps call the sociological one[11] runs: Man realizes himself truly and achieves the authentic fulness of [241] his own nature only when he

[11] On this cf. especially the author's studies, 'Thoughts on the Possibility of Belief Today', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 3-22; 'The "Commandment" of Love in Relation to the Other Commandments', ibid., pp. 439-459; 'Reflections on the Unity of the Love of Neighbour and the Love of God', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 231-249; Im Heute Glauben = Theologische Meditationen 21 (Einsiedeln, 1968).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

turns radically away from himself and to his fellow. If he does this he apprehends (whether latently or explicitly) what is meant by saying that God provides the ambience, the assurance and the radicality of such an act of love, for it is God who, in his act of self-bestowal (at the level of both individual existence and of history) becomes the dimension within which such love is made possible. The term love as used here signifies both the love of intimate relationship and love in the social dimension. And it is the radical unity between these two elements that constitutes the foundation and nature of the Church. In this we may perhaps distinguish three assertions.

The first states that in that act of self-transcendence within his own individual existence which is achieved in the act of loving his neighbour man makes, at least implicitly, an experience of God. This first assertion, therefore, is simply a further specification of the first part of the theological brief formula. It concretizes that truth which was expressed in the first assertion of the first brief formula, namely that the achievement of the ultimate fulness of human transcendence takes place not at the level of theoretical speculation, but in the concrete practical knowledge and freedom of 'everyday' life. For this precisely signifies life as lived with and among one's fellow men. This first statement of the second brief formula is also covered from the theological point of view by the truth that love of God and love of neighbour are one, provided only that we do not reduce this truth to the platitude that we cannot please God unless we pay due heed to his commandment to love our neighbour.

The second assertion in this basic formula states that precisely through his self-bestowal God creates the possibility of achieving that relationship of love between men which is possible for us in the concrete and is the task which we have to achieve. In other words, therefore, this second assertion states that love between men (when it really achieves its proper and ultimate nature) is sustained by the supernatural infused and justifying grace of the Holy Spirit. If we have a more precise understanding of this self-bestowal of God in the sense in which it was more exactly defined in the first brief formula (in other words in the unity, the distinction and the mutual interconditioning of the self-bestowal of God in grace in the individual's own existence on the one hand, and the historical self-bestowal of God on the other, having its supreme point in the Incarnation of the divine Logos), then the statement that God has made himself the dimension in which it is possible to achieve a radical relationship of this kind between men includes also all that was said in the first brief formula and its interpretation with regard to the self-bestowal of God as constituting the [242] essence of the Christian faith. We have only to reflect upon Mt. 25 to realize that it is certainly quite unnecessary from the outset to dispute the fact that in the radical love of neighbour as realized at the practical level the whole salvific relationship of man to God and to Christ is already implicitly present. And if anyone were to feel that what was lacking in this second statement of the sociological brief formula was an explicit statement of the reference to Jesus Christ in man and in his love of neighbour, then obviously we could reply to him explicitly: This self-bestowal of God upon man which sustains him in his love of neighbour has its supreme and eschatologically victorious point in history in Jesus Christ, and for this reason in the love of every other man Jesus Christ is loved at least anonymously.

The third assertion of this second brief formula states that a love of this kind, in which God is loved in our neighbour and our neighbour in God, has itself a dimension of intimacy at the level of personal existence, and a social dimension at the level of history which precisely corresponds to the twofold aspect of the self-bestowal of God inherent in it. Where this love achieves its supreme point, and that too in the unity of these two aspects, that which we call the Church is tie facto present. For what is peculiar to the Church as distinct from other social groups consists precisely in the eschatologically indissoluble connection (not identity!) between truth-spirit-love on the one hand, and the historical and institutional manifestation of this bestowal of the Spirit as truth and love on the other.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

A third brief formula,[12] which we can call the futurologist one runs as follows: Christianity consists in an attitude of open enquiry into the absolute future which wills to give itself as such in itself in an act of self-bestowal, and which in Jesus Christ has confirmed this will which it has with an eschatological irrevocability. It is the absolute future in this sense that is called God.

This briefest of all the formulae transposes the statement about the transcendentality of man in the first basic formula in that it interprets this transcendentality as a reference to the future as 'futuricity'. An absolutely [243] limitless transcendentality, therefore, eo ipso implies an enquiry into the future in the absolute, as distinct from indefinite, finite, and partial futures following one upon another. Concerning this future it is stated that it is not merely the ultimate and asymptotic goal towards which history is orientated, which, while it does indeed maintain this history in motion, will not itself be attained to as itself, but rather wills to give itself through its own act of self-bestowal. Now what is said about this self-bestowal of the absolute future which is still in process of being realized in history is what has already been said concerning the self-bestowal of God in the first brief formula, namely that this self-bestowal, which is obviously also and in all cases posited in the dimension of concrete individual existence, has a historical aspect and in this has achieved a stage of eschatological irrevocability in Jesus Christ.

There is no need to provide yet again any full exposition of the fact that in this basic principle of a divine self-bestowal upon the world which has been rendered eschatologically irrevocable in Jesus Christ that truth is already implicitly contained which is explicitly stated in the doctrine of the Trinity and in christology. Nor do we need to repeat at any length our exposition of the fact that in the experience of our orientation towards the absolute future, and that too in the mode in which this wills to bestow itself directly as itself, God is experienced, and moreover, the God of the supernatural order of grace. And this means that he is experienced as sheer mystery.

Inasmuch as Christianity consists in the adoration of the one and true God as opposed to all idols (taking these to signify the according of an absolute value to finite, powers and dimensions in man) it is that attitude on man's part in which he maintains himself in openness to the absolute future and, inasmuch as this is, and continues to be, the absolute Mystery even in the consummation of this self-bestowal, Christianity consists in maintaining open the actual question which points to the absolute future.

These three brief formulae are certainly intended first and foremost as conceivable side by side with other possible basic formulae of the same kind, even supposing that such formulae have been conceived of at one quite specific level of conceptual abstraction, Nevertheless it is perhaps no mere theological word-play if we seek to understand these three formulae in their juxtaposition and interconnection as reflections and consequences of the Christian faith in the Trinity, or if we interpret them as the three approaches which are open to human experience, and by means of which an initial understanding can be achieved of the Trinity in its effects in the [244] economy of salvation and, in the light of this, of the Trinity as immanent also.[13]

The first formula speaks of God in fact as the uncircumscribed point of reference of [12] For further elucidation reference may be made to the following studies: 'Christianity and the "New Man"', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 135-153; 'Marxist Utopia and the Christian Future of Man', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 59-68; 'A Fragmentary Aspect of a Theological Evaluation of the Concept of the Future', Theological Investigations VIII (London and New York, 1973), pp. 235-242; 'On the Theology of Hope', ibid., pp. 242-260.

[13] On this cf. the statement of the principles involved in the author's article, 'Remarks on the Dogmatic Treatise "De Trinitate"', Theological Investigations IV, (London and Baltimore, 1966), PP. 77-102; and further the articles 'Trinity' and 'Trinity in Theology', Sacramentum Mundi 6 (New York and London, 1970), pp. 295-303 and 303-308.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

human transcendence. If we include in this conception the fact that in it the absolute and unoriginated 'principium inprincipiatum' of all conceivable reality is named, then, in a real sense the 'Father' of the Christian doctrine of the Trinity is named in expressing this incomprehensible and unoriginated point of reference of human transcendence. When in the second brief formula we say that the true scope of this is the idea of God in Jesus Christ as man making himself the dimension in which man can achieve a radical relationship with his fellow men, then in it we have named God made man, the 'Son'. The absolute future of man bestowing itself of its free and sovereign power over history which is God is, however, in a special sense the 'Spirit' of God, because it can be characterized as love, freedom, and a newness that constantly takes us by surprise.

Of course this triad of the brief formulae which we have mentioned should be conceived of still more precisely and clearly against their Trinitarian background, and it is not possible to do this here at any greater length. But at any rate we can say this much: a brief formula must on the one hand express the basic substance of the reality of the Christian faith in such a way that the most intelligible possible access to it is opened up at the level of man's experience in the concrete conditions of his existence, while on the other hand this basic substance can certainly be discovered in the idea of God turning to the world in the Trinitarian dimension of the economy of salvation. And if this is true then it is not from the outset difficult to show that there must be three basic types of such brief formulae, corresponding to the dogma of the Trinity. This does not exclude the fact that each of these basic types in turn can be very different from the others both in respect of the further distinctions which it contains and the difference of emphasis which it introduces into its content, and in respect of the due attention which it pays to the differences between these for whom a basic formula of this kind is destined.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[245]

PART THREE

Anthropology

[247]

11

THE SIN OF ADAM

The most striking feature of the situation which exists today for an ecumenical discussion of 'the sin of Adam' is that neither on the Protestant nor on the Catholic side is there any theology on this theme which could be presented simply as the Protestant or the Catholic position. So far as the Protestant side is concerned this seems to me to be clear from the fact that here there is no general agreement as to the existence of any original sin. But on the Catholic side too the situation is not different.[1] It is true that here – at least in principle – the doctrinal definitions produced in the fifth session of the Council of Trent with regard to original sin are recognized as binding in character. But this still does not clarify the situation. In the first place since then questions have arisen bearing upon the theory of anthropological evolution, the creation of man, polygenism and monogenism. And on these the teaching authority of the Church has adopted certain definite, though provisional, positions to which due heed must be paid in any Catholic theology in dealing with the question which concerns us here also.[2] A further factor is that for the past few years even in Catholic theology attempts have been made to interpret the Catholic doctrine of original sin such that they appear all but contradictory to one another and to be opposed to the simple and literal sense of the Church's definitions. Furthermore so many questions have been raised for the Catholic doctrine of original sin in the light of the general [248] situation prevailing today in theology itself and in secular anthropology that a mere repetition of, and simple commentary upon the Catholic dogma of original sin would, taken by itself, in no sense constitute an answer. For this reason unless a certain attempt is made to answer these questions, at least on the individual's own account and on his personal responsibility, it is no longer so clear that even the official teaching of the Church on original sin can be adduced as a real and vital factor such that it is adequate to sustain a real faith. For this is never possible unless a confrontation is achieved between the content of this faith and the totality of the believer's own understanding of himself prevailing at any given time.

In this situation the only course still remaining open to the Catholic dogmatic theologian is to put forward his own understanding of the official Catholic teaching on original sin without claiming thereby that this particular understanding is obviously or unquestionably identical

[1] An extensive account of the state of the discussion at the moment is provided by A. M. Dubarle, 'Le péché originel, recherches récentes et orientation nouvelle', RSPT 53 (1969), pp. 81-113. cf. also P. Schoonenberg, 'AT, NT und Erbsündenlehre', TPQ 117 (1969), pp. 115-124. In what follows we cannot enter any further into this point. This study reproduces a lecture which the author delivered in March, 1968 at a conference of ecumenical work at Paderborn.

[2] An account of these positions is given by J. Feiner, 'Der Ursprung des Menschen', Mysterium Salutis II (Einsiedeln, 1967), pp. 562-581; see also Z. Alszeghy, 'Development in the Doctrinal Formulations of the Church concerning the Theory of Evolution', Concilium (1967) 6/13 (Church and World), pp. 14-17.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

with that official teaching.[3] All that he will claim on behalf of his understanding of the question until the contrary is proved is that he has put forward an interpretation of the official teaching of the Church's faith with regard to the existence and nature of original sin which it is possible to hold within the Church; in other words that this personal understanding of his has been formulated in an attitude of unreserved obedience towards the teaching of the Church and that it remains as a point for discussion submitted to the Church's understanding of her faith as a whole. What we are asking, therefore, is whether in an interpretation of this kind the Church can recognize that it is her own understanding of her faith that is being reproduced. Whether the Church will react on the basis of her total understanding of her faith to this personal understanding of mine which I am submitting for her consideration, when she will do so, what form her reaction will take, and what its outcome will be – these are questions which still await an answer. For the time being it is sufficient that the dialogue to be maintained between the two sides should be a peaceable one. For the point to be decided in this dialogue is whether a personal understanding of the doctrine of original sin as put forward here is to be designated as 'Catholic'.

In a subject as extensive as this it is not possible to examine all the relevant factors, and for this reason there is much that must be put forward here in the form of a simple statement without any further arguments to justify it. And again it will not be possible here explicitly to define our [249] position with regard to other expressions of opinion on original sin which have been put forward from the Catholic side.

We shall proceed straightway to the question itself and put the question quite simply: What do we really mean when we speak of 'original sin'? We believe that this is the only way to arrive at a meaningful answer to the question of the 'sin of Adam', because the doctrine of original sin in us is the sole point at which the theological question of the 'sin of Adam' can be raised and answered – and answered moreover on grounds which we are just about to discuss. In terms of content both questions are one, a point which is already recognized and made clear in the combination of the two scholastic terms 'peccatum originale originans – peccatum originale originatum'. For us the sin of Adam is a theological datum only in virtue of the fact that our sinfulness, which we assert of ourselves, is a sinfulness that has been 'derived'.

I

Methodological Presuppositions

1. Our information about the 'fall of the first man' and the situation of perdition which it entails for all those descended from him has not come to us through an eye-witness account emanating precisely from that event in 'perdition' history. No such eye-witness account has been handed down to us either through a tradition deriving from that first man or as transmitted in the writings of the Old or New Testaments, nor has any such account been communicated to us by God as one of the parties concerned in the original event by any direct act of revelation such that it derives from no further source apart from God himself. On the contrary all protology, and so too the doctrine of original sin, is ipso facto theology, albeit a theology worked out in the writings of the New Testament (and the Old) themselves, and thereby guaranteed, so far as we are concerned, to be valid. In other words all protology comes to us as explicitated and deduced from a more original source, from a primary revelation. This more original starting-point, from which the doctrine of original sin is arrived

[3] For a better understanding of the author's personal position cf. his article, 'Original Sin', Sacramentum Mundi 4 (New York and London, 1969), pp. 328-334.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

at in a process of aetiological retrospection is man's awareness, as part of the basic Christian revelation, of the fact that he himself is a sinner who obtains forgiveness and salvation solely through Christ, Why and how a doctrine of original sin, and moreover one that is rightly understood, can be deduced from this – these are questions which cannot yet be raised at the present stage. Our first task must be to concentrate on [250] the starting-point and methods to be adopted in working out this doctrine, and to point out the formal characteristics of these.[4] This formal starting-point and these aetiological methods have this much at least to be said in their favour that de facto it is not until the New Testament, and in connection with the message of Christ, that a doctrine of original sin appears with the radical significance which the Church perceives in her understanding of it.[5] By contrast, in the Old Testament it has not properly speaking yet been evolved.[6] This heuristic principle is also to be recommended on the grounds that in fact any specific question in theology at all must enquire into the 'transcendental horizon' which it itself presupposes.[7] Thus it is only in terms of the particular 'transcendental horizon' involved here that we can understand what would otherwise be quite unintelligible, namely why original sin really applies in some sense to us ourselves, and is not reduced to the level of a mere fact of the past and one to which we can be quite indifferent. It can be stated quite in general that we understand the past and what derivation from the past means from the present and the fact that realities in the present are, of their nature, derived, and continue to be present as such. Thus we understand them by relating them as present and as experienced in this sense to their own origins in the past. It is true that the Catholic theologian cannot dispute the fact (even though this is a point that not all contemporary Catholic exegetes are still willing to admit as correct) that in Romans 5 scripture does contain a doctrine of original sin and, moreover, substantially that which (whether explicitly or implicitly) was subsequently defined by the Council of Trent.[8] But the Catholic theologian is not thereby prohibited from viewing even the [251] teaching of Romans 5 as 'theology' in the sense defined, and so interpreting this teaching itself in terms of its own origins so as to establish more precisely its exact meaning and bearing. Nor is he forbidden to hold that a doctrine of original sin can be found in Romans 5 only if the passage concerned is read in the whole context of the Pauline doctrine of justification and the Pneuma. Nor yet is he bound to read into or read out of Romans 5 everything which has already been taught with regard to original sin by a traditional, but ultimately non-binding seminary theology or exegesis. For instance even to a Catholic it is a completely open question how we should interpret Romans 5:12d.[9]

2. Methodologically speaking it should probably be stated straightway at this initial stage that what is in question here is not, in the last analysis, the actual term 'original sin', but that an additional factor is a certain established ecclesiastical terminology, as it were of a

[4] On this K. Rahner, 'Grundsätzliche Überlegungen zur Anthropologie und Protologie im Rahmen der Theologie', Mysterium Salutis II (Einsiedeln, 1967), pp. 406-420,esp. 417 ff.
[5] For a summary on this cf. S. Lyonnet, 'Péché IV', Supplément au Dictionnaire de la Bible VII (Paris, 1966), 509-565.
[6] We cannot enter specifically into the contrary positions upheld on this point by H. Haag, Biblische Schöpfungslehre und kirchliche Erbsündenlehre (Stuttgart, 1966) and J. Scharbert, Prolegomena eines Alttestamentlers zur Erbsündenlehre (Freiburg, 1968). With regard to my personal controversy with Haag on his position I may refer to the number of the Quaestiones Disputatas referred to in n. 16.
[7] On the transcendental approach in theology cf. K. Rahner, 'Theology and Anthropology', Theological Investigations IX (London and New York, 1973), pp. 28-46, and idem, 'Transcendental Theology', Sacramentum Mundi 6 (New York and London, 1970), pp. 287-289. Also in the present volume the article entitled 'Reflections on Methodology in Theology', pp. 68-114.
[8] In the Council of Trent this passage is itself officially interpreted: DS 1512 and 1514.
[9] On this cf. also S. Lyonnet, 'Le sens de ε)ϕ ω|||{ en Rom 5:12 et l'exégèse des Pères grecs', Biblica 36 (1955), pp. 436-457.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

disciplinary kind, and though this too is important and needs to be respected, it must be distinguished from the reality itself and the various ways in which it can be expressed. We have several reasons for saying this, and among them is the fact that the theology of Eastern Christianity (for this also has won an undisputed place for itself in contemporary Catholic theology, as has recently been recognized by the Second Vatican Council) for the most part avoids using the term 'sin' in this connection. But we must also bear in mind the following factors which are also vitally relevant: Even the traditional Catholic seminary theology explicitly teaches (and this is a point which has never been disputed by the teaching authority of the Church) that the terms 'sin' and 'sinfulness' as applied on the one hand to the condition which man owes to his descent from Adam, and on the other to the condition which is The outcome of his own personal decision to go against God, are used in a sense that is merely analogous.[10] This condition of man, therefore, in the first and second case must not be thought of as strictly one and the same, even though the same terms are used to describe it. For both conditions are induced in man by two different causes, exterior to the condition itself. Anyone who makes the opposite assumption, following an implication which might be drawn from the Church's teaching, and then disputes the existence of original sin, has not [252] properly speaking thereby denied any dogmatic teaching of the Church. It would even be possible to imagine a situation (corresponding to an analogous instance which actually is de facto to be found in the linguistic usage of the Church) in which the Church actually forbade us to call the condition which we derive from Adam original sin, without thereby altering her own dogma. The reason for this is that all along there has been a danger of misinterpreting this word so as to suggest that it is through Adam and our descent from him that we have in the strict sense been constituted as sinners, whereas we are such and become such as a result of our own personal and inalienable decision, unique in each particular instance, to go against God.[11]

3. In presenting our interpretation of the doctrine of original sin we shall exclude the question of monogenism and polygenism,[12] i.e. we are of opinion that on a more exact interpretation of the Church's dogmatic teaching on original sin we do not have to hold that the theory of monogenism is contained in it either as a necessary premiss or as a direct doctrine. It is true that Pius XII declared in 'Humani Generis' that Catholic theologians were not free to uphold the theory of polygenism.[13] But in the first case even he did not declare that monogenism had either explicitly or implicitly the force of dogma, and secondly we may surely say that the development of Catholic theology since 'Humani Generis' has made such advances (advances that have been tolerated by the Church's magisterium) that the opinion that polygenism is not irreconcilable with the doctrine of original sin is no longer exposed to the danger of being censured by the authorities of the Church.[14]

When therefore we use the term 'Adam' in the course of the following arguments we mean humanity in that form in which it existed at the beginning of its own history, and from which all subsequent humanity originated, from which we are all descended. In saying this, however, we are abstracting from the question of whether this humanity in its original form consists in a single couple from the numerical point of view, or in a [253] 'population' more

[10] cf. Patres Societatis Jesu Facultatum Theologicarum in Hispania Professores, Sacrae Theologiae Summa II (Madrid, 3rd ed. 1958), pp. 833 and 939-949 'Ergo ratio peccati est analogica, non univoca, cum diversa ratio voluntarietatis sit peccato personali ac originali' (ibid, p. 949).
[11] An interpretation of the doctrine of original sin from this point of view is to be found, for instance, in K. H. Schelkle, 'Schuld als Erbteil?' (Einsiedeln, 1969).
[12] A summarizing presentation of the problems entailed here is provided in the article 'Monogenism', Sacramentum Mundi 4 (London and New York, 1969), pp. 105-107.
[13] On this cf. the detailed interpretation in K. Rahner, 'Theological Reflexions on Monogenism', Theological Investigations I (London and Baltimore, 1961), pp. 229-296.
[14] cf. K. Rahner, 'Evolution and Original Sin', Concilium 3 (1967), 6/13 (Church and World), pp. 30-35.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

widely extended in terms of space and time which emerged from the animal kingdom and in which the historical origins of the human race as a single entity are to be located. For the fact that we are leaving this particular question open certainly does not imply any belief that the doctrine of original sin is to be explained away in 'existentialist' terms in a doctrine which merely expresses something about every man, 'man as such', the Adam which we all are, without implying any further statement with regard to the fact that he has descended through a unique history from an origin that is genuine, concrete, and real.

4. In order to be able adequately to meet the claims that are made upon it a doctrine of original sin today should develop a formal philosophy and formal theology of the beginning,[15] because only on the basis of this can we achieve any understanding of the necessity, meaning and methods of that retrospective aetiology of which we have already spoken. Of course it is not possible to develop these here. But even so we may attempt a few indications of how it might be done as some poor substitute for this.

Man is a historical being, and it is a necessary law of his nature that he is conscious of himself as being such. Hence protology and eschatology, a statement of the fact that he has derived from the past and is orientated towards the future, necessarily belong to that understanding of himself in which he conceives of himself as given over to himself in the here and now and committed to himself in a present that belongs to him. Inasmuch as he is that being that can only exist in a state of co-existence with other men any such protology must, so far as he is concerned, always and necessarily be the protology of the beginning of humanity, and this because and to the extent that precisely this kind of beginning does not simply consist in what belongs to the past, and so at most still survives in historical records, but is rather that power which extends into his own present, controlling it and shaping it as the law governing his own emergence on the plane of existence. A further point entailed in the relationship between past and future as the powers presiding over the present is that it is in the light of the future that the past is revealed. The emergence of the future constitutes the growing revelation of the origins, even though this future is never simply the mere temporal explicitation of the past. The beginning also presides over the present in the further sense that it is that which has been withdrawn from it. For invariably we encounter ourselves as those who have already come to a free decision, and we never encounter ourselves at that original starting-point which there must once have been [254] (if in fact it is right to make freedom responsible for itself) and which invariably we only have in that form, or lack of form, which it has acquired as a result of our freedom itself, though in this the two factors involved, that which belongs to the origins and that which we ourselves have done, can never be distinguished with complete clarity in any given case. This applies to the individual and to every community which has come to exist as a historical entity through the exercise of freedom. The beginning which has been withdrawn from our control (we might even call it the Urgeschichte) is constituted as now in force in virtue of that original stage which is prior to our own freedom and hidden from us, and at the same time in virtue of the event in which freedom was first exercised, which per definitionem is different in kind from the freedom which we can exercise now. For this latter kind of freedom is always exercised throughout in a situation which creaturely freedom, whether our own or another's, has already helped to shape, a situation which has rendered that which belongs to the origins withdrawn from us, so that we can no longer draw upon its nature to illumine our own acts, but are compelled, rather, to seek it in the future, pursuing protology in eschatology.

For our present modest purposes, however, the chief point in this formal theology of the beginnings is this: for an anthropology that is existential-ontological in character, and [15] A more detailed analysis of this matter is to be found in A. Darlap, 'Anfang und Ende', Sacramentum Mundi I (Freiburg, 1967), pp. 138-145.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

especially one that is theological, 'beginning' is from the outset not the first moment in a whole series of moments following one upon another, but rather the basis, of its very nature unique, on which the whole of history rests, a basis which, in virtue of the fact that it has been posited by God himself, and of the uniqueness of the free act which educed it from sheer ultimacy, is itself sui generis.

To anyone who does not recognize all this the doctrine of original sin must either appear as sheer mythology or else a rationalistic view of it will be taken in which, as peccatum originale originans, it will be assigned to the same level as, and regarded as the first in a whole series of, sinful acts of basically the same kind, each one of which, and so the first as well, has, as we recognize from our everyday experience, further consequences in that it leads on to other and later sinful acts. In truth, however, what we call original sin (considered as the sin 'of Adam') belongs to the initial constitution of that ultimate beginning which is withdrawn from us and never recurs, and the true nature of which is only gradually revealed in the light of the future which is Christ.

[255]

II

The Nature of Original Sin

In the light of the principles we have just mentioned, therefore, we shall attempt to provide a statement of the Catholic dogma of original sin.[16] It is claimed that in this statement this dogma will suffer no diminution, even though in the course of making it theological ideas will be used which perhaps are not universally accepted.[17] For it is inevitable that there should be some such, and it could be demonstrated that the same is true of every theological statement of the doctrine of original sin.

1. We shall be speaking, then, of that self-bestowal of God (who is of his nature holy) upon man in grace which ipso facto sanctifies him prior to any moral decision on man's own part, i.e. which sets him in the ambience of God in his holiness. Now this self-bestowal of God upon men (whether as offered or as accepted) is given by God to the whole of humanity (and to the individual man as a member of this) only in virtue of the fact that this humanity as a historical and derived reality (through 'generation', as the ancient formulations express it) draws its existence from Christ and is orientated to him. But this bestowal is not given to the individual man in virtue of the fact that he derives physically and historically from this human race, and in virtue of this derivation of his is a member of it. For the individual man his derivation from, and thereby his union with the single human race is neither the basis nor, in any direct sense, the medium of his justification and sanctification by the self-bestowal of the holy God in his Pneuma. We must repeat the terms we have used here: 'Basis and medium.' A distinction has to be drawn between these two concepts because on a 'Scotist' conception of the relationship between supralapsarian and infralapsarian grace the will of God towards Christ was the basis for the sanctifying will of God towards mankind even prior to sin being committed. Now on this assumption the derivation of man from the single human race, insofar as it enters into the question at all of how grace is conferred on the individual man, enters into it at most as 'mediating' to him that grace which was 'Christian' all along, and so from the outset cannot constitute the basis for this grace. And [256] precisely for this reason too derivation and descent must properly and explicitly be excluded as a medium. This

[16] On what follows cf. also K. H. Weger, Theologie der Erbsünde = Quaestiones Disputatae 44 (Freiburg, 1970), together with the excursus, 'Erbsünde und Monogenismus'.
[17] On the teaching of the Church herself cf. also P. Schoonenberg, 'Der Mensch in der Sünde', Mysterium Salutis II (Einsiedeln, 1967), esp. pp. 916-927.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

derivation and descent do not enter into the question as the 'sacrament', the sign and the medium for grace.

2. But against this, according to the will of God and the intrinsic specification imparted to the human race by this in itself, the descent of the individual man from the single human race and its divinely ordained beginning had to be if not the basis, then at least the direct medium, in which that justifying holiness of man was communicated to him which is prior to his own personal existence, and therefore has the force of an existential modality. This is because this holiness was intended as a gift to, and claim upon, humanity as a whole by the Creator of mankind, who graciously willed to 'raise' it. This creation in view of grace, in which God created the spiritual order of nature, causing it to exist both in many individuals and in a single race as a prior condition for his divine self-bestowal, may have been conceived of by God (in the Scotist sense) all along from the very beginning in view of Christ as the supreme point in history and the point of eschatological irreversibility of this world as endowed with divine grace, and if this interpretation is correct, then even the supralapsarian grace of the 'original state' was a grace of Christ. But even supposing this to be the case, and indeed precisely on this view, descent from and union with the human race in this sense (as that which provides the origins of the individual) was capable of being, and should have been the medium in which this sanctifying grace was communicated to the individual man. Now it is not this if it remained merely at the level of a remote prior condition for this endowment with grace, though of course it would still always have been this also. To say that this descent and derivation are not the medium ('sacrament') in this sense is contrary to the original will of the Creator in his act of bestowing grace. The absence of that holiness which is an existential modality imparted by God's own holiness prior to the concrete conditions of individual existence, inasmuch as this was intended to be mediated through human descent but in fact is not so – this is rightly called a state of sinfulness, and it is this that is meant by original sin (peccatum originale originatum). On the basis of this principle the definitions of original sin given in the Council of Trent can be developed, although they do not have to be presented in the same way here. Likewise we shall not here be treating in any explicit way of what is traditionally expressed under the heading of concupiscence in the doctrine of original sin. This too should be accounted a legitimate approach because according to the Tridentine doctrine of [257] original sin concupiscence as such should not be viewed simply as that which gives original sin its proper nature as a state of sinfulness in the true sense.

3. In itself, then, the factor of human descent should have the function of providing the medium for this 'holiness' to be imparted to man. Now its failure to do this is only conceivable as the outcome of the guilt of those men who existed at the beginning of the human race and provided the origins of the rest. In this connection it makes no difference whether humanity itself is conceived of in terms of monogenism or polygenism, provided only that it is recognized as a real unity, something which is possible in any case and independently of the question of polygenism. At all events: the only possible reason for the non-existence of something which, according to God's will, should exist can be personal guilt. But since the guilty act at the moral and personal level is not that of the descendants themselves, and since obviously a personal act of this kind can neither be 'inherited by' others or 'accounted to' them, it follows that this guilt which constitutes the non-existence of that which, as we have said, should exist, is the guilt of that part of humanity from which the rest originated. This also serves to show in radical form the merely analogous character of original sin by comparison with an act of personal guilt and the state of guilt ensuing from this. This too is a point which cannot be expounded here at any length. That state of analogous guilt which is called original sin is not a projection of the personal state of guilt 'of Adam' to us, but is constituted by the absence of the holy Pneuma which, prior to any moral decision, sanctifies man interiorly when it is present, or would sanctify him if it were so, but

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the absence of which correspondingly, prior to any personal decision, constitutes an analogous state of guilt, seeing that this deficiency consists not merely in the fact that the holy Pneuma is not present, but implies a deficiency which is the opposite of the situation which ought to exist.

A few explanatory observations must be added on this point:

(a) It is necessary to postulate personal guilt at the beginning as such of the 'Urgeschichte' in the theological sense, but in accordance with the manner in which, as we have seen, this beginning is radically withdrawn from us. Unless we postulate this we cannot conceive of a situation which ought not to be the case, a state which is contrary to the will of the Creator. But if original sin is not to be explained away in a rationalizing sense as consisting in the sum total of the personal sins committed by men in the course of history, if, in other words there is a state of sinfulness such that it is prior to the personal decision of any given individual, and such that [258] the fact that it ought not to exist cannot simply be referred back to God (as though the very constitution of finite man as different from God were eo ipso and of itself to be identified with the constitution of the sinner as such by God himself), then this state of affairs which ought not to exist must be constituted by creaturely guilt at the 'beginning'.

(b) This personal guilt at the beginning of human history, regardless of how we may conceive of its subject in more precise terms, does not, however, constitute the state of guilt arising from original sin as though this were the extension and prolongation of the personal state of guilt inherent in the peccatum originale originans as subject. The effect of it, rather, is simply that the human descendants of this subject do not possess the state of sanctification by God's self-bestowal in Christ precisely as descendants.

(c) The deficiency which inhibits a state which 'ought to exist' inhibits sanctifying grace. It does this inasmuch as the state which ought to be, and to which this deficiency is opposed, is not that which, in accordance with the moral demands of God, should be brought about by the individual as such in his own capacity for free decision, and as a matter of personal duty. Rather this state which ought to be, and to which the deficiency of which we are speaking is opposed, is that which is constituted by the will of the Creator as such in his will to endow humanity with grace.

It is what has been expressed under the heading (b) and (c) that constitutes the merely analogous character of original sin as opposed to a personal state of guilt which is identical with the personal act, and which is directly opposed to the moral demands which God makes upon the free individual as such. The other differences entailed in the merely analogous connection between original sin and personal sin derive from these two basic factors.

(d) It follows from what has been said that the concept of original sin has nothing to do with that of a 'collective guilt'. For what is posited in the term 'collective guilt', to the extent that it is not simply the final sum total of the personal guilt of many individuals, is that the personal guilt of a particular individual or individuals is as such transmitted to others. Now whether or not such an idea is conceivable at all, it has in any case nothing to do with the idea of original sin.

(e) A further point which must not be overlooked is the following: In the concrete order of salvation in Christ (whether we interpret this in an infralapsarian or a Scotist and supralapsarian sense) 'original sin' is always to be understood as a dialectical element in counterpoint to that effective [259] will of God to save men which, on account of Christ, always imparts that sanctification through Christ (at least as 'offered') which was not imparted through descent from 'Adam'. Original sin and grace, therefore, to the extent that both these realities are prior to the personal decision of man, do not, properly speaking, follow one upon another in a temporal succession, but rather both together imply a single dialectical 'situation'[18] of man (as a being endowed with freedom) to the extent that a specification is imparted to him both by the 'beginning' (that which provides the origins of mankind) and by Christ as the 'end' and 'goal'. Thereby he is placed in a situation in which he has to decide in the concrete conditions of his personal existence which of two factors he will take as the freely chosen basis for his actions: either the factor of his descent from the beginnings of humanity, or his orientation towards the future in Christ (the first of these is that state of sin spoken of in Romans 5:12d, while the second is the faith which justifies).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

(f) If original sin is to be interpreted and understood in the sense explained here – in other words as a datum of New Testament theology, and not merely as revelation in its most basic form (for in this form it is to be found in Romans 5 alone, if at all) – there is one point that must be recognized. This is that descent from 'Adam' was in itself intended according to the will of God as Creator to be the 'medium' of grace. Now if we are asked how we know this, then we must point to two factors:

i. It is the solidarity of mankind in salvation and saving history (which is to be conceived of as all-embracing, and which after all is a motif that runs through the whole of scripture) that constitutes the basic assumption underlying the doctrine of the universality of salvation as one and the same for all, the doctrine of the redemption of all through Christ, of the Body of Christ, the Church, and of the radical importance of love of neighbour, which is something more than the fulfilment of any one particular commandment. For after all solidarity in salvation and saving history surely implies in itself that man is intended to receive salvation in virtue of the fact that he is a member of this human race.

ii. In scripture the fact that Christ is the originator of salvation is always viewed in its application to man precisely as a sinner, and not merely to man as one to whom the grace of God as imparting a share in the divine nature is not due. Moreover, while this sinfulness is conceived of [260] primarily as personal, still its universality is surely not to be conceived of as absolutely radical and ultimate unless we recognize a certain sinfulness which is prior to the personal decision of the individual as such, so that in this personal decision this prior state of sinfulness is made manifest by a process of ratification. Unless we assumed the existence of a sinfulness of this kind we would have to concede that each individual man in the history of individual freedom takes as his starting-point a situation which, after all, is, from the point of view of salvation, precisely neutral, and then we would no longer be able to conceive in any effective or real sense of how the universality of personal sinfulness comes to exist. Nor can it be said that this answer merely transfers the problem from the many individuals to the individual or individuals at the beginning of humanity. For what we are concerned with here is not to maintain that the sinful decision taken at the personal level at the beginning is as such extended to all others and so constitutes a universality of pre-personal sinfulness. This pre-personal and dialectically universal sinfulness is constituted only by the following facts and in the following way:

By reason of the sin which took place in the Urgeschichte at the beginning mankind as such is incapable of acting as the mediator of grace, and it is precisely in this way that a universal sinfulness comes to exist which is sui generis in character. The personal sin at the beginning creates a situation for all which should not exist, and it is as arising from, and concomitant with this situation that that reality is simply given which we call original sin, taking this term in its correct sense.

(g) From what has been said it will surely also be clear that the doctrine of original sin is ultimately contained as a simple implication in the truth that all of us as sinners have been

[18] This concept is also used by P. Schoonenberg. cf. ibid, pp. 928 ff., and idem, Theologie der Sünde (Einsiedeln, 1966).

Admittedly a question which should be raised in this connection is how the existentiality of such a situation is to be established metaphysically.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

redeemed by Christ, and must be redeemed by him. But this redemption consists not merely in some kind of liberation from guilt, but in that justifying sanctification in which God imparts his own holiness in his holy Pneuma, and that in this whole saving event the individual is always involved in virtue of the fact that he is also a member of the human race as one, a unity which Christ both presupposes and constitutes at the same time.

4. Finally we must speak explicitly once more of the 'sin of Adam', in other words of peccatum originale originans as distinct from original sin, peccatum originale originatum, which is a specification that applies to us. Thus by way of résumé we can state the following:

(a) That beginning of the single human race which is withdrawn from our view and control is characterized by the fact that in it a state of original freedom existed, i.e. one such that the situation in which it existed was [261] still unspecified by any decision of human freedom (whether that of the individual himself, or that of others).

Logically speaking, this statement is self-explanatory, and moreover it does not contradict the empirical ideas which we have evolved today of 'early' man, because this situation of freedom exists independently and is capable of realization regardless of which particular category of material in this world was available to this freedom as the medium in which it could be exercised, and how far this original freedom was, or could be, consciously reflected upon, and inherent in a subject capable of reflecting upon himself.

(b) The subject of such a free decision at the beginning can freely be conceived of as a 'group'. For even a humanity conceived of as polygenist in origin constitutes a real unity, however varied the aspects which it displays, and as a humanity of the 'beginnings' is distinguished from a 'humanitas originata' by the ultimacy and originality of its freedom.

(c) The decision of this group is conceivable as a decision which all the members of this group take as individuals, since in fact, after all, these would be relatively few in number. In the light of the interpretation of the role of decision at the beginning in the factor of peccatum originale, however, it is also perfectly possible that this decision is that of one individual, assuming here that according to God's will the humanitas originans was intended to mediate grace only if it had continued as a whole and wholly sinless through its decision. An interpretation more or less on the following lines is perfectly conceivable: If on the one hand man is inevitably personal and communicative at the same time, and both aspects mutually condition one another, and if further the humanitas originans on any showing constitutes a unity, and as such is to be distinguished from the humanitas originata, and if by its initial free personal decisions it specifies the existential situation of the humanitas originata in manifold ways, then it is perfectly conceivable that the decision of one individual within this unity (and one who thereby plays his part in specifying this humanitas originans) can actually fulfil the function of this humanitas originans as mediating grace.

(d) Since the 'polygenist' view of the origins of mankind has to be adopted, at any rate to the extent that at least two of its members are not derived from a single human nature, it surely has no theological relevance, but rather belongs to the realm of imagery and modes of expression, when scripture (in general) regards 'Adam', as opposed to 'Eve', as the bearer of peccatum originale originans. Again the Adam-Christ parallel does not compel us to take the opposite view, since the parallelism (one-all) also [262] remains in force if the humanitas originans is interpreted as one and seen as distinct from the humanitas originata.

(e)This historical derivation of our state of sin, and the difference between 'imitatio' and 'propagatio' in the Catholic doctrine of original sin, must be maintained. This is possible, since humanity has a history. The individual understands himself only when he apprehends himself as deriving from a real history. The decision of the individual constantly plays its part in specifying, in the most varied ways, the situation of freedom which applies to all others. Man as such (the state of being man, humanity in process of achieving itself) first begins at the point at which freedom is exercised. Humanity is also one in its saving history. If we consider these simple principles, which contain no mythological implications, then the statement that humanity, or real membership of it, does not imply any mediation of divine grace to an individual member of this humanity because at the beginnings, and from the beginnings onwards it was a sinful humanity, is not mythological either. This statement, however, properly speaking contains everything which is stated in the doctrine of original sin, and hence too the doctrine of original sin is no mythologem. Such a mythologem would be present if this doctrine were to imply that the subjective and personal guilt of one or a few individuals as such were projected onto their descendants. But this is far from being the content of the dogma of original sin. This implies the existence of a real guilt at the beginnings, but only as the basis for a primitive deficiency of the sanctifying grace of God, and that, moreover, only to the extent that humanity is descended from this beginning. The existence of a real sin at the beginning, however, is no myth, however important it is for us not to portray this sin to ourselves as a concrete phenomenon. If it were a myth, then ultimately and logically speaking, the same would absolutely have to be asserted of the history of human freedom. This is a reality which we experience.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

5. It must be conceded that the classic doctrine of original sin contains many further aspects besides those which have been discussed here, above all the question of the existence and loss of the so-called preternatural gifts of the original state, of freedom from concupiscence and from being delivered up to death. But this is a question which cannot be taken as a subject for theological consideration any further here.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[263]

12

ON THE ENCYCLICAL 'HUMANAE VITAE'

On the twenty-fifth of July 1968 Paul VI published his long-awaited encyclical, 'Humanae Vitae' on the right principles governing the procreation of new life.[1] This encyclical had been announced years before. It had been prepared for, in a manner which had not previously been usual, by the work of a commission, and its publication had been repeatedly postponed. In spite of this it provoked the greatest surprise among Catholics and in the non-Catholic world. Side by side with the measure of agreement which it received, and which certainly must not be under-estimated, it also met with worldwide contradiction. Now certainly this is partly to be explained by the simple fact that the supreme authority of a Church comprising millions of believers had pronounced on a question affecting the personal lives of countless individuals. Apart from this the subject-matter of this question is 'of interest' to many more than merely the Catholic believers. But this alone is not sufficient to explain the opposition which it provoked. This is to some extent understandable when one considers that on the question treated of in the encyclical married Catholics had already arrived at a definite opinion (regardless of which this was), and had applied this in the practice of their lives. Furthermore, among moral theologians too, at least for some considerable time, there had no longer been any unanimity of opinion on this question, and it was becoming ever clearer that the practical importance of the question itself had grown immeasurably as a result of the 'population explosion'. This opposition, especially as found even in the Catholic Church herself, is a fact, and it is with this fact that we shall chiefly be concerned in the considerations which follow.

[264]

I. Preliminary Observations

Before we go on to treat more directly of the problem itself certain preliminary observations have to be made which are necessary for a right understanding of what follows.

A Catholic must take this encyclical seriously. Certainly we shall have to state more precisely and to define what this in fact implies in the present context. But the encyclical itself must be taken seriously. It is the pronouncement of a pope. It is certainly the outcome of mature thought and preparation. In the Catholic Church it has a notable doctrinal tradition behind it. Under these circumstances it is meaningless and contrary to the seriousness with which the question should be taken, and the respect due to the authority of the pope, if our reactions to the encyclical simply take the form of short-sighted emotionalism; if all we can do is to produce crude and distorted summaries of its contents, and to ascribe to the pope motives which are designed to render his pronouncements unworthy of belief from the outset. Anyone who from the outset maintains his own opinion as indisputable without any self-criticism, anyone who believes that a more recent idea is a priori and certainly more correct than an earlier one, anyone who simply argues on the basis of the undesirable practical consequences of the papal pronouncement, is thinking pragmatically and so even from his initial standpoint evading the question of truth. And anyone who does this cannot, as a Catholic, do justice to the encyclical.

Now what we shall be treating of in these considerations of ours is not that which constitutes the heart and centre of the papal encyclical. In other words we shall not be

[1] AAS 60 (1968), pp. 481-518.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

investigating the question of whether and why objectively speaking it is immoral, or alternatively need not necessarily be so, for a man deliberately, and as his own free personal act, to exclude the possibility of new life coming to be as a result of an individual married act. Here let us simply confine ourselves to noticing in this connection that on any sound view of the basic principles involved it is a crude simplification of the papal teaching to represent it as an absolute prohibition, even at the theoretical level, of any deliberate control of the birthrate, whereas in reality what the encyclical is concerned with is to reject certain specific methods of such birth control. In this connection, however, it must be admitted that for the normal and average reader of the encyclical it is even so not clear how the control of the birthrate which is conceded to be necessary can de facto effectively be achieved in the concrete conditions which prevail at the social and individual levels without applying the very methods which have been rejected.

[265] Here, therefore, we shall not be treating directly either of the material problem in itself or of the question of truth which it involves, even though these constitute the heart and centre of the encyclical. It would be impossible to carry out such an undertaking within the limits of a single brief article. In any case we would have to treat of the basic assumptions underlying the papal position: the nature of the natural law, its 'immutability' and historical development, the competence of the teaching authority of the Church in relation to this natural law, the relationship between the natural law and revelation, what constitutes the essence of 'human nature', how we can recognize this, the relationship which the person as a free agent bears to the reality which is already there for him to act upon (the reality called 'nature'), man's capacities in relation to that 'nature' which he himself has, his powers to shape and direct himself and how far he is subject in this to certain moral restrictions. All these prior factors, which have had an influence on the papal decision, are so difficult, and matters of such widespread controversy among contemporary Catholic theologians, and, moreover, even in the encyclical itself so fleetingly indicated, that it is impossible, within the limits of a brief article, to treat of these factors which are the premisses of the papal thesis even though in themselves they do need to be discussed. The same applies to the meaning to be attached to the papal position itself, and the justification for this. For from this point of view we should have to treat of the question of whether, and on what grounds, any given individual married act in the concrete, even taken in itself as individual, and independently of married life as a whole, is subject to an unequivocal moral judgement. It must be remembered that the individual married act has a twofold importance: it is conducive to married love and at the same time it is an act from which new life may possibly be generated. In view of this we would have to treat of the question of why every single married act must be such that it has both these significances together. A further point which we should have to discuss relates to the fact that 'nature' itself allows us to take these two aspects apart from one another and to take either one of them as our motive for the act. Moreover even according to the encyclical itself this is a state of affairs which can deliberately be taken advantage of in regulating births. The point which we should have to discuss in this connection, therefore, would be why man himself under certain specific provisos, cannot separate the two aspects in the married act in any individual exercise of it, so long as this continues to be accorded its proper place within the totality of a married life which remains in principle willing to propagate new life. This question becomes still more acute when we [266] consider that after all the power freely to shape and direct himself inherent in man himself, and distinguishing him from animals, is itself in turn an intrinsic part of 'human nature', so that there can be no question of this power of self-manipulation through his own 'nature' being in principle conceded to man as a matter of morality. The only question can be, rather, whether in this specific instance the moral boundaries governing such self-manipulation are or are not overstepped. In all respects we shall surely have to say that on these questions a specific

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

position has indeed been adopted, but this is merely stated rather than explained or proved in any effective sense. It becomes clear in the encyclical itself that the real and primary reason for adhering to this position is the need that is felt to hold firm to the traditional teaching of Pius XI and Pius XII. This fact certainly carries a not inconsiderable theological weight, the more so since in individual moral questions a certain global 'instinct' can be right even when it is incapable of being explicitated to the utmost at the level of rational theory and speculation. Yet in view of the fact that according to the encyclical itself what is in question here is not simply a divine revelation of a moral norm, but rather a principle of the 'natural law', it would have been desirable for the material grounds for holding the papal thesis to have been justified by more precise arguments. But, as has been said, these are all questions which cannot be treated of here.

While therefore we are setting aside that which constitutes the true essence of the question here, still in doing so we must not overlook or treat as of no importance that which is held among Catholics as a matter of common conviction even though not all of them will give their interior agreement to the papal position or apply it in practice in their lives. After all the encyclical does give expression to a conviction that is held in common by all Catholics (though by comparison with the basic outlooks and practices of non-Christians it is far from being simply a self-evident truism!), namely that sexual life is subject to moral laws which themselves derive from the very nature of the realities involved, and which are designed to ensure that human happiness can be achieved in sexual life, the conviction, moreover, that under certain circumstances it is necessary both for the individual and for society to control the birthrate. Again this is something that is also subject to moral laws stemming from the very nature of marriage itself. And a further conviction held by all Catholics and expressed in the encyclical is that hedonism and moral libertinism in sexual matters lead not to a liberation of man from oppressive taboos but ultimately to a de-humanization and to unhappiness. If we want to arrive at a correct evaluation of the encyclical, this general Christian conviction [267] must be clearly recognized. And there are really no apparent grounds for supposing that in the present age it is superfluous to speak of this universally held Christian position or to uphold it in public in the secular sphere even though in doing so we must guard against the danger of unduly blackening the outlook of secular society today in the sphere of sexual morality. A further point is that the encyclical rightly recognizes the dangers that would be entailed if the state were allowed to act in a totalitarian way by claiming exclusive rights over the practice of birth control. Here there are dangers which must really be taken seriously even though we may hold the opinion that the state cannot simply and in every respect leave it to the individual as such to cope with the problem of the population explosion, and even though in this connection the encyclical remains too much at the level of the general, the abstract, and the imprecise. What we shall be concerned with in these considerations of ours, therefore, is the simple fact that even within the Catholic Church herself the encyclical has not met with any unanimous agreement either in theory or in practice. And surely the fact that this is so – regardless of whether we regard it as normal or as extremely regrettable – is beyond all question. The very way in which the Church's members have reacted to the encyclical up to now is in itself enough to demonstrate this point, and in this connection it makes no difference, ultimately speaking, whether this reaction is the same in all countries, or which individuals, groups and official bodies in the Church have been responsible for it. This fact in itself and as such constitutes a theological problem, and moreover this is particularly true in view of the fact that in this case the reaction in the form of opposition is far greater, far swifter, far more decided and far more vocal in the public life of the Church than has been the case on earlier occasions of doctrinal pronouncements by the popes. What then is to be said at the theological level with regard to this opposition which the encyclical is meeting with and will continue to meet with in the manner we have described? This is the sole question with which we shall be concerned here.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

II. The Encyclical as a Reformable Statement of Doctrine

This encyclical is not a papal definition ('ex cathedra') of the moral norms which the Pope lays down with regard to the 'inadmissibility' of any 'artificial' prevention of the possibility of procreation in the individual married act. In itself and as it stands this is a truism. Its real significance and implications may initially be pointed out by means of an extensive [268] quotation from the Doctrinal Letter published by the German bishops in 1967, which will then be explained in greater detail.[2]

'We are here concerned with the presence or possibility of errors in those statements of doctrine which, though promulgated by the Church, do not have the force of definitions, and which themselves in turn can vary very greatly in their degree of binding force. On this question we must begin by recognizing soberly and firmly that it is a rule of human life quite in general that it must always be lived (as conscientiously as possible) in accordance with tenets which, while on the one hand they are not recognized as absolutely certain at the theoretical level, must nevertheless be respected as valid norms for thinking and acting (here and now), because provisionally at least they are the best that can be found. Every individual is aware of this from the experience of his own life in the concrete. Every doctor in his diagnoses, every statesman in the judgements he has to make from his particular situation in politics, and in the [269] decisions which have to be taken on the basis of these judgements, is aware of this fact. The Church too, in her doctrine and practice, cannot always or in every case allow herself to be confronted with the dilemma either of arriving at a doctrinal decision of an ultimately binding nature, or simply remaining silent and leaving everything to the individual, allowing him to hold any opinion he likes. In order to guard the true and ultimate substance of the faith she must, even at the risk of including some error of detail, provide explicit directions in matters of doctrine such that these have a definite degree of binding force even though, if they do not constitute any definition of the faith, they do have a certain provisional character even to the point of possibly including some error. Otherwise she

[2] The study which follows was written immediately after the Encyclical had appeared. Since in the meantime a very intense discussion has been initiated on this subject further reference may here be made to the following works, even though, in the nature of the case, it is impossible at this point to provide any full account of our position in relation to them. cf. F. E. v. Gagern, Geburtenregelung und Gewissensentscheid. Die bekanntgewordenen Dokumente des päpstlichen Ehekommission (Munich, 1967); F. Greiner, 'Nach "Humanae vitae"', Hochland 60 (1967/68), pp. 681-686; F. Boekle and C. Holenstein (edd.). Die Enzyklika in der Diskussion (Zürich, 1968); B. Häring, Krise um 'Humanea Vitae' (Bergen-Enkheim, 1968); D. v. Hildebrand, Die Enzyklika 'Humanea vitae' – ein Zeichen des Widerspruchs (Regensburg, 1968); G. Martelet, 'Pour mieux comprendre l'encyclique "Humanae vitae"', NRT 90 (1968), pp. 897-917, 1009-1063 (On this cf. A. Winter, 'Neues Licht ad "Humanae vitae"?', StdZ 183 (1969), pp. 206-210): Humanae vitae oder die Freiheit des Gewissens edited by members of the 'Humanea vitae' action group of Bochum University of the Ruhr (Olten, 1968); K. Rahner, 'Im Beichtstuhl nach der Pille fragen? Spiegelgespräch über die Enzyklika zur Geburtenregelung', Der Spiegel 22 (1968), No. 39 (23.9.1968), pp. 166-176; K. Rahner, Cardinal Renard, B. Haering, A propos de l'encyclique 'Humanize vitae' (Paris, 1968); F. Oertel ed., Erstes Echo auf 'Humanae vitae'. Dokumentation wichtiger Stellungnahmen zur umstrittenen Enzyklika über die Geburtenkontrolle (Essen, 1968); 'Schreiben der deutschen Bischöfe zu "Humanae vitae" ', Herder Korrespondenz 22 (1968), pp. 484-487; 'Stellungnahmen zur Enzyklika "Humanae vitae" vom 25. Juli 1968', Diakonia 3 (1968), pp. 300-312; W. Wickler, 'Das Missverständnis der Natur des ehelichen Aktes in der Moraltheologie', Stimmen der Zeit 182 (1968), pp. 289-303; A. Antweiler, Ehe und Geburtenregelung (Munich, 1969); A. Auer, 'Nach dem Erscheinen der Enzyklika "Humanae vitae" ', TQ 149 (1969), pp. 75-85; F. Boeckle, Freiheit und Bindung (Kevelaer, 1969); A. Günthor, Kommentar zur Enzyklika 'Humanae vitae' (Freiburg, 1969); E. Hamel, 'Conferentiae episcopales et encyclica "Humanae vitae"', Periodica 58 (1969), pp. 243-349; J. Noonan, Empfängnisverhütung (Mainz, 1969).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

cannot possibly proclaim her faith, interpret it, or apply it to the fresh situation which arises in the individual's life in such a way that it shall be an effective force in determining the course of life to be pursued. In such a case the position in which the individual Christian stands in relation to the Church is first and foremost an analogous one in the sense that as an individual he recognizes that he is bound to accept the decision of the specialist even though he knows that this is not infallible.

'In any case there can be no place in catechetics for an opinion opposed to the provisional pronouncements of the Church in matters of doctrine, even though it is right, under certain circumstances, to instruct the faithful as to the nature of and the limited degree of weight to be attached to provisional doctrinal decisions of this kind. This is a point on which we have already spoken. Anyone who believes that he can retain his own private opinion, and that he is already even now in possession of that better insight which the Church will achieve in the future must take stock of himself in an attitude of sober self-criticism, and ask himself before God and his own conscience whether he has the necessary breadth and depths of specialized theological knowledge to be able to deviate from the current teaching of the official Church in his private theory and practice. Such a case is in principle conceivable. But subjective presumptuousness and over-hasty opinionatedness will have to answer before the judgement of God.

'It pertains to the right attitude of a Catholic towards his faith seriously to strive to attach its due and positive value even to a provisional doctrinal pronouncement of the Church, and to make it his own. The position here is similar to that in the secular sphere, for here too far-reaching decisions have to be taken on the basis of fallible insights arrived at as conscientiously as possible by others. So too in the sphere of the Church, [270] no-one need feel ashamed or diminished in his human dignity when he commits himself in his own mind to the Church's doctrine, even in those instances in which it cannot from the outset be accounted as definitive. It is possible that in specific instances the development of doctrine in the Church advances too slowly. But even in arriving at a judgement of this kind it is necessary to be prudent and reserved. For in a Church composed of individuals subject to the conditions of history, time is needed to achieve such developments in doctrine, since they cannot proceed more swiftly than the necessity of preserving the substance of the faith without loss allows.

'We do not need to fear that in adopting the attitude we have described towards the Church and her pronouncements we shall be refusing to meet the claims of our own times. Often enough the serious questions which are raised by our own times, and which we have to answer on the basis of our faith, make it necessary for us to re-think the truths of our faith anew. In this it is perfectly possible for fresh shifts of emphasis to be introduced. But this is not to call the faith itself in question. It contributes, rather, to a deeper apprehension of the truths of divine revelation and of the Church's doctrine. For we are firmly convinced, and we see that experience confirms us in this, that we have no need either to deny any truth for the sake of the Catholic faith, nor to deny the Catholic faith for the sake of any truth, provided only that we understand this faith in the spirit of the Church, and seek always to achieve a still deeper apprehension of it.'[3]

The first point to be made is that the papal encyclical clearly falls under the heading of the kind of doctrinal pronouncements of the Church which the bishops refer to in their doctrinal letter, namely doctrinal pronouncements which are authentic but non-definitorial in character, and so at least in principle susceptible of revision. At no point in the encyclical is any formulation to be found which could give rise to the impression that it is an ex cathedra

[3] Schreiben der deutschen Bischöfe an alle die von der Kirche mit des Glaubeneverkündigung beaufratgt sind (Treves, 2nd ed., 1968), pp. 12-14.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

definition that is being treated of. In this respect, indeed, it is possible to say that the formulations are actually more cautiously worded than, for instance, Pius XI's pronouncements in 'Casti Connubii'. Now it is clear in the very nature of the case, besides being explicitly stated as a norm in canon law, that an official statement of doctrine constitutes an ex cathedra decision only if this force is explicitly attached to it (even though this can be done in very different ways). In accordance with the [271] norms laid down in the Doctrinal Letter of the German bishops which we have cited, therefore, the following distinctions, both formal and material, can be adduced with regard to the binding force of the encyclical.

A doctrinal statement by the Pope in which no definition is presented is in principle a teaching that can be revised. Of course it cannot straightway be concluded from this that such a document has no importance for the instruction, understanding and formation of conscience of an individual Catholic. On the contrary, so long as the Catholic Christian does not radically reject the official teaching authority of the Church (and thereby ceases to be a Catholic) this document is in principle and from the outset a declaration which should cause him to maintain a critical attitude with regard to himself and his personal understanding in such a way that he must also seriously take into account the fact that a decision of this sort has been arrived at by the Church's authorities under the guidance of the Spirit and with the utmost conscientiousness. For this reason it must be considered right, even when it contradicts one's own subjective opinion, which is not in any true sense protected from error from the outset. A Catholic who has no understanding of what is signified by a 'presumption' of this kind must incur the reproach that he is in love with his own subjective opinion in a way that is childish and emotional, and that he is not bringing to bear that attitude of self-criticism which we must bring to bear with regard to our own opinions, however deeply rooted they may be, even though these appear to represent the voice of our own 'conscience'. Such a Catholic as this is so enclosed within an attitude of retarded individualism that he fails to understand the extent to which any 'ideological' convictions, or convictions affecting mankind as a whole, invariably have some connection with an 'institution'. And again he is enormously under-estimating the fact that as a Catholic a man must have grounds which are really proved and tested to the last detail, and have really been reflected upon in a spirit of self-criticism in order to be able conscientiously to disassociate himself from an official declaration of doctrine on the part of the Church. What still remains to be said over and above this with regard to the importance of taking an official declaration of doctrine positively and seriously will be set forth at a later stage.

This is one aspect of the attitude which a Catholic ought to have towards an official declaration of doctrine on the part of his Church. The other aspect, however, can be formulated as follows. A non-definitorial declaration of this kind really is in principle susceptible of revision, and the Catholic or the theologian has in principle the right, indeed the duty, to take cognizance of this fact. To say that an official declaration of doctrine [272] can in principle be revised does not of course ipso facto imply the presumption that one who recognizes this fact is convinced that the specific official doctrinal declaration involved is actually de facto false, inadequate, or in need of revision. One the contrary it is the opposite presumption and approach that is intended, but then only and precisely as a presumption which in a specific instance may later have to yield to the superior conviction, conscientiously arrived at in the theory and practice of an individual, that the opposite position to that adopted in the official teaching is correct. Whether in the particular case with which we are concerned in the concrete (even abstracting from any ultimate decision on the question of truth with regard to the papal declaration) there are de facto grounds which make it morally justifiable to disagree with this declaration – this is a point which we shall have to discuss later. First let us simply draw attention to the fact that (even if we abstract from all the 'classic' instances of papal declarations of doctrine which have subsequently been revised, such as those of Vigilius, Honorius, many statements contained in the Bull 'Exsurge Domine' of Leo X, and in several of the papal pronouncements with regard to the moral justification of usury etc.) there actually have been in very recent times papal declarations of doctrine to which the same weight has been attached as to this encyclical, yet which have not merely been susceptible of revisions 'in theory', but which have, whether tacitly or explicitly, actually been revised. We may for instance recall the doctrinal pronouncements of Gregory XVI and Pius IX with regard to a liberal and democratic social order which would certainly not be formulated in this way by any pope today. We may recall many of the pronouncements in the field of exegesis and biblical theology put forward against Modernism at the beginning of this century, and which today are almost totally out of date. From this alone it can be concluded that the Catholic has the right and the duty to take into account the fact that an official pronouncement by the Church on doctrinal matters so long as it does not imply any definition, is susceptible of revision. These examples also show, if we realize their full significance in the concrete, that to 'allow for' the possibility of such revision is not in principle only permissible once such a revision actually has taken place quite in general in the Church. For in that case such revision would never have been undertaken at all, and at the same time it cannot be assumed that in practice such revisions only come to be made in the first place as a result of the pronouncements concerned actually having been contradicted by individuals who, from the point of view of conscience, were un-Catholic in their thinking and acting.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[273] However in view of the formal authority of this Encyclical, as also with regard to the fact that it is in principle capable of being revised, something further must be said more from the point of view of its actual content. For even in respect of the basic norms expressed in it this actual content in itself is not so clear-cut in its message as might appear at first sight. And this also has its significance for the question of its formal authority. What we mean by this can only be indicated quite briefly here. For even if, in all simplicity, we assume the correctness of the norm laid down by the Pope, it is still always possible to raise the question of what, in more precise terms, this signifies. After all it is conceivable, in principle at least, that what is being formulated here is an 'ideal norm' such that it is not ipso facto clear that it can effectively be 'realized' in all its moral obligations in every situation in human life, or by every individual and every social group. For instance even at the time of the Old Testament patriarchs monogamy was a moral norm which derived in the most basic sense from the nature of man and of marriage itself. Yet in the concrete situation in terms of human living and at the stage of development of human 'nature' of that time, neither the individual nor the social group concerned was capable of putting it into practice to a sufficient extent for an obligation to monogamy actually to be imposed in the concrete circumstances prevailing at that time and in that area. Could it not be conceivable that something similar is the case with regard to the basic norm of the encyclical? It is not ipso facto against such a parallel to say that the norm in the encyclical has been explicitly formulated and promulgated in a manner which is quite different from the other case. For even in other cases too we recognize a certain 'delayed action' in the developing recognition of moral norms as this emerges among specific peoples, civilizations and human groups and comes to be apprehended as morally binding in practice. And we can still see the effects of this 'delayed action' with regard to a moral norm which was actually proclaimed during the age of Christianity. Here we have only been able to indicate the fact that the recognition of moral principles has a historical development of its own. But in the light of this it is conceivable, at least in principle, that even in the case of a moral norm that has been officially proclaimed and is 'ex hypothesi' correct, it may only be at some subsequent point within a given age or a given society taken as a whole that its content really comes effectively to be understood in such a way that it has

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the force of a moral obligation in actual concrete fact. In that case the force which such a norm carries already in the present concrete circumstances consists in the obligation to strive for that degree of apprehension on the part of the individual and the [274] society in which this norm can be recognized as binding in content as a matter of direct concrete practice. In all ages Catholic moral theology has recognized the idea of 'invincible error' as valid with regard to moral norms of a more detailed kind. It is true that it has applied this idea almost exclusively to the conscience of the individual as such. But it is perfectly conceivable, as is also apparent from the moral history of mankind, that it can also be applied to the collective moral awareness of an age or of larger social groups. From this point of view it can at least be said that it is not absurd from the outset to ask whether the moral norm of the encyclical may not perhaps have been proclaimed as an 'ideal norm' which, while it does indeed carry a direct and practical binding force already in the here and now for many individuals who differ very greatly among themselves and in the way in which their consciences have been formed, still does not carry the same immediate moral obligation for a wide range of people at the existing stage of their moral development.

This question can at least be raised as such with regard to this moral norm which has been laid down by the Pope. Indeed the moment we assume that it is materially correct it actually must be raised because on the one hand we have to be realistic enough to allow for a large measure of rejection of this norm even within the Church, while on the other there are many cases in which it is rejected in practice, and in which even so this practical refusal to observe it should not be qualified as subjectively speaking grave sin. Thus in fact the theological question does arise of what is implied by a discrepancy of this kind between an officially proclaimed norm on the one hand, and the 'ex supposito' largely inculpable failure to accept it on the other. This is a question that really does impose itself. And precisely on the assumption that the papal norm is objectively correct, the solution to it can, after all, surely be found only in the direction we have just indicated. But in that case this has a further significance also for the question of the formal binding force of this norm. On our hypothesis this would be, in a certain sense, that degree of binding force to be attached to a norm which defines a goal to be aimed at in the moral development of the Church and of society, but which, in the actual circumstances prevailing, is far from having yet been attained to, even though it is intended to be attained to. The case here is similar to that of loving God with one's whole heart. This too implies a radical obligation, yet at the same time does not say that this total love is already attainable in the 'here and now'.

[275]

III. Deviant Decisions of Conscience

We now come to the grounds which make it permissible for us to allow for the fact that subjectively speaking the individual Christian may believe himself justified in conscience in deviating from the papal teaching. Whatever approach we adopt to this question, our first task must be to define the precise limits of the 'state of the question'. For the purposes of our present investigation what we are concerned to achieve, therefore (and this is in accordance with the limits which we have defined for our considerations as a whole) is not to present arguments which, in our opinion, objectively demonstrate that the papal norm is incorrect or at least incapable of proof. Our sole aim here is to make clear that apart from the abstract possibility of an inculpably erroneous conscience there are grounds for holding that in this particular concrete instance even a Catholic conscience can, by a psychological process that we can understand, arrive at the (subjective) conviction that it is not bound by the papal norm.

(a) The first point to which we must draw attention in this connection is that we are

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

arriving at too facile a judgement on the situation in which a subjective conscience is placed if we assume that this conscience is simply being subjected to a conflict between a harsh norm proclaimed by the Church and an easier course of action which has only moral laxity, superficiality, and hedonism to commend it. On the contrary not a few cases arise in which such a conscience finds itself caught up in what is (at least to all appearances) a conflict between moral duties on both sides. This is surely a point which does not need to be clarified at any greater length here.

(b) A further point to which attention must be drawn is that in this question, as a factor in the concrete situation of human living we must not over-emphasize the formal authority of the official teaching body with regard to its effectiveness. For in fact even from the point of view of sheer formal logic the matter appears to be very simple: the Catholic Christian in principle acknowledges the Church's teaching authority in moral questions also. It still continues to be authoritative for him even in the case in which he fails to perceive – at any rate with sufficient clarity – the material justification for this particular official decision in matters of doctrine. In other words – for this is how we might express the simple conclusion that appears to follow from this – even according to the dictates of his own conscience he has to adhere to this concrete norm. In reality, however, the matter is not so simple. First we must simply recognize the [276] fact that despite the formal logic of the position which has been indicated above a formal authority can be over-strained from the psychological point of view, and that too not merely in the individual case, but also in collective situations. Man in his concrete behaviour is in fact not made up merely of logic. For instance a case that is perfectly conceivable and actually arises again and again is that of a Catholic doctor who in principle and theory recognizes the Catholic doctrine that any direct termination of pregnancy is forbidden. Yet in the concrete instance in which it is a question of saving a mother who already has many children he is psychologically in no position to realize the moral force at the psychological level of a norm to which he adheres at the conceptual level to such an extent that he either observes this norm in the concrete individual case, or alternatively disobeys it and incurs subjective guilt in doing so. A somewhat similar situation is perfectly conceivable even at the 'collective' level in the case with which we are here concerned, and may apply to wide areas of the Church even when we assume the objective correctness of the papal norm.

(c) A further point which must in all sober realism be emphasized is that in the case with which we are here concerned the individual and collective consciences of Catholic Christians neither have nor can assume any absolute certainty with regard to the objective correctness of the papal norm.

(d) Once this situation is taken duly into account the arguments against the papal norm acquire, both theoretically and practically speaking a far greater effectiveness, at least at the subjective level, than we could ascribe to them if – as in the case of a dogma – we could assume the absolute correctness of the papal teaching (regardless of whether we clearly saw the reason for it, or how we coped with the arguments against it).

(e) It must further be emphasized that in a question of the natural law it is far from being a matter of indifference whether we realize the intrinsic basis in reality for a norm of the natural law or not. In a case in which we completely failed to achieve this degree of understanding we would have to say that to observe a norm of this kind would indeed be an act of moral obedience to the authority of the Church, but it would no longer be an act in which the intrinsic morality of what is actually prescribed in itself would be attained to subjectively. Now this is certainly not a matter of indifference.

(f) In addition to this the actual situation in which the individual stands is such that while he may recognize this authority formally and in principle, still in the concrete individual case it is all too often made [277] effectively present to him as nothing more than a moral demand

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

for a given line of conduct in practice, so long as it does not succeed in effectively enabling him to understand how its demand is justified from the real nature of the case.

From this point of view alone we must be realistic enough to allow for the fact that in the case with which we are concerned, even though formally speaking we may acknowledge the teaching authority of the Church, and assume that the papal norm is correct, still there will be very many Catholics who neither recognize nor acknowledge in any effective sense that this norm has any binding force upon their own consciences.

So far all that we have been saying has been expressed in very formal terms. Now, however, we have reached a point at which it must be said quite decisively that there certainly are notable arguments against this papal norm. We cannot estimate the force of these arguments by asking ourselves whether they supply an objective and unambiguous proof of the contrary position to that upheld in the papal norm, but rather, from the standpoint of whether they are capable psychologically, albeit on the basis of objectively real considerations, of de facto causing the mind and conscience of an individual Catholic to hold the opinion that the papal norm is incorrect and, moreover, in such a way that he can foresee such a state of affairs emerging not merely in this or that individual case (a possibility which will certainly not be contested by any moral theologian) but in larger groups as well within the Church. If this is indeed the case, then here too we must not overlook a fact that a state of mind of this sort in such a group will have the effect of confirming the conviction of the individual.

Now such arguments are certainly to be found. In this connection only a few indications are possible here.

(a) First the line of argument against such positions adopted in the encyclical is surely too brief to be very effective so far as its power to convince at the de facto psychological level is concerned. It hardly goes beyond the actual statement of the thesis. It fails to show why the natural constitution of an individual, with his particular human powers, ipso facto and of itself alone lays a moral demand upon the individual concerned. To say the least the impression it arouses is as though man's capacity deliberately and consciously to shape and direct himself is power added on purely ab externo to a closed and 'static' nature, and not that which constitutes human 'nature' precisely as human. It therefore fails to demonstrate in any enlightening way the fact that man (admittedly with all the necessary provisos) precisely does not remain any longer within his own [278] 'nature' when he deliberately induces a state of affairs which 'nature' itself also in fact produces again and again through the factor of the 'safe period'. All this is not said in order to deprive the line of argument adopted by the Pope of its own intrinsic force, but simply in order to make it clear that de facto in the case of many individuals it will turn out to be psychologically ineffective.

(b) An additional point is that a notable majority both of the theologians and of the bishops who were included in the Papal Commission set up to study this question declared themselves against laying down this norm, which has been published in the encyclical. In the light of this fact it is difficult to hold out any hope that a notable majority of Catholics will regard the line of argument adopted in the papal encyclical as carrying conviction. It has already been pointed out that any attempt to counter this position by having recourse to the formal papal authority alone will not help in a way that is psychologically effective.

(c) Finally in this respect the following factor has to be borne in mind: the papal encyclical recognizes that when there are serious grounds to justify it the safe period may be used to control fertility. In view of this we shall surely feel able to go on to say that even assuming the correctness of the papal norm we can still defend the position that it is morally permissible to make sure that these safe periods really are safe; that the woman concerned does not become fertile even during them as a result of factors which are biologically abnormal (and therefore 'unnatural'), in other words through ovulation taking place at a time when it is not expected. According to this line of argument it would be morally permissible to ensure the regularity of the 'safe period' by means of a 'pill' (it makes no difference whether one has already been found which is suitable for this purpose or not). The argument here would be that this would simply be a way of 'supporting' and regularizing 'nature', but not altering it. Now assuming for the moment that such a course of action is permissible, then the only difference in practice between the sort of 'birth control' which is in conformity with the papal norm and the sort that corresponds to the point of view opposed to this is that the papal norm would regard the use of the pill as unlawful during a period of about three days within the menstrual cycle (it would be lawful, therefore, for all the rest of the days) because in these three days a normal ovulation takes place and should not be prevented by the 'pill'. Of course to the moral theologian who accepts the papal norm this difference is vital to a degree. But in spite of this we are compelled to doubt whether this difference can be effectively apprehended and accorded its true value by the average human conscience.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[279] If such refinements are introduced into the case, then the difference between the papal and the 'modern' position will no longer be understood by the average conscience, and will be felt to be so much hair-splitting. The effect is the same even though the means by which man seeks to achieve it are different: in the one case through his 'knowledge', in the other through his biological 'techniques'. In both cases it is intended. The sole difference, so far as the conscience of the average man is concerned is that something which he is permitted to do for all the rest of the time is unlawful for the specific period of the three days. It must be reiterated that what we are treating of here is a line of argument not about the true nature of the case in itself, but about the insights demanded of the average man in the process of forming his conscience. From this point of view, therefore, we must expect that in practice the papal norm will not be accepted.

IV. The De Facto Situation Among Catholics Since the Encyclical

From all that has been said up to now we must surely be realistic enough to draw the conclusion that so far as the outlook and living practice of the majority of Catholics is concerned the situation after the encyclical will be no different from what it was before. The number of protests which have already been raised even within the Church are in themselves enough to demonstrate this point. Moreover all the considerations which we have put forward so far in any case make it probable. The majority of Catholics will regard the norm presented in the encyclical as de facto not merely 'doctrina reformabilis' but actually as 'doctrina reformanda'. They will apply to the case in question those principles which have been stated in the doctrinal letter of the German bishops with regard to the possibility of deviating from that teaching of the official Church which, though authentic, has not been defined. In this situation a point that is crucial for any theological judgement upon it is that (though certainly not in all cases, still in very many) the 'bona fides' of the individuals concerned, the fact that at least in their subjective consciences they are inculpable, even when they do deviate from the official norm in this way, cannot be contested. Furthermore we cannot regard such a state of 'bona fides' in the concrete as a mere isolated case arising here and there. Rather it is a state that applies to large groups within the Church and to the Church's public life. It cannot be proved by any a priori line of theological argument that such a situation is impossible in a case such as this, in which the teaching of the Church that is in question is indeed authentic, but nevertheless objectively speaking capable of revision. Teaching of this kind is of its very [280] nature exposed to such a situation, even though it is still far from being the case that it must therefore arise in all cases wherever such teaching is proclaimed as authentic yet capable of reform. Certainly a situation of this kind actually has arisen often in the past, albeit

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

not with such a full glare of publicity as in the present instance. For instance we can certainly state that with regard to many official doctrinal pronouncements in the field of biblical theology put forward at the beginning of the present century the great majority of exegetes had already abandoned these officially prescribed positions even before the teaching authorities themselves prudently withdrew from them. In the case of an authentic pronouncement of the teaching authorities such a situation is possible, and on all human estimation has de facto arisen in the case with which we are here concerned.

The importance to be attached to a doctrinal pronouncement of this kind, and the authority of the Church herself in her official doctrinal pronouncements, are not helped by covering over this situation or attempting to suppress any public awareness of it in the Church. Both within and without the Church so much will be said and written, and so many opinions will be put forward concerning this situation, opinions which cannot be suppressed and will not allow themselves to be suppressed by such expedients, that it could only do damage to the authority of the Church if those who in principle acknowledge their allegiance to the Church's authority were to attempt to remain silent. What we are concerned with here (and this is in conformity with the limited field of enquiry which we have defined for these considerations of ours) is in fact not whether this situation is, in every respect to be approved of, but rather what ought to be done, assuming that it already exists.

In such a situation the task of the bishops will be no easy one, the more so (though this is not the only reason) in view of the fact that in recent years they have more or less clearly adopted a public attitude which is either directly or indirectly at variance with the norm enunciated in the encyclical. A bishop need not, and certainly should not, take as his starting-point the conviction that it is absolutely certain that the positions unequivocally opposed to the papal norm are correct. And he cannot assume this to be the case. It is certainly impossible to maintain any such position so long as we view the question in a spirit of self-criticism and guard against any short-sighted emotionalism. But so long as he does not proceed from a conviction of this kind any bishop, regardless of which position he personally is inclined to adopt in view of the objective realities involved, can honourably and in all subjective honesty point out to the [281] faithful over whom he presides the weight and importance to be attached to a papal pronouncement of this kind. He can exhort the faithful and the priests to be self-critical and so to take seriously a norm of this kind, laid down as it is by the supreme authority of the Church. He can put the question to the conscience of the individual believer whether he can have, or actually has, a sufficient conviction, supported by serious arguments, to make it lawful for him in conscience, either in theory or in practice, to deviate from the papal norm, or whether alternatively he is falling prey to an unconscious allergy against any teaching authority in the Church which is very widespread today, and so reacting merely emotionally without reflecting that in the gospel too claims can be put forward which at first seem to demand too much of man, driven as he is by his own impulses, and so appear to him incapable of fulfilment.

But a bishop need not and should not act either as though the papal pronouncement were absolute and incapable of revision, or as though any deviation from it necessarily implied a radical denial of the teaching authority of the Church such as would objectively separate the Catholics concerned from the Church. We have a right confidently to expect that on this question the bishops will proceed in conformity with the general norms which the German bishops themselves have formulated for such cases. Certainly a bishop will have to do his best to ensure that in the pulpit and in other contexts his priests will treat of questions of sexual morality in such a way that they continue clearly to maintain a genuine and positive attitude towards the teaching authority of the Church. But in a society in which there is still only very little that can be achieved at the merely discrete level, 'in camera caritatis', it is impossible to avoid a situation in which the basic principles of the doctrinal letter of the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

German bishops, even as applied to the specific case, will be set forth in public, and in which it will be explicitly asserted that it is quite conceivable for a Catholic in 'bona fide' to deviate from the papal norm. It seems to be impossible for a bishop to have recourse to the disciplinary measures available to the Church's magisterium against a priest merely on the grounds that he is applying these principles to the case with which we are concerned, now that those same principles have been proclaimed by the bishops themselves in a presentation that is discrete, credible, and respectful in its attitude towards the teaching authority of the Church. To take such a course would be to deprive those same principles of their due weight, and to discredit the honesty of the bishops themselves in proclaiming them. For principles are there to be applied to concrete cases.

What we have already said in itself carries certain implications with [282] regard to the attitude which priests should adopt in the pulpit and in the confessional. Even today one who is charged with proclaiming the gospel message has a very high and important task in upholding a Christian morality of sex. It has already been pointed out at an earlier stage that even today there is a great body of doctrine, held in common by all Catholics on this question, which the priest must boldly and unashamedly uphold. He has to point out again and again that marriage is something more than a mere egoism shared by two individuals, more than the legitimization of mere instincts, that it consists in a genuine and personal monogamy in which each partner strives to achieve the eternal salvation of the other, and that it is a love that entails a lifelong faithfulness. He has to point out that it is subject to the law and the grace of the gospel, that in principle it must be permanently open to the procreation of children, that the norms of birth-control are essentially ethical in character, and as such affect the whole man, etc. Again and again in the course of pastoral discussions in preparation for marriage, and in counselling married people (both in the confessional and outside it) the priest has to strive to instil an understanding of the Christian conception of marriage in the believers. He neither need be, nor should allow himself to be, manoeuvred into a situation in which it appears as though the sole question which arises in the ethics of marriage today is that concerned with the arguments for or against the 'pill'. Even today it is in principle perfectly conceivable that he will encounter individuals who, if it is left to their own judgement, will reject the 'pill'. In view of the 'authenticity' of the papal pronouncement he has certainly no right, in relation to such consciences, to seek to 'teach them better'. It would be still more reprehensible (although unhappily it does already occur in practice) if a priest in the confessional were to deprive people of their confidence when they had the joyful will and the Christian courage to increase the number of their children. On the other hand, however, he can also allow for the fact that there is a genuine state of 'bona fides' in many believers such that they do not incur guilt by deviating from the papal norm. If in general he acts in support of an understanding and a genuine respect for the papal norm (with the due provisos which the actual realities themselves require) he will in practice in the majority of cases in the confessional be able to refrain from making any attempt to 'upset' the 'bona fides' which is firmly present, or which may be assumed, in the penitent. For in accordance with what has been said so far, in the majority of cases he will not merely not succeed in this, but also in making such an attempt in the current situation he will fail to abide by the traditional rules, which lay [283] down that a 'bona fides' of this kind must not be 'destroyed', but rather left untroubled. For today in effect any attempt of this kind would not as such be productive of any good, even in the sphere of public morality. In accordance with this the only cases in which the priest in the confessional will still have a 'duty to enquire' as to the use or non-use of the pill will be those in which he is forced to presume from positive signs that the penitent is keeping silent about his use of the pill, and that this is contrary to his subjectively 'better' conscience.

The theologians who have to present Catholic morality as from the professor's chair find themselves in a particularly difficult situation today with regard to this matter. First we are surely justified in saying that even in this official position of theirs they have the right and the duty to say everything which we have said up to now in the form of general considerations and the consequences to be drawn from these for the course of action to be followed by the bishops and the priests. But certain explicit questions still remain to be treated of which have been omitted in the above treatment. In 'Humani Generis' Pius XII had already declared that even if a papal pronouncement in matters of doctrine does not have the force of an ex cathedra definition, it is no longer open to free discussion among the theologians. It is true that this pronouncement has not been repeated in 'Lumen Gentium', the Constitution on the Church of the Second Vatican Council, even though it was at first included in a projected schema of this Dogmatic Constitution. But even in this Constitution it is laid down that a doctrinal statement of this kind has to be upheld by the theologians with a 'religious obedience' (No. 25). This certainly raises a special difficulty for moral theologians in their teaching, the more so since it is certainly reasonable to draw a distinction here according to whether, in the given case, it is a personal opinion that is being treated of, which remains at the private level and is held as a matter of personal theory and practice by someone who in doing so observes a 'silentium obsequiosum', or whether it is an opinion which is upheld with a certain degree of publicity within the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Over and above what has already been said at the beginning of this section we must surely adopt the following position on this question: in the concrete conditions prevailing today in the Church and in public life in the world, the respect which the moral theologian has to pay in his teaching to an authentic but not defined pronouncement of the Church's magisterium can no longer imply that the moral theologian concerned must either defend a doctrinal pronouncement of this kind through thick and thin as absolutely the only opinion which is certain and admissible for all [284] ages, or else he must simply be silent. In conformity with what has been said up to now he cannot in honesty adopt the first position, and if he adopted the second he would both be failing in his task as a moral theologian and at the same time doing no service to the Church, to the moral standards of the faithful, and to the Church's teaching authority. Hence the moral theologian will on the one hand have to do his utmost to make the arguments supporting the papal doctrine intelligible to his hearers – in other words he will have to uphold the formal authority of the Church's official teachers (within the limits here laid down), and present the objective arguments supporting the papal position – on the other hand, however, he will not have to be silent concerning the difficulties against this papal teaching, neither those which actually exist as a matter of objective fact, nor those which may be very effective at the subjective level, for the very reason that this would have the effect of making his presentation unworthy of belief in the estimation of his hearers. Over and above this he will seek to help his hearers genuinely to form their own consciences even if he is unable to ensure that all of them will form them in the same sense. It can be said that in the concrete individual case this line of action on the part of the moral theologian is sufficient to ensure that he is adequately taking into account those principles to which we have just referred. It must be remembered that even according to the traditional interpretation these principles as stated by Pius XII and the Second Vatican Council do not in principle exclude the possibility of a theologian dissenting from an authentic statement of teaching of this kind, and that today it would be utopian to suppose that such dissent must always and in every case remain locked up in the private conscience of the theologian concerned. These factors alone are enough to ensure the validity of the approach which we have described. Moreover even in former times the theologian was not forced to keep his dissenting opinions to himself in this way. For otherwise the revisions which de facto have been arrived at – whether explicitly or tacitly – of other such official pronouncements of the Church would never have been made at all. Something which is necessary for a theological development,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which de facto has existed all along, and is ultimately recognized by the Church's magisterium as well, cannot in principle or from the outset be contrary to morality.

So far as the adherents of the Christian faith, and above all Catholic married people are concerned, all that is essential has strictly speaking already been said, and, moreover, is already contained in the written statement of doctrine published by the German bishops. If, after maturely searching his conscience, a Catholic Christian believes that in all prudence [285] and self-criticism he has been forced to arrive at a point of view which deviates from the papal norm, and if he follows this in the practice of his married life, then, so long as he observes those principles which have already repeatedly been mentioned as of general application to all Christians, such a Catholic need not fear that he has incurred any subjective guilt or regard himself as in a state of formal disobedience to the Church's authority. If he really succeeds in sincerely forming his conscience in this way, then such a Catholic has in principle no obligation to subject the judgement of his conscience which he has arrived at in this way to fresh questioning each time he receives the sacrament of penance. Admittedly in the contemporary situation the Catholic has one further duty to perform over and above those we have mentioned: his love for, and faithfulness to the Church must be such that he does not allow himself to be led astray by the scornful criticism of the Church and her sacrament, and the sometimes unbridled insults to which they are subjected, and which he can hear and read everywhere today where the 'question of the pill' is discussed. He must actually have acquired all the necessary information for understanding the true situation in this question. He must know how to distinguish between reformable and definitorial statements of doctrine on the part of his Church. Furthermore he must achieve a clear understanding of the fact that a teaching authority of the Church cannot in every case be forced into the dilemma either of having to speak with its supreme and infallible authority, or else simply keeping silent. Finally he must recognize that the examples of an alleged fallibility in the Church's teaching authority in the current controversy have been adduced by journalists who are either wholly or partially uneducated in theological matters. And all these examples involve decisions which were either not ex cathedra at all or which have nothing whatever to do with pronouncements of the Church's teaching authority (as, for instance, alterations in the Church's marriage laws, on the question of cremation etc.). Now if a believing Catholic does inform himself to this extent, then, even in the atmosphere of tension which now prevails, and which is in part artificially stimulated, he will be able to remain calm and composed and to preserve an attitude of trust towards the Church.

V. The Significance of the Current Situation as Constituting a Representative Example

What a Catholic or a theologian is experiencing today in our question is not really anything absolutely novel. For developments of doctrine and [286] situations in which doctrinal developments such as the present one were still possible, even though the subsequent history could not be predicted with any clarity, have obviously existed again and again in the course of the Church's history. The new element in all this is simply the fact that such developments and situations arise and advance, or alternatively change, more rapidly nowadays, and so make a sharper and more urgent impression on the awareness of the individual within the brief span of his single lifetime; and further that this question affects the concrete life of an incalculably greater number of individuals, and affects it more directly than other dogmatic questions. Whatever the situation may have been over the last hundred years from the psychological point of view in the awareness of the average Catholic with regard to his attitude towards the Church, it is not true to suggest that the Catholic Church either has understood herself in the past, or understands herself now as a Church in which everything that is important is already clear from the outset, and already possessed as a matter of absolute certainty; or as a Church in which every fresh discovery of truth takes place solely and exclusively through the pronouncements of her supreme official teachers. The teaching authority in the Catholic Church, and above all in those cases in which it does not produce any definitorial pronouncement (and in many cases it is quite incapable of doing so) is an important and essential element for the discovery of truth and the development of doctrine in the Church. But it is not the sort of official body which acts in isolation and in every respect in total independence of other real elements in the Church, and so presides over this discovery of truth or development of doctrine in a totalitarian manner. Even the ex cathedra decisions of the popes or Councils have properly speaking always arisen, in some sense or other, as a final seal of approval accorded to a development which has been sustained by factors quite different from the official teaching body itself or the formal authority attached to this. The authority of the official teachers in the Church and the respect due to this do not require, therefore, that we who are in the Church shall act as though all theological views upheld in the Church consist simply in an obedient repetition of some declaration on the part of these official teachers. On any true understanding there is, even in the Catholic Church, an open 'system' in which the most varied factors (the 'instinct' of the faithful fresh, insights on the part of individual Christians and theologians, fresh situations that arise in a particular age, the new questions to which these give rise and much else besides) work together to throw fresh light upon the Church's own awareness of her faith, and to produce a development of doctrine.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[287] And in all this this open 'system' considered as a whole, in which the official teaching authority has its proper and necessary place, is not taken over and directed in any exclusive or totalitarian sense by this official teaching body in itself.

These are factors in the Church's understanding of her own nature which are properly speaking self-evident. Today we are experiencing them in a particular concrete instance in a way that is perhaps painful but that should not, on any ultimate view, have been unexpected to us. In such a situation the question arises of what attitude the individual Christian in the Catholic Church ought to adopt in his own conscience. For deciding this question there are indeed numerous principles, of which we have mentioned only a few in the present discussion. But in this particular concrete case, as also in the important decisions which he has to take in other areas of his life, these principles do not relieve the individual Christian of the responsibility of arriving at a sincere decision in his own personal life, or of his responsibility before God as an individual. The two factors of free responsibility even in the process of arriving at the truth on the one hand, and of paying due heed to the teaching authority of the Church on the other are united and combined in the process of arriving at this decision. And to unite the two factors in this way is a task that arises ever anew, one which cannot be achieved solely by speculating on abstract principles. According to the teaching of the Church herself there are certain cases in which the individual's own subjective conscience with regard to truth is blameless, either when it fails to lead him to the Church and her defined doctrine or even when it leads him out of her. The question with which we are here concerned, however is certainly not, objectively speaking, a case in which anything of this kind necessarily must take place.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[288]

13

THEOLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS ON THE CONCEPT OF TIME

In the considerations which I propose to put forward here I shall not be taking as my starting-point the problems of modern physics, non-Euclidian geometry, the fundamentals of the theory of aggregates, or the natural philosophy developed on the basis of all this, because this cannot justly be demanded of theology as a scientific discipline. Nevertheless this is regrettable. For in Catholic theology, which in this respect differs from several tendencies in Protestant theology, the opinion cannot a priori be upheld that, quite apart from the methodological differences between his discipline and that of the natural scientist, the actual area of subject-matter which he has to investigate is so different from that field of reality with which the natural scientist has to deal that from the outset there are no points of contact between them, and therefore no possibilities of conflict either. Nevertheless this restriction, regrettable though it may be, is rendered increasingly inevitable by the fact that the pluralism which exists among the contemporary sciences is too great for any one mind any longer to achieve an overall synthesis. At the same time this contemporary situation itself in turn creates problems which did not exist before, and so demand a completely new approach. These too, as far as possible, have to be solved. We may further justify the fact that we are not, in any primary sense, taking as our starting-point for the considerations presented here the sort of problems that are raised by the natural sciences[1] on the grounds that according to its own demonstrable understanding [289] of itself theology is a science which is concerned with the interpretation of human existence, a field which is existentially and ontologically prior to man's interpretation of himself at the level of the natural sciences. For this reason theology can and should pursue its own tasks without having to wait for the findings of the natural sciences as the necessary prior condition enabling it to achieve what is proper to itself.[2] Precisely in virtue of the account which his science gives of its own nature the theologian must, after all, enter into dialogue with the natural scientist, and at the same time in doing so retain the right to state his findings without having first studied the findings of natural science, and before the natural scientist himself has pronounced upon these. He can then leave it to the dialogue itself to achieve the further developments necessary, developments which in fact have not already been anticipated by what the theologian himself asserts in the sphere of his own interpretation of his faith and his theology.

The Christian believer and his theology are in the highest degree concerned with the concept of time. Whatever may be meant by this in more precise terms, Christian dogma recognizes the creation of the world as having a temporal 'beginning', and rejects the [1] Hence we cannot here enter any more closely into the problems of space and time entailed in the scientific theorizing of the natural scientists. Thus a bibliography may be sufficient on this point: See M. Schlick, Raum und Zeit in der gegenwartigen Physik (Berlin, 4th ed., 1922); H. Reichenbach, Die Philosophie der Raum-Zeit-Lehre (Berlin, 1928); A. Wenzl, 'Das Paradoxon der Relativierung der Zeit in der Relativitätstheorie', Forschung und Fortschritt (1958); G. Frey, 'Der Zeitbegriff in den Naturwissenschaften', Stadium generale 14 (1961); P. Mittelstaedt, Philosophische Probleme der modernen Physik (Mannheizn, 1963); Die Problematik von Raum und Zeit = Naturwissenschaft und Theologie 6 (Freiburg, 1964); R. W. Meyer, ed., Das Zeit-problem im 20. Jahrhundert (Bern, 1964); W. Büchel, Philosophische Probleme der Physik (Freiburg, 1965); H. Weyl, Philosophie der Mathematik und Naturwissenschaft (Munich, 1966); C. F. von Weizsäcker, *Die Tragweite der Wissenschaf*t I (Stuttgart, 2nd ed., 1966); H. Sachsse, Naturerkenntnis und Wirklichkeit (Braunschweig, 1967); A. Koyré, Von der geschlossenen Welt zum endlichen Universum (Frankfurt, 1969).

[2] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Science as a "Confession"?', Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 385-400.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

doctrine of a 'world that has already existed from eternity' as a heresy.[3] It recognizes a history of salvation and perdition which is unique and linear in its advance, and rejects the 'eternal return of all things'. This Christian dogma recognizes certain absolutely unique events occurring at particular points in space and time in saving history, and looks for the end of all history. It ascribes to the human existence of the individual a personal history developed in a freedom which does not give the subject concerned the power to go back over his course at will, or the possibility of limitless revisions, but consists rather in the forging of that which is definitive, that in which time as a process will be raised to its definitive outcome, that which is called the [290] 'eternity' of man in salvation or perdition.[4] The doctrine of the faith includes the concept of the 'fulness of time', the biblical concept of the kairos, the possibility, appointed and given once and for all, for man of his freedom to achieve definitive salvation. It includes the concept of the 'ε0ϕ α#παχ'[5] i.e. the event which, taking place at a particular point in time, remains as an unsurpassable existential modality for all times. Faith is aware of the flux of time as an enslaving power over man, from which he is liberated by the grace of God in Christ. And it recognizes saving time, in which that can take place which endures blessedly in force for ever.

There is the theological concept of hope, which is act and expectation both in one, reaching out into a time that lies open before man, and which he can never seize upon or bring under his control by his own autonomous planning. Theology considers the concept of divine providence through which God is not merely the sole Lord of time and history, but also guarantees that time shall be shaped and directed in a way that is ultimately meaningful for history, and does not allow this to be fragmented and so to sink into a formless succession of particles of time following one upon the other. In the doctrine of the Incarnation of the divine Logos Christian dogma apprehends the tremendous fact that time becomes, in a true sense, predicated of God who is 'in himself' immutable, God who assumes and undergoes a personal history of his own in time, and 'in the world' itself. In the concept of the development of revelation and dogma as history an encounter is achieved between truth and time, and it becomes clear that time is not merely a specification of physical and material reality, but also one that applies to the spirit as such. Among the insights of the Church's dogmatic teaching is included the truth that the ultimate essence and outcome of the history of nature and of the world itself are specified by the history of man's achievement of salvation or perdition in freedom. And from this the further truth emerges that the time inherent in material reality is not, in the last analysis, the power which dominates human history, but on the contrary remains one particular and subordinate element in the time that belongs to personal freedom. Ultimately speaking, therefore, it is the former of these that must be specified by the latter and not vice versa. The New Testament uses a whole range of concepts which include both purely temporal aspects and at the same time [291] a theological content and weight: αι0ω&ν, αι0ω&νιοφ, η|9με/ρα, ω|#ρα, καιρο&φ (ε1σξατοφ), τα τε/λη, ση/μερον, ε0νεστω~τα-με/λλοντα θα&νατοφ, ε0φα&παχ, νυ=ν, παραυτι//κα, παραυτα_, ε0ρνε/σθαι, ϕθορα&, ε0κθε/φ, α)να&μνησιφ, etc. Thereby it provides an immediate basis for a theology of time. Theology reflects (or should do so!) upon the concept of that 'simultaneity' in virtue of which the believer achieves immediate contact with the saving event of the 'past' in 'anamnesis'. Theology recognizes the sacraments as events of grace having the character of 'anamnesis' and at the same time anticipating the future. It is

[3] A brief and precise explanation of this point is to be found in W. Kern, 'Zur theologischen Auslegung des Schöpfungsglaubens', Mysterium Salutis II (Einsiedeln, 1967), pp. 464-546, esp. 519-529 (bibliog.).
[4] cf. K. Rahner, 'The Comfort of Time', Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 141-157; idem, 'Immanent and Transcendent Consummation of the World', Theological Investigations X (London and New York, 1973), 260-273.
[5] cf. A. Winter, #Απαχ ε0φα&παχ im Hebräerbrief (Dissertation, Rome, 1960).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

clear, therefore, that the dogmatic teaching of Christianity must concern itself particularly with the concept of time.

Now this conclusion contrasts strangely with the fact that there is hardly any 'theology of time' in the established theology of the seminaries, and therefore (as dependent upon this) in the average Catholic's conscious awareness of his faith. Of course some controversies have arisen in the history of dogma and theology which do relate to time. This applies for instance to the struggle against Gnosticism and against an Origenist doctrine of apokatastasis, and also the controversy of the Mediaeval schoolmen 'de aeternitate mundi', i.e. in more precise terms with regard to the possibility or impossibility of establishing the finitude of the temporal world by philosophical argument. But any systematically worked out doctrine of the nature of time has never been arrived at in the established theology of the Church. The statements about time which this contains have remained scattered throughout the particular theological treatises, ranging from the treatise on creation to that on eschatology. What is true with regard to any formal theology of history is also true with regard to a theology of time. It does not yet really exist, and even though here and there time is inevitably spoken of in the treatises which exist on particular topics, still even here the question is not for the most part entered into very deeply in this established theology. It assumes as self-evident a popular understanding of time, and when it does reflect upon it more precisely it does so with the aid of a Greek understanding of time which derives its primary orientation from the model of κι/νησιφ, in other words, in the last analysis, from the idea of changes of place. In the light of this we can understand that from the ancient conception of the world right down to the most recent times the idea of saving history has been worked out according to the model of changes of place. 'Heaven' does not come to be in time, but history is basically speaking presented as a movement (or return) taking place in a sphere within which certain specific and qualitatively different points can be discerned, each with a theological relevance of its own. This failure to reflect upon the real nature [292] of time is also shown, for instance, by the fact that the actual word 'time' (tempus) only arises as a specific topic in the official doctrinal documents of the Church in contexts in which the beginning of the world through creation is being spoken of.

In arriving at this conclusion we do not of course intend to dispute the fact that a far more profound and radical Christian understanding of time evinces itself in many theologians ranging from Irenaeus and Augustine[6] to Pascal and Kirkegaard,[7] or that the understanding of time commonly accepted among Christians, even though insufficiently reflected upon, has still had a considerable influence upon that conception of time which is characteristic of modern philosophy.

This omission, strange and surprising though it is, has reasons of its own which are readily understandable. Everyone imagines that he knows what time is as constituted by past, present and future, and in a certain sense is justified in this even though for the most part he is overlooking the principle that that which has been 'known all along' is, and must continue to be, that which constantly calls for fresh questioning. And hence theology too seems able to manage with this awareness of time which is prior to any ontological speculation upon it. For the message of faith is intended to be intelligible to all. And even when theology draws upon, or attempts to draw upon, the specialist concepts of philosophy it does not in its turn produce

[6] On this cf. U. Duchrow, 'Der sogenannte psychologische Zeitbegriff Augustins im Verhältnis zur physikalischen und geschichtlichen Zeit', ZTK 63 (1966), pp. 267-288.

[7] The central discussion of this concept of time, which is also particularly important for the considerations on simultaneity already mentioned above, is to be found in S. Kierkegaard, Philosophische Brocken (Vol. so of the German edition) (Düsseldorf, 1952), esp. pp. 7-107; in this connection cf. also idem, Der Augenblick (Jena, 2nd ed., 1909); idem, Abschliessende unwissenschafitlche Nachschrift (Vol 16 of the German edition) (Düsseldorf, 1957/58); idem, Einübung im Christentum (Vol 26 of the German edition) (Düsseldorf, 1951).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

any official doctrinal interpretations of these, but uses them on its own account and at its own risk in its proper field, and in so doing often fails to achieve any unanimity in the use of such concepts.

Hence it is perhaps appropriate to show by means of a few examples -more are not possible – how theology must, in order to cope with its own problems, concern itself with achieving a deeper understanding of the concept of time, and how in the course of its own enquiry it encounters problems which require it to take into account certain relevant factors which fall outside its own boundaries. From these few modest preliminary [293] soundings we shall pass on somewhat arbitrarily and abruptly, because nothing else is possible here.[8]

I

The dogmatic teaching of the Church lays down that the world is not 'eternal', but has been created in time and with time, and that it has a 'beginning'. Here we must dispense with any more detailed investigation of the 'theological qualification' attached to this statement, though it is consistently qualified, at least in the manuals of Catholic dogma, as 'de fide divina et catholica definita' (Reference being made here to D 428, 501-503; 1783). Let us simply notice in passing that nowadays a small question mark is here and there appended to this qualification.[9] Insofar as any dispute arises in the established theology with regard to this statement, it is at most concerned with the question of whether it constitutes merely a statement of revelation or also has the force of a statement of the findings of 'natural' philosophy. Here we may adduce Thomas as an example of the first position, and Bonaventure as an example of the second. Possibly it may be asked in more precise terms here whether with regard to this point of controversy still further distinctions are offered to show precisely which finite and created reality is being treated of in each particular case. But even if we set aside this controversial point, we must still ask whether the actual meaning of the dogma itself is unambiguously clear. Certainly no further explanation of a binding character has been put forward by the official Church as the outcome of any conscious investigation of the actual dogma itself. But can it be said that its meaning is clear? What does it mean to say that the world has a 'beginning', that real time is 'finite' in respect of its extension back into the past, and therefore that the world is not 'eternal', not existing from all eternity? Theology itself in fact explains that we should not interpret this statement as though we could, by tracing [294] the course of time backwards, arrive at some point at which the world no longer existed, as though space and time in the material sense were still present, though empty, so that only God still existed. Established theology itself states the world as a whole cannot be conceived of in such a way that it would be reasonable to ask whether it could have existed either 'earlier' or 'later', because, as applied to the material world, there is not and cannot be in the concrete any 'earlier' or 'later' at all. And such a question derives merely from the illusion of the 'transcendental phantasy' which fails to understand that the world actually has time as the specification of itself, but as a whole does not in turn exist in [8] The considerations put forward here are not of themselves to be thought of as constituting a systematic plan for a theology of time of this kind. In such a theology we should probably also have to take into consideration and develop more strongly our own evaluation of the way in which the concept of time has been discussed among philosophers ever since the introduction of the Kantian antinomies. But, as the title of this study shows, it is the prior conditions for, and also the insoluble difficulties encountered by, such a theology of time that we are seeking to make apparent here. For such a theology must have an awareness of these if it is to pursue its proper task in an intelligent way. In general reference may be made to the article, 'Zeit, Zeitlichkeit' I-V, LTK X (and ed. Freiburg, 1965) 1324-1334 (Bibliog.).

[9] cf. W. Kern, op. cit., p. 524.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

time.

But what is finite time as material, seeing that it cannot in its turn be expressed in time, because otherwise it would once more have its place in a material time? Can the finitude of the totality of time be real in any other way than in virtue of the fact that it is conceived of as (and actually is) a part of a wider extent of time which is just as real as itself, something which, ex supposito, cannot be the case?

We might begin by imagining to ourselves what it would be like for us to set up a clock beside the world and proceeding at the same rate as it such that it would always be co-existent with the world (whether this always exists or not), and then say: now since the time which this clock tells is finite, so too the time of the world is finite. But this clock would either be a part of the world as such or not. In the first case, as a particular element of the world it could not tell us anything more about the temporality of the world as a whole than any other individual element in the world, namely that it itself exhibits a finite number of changes. But the idea that because of its continuous co-existence with the world the world itself too exhibits only a finite number of processes, and so has a finite time – this is an idea which we could not assume, but would rather have to have proved. But how?

In the second case the clock would be a world in itself. But in that case it would first have to be proved that two absolutely disparate worlds, having no real connection with one another, are conceivable at all, and, even assuming this, that the two absolutely disparate times belonging to them could, nevertheless, serve as measures of one another, and that a non-finite time could not be continuously co-existent with an absolutely disparate finite time.[10] But how are we to prove this without constantly [295] assuming what appears to be the case from the transcendental phantasy, namely that time is a unique and homogeneous medium, constantly present for all and for each, of the realities which must from the outset exist in it in order to exist at all? Are we to say that the statement, 'The world has a beginning' means 'If we count up the total number of states, real yet distinguishable from one another, in which the world and the elements belonging to it have existed up to now, we shall arrive at a finite sum total'? But a computation of this kind presupposes on the one hand that the individual states themselves, as constituting a numerical series, are subject to time and have a temporal extension (otherwise they could not constitute time), and on the other that they must not be thought of in turn as materially continuous with one another, but rather as temporal 'atoms' of the states or conditions through which the world passes such that they cannot materially speaking be broken down into any smaller units.[11] But is this assumption conceivable, and not rather a contradiction in itself? Why, for example, could not as much 'take place' in those particles of time considered as a specification of such computable states as in the totality of the time that is measured? Why is it assumed in this clarification of the meaning of the dogma that there is an absolute flow of time proceeding at a regular rate such that nothing can have any place in the units of it except precisely these states, any one of which, so it is alleged, is materially different from the rest. To put it in other terms, if the statement that material time is finite is to have any meaning, does it not presuppose (at least in principle, even though it may not be something that we ourselves can realize) that time is measureable, that the units of time can be calculated, and in that case does not the question

[10] For if it were possible, e.g. for a non-finite time permanently to co-exist with a finite one in such a way that one of the two time-series involved was unknown to us, then we still could not say whether that other was finite or infinite, and it would be of no avail to attempt to represent it to ourselves in terms of the one that we did know. The only assured assumption here, albeit one that we should have to prove, is that an infinite time-series can never be represented in terms of a finite one.

[11] For the idea of a primary unit of extension and a primary unit of time, the so-called time atom cf. e.g. P. Jordan, Das Bild der modernen Physik (Berlin, 1957), pp. 147 ff. On what follows cf. also what is said about the model proposed by K. E. v. Baer in H.-D. Bastian, Theologie der Frage (Munich, 1969), pp. 52 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

necessarily impose itself of how any such measurability, even if it is only a measurability in principle, is to be conceived of? Is the computability of the events related, at least in principle, to actual occurrences such that these are ultimately accessible at all to the empirical methods of the natural sciences, or is the sort of finitude that is signified here one which is, so far as these empirical methods are concerned, capable of being divided ad infinitum into ever further elements, whether hypothetical or actually [296] observed, so that in principle such an enumeration never comes to an end and hence cannot of itself tell us anything with regard to the finitude or infinity of what it precisely is able to enumerate.[12] But in that case what does the finitude of that which is in principle incapable of being calculated or measured signify? Does it still have anything to do with time, or is it simply concomitant with the fact that everything belonging to the world without exception is dependent upon God? In other words is the finitude of the time that belongs to the world not after all merely another term for that reality which, in other contexts or on other approaches, is called contingency? To express the question in yet another way: time is experienced as a mutual relationship of the constituents of the world to one another precisely so long as we are considering the intrinsic temporality of the individual, and not time as an external factor, the 'space-time' dimension and the measure of time as a starting-point for every understanding of time.[13] Does it have any essential meaning to transpose this relationship from the constituents of the world as a totality to the totality itself, and, as is or seems to be the practice in dogmatic teaching, to express finite time as applicable to the world as a whole?

It seems that material time, that is time as constituted by a temporal interval between two entities, can only exist if between the two lies a temporal process of development in virtue of which they are both connected, and at the same time held apart from one another. How are we to apply time as thus conceived of to the world as such and in its totality? On this showing, then, is the dogmatic teaching saying anything more than precisely that the world consists of realities which have a temporal relationship between one another? But who has ever seriously disputed this? And is this all which the dogmatic teaching is intended to express? Before we go any further in enquiring into the meaning of the dogmatic teaching we must pause to introduce a certain methodological consideration.

In principle it neither can nor should be disputed that a de fide pronouncement can contain implications which only become clear in a confrontation with those secular findings and hypotheses which are arrived [297] at, and objections which are raised, at a later stage, so that then it becomes necessary to maintain the pronouncements against the difficulties that arise in this way. Certainly, therefore, we must be cautious in invoking a certain hermeneutic consideration which is often too hastily applied today, namely the suggestion that at the time when a given dogmatic statement was formulated such and such factors had not yet been realized, had not been conceived of, and could not be taken into account. In other words the dogmatic pronouncement concerned could not have expressed anything about them.[14]

But in the concrete instance with which we are concerned we must, after all, surely lay down the following principle: the dogmatic statement concerning the temporal nature of the world must always, and from the outset, be read and understood in the context in which it is enunciated, in the context of a veritas salutaris – in other words of a saving statement ('evangelium') addressed to men and of an appeal to their free decision ('law') to accept

[12] On the problem of the continuum referred to here cf. H. Weyl, op. cit., pp. 47-90.

[13] For a more searching philosophical discussion of the distinctions in the concept of time indicated here reference may be made to the basic studies in H. Bergson, Essai sur les données immédiates de la conscience (Paris, 1889); E. Husserl, Vorlesungen zur Phänomenologie des inneren Zeibewusstseins (Halle, 1928); M. Heidegger, Sein und Zeit (Halle, 1927).

[14] cf. K. Rahner and K. Lehmann, 'Kerygma und Dogma', Mysterium Salutis I (Einsiedeln, 1965), pp. 622-707, esp. 686-703; P. Schoonenberg (ed.), Die Interpretation des Dogmas (Düsseldorf, 1969).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'irrevocably' the definitive salvation in a definitive exercise of freedom. Only so long as the statement regarding the temporal nature of the world is consistently and strictly read in this context do we escape the following dilemma: either the statement concerned is intended to be one which merely describes a 'phenomenon' of popular experience, but which nevertheless neither can be nor in fact is an object of revelation (the temporality of worldly things as a phenomenon is in fact something different from the temporality of the world) or it is intended to be a statement the meaning of which can only be clarified and authenticated by means of the resources of contemporary natural science with its still unresolved problems, something which, in terms of theological method, would, nevertheless, be impossible to carry out. Thus it appears that the considerations put forward so far with regard to the meaning of the dogmatic pronouncement on the temporal finitude of the world, in virtue of the insoluble difficulties[15] into which they have led us, can justifiably be understood as a demand to consider this general context within which the dogmatic statement itself is to be read, and in the light of which its dogmatically binding meaning is to be determined.

[298]

II

In the light of all this we are now in a position to fix a starting-point (and at the same time to anticipate the conclusion) to state the following: the dogmatic pronouncement regarding the created nature of the world in and with time (= the dogmas of the Fourth Lateran and the First Vatican Councils) is intended to express the following: Man is an element in the world in virtue of the unity of spirit and matter[16] in him, and the factors entailed by this, the resurrection of the flesh and the consummation of the world in the 'new heaven and the new earth'.[17] Now because of this, and in spite of the limitations it implies, the world must be such that man can be that which he is: a being endowed with a freedom to be exercised in time and history which attains to the definitive finality of God in the definitive finality of its own free decision.

In what follows this statement will be developed in two parts: (a) It tells us something about a qualified temporality inherent in man which can be experienced and verified directly from the way in which he lives; (b) secondly it introduces a (discreet) extrapolation of this temporal factor, applying it to the world as a whole.

(a) With regard to the first part of this statement it is of course impossible here to develop at any length either a theological anthropology in general or a theology of history and freedom in particular. Here too we must exclude from the outset the question of whether there is a kind of time which is already in force and being directed irreversibly forward as a necessity of nature even at the sub-human level – especially in organic things (or in virtue of the law of entropy which prevails throughout the cosmos as a whole), in other words whether even independently of man there is a process of change which unfolds in a linear development and can only unfold in this way.[18] For so long as we do not ascribe any false individuality to the various types of organism and, in accordance with this, are cautious in the value we attach to death in their case, it would perhaps be conceivable to interpret the history of living things as a series of expansions and contractions (on the analogy of a pulsating

[15] On the insoluble problems which arise in connection with the concept of time cf. the first antinomy of the pure reason in I. Kant, Critique of Pure Reason (London, 1929).
[16] cf. K. Rahner, 'The Unity of Spirit and Matter in the Christian Understanding of Faith', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 153-177.
[17] cf. K. Rahner, 'The Theological Problems Entailed in the Idea of the "New Earth" ', Theological Investigations VIII (London and New York, 1973), pp. 260-273.
[18] We may compare, e.g. the main principles of thermo-dynamics.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

world),[19] [299] and so to doubt whether the history of living things follows a linear course and to ask ourselves whether the real 'death' in organic matter does not consist in the formation of a new germ or seed, in other words a return to the point of departure. On this view that which we regard as death in this sphere would be only a relatively secondary episode in the transformation of matter.

It will not even be said that this theory (which, by a process of extrapolation, we would then go on to apply to the world as a whole) is the sole possible starting-point for achieving an understanding of the statement regarding the temporal creation of the world. Certainly in terms of theology it would be possible to formulate another and different starting-point.[20] We could for instance take the theology of saving history, the covenant, the Incarnation etc. in this sense. Here, however, we prefer to take as our starting-point the theory we have formulated above, because on the one hand it has the advantage of being closer to the experience of the individual, and on the other the alternative theories which we might use as a starting-point (which are in any case connected with ours, and among themselves) probably do not yield any more help for achieving an understanding of what is meant by the statement that the creation took place in time and had a beginning than that which we can achieve on our theory. Finally it may be observed that by adopting this theory as our starting-point we can bypass the problem of biblical hermeneutics, how in more precise terms we should interpret the 'not yet' sayings of scripture as such (Gen 1:1; 2-4;Ps 90:2; 102:26; Prov 8:22-30; Mt 13:35; 25:34; Lk 11:50; Jn 17:5, 24; Eph 1:4; Heb 4:3), the problem, in other words, of how far we can interpret them as making an objective statement about the finite time of the world by pointing to an empty void in space and time 'prior to' the existence of the world, or how far they present a conceptual pattern for expressing the radical dependence of the world upon God regardless of whether or not it did actually exist 'all along'.

In any case however man experiences himself as a historical being endowed with responsibility and freedom in such a way that he exists in a time the very meaning of which involves a clear and irreversible forward orientation, and which cannot be conceived of as capable of being reversed in the opposite direction without thereby denying the very nature of man as deciding what his final and definitive state is to be. At least through his first free act and through his death man experiences this history of the exercise of his own freedom in time as finite, with definite limits in the past [300] and the future, and this has the effect of ruling out, so far as the personal history of the individual as such is concerned, any 'pre-existence' or any indeterminate prolongation of his life into the future. Here, in a theological consideration, there is no need to examine any more closely the question of how far these data of a theological anthropology are already given or could be discovered even independently of the supernatural order of grace in which man is called to receive God's self-bestowal, and independently also of the divine revelation in which this summons is interpreted. The one point upon which there can be no doubt is that these data belong intrinsically to man's understanding of himself at the Christian and theological level, and that is sufficient here, where we are concerned with the theological interpretation of a dogmatic statement (i.e. that concerning the temporal nature of the world). This man who experiences time as irreversible in this sense, with a beginning and end, within the history of his own freedom is aware of himself as a real element of the world and at the same time, in a manner unique in each particular case, as the totality of the world. In this awareness of his there is a dialectical unity in which the two elements involved are mutually interconnected. In his physical side he experiences himself as a partial element of the world and of the history of nature, and in the radical unity of his nature as constituted by spirit and matter he cannot

[19] cf. W. Büchel, 'Das pulsierende Universum', StdZ 177 (1966), pp. 119-126.
[20] cf. W. Kern, op. cit.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

conceive that his history as a free being, considered as something that takes place in the material world as subject to time, is something enacted, as it were, on a static stage, and something that is brought to an end once the historical person himself and the effects of this history of his make their exit from this world. On a Christian view the history of nature can, in the last analysis, be understood only as an element in the history of the free spirit in its dialogue with God who bestows himself in grace, and hence the material time of the world is to be conceived of as an element in the material time of this history of the free spirit.

All this still does not do much to throw light upon the intrinsic nature of this time that belongs to the world, because in fact, while we should have a right understanding of the real distinction between spirit and matter, the distinction itself cannot be eliminated. But surely what has been achieved here is a general orientation for our understanding of the time factor in the world, which in principle must never be overlooked: this temporal factor must never be interpreted in such a way as to leave no room in it for the time that is intrinsic to the personal spirit with its beginning and end. As has been said, what we are demanding here is not so self-explanatory when we consider that materiality is an element that [301] is intrinsic to the concrete subject of this history of freedom, and is in part affected by it. And this materiality is also an element in the material world which cannot be isolated from the world. A further point is that the subject of freedom considered as a historical process in this sense cannot be interpreted as a mere constitutive element in the world. As 'anima quodammodo omnia' it has a real-onto-logical relationship to the world as a totality, and could not be considered to have achieved its due fulness so long as the fulness of this relationship itself had not yet been achieved, as would be the case if the world itself were conceived of as still in a state of openness and becoming in a time that ran onwards into the indefinite future.

(b) Taking these as our prior assumptions, in the second part of our statement we shall now go on to say that the world and its modes of existence must be conceived of in such a way that they are capable of being the sphere within which precisely this history of the free person in time can take place, and at the same time an intrinsic element in that history. This is a cautious and almost negative assertion: the world does not have to be such that, while still remaining an intrinsic element in this history, it so to say cuts off its temporal span at the beginning and end of it. The positive element in what we are saying about the mode of existence proper to the world, to the extent that it is a real element which is different in relation to the spirit as such, is precisely whether it is possible to make some positive statement about something which is, initially, still completely open. In the last analysis, moreover, this question can actually remain open because what we are concerned with is the veritas salutaris of man in his freedom as a finite historical being, and properly speaking nothing else than this, provided only that we recognize that this truth in itself already involves some statement about the world to which man belongs, while recognizing also that it is only with difficulty that we can arrive at any clear reflection upon these implications contained in the veritas salutaris. But if despite this fact the attempt is to be made, and we are to try to apply the positive content in this negative statement, then we may perhaps say the following: any positive statement about an 'everlasting' world with a limitless range of specifications, is inconceivable from the outset if the statement in question relates to the world precisely as the environment in which a finite mode of freedom exists, and the concomitant conditions of this. For this is not the sort of world with which a finite freedom can be involved. It must be admitted that even when we have said this, it still remains obscure what is meant in positive terms by a negation of this sort ('a world with many, but not limitless, specifications'). But it must [302] be observed that at any rate in the case of an existing world which constitutes the material of finite freedom by the limited number of specifications to which it is open, we do not have to suppose that this world is the product of an infinite number of temporal states following one upon another in a limitless series in time. Hence it is at least superfluous to

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

postulate an endless series of this kind. On this basis a finitude of this present world can be asserted and maintained as at any rate a more intelligible interpretation of the content of the dogma regarding the temporal finitude of the world. Moreover the significance of this can be understood in its implications for the religious fulfilment of human living even though it may not be quite clear to us what finitude and infinity are intended to signify when these two concepts are related solely to the totality of the material time inherent in the world as a single whole.

To express the point in different terms: we can and must positively assert that the time of the world is finite (even when it is not clear what this implies or does not imply) if, and to the extent that, we regard the time belonging to the world as the material for the finite freedom of man as related to the totality of the world. For in that case to postulate an infinitude of the world's time would imply that it was of such a kind that in principle it could not be the material of man's finite freedom in this sense. Now even if we accept that the world's time does in fact constitute one element in the time which creaturely freedom involves in this way, we might still raise the further question of precisely how this world's time is constituted 'in itself' and taken in isolation,[21] that is conceiving of it in abstraction from this connection which it has with man's finite freedom. But surely the reason why it is so difficult to make any statement on this point is that despite all the objectivity we may achieve in our knowledge of the physical world, and despite the fact that we are able to measure the time belonging to this, even this time is in real fact only experienced within the experience of the concrete individual as rational and spiritual, and as a being endowed with freedom even in the act of formulating his theory about the time of the world. In such an act the individual is indeed concerning himself with a quality inherent in objective experience. But at the same time this same quality is inherent also in the subjective fact of the individual himself even though at the same time it does go beyond this. Now in these circumstances it is in principle never possible to isolate this quality completely from the subjective aspects, because the very act of reflecting upon it is itself in turn subject to the same conditions and the [303] quality being reflected upon is inherent in this act itself. It is this, in fact, that gives rise to all the representations of the transcendental phantasy, representations which we can recognize negatively as such, but which we cannot positively eliminate. What the term 'representation' here is intended to stand for is not that which is false, but rather that kind of reality which has both an objective and a subjective side. Now while it does not fall within the purview of the natural sciences to offer a critique of transcendental 'representation' in this sense, still transcendental 'representation' is a factor with which they have to work. And in view of this it can surely be said that whereas in investigating any given temporal element the natural sciences must always seek for that which came before it, the same does not apply to theology (or metaphysics). For these disciplines must assert that time is finite in the sense we have defined. And yet this does not imply any contradiction between the two different approaches. For time is not ipso facto constituted as infinite merely by the fact that any number of material temporal elements which we can discover is in principle capable of continuous further increase. And this in itself is sufficient to justify the statement we have just made.[22]

[21] cf. I. Kant, op. cit.

[22] Without analysing any further here what, on this showing, is the meaning of time as such (on this cf. also what follows) reference may simply be made to the fact that the methods used in the natural sciences are consistently formulated in such a way as to lead to an understanding of the functional connections between individual facts, But the dimension in which these facts are manifested taken as a totality cannot itself in turn be an object of investigation by these same methods of natural science. And since the space-time world considered as a totality is not an object which is empirically discoverable natural science cannot say anything either with regard to the possible infinitude of this totality.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

III

To the problems which we have presented up to this point, and which derive solely from the dogmatic teaching that the world was created in time, certain further considerations must be appended, which are intended to broaden the subject of investigation a little further.

(a) For the theologian it is the time that belongs to saving history that is primary.[23] The time of saving history means the history of personal freedom as engaged in dialogue with the God of grace in his act of self-bestowal at both the individual and the collective levels. When we say [304] that this time is primary we mean that it provides a standard of measurement in the light of which, so far as the theologian is concerned, all other time has to be considered, and that too in such a way that the 'content' of this kind of time also specifies the modality of time as such. Now this statement has constituted the heuristic norm in the considerations we have offered up to this point, and we have been compelled to adopt it by reason of the insoluble difficulties which we encounter in the question of what in more precise terms the dogmatic statement that the creation took place in time really means. Of course it would be possible to adduce further considerations in support of this statement. We might, for example, advert to the question of how, on this showing, we could conceive of the revelation of this dogma in the concrete. And in the course of answering this question we might show that it can be understood as an implication of God's self-bestowal precisely as conceived of in terms of salvation and revelation (and that it cannot be understood in any other sense). For in this self-bestowal of God salvation and revelation, and man's own ultimate understanding of himself, are achieved all in one.

(b) Any extrapolations in which we transfer our conceptions of this kind of time (i.e. the time belonging to saving history) and the special qualities belonging to it to the time in which material events purely as such run their course, can only be undertaken with the greatest caution and with a limited degree of success. This latter point is of course something that we experience and recognize in our everyday lives and work in the field of natural science. But what we establish in this is temporal development and temporal processes as distinct from one another, time as it appears to be and not as it is of its essence. What time is 'in itself' is no more directly ascertainable in this experience than the existence of an existing thing is ipso facto ascertainable in its essence in virtue of the fact that we constantly have to do with existing things. In the same way too we do not, ontologically speaking, ipso facto know what matter is in its essence merely in virtue of the fact that we constantly have to do with material things. But strange though it may appear at first sight, we can draw upon our experience of the spirit (as being in possession of itself) so as to state in negative terms what matter is, namely precisely that kind of being which is not given over to itself (and this negative character is inherent not merely in our knowledge but in matter itself as a specification of this), and in just the same way the only way in which we can determine what physical time is as such is in negative terms and from our knowledge of that time which belongs to the free operation of the spirit. And this negative character, considered as a negative inherent in the time of material [305] being, is precisely that negativity which prevents this time as such from being raised in itself to any definitive and final state and being brought to an end in this. In the light of this we are here once more justified in principle in approaching the matter with the same caution which we have adopted in dealing with the question of whether we ought to postulate a finite and calculable series of states extending backwards into the past beyond physical time (whether considered from the standpoint of physics, philosophy or dogmatic

[23] A bibliography on this point has been compiled by W. Kern, op. cit., n. 40; cf. also the article, 'Zeit III, IV', LTK X (2nd ed., Freiburg, 1965), 1329-1334.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

theology), or whether there is no necessity for this. Just as matter as such is not endowed with self-awareness and freedom, and so not 'in confrontation with' itself so as to be capable of achieving it own definitive consummation, so in the same way physical time is in itself 'negative' in the sense of being incapable of any definitive consummation. Considered as 'potentiality' in this sense it is probably unlimited in either direction, past or present. As such then it does not begin or end at any specific points. The only sense in which any beginning or end can be ascribed to it is in virtue of the fact that it constitutes an element in the time inherent in the history of personal freedom, and to that extent must have a beginning and ending of this kind within this. And surely this phrase 'to that extent' marks the limits beyond which we cannot go.

(c) It must clearly be recognized that exactly the same relationship prevails between a secular and theological understanding of time as between nature in itself and nature as de facto endowed with grace, and between a philosophical and secular self-understanding on the one hand, and revelation and theology on the other. Manifestly time is not a modality which is present in a univocal sense everywhere where anything takes place, but rather a modality[24] which admits of intrinsic variations, and hence is analogously applied to the various realities of which it is predicated.[25] And this in itself is tantamount to saying that in principle, even though for the most part this fact is overlooked, all the problems entailed in correctly defining the relationship between nature and being that has been raised to a supernatural level must necessarily lead us back to the problem of time.

[306] It is no purely abstract or formal interest that prompts us, for example, to raise the question of whether even in a 'status naturae purae' the free person would have been impelled towards an absolute and total decision determining his own final destiny by the same impetus which is inherent in every free act to the extent that it involves a decision regarding the self-offering of God in grace.[26] This instance too serves once again to show how cautious the theologian must be if he seeks to make any statement about natural time as such. For him the concept of natura pura, though peripheral, is a necessary one, yet one which as such can never be applied purely as a positive datum in its own right, because we can never go beyond the limits of an experience raised to a supernatural level. And just as this is true, so in the same way and in the same measure merely secular and natural time (even as this is applicable to personal freedom at the purely natural level) is likewise a peripheral concept. The opinion that man experienced it purely in itself could be an instance of that culpable blindness in which, even in the present order of grace, an attempt is made to understand 'nature' purely as it is in itself. That is one side to the question. On the other hand the following position is of course valid: it must be remembered that grace presupposes nature as the condition distinct from itself which nevertheless makes it possible for it to be itself and to maintain the distinction between itself and nature (even though, so far as our conscious understanding is concerned, it is not possible materially speaking to follow through this distinction completely to the end). And the case is exactly similar when we come to speak of a 'supernatural understanding of time', if we may so express it, and in doing so envisage that time which is achieved in free dialogue with God in his self-bestowal, and only in this. Here too we are presupposing a secular understanding of time and secular time itself

[24] cf. the article mentioned in n. 23, especially 1328 f.
[25] There is no need here for any further extensive metaphysical speculation or for entering into the Heideggerian understanding of time as set forth in Sein und Zeit; for it is also apparent that this is recognized in the theory of relativity, where time is no longer conceived of as an independent dimension. For here the world is understood as a four-dimensional space-time continuum, in which time is dependent upon the changes and developments of the continuum as a whole.
[26] For more precise details on this cf. K. Rahner, 'Erbsünde und Monogenismus' in K. H. Weger, Theologie der Erbsünde: Quaestiones Disputatae 44 (Freiburg, 1970).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

as the condition, distinct from supernatural time, which makes it possible of achievement. Just as grace wills the world to be worldly, and as such to increase, and positively establishes it in its own autonomy, so too the 'time of grace', as a unique kind of time that belongs to God's self-bestowal and derives its own ultimate quality from God's eternity positively wills the existence of a time of this world, i.e. a time that is open to decision, to hope, to the unforeseen, as the sphere for that activity which fashions the possible from the utopian and so time itself.

(d) Perhaps it may be appropriate in this series of improvised theological remarks on time to say something also with regard to the 'eternity' of [307] God.[27] In using this term, the established theology conceives initially of an existence extending without cessation in either direction, backwards and forwards alike, and it then goes on to improve this idea by invoking the Platonist ε1στι μο/νον (as distinct from η]ν, ε1στι και∴ μο/νον), or by the saying added by Boethius: tota simul and the nunc stans. It conceives of eternity, therefore, as the non-temporally-extended possession of existence.

It is therefore initially understood precisely according to the model of 'duratio'. 'In cognitionem aeternitatis oportet nos venire per tempus', says Thomas. And of course in a certain sense all this is obvious and inevitable. But it might perhaps be said: We can best arrive at an understanding of the eternity of God (albeit still always treating of this 'per modum negationis et eminentiae' if we envisage that factor in our own (not simply physical!) time which is experienced in it, and perhaps is only experienced there precisely as it in fact is. For what we are treating of here is the event of God's free bestowal of himself, in which, namely he wills the final consummation of a love that is freely given, and which is prompted by no further reason beyond itself, and does not depend upon any empty possibility prior to itself. It is, after all, in this that man experiences his own 'eternity' as something more than simply a further prolongation of an entity, so that it has an indeterminate extension. And this is the point of departure for understanding the eternity of God per modum negationis et eminentiae.

(e) A brief word on the sort of time which belongs to God himself. Here we have the same theological problem as arises in connection with the 'immutability' of God. The very fact that the problem arises at the same point enables us immediately to understand this. With regard to the immutability, and therefore the non-temporal nature of God, however, Christian theology must not make the question simpler than it in fact is in view of the fact that the Logos became true man, and therefore entered into time. Christian theology must hold firm to the 'immutability 'and 'eternal' timelessness of God 'in themselves'. At the same time, however, it will have to say that God himself, in the otherness of the world, undergoes history, change, and so too time; the time of the world is his own [308] history. As the eternal he does not merely establish time by creating it, but freely assumes it as a specification of his own self. Assumendo tempus creat tempus, as we might say, adapting in this a saying of Augustine's. He thereby causes his own eternity to be the true content of time. He creates his own time in order to impart to it his own eternity as the radical effectiveness of his own love. Temporal becoming is not merely the distinguishing characteristic of that which is different from God, but that which, precisely as different from God in this way, and permanently maintaining itself as different, can become, and has become the distinguishing seal of God himself. Ultimately speaking this is possible because the difference between creaturely time

[27] On this and on the section which follows cf. K. Rahner, 'Theos in the New Testament', Theological Investigations I (London and Baltimore, 1961), pp. 79-148; idem, 'Gott', LTK IV (2nd ed., 1960), 1080-1087; idem, 'Gotteslehre', ibid., 1119-1124; idem, 'Observations on the Doctrine of God in Catholic Dogmatics', Theological Investigations VIII (London and New York, 1971), pp. 127-145. M. Löhrer, 'Dogmatische Bemerkungen zur Frage der Eigenschaften und Verhaltensweisen Gottes', Mysterium Salutis II (Einsiedeln, 1967), pp. 291-315.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and the eternity of God removes time from eternity but not, properly speaking, eternity from time. For if God himself causes the difference he sets that which he has established apart from himself, but not himself apart from that which he has established. Being different from eternity is a predicate of a time that has been established. Eternity as predicated of the God who establishes time implies, however, in the fullest sense, the temporal as an element in itself. And hence, in assuming it as his own time, he can be both he who establishes it and he who assumes what he has established.

(f) It is because time – from the viewpoint of God and man alike – is first and last the modality of the loving freedom exercised in God's act of self-bestowal, that there is the sort of time that is kairos, a unique and privileged time, a 'once and for all now' and an 'only now and not at any other time', a fulness of the times etc. It is because time is ultimately constituted by God's act of self-bestowal on that which is other to himself, in other words because ultimately speaking this is one act and takes place once and for all, that it is precisely not the case that everything is possible at any time, or that time is the empty sphere in which anything and everything can be fitted in and moved from point to point. Time rather is the modality of this one event, such that it is only in the achievement of this that it itself comes to be. The neutral homogeneity of physical time is, insofar as it exists at all, merely the condition making it possible for the freedom of love to manifest itself as free love in the gift of God and its acceptance. For God is the love that is unconditioned, and this physical time constitutes a temporal sphere within which this free love can take place 'here and now' even though it might also have taken place 'there and then'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[309]

14

THEOLOGICAL CONSIDERATIONS CONCERNING THE MOMENT OF DEATH

It is evident that Christian theology recognizes dying and death as one of the basic themes of its own message, and has to proclaim the message of the death of Christ, the death that takes place at the beginning of saving history, the death of man, the first and second deaths, the life of God that overcomes death, and the celebration of the death of Christ in the Church's cult. But even abstracting from this, we must recognize that a new situation has arisen in contemporary thought which has a bearing on this question. It is a situation of radical pluralism among the sciences, one in which the problems, methods, and findings in each particular science are so wide-ranging and so different among themselves that no-one who is not a specialist in the particular science concerned can any longer achieve an overall view of it. In this situation, then, as it exists today, it is quite essential that there should be discussion and dialogue among the sciences themselves, including philosophy and theology, on this question also. They must conduct such a dialogue if the life of the individual and the scientist is not to be reduced to hopelessness, and in fact if the individual science is not itself to suffer as a result of being isolated from the other sciences. The current question of the limits of a doctor's duty to preserve life as it arises in the study of medicine is certainly a question of this kind, which needs to be treated of at the interdisciplinary level. There can be no doubt that this question is of concern not only to the doctor, not only to the jurist, but to the theologian and moralist as well. For the care which needs to be taken in preserving life, and the limits to be attached to this, refer not merely to a procedure carried out solely in the biological sphere as such, but have a significance for man as a whole. Now this is of concern to the theologian also, hence he cannot pass over this question as though it were irrelevant.

Now it can be said with perfect justice that on a question of this kind it is only at the end that the theologian can be given a hearing, because in [310] finding the answer to this question so many biological, medical, and even juridical factors have first to be taken into account, factors in which the theologian is in no sense competent, and which he simply has to take cognizance of as the findings of other sciences. But we can also say that these a posteriori sciences themselves in turn have a priori perspectives and premisses of their own, albeit for the most part unconscious, and also that they have need of principles of this kind in order that from the findings of these departmental sciences norms can be arrived at applicable to human activity as such and considered as a single whole. The philosopher, and the theologian inasmuch as he works as a philosopher, giving the philosophical interpretation of existence a still more radical dimension, may number himself among those who are competent to deal with these prior assumptions, and in view of this it is surely justifiable once more for the theologian to open the discussion. Admittedly in doing so he must be aware that in the question which is here being treated of it is only when his general considerations have been supplemented by contributions from the other sciences and their findings that they can become concrete norms for human action.

From the standpoint from which the theologian views this question of the limits of the doctor's duty to maintain life, the question of precisely when the death of the patient has supervened and how it can be recognized surely takes pride of place even though there may be other questions too which need to be considered from the point of view of morals and theology. Here, however, we shall not be entering into these other questions. For as a matter of principle and in the abstract we can certainly say this much: the doctor can relinquish his efforts only when the individual is dead, and not before. And this remains true even though in

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

hopeless cases where death is inevitable but has not yet supervened, many further questions do arise as to the circumstances in which, and the degree of intensity with which the doctor must still continue to strive to prolong such lives as these, or alternatively at what point he can relinquish this struggle while still doing everything possible for the individual concerned in the way of ordinary care. But abstracting from these cases, and the special problems they raise in the concrete, the axiom we have just mentioned, namely that the doctor should only relinquish his efforts when the patient is dead, seems to be a truism which is self-evident and does not help the doctor in arriving at a moral judgement about his work. But the matter is not so simple as this. For today the question of when someone dies in his human nature is much more difficult to answer than in former times. For the sake of clarity attention must first be drawn to the fact that dying [311] and death (as 'death that has been died') are not simply one and the same, and yet so far as our ultimate understanding is concerned it is only from a knowledge of what death is that we can say what dying is as distinct from illness in general. But this death of which we speak is both the most familiar of everyday occurrences and at the same time that which is dark and mysterious to us. Hence the inevitable and bewildering embarrassment always arises at this point that we have to speak of dying and not of death, and yet at the same time it is impossible to do this without constantly speaking of death at the same time.

Medicine, and above all medical ethics, are faced with a new situation today because of the possibility of transplanting organs, for these are actually transplanted 'alive' from a dead person (and also precisely because of the question of when a doctor should give up positively striving to prolong a human life in a case in which any personal and spiritual life of the individual as human has ceased, or is no longer present, and in which it cannot be restored by any efforts on the part of the doctor). In this situation the problem of the borderline cases arises with quite fresh acuteness, the problem namely of when that human life for which the doctor must positively strive with the application of all his medical skill is still present, and when it is no longer so; in other words when human life as such has ceased, when the process of dying in the human being as such has been terminated by death even though, perhaps, specific organs or combinations of cells still 'survive' and can be maintained 'alive', i.e. capable of functioning either within or without the human organism.

This simple observation alone makes it much more difficult than formerly for the theologian to say when the death of the human being has taken place. Indeed it is not even certain from the outset that the question of where precisely the borderline lies between human life and death can be answered in the same way by biology, medicine, and above all by specifically medical ethics on the one hand and by theology on the other in such a way that these answers can be made formally and materially to coincide. It is of course immediately obvious that in dealing with the question of when in a specific case death has taken place and when it has not yet done so the theologian cannot dispense with the factor of experience at the quite primitive level, any more than he can dispense with the judgement of the biologist and the doctor. Hence in arriving at a concrete judgement in any particular case he is constantly dependent upon these sciences and the developments in them, even though strictly speaking the essentially theological statement of what constitutes human death in [312] general and as such is unaffected by these developments in the sciences we have mentioned.

But conversely the question with which medical ethics is faced of when a human being as human is dead is intrinsically connected with the question of what a human being as such is. And this means that it is a question which the doctor can only answer if he is prepared to go beyond the limits of his own science and to allow philosophical and theological anthropology to have some say in the matter. At the same time this is not to assert either, in any unequivocal sense, that medical ethics can simply take over the philosophical and theological concept of when a human life as such does or does not exist. It cannot take over this concept

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in such a way as to be able to assert that the doctor's duty to strive to maintain a human life ceases ipso facto at that point at which, from a philosophical and theological point of view, such a life appears no longer to be present.

It would even be possible for a case to arise, and that too for the most varied reasons which will not be discussed here, in which the theologian and philosopher might perhaps accept the biologist's view that life in the strictly biological sense was still present even though they themselves believed that they could no longer recognize any specifically human life still remaining. And even in such a case it might very well be that it would be the doctor's duty either positively to extinguish the life that still remained nor to neglect any normal care on its behalf. In such a case in fact he might still have to presume that human life was present, and so that he was obliged to do his utmost to preserve it.

Nowadays in fact the theologian must presumably say that both with regard to the emergence of life at the level of the strictly human, and with regard to the termination of such life there is a question which he cannot answer with any certainty, the question namely of whether the fact that life of this kind manifests itself at the level of human biology ipso facto means that it is certainly, and in all cases, human life in the sense that has a theological relevance and entails moral demands upon man himself, and above all upon the doctor. Certainly the theologian will hold firm to the proposition that specifically human life, which as such is under the protection of certain moral principles, can be present and, in the case of life deriving from human generation must actually be presumed to be present, even in those cases in which no really conscious personal activity is any longer present, or at least can no longer be established. But when he considers specific borderline cases of embryonic development which have miscarried from the first, when he regards the survival of tissues which in some conditions no longer have anything to do with human life in the [313] theological sense, when he bears in mind that in a heart transplantation, which is, at least in principle, morally legitimate, on the one hand the death of the organ donor as such is presumed to have taken place, while at the same time (from the biological standpoint) it is also presumed that the heart continues to be alive, then the present-day theologian will hardly be any longer in a position to assume, as he formerly did, that the axiom applies uniformly to all cases that any life deriving biologically from man is always and invariably human life in the theological sense as well. A further point is that if we take this axiom as our starting-point then it becomes difficult to assign any place to that 'life' which must be ascribed to the sperm and egg-cells even before they have become united. And yet a further relevant factor is that today we are surely once more in a position in which we can give no completely clear answer to the question of the precise point in time at which the fertilized human ovum begins to have a soul.

These then are all problems which the theologian has to bear in mind. Moreover in order to proceed with his theological considerations at all he has to be in a position to assume that from the biological aspect it is at least in principle possible (which does not mean ipso facto that this possibility is made actual) that life is present at the spiritual and personal level. In view of all this then he will surely have to recognize that in those cases in which the biological substrate for life at this level, i.e. (in nonscientific terms) the human brain, is no longer present or has ceased to retain any life, biological life at the specifically human level is not present either, or that it has ceased to be present.

In terms of the principles which provide him with his own starting-point, therefore, the theologian will defend the position that human life as human has been terminated at that point at which the death of the brain has supervened, even though he has to leave it to the biologist and medical scientist to work out the precise criteria for deciding when this takes place. And this means that the theologian will recognize that the process of human dying precisely as human has come to an end also, even though other organs and tissues may 'be alive' or

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'continue to survive' in a biological sense either within the organism as a whole or outside it. I have already said that even when we have defined in anthropological and theological terms the borderline between human and non-human life, or human and non-human death, this still cannot be accounted ipso facto and of itself a sufficient and assured basis for medical ethics in treating of the question of when a doctor can relinquish his efforts to preserve the life entrusted to him with his medical skill, and the further question of [314] what means he should use, whether normal or exceptional ones, in carrying out this task of his. It is perfectly possible, as we have already said, that a doctor's idea of the life that is entrusted to him as a doctor may not coincide with the theological and anthropological concept of human life. Indeed it may not even be desirable that the two ideas should be made to coincide. But this problem, together with its deontological implications, cannot be treated of any further here.

We have established, then, that both as conceived of in itself and in its implications for medical ethics the life which the doctor strives to preserve from dying is not simply to be identified with that specifically human life which is of immediate concern to the theologian, and which he takes as axiomatic in his researches. At the same time, however, the two concepts of life here, the medical and the theological ones, are intrinsically interconnected. For in the last analysis the obligations which arise from, and the value to be attached to the work of the doctor derive from the fact that it is man as such, and not merely some kind of biological organism, that is the object of his concern. Hence, while maintaining the provisos which we have already indicated so far as medical ethics are concerned, we should still say not only that the struggle waged by the doctor against death derives its ultimate value and its moral necessity from the fact that it is the life of man as such – in other words the life of a person with a spiritual mode of existence that is being treated of but also that precisely because of this this struggle and the moral obligation to maintain it also have intrinsic limits of their own. Even if for want of time and the necessary competence in the field, we cannot here embark upon an investigation of the difficult cases involved (although this might perhaps be of great interest primarily for the doctor in his work in the concrete), still we may conclude that the point at which the doctor may willingly concede victory in his struggle against death is determined by the specifically human factor involved in living and dying.

What we mean is this: as a medical scientist, a biologist, and one who is governed by the obligations of medical ethics in the most direct sense, the doctor will certainly be seeking only to prolong life and the struggle against death with all the means at his disposal. And from this point of view he can only feel death as a terrible defeat which is so much the contrary of what he wills that he feels it almost shameful to be forced to concede victory to it. Even so, however, the patient with whom he has to deal as a man and a doctor is a human being, one whose life is specifically human, i.e. this life constitutes a personal history which of its own intrinsic nature seeks its own consummation. The intrinsic nature of this [315] history is such that it is never for one moment intended to be prolonged indefinitely into an indeterminate future. Rather it has a definite shape such that of itself it demands to be rounded off and to achieve a consummation which goes far beyond any mere state of further prolongation.

Of course prior to the moment of death itself it is never possible as a matter of empirical human experience to state unambiguously the precise point at which a given life achieves its intrinsic consummation in death even though, from the theological point of view, it must be stated that it is possible for a specifically human history of this sort already to have achieved its intrinsic consummation even before the possibilities of prolonging life at the biological level have been exhausted. To that extent the doctor must certainly continue to strive right to the very last to prolong life in his sense of the term. But what does this phrase 'right to the very last' imply? From the viewpoint which we have just achieved we shall, after all, be in a position to begin by stating the following: When a doctor has done all that is in his power and still a dying man has finally died, then precisely as a man the doctor is not simply one who has suffered a catastrophic and meaningless defeat, but rather one who can willingly suffer the sick person to die, one therefore who has not failed to fulfil his task but on the contrary has effectively completed it. For in fact he has provided his fellow man with that span of life in the biological sense within which his specifically human life considered as the history of a free person has in fact been able to achieve its consummation. He has provided him with a span of biological life in this sense which was never for one moment intended to, or sought to be extended into the unforeseeable future. And this remains true even though it is at most only very approximately that we can state prior to death (in all cases except the sort of death that results from sheer old age) precisely how far this span is meant to be extended in order to be able to constitute the sphere for a personal history of this kind advancing towards a consummation which it demands intrinsically and of its very nature.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In the light of these considerations we may after all suppose, without entering into individual cases or being superfluous, that a doctor who is struggling to avert death is justified in adopting two rather different attitudes towards the life which he is attempting to save. There is the kind of life which at least to all appearances offers no real basis for a truly personal kind of living, and his attitude to this will be rather different from his attitude to a life which will still be lived at the fully personal level, or which can at least be restored to provide once more a possible basis for such personal living. Certainly, even before death, the doctor may feel [316] more willing to let the former kind of life be terminated than the latter.

Perhaps this may serve as some guide for drawing a certain distinction within the general attitude which the doctor ought to take towards the death of an individual, a distinction which is all too often forced upon the doctor in the difficult situations in which he often has to exercise his medical skill. For all too often he is quite unable to escape from the responsibility of having to choose which of several sick or dying individuals he should concentrate upon, devoting his utmost efforts and resources as a doctor to saving him before the rest.

More than all the rest of us doctors find themselves again and again having to stand beside the death-bed engaged in the struggle against death. Their will is to save life, and when death has proved too much for them their task is ended. All that we can still ask of them is at most whether what is lying there really is a dead man. It might appear that their concern is with life alone, and that they have nothing to do with death. But as men, when faced with the dying in this way, they must inevitably be reminded of the approach of their own fate. They may suppress, but cannot avoid, the question of what really happens at this moment when a man dies, when as human he becomes subject to death, or better: they cannot avoid asking what happens in their own death, in ‘my particular death’ which is slowly and inexorably advancing upon us. And the more human a doctor is (for it is only as human that he brings his medical activity and his medical ethos to their due fulness), the more the specifically human question of what death is becomes a question for the doctor himself, the question that the doctor asks as he gazes after the man to whom he has devoted his care. For there the doctor must see the anticipation of his own death, he who lives as a helper in the midst of men, none of whom can escape the destiny of having to die. The man in the doctor can perhaps attempt to suppress this question. He can attempt to answer it in an epicurean sense, by saying that there is no such question, since it is no question for us so long as we are alive, and no question for the dead man seeing that he is no longer there. The man in the doctor can, perhaps, respond to this question with a helpless shrug of his shoulders. He can endure his own helplessness in humility and with a secret trust in the fact that a question that is faced up to, not suppressed and not run away from, conceals within its depths its own answer, even though we may not have raised it from these depths of our own existence to the surface level of our conscious awareness and so expressed it in words. At least the question ought to be present in this sense in the mind of every sincere man. In this [317] sense at least it can and must be endured by every man. In this sense at least there can be no escaping from this question in all its inexorability. It still arises even when we resolve that it should not arise at all, or that it is unanswerable. It is clear even though we do not commit ourselves to answering it that to try to answer it on the basis of biology alone would ipso facto and from the outset be a failure to recognize the question itself.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

For the point of the question is the death of man, man who is alive not merely at the level of the material and the biological, but on the plane of self-awareness, personhood, freedom, responsibility, love and faithfulness; man whose mode of existence is such that it is charged with the responsibility of his self-awareness and his freedom. The question of what constitutes the consummation of a personal history at this level is still not answered even when on the one hand we have established that biological life comes to an end, and on the other hand are not prepared on these grounds alone to find an optimistic and over-facile answer to the question by adopting a conceptual image of man as consisting of two parts, each existing independently of the other. On this conception, then, prior to the biological death the two parts would have been adventitiously combined while after it the 'immortal soul' would continue on ultimately and alone in an indefinite prolongation of its existence. Even if we do not produce an over-facile answer of this kind to the question of human death, it still remains true that in any case it is not ipso facto answered once we have established the termination of life at the biological level. Such an answer would be nothing else than an illegitimate overstepping of the limits of a materialist biology which is quite incapable of including within its purview man at the specifically human level, and hence too is incapable of stating in any adequate way what constitutes the consummation of the personal history of a man as such. The question is there. This question has to be endured, and this question cannot be answered solely in biological terms. Hence too it goes beyond the competence of a doctor to answer it simply as an exponent of medical science.

But how to answer it? As I have already indicated above, even a theologian who in all modesty and diffidence hazards an answer to this question can take cognizance of the fact that a man, through no fault of his own, stands at one specific point in his own personal history as a human individual endowed with spiritual faculties at which he is not yet in a position personally to realize the answer to the ultimate questions of life, even though in the absolute such an answer does exist. Instead of realizing the answer straightway at this point then, he is compelled to hold out, in an attitude of questioning openness, and hope in silence and patience for [318] a future light to come to him. Hence the theologian too can, in all patience, freely credit the honest seeker with an attitude of perseverance and hope, as in the concrete conditions of his personal existence he endures the question of what the true nature of death really is.

At the same time, however, the Christian and the theologian may offer to the individual concerned that interpretation of the nature and meaning of death which pertains to the faith. He can do this by asking him whether this answer does not strike a chord in him, appealing to a secret and, as it were, anonymous awareness at the depths of his being with regard to human existence in general and, as a part of this, the ultimate meaning of death. As his mind moves, then, somewhere between this silent and basic understanding of existence on the one hand and the word of God on the other, can he not discover that courage, that spirit of freedom and happiness, which will enable him to make his own this understanding of death which faith supplies, to join with all those who, with their gaze fixed wholly upon the crucified one, upon Jesus Christ, freely commit themselves to death as the gateway to God and eternal life? The message of Christianity does not in fact contain any rationalist 'explanation' of death. We can only really understand what is stated to be the teaching of Christianity with regard to death when we read it in the context of what the faith declares with regard to God. Now this statement about God represents precisely the ultimate that can be said before falling into silence. It is a statement about the inconceivable mystery that we call God, and that is beyond our apprehension, that never at any stage constitutes a fixed landmark such as we can assign to a specific place in the calculations we apply to our own lives. Yet at the same time it is equally a statement which promises this same God of mystery as the fulfilment of these lives of ours through forgiveness and the imparting of his own divine nature to us. In terms of the message of Christianity, therefore, the word 'death' does not stand for a phenomenon of this world which can be used and manipulated in combination with all the other factors which we recognize and understand so that it has a specific place in the total system of co-ordinates which we build up for ourselves from our human apprehensions. Rather the death of man is the moment at which the whole of his history as a free being, now consummated and completed, is brought into immediate confrontation with the mystery of God, encountering this either as its consummate blessing or as judgement. And hence death is as incomprehensible as God himself. It affects man as one and whole. For we of today find it even less possible than those of former times to reduce man either to spirit or to matter. Nor can we conceive of him as a union of both these [319] principles in such a way that the destruction of this unity entails no further difficulty either in reality or in our own minds. The death of man consists in the immediate confrontation of man, together with the whole of his history as a free person now consummated and complete, with the absolute mystery, with God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We may call this confrontation the continuing life of the immortal soul in order to express the fact that man and his personal history are something more even in the inception of this, and a fortiori at its end, than a mere biological process in space and time such that it fades away at either end of the span allotted to it into the anonymity of the merely physical. This same confrontation of man's existence as consummated and complete with God can also be called the 'resurrection of the flesh' in order to express the fact that it is the one whole man who is brought before God, though this is not to say that the physical side of his consummation before God consists in a return to the sort of 'bios' which belongs to the dimension of space and time with the incessant process of change extending indefinitely into the future which is characteristic of this. Whichever formulation we adopt, the truth we are pointing to is always the fact that death brings man into the presence of God, God who does not permit the personal history of man as rounded off and completed to fall into nothingness, God to whom man has to answer as to how he has used his freedom, whether he has used it to love his neighbour and God himself for he cannot escape from being called to account in this way by taking refuge in a mere cessation of existence from which he could no longer be recalled. Now if death is that which brings man as one and whole face to face with God in this way, then it is not surprising that once a man has undergone death, neither the death itself nor its effects are discoverable within the sphere of that which we can ascertain empirically, the sphere in which we lead our earthly lives as subject to space and time, for obviously we can never encounter God as one particular element within this sphere.

Death, then, is the consummation of a man's history as a free person, that in which this history breaks through into the absolute future which is its goal, and in which God as the ultimate, original, and infinite all, by whom all reality is upheld, is encountered either as judgement or as man's blessed consummation. Now if this is true then death is that towards which the will of the free person tends at its deepest and most ultimate, because this free person must seek the end of that which merely prolongs itself in time in order to achieve his consummation. It is only on the surface of our awareness that we actually see death. But at the very roots of our existence we hunger for the end of that which is unconsummated in [320] order that consummation may be achieved. If anyone were to tell us that the state we had lived in up to now would simply continue on into eternity, in that self-same moment we would have to recognize ourselves as damned. For in that case each successive transitory moment of our lives would be divested of its own special value, a value which consists in the fact that these moments in our temporal existence provide the possibility for us to take a decision that is irrevocable. For it is the exercise of our freedom in these particular moments that gives birth to that which will remain and endure.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Inherent in the history of any man as personal and human, then, there is an ultimate and deepest tendency of the will to achieve its consummation in death. And in the light of this the doctor who stands at the death bed is placed in a situation that is unique. As a doctor he is bound to preserve life at the biological level and the tendency inherent in this to 'prolong itself'. Yet as man he is no less bound by the ultimate will to achieve the end, the consummation, that will which says 'no' to the fate to which Ahasuerus was condemned, the fate of not being allowed to die. This tension is inherent in the very life of a doctor, and it must be maintained and endured without any short-sighted surrender to one side or the other. It is a tension that underlies many of the concrete questions which a doctor has to face as part of his responsibility as a doctor when he stands at the bed of a dying man.

A doctor should take effective cognizance of the fact that what constitutes the normal circumstances of his everyday life, namely having to do with death, is also a central factor in the Christian faith, that faith which is either his own or at least constitutes a factor in the situation of human living and ideas in which he lives, whether he is a Christian or not. For while Christianity does indeed avow its certainty of eternal life it certainly does not look askance at any kind of life, or at the attempts that are made to cause it to flourish happily, to maintain it as vigorously as possible, and to defend it to the utmost from the dangers that threaten it. But this Christianity consists precisely in a professed belief in the Cross, in other words, as we might say, a belief in the Death of him whom we Christians call our Lord.

In the case of one man, the first of all, we are bold enough to believe that he was not merely made subject to death, not merely swallowed up by the absurdity of existence. Rather he himself died. He made death his own act. He himself assumes that which is beyond all human conception and control, and himself enacts what has to be suffered. This first one, whom we seek to follow in death, is Jesus. He died as we shall die: in that [321] darkness into which he uttered that groan of his, 'My God, my God why hast thou forsaken me?'. In his death everything which makes death terrible took place, and that which death entails was truly suffered: the agony of the body, the brutal injustice which was an additional element in his case, the hatred of his enemies and their mocking self-assurance, the failure of his life-work, the betrayal of his friends, and over and above all that is terrible in death precisely that sense of futility which death entails wherever it is died amid the mourning of the dying man's fellows who cannot help him, the struggle for breath and all the pain from which no-one returns, and all the sense of being powerless to do any more in which he ceases to be heroic.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[322]

VOLUME 11

LIST OF SOURCES

PLURALISM IN THEOLOGY AND THE UNITY OF THE CREED IN THE CHURCH
Lecture given on the 26 April 1969 at the invitation of the Hogeschool für Theologie en Pastoraat in Heerlen/Holland. Published in Concilium 5 (1969), pp. 462-471.

ON THE THEOLOGY OF THE ECUMENICAL DISCUSSION
Delivered as a lecture to the Theological Faculties of Copenhagen (21 March 1968), Lund (24 March 1968), Oslo (27 March 1968), Uppsala (29 March 1968), Helsinki (1 April 1968), Abu Turku (3April 1968).
Published in the Festschrift zum 65 Gehurtstag von Bischof Hermann Volk: Martyria - Leiturgia - Diakonia (edited by O. Semmelroth, R. Huabst, and K. Rahner (Mainz, 1968)), pp. 163-199; 'Om den økumeniske samtales teologi', Lumen 12 (1969), pp. 1-39.

REFLECTIONS ON METHODOLOGY IN THEOLOGY
A series of lectures delivered between the 18 and 22 August 1969 at an International Symposium of Theologians at Montreal. Hitherto unpublished.

THE NEW CLAIMS WHICH PASTORAL THEOLOGY MAKES UPON THEOLOGY AS A WHOLE
First published in Gregorianum 50 (Rome, 1969), pp. 617-638.

THE FUTURE OF THEOLOGY
Delivered as a broadcast on the 17 December 1968 on the Bavarian Radio in the series entitled Abschied von Trient; published in J. Bielmeier, ed., Abschied von Trient. Theologie am Ende des kirchlichen Mittelalters (Regensburg, 1969), pp. 121-130.
[323]
THE EXPERIENCE OF GOD TODAY
Given as a lecture in the context of discussions on the 'Theological Academy' at Cologne (16 October 1969), Essen (17 October 1969), Koblenz (22 October 1969), Frankfurt (23 October 1969) and Berlin (31 October 1969).
Published in Theologische Akademie VII, edited by O. Semmelroth and K. Rahner (Frankfurt, 1970).

THEOLOGICAL CONSIDERATIONS ON SECULARIZATION AND ATHEISM
A lecture at the Conference of the Secretariat for Non-Believers at Vienna on 10 September 1968, to the Theological Faculty of the University of Budapest on 19 September 1969, and at Prague on a April 1969 to the Professors of Theology of the CSSR.
Published in Bollettino di Informatione (Secretariatus pro non-credentibus) III/4 (Rome, 1968), pp. 18-20.

THE POSITION OF CHRISTOLOGY IN THE CHURCH BETWEEN EXEGESIS AND DOGMATICS
Lecture given to the Theological Academy of Berlin in the context of a weekend Conference 4-5 May 1968.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CHRISTOLOGY IN THE SETTING OF MODERN MAN'S UNDERSTANDING OF HIMSELF AND OF HIS WORLD
Unpublished hitherto.

REFLECTIONS ON THE PROBLEMS INVOLVED IN DEVISING A SHORT FORMULA OF THE FAITH
First published in Diakonia/Der Seelsorger 1 (1970), pp. 4-30

THE SIN OF ADAM
A lecture given at the twenty-eighth Conference of the Ecumenical Study Group of Protestant and Catholic Theologians from 13 to 17 March 1968 at Paderborn.
[324]
ON THE ENCYCLICAL 'HUMANAE VITAE'
First published in Stimmen der Zeit 182 (1968), pp. 193-210. It also appeared (sometimes only in excerpts) in the following publications: F. Oertel ed., Erstes Echo auf Humanae Vitae (Essen, 1968), pp. 25-29; F. Böckle, C. Holstein edd., Die Enzyklika in der Diskussion. Eine orientierende Dokumentation zu Humanae vitae (Einsiedeln, 1968), pp. 57-63; Die Welt (Hamburg) No. 198 (1968) (of 25 August 1968), p. 8; 'Zur Enzyklika "Humanae vitae", Ehe in Gewissensfreiheit, edited by Albert Görres (Mainz, 1969), pp. 51-71.
Translations appeared in the following languages: Italian, B. Häring and K. Rahner, Riflessioni sull' enciclica "Humanae vitae" (Rome, 2nd ed., 1968) Portuguese, 'Regulaçao dos nascimentos e obediência ao Magistério da Igreja', Mariam (Porto) 2 (1968), pp. 10-12, 93-97; English, 'Rahner on the Encyclical "Humanae Vitae"', The National Catholic Reporter (Kansas City) 4 (1968), No. 46 (18 September 1968), pp. 6-7; 'On the Encyclical "Humanae vitae"', Catholic Mind LXVI (New York, 1968), pp. 28-45; French, 'A propos de l'encyclique "Humanae vitae"' = Foi vivante 38 (Brussels, 1968); 'A propos de l'encyclique "Humanae vitae" (in collaboration with Cardinal Renard and B. Häring) = Le point (Paris, 1969), pp. 11-54; Spanish, Reflexiones en torno a la Humanae vitae (Madrid, 1968); Dutch, 'Naar aanleiding van de encyckliek "Humanae vitae"', Streven (Amsterdam) 22 (1968), pp. 1, 5-23.

THEOLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS ON THE CONCEPT OF TIME
Given as a lecture at the Conference of the Görres-Gesellschaft on the theme, 'Modes of Temporality' from 15 to 20 September 1967 at Feldafing.

THEOLOGICAL CONSIDERATIONS ON THE MOMENT OF DEATH
Lectures given at the twenty-second Congress of Austrian Doctors of the 'Van-Swieten' Society on it November 1968 at Vienna, and on the occasion of the tenth anniversary of the Society of the Promoters of the Westphalian Wilhelms-University in Munster on 29 November 1968 at Munster.
Previous publications (of excerpts) Jahresschrift 1968 der Gesellschaft zur Förderung der Westfälischen Wilhelms-Universität in Münster (edited [325] by the Society) (Munster, 1968), pp. 67-70; Arzt und Christ 15 (Salzburg, 1969), pp. 24-32.

In the above list of sources not all the publications in German have been recorded. Radio broadcasts are adduced only if the article concerned was specially written for such broadcasts. Only the publication in which they initially appeared is adduced, whether this was in German or in a foreign language.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[1]

PART ONE

Ecclesiology

[3]

1

THE TEACHING OFFICE OF THE CHURCH IN THE PRESENT-DAY CRISIS OF AUTHORITY

A theological consideration of the Church's office to teach or magisterium[1] and the authority which, on a Catholic understanding of the Church, is to be attached to this, is not perhaps in any direct sense a suitable theme for ecumenical discussion or in controversial theology. And in fact our present consideration will indeed, to a large extent, take the form of a quaestio disputata internal to the Catholic body. But surely it is permissible to present even a consideration of this kind in the present context. First because even in a Protestant Church, despite all differences of opinion between Protestant and Catholic Christians precisely on the question of ecclesiastical authority, the subject of an official function to teach cannot altogether be evaded from the outset, as is shown, for instance, from the fact that instructional techniques have been raised as an issue for discussion.[2] Second because any further development in the theology of the Church's official teaching function, even within the Catholic body and on the basis of specifically Catholic principles may perhaps be able to bring us nearer to an ecumenical agreement. I propose, therefore, to put forward certain considerations concerning the authority of the Church's magisterium on a Catholic understanding of the Church. It is obvious that in view of the brevity of the time available these considerations will once more be very fragmentary in character, and our choice of subject-matter must necessarily appear somewhat arbitrary. Our aim, therefore, in these considerations of ours is not once again to present, or even to justify, the universal Catholic doctrine with regard to the official teaching function of the Church as this has once more been set [4] forth in the Second Vatican Council (and, moreover, abstracting from the question of the collegiality of those in whom this official teaching function is vested, without any notable advances by comparison with the First Vatican Council). Our present aim is rather to lay bare certain problems inherent in this doctrine which have not been reflected upon, and so to provide a stimulus for a further development of this doctrine which may then perhaps even have better prospects of success in coping with the present-day crisis which threatens the teaching authority of the Church.

Let us begin by re-stating in contemporary terms the formal model which is customarily used in presentations of the teaching authority of the Church's official representatives. The following statement may perhaps achieve this:

As the absolute teacher and the prophet par excellence Jesus Christ delivered to the apostles a quite specific body of teaching. In doing so he also equipped these apostles with a [1] Cf. also the article under this heading in LTK VI (2nd ed. 1961), 884-890, and 'Magisterium' Sacramentum Mundi 3 (New York and London, 1969), pp. 351-358.

[2] A survey and summary on this point is to be found in H. Hohlbein and W. Maurer, 'Lehrzuchtverfahren', RGG IV (3rd ed., 1960), 281-286.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

quite specific formal authority deriving from himself and supplementary to the actual content of this doctrinal message which he handed down to them. It equips the apostles and authorises them to stand before their fellow men and claim the allegiance of their faith for the content of their message. It also equips them to preserve that message itself undistorted, to interpret it, and to explicitate it. The assistance of the Spirit of Christ promised to them guarantees that they shall make a right use of this formal authority to teach, and their use of it is 'infallibly' preserved from error in those cases in which the exercise of this teaching authority is accompanied by a claim to an absolute assent of faith on the part of those to whom their message is addressed, in other words in those cases in which the fulness of their authority is brought to bear. This teaching authority of the apostles has been handed down to the college of bishops under the pope.

This absolute authority can be exercised both in the ordinary proclamation of Christian doctrine and also in an act of the 'extraordinary magisterium', i.e. in the form of a definition on the part of a Council or of the pope. However in very many cases in which the authoritative magisterium is exercised it is not brought to bear with this absolute force, and the obligation which it lays upon the faithful is not the assent of their faith properly so called, but merely a qualified assent, for in such exercises of the official teaching authority of the Church the doctrine that is stated, though authentic, is not in itself irreformable. Rather it is a doctrine that is formulated as conscientiously as possible by the teaching authority to protect the essential and proper substance of the faith.

With the proviso that in the following considerations this conceptual [5] model will have to be slightly expanded or more precisely defined in this or that respect, I believe that the terms in which I have just presented this conceptual model do justice to the essential tenor of the established ecclesiology of the Church with regard to her own teaching office.[3] But the very fact that it has been stated in such formal and abstract terms means that very much in it still remains unclarified and obscure. And it is with these elements that we shall be concerned in what follows. In this we are abstracting altogether from the questions (in themselves fundamental) of whether, how, and how far this conception of the teaching authority attached to the office of bishop can be justified on the basis of scripture as a whole, and we are abstracting even more from the still more difficult question of how, and to what extent a doctrinal authority of this kind can be traced back to a resolve of the pre-Easter Jesus himself. Here we are considering only the problems inherent in this conceptual model.

In considering this conceptual model of what is meant by the teaching authority of the official Church the first point that we notice is the absence of any reference to the Church as such. To state the matter more precisely: the Church as 'hearing' and believing is merely that which is addressed, that to which this authority is directed. Now in the Second Vatican Council statements are to be found at various points (though no specific presentation of these can be undertaken here) in which an attempt has been made to overcome this one-sided state of affairs in which the official teachers do all the speaking, and their point of view alone is expressed, while the Church of the faithful listening to them is in the position merely of an addressee obediently accepting the Church's teaching authority as vested in her bishops. The fact that sporadic attempts were made to overcome this situation in the Second Vatican Council should be neither doubted nor under-estimated, But I believe that initiatives of this kind have, after all, remained precisely at the level of initiatives and no more, and have [3] The tendency referred to here is to be discerned in all the classical treatises of theology. Cf. e.g. PSJ I (Madrid, 4th ed., 1958), 503-993, where the authority of the official Church is treated of almost to the exclusion of all else.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

therefore had hardly any practical effect in the life of the Church and in the manner in which her teaching is presented and listened to.[4]

The first point to bear in mind is that on any showing the apostles can [6] only be the bearers of a teaching authority of this kind to the extent that they themselves are believers and hearers. This is not merely because the unbeliever could have no reason and no motive for laying claim to or applying any such formal authority, nor merely because in fact in our case (in other cases it might conceivably be different) the exercise of such authority necessarily claims the allegiance of faith from the official bearers of this teaching authority themselves. This means that any officially appointed teacher who refused the allegiance of his faith would thereby himself be denying his own authority in the very act of laying claim to it. For this authority vested in him is at the same time an element in his own message. When an apostle preaches he bears witness precisely to his experience of Jesus' Resurrection, and it is quite impossible to separate this experience from his own faith in the Resurrection of Jesus.

Furthermore he always preaches as a member of a community of believers which asserts its claims openly in virtue of the fact that it also presents itself as the genuine continuation and perfection of the Old Testament community which was constituted by faith in the promises of God, those promises which have been fulfilled in Jesus. The apostolic preaching was always that of a member of the Old Testament community of the faith. It assumed as its starting-point the faith and the professed creed of Israel. It used this as the basis for its argument. In other words it proceeded from the faith of a Church which did not presuppose as infallible any teaching office which was institutional in the proper sense of the term. The preaching of the individual apostle, therefore, is not merely addressed to the believing community, but also proceeds from it. It bears witness to a faith which has already been brought into being by God alone in Jesus Christ, and it is only on this basis (this is a point which we shall have to consider more fully at a later stage) that it can also justify its own formal authority.[5]

The fact that the authority of the officially appointed teachers in the Church derives from the Church herself as a whole becomes still clearer [7] when we consider the bearers of this authority in post-apostolic times. We are making it impossible for ourselves to achieve any insight into this truth that the authority of the official teachers in the Church derives from the Church as a whole if we suppose that we can conceive of a derived authority of this kind merely as corresponding to a popular and democratic form of government. On this interpretation the 'people' of the Church in this sense would be the juridical subject of power extending the authority which it possesses as such to certain specific individuals as a decision of the people's own will. But to reject the conceptual model of a 'democracy' precisely of this sort is far from making it completely impossible to conceive of any way in which the authority of the Church can be derived from the believing Church as a whole. On any fully Catholic understanding of the Church the believing Church is not merely constituted as such

[4] In this connection chapters II and IV of the Constitution 'Lumen Gentium' are significant. Here an infallibility of faith is attributed to the people of God as a whole, as also to the people of the Church as the recipients of teaching in particular. The Council itself has not attempted to carry this further by relating what it says in these chapters to the statements in chapter III, where it is the hierarchical structure of the Church that is being dealt with.

[5] This connection is in fact one which was clearly recognized in the ancient Church as well. On this cf. the extremely instructive study by G. Ludwig, Die Primatsworte Mt 16:18-19 in der altkirchlichen Exegese (Munster, 1952), and also K. Adam, 'Cyprians Kommentar zu Mt 16:18', Gesammelte Aufsätze (Augsburg, 1936), pp. 80-123; M. Lods, 'Le "Tu es Petrus" dans l'exégèse patristique', Eglise et Théologie 21/62 (1958), pp. 15-34; A. M. La Bonnardière, 'Tu es Petrus. La péricope Mt. 16:13-23 dans l'oeuvre de Saint Augustin', Irénikon 34 (1961), pp. 451-499. And in addition to these: B. Botte, H. Marot etc. (edd.), Das Konzil und die Konzile (Stuttgart, 1962); Y. Congar, ed., L'Épiscopat et l'Église universelle, Unam Sanctam 39 (Paris, 1962); idem, L'Ecclésiologie du Haut Moyen Age (Paris, 1968), pp. 138 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

by the factor of teaching authority. On the contrary for authority of this sort to be able to exist at all a believing Church has already to be in existence as its necessary prior condition.[6]

The basic principles leading to this insight are already to be found in the established ecclesiology of the seminaries. Thus for instance even in the First Vatican Council the nature and extent of the pope's authority to teach, especially with regard to its 'infallibility', are determined by the standards of the teaching authority actually exercised in the Church in general (DS 3074). But since there cannot be several supreme teaching authorities in the Church this relationship which the pope's authority to teach bears to that of the Church in general is not only a relationship of mere equality between two entities which are really distinct. Rather the pope's authority to teach them in a real sense be derived, at least from the active teaching authority of the Church as a whole. The truth that we are seeking to express in this way is simply that the derivation of an authority from Christ need not from the outset be incompatible with a derivation of this same authority from the Church. Rather both kinds of derivation can constitute two sides of a single objective situation, because ultimately speaking the derivation of a specific office from Christ is nothing else than an element in the derivation of the Church as a whole from Christ.[7]

[8] In the Second Vatican Council too (Lumen Gentium No. 25) the teaching authority of the pope and bishops is regarded as deriving univocally from Christ and aimed at the Church rather than deriving from it. In this way it is emphasized that it is not primarily in virtue of the agreement of the Church that the decisions of the popes and bishops are unassailable. At the same time, however, it is also emphasized that in any ex cathedra definition the pope is acting not as a private individual, but as the supreme teacher of the universal Church. His charism is the charism of the infallibility of the Church herself, and not one that is separate from this. And it is emphasized further that it is the effective power of the one Spirit of the Church as a whole that ensures that the Church herself can never fail to agree to such decisions. It is further stated in Dei Verbum No. 8 that the deposit of faith to which the teaching office is bound includes all 'that she herself is, all that she believes'. This, then, constitutes a further pointer to the fact that the teaching office is not only actively orientated towards the Church with a content of faith which she initially possesses on her own account, but is at the same time derived from this believing Church herself. In a true sense all this is, in fact, obvious. Only in this particular context, in which we are speaking of the teaching office, it is generally overlooked. In this connection the teaching office appears simply as deriving from God and Christ alone, and as consisting in the possession of the deposit of faith and of a formal ratification enabling it to bear an authoritative witness to the content of this faith. The situation is of course such that in the concrete the bearers of this deposit of faith and the teaching authority that goes with it are necessarily men who as simple believers have already received this faith from the Church and from her life as these exist in the concrete – from the concrete Church, therefore, who in her faith, in the history of her faith, and the development of her dogma, is not simply the passive and obedient object of a teaching authority in the Church. The de facto bearers of the teaching office are, at least in respect of the content of their teaching, dependent upon a Church who is not constituted simply by the one-sided functions of the official authorities in the Church. This faith, this history of faith, this development of dogma on which the teaching office depends in the concrete, are factors to which all the members of the Church contribute, each in his own way, by their lives, the confession of their faith, their prayers, their concrete decisions, the theology which they work

[6] The author has pointed out a connection which is – mutatis mutandis – similar in other contexts. Cf. K. Rahner and J. Ratzinger, Revelation and Tradition, Quaestiones Disputatae 17 (Freiburg, 1966). See also H. Fries, 'Lehramt als Dienst am Glauben', Catholica 23 (1969), pp. 154-186.

[7] On this cf. the extremely enlightening studies on the history of dogma in O. Rousseau, J. J. von Allmen et al. (edd.), L'infaillibilité de l'Eglise, Collection Irénikon (Chevetogne, 1963), esp. pp. 147 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

out for themselves, and their activities in all this are very far from being confined merely to putting into practice truths and norms deriving from the teaching office itself.[8]

[9] But the doctrinal authority attached to the teaching office has a derivation from the Church as a whole and in herself not merely in respect of the content of what is proclaimed, or in virtue of the fact that those who do proclaim it are always first and foremost themselves believers involved in the single developing history of faith in the Church as a whole. More than this the actual power to teach, the authenticity and effectiveness ('infallibility') of the teaching have a certain derivation from the Church herself as a whole. We do not need to conceive of the reality and effectiveness of this authority, which must in fact be something more than a mere formal right to teach as constituted by a continually renewed intervention on God's part from without taking place in a miraculous manner in the course of the Church's history. For otherwise saving history and revelation history as abiding factors in the Church would not in fact constitute the Church's history itself, but would merely be present at those isolated points within that history as a whole at which God intervened to correct the course of the history of the human spirit and to preserve it from deviations arising from its own interior dynamism. The real effectiveness of the authority vested in the Church's official teachers must consist rather in the fact that through God's grace-given bestowal of himself upon the world, and through the historical manifestation of this in the absolute in Jesus Christ, which renders this self-bestowal victorious and irrevocable, the Church is constituted as the experience in faith of this self-bestowal of God, which can no longer be defeated by error. This entity, then, constituted by the experience of the irreversible victory of God's self-bestowal, is called the Church. As a community and a society she is of her nature institutional, and this means that she has an office, an officially constituted body to be the organ through which she realizes the fulness of her own true nature. Now because of this office, as a teaching office, participates in this abiding victory of the truth of God in the world which constitutes the innermost entelecheia of the history of the world, and the self-realization of the world in its relationship to God.[9] In Jesus Christ the Church constitutes the achieved self-realization of the eschatological [10] victory of God's self-bestowal upon the world. Moreover, as a community of faith the Church always continues also and necessarily to be a society composed of men with an official constitution. It is because of this that there is also a teaching office. Hence both in what it teaches and in the power and infallibility with which it teaches it this office has a derivation from the Church. This derivation from the Church is precisely the concrete form in which the derivation of the teaching office from Christ and God is realized.

Now while all these points are in themselves self-evident truisms, it is nevertheless all too easy, both in theory and still more in the practice of the Church, for them to be covered over by the formal and juridical framework in which the doctrinal power of the teaching office is conceived of, for it tends to be thought of in merely formal and juridical terms as a commission coming from God and Christ. And on this view we cease any longer to enquire what this conceptual model, in itself perfectly correct, is really intended to convey in terms of content. Precisely today, when all merely formal claims to authority are being called in question and disputed, it must be emphasized that the doctrine of the Church's teaching office has a concrete content of its own of a theological kind, and this fact must be clearly

[8] Cf. M. Löhrer, 'Träger der Vermittlung', Mysterium Salutis I (Zürich, 1965), pp. 545-555. Likewise the comprehensive presentation of the relevant dogmatic history by Y. Congar, Lay People in the Church (London, 1957). On Newman's thesis to the effect that the real resistance to Arianism in the fourth century was achieved by the 'people' cf. J. Guitton, Mitbürger der Wahrheit (Salzburg, 1964).

[9] This idea has been still further developed by K. Rahner, 'Ekklesiologische Grundlegung', Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie I (Freiburg, 1964), pp. 117-148; idem, 'The Church and the Parousia of Christ', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 295-312.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

recognized and included as a factor in Christian thinking and in the exercise of the Church's official functions in the concrete.

In fact it must be recognized as a basic and universal principle that the situation is not that the formal authority vested in an official body in society and the authority inherent in the realities themselves which that body is designed to represent and uphold really have to be two different entities. The two entities can perfectly well be conceived of as really identical in objective fact. The only proviso is that we must realize and hold firm to the truth that the reality itself and the authority inherent in it as such need to be upheld and given concrete application by an authority of a formal kind existing in society, and further that this authority, which depends upon the authority inherent in the reality itself can in the concrete individual case make claims of its own and interpret the reality itself, and can thereby claim a 'formal' authority whenever it is not immediately clear to the individual how the individual decisions derive from the 'reality itself' as a whole. But precisely for this reason, and in every individual case in which such formal authority is exercised, it must be able to make it clear again and again that as a whole it derives from the very reality which it is concerned to uphold.[10]

[11] What this means in the concrete in the case with which we are concerned is this: the teaching office must show itself as it really is according to its own understanding of its nature. It may not cover over and conceal aspects in this from the short-sighted feeling that these aspects tend more to overthrow the authority of the teaching office itself and entail a danger that it will not be recognized. In Lumen Gentium No. 25 the Second Vatican Council explicitly states that the officially appointed teachers of the Church have to apply the appropriate human means in order to arrive at the truth in official decisions on matters of doctrine. Even this, however, is only a very general statement, and almost excessively mild and vague. For in the very nature of the case it obviously implies that those charged to uphold the teaching office are also obliged to study before coming to a decision. They must consult theologians, work themselves and cause others to work in the fields of exegesis and the history of dogma. They must open their minds to discussion. They must maintain contact with the living awareness of the faith which manifests itself in the Church as a whole. For it is from this living awareness that these bearers of the teaching office themselves derive their ideas. Again in any definitorial decisions which these representatives of the teaching office arrive at the Church's own absolute assent of faith as worked out in history, albeit unreflectingly, must already have gone before, so that in a case of this kind the specific charism of the teaching office consists, strictly speaking, in its 'infallible' confirmation of this absolute assent of faith on the part of the Church as a whole, which has already been arrived at.

All these factors are implied in the very nature of the case in the statement of the Second Vatican Council referred to above.

Now it must not be disputed that these and similar 'suitable means' of the teaching office have by and large de facto been applied, although perhaps it should also be emphasized that in particular epochs and at particular stages in the history of the world and of the Church the means and procedures employed in a process of discovering truth of this kind need not necessarily always be the same. Today, for instance, means and procedures may be necessary and obligatory for the representatives of the teaching office which could not possibly have [10] In this connection very different ideas were developed in the past as to the precise connection between authority and 'objective truth'. In addition to the work mentioned in n. 7 cf. esp. J. M. Todd (ed.), Probleme der Autorität (Düsseldorf, 1967); Y. Congar, Pour une Église servante et pauvre, L'église aux cent visages 8 (Paris, 1963), and also idem in M. Nédoncelle, R. Aubert et al. (edd.), L'Ecclésiologie au XIXe siècle, Unam Sanctam 34 (Paris, 1960), pp. 77-114.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

been present in earlier [12] ages.[11] But I cannot escape the impression that attempts are still constantly made to conceal these genuinely human factors in the concrete process by which the Church's teaching office arrives at the truth. And this is manifestly because there is a tendency to feel that belief in the divine assistance accorded to the teaching office would be endangered or even disappear if the normal Christian were to realize the sort of concrete personalities who were involved, the sort of institutional factors and procedures which were brought to bear, the sort of struggles, discussions, factional divisions etc. which arose in the process of arriving at the truth in this way. On this question there is a tendency tacitly to proceed from the assumption that there is a kind of 'synergism' at work here, to point to forces that are extrinsic to the human debate, and so to regard God's intervention as commencing only at that point at which human efforts are suspended. In reality, however, God works precisely in and through these human efforts and his activity does not constitute a distinct factor apart from this. Precisely for this reason we should bring these human factors into the open. Instead of concealing them we should throw light upon them and make it possible to assess them at their true worth. For in themselves they constitute something more than merely a supplement to the divine activity, a prior condition for it, or an obscure residue, otherwise unaccounted for, in the exercise of the teaching office. Rather these human factors constitute an intrinsic element in the exercise of the teaching office itself. We are deceiving ourselves if we suppose that meets with more respect and trust on the part of modern man when it withdraws itself into a mysterious remoteness, when it conceals even the material questions with which it has to cope beneath the veil of a Secretum Sancti Officii, when it prohibits a realistic and open discussion of the suitability of the theological advisers who are engaged, when it fails to make clear what objective and really relevant criteria have governed the choice of these, and when its decisions are not accompanied by any arguments, or at least any that do justice to the importance of the realities involved.

Of course at a time like the present, in which many more advanced stages of development are to be found side by side, and are being achieved [13] almost hourly in the Church, there are still many individuals for whom any sober and realistic view of the work of the teaching office as it is and as it actually must be as a matter of theological necessity represents an attack upon their faith. But for those people who really do provide the standards by which the present and future of the Church will have to be shaped the converse is true. Hence today the Church has a vital task to perform in so educating her members that they are effectively conversant with the nature of the Church in all her aspects and the forms in which this must necessarily be manifested today.

Perhaps even here we have already reached a point at which it is possible to make some explicit statement about that question which is customarily referred to as the question of 'the teaching office and democracy'.[12] In formulating this subordinate theme in these terms we are of course aware of the fact that 'democracy' is not a concept for which any authorization can be claimed from scripture, or which arises in any traditional ecclesiology. This fact in itself shows that we must be cautious in seeking to introduce 'democracy' into any ecclesiology as a theological concept. It is clear from the ultimate nature of the Church that she can never be allowed to be a 'democracy' in the sense in which a secular society can or should be this. What has to be said about 'democracy' in an ecclesiology could be expressed without ever

[11] The author has developed proposals for this in other contexts. cf. K. Rahner, 'Theology and the Church's Teaching Authority,' Theological Investigations IX (London and New York, 1972), pp. 83-100; and in addition 'Pluralism in Theology and the Unity of the Creed in the Church' idem XI (London, 1970) pp. 3-23; see also G. Baum, 'The Magisterium in a Changing Church', Concilium I/3 (1967), pp. 34-42 (Dogma).

[12] On what follows cf. also K. Rahner, 'Demokratie in der Kirche?', Gnade als Freiheit (Freiburg, 1968), pp. 113-130, and O. Semmelroth, 'Demokratie in der Kirche?', Martyria, Leiturgia, Diakonia (Festschrift für H. Volk), (Mainz, 1968), pp. 399-415.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

using this term at all. We could take as our starting-point the biblical doctrine of the Body of Christ and the pluralism of its functions, no one of which can be allowed to exclude the others, and all of which must work together. Alternatively we might take as our starting-point the concept of 'brotherhood' etc. Our true reason for speaking of democracy in connection with the Church at this point, therefore, is simply that it is precisely this key term that is used today in treating of this question. In this connection we can point out to those theologians and believers who all too uncompromisingly reject any such key term as 'democracy' from the outset in their theology that the traditional ecclesiology works freely with concepts which derive from the experience of what it is to live in society at the secular level.

First in the very nature of the case it is obvious that that reality which the term 'democracy' can be used to signify or to stand for has, and necessarily must have, a quite different relationship to the faith and creed of the Church and to the truth of divine revelation from that which it [14] bears to those realities consisting in institutional factors, modes of life and practices in the Church, which according to the Church's theological understanding of her own nature, are from the outset regarded as 'juris humani', and as such subject, in a way which is quite different from that which applies to the truth of revelation, to historical change and to free evaluation on the part of the Church's members. Right from the outset the meaning of the term 'democracy' and the place accorded to it in our scale of values differs according to whether it is the first or the second of these two realities that is being treated of. In our present study, therefore, we are treating exclusively of the question of the teaching office and democracy, and any answer which we arrive at to this question is still not an answer to the further question of in what ways, and to what extent the Church could be 'more democratic', for instance in the manner in which its office-bearers are selected, the exemption of ecclesiastical laws from human justice, the degree of autonomy granted to particular Churches within the one Church etc. If the subject of our discussion is to be democracy and the teaching office it is necessary to reject straightway any 'reactionary' prejudice which might lead us to suppose that any democratic system of voting is from the outset incompatible with the nature of the Church's teaching office. From the time of the Council of the Apostles right down to the Second Vatican Council votes have been taken in questions of doctrine, and this system of voting was the manner in which decisions were arrived at which were binding in conscience upon the faith of every member of the Church. Nor let it be said that at least since the First Vatican Council any such system of voting on the part of a collegium can no longer have any true significance or any real democratic character on the grounds that it could be blocked or rendered ineffective by the decision of the pope acting as an individual and in isolation. For when any such fully ratified decision of a Council is arrived at by a voting process – and this is what has in fact taken place – then it has the force of an effective decision on the part of the collegium as such, and not merely a consultative procedure prior to the decision of the pope. Conversely it is quite impossible for the pope to take an ex cathedra decision in opposition to a clear majority of the bishops of the Church, though the term 'impossible', as applied here does not signify any limitation of his formal and juridical authority, but rather constitutes a limitation which is inherent in the reality itself and in the moral norms which have to be observed when the pope arrives at any such decision (seeing that it is through the assistance of the Spirit that he actually does arrive at it).[13]

[15] In fact to realize how impossible this is we have only to put to ourselves the following question: Given that the pope proposed to define a doctrine which was contrary to the [13] The doctrine of the Second Vatican Council on this point is clear. Cf. the author's commentary on chapter III of the Constitution 'Lumen Gentium': LTK Suppl. Vol. I (1966), esp. 221-229. But the pronouncements of the First Vatican Council too on this point must not be ignored. On this cf. H. Fries, 'Ex esse non ex consensu Ecclesiae', Volk Gottes (Festschrift für J. Höfer) edited by R. Bäumer and H. Dolch (Freiburg, 1967), pp. 480-517.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

conviction of the great majority of the Church's members, and that too as expressed by the undoubted representatives of these, and given that, according to the teaching of the Second Vatican Council itself, the pope himself does not receive any fresh revelations, how could he ever know that the doctrine which he proposed to define was in fact contained in divine revelation? If he were to arrive at a decision which was positively opposed to the conviction of the great majority of the universal episcopate, this would be tantamount to asserting that he had received a fresh revelation regardless of whether we did or did not apply the term 'revelation' to this knowledge on the pope's part that he was right while the opposite opinion, upheld by the majority of the Church, was wrong. Even if the actual content of the doctrine itself was not held to constitute a fresh revelation which the pope alone had obtained independently of the rest of the Church, still the very statement that this content belonged to revelation would constitute such a fresh revelation in itself. Now according to the doctrine of the Second Vatican Council no such situation is possible. The pope's teaching precisely as formulated in his ex cathedra decisions is derived from the faith of the universal Church, and the fact that it is derived in this sense is ensured by the taking of a 'vote', though of course this can take place in the most varied ways, and need not necessarily have the juridical form or the solemnity of a vote taken in a Council. In the nature of the case this 'vote' may be present as the prior condition for an ex cathedra decision on the pope's part even outside the context of a Council. If we decide to regard any 'vote' as a democratic element, then we must uncompromisingly assert that the teaching office has something to do with democracy even though in saying this we are still leaving certain more detailed questions not fully answered, the questions, namely, of the theological nature of a voting procedure of this kind, and still more that of which members in the Church are or can be qualified to participate in this voting procedure. With regard to the theological nature of a voting procedure of this kind it must be said that in any such vote the voter does not simply declare what is his own personal free choice (as is the case in votes taken on civic laws in secular [16] society) but bears witness to that faith which he is conscious of possessing and which he finds within himself as a divine gift. In secular society a decision of this kind, even though arrived at democratically, is of its nature binding upon society as a whole. In contrast to this, however, a vote of this kind taken within the free community of the faith which is the Church, and pertaining essentially to the Church, is restricted in its binding force to the individual conscience of the believer.

In a secular society which is democratic in its constitution the outcome of a vote implies a situation in which even those who have voted against the majority are bound to observe the majority decision (otherwise we would have to support a utopian idea and hold that no truly democratic society had yet been evolved at all. We would have to say that it is something that still has to come in the future, and that it is only achieved when the goals which opposed factions have set themselves to achieve can be, and actually are, realized simultaneously). By contrast with this the situation essentially produced by a vote on questions of faith admits of the following two alternatives: first, prior to the decision being taken, the personal faith of those belonging to the minority party may still have remained ultimately open in conscience to the view of the opposing party on the concrete question of faith that was being discussed. In that case after the decision has been taken and the convictions in faith of the majority party have been adopted as the convictions of the Church as such, the minority party can re-orientate its ideas in conformity with this. The second alternative is that the conscience of the minority party with regard to their faith was such that the decision of the majority is conceived actually to separate its adherents from the Church. In that case the minority party remains free because on the concrete question concerned its own faith taken as a whole is committed firmly to a position which is felt to be diametrically opposed to that of the majority party. From this it follows as a matter of necessity that the majority party must be considered to have separated themselves from the Church, and the true Church must be deemed to be constituted by the minority.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

With regard to the question of which members of the Church may be considered as qualified to take an active part in such a vote all that we can briefly say here is the following:

According to the Catholic understanding of the Church the universal episcopate must be considered qualified jure divino to take part in such a vote in union with and under the pope in exercising the Church's doctrinal authority. But 'jure divino' here does not signify in any primary sense that others too cannot be given the right to take part in such a vote in [17] union with the college of bishops in virtue of human laws enacted within the Church. In fact this has actually been the case in all the more recent Councils. There have always been non-episcopal members of the Council who were given the right to vote.[14] The reasons for admitting a non-episcopal member to a consultative vote at a Council or similar occasion do not necessarily have to consist in the fact (though formerly this was, generally speaking the case) that the member concerned, though not a bishop, was nevertheless exercising quasi-episcopal functions (e.g. as the head of a religious order). Another and equally valid reason which was admitted in principle could be the special competence of the individual concerned in a particular field. Roman prelates who had a seat and vote in the Council, on a serious theological view of their functions, rely more upon the competence of specialist theologians of this kind than upon the mere fact of their episcopal consecration, which, after all, constituted them as 'bishops' only in a very formalistic sense. In other words it is at least possible for the Church to extend such a right to non-episcopal members even though, when she does so she is acting jure humano. In this connection a point to be borne in mind is that in principle it may be morally demanded of her in the very nature of the case that she shall extend the right to vote in this way in situations arising at particular epochs, in particular cultural conditions, and in questions arising in specific fields. For it is at any rate not in principle or a priori inconceivable that a case of this kind might arise in circumstances such as these. Now if such cases were to arise then the difference between divine and human law in the Church would be only a very relative one, since on the one hand the divine law of the Church's constitution must always and inevitably exhibit a concrete form that is subject to the conditions of particular epochs, while on the other every jus humanum entailing a moral duty to act in such and such a way in a specific situation conceals within itself a basic core of necessity that derives from God. From this it follows that the jus divinum attributed, in the case which we are considering, to the universal episcopate ultimately signifies merely that the united bishops, and no-one else beside them, represent the abiding assurance and the abiding visible manifestation of the continuity of the right of the teaching office in the Church to be heard and obeyed.

The jus divinum belonging to the universal episcopate in union with the pope, therefore, does not imply that it alone can always and in every [18] epoch be the sole bearer of the teaching office in the concrete. It is at least perfectly conceivable that a historical situation might arise in which the concrete bearer of the teaching office need not necessarily be simply identical with the episcopate alone, and this for moral reasons which in fact do not necessarily have to entail obligations applicable to all ages, but certainly can make claims of this kind at specific epochs and in specific situations (in terms of intellectual, cultural or social development). Now even though one who is a representative of the Church's teaching office does not necessarily have to be fully a member of the episcopate, still in the very nature of the case there will be individuals who are, in spite of this, what we now call bishops (and whom, presumably, we will continue to call by this name in the future), and in virtue of [14] On the practice of earlier Councils in this connection cf. the study by Y. Congar adduced in n. 8, and also idem, L'Ecclésiologie du Haut Moyen Age (Paris, 1968), esp. p. 96.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this fact the jus divinum of the episcopate itself considered as an official authority to teach is assured, and at the same time we are assured of the fact that the teaching office even as upheld by such individuals can be traced back through the ages in unbroken succession right to apostolic times.

Up to this point we have been following two lines of thought with regard to the possibility and the significance of exercising the teaching authority of the Church in the form of a vote, and with regard to the individuals to whom such voting power could be extended. Now the only way in which we can develop these considerations any further is to attempt to define still more precisely the significance which such a voting procedure would have. We have already said that a vote of this kind is of its nature different from the sort of vote that takes place in the context of secular politics. This latter constitutes a public statement of a voluntary decision taken by the voters themselves. By contrast with this the sort of vote we are speaking of is an attestation of certain beliefs held by the voters which as a matter of their own personal conviction they discover within themselves and recognize as brought about by God.

The next stage in our considerations must be to examine the question of the weight and significance to be attached to a majority vote. How far, and in what sense must this be allowed to prevail over a minority of the voters? The first point that must be made is that (abstracting for the moment from the position of the pope) on a Catholic understanding of the Church the fact that a given position is upheld by the majority of the voters does not represent any absolute guarantee, so far as the conscience of the individual Catholic believer or the individual Catholic bishop is concerned, that the doctrine assented to by the majority does in fact belong intrinsically to the deposit of faith bequeathed by the apostles, and as such binding in faith upon the conscience of the individual believer or bishop. (This does not [19] invalidate what has been said above with regard to the negative function which such a majority vote has in contributing to the decision of the pope.) A further point is that on a Catholic understanding of the Church no majority decision arrived at in the present can ever prevail over the absolute assent of faith accorded to a given doctrine by the Church of earlier ages. If such a case should arise, the true Church would unquestionably be constituted by the minority alone. This would remain true even if the pope himself took his stand on the side of the majority in such a case, a situation which, as we know, is not regarded by theological tradition as simply and absolutely impossible from the outset.[15]

It must be recognized a priori therefore that we can regard the opinion of a majority as theologically relevant only if in coming to a decision on some open question it continues to affirm the absolute assent of faith upheld up to that point by the Church of earlier ages, and moreover only if in arriving at its decision it has worked in positive collaboration with the pope. And in that case the majority is not merely putting forward its opinion in this sense as constituting what it feels to be the better one, but is rather attesting this opinion as commanding the allegiance of its faith. When a majority has arrived at a decision in this way and under these conditions the minority both can and must agree to it if that minority is not insuperably convinced that the decision of the majority goes against the substance of its own faith as a whole as upheld by it up to that point. In that case this decision would show that even the formal authority of the Church's teaching office was an illegitimate presumption.

[15] On this point the ecclesiologies of the Middle Ages were far more open, and despite their universal recognition of the principle, 'Prima sedes a nemine judicatur' they did to a large extent reckon with the possibility that on a very wide variety of grounds, ranging from sickness to heresy, the pope could lose his office. Cf. chiefly H. Zimmermann, Papstabsetzungen des Mittelalters (Graz, 1968), and A. Fransen, 'Conciliarism', Sacramentum Mundi 1 (New York and London, 1968), pp. 401-403. It is no argument against the kernel of truth in these ideas, which theologically speaking is extremely important, that they could lead to an extreme form of conciliarism.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The Catholic as such is of course convinced as a matter of his faith that any such radical case will never arise in the Church. In other words: when the pope, together with a majority of the bishops (or, supposing that they are in a minority it is a minority purely in the numerical sense, but one which still gives the agreement of the pope the force of moral law) arrives at a decision which is binding in faith on some open question, then this decision is preserved from any real or radical error by the assistance of the Spirit (though this does not mean that any such decision is in every respect successful in the way in which it is formulated, or that it covers all the [20] factors which such a question may involve of its very nature in a full or adequate way, or that it is opportune etc.). But even the Catholic can, and today actually must concede that it is possible for an individual in the concrete to arrive at a judgement in conscience which cannot be overthrown, that a decision of faith of this kind is radically opposed to the ultimate essence of the Christian faith, and in that case the claim which this teaching authority of the Church makes upon his conscience would lose its validity.

In any case these considerations show that some form of democratic collaboration in the decisions taken by the teaching office as such in the Church is not impossible from the outset, quite apart from the fact that in questions of the Church's practice, life in the Church, and discipline, and also in questions of Church law, it is in principle possible from the outset to accord a far wider sphere for such democratic collaboration to be exercised. Here, too however, the interplay between divine and human law which we have touched on above would have to be more clearly borne in mind than is the case in our present considerations. A further point which has already arisen from the very nature of the case in the present discussion is that any such collaboration on the part of the Church as a whole in the progressive articulation of the faith in the course of history is not present primarily or exclusively in those cases in which this collaboration is manifested in forms which are 'democratic' in an explicit or juridical sense. The derivation of the teaching office from the universal Church as supported and sustained by the Holy Spirit even in the progressive development of her faith is far wider and deeper in its ramifications, and does not begin, as many believe, only at that point at which it is given concrete expression in juridical forms.

What we are considering here is a worldwide Church with many millions of believers, all of them in principle called upon to collaborate. But for technical reasons alone any formal or juridical process of democratization represents no absolute guarantee of the fact that the people of God are effectively and actively taking part in the life of the Church in a way which corresponds to the movement of the Spirit of God. Our experience of the contemporary democracies of the masses, whether in the forms in which these may appear in the western or the eastern spheres, serves to show how cautious we have to be in this matter. It may be argued that the people of the Church should collaborate to a greater extent and more 'democratically' even in the functions of the teaching office, and this cannot be rejected from the outset as un-Catholic. At the same time, however, it should first be shown how some scheme can be devised for [21] achieving this in the concrete which is both realistic and practicable. It should be shown which Catholic Christians have achieved a position in secular society such that they are not merely equipped and willing seriously to take part in such collaboration, but also that they are justified in doing so in ecclesiological terms, and it should be shown how Catholic Christians of this type can be distinguished from the rest. The present-day situation of the Church is one in which we are faced with the phenomenon of individuals only partially identifying themselves with her, and so too of varying very greatly in the degree in which they do so identify themselves with the Church. Now in this situation there is a very real danger that under cover of the watchword of democracy many individuals will be carried away from the Church into positions which are un-Christian and un-Catholic. Hence the officially constituted authorities of the Church cannot be blamed when they suspect such dangers to be present and attempt to avert them.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In this connection a further factor may be pointed out, one which both reveals the relativity of the majority opinion in any voting procedure of the kind of which we have been speaking, and at the same time also enables us to understand that there is an intrinsic connection between the teaching office and the pastoral office as exercised in the Church. In any such voting procedure we are presupposing from the first that both the majority and the minority accept, with the full assent of their faith, the basic substance of the faith, for the decision actually arrived at in any given case is, or is intended to be, an explicitation of this. It is obvious that we must assume this much, but if we do assume this, then strictly speaking it is no less obvious that the decision of the majority materially speaking implies more a specific definition on the Church's own part[16] on the question involved than a decision which is directed against the opposite opinion on the actual matter itself which is concerned as upheld by the minority. In this respect it is ultimately speaking a secondary question whether the parties themselves have been aware that the controversy between them has this special character, or whether they have supposed that they were radically disunited on the actual matter itself. In any case when we look back on history we can recognize retrospectively that the controversies which have taken place between genuine Christians have only been controversies with regard to the terms in which the truths of the faith should be defined. It is not possible here to corroborate this assertion by means of historical [22] examples, nor does the assertion itself imply that it is always easy to distinguish between content and expression in matters of controversy. And again in maintaining this position we are not implying that the controversy with regard to the terms of the definition is in itself a matter of indifference. But it is possible to state that in all decisions in matters of doctrine one of the factors included is always that of the terms in which the decision should be defined, because in theological questions it is quite impossible that any given formulation should be the only one and the only correct one. This would only be possible if the truth which it was intended to define contained nothing more than was explicitly stated in the formula. And when it is a theological reality that is being treated of this can never be the case.

However when, if, and to the extent that it is a terminological controversy that is involved in a voting procedure of this kind (whether the parties involved are aware of it as such or not) the taking of such a vote is essentially an exercise of the pastoral office, and it is relatively easy to understand why in this context a majority can be more important than a minority in tipping the scales to one side rather than the other. The majority declares that with regard to the real substance of the faith (which in fact all agree to) it is able to express this better and in a way which is more intelligible to it by means of a particular form of definition, and that therefore, while having to respect the claims of charity towards the others, it has a right to demand that the minority shall fall in with this definition. This is not too much to demand since on the one hand a definition of this kind does not prohibit others from explaining what has been expressed in it in different terms, while on the other any such expression, even among those who respect it, is wide enough and 'analogous' enough to be able to include and implicitly contain within itself the 'special concerns' of the minority.

Now surely this applies especially to the contemporary situation. For today the situation in which we all find ourselves in terms of ideas is such that we are very well able clearly to recognize and to evaluate the historical factors and the analogous nature of any such expression, even, therefore, one that is produced by the official authorities of the Church. The situation of the Church today in terms of theology and speculation is such that we may presume that any authentic, and still more definitorial decisions on doctrine on the part of the Church will in the future consist not so much in fresh explicitations and developments of the [16] A more detailed treatment of this idea is to be found in K. Rahner and K. Lehmann, 'Kerygma und Dogma', Mysterium Salutis I (Einsiedeln, 1965), pp. 693-696.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ancient teaching of the Church as in the special emphasis which she gives to particular points of doctrine in order to maintain their truth against false interpretations.

[23] Hence in producing authoritative pronouncements of this kind the Church will not be restricting the necessary scope for interpretation which should be allowed for in a situation of pluralism among the various orthodox theologies. Precisely in the future, therefore, decisions on doctrine on the part of the Church will take the form of 'justified and important' definitive formulae in which to express the one creed of the Church, and will be understood as such. Now on this showing any discovery of truth which is arrived at democratically, even though it transcends mere considerations of 'voting' is both more appropriate to the realities involved and also easier to understand and accept than was the case in earlier times.

So far we have been attempting to consider the teaching office of the Church in its relationship to the Church as a whole. We must now consider the question of the teaching office from yet another point of view. In our introductory remarks we have already drawn attention to the fact that in the usual theology of the seminaries, by reason of the formal and juridical categories in which the nature and power of the teaching office are conceived of, the formal authority to be attached to the teaching office is thought of almost independently of the actual truth content which it attests. In this seminary theology the content of the faith on the one hand and the formal authority of the teaching office on the other are presented as two separate entities almost without connection. It is true that it is stated clearly that the teaching office is obviously constituted under divine revelation, that it must be subordinate and obedient to it, and that through the power of the Spirit that has been promised to the Church it will also be preserved in this obedience. But this in itself is not enough really to make clear the precise relationship which exists between the formal authority of the teaching office and the fides quae which is intended to mediate it to the fides qua of the individual believer. We shall enquire into this relationship in respect both of its essential constitution and of the forms which it inevitably assumes today.

With regard to the basic relationship which constantly exists between the formal authority of the teaching office and the content of the faith which that teaching office is designed to present it must first be stated simply and unambiguously that according to the fundamental theology and the interpretation of the faith of the Catholic Church the formal authority of the teaching office is not the first and most fundamental datum in the content of the faith such that all other elements in it are based upon this one as their necessary foundation. There is a well-known saying of Augustine[17] (which unfortunately is quoted all too often and in [24] a sense that is misleading) to the effect that he would not give the allegiance of his faith to the gospels unless the authority of the Church had moved him to do so. Now taken in a strict and absolute sense, and as a universal principle applicable to the faith as such this statement is simply false. Of course it is true as a matter of history that the gospel has come down to me, the individual, historically separated as I am from Christ, through the mediation of the Church. It has come down to me in this sense as that which at once commands and makes possible my belief, as the grace-given power of the Kyrios and as containing the fundamental truths of the Christian faith. But this is still very far from saying that the formal authority precisely of the teaching office of the Church is in the specifically theological sense the first and most fundamental datum for a Catholic Christian in his faith. Ultimately speaking he believes in the formal authority of the Church's teaching office because prior to this he already believes in God, his grace, in Jesus Christ the crucified and risen Lord, and not e converso. In the hierarchy of truths[18] referred to by the Second Vatican Council the fact that

[17] PL 42, 176.

[18] A full treatment of the history of this dogma is to be found in U. Valeske, Hierarchia veritatum (Munich, 1968). On the subject itself cf. also H. Mühlen, 'Die Bedeutung der Differenz zwischen Zentraldogmen und Randdogmen für den ökumenischen Dialog', Freiheit in der Begegnung, edited by J. L. Leuba and H.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

there is in truth and in reality a teaching office of the Church is not in fact a first and fundamental datum, but a relatively secondary one, though this is not for one moment to deny that this truth does belong, albeit in its due and proper place, to this hierarchy of truths.

Both in reality and also as recognized in the subjective conscience of the believer, the doctrine of the teaching office is itself based upon certain more radical truths of faith and is not either logically or ontologically speaking the basis upon which all else rests. Precisely in order to be Catholic in our belief we must turn Augustine's axiom 'the other way round' by saying 'I would not believe in the authority of the Church if I were not moved to do so by the gospel'. This is not to deny that in the unity of the whole structured hierarchy of the Catholic faith there is also, in a certain sense, a mutual relationship of interdependence between the Church, her institutional structures, and her officialdom on the one hand, and the true substance of the faith on the other as recognized in the conscience of the individual believer. Nor do we deny that Christian faith is always the faith of the Church as well.

[25] But in this unity and in this wholly mutual relationship, in which each of the individual elements in the faith conditions and modifies the others, there is still an overriding order. From this point of view belief in the Church's teaching office is both objectively and subjectively sustained by a reality of the faith which is prior to this teaching office and to faith in it. Hence too in any book on Catholic fundamental theology even of the traditional kind it is taken for granted – indeed we might almost say too much taken for granted – that the section dealing with the existence and authority of the teaching office in the Church as vested in the pope and bishops is included only at a very late stage. A further point is that the truth that in founding his Church Christ gave it an official authority to teach in this sense in virtue of his own authority and promise is obviously no easier to recognize than any other truths of the Christian faith which subjectively and objectively speaking are of a more fundamental character. Since the Second Vatican Council and in the age of a sincere ecumenism a Catholic should not hesitate to conceded that the more fundamental realities of faith common to all Christians, and at the same time more vital to their salvation (whether logically speaking or at least under God's saving providence as it de facto exists) are actually easier to apprehend in faith than the specifically Catholic truth of the teaching office of the Church. Now these facts, however self-evident, have certain consequences for the teaching office of the Church as applied in practice which, as I feel, are not always recognized and observed.

When the teaching office of the Church arrives at decisions (whether definitorial or merely provisional, albeit authentic ones) if in doing so it relies simply and exclusively on its own formal authority it is in a real sense acting against the obvious truths mentioned above. It is true that within the theoretical system of the Catholic faith this formal authority is itself an obvious factor. But it is not so in the subjective conscience of the individual Catholic believer to which such a decision is addressed. Here this authority is no primary datum, but rather a dependent function, a truth based upon other truths, indeed a truth which is more assailable and more easily imperilled than the fundamental truths of the Christian faith. Hence in taking such a decision the teaching office of the Church has the duty of showing that the content of this decision does not rest merely on its own formal authority. Rather it must show as clearly and convincingly as possible that it is intrinsically connected with the original basis of the Christian faith in general. In doing this it will at the same time have again and again to enable believers to understand afresh that this authority of the teaching office derives from the basic essence of the Christian faith [26] which the subject to whom this particular decision of the Stirnimann (Frankfurt, 1969), pp. 191-227, and P. Schoonenberg, 'Geschichtlichkeit und Interpretation des Dogmas', Die Interpretation des Dogmas (Düsseldorf, 1969), pp. 58-110, esp. pp. 80-88.

---

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

teaching office is addressed must already have apprehended prior to any assent on his part to the formal authority of the teaching office.

If, and to the extent that, the Christian faith is ultimately one and all elements in it mutually condition one another it can uncompromisingly be asserted that there is a mutual interdependence here too. It is just as true to say that the formal authority of the teaching office depends upon the power of the truth of faith as proclaimed to command the allegiance of our faith as to say that the latter depends upon the former. This relationship in which either factor influences the other is distorted, however, if we rely exclusively upon the formal authority of the teaching office. It can be stated absolutely as a matter of principle that in its individual decisions and the preliminary proposals leading up to these the teaching office of the Church acts best and most correctly when it allows the truth which is sustained by grace and inherent in the reality itself which it is treating of and seeking to teach to make its own impact, and allows its own formal authority almost completely to be effaced by giving pride of place to this truth. As we have said this is the right approach to adopt simply because the truth that the teaching office has this formal authority is in any instance supported and kept alive by faith in the fundamental truths of Christianity. Hence in the concrete exercise of its functions the teaching office must again and again re-establish its connections with these truths.

The urgency of the point which we are making here becomes still clearer when we reflect upon the way in which the teaching office of the Church exercises its functions in the situation which prevails in the present day. Very many authorities whom we encounter in the world and in the course of human living have a certain power regardless of whether or not the legitimacy of their formal claims to power are recognized by the individual in his own conscience. For the most part these various kinds of authority (that of parents, of groups in secular society, of teachers or experts, or of the state) are reinforced with a certain degree of power, whether explicit or implicit, consciously adverted to or unconsciously taken for granted. So far as the conscious awareness of the individual is concerned moral authority and the power accompanying this are far from being clearly distinguishable from one another. When we recognize authority we are very largely, without actually noticing it, submitting ourselves to the power (which itself in turn may take many forms), and when authority is claimed by those in whom it is vested these likewise are aware of and rely upon this power which they take for granted without explicitly reflecting upon the fact. This is particularly true in those cases [27] in which the parties involved take it for granted that their authority is accompanied by such power. In such cases authority imposes itself in virtue of the power attached to it and not in virtue of itself. Now right down to these present times in which we live the authority of the Church and of the Churches has had power of this kind which extends to their teaching function as well. They have had this power in virtue of public opinion, many institutional factors, the extremely close connection which they have had with secular society, and all the opportunities they have enjoyed of influencing public awareness in general.

This is not the place to enquire how far such power should be attached to the formal authority of the Church's teaching office as of right, what historical factors and situations have caused this supplementary power to be attached to the teaching office in society and in the awareness of the individual, or what reasons, whether regrettable or providential, have led to a situation in which it has to a large extent lost this power. At any rate the situation which prevails today and which will come to prevail still more in the future is that the power which in earlier times was ascribed to the teaching office in addition to the authority which it was recognized as having in itself has to a large extent disappeared and is in process of disappearing more and more. The teaching office has less and less 'authority' in itself in virtue of this power which was formally attached to it prior to and independent of the assent

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of faith in which the individual recognized its existence as legitimate. In other words what it lacks now is any effective influence upon the individual prior to his assent of faith precisely to this teaching office. The only real significance which it still has depends almost exclusively, and in increasing measure today, upon the question of whether and how far it succeeds in making its own spiritual authority credible on the basis of the gospel itself. Today less than ever before can it assume a priori that its own formal validity as a teaching office has already been acknowledged as de fide in the conscience of the individual Catholic Christian, and so rely simply and exclusively upon this as a justification of the specific doctrine which it promulgates. Every time a specific doctrine of this kind is promulgated without its own intrinsic claim to truth being made clear (this does not necessarily have to mean rationally comprehensible in itself, but it surely does mean intrinsically intelligible and following logically from the Christian faith as a single whole) it always entails a threat to the formal authority of the teaching office as a whole such that there is a real danger that it will not be acknowledged. The reason is that, as we have already said, this authority does not of itself command any greater degree of credibility in terms of fundamental theology than other [28] truths of the faith. And since today all kinds of purely formal authority are under attack it follows a fortiori that this particular kind of authority cannot constitute the fixed and unquestionable point of departure for considering questions of truth in the subjective conscience of the individual with regard to truth. Hence any appeal merely to the formal authority of the teaching office as a factor which is given and can be assumed as obvious and beyond all dispute will to a large extent be ineffective even though in itself it may, from one specific point of view, be perfectly legitimate as following logically from the faith.

Again in the situation which prevails precisely today every time the teaching office proclaims a specific doctrine of the faith it must justify its own formal authority in doing so, and it must of course do this not merely by speaking in abstract terms about its own formal authority, but by establishing the connection between the content of the individual doctrine which it promulgates and the totality of the Christian faith and the Christian interpretation of existence. It must do this in order that it may, to some extent, lighten the burden which is placed upon its own formal authority, and at the same time state the basis on which it itself rests.[19]

In other words: when an individual doctrine is promulgated by the teaching office the actual content of the truth that is proclaimed should impart credibility to the formal authority of the body which proclaims it. It should do this in virtue of the conviction which it carries of its own nature, and which is immanent within itself, and in virtue of the clear connection which it has with the totality of the faith. Moreover it must do this in a manner which is in conformity with the contemporary situation as well as the actual truth which is involved. This does not render the significance of the formal authority of the teaching office superfluous. On the contrary what we are requiring here is, as we have already said, justified on the grounds that the formal teaching authority is based on a truth which is prior to itself, and on the fact that the individual truth which is being taught can never be a truth of the faith as an isolated doctrine, but must always be so only in virtue of its connection with the totality of the Christian faith in general.

If these two factors are borne in mind then the requirement which we have stated above is in a real sense self-evident; the requirement, namely, that the teaching office itself must so act as to render itself in a certain sense, and speaking approximately, more and more superfluous. This requirement is further strengthened by the fact that it would be quite [29] untrue to say that the progressive development of the Christian faith has ever found its anchor-holds or its [19] It may be doubted whether all the more recent pronouncements of the Church's teaching office have in fact met this requirement.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

turning-points first and last in the teaching office as one particular institution within the totality of the Church. This is of course not to exclude the fact that in the life of the individual believer and of the Church as a whole particular situations have arisen, can arise, and will arise in the concrete in which the assurance that a specific doctrine is a genuine explicitation of the faith as a single whole is provided by the pronouncements of the teaching office.

It is not possible here to develop these considerations any further so as to show, by means of individual examples of the practice of the Church's teaching office, that in the life of the Church in the concrete it has consistently been taken for granted right from the first that these requirements must be fulfilled. Still less should our readers be left with the impression that in what has been said here everything is covered or at least touched upon which it is necessary to demand if in the contemporary crisis of authority the teaching office is to achieve what it is capable of in order to survive this crisis. The present-day situation is such that many further consequences arise from it in addition to those mentioned here which have a bearing on the continuing function of the teaching office. Thus for instance a situation has arisen today in the development of ideas in which it is necessary and inevitable that there should be a pluralism of theologies even within the one Church and in spite of the unity of her creed. This again implies a quite new situation for the exercise of the Church's teaching office, because precisely in its pronouncements and critical judgements it is quite impossible any longer to assume that there is any one theology common to all with a single uniform language.[20] It would even be possible to raise the further question of whether the future development of dogma in the Catholic Church, and so too the further functioning of the teaching office either can or will lead to further dogmatic explicitations of individual points of doctrine which, as it were, are still waiting to be developed over and above the existing hierarchy of truths, or whether alternatively the future task of the teaching office will consist simply in preserving the basic substance of the Christian message in a far more radical and concentrated way than hitherto.

If we hold the second opinion then it will become still clearer that in the present and future situation of crisis the best and most effective way for the Church's teaching office to defend its own formal authority is for it to present itself as the official body which bears witness with the uncompromising courage and hope that arises from faith itself to that basic [30] substance of the faith which is common to all Christians. Perhaps we ought to express this more cautiously by saying that this is what ought to be the case. If the teaching office of the Catholic Church bears witness with unwavering faithfulness to faith in God and Jesus Christ, and again and again gives fresh life to this faith, then even it has its greatest opportunity for achieving advances in the ecumenical field.

[20] See n. 11.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[31]

2

THE POINT OF DEPARTURE IN THEOLOGY FOR DETERMINING THE NATURE OF THE PRIESTLY OFFICE

The priestly office in the Catholic Church is an extremely complex entity, and one which is subject to historical changes. As realized in the concrete its form is determined not merely by the dogmatically definable nature of the Church herself, or by its own real theological nature, which belongs to the 'jus divinum' of the Church, but also by the concrete forms which the Church has assumed under historical influences and, arising from this, by the changing positions which the priest has occupied within the Church as a society, as also by the role ascribed to him by secular society. Our present considerations, however, will be confined merely to the point of departure in theology for determining the nature of the priestly office in the Church. All other factors will remain outside the scope of our present study even though they do contribute to the contemporary crisis in our understanding of the significance of the priesthood at least as much as the specifically theological problems which it entails. Obviously there is a constant and active interconnection between the theological essence of the priesthood which abides, and the other basic factors and influences in history and society which play their part in determining its form in the concrete. To that extent these questions too (even though they will remain untreated of here) constitute the background for the question with which we are specifically concerned. It is true that even from the point of view of its theological nature the priestly office is an extremely complex entity, so that we must guard against an over-'speculative' approach in which we attempt to deduce the fulness of its reality by a process of logical deduction from one simple and radical characteristic inherent in its nature. But however true this may be, still it is manifest from the contemporary theory and practice of priestly life that we must raise the question of where the initial point of departure lies for determining the theological nature of the priesthood. Because only in this way can it be made clear what belongs to its abiding nature and what pertains [32] rather to those changeable factors which are the outcome of historical conditions and the circumstances of particular epochs.[1]

Preliminary Remarks

[1] It is impossible in a brief study such as this to set forth each individual idea in detail. For this reason I may refer to other basic studies in which I have defined my position on the theme in question: K. Rahner, The Church and the Sacraments, Quaestiones Disputatae 9 (Freiburg, 1963); Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie I (Freiburg, 1964), pp. 149-215 (those charged with ensuring that the Church shall achieve the due fulness of her own nature), esp. 154 ff. (the institutional and charismatic factors), 189 ff. (the priesthood and the individual priest) (New and expanded edition in preparation [2nd ed. 1970]); Vom Sinn des kirchlichen Amtes (Freiburg, 1966); Knechte Christi (Freiburg, 1967); 'Priestly Existence', Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 239-262; cf. also 'One Mediator and Many Mediations', Theological Investigations IX (London and New York, 1972), pp. 169-186; also cf. my address to the Catholic Conference entitled 'Dogmatische Grundlagen des priesterlichen Selbstverständnisses', Mitten in dieser Welt edited by the Zentralkomitee der Deutschen Katholiken (Paderborn, 1968), pp. 96-115 and the study entitled 'Theological Reflections on the Image of the Priest of Today and Tomorrow' in this volume pp. 39-60; on the concept of office cf. also my commentary on the third chapter of 'Lumen Gentium', The Constitution on the Church, LTK suppl. I (Freiburg, 1966), 210-246 (on No. 28 cf. the commentary by A. Grillmeier, ibid., 247-255).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

1. Both from the point of view of the concrete contemporary situation of the priest and also on theological grounds there seem to be disadvantages in taking as our initial starting-point for defining the nature of the priestly office those sacramental powers which, according to the teaching of the Councils (chiefly that of Trent) belong to him alone in contrast to the laity and the lower ranks in the hierarchy of order (especially that of deacon). The powers we are speaking of here, therefore, are those of presiding at the celebration of the Eucharistic sacrifice and the sacramental forgiveness of sins (including the administration of the anointing of the sick). There is no need here to enlarge upon the fact that at least in the present age this approach can be adopted only with difficulty, if indeed it is not totally inadequate as a primary and basic starting-point for understanding the true nature of the priesthood.[2] In any case this [33] starting-point would have no directly perceptible basis in scripture.

2. We can also see disadvantages in seeking to define the nature of the priestly office in the first instance on the basis of the concept of 'mediator'. This approach too would not find any immediate support from the witness of the bible, for in scripture the concept of mediator is applied only to Jesus Christ. Such an approach would immediately give rise to the difficult questions of how in more precise terms we should conceive of participation in the mediatorship of Christ through the priestly office, what the connection would be between a participation of this kind and the other functions of mediating salvation which are exercised in the Body of Christ even apart from the priestly office, how any such mediatorship should more precisely be conceived of seeing that after all it must always be a mediation between God and the individual man endowed with grace such that the mediator makes them immediately present to one another. Such an approach would also have to come to terms with the dogmatic principle that all sacramental mediation constitutes only one particular manifestation, albeit an effective one, of a grace-given relationship of man to God which extends throughout all dimensions of human life even without any mediation on the part of the official priesthood.

3. It is admitted both from the point of view of biblical study, the history of dogma, and theology, that in order to obtain any understanding of the theological nature of the priestly office (as distinct from the 'episcopal' office, the 'diaconate' and the 'lay state') we must not immediately assume that there is a hierarchical order in the Church divided into three stages, and that this sets its holders apart from the rest of the 'people of God'. On the contrary the approach which should be adopted – though of course this is not possible here – is to take as our starting-point the nature of the Church as a sacrament of God's utterance of himself to the [34] world as accepted in faith, hope, and love. From this point we should go on to show – always of course with reference to scripture – that the Church as understood in this sense is always in need of that which can be called 'office', the nature of which is determined on the

[2] On this approach the tendency would be to take the hierarchical element and the traditional concept of the priestly ministry too much for granted.

For this reason it is, however, extremely questionable whether any adequate starting-point can be found by envisaging merely the functions of the priest as leader of the community or the merely spiritual element in his ministry. On this cf. also H. U. von Balthasar, 'Das priesterliche Amt', Civitas 23 (1968), pp. 794-797; W. Breuning, 'Zum Verständnis des Priesteramtes vom "Dienen" her', Lebendiges Zeugnis (1969), pp. 24-40; J. Ratzinger, 'Zur Frage nach den Sinn des priesterlichen Dienstes', GuL 41 (1968), pp. 347-376; W. Kasper, 'A New Dogmatic Outlook on the Priestly Ministry', Concilium 3/5 (Pastoral), 1969, pp. 12-18.

In this connection cf. likewise E. Niermann, 'Priest' Sacramentum Mundi 5 (New York and London, 1970), pp. 97-101; O. Semmelroth, 'Die Präsenz der drei Ämter Christi im gemeinsamen und besonderen Priestertum der Kirche', Theologie und Philosophie 44 (1969), pp. 181-195; H. Vorgrimler, 'Der theologische Ort des Priesters', Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie IV (Freiburg, 1969), pp. 432 ff.; K. Lehmann, 'Das dogmatische Problem des theologischen Ansatzes zum Verständnis des Amtspriestertums', Existenzprobleme des Priesters, Münchener Akademie-Schriften der Katholischen Akademie in Bayern 50 (Munich, 1969), pp. 121-175.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

one hand by the nature of the Church herself and on the other (since it signifies a particular function in the Church) must also be negatively circumscribed and distinguished from other ways in which the Church achieves her own due fulness. This factor of office is primarily one as the Church herself is ultimately one. This single office can and must be subdivided into particular departments both in respect of its holders and also with regard to the task and functions which it entails of its very nature because in view of the nature of the Church as a socially constituted reality it is quite impossible to conceive of it assuming any other form. But the ways in which this subdivision of the priestly office can be achieved are very varied, and this remains true even if we assume that a development took place during the apostolic age in which the priestly office was divided into three ranks and that this is permanently and irreversibly binding upon the post-apostolic Church and is in this sense 'juris divini'. For in the New Testament itself this subdivision of a single sacrament of order is still extremely fluid. The question of precisely what functions are to be attached to each of the three degrees of order (assuming for our present purposes that there are indeed three degrees) still remains to a large extent an open one both in the New Testament itself and in later ages. From the standpoint of dogmatic theology, even if we recognize this division of the priestly office into three degrees this does not mean that other functions, no less genuine, may not arise within and in addition to the functions attached to these three degrees, albeit as the outcome of the fresh subdivisions of the single priestly office which emerge from the ever-changing conditions of history. Indeed the very fact that in the course of history further and quite different official functions and holders of official functions can be discerned in addition to, and also within, the three degrees into which the priestly office is initially divided is in itself enough to demonstrate this point. The same is also true with regard to the process by which such a function is sacramentally imparted to a specific holder of office. The idea that it is only the official process by which the orders of bishop, 'priest' and deacon are imparted that can constitute a sacrament, so far from being part of the Church's official doctrine, is actually in contradiction to the theology at least of the Middle Ages. In the light of these considerations, which we have only been able to touch upon here, it is theologically speaking perfectly conceivable (though naturally the question [35] of whether it would be opportune still remains open) that, while preserving the three degrees of the priestly office in some sense, some different way might be devized of distributing and sacramentally conferring the various functions contained within this single priestly office in the Church. Thus for instance the concept of the 'priesthood' might come to cover a very different range of functions in respect of both the official role of the priest in the Church and of the sacramental powers conferred upon him. Again it is possible for there to be other sacramentally conferred 'leadership' functions (e.g. those of 'teacher' or 'community leader') apart from the priesthood itself. We may defer to tradition and the terminology in vogue at the moment by confining our use of the term 'priestly' as applied to such functions only to those which include presiding over the celebration of the Eucharist and the rest of the so-called sacramental powers. But this precisely does not invalidate the point that the Church is free to choose between a wide range of possibilities, or that she can exercise her own free judgement as to how best to divide up this single office between various functionaries according to the requirements of the situation at any given time, or how to distribute the functions themselves inherent in this single office as determined by the very nature of the Church herself.

4. There is a further point which we must not overlook in our quest for a simple point of departure comprehensible in terms of biblical theology and at the same time capable of 'realization' in the current circumstances, for determining the nature of the priestly office. This point is that in principle the word which has been entrusted to the Church has the force of an event, an exhibitive and effective character. It does not imply merely the communication of some reality which exists in total independence of the actual doctrinal

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

process of communicating it. The Church fulfils her own nature as the sacrament of God's self-utterance to the world in the word, and hence this word has in principle an exhibitive character. That which this word proclaims takes place through it. As with human words in other contexts so too with this word the degree of 'event' character to be attributed to it is essentially variable. And it is in that form which we call the sacrament in the theological and technical sense of the term that this 'event' character achieves its highest point. Nevertheless the fact that this word is essentially variable in the degree of 'event' character to be attributed to it and in respect of its power to take 'effect' does not deprive it of that basic force inherent in all the Church's words of rendering present the single event of salvation both as anamnesis and as prognosis. The proclaiming of the word and the dispensing of the sacrament, therefore, spring [36] from a single common root and are ultimately one in nature.[3]

The Point of Departure Itself

In the light of these considerations we can arrive at the following definition (although it must be admitted that in doing so we are adopting a somewhat audacious 'short-cut'): The priest is the proclaimer of the word of God, officially commissioned and appointed as such by the Church as a whole in such a way that this word is entrusted to him in the supreme degree of sacramental intensity inherent in it. His work as proclaimer of the word in this sense is essentially directed towards the community (which is at least potentially in existence). To express the matter quite simply, he is the one sent by the Church to proclaim the gospel in her name. He is this in the supreme mode in which this word can be realized, that namely of the anamnesis of the Death and Resurrection of Christ which is achieved in the celebration of the Eucharist. In defining the concept of the priesthood in these terms we are not seeking to set it apart from the episcopal office. The very fact that mediaeval theology denied that episcopal consecration had a distinct sacramental character in itself shows that it is not altogether easy to separate the two entities one from another even though since the Second Vatican Council the position of the mediaeval theologians can no longer be maintained.[4] On the basis of this definition of the concept it becomes clear that the priest is not simply a 'cult official',[5] and that this task of bearing witness to the word of God as exhibitive and effective of salvation is one that lays claims upon his whole existence (viewing this [37] from the theological standpoint), regardless of the extent to which it may also determine his calling in secular society or how far it may or may not supply his economic needs. Since the essence of his priesthood consists in proclaiming the word of God this imparts to it from the outset a missionary character. It orientates him from the outset towards a community, regardless of whether he can assume this as already in some sense in existence, or whether he has to create it ab initio; and regardless too of what the precise sociological constitution of this community may be.

---

[3] For a more detailed justification of this point cf. 'The Word and the Eucharist', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 253-286; 'The Theology of the Symbol', ibid., pp. 221-252; 'The Presence of the Lord in the Christian Community at Worship', Theological Investigations X (London and New York, 1973), pp. 84-102. We may refer to the points that have been demonstrated in the articles referred to in order to guard against any misunderstandings of our observations here.

[4] On this problem cf. chiefly Y. Congar, 'Tatsachen, Problem und Betrachtungen hinsichtlich der Weihevollmacht und der Beziehungen zwischen dem Presbyterat und dem Episkopat', Heilige Kirche (Stuttgart, 1966), pp. 285-316; also L. Ott, Das Weihesakrament, Handbuch der Dogmengeschichte IV/5 (Freiburg, 1969).

[5] The limitations of this idea even prior to the Tridentine decree are very ably demonstrated by K. Lehmann, 'Das dogmatische Problem des theologischen Anstazes zum Verständnis des Amtspriestertums'. Existenzprobleme des Priesters. Münchener Akademie-Schriften der Katholischen Akademie in Bayern 50 (Munich, 1969), pp. 121-175.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

What we have said does not rule out either the possibility or the fact of there being quite different ways in which the 'ministry of the word' may be realized, these too being 'official' ways and capable of being sacramentally imparted to an individual as a commission from the Church.

In this connection the concrete form which a priestly commission of this kind may assume in the social structure of the Church and in secular society may vary very greatly, and many of the functions which are de facto exercised by priests can in practice also be conceived of as special and non-priestly official functions in the Church without the theological essence of the priesthood itself being affected by this. The way in which the word is proclaimed, the concrete form of the community to which the priest is attached, the precise manner in which the various official functions, whether actual or possible, are co-ordinated in the Church, and the status of the priest in secular society – all these are factors which can vary very greatly. But we should not identify all these from the outset with that which constitutes the real theological essence of the priesthood. Not only are all these factors subject to change as a matter of empirical fact, but the Church herself ought actively to take the initiative in imparting ever new forms to them. Up to the present there has been a failure to realize sufficiently the extent to which official functions in the Church in general and the priesthood in particular are capable of being changed in this way both interiorly and exteriorly. Often the indelible character of the priesthood has been appealed to by those opposed to ideas of change of this sort. Contemporary exegesis, the history of dogma and of the Church, the sociology of the Church, and the needs of the Church in the present day all compel us to a radical re-appraisal of the mutable and immutable factors in the Catholic priesthood. If this re-appraisal is carried through boldly enough two points will become clear: first, there is indeed an abiding element in the priestly office such as justifies an individual in the concrete circumstances of his life as a man of today in entering upon it boldly and confidently; second, from the standpoint of dogmatic theology almost unlimited scope is available to the Church in subdividing and [38] giving concrete form to her official institutions in those ways which most effectively correspond to her own mission and the contemporary situation.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[39]

3

THEOLOGICAL REFLECTIONS ON THE PRIESTLY IMAGE OF TODAY AND TOMORROW

I

I must begin by saying that I am well aware of the fact that the article which follows represents only a very small selection, based on my own subjective preferences, from the totality of the subject-matter which falls under the heading mentioned in the title. The subject of our consideration is connected with so many problems in the fields of biblical theology, dogmatics, the history of religion, psychology, the sociology of religion, social politics, canon law and pastoral theology that in our present treatment our choice of subject-matter will almost of necessity be an arbitrary one, and we can say only very little on the subject as a whole.

With regard to the priestly office and the priest's own personal understanding of his office we find ourselves in a period of transition which is conditioned by both theological and social factors. Without prejudice to the fundamental theological nature of the institution of the Catholic priesthood – something that is inherent in the nature of the Church herself – the concrete form which the priestly ministry assumes in the course of the history of the Church can, may, and indeed should undergo repeated modifications. The very fact that the Church herself both is and should be an historical entity is in itself enough to make this necessary. The actual rate at which changes of this kind take place is not always the same. In the last hundred and fifty years we have lived through an epoch in which the concrete form of the institution of the Catholic priesthood has been relatively fixed and immutable both with regard to the priest's own theological understanding of his own function and with regard to his position in the Church, as also in secular society. Today, however, we are certainly in a situation in which the process of such changes is notably accelerated. The old image still survives. The old image still defends itself. But suddenly the old image is no longer taken for granted, and is [40] threatened. The new image makes itself felt, but has not yet acquired any clear outlines. In such a period of transition and the uncertainty which it inevitably entails, in which experiment is justified and tentative trials are made, in which there is a right and a wrong way of holding firm to the traditional and the accustomed, we priests must maintain an attitude of patience and courage with ourselves, our office, and the Church whom we serve. We must learn to live with those factors in our office which are questionable, and which today we must inevitably feel as burdensome. We must calmly endure those elements in our priestly situation which seem to be troubled, obscure and confused. We cannot simply entrench ourselves in the accustomed ways, in that which has been tried and proved over a long period and enacted a thousand times over, nor can we, simply by a revolutionary act of force, produce in priests ex nillilo sui et subjecti that conception of their own role, that mode of priestly life and work, which future generations of priests are perhaps destined to have the happiness of achieving in all its classic and fully refined purity in the near or more distant future.

Such problems in understanding one's own role arise in other callings too in virtue of changes in the social situation, and the individuals concerned cannot forcibly apply that interpretation of their role which is appropriate to the present to the future also, because problems of this kind call for concrete decisions and not merely speculative considerations. No-one is free to choose any situation he likes for his life, and hence it is that we priests of today have had the great task and burden imposed upon us of enduring this period of transition in patience and hope. Yet this is something which God can demand of a priest and a Christian. Sometimes from sheer perplexity and insecurity we find ourselves asking what the role of the priest of the future is to be, and how he is to work. But this has nothing to do with prophesying, the capricious conjuring up of fantasies, or wishful thinking and dreaming. What is involved in such a line of enquiry is simply a realistic confrontation with a future state of affairs, in so far as we are already in a position to foresee this, in order (as far as possible and with all necessary provisos) to deduce consequences from this for the priestly way of life. Our uncertainties with regard to the form which the priesthood will take in the future – uncertainties which oppress us so much today, and in many respects even reduce us to perplexity (something which we can freely admit to ourselves) – are perfectly reconcilable with the firm and unquestioning conviction of faith that the official institution of the priesthood will always exist in the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

For at least fifteen hundred years, and since the much criticized Constantine [41] era, the institution and function of the priest in the Church have also come to be regarded as a profession so far as the world is concerned, one which, like any other profession, has been fitted almost without any friction into the structure of secular society adopted by the corpus christianum. For this, after all, has been more or less identical with society at the political level. Certainly from the theological point of view the priesthood has always been a profession sui generis, with powers and functions which distinguish this particular office from any other worldly calling. Nevertheless within secular society at the social and political level the priest as such has himself had a definite place of his own, carrying a social prestige more or less inherent in the office itself and independent of the personality of its holder, and carrying also a degree of economic support accorded to the priest by secular society, albeit in the most varied forms. In virtue of these the priestly office has been a profession in the normal and modern sense of the term. The priest has had a function in human society which has been recognized and valued by that society itself. It has been taken for granted that the divine calling to the priesthood is at the same time an earthly profession too.

There is nothing in the nature of the priesthood itself which makes this necessary. Nor can we, on the basis of our personal conviction of faith, assert from the outset that this will continue to be the case. The priestly vocation and the office of the priesthood need not necessarily or in all cases also imply a profession taken for granted as such in society. There can be great differences between a vocation and a profession. Indeed there already are in the secular sphere vocations, missions, and forms of human activity extending even into the public life of society which do not ipso facto imply any particular profession which is either desired, expected or ipso facto recognized as a way of earning one's living by society itself. In fact the very nature of missions of this sort can be imperilled to the utmost in those cases in which they are also institutionalized and accepted as ways of earning one's living in society. This is the case, for instance, with poets, philosophers, artists, or the prophets of a new ideology. Even in the secular sphere there can be a great difference between vocation and profession. The tension between the two may be so great that it can actually be a criterion of the genuineness of a vocation of this kind that it is impossible to institutionalize this vocation in any calling such as society can recognize. Now if this is already true in the secular sphere then the priestly vocation can certainly not ipso facto and as a matter of course be conceived of, without any further distinction, according to the conceptual model of a profession in society, even though a habitual outlook extending [42] over a millenium and a half represents a constant temptation to us to conceive of the priestly vocation in these terms. Today we are actually in a position to say with Paul in a completely realistic and objective manner that he who ministers at the altar should also live by the altar. Nevertheless in this period of transition we will have to ask ourselves again and again whether from the very heart

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation and centre of our existence we are succeeding in really understanding and constantly renewing our acceptance of our own priesthood without tacitly attaching to this understanding the prior condition that the priesthood itself must be capable of being lived in such a way that it also constitutes our worldly profession.

II

After these preliminary remarks let us attempt to develop a few theological considerations with regard to the nature of the priesthood. This is something which has become obscure to many priests of today, not merely because the social status which it carries no longer appears to them to be taken for granted and secure, but also for theological reasons. A fresh problem has arisen with regard to the very relationship between that which is religious in the sacramental sense on the one hand and the secular on the other quite in general. This is because modern man has the impression that if he is to find God at all he must seek him in the sphere of his secular and everyday life, that that which is cultic and religious in the specific sense is ipso facto and of itself suspect, that it is 'religion' rather than Christian 'faith'. In the light of the New Testament a question arises ever anew of whether the presbyter of the primitive Church should be interpreted at all in terms of the religious category of the priest, that is to say the 'mediator' between the holy God and an unholy people empowered by a higher authority for cultic activities. In the light of the true and biblical doctrine of the royal priesthood of the holy covenant people of God the question presents itself of what place there can still be on such a view for the official priest within this holy covenant people, seeing that its relationship to God is immediate. How can any such official priesthood still constitute a special calling, and that too both in the society of the Church as such and at the same time in secular society. These are a few specific reasons for the sense of insecurity that a priest feels in his understanding of his own role. They relate to the official priesthood as such. But to these and similar specific reasons other and more general ones must be added, reasons which, though they are less specific, are nevertheless [43] far-reaching in their effects. The authentically religious element as it exists today – even when it is a real and living force, and indeed most of all here – manifests itself as that about which we maintain a tactful silence, that which must not be spoken of, that which does not fall within the sphere of social and institutional policy making.

Here we have only been able to indicate these reasons for the insecurity which the priest feels in interpreting his own role. But in response to these reasons it cannot be our task at this point to present a biblical theology defining the precise nature of the apostle, the disciple, the presbyter, the deacon, the bishop, the prophet, the teacher in the Church. As found in the New Testament all these concepts are still fluid both in themselves and in their mutual relationship to one another. It is by no means the case that in the New Testament they always have the same meaning, and it is a difficult question, and one which has certainly not yet fully been solved, to decide precisely what elements in all that is referred to by such terms as so many functions in the life of the Church have entered into the hierarchically ordered offices of bishop, priest and deacon as we have them today, and what elements in these primitive functions are still really present apart from these offices in the contemporary Church, although, it may be, in quite anonymous forms or existing under different designations. Here we must confine ourselves to a few theological considerations which on the one hand can be deduced from a wholly traditional theology of the sacrament of order, and which on the other hand still serve to show how even today the essence of the Catholic priesthood can still be conceived of as a unity, although one that is still at the same time vital and capable of change.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If we wish to achieve a genuine theological understanding of the nature of the ministerial functions in the Church which we designate as her official priesthood then we must take as our starting-point the Church as one and whole. An alternative would be to interpret the priesthood of the Church whether explicitly or unconsciously in terms of a general conception of the priest as the mediator endowed with higher faculties between a sacral dimension belonging to God as holy on the one hand, and a secular and unholy world on the other. This concept of the priesthood would be worked out in terms of this history and phenomenology of religion in general. But if we adopted this approach we would constantly be in danger of misconceiving the true nature of that function in the Church which we nowadays designate as the priesthood, departing in this to some extent from the linguistic usage of scripture. We can legitimately designate this function as the priesthood, provided only that we overcome [44] the dangers of misunderstanding which such a concept entails. We should take as our starting-point a concept of the Church as one and whole and achieve an understanding of what is special in the function which the presbyters in the Church take upon themselves in the light of the nature of the Church herself.

God loves the world. His grace is at work everywhere and in every age. Considered as God's self-bestowal offered to man it summons man in all dimensions, including the 'secular one', to a decision: the decision namely of whether or not he accepts this self-offering of God in the living of his everyday life, although his acceptance of it may perhaps be at a quite unexplicit level. If the 'sacral' is ultimately constituted by the grace of God, in which God becomes the sustaining basis, the ultimate depths, and the absolute future of man, then in this ultimate sense there is no sacral sphere such as could be marked off as the holy temple and set apart from a profane and Godless world, as though it were only there, and not here, that the holy God of eternal life was waiting for us and was to be found. There is only one ultimate line of division between the secular and the sacral, that namely defined by the mortal guilt of man's refusal of God, God who wills his salvation to be everywhere and in all dimensions of man. In relation to this sanctification of the secular world even the Church as a whole is simply the basic sacramental sign of the fact that God has, in this sense, loved the world itself. When the will of God towards the world as forgiving it and permeating it with his own divinity is explicitly proclaimed in this Church in the word of preaching, in the creed, in the sacral sign, then, while this proclamation is certainly effective, what it proclaims is not a saving event which takes place only in the explicitly sacral sphere of the proclamation itself. What this proclamation constitutes rather is an explicit revelation of a saving will on God's part which is addressed in the form of judgement and grace to the whole world in all its dimensions and epochs, and which can still achieve victory even in those spheres in which it is never accepted at all at the level of conscious and explicit decision. For the acceptance can take a purely anonymous form and consist simply in maintaining integrity and honesty throughout the vicissitudes of life.

From this point of view alone, then, the Church as a whole is not simply identical with the salvation of the world. Rather she constitutes the historical and symbolic manifestation of this salvation, the basic sacrament of salvation for the world. Now if this is true, then still more caution must be brought to bear if we are rightly to define the nature of one specific function within this Church. The officially ordained priest is not the sacral representative of God who is equipped with celestial powers and [45] set apart from an unholy people by God. Rather he is the bearer of one specific and necessary function within a people that has already been sanctified by God. The universal priesthood is not an entity deduced from the official priesthood by a process of metaphorical refinement. Rather it constitutes the sustaining basis for this official priesthood. It is because there is a holy covenant people, because the Church as one and whole constitutes the historical and social manifestation of God's will to bring universal salvation to the world as eschatologically victorious, because the Church is she who makes manifest this victory of God's universal will to save – it is because of this that there can be within her such a specific function as the official priesthood. There must be an official institution of this kind in the Church because the Church is an entity which, of its very nature, must necessarily have directive functions at the social and historical levels too, through which she becomes apprehensible and effective for the individuals within her and about her. But for this very reason the nature of these directive functions at the social level is in its turn determined by the nature of the Church herself. This does not exclude, but rather includes the fact that as applied to the individual holder of such functions it both can and must be said that he receives his commission to exercise such functions from God and Christ, and is not commissioned to exercise them as it were from below by the multitude of individual members within the Church inasmuch as this multitude can be thought of as prior to the Church herself as constituted as a society, in other words as structurally organized by her official institutions. Certainly the Church only becomes concrete and effective to the extent that one factor, albeit not the only one, by which she is constituted is the factor of officialdom within her considered as one particular function. But for this very reason this element of officialdom derives its nature, its eschatological character, its special features, and its limits from the Church considered as a whole and as one. In the light of this we can understand, for instance, that it is only a baptized individual who can be a priest, that the Eucharist which he celebrates is from the outset the Eucharist of the holy people of God, that he can only teach inasmuch as he himself hears in a spirit of belief and inasmuch as it is the faith of the universal Church that he preaches, for the Church as hearing and as encompassed by the victorious grace of God is she who is indefectible. We can understand also that all sacramental power that is conferred empowers the individual to achieve a fulfilment of the Church's own nature, and to do so in such a way that the recipient of the sacrament does not merely remain passive, but himself makes a positive contribution towards this self-fulfilment of the Church in which she makes actual her [46] own nature as the basic sacrament of salvation for the world. In fact this is the almost universal teaching of the theologians, at least with regard to the sacrament of penance.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We should conceive of the priestly office, then, from the standpoint of the Church. We should think of it not as a power which in the first instance sets its holder over against the Church as the people of God, but as the empowering of an individual in one specific area to achieve the fulfilment of that which the Church is as a whole, and moreover, that fulfilment which she must achieve in this way in virtue of her official ministry. And once we recognize this then we can understand how very cautious we must be in enquiring into the specific characteristics proper to the ministerial priesthood in relation to the rest of the members of the Church.

In the case of many priests today we find a degree of insecurity with regard to their understanding of their own priesthood which strikes us as almost neurotic. The question is raised of what a priest really is and why there still are priests today, seeing that on the one hand almost everything which he himself has the power to do and does could also be done by others, and on the other that the little which, according to the teaching of the Catholic faith, can be done only by ordained priests can hardly constitute the content and the function of a 'principal calling'. Certainly the following proposition is true: according to Catholic teaching and practice there is little in that which constitutes the normal activity of a priest engaged in the pastoral ministry which could not also be done by a 'layman'. At least provided that authority is granted on the part of the hierarchical Church (something which it is perfectly well able to do) teaching and directing, indeed baptizing itself, are not acts for which priestly ordination is absolutely required, although in concrete living practice all these constitute the principle part of the priests' vocational work. Of course there is a whole range of further and more subtle problems which might be treated of in this connection. But abstracting from these we can certainly raise a further question with regard to those functions of presiding over the celebration of the Eucharist, the administration of the sacrament of penance and the anointing of the sick which, according to Catholic teaching, can be exercised only by an ordained priest. Even if a special 'class' has to be constituted within the hierarchical structure of the Church in order to cater for these functions we are of course entitled to ask whether in themselves they are capable of constituting a 'calling' in the sense in which this is understood in secular society, one namely which, even from the secular point of view, constitutes the main occupation of an individual in the same way that an official post in secular society does.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[47] Yet if we present the question in this way and divide the function of the ministerial priesthood into its individual components in this way then, even though in doing so we are following the pattern of the established theology of the seminaries itself, we are still putting the question falsely. In this connection it may be pointed out that the problem which we are treating of here is still not precisely the problem of whether the priestly office in the Catholic Church should necessarily also have the status of a profession in the secular sense. This problem of the professionalization of the priesthood, as it is called by the contemporary sociologists of religion, is one with which we shall have to concern ourselves at a later stage. But in order to recognize how false it is to present the question in the manner envisaged here, and in order to achieve an understanding of how the question should rightly be presented, we may begin by pointing to an analogous example, namely the recent revival of the diaconate in the Latin Church.

In the discussion which has taken place in recent years both before and after the Council, the objection has often been raised even by such personages as Cardinal Ottaviani that the diaconate comprises no tasks or functions whatever which, provided the Church authorises it, could not be exercised by laymen also. From this point of view the problem with which we are here concerned arises still more acutely than in the case of the official priesthood. For in this case there are at least some powers and functions which, according to Catholic teaching, can only be attributed to the ordained priest. Nevertheless in response to this attitude of scepticism with regard to the diaconate and its renewal it has rightly been pointed out that to present the question precisely in this way is false. It has been emphasized that what is in question here is not whether in ordaining an individual as deacon we are transferring functions to him which he would not otherwise possess and hence has not previously exercised. The question is rather concerned with a whole unified complex of functions and tasks, reasonable in themselves, which the individual holds and exercises in the name of the Church. Does there exist in the society of the Church an explicitly sacramental form and sacramental seal which can be applied to this unified complex of functions and tasks in such a way as to give the individual concerned an assurance of grace in the exercise of his tasks? The question of the legitimacy and reasonableness of a sacramental order, therefore, is not, in the last analysis to be answered by pointing out that one or other of the tasks involved in the Church is only possible provided the individual has actually been ordained for it in this way. This question is to be answered rather by applying the principle that it is [48] reasonable and in accordance with the nature of the Church to confer a sacramental seal and sacramental power upon the official and institutionalized functions exercised in the Church as a society, and moreover this remains true even in those cases in which such functions and tasks are 'in themselves' possible and indeed de facto exercised in the Church even when no such ordination has been conferred. The nature of sacramental ordination and the purpose for which it is designed are such that it does not depend upon whether it relates to something and achieves some form of consecration which would otherwise not exist at all.

In the light of this it becomes clear that priestly ordination is in principle and from the outset also related to such priestly functions as are possible and actually practised in themselves even without ordination, such functions, therefore, as teaching, directing,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

preaching the gospel in the name of the Church and in the word of authority that claims the obedience of faith. In other contexts too sacraments are in fact – especially so far as their recipients are concerned – not symbolic events such that without them the actual reality signified, the res sacramenti, would not be possible. Rather they are the historical, social and effective manifestation of those events of grace which are also possible even apart from them, and the effects of which extend beyond that sphere within which these events require to be made manifest at the sacramental level also. Grace, justification, and even unity with the Body of Christ in his Spirit (the res sacramenti in the Eucharist) are in fact possible and become a reality even apart from baptism, the sacrament of penance and the Eucharist. And yet this does not mean that we have either to deny or to obscure our obligation to receive these sacraments or the 'necessitas medii' attached to them. In an analogous way, therefore, priestly ordination can perfectly well be applied to the totality of the priestly office as this is exercised in the concrete in the Church. The basic question with regard to the essence of the priestly office, therefore, is not 'What is it which the priest alone can do?' but rather this: Let us say that what the priest assumes and brings to its fulness in his office is a complex of tasks and functions deriving its meaning from the nature of the Church herself, so that it is this that gives the priestly office its justification. On this showing, then, are we to understand this complex as a unity that is conferred on a specific individual so as sacramentally to empower him to exercise these tasks and functions, and so constituting a special status in the Church with a distinctive content of its own?

Certainly with regard to the manifold elements in this complex we can impose a structure upon this complex. Certainly we can take as our [49] starting-point in imposing this structure the fact that the individual is empowered to proclaim that effective and exhibitive word which the priest utters in the name of the Church in the celebration of the Eucharist. We can further freely and unreservedly take into account the fact that the complex of such priestly tasks and functions in the concrete is itself subject to a certain process of change in the course of history – the more so since according to the witness of history itself no absolute lines of demarcation can be deduced by which this complex can be separated off from the complex of functions and tasks belonging to the bishop. But the imposing of a structure of this kind on the complex of priestly tasks and functions, and even the factor of change in the concrete realization of this complex, do not exclude the fact that priestly ordination bears upon the complex of these functions taken as a single whole, that priestly ordination consecrates the individual for this complex and confers it upon him as a single whole, and that it is not confined merely to those functions of the priest which are reserved to the ordained individual exclusively. To put the matter bluntly: the priest is not merely ordained to say Mass, but equally to preach the gospel in the name of the Church, and this statement is not invalidated by the fact that it can be said that preaching the gospel can also be done without ordination. The point in question here, therefore, is simply whether the complex of priestly tasks as it exists de facto in the present constitutes, when viewed as a whole, a meaningful complex of tasks and functions which must be present in the Church. Now this is a question which can unreservedly and unambiguously be answered in the affirmative, and that too even if we leave the question of whether any particular element in this complex will also continue to be included in it in the future.

In order to understand this more clearly we must first go back somewhat further in history. We should not in the first instance take as our starting-point that threefold division of the Church's office into bishop, priest and deacon which is traditional, and also functioned as legitimate in the Second Vatican Council. The official institution of the Church is ultimately one, and that too not merely in the sense of an a posteriori unity among the holders of office in the Church, but in itself. The Church has an office and, moreover, in virtue of the fact that she, without prejudice to the deeper unity in the Holy Spirit of faith, hope and love, of her very essence is also endowed with an historical dimension. At this level too, then, the Church is she who is one and she who must necessarily actualize her own nature as a single social entity, amongst other factors through that one precisely which we call her official institutions, although this does not imply that the Church as such and as one could only achieve the fulness [50] of her own nature in actual terms through her official institutions. It is not easy, and above all not possible in any adequate sense here, to express the basic essence of this single office in a definition that is brief and yet at the same time expresses all that it contains in terms of the nature of the Church herself. To do this we should have to consider this nature in itself, and that too at a most radical level of theological thought, a level to which the dogmatic constitution on the Church of the Second Vatican Council has brought us essentially nearer, but which it has still not succeeded in achieving in any definitive sense. We should have to consider the unity which exists between that which in ecclesiology is called the 'potestas ordinis' and that which in the same discipline is referred to as the 'potestas jurisdictionis'. And in doing this we should have to ask whether these two concepts, even considered in their ultimate and original unity, provide a basis for the whole essence of the factor of office in the Church, or whether in them functions such as, for instance, the prophetic function, which also belong in some sense to the factor of office in the Church, are not perhaps too inadequately represented. We should have to ask ourselves whether the Church as understood simply in these terms does not after all appear too much as a mere static establishment.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We have no intention of denying the questionable factors in this, or of rejecting as false or misconceived other possibilities of arriving at a radical definition of the nature of the Church at this level, and, arising from this, of the factor of office in her. But even allowing for this, we may perhaps commit ourselves to the following statement: For our present purposes we are viewing the Church not as the society of the saved, though obviously she is also and even primarily this, but rather as the medium of salvation – in other words as the offering of salvation to mankind and not as the acceptance of salvation. On this showing, then, we must describe her as the abiding actualization of that word of promise on God's part which was uttered and made manifest in Jesus Christ in history, and which is eschatologically victorious. This word certainly achieves its supreme point in that proclamation of the Death and Resurrection of Jesus in the Eucharist which renders these events present. But obviously too it is not restricted to this. For this basic word must not merely be doctrinally formulated, developed and expressed in ever new forms corresponding to the concrete situation of the world itself, so that in this sense the word itself has a history of its own, but more than this it must be uttered in a form in which it can penetrate into the concrete situation of the individual man and into all the dimensions of individual human life both private and social so as to become actual for the present and future [51] alike. In this sense, then, this basic word in its unity bears within it a character that is at once doctrinal, juridical in the social sense, sacramental, and prophetic.

The nature of the Church as medium of salvation, therefore, consists in the presence of this word as understood here being actualised ever afresh. Moreover the Church in this sense necessarily has a social character also, and therefore an institutional character and an official establishment, Now it follows from this that with regard to the nature of the priesthood, presupposing all that has already been said with regard to its complexity, this can be specified by the fact that as conferred on an individual it empowers him to proclaim this word as the word of the Church. In defining the nature of the priesthood in this sense we can set aside those elements in it which distinguish it from the episcopate, for these are relatively secondary and, moreover, have varied in the course of history, and for our present considerations they are of minor importance. The priest is he who has been empowered for the ministry of the word in the Church, and we can recognize in this 'definition' all the functions attributed to him provided that we have clearly before our eyes the manifold dimensions intrinsic in this word, the variations in the degree of its actuality, and its exhibitive character, its nature as not merely doctrinal but prophetic too in its orientation, and its character as promise. All these are factors in it which we have already indicated above.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is unimportant whether the bearers of the word which is, in this sense, 'official' can also be – at least in certain degrees of its actualization and certain specific directions – men who have not been essentially commissioned for proclaiming this word by having that special power conferred upon them which we call priestly ordination. In those cases in which a commission of this kind is given with sufficient breadth (although it may be rather vague with regard to the more peripheral activities which it includes) it should also be ratified, made explicit and reinforced with the sacramental grace necessary for it in the public and social life of the Church. According to the Catholic interpretation of faith this word is present in a particularly intense degree in the word of the Eucharistic anamnesis, in the word of pardon uttered in the sacrament of penance, and in the concretion of this in the anointing of the sick, so that in all normal cases in the life of the Church this sacramental ratification constitutes an indispensable prior condition for the word to be uttered in these contexts, so that everything may take place 'in order' in the Church. The Church is intended to be something more than merely the amalgam of the individual religious enthusiasts, the 'zealots'. For though the Church has a certain freedom, [52] bequeathed to her by Christ himself, as to the precise manner in which she defines the powers attached to the individual offices within her, and as to the way in which she divides her offices into several degrees or orders, still this factor of institutionalized office is something that she must have, and its function is to empower its holders to render present through their official witness this word that is always identified with the Church herself. Now if all this is true then there is in the Church a priesthood of a kind which cannot be reduced solely to the cult of the Church in the narrower sense.

An office of this kind is of its very nature so multi-dimensional, necessarily extending its claims over all departments of the life of its holders, and it depends upon so many prior human factors, that the function it confers upon its holder in the Church is far from being merely a partial one. On the contrary it gives him, amongst other things, a clearly defined status in the social life of the Church as such, and in virtue of this fact implies a vocation and a calling in the ecclesiological sense even though this does not necessarily, or at all epochs in the Church's history, carry with it a professional status in secular society as something that is accorded by that society and is effective in its life. This remains true however much it may be the case that this is likely to be brought about as a result of the interplay between the ecclesiastical and the secular spheres, an interplay which it is quite impossible wholly to avoid.

So long, therefore, as we believe in the nature of the Church and her character as abiding we have no reason to call in question the necessity of the official priesthood as an abiding factor in her. However much the image of this may be charged in secular society its nature will endure. Now the nature of the official priesthood is such as to lay claims upon the whole man in such a way that it certainly implies a vocation and, following from this, a profession too, taking the term profession here to signify a comprehensive and permanent task which an individual exercises on behalf of others, which to a very large extent demands that his whole life shall be committed to it, and which is prior to any process of institutionalization in terms of secular society. If a priest were unable to understand his priesthood in this sense as a vocation and thereby as a profession too, he would have failed to understand the very nature of this priesthood itself. If today he is experiencing the fact that secularized society refuses to recognize his 'profession', then he is simply suffering from the contradiction of the Church as such by the 'world' (something which the Christian layman also has to endure in his own way), and he should ask himself how he can be surprised at this since in fact, after all,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Christian faith always [53] implies folly and scandal so far as the 'world' is concerned. Certainly as a result of this contradiction special features will often be evoked in the activities and life of the priest as it de facto exists which have nothing to do with the nature of the priesthood itself, and through these we and the Church in the concrete often cause scandal to the world in a way that is unnecessary and regrettable. But for the most part what is implied in this contradiction is, after all, something which constitutes the very nature of the Church and the priesthood, for the word of God both as judging and as liberating is destined to be contradicted and this is precisely something that belongs to its very nature.

III

While recognizing, then, that the priestly office as it exists today, and also as it will exist in the future, constitutes a special status in the Church and, in this theological sense, a profession, this is still clearly not enough to decide the question of the priesthood considered as a profession in the secular sense also. Certainly we might refer to the biblical statement that he who ministers at the altar can also live by the altar, and in fact we have already invoked this principle. We could further point to the fact that in secular society as it exists today, with its extremely wide variation of callings and divisions of labour, there is a whole range of callings and professions in a secular sense within that society which do not play any part in the social productivity of that society in the material sense. Those engaged in the representational arts, authors and musicians for instance, belong to this category. The fact that they live by their activities in these fields is something which society accepts without question. It could further be emphasized that on a right theological understanding of the function of the priest in the Church, which is so very far from being confined merely to the cult, it actually includes today, and will include in the future, so many prior activities and tasks that it can only be fulfilled if it is accepted as a 'principal calling'. All these aspects certainly have a certain significance even with regard to the future, and they will also be capable of taking effect in the future at least provided that society does not become so anti-Christian and hostile that it prevents them with physical force. But this is still not enough to provide any effective answer to the question of the 'professionalization' or professional status of the priesthood. From two points of view a question still remains: on the one hand from the point of view of the reform which the Church and the individual local and [54] worshipping community will assume in the future, and on the other from the point of view of the function which the priest himself will have to fulfil for communities of this kind.

It is not merely that which still lies totally in the future which is affected by these questions. For in some sense this future has already begun even here and now, and hence the questions which we have raised already affect the present-day life of the priest and his understanding of his own function, the more so since, after all, it is the priests of the present day (not alone, it is true, but still amongst others) who will have to conduct the Church into the future that awaits her. For this reason we cannot simply set these questions aside if we want to consider the priesthood as it exists today. We cannot do this even though at the same time we must neither forget nor neglect the point that we emphasized at the beginning of these considerations, namely that calmness and patience which are so needful in a period of transition.

The moment we turn to consider the future form of the Church herself this 'professional status' to be attributed to the priesthood becomes a question. For over the space of one and a half millenia the Church has existed as a national Church, so that her status in the midst of secular society has, on the whole, been taken for granted and never called in question, and on this showing the professional status of the priesthood too has been something accepted

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

without question. Nor do we need, from our contemporary point of view, to condemn this status of being a national Church which the Church has enjoyed since the 'Constantine epoch' as in principle a sinful derogation on the Church's part. This status of being a 'national Church' has been, and still is – to some extent this is still true even today – a historical phenomenon which was probably quite incapable of being otherwise, and which, moreover, has certainly had a positive significance for the true and enduring function of the Church herself. Nevertheless all this seems to tell in favour of the point of view that the Church is changing from being a 'national Church' into a Church of those who believe as an act of their own personal and free decision. Whereas earlier, and right down to our own days the Church has been, despite all her struggles with the state, a social entity in her social constitution and in the status accorded to her by secular society, one which, through her power as a society, her institutions, the value accorded to her in public opinion etc., was prior to the free decision of faith on the part of the individuals, and rather supported this than was supported by it, nowadays this situation is changing at an ever-increasing rate.

More and more the Church, with her offices, the authority attached to [55] these, her value in the eyes of the public etc., is becoming an entity such that her real effectiveness in society is dependent upon the free faith of those who confess their allegiance to her, and incidentally to recognize this is in no sense to deny the fact that she has been founded by God in Jesus Christ. It is true that in a Church which is only gradually becoming a Church of personal believers in this sense, there still always are certain elements (justifiably so not merely with regard to the Church's due mode of existence but also with regard to her real effectiveness) which are prior to the free decision of faith on the part of the individual to believe in the Church. These factors are present first because even a believing community continues to be in specific areas a real entity in secular society which also plays its part in shaping the situation in which non-believers live. A further reason why such elements still remain in the Church is that Christian parents have a right and duty to bring up their children as Christians and to bring them to a positive decision of faith. On the other hand, however, this still does not in the least alter the fact that there is a difference between the national Church of the past and the Church of free personal faith which is gradually developing and which must so develop even though at the same time we hope and work to ensure that this future Church will not be all too small a flock in terms of the numbers of her members.

In a Church of this kind constituted by personal faith it is after all inevitable that the professional status of the priesthood in its secular aspects will in some respects be called in question. Certainly the Church of the future must be open in a missionary and apostolic sense to the whole of society, and this means to non-believers as well. She must not seek to turn herself into a ghetto, a small sect with the sort of cosiness and lack of interest in the 'wide world' outside which is characteristic of this. But the number of her priests, their mode of life, the possibility of their human existence, will be primarily conditioned by the number of adherents, the economic resources which they will have and their mentality in a Church of the kind we are thinking of. For instance it is after all hardly conceivable that throughout all future ages this Church will to a large extent have her economic necessities provided for by those who have no personal relationship to the Church whatever in terms of faith, are hardly Christians at all even in the most superficial sense through baptism, and declare themselves Christians only for the purposes of their official status in secular society (this is in fact the situation which prevails today in central Europe with regard to the administration of taxes on behalf of the Church).

Conversely we can foresee that the resources which a living community [56] of believers of this kind will be able to contribute towards those who are called to be priests will be on a totally different basis, and will be conditioned by quite different factors in terms of education and way of life than is the case today with the great majority of such communities.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Certainly it is desirable that in the future too as many priests as possible will be humanly and theologically highly educated men who can also assume a significant place in secular society. At the same time, however, it is certainly not a matter of necessity in the very nature of the Church that the priests will have simply the same type of academic formation as educated functionaries in the state. Already today in view of the fact that the lack of priests is becoming ever greater we should work to abolish prejudices of this kind, and seek to devize institutional means of enabling men to become priests which need not be identical with those which are nowadays required for so-called late vocations to the priesthood. We shall straightway be going on to develop certain aspects of this point in somewhat greater detail.

A preliminary point that still has to be recognized is that even from the point of view of the function of the priest himself his professional status will be called in question to a notable extent in the future. On any honest and realistic view of out work we priests of today must admit that our work and the success which it achieves, which is still considerable even today, depends upon the conditions provided by the national Church and by a traditional Christianity. People still come to the Church even when we preach badly. The Church taxes are still paid, even though the relationship between these and the Christian faith and the Church is an extremely problematical one. Even today, without having to exert ourselves particularly, we still receive almost all the children of parents who have been baptized Catholics in baptism and religious instruction in the state schools. Even today it is still almost universally regarded as important to be buried with the Christian rites. Our sermons and morning prayers are transmitted over the radio even when they are bad. In the long run, however, we cannot simply count upon this always remaining the case. But any alterations which take place in this situation, whether they are gradual or, as it may be, in the form of spectacular upheavals, we priests will be brought face to face in a far plainer and harsher light with the fact that the success of our work depends upon the vitality of our own personal religious lives, and will survive precisely so long as this survives. Just as an artist (i.e. one who thinks of himself as such) goes hungry and fails if the personal factor in his art is not real and strong, so too the priest of the future will depend, in his concrete living, upon the question of whether he [57] is really a man who lives from the heart and centre of his own personal existence as one who bears witness to the faith and arouses faith in others. To put the matter crudely the priest of the future will ‘earn’ as much as he himself provides in terms of genuine religion. But this does not imply that we are in any sense calling in question that professional status which is still obviously present among us today, and that too even though we neither wish nor expect the priest of the future not to ‘live by the altar’.

Let us attempt, albeit only in the form of questions which are genuinely conceived of as open and unreserved, to express in somewhat more concrete form, the point which we have just sketched out in barest outline. It is perfectly conceivable that a situation might arise in which some future community of believers found itself unable to discover any more priests through the administrative channels customary hitherto. Why, then, should such a community not discover and select from among its own more vital members some senior man who (the due conditions of theological formation and human maturity being fulfilled, and ordination having been conferred by the bishop) would become the ‘presbyter’ of this community, its priest? Certainly we will always need priests and bishops in the Church who also exercise the priesthood as their ‘chief office’ and ‘main calling’ in the secular and civic sense, and also in the manner in which these were to be found in the first centuries of the Church in circumstances of persecution. But does this prevent us from boldly envisaging the possibility that there may also be ‘part-time’ priests in the civic sense, and that it may be that this will be something that is not merely forced upon us by the ever greater lack of priests, but also something that has positive opportunities and advantages of its own to offer? The term ‘part-time’ as applied here would in fact only serve to characterize a priesthood of this sort from the standpoint of secular society. But it would not imply that such a priesthood would be, in the concrete existence of the individual, or in a theological sense, a hobby which such priests would practise in their spare time.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Today the 'diaspora' situation of the Church is increasing and extending, and because of this any organization of the cure of souls in the Church on a basis which is in principle territorial will also perhaps become ever more difficult and problematical. Now in view of this would it not be possible to work out the concrete form of the priesthood as vested in a specific individual in terms of a personal group of a specific kind, and not by invoking the territorial principle of the parish, which, after all, still consistently serves as the basic model for priestly activity. After all there may already be today many men, both young and old, who are [58] suitable for the priesthood in the truly theological sense already indicated, and who feel themselves called to it even though they may not on this account ipso facto regard themselves as suited or feel themselves inclined to take upon themselves all the various functions exercised by a parish priest as normally envisaged today. Could we not, without prejudice to the theological essence of the priesthood, be bold enough to allow it to become specialized? Could we not from the outset juridically work out institutional forms for it in such a way that when this priesthood was conferred upon the individual through sacramental ordination the range of functions attached to it and the group of believers which that individual was intended to serve would be such as he himself felt himself formed enough to cope with.

We have in fact already come to recognize a similar situation with regard to the deacons who are newly ordained or about to be so. The social worker who has been ordained deacon or the teacher of religion who has been ordained deacon, despite having been ordained, and indeed concomitantly with it, precisely continues in his own calling. He is not obliged to perform all those functions which in principle and in themselves are included and consecrated through this sacramental ordination. Why should not something similar also be conceived of and introduced in the future in the case of the priesthood as well? After all it would for instance be perfectly possible to ordain one of a group of masters attached to a secondary school as priest, without thereby obliging him even in principle to any kind of priestly activity outside the milieu in which he had formerly lived and worked. The established offices in the Church are essentially one, and they are capable of far more variations and subdivisions so as to suit those who hold them than we have been accustomed to recognize hitherto. For generally speaking even when we consider this problem at the theoretical level we overlook the fact of how many concrete variations of form priestly activity has already manifested in former times, as it still does to this day.

We may notice merely in passing that among these possibilities for the future the questions of priestly celibacy would also have to be thought out afresh. I myself have been most resolute in supporting the view that celibacy should be retained even for secular priests. I am convinced that any further secularization of the clergy would not be conducive to the salvation of the Church and the priesthood, and moreover that in accordance with the recommendation of scripture the priest is called to live by, and to bear witness to his faith in that eternal life which is not of this world, amongst other things by his renunciation of marriage, however great this [59] blessing may be. These considerations of themselves are enough to justify my support of priestly celibacy. At the same time, however, the question may very well be raised whether this sacred burden should be imposed upon all those groups of priests who may perhaps be formed in the future within the single priesthood.

The priestly office will endure in the Catholic Church because the Church endures. In the outward forms it assumes in secular society it may undergo great changes. We do not need to introduce such changes violently or in a hysterical and revolutionary spirit. Nevertheless we should not shrink from them either, as though through them the essence of the priesthood

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

itself were to be imperilled. We only safeguard the abiding essence of the priesthood when we maintain an attitude of freedom and openness towards a change in its external forms as and when this is demanded by the situation of the Church today and in the future. And so in accordance with that attitude of mind which prevails today at least in this respect in the hierarchy of the Church we must guard still more against any tendency to a conservative rigidity than against being over-bold in devizing fresh forms of the priesthood. But in an age in which an ecclesiastical defeatism and a general insecurity prevail, an age in which the Christian faith is under attack in the most radical manner, the point of first and last importance with regard to the priesthood is that unconditional hope which springs from faith in its existence and its function in the Church of today and tomorrow.

As Christians we do not have to calculate what the future of the priesthood will be in a futurologist sense. We do not have to estimate its chances and adapt ourselves accordingly. We have to believe in this future unconditionally, and by this act of faith to shape this future precisely when it seems to be improbable. Here too we need to be not those who suffer the future, but rather those who create it. In a spirit of faith, prayer, and selflessness we have to overcome any tendency to a bourgeois ‘establishment’ attitude towards our priesthood as though it were a means of earning our living. We have to be the sort of priests who in the boldness of faith seize upon the folly of the Cross. We have to be not hirelings but shepherds who hope against all hope. We have to give our allegiance to the scandal of the Cross of Christ, to have the patience to endure historical situations which are impenetrable to our gaze. We have in a real sense to see ourselves as servants of Christ, that Christ who, through the fathomless darkness of his death, has redeemed the world. We have to be ready to bear unemotionally and in all the realism of our colourless everyday lives the stigmata of Christ. And if we do all this then we are priests indeed, [60] then it is the grace of God alone which is creating through us, and also through our priesthood, that future which the one and unique Lord of history and of the Church has devized for this priesthood and which will come to pass.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[61]

4

ON THE DIACONATE

Such far-reaching and rapid developments have taken place in the theology and the practice of the permanent diaconate[1] that even twenty years ago it would have been quite impossible to guess at them. Certain theological movements in the last few years before the Council, the Council itself, and certain impulses arising from it, have all undoubtedly contributed to this. In our present consideration however we have no intention of re-opening in any direct sense the discussion of this conciliar theology of the diaconate and the practical effects deriving from this. We must begin by taking all this as already recognized and valid.[2] Since the Council, however, and without any direct dependence upon it, the development of the diaconate has received a quite fresh impetus, and it is this that we shall be concerned with here. For in the light of this fresh impetus which we are on the point of describing the question of the content, the significance, the usefulness, or even the necessity of the permanent diaconate will be presented from an aspect which is quite different from those which have formerly been discussed, and different even from those which were considered in the Council.

The new stimulus to develop a theology, and concomitant with this new practical applications too, of the diaconate stems from the new theology of the priestly office. This is something which in its current developments was still not envisaged at all in the Council, or at any rate, [62] if it was so, the statements in which it was referred to did not attract any attention. This new development of the theology of the priestly office, which is of the utmost importance for the diaconate, generates its own forward impulse, and this from two different directions: from the standpoint of the biblical theology of 'office' in the Church, and from the situation both within the Church herself and in secular society in which the priestly office is placed today. Although we must begin by speaking of the fresh problems raised by the theology of the priestly office, our treatment of this must necessarily be extremely brief, and we shall only discuss these problems in so far as they throw some light upon the theology of the diaconate itself.

The first point to be clearly recognized in the New Testament theology[3] of 'office' in the Church concerns the division of this into the office of priest and bishop. In so far as we can discern this division at all in the New Testament it certainly does not consist in any clear line of demarcation drawn between the office of priest and bishop. Moreover it is clear that that which constitutes the essence of this office does not consist in any immediately apprehensible sense in sacramental powers of a specifically sacerdotal kind, or, more precisely still, in any

[1] This study is the text of a lecture which the author gave on the 7th of December 1968 in Freiburg, on the occasion of a conference on the diaconate. For purposes of publication a few notes have been added to it.

[2] On the state of the discussion at the Council itself cf. the commentary on Article 29 of the Decree 'Lumen Gentium' by H. Vorgrimler, LTK Suppl. I (Freiburg, 1966), 256-259; cf. also idem, 'Erneuerung des Diakonats nach dem Konzil', Der Seelsorger 35 (1965), 102-115; K. Rahner, 'The Teaching of the Second Vatican Council on the Diaconate', Theological Investigations X (London and New York, 1973), pp. 222-234; also H. Vorgrimler, 'Zur Theologie des Diakonats. Thesen', Der Diakon heute, edited by the Cathedral School, Akademie für Erwachsenenbildung der Diözese Würzburg (Würzburg, 1969), pp. 39-43; idem, 'Der theologische Ort des Diakonats', Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie IV (Freiburg, 1969), pp. 417 ff.

[3] On this cf. H. Schürmann, 'Neutestamentliche Marginalien zur Frage der Entsakralisierung', I/II, Der Seelsorger 38 (1968), pp. 38-40, 89-104; J. Blank, 'Der Priester im Lichte der Bibel', ibid., 155-164. But see also H. Schlier, 'Grundelemente des priesterlichen Amtes im Neuen Testament', Theologie und Philosophie 44 (1969), pp. 161-180.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

special powers exercised in the community's celebration of the Eucharist. In so far as we can discern any special office in the Christian community as portrayed in the New Testament, with its universal priesthood, it is characterized primarily by a special mission to preach the word and by the function of leading and directing a Christian community, and in this connection the question of the relationship and at the same time the distinction between these two functions represents a further special problem in its own right. Of course we can say, and objectively speaking we are certainly justified in saying, that any official preaching of the word or leadership of the community achieve their supreme point in that proclamation of the Death of the Lord which takes place in the liturgy of the community. And it is in this liturgy that the community itself achieves the fulness of its own nature in a form that is sacramentally most intense. In this sense we can certainly establish a rational connection between the traditional and sacerdotal concept of the priestly office which is also that sanctioned by the Council of Trent, and the conception of office which we find in the New Testament, which is not [63] in any direct sense defined in specifically priestly, i.e. cultic and sacerdotal, terms. But even if we recognize this still the question of the nature of the priestly office is presented in a fresh form by the New Testament, and needs to be answered afresh by working out a fresh way of organizing the manifold elements belonging to the priestly office based upon the bible itself.

To this a second point must be added which also derives from the present-day biblical theology of 'office' in the Church. In the light of the New Testament it is surely possible to conceive of official functions within the society of the Church which are quite different from those which spontaneously occur to our minds today when we speak of 'office' in the Church and go on straightway to divide this into the offices of bishop, priest and deacon in the conviction that these three hierarchical degrees can be easily and unambiguously distinguished from one another, and that these alone, when taken together, represent the single totality of 'office' in the Church. It is true that the three terms do occur already in the New Testament: bishop, presbyter, diakon. But even if it appears in the Pastoral Epistles that by the end of the apostolic age the bishop as an individual already possesses a well-defined function of leadership in the local community reserved to him alone, still this in itself is not enough to supply any unambiguous distinction between the three concepts or to assign any unambiguous content to each of the three. In other words in terms of the New Testament there is indeed an 'office' in the Church, and this is ultimately one. But it can be subdivided into various functions according to the concrete needs of any given community. These functions as distributed in this sense between various office-holders will certainly also have to be thought of as hierarchically arranged. But the element of 'office' in the Church is certainly still fluid. Various sociological patterns can be employed in determining the concrete forms which it assumes and the variations which it undergoes, and moreover no very clear lines of demarcation are to be found in the New Testament marking it off from other charisms contributing to the wellbeing of the community, which cannot be regarded as official or institutional in any proper sense. In passing a further point must also be emphasized: the fact that in the New Testament the Church's 'office' is still fluid in this sense, and that variation is still possible in the way in which its different functions are distributed between different office-holders according to the concrete circumstances and requirements in any given case does not gainsay the sacramentality of the three hierarchical degrees of order recognized in our own times. In other words these factors in the New Testament cannot be contested on [64] the ground of the dogmatic teaching of the sacramentality of order as it exists in the present day. There is a further question of what the reasons are, in more precise terms, for ascribing a sacramental force to the juridical act of conferring 'office' in the Church. But this question need not concern us for our immediate purposes. In any case the teaching of dogmatic theology demonstrates the fact that the single

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

sacrament of ordo, even though it really is single (otherwise there would be more than seven sacraments) can be subdivided into different degrees, and this teaching also demonstrates the fact that at least as late as the high Middle Ages the theologians uncompromisingly taught that the truly sacramental element in order was further subdivided into very minor and insignificant official posts in the Church. And they also taught uncompromisingly that the conferring of a share in the single 'office' of the Church allowed for a far greater variation and modification of content among the official posts which the Church recognized than we are nowadays accustomed to accept as either possible or actual. What all this implies for the diaconate can be explained only at a later stage.

We must first consider the fresh impetus which the theology and practical application of the priestly office implies for the diaconate from yet another aspect. The problems entailed in the situation of the present-day priest both within the society of the Church and within secular society must briefly be touched upon.[4]

Formerly in virtue of his priestly office, it was taken for granted that the priest has a specific and well-defined position in secular society. In virtue of his priestly office he had also a calling in the worldly sense, a 'firm position' even at the secular level, a plain and recognized 'role' in the body politic. Today this is no longer so obvious. The question is raised, for instance, whether a priest should not follow a secular calling as well in order to achieve an indisputable position in the world, and one which provides him with economic support, so that he may bear an effective witness to the gospel precisely from this well-recognized position. In fact there are here and there in the secular institutes priests who side by [65] side with their priestly tasks follow a worldly calling. This, together with the phenomenon of the worker priests, demonstrates the fact that we have already reached a stage which is beyond that of purely academic speculation.

There is a further question, namely whether in view of the dangerous lack of priests today there should not be individuals who, in addition to their priestly office, also follow a worldly calling as a 'full-time job'. These would exercise their priestly functions on Sunday or in the evening as a 'part-time job'. This question points in the same direction. An additional factor is that even regarded from within the Church those who hold the priestly office in the Church at least to some extent have gathered to themselves and exercised functions in the Church which are both very intensive and very numerous, even though precisely if we take the traditional conception of the priesthood as our starting-point we cannot really see why such functions should be exercised precisely by priests. The phenomenon of the lay religious instructor, the so-called lay theologian, and many others besides show that even this question which is interior to the society of the Church is no mere theoretical problem.

These are findings which both at the theological and the practical levels have properly speaking only been realized in their full relevance since the Council, and it is in the light of these that the question of the diaconate too must be viewed today. Although the factor of 'office' in the Church is ultimately one, in respect of its functions and its distribution between various of its holders,[5] it is far more elastic, flexible and fluid, if we may so express it, than [4] There is a constantly increasing body of literature on this subject, which it is quite impossible to present here. For this reason reference will only be made to the address which the author delivered on the 4th September 1968 at the Conference of German Catholics in Essen: 'Dogmatische Grundlagen des priesterlichen Selbstverständnisses', Mitten in dieser Welt, edited by the Central Committee of German Catholics (Paderborn, 1968), pp. 96-115. Reference may also be made to the following articles: 'The Point of Departure in Theology for Determining the Nature of the Priestly Office' in this volume, pp. 31-38; 'Theological Reflections upon the Priestly Image of Today and Tomorrow', in this volume, pp. 39-60.

[5] On this cf. the author's article, 'Die Aufgleiderung des einen Amtes der Kirche" Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie I (Freiburg, 1964, 2nd ed. 1970), pp. 160-167, together with the chapters which follow. On the concept of office in general reference may be made to the author's commentary on the third chapter of 'Lumen Gentium', LTK Suppl. I (Freiburg, 1966), 210-246. On the question of whether it is possible for a way

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

has been realized in the last few centuries. We have no intention here of drawing from this the conclusion that we should ipso facto call in question or seek to revise the threefold division of the single office of the Church into bishop, priest and deacon, which had already become classic and canonical at the beginning of the post-apostolic age. At the same time it should not be forgotten that the great theologians of the Middle Ages still counted the so-called minor orders as well – in other words those belonging to quite unimportant office-holders in the Church [66] – as to be included also among those degrees of office which are sacramentally conferred. Moreover, even to this day the Church has not produced any official doctrinal decision which rules out such a theory.

But even when we simply take for granted the three degrees in the hierarchical division of ecclesiastical office, still it must at least be concluded from the evidence which we have mentioned both in terms of biblical theology and of the state of contemporary society, that it is possible freely to reconsider in more precise terms both the content of the three offices in the Church and the lines of demarcation between them. Moreover this reappraisal needs to be something more than merely an affair of the reason engaging in theological speculation so as to establish what is the case. Also, and more than this, it must at least to some extent be capable of leading to an alteration in the content of these offices, and to the establishing of new and real lines of demarcation between them (that this is not impossible from the outset is indeed also demonstrated by the fact that, for instance, it cannot be asserted in any very precise terms whether the power of conferring the sacrament of confirmation belongs to the episcopal or the priestly office. This is something that on any showing needs, from this aspect to be determined once and for all as a matter of positive law by the Church).

On this basis it would be theologically justified to say that the function and tasks of the renewed and permanent diaconate enumerated by the Council do not restrict our scope for working out a more profound and also a fresh and creative theology of the diaconate. These functions adduced in the Council vary very greatly in their significance. Taken in isolation any one of them can also be conferred upon one who is not a deacon, although on any right understanding of the single complex ‘office’ in the Church this does not tell against the significance and the sacramentality of the diaconate itself. These functions enumerated by the Council are not co-ordinated among themselves by it so as to constitute the diaconate as a unified whole in which all these functions and tasks are manifestly interconnected. And finally it is by no means certain that in the diaconate in its contemporary form, in contrast, and also as an alternative to these historical functions of the diaconate, quite other functions may be present which will characterize the diaconate of the future far more decisively than these former ones.

In this theological situation, in which the question of what a deacon is and what he should be in the future is still, to a very great extent an open one, in this situation in which it is possible to work out a new definition of what the diaconate shall mean not merely at the speculative but at the [67] practical level as well, it seems to me that properly speaking only the following fixed points can be regarded as established: the deacon receives his office together with the powers and duties appropriate to it. The conferring of this office on the part of the episcopate has a sacramental character and because of this must take place in the manner required for a sacramental act performed in public, something which is perfectly reconcilable with a considerable breadth of choice in the form which this conferring of the office of deacon is to assume. It is not normal (i.e. legitimate in the ordinary circumstances prevailing in a Christian community) for the deacon to have the power of presiding at the of subdividing the institution of order to be developed juris divini within Christian history cf. also the author’s article, ‘Reflection on the Concept of “Ius Divinum,” in Catholic Thought’, Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 219-243.

---

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Eucharistic liturgy. For while it is true that this does not simply constitute in itself alone the content of the priestly office or the basic theological starting-point for defining its nature, still this power is, after all, proper to the priestly office, and will surely remain so in the future, although it still does not carry with it any absolute, fixed, or unalterable connection with the official preaching of the word of God and the direction of the community (taking these in turn as constituting a unity). It seems to me, however, that these three specifications of the diaconate constitute at the same time the sole three invariable factors which can be attributed with certainty to the diaconate.

All that has been said up to this point has been intended to convey in barest outline the insight that we cannot properly speaking define the meaning and content of the diaconate of the future on the basis of the New Testament, the ancient practice of the western Church, or of course on the basis of the eastern Church's conception of the diaconate either,[6] although at the same time the three invariable factors mentioned above have to be respected. Today, therefore, what is properly in question is not a restoration of the diaconate in its ancient form, but a creative conception of the diaconate of the future. Ancient models of the diaconate can provide stimuli for this new specification of it. Nevertheless in this new and creative specification what is involved is not merely a restructuring of the traditional functions of the ancient diaconate at the level of speculative theology.

But how is this new specification of the nature, i.e. the specific function, of the diaconate of the future to be arrived at? This is the difficult question [68] with which the Church has to cope today the moment she has resolved upon a renewal of the diaconate of this kind. Two points should be self-evident from the outset in this quest for a new conception of the diaconate:

1. Any such creatively new conception cannot be worked out exclusively at the conference table of rational theological speculation, because in principle and in all cases no concrete decisions can be arrived at solely and exclusively by a process of theological reasoning. Practical and concrete experimentation is required. All kinds of attempts have to be made, even though they do not lead immediately or in all cases to results that are serviceable or permanent, and even though conversely such attempts have to be undertaken only with theological speculation as their concomitant, and with an attitude of realism and prudence.

2. It can readily be accepted from the outset that the diaconate of the future as it is realized in the concrete will admit of a quite considerable number of variations of form. This is surely something that we should expect both with regard to the concrete functions attached to an office of this kind and with regard to the various holders of this office. For even an office which, as a matter of theological principle, is conceived of very much as a unity certainly demands very considerable variations in the forms it assumes in the situation which exists today both in the Church and also in secular society with all its extreme complexities and variations. In fact it can be the case that it will only be from a fairly wide variety of concrete forms assumed by the diaconate (forms which have been prompted by the situation of the Church and her concrete practice, and have almost been forced upon her) that we shall gradually come to recognize the single theological essence common to all these various forms and underlying them, and constituting the ministry of the diaconate as an office of the Church.

Now if I am to attempt to say anything with regard to this content and nature of the diaconate of the future I would like to begin by drawing attention to the fact that probably the [6] This also becomes clear in view of the very different motives adduced at the Council as arguments in favour of restoring the diaconate. In the Decree on the Church the motive adduced is the importance of specific functions (No. 29). In the Decree for the Eastern Churches the motive is the ancient discipline of the sacrament of order (No. 17), and in the Decree on the Missions the fact that the diaconal ministry is already being exercised in practice (No. 16).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

best treatment that has been accorded to this theme up to the present is that of H. Vorgrimler in the Handbuch der Pastoral-theologie, Vol. IV.[7] In what follows I shall be relying very much on this study, but I would like to present what I have to say in my own words and on my own responsibility.

In order to find an answer to our question concerning the nature and function (which is the same thing) of the future diaconate certain preliminary methodological remarks must first be made, and then certain [69] negative boundary lines must be drawn, and finally an attempt must be made to state in positive terms what the future diaconate will be.

First a few preliminary methodological remarks. In the days of the Council the line of argument which I customarily followed in support of the restoration and renewal of the permanent diaconate was as follows: the diaconate already exists de facto in an anonymous form in the Church of today. In these circumstances it is right that those who are already vested with this anonymous diaconate should also have the sacramental commission conferred upon them, because in principle it is possible for there to be a sacramental diaconate in the Church, and such a sacramental commission is reasonable and productive of grace.[8]

This line of argument was, and still is in principle, not unjustified. Today, however, it is no longer adequate, for first in asserting that de facto the function of the diaconate was already being exercised in the Church, albeit in anonymous form and without any sacramental commission, we allowed ourselves to be influenced too much by the model of the earlier form of the diaconate,[9] although this in itself did not simply make our assertion false. It was not possible on these grounds to define more precisely what form the diaconate is to assume in the future in terms of its functions and activities. With regard to the functions already de facto existing in the Church it could not easily be explained which ones would be conferred by means of a sacramental commissioning and which would not. In the 'institutional Church' in the future, even though it is certain that in the future too there will be functions of this kind pertaining to the administrative practice of the Church such as not merely can be, but actually should be exercised by laymen, even so it will remain to some extent a question of practical judgement to decide where to draw the borderline in the concrete between this type of function and the other type. There is a further point to be noticed, pertaining to methodology. The diaconate of the future will remain an integral part of the official ministry of the Church as hierarchically organized. On the one hand, therefore, it must certainly manifestly be seen to be a subdivision of this official ministry and its functions, deriving from the very nature of the official ministry itself. On the other hand, however, this subdivision can and must be conditioned by the concrete situation in which the Church fulfils her [70] task through her official ministry. It follows that whatever authentic basis we find for instituting the diaconate of the future in its distinctive form it must be such that it does not in any sense depend upon the postulate that this concrete form of the diaconate as conceived of in the present must have been in existence all along and of necessity, and must continue to exist for all time. This means that the concrete situation of the Church is an essential element in this line of argument. This does not invalidate the 'jus divinum' of the diaconate (and, as the concomitant of this, its sacramentality too) for this jus divinum simply implies that the Church's official institutions belong essentially to the Church herself that they are communicated sacramentally as such, and that this special quality inherent in them also extends to the concrete subdivisions of these institutions whenever the process of subdividing the single

[7] On this cf. n. 2.
[8] On this cf. my article, 'The Theology of the Restoration of the Diaconate', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 268-314.
[9] Up to the present the best general presentation is still to be found in K. Rahner, H. Vorgrimler ed., Diakonia in Christo, Quaestiones Disputatae 15/16 (Freiburg, 1962).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

institution of order is demanded by the concrete situation of the Church, or is at any rate reasonable in view of it.

There is one final point which has to be taken into account from the outset with regard to this basic flexibility and adaptability of the single institution of order in the Church and the forms into which it is subdivided. It is that any specific subdivision of this order is itself in turn capable of appearing in various concrete forms as demanded by the concrete circumstances and tasks of the Church, and that in such subordinate manifestations of it various aspects may be particularly emphasized at various times. In seeking a theological basis for the future diaconate, therefore, we do not need to make it our aim to evolve any absolutely univocal and uniform type of deacon. The priesthood itself is subject to a wide range of variations, even though it is conceived of as consisting essentially in the authoritative preaching of the gospel in the name of the Church, and in guiding and directing the community (both functions being thought of as a unity), and this in itself is enough to make it apparent that the diaconate does not necessarily have to be univocal and uniform in the sense indicated. Admittedly it is necessary that a single basic essence of the diaconate, deriving from the very nature of order itself and from the concrete situation of the Church (for it is this that demands that the single institution of order shall be subdivided in this way) shall be common to all these variations of type which the diaconate may assume in the concrete, and shall be recognizable as such in them all. But all that we can demand is that it shall continue to be sufficiently intelligible why this particular subdivision of order is called the diaconate, and how it is adequately to be distinguished in terms of theology from those other 'official' functions which are present in the Church as institutions, and which are both distinct from the priestly office [71] and at the same time not to be conceived of as pertaining to the diaconate. In this respect it is inevitable that in the process of drawing the lines of division certain points will remain unclarified. The reason is first that in view of the variations in the way in which the single institution of order in the Church is subdivided it is quite impossible wholly to avoid such points of obscurity; we have simply to accept them and make due allowance for them. Second, it is perfectly possible that the future situation of the Church will make it necessary, and will actually bring it about that new and hitherto unfamiliar ways of subdividing the institution of order will be introduced, and that concerning these it will not always be easy to say a priori whether they constitute a variant form of the diaconate or a subdivision of order which cannot be subsumed under this concept of the diaconate.

Now let us turn to certain negative demarcations of the diaconate. In order to be in a position to define these the following preliminary points have to be made: the Church as a whole, and therefore all her members – including, therefore the so-called laity – have been entrusted with a ministry towards man to work for his salvation. This universal ministry has an individual and a social dimension affecting both those entrusted with it and those to whom it is directed. This universal Christian diakonia, binding in the same way upon clergy and layfolk alike, is a Christian duty which no one individual can transfer to the rest. In this universal diakonia each has a responsibility towards all, and each Christian has a responsibility not only towards his fellow Christians but essentially towards every man as well. But not withstanding this the concrete form in which this universal diakonia or ministry is realized in the individual Christian life, and in which each individual discharges his personal responsibility varies according to the concrete circumstances of those involved, both those vested with this ministry and those to whom it is directed.

Now without prejudice to this universal diakonia there is a special diakonia proper to those who are officially ordained. The reason for this is twofold: first, ordination considered as an official institution too can be understood only as conferring the authorization, the duty, and the equipment to minister to other Christians and individuals. Second, in the community of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Christians called the Church, which is of necessity constituted as a society with institutions, there is need for a special office with special functions and the powers entailed in these attached to it, with a particular part to play (we shall not be describing or justifying this in any more precise detail here) within this universal diakonia. On the basis of these prior considerations we can now lay down the following negative [72] lines of demarcation with regard to the diaconate in the special and restricted sense as part of the official institution of order in the Church, with special functions of its own. Its specific nature cannot, in any proper sense, be regarded as consisting in the function of leadership as such. For this is proper to the episcopal and priestly office. In some cases, as in the missions or communities deprived of priests, the deacon is entrusted with leadership functions of this kind, and this is perfectly possible chiefly in virtue of the fact that he belongs to the ranks of those who are officially ordained. But all such cases are secondary, and do not imply that this leadership function belongs specifically to his particular office. Nor does the office of deacon imply that the laity are deprived of their mission and duty to exercise the universal diaconate or that these can transfer their mission to the officially ordained deacon. Again the officially ordained deacon is not, properly speaking, a mediator between clergy and layfolk in the Church, for at least in principle there is no need for any such mediation even though it may be conceded that in specific sociological situations in the Church the deacon does perform a useful secondary function of this kind. In principle, however, this function does not constitute the very nature of his office, and the very fact that he himself belongs to the ranks of those who have been officially ordained – in other words to the clergy – is in itself enough to show that this is not the case. Again the true nature of the diaconate cannot be defined in terms of specific cultic powers, even though de facto he may exercise powers of this kind, such as baptizing, conferring Christian burial, giving communion, performing the sacramentals etc. at least provided the official Church gives a certain authorization for them. Such specifically sacral functions can also be assumed by any baptized layman, and even though this fact does not in itself alone in principle exclude the possibility of empowering the individual sacramentally to exercise a whole complex of such sacral functions, still at least today, in the present situation of the Church and the concrete possibilities thereby entailed such functions should he left to laymen, and should be regarded as functions which are not so important in themselves that they need to constitute a specific office in the Church of today. Nor does the office of deacon in the proper sense imply that bishops and priests should be able to transfer the specifically diaconal functions entailed in the institution of order in the Church in general to the deacon in the strict sense in such a way that they themselves would have nothing more to do with such diaconal functions. The institution of order is ultimately one, and any subdivisions introduced into it do not in fact imply that the various ways in which this single office is shared are simply set alongside one another as [73] so many separate compartments. The significance of the episcopal office at least is such that the institution of order in general in the Church must be present in it in its fulness, and in view of this those who hold it cannot transfer the specifically diaconal functions contained in it (which we shall have to define more precisely at a later stage) in such a way that they no longer remain the responsibility of the bishop himself. And the same applies analogously to the priestly office to the extent that this too involves leading a community constituted by a particular locality or class, analogous in structure to the Church presided over by the bishop. The fact that an office is subdivided does not in fact imply that that single official institution is a priori split up into totally different functions. Rather it signifies a graded participation which is made necessary a posteriori by the concrete situation, because the technical work, material conditions etc. involved are such that in practice no one individual office-holder can perform by himself everything that is absolutely speaking required of his office.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

After applying these negative lines of demarcation to the office of deacon we must now attempt to define its nature in positive terms. Once more we have to emphasize that this process of defining the nature of the office of deacon cannot be deduced solely from any one abstract concept of the nature of officially constituted order in the Church. Rather we have to take into account the concrete situation prevailing today in which this official institution has to fulfil its function.[10]

The office of order in the Church has the function of building up the Church herself, forming the community. Now this function of forming the community implies not merely a function of the kind which might be contrasted with the function of mediating personal salvation to the individual as such. On the contrary this function of forming the community also and precisely implies that in human and Christian terms a place is assigned to the individual as such in the community such that in it he finds a position in the ecclesiastical and social life of the Church from which he can live out his own individual human and Christian life so as to achieve his salvation. This function of forming the community, which also and essentially involves certain prior conditions simply at the human level, and which also implies an integration of the individual into the community (something which is itself different from any totalitarian subjugation [74] of the individual on the part of an ecclesiastical society) is confronted today, in the conditions of secular human life, with special difficulties entailed in the contemporary state of society. Hence those officially vested with the task of forming the community in this sense are required to become specialists in their own right, to learn special kinds of knowledge and skill such as cannot be either presupposed as already present or capable of being acquired by every ordained individual.

In earlier times secular society itself was so constituted as to ensure that men were integrated to a greater or lesser degree, but in any case in sufficient measure, into secular society. Right from the first they had in it that role which best fitted them, and sufficient stability and security at the human level. The ecclesiastical community could from the outset presuppose a society at the secular level which was sufficiently integrated to provide due scope for the life of the individual, and did not need to make any special provision for this social integration of the individual into secular society.

Today all this has changed. The individual man lives in a society which is in a state of great disintegration, and therefore in a state of insecurity as to his proper role, and this also implies a lack of the natural human substrate for a Christian life on the individuals' part, and for his incorporation into the Christian community as such. Of course secular society itself has the task of striving ever anew to achieve this integration of society. But precisely in virtue of the institutional factors which it creates for this purpose, it in turn introduces new forms of disintegration. Now what we have to bear in mind in the case of these individuals who are socially disintegrated in this sense is not merely those who, from the economical aspect, are very poor and oppressed, not merely the conflicts between the social classes in the usual sense of the term. There are other such forms of disintegration also. There are the lonely, those who are in various ways cast aside by secular society, deprived of any secure place or any role in society to give them stability and free them from burdens of care. There are also those who while they are still young and immature have to be integrated into society.

This task of integration is primarily a human one, one from which the Church even as such cannot withdraw herself if she is to serve humanity as such. It is a task for the Church even though in this respect she cannot claim any monopoly in discharging this task in human society. Furthermore this task is a specifically ecclesiastical one to the extent that the [10] So far as the present author is concerned cf. on this requirement the considerations put forward at the scientific and speculative level in Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1 (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 181-188, and further 'Practical Theology within the Totality of Theological Disciplines', Theological Investigations IX (London and New York, 1972), pp. 101-115.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

integration of the individual at the human level into the human community and society is the necessary prior condition for the forming of an ecclesiastical [75] community, while conversely any such process of forming an ecclesiastical community or of providing a permanent place for the individual in the community of the Church always also has repercussions upon the formation of the human community and the humanization of secular society.

This task, then, of integrating the individual both into a humanized secular society and at the same time in particular into the community of the Church is, from these various points of view, a function of the Church. And it is a function of such a kind that it presupposes specialist equipment and human qualities which can neither be possessed nor acquired by every one of the Church's official functionaries. But if this task, which we may surely describe with justice as a diaconal task in a specific sense, is a task for the official Church as such, and if today it cannot adequately be discharged by every one of the Church's officials for want of specialist equipment at the material and human level, then it follows that the Church today must institute a special subdivision within the single institution of order[11] which can be called the diaconate in the specific sense and in the sense which we have defined. And it is precisely this that constitutes the diaconate as it must be today, regardless of whether the earlier diaconate did or did not have this specific content. This is not to dispute the fact that this diaconate of the future as understood in this sense does still continue to have a sufficient connection with the earlier diaconate to make it legitimate for us to apply the old name 'diaconate' to it.[12]

The position is, then, that on the one hand one of the tasks of the Church's official ministers is to build up the Christian community by integrating man into the civic and ecclesiastical community when he exists today in a state that is to a large extent disintegrated from a religious and social point of view, while on the other this task cannot be fulfilled unless those charged with it have specialized formation of the most varied kind at their command, such as bishops and priests cannot possess. It is this position, therefore, that makes it necessary to have the diaconate as a special official institution.

We have now explained the starting-point for determining the nature of the future diaconate on the basis of the nature of the institution of order itself and of the contemporary situation of the Church in the concrete. But even though we have done this many questions still remain open with regard to the forms in which it is to be developed in the concrete. It is in [76] a true sense evident in the light of our basic position that even in respect of the sphere allotted to him from the very nature of the diaconate itself the future deacon cannot be an 'all-round' deacon, but must rather be himself in turn a specialist even within this sphere. The question of which specialized tasks pertaining to this diaconal ministry have to be discharged in a particular branch of the Church or local community by such a specialist holder of the office depends of course on the concrete circumstances of the particular branch of the Church or local community concerned. With regard to these specialist deacons we should not seek to deduce too much a priori. For uniformity within the individual groupings within the Church is far from being an aim to be striven for. At this level the particular and special forms of the diaconate which are developed should be arrived at on the basis of the concrete needs and requirements of the Church's life. A deacon may be working in a factory or trade, he may be running a community home, he may be a welfare worker, an assistant in pastoral work, a specialist in marriage counselling, engaged in preventing suicides, or in similar tasks. All these are perfectly possible concrete forms of the diaconate which may be developed, [11] On this cf. also the section in the Pastoralhandbuch adduced in n. 5.

[12] On this cf. also the author's 'Practical Theology and Social Work in the Church', Theological Investigations X (London and New York, 1972), pp. 349-370.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

although it is clear that those engaged in them should have a minimum of specifically religious powers and duties, and by actively engaging in the celebration of the Eucharist on Sundays should give expression to the fact that the diaconate, as the spirit of fraternity put into practice, finds its starting-point and its supreme sacramental realization in the sacrament of unity. It seems to me that with regard to these concrete forms of the diaconate that are developed the question of the teacher of religion in primary and secondary schools represents a special problem. Perhaps it is not necessary to conclude without further ado that the function of the 'teacher' who is not a priest in the Church, the function of the 'lay theologian' in the Church, should be subsumed under the diaconate as understood here. The 'teacher' (didaskalos) in the Church already figures prominently in the New Testament, and it must be remembered first that he does not necessarily have to be identified with the priestly leader of the community, and second that it cannot simply be taken for granted that the only possible role for such a teacher in the Church of the future will be as a teacher of religious doctrine to immature schoolchildren. These facts in themselves are enough to show that the role of 'teacher' in the Church does not necessarily have to be subsumed under the diaconate as understood here. But at least certain concrete roles which will be developed for the 'teachers' in the Church, i.e. those in which the teaching given to adults is designed to introduce these to the Christian life, and so into the Christian community, can [77] perfectly well be understood as a specialized form of the diaconate.

The theological nature of the diaconate has nothing in it that decides the question beforehand of whether a deacon should work as a 'full-time' deacon, i.e. engage himself in this ministry as his chief calling in the secular sense, or whether he should exercise his office on what is, from the point of view of the state, a 'part-time basis'. The theological nature of the diaconate does not predetermine from the outset the question of whether a combination of ecclesiastical office and secular calling of this kind constitutes simply the de facto combination of two roles which do not have much to do with one another, or whether, as in the case of the worker priests properly so-called, these two tasks compenetrate one another. The theological essence of the diaconate does not predetermine from the outset whether deacons should be drawn from the ranks of younger men, or from the class of those who have been prematurely relegated to retirement by contemporary society because their physical powers have been somewhat reduced even though they have reached the full maturity of their experience of life. All these possibilities are given, and which of them are to be realized in practice is a question which must be decided in the light of the concrete circumstances involved. The same applies to the question of whether a deacon should work as an individual in isolation, or in a team made up of several deacons, whether he should work directly under the bishop in the fulfilment of his task or should be assigned to one particular parish priest.

In any doctrinal review of the nature of the diaconate one thing further must also be said concerning the sacramental grace which is imparted through this sacrament. A sacramental grace which is ritually communicated by the conferring of a given office in the Church has, in virtue of that fact in itself, a quite peculiar character. The reason that it is imparted by means of a ritual conferment of office is because this office can only be exercised in accordance with its true nature if it is fulfilled in faith, hope, and love. The reason is that while the absence of any personal or 'existential' engagement on the part of the individual (i.e., in the case supposed, an engagement that is sustained by grace) certainly does not simply 'invalidate' the ways in which this office is fulfilled, still it is contrary to the nature of the office itself, and hence something that is indeed conceivable in individual holders of office, but not in the Church as a whole. For in her the dimension of her social and historical reality can never totally and definitively be separated from her endowment with the Spirit. Any conferment of office by the Church and in her, therefore, always also constitutes the offering and the promise of that grace which alone really makes the [78] fulfilment of this office an ecclesiastical fulfilment in the full sense. Any such 'grace of office', therefore, is given precisely in order that the individual holder of the office may fulfil his ministry for the other members of the Church in accordance with its true nature. It 'sanctifies' the holder of the office precisely inasmuch as it equips him not to seek his own sanctification in an 'egoistical' manner, but rather, by directing his gaze away from himself and forgetting himself to serve his neighbour in the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is in this that the very essence of every charisma of office, every 'grace of office' consists. It 'sanctifies' the individual on whom it is conferred precisely in virtue of the fact that he forgets himself in the service of his neighbour. Hence it is that on any true understanding of the nature of the Church as a society and as pneumatic at the same time the grace of office is not, properly speaking, something that is supplementary, that fills out the basic equipment that is given when an office is conferred within her, but rather actually constitutes this basic equipment of office in itself. This in itself ipso facto implies the further point that this grace of office is not something which takes place solely at that particular point in time when the office is sacramentally conferred and actually constitutes that point, but rather implies the promise of God to support with his grace the whole conduct of office on the part of the ordained individual in his life, a promise which, therefore, is constantly achieving fresh actualization in the life of the deacon. Once we recognize that to be appointed to the diaconal function in the Church is something abiding and ultimately irrevocable, and recognize too that the promise entailed in this of the assistance of the Spirit of the Church for the fulfilment of this task as something that is likewise abiding, we have ipso facto also achieved an understanding of that which in tradition and in the teaching of the Council of Trent is called sacramental character, something which is present in every 'degree' of the single sacrament of order in the manner appropriate to each degree. It is really superfluous to embark on any lofty speculations over and above what has already been said concerning this 'character indelebilis' inherent in the sacrament of order. Such speculations would merely give rise to ideas which are inessential or else would state in other terms something which is, in the very nature of the case, entailed in the enduring nature precisely of this specific ministerial task and the abiding nature of the offer of grace inherent in it.

Now if we are to give any adequate account of the sacramental grace of the diaconate, we must now consider this event of grace from yet a further aspect. For this purpose we must undertake a consideration which touches upon the relationship which exists between grace and sacrament in general.

[79] Any short-sightedness in theology, or any excessively naïve piety constantly entails the danger of unconsciously falling into the position of regarding the sacraments exclusively as the events of grace alone (even though this is in contradiction to other firmly held theological positions). Such a position, however, is false. He who seeks God in a spirit of faith, love and hope is ipso facto justified, a child of God, and a temple of the Spirit even before he has received the baptism of water, though of course even in any such 'subjective' attitude the will to receive baptism is implicitly and unconsciously included. At least in normal cases he who comes to the sacrament of penance as a repentant sinner comes as one who has already been justified, and whose sins have already been forgiven. The prayer of the 'confiteor' before Mass, if it is uttered with a sincere heart, is not merely the desire addressed to God for the forgiveness of some sin, a desire emanating solely from the individual himself. Rather it is an event of grace which God himself brings about in the individual and through his act. The question of why, without prejudice to these obvious points, the sacraments are, nevertheless, meaningful and, under certain circumstances necessary is one which cannot explicitly be discussed here. The reasonableness of and necessity for the sacraments arises ultimately from the nature of man as a physical person, and from the 'incarnatorial' dynamism of grace itself. For as the grace precisely of Christ this seeks to project itself

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

beyond the source and centre of human living as endowed with grace, and to achieve a dimension of historical concretion in space and time. For it is in this alone that even grace achieves its full effectiveness and power over all dimensions of human existence.

Let us therefore apply these points which we recognize as evidence to the diaconate. First it is clear that there can be powers in the social dimension of the Church which, in order to exist at all and to be validly applied, presuppose in the society concerned a specific conferment of office achieved in a manner that is juridically defined. Speaking quite in general it is also perfectly conceivable that such official functions in a society can be conferred in various ways. Now it has already been said that the particular functions inherent in the diaconate, however they are to be thought of in more precise terms in their particular details, and whatever possible new forms are to be conceived of for them, are 'in themselves' also within the power of a 'layman' and can be exercised by him even though this fact does not call in question the reasonableness of such a complex of tasks and powers as are involved in the diaconate, and therefore of the diaconate itself as an office in the Church. If we consider this point in conjunction with what has been said above with regard to extra-sacramental and [80] pre-sacramental grace, then we can freely arrive at the following conclusion: that amalgam of functions which is or can be unified and sacramentally conferred in the diaconate already exists independently of any such sacramental conferring of office, and this complex amalgam of functions is exercised in its 'lay' practitioners (provided the necessary conditions are present for grace to become effective) with a grace which is, in its effects, the same grace directed towards the service of neighbour which is manifested and conferred 'ex opere operato' in a sacramental mode in the sacramental order of the diaconate. We say this for the 'consolation' of those who, in virtue of the functions which they do de facto exercise in the Church are striving to attain to the diaconate as a sacrament, but have not yet had it conferred upon them through the imposition of hands. In a Church that is permeated by the Holy Spirit even such a ministry as this cannot be 'devoid of the Spirit'. Conversely, however, it follows from the same radical connection between sacrament (sacramental sign) and grace that the fact that the lay 'deacon' is endowed with the Spirit does not invalidate the reasonableness and relative necessity of the sacramental diaconate. Precisely this extra- and pre-sacramental grace enjoyed by the lay 'deacon' demands, in virtue of its incarnatorial dynamism, to achieve its due sacramental manifestation in the Church in which this grace in itself finds the full realization of its essence. So true is this, indeed, that conversely this 'incarnation' of it becomes the sign that effects the grace itself. This is true just as it is also the case that when diaconal functions are exercised in the Church, and when these are entrusted in a more or less informal way to individuals there is a tendency for them to become recognized and entrusted to those individuals in that more formal manner in which the recognition and the conferring of them can be called a sacrament in the proper sense, appointing the individuals concerned to the office of deacon.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[81]

5

OBSERVATIONS ON THE FACTOR OF THE CHARISMATIC IN THE CHURCH

I

The Catholic ecclesiology of former times from the period of the Reformation onwards was concerned almost exclusively with the institutional factors in the Church. It viewed the Church as a 'societas perfecta', unified, organized, and directed by the official hierarchy, which is in its turn summed up in a supreme and effective manner in the pope. It is true that in this period also it was recognized that the Church is holy, and that this holiness is one of her essential characteristics and notes (characteristics which make a given entity recognizable and distinguishable for what it is), but this holiness was looked for almost exclusively in the sacraments and other objective means of holiness present in the Church, in other words, once more in the institutional factors. Meanwhile the interior subjective holiness achieved by justifying grace was regarded as consisting almost exclusively in grace at the individual level and as present in the individual for himself. Whenever the holiness of the saints (either canonized or worthy of canonization) was spoken of, this was, it is true, valued as a proof of the 'outstanding holiness and inexhaustible fruitfulness in all good' of the Church, something in virtue of which the Church as 'signum levatum in nationes' manifests herself as instituted by Christ to 'outsiders' as well.[1] But this objective holiness was not regarded as an element intrinsic to the life of the Church herself, standing in a quite specific dialectical relationship to the institutional factor in the Church such that each influenced the other, instead of this holiness merely being the product of the institutional activity of the official functionaries in the Church.

Now in the most recent times, prior to the Second Vatican Council, in it and after it, a more explicit theology of the charismatic factor in the [82] Church has been developed.[2] First a clearer emphasis has been laid upon the fact that the Church is not simply a society at the merely external level, and constituted as such by institutional factors, not merely a means of salvation but also the fruit of salvation in herself. It has come to be emphasized that the opposite of ecclesiological Nestorianism is that the Spirit and grace are constitutive for the Church as an eschatological reality.[3] Now on this showing the gifts of the Spirit, the

---

[1] DS 3013/33014.

[2] Admittedly no comprehensive work on this subject has yet been written. The basic principles are to be found in Y. Congar, 'Le peuple fidèle et la fonction prophétique de 1'Eglise', Irenikon 24 (1951), pp. 289-312, 440-466; K. Rahner, 'Das Charismatische in der Kirche', LKT II(2nd ed. 1958), 1027-1030; idem, Das Dynamische in der Kirche, Quaestiones Disputatae 5 (Freiburg, 1958), pp. 38-53; Cardinal Suenens, 'Die charismatische Dimension der Kirche', Konzilsreden, edited by H. Küng and D. O'Hanlon (Einsiedeln, 1964), pp. 24-28; H. U. von Balthasar, 'Charis und Charisma', Sponsa Verbi (Einsiedeln, 1964), pp. 319-331; H. Küng, 'The Charismatic Structure of the Church', Concilium 1/4 (1965 (Ecumenism)), pp. 23-33; idem, The Church (London, 1969); B. v. Leeuwen, 'Die allgemeine Teilnahme am Prophetenamt Christi', De Ecclesia I, edited by G. Baraúna (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 393-419, esp. 409 ff.; E. Bettencourt, 'Charisms', Sacramentum Mundi I (New York and London, 1968), pp. 283-284; G. Hasenhüttl, 'Die Charismen in Leben der Kirche', Der Seelsorger 39 (1969), pp. 167-174; idem, Charisma, Ordnungsprinzip der Kirche (Freiburg, 1969).

[3] On this view of the Church cf. K. Rahner, The Church and the Sacraments, Quaestiones Disputatae 9 (Freiburg, 1963); idem 'Ekklesiologische Grundlegung', Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie I (Freiburg, 1964), pp. 117 ff.; idem, 'The Church and the Parousia of Christ', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 295-312.

In this connection ecclesiology has come, from the nineteenth century onwards, increasingly to be conceived of in terms of christology. This appears in the work of theologians such as J. A. Möhler, J. Perrone, F. Pilgrim,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'charismata' can be conceived of not merely as present in the Church but actually as constitutive for her and for the life that is proper to her. These charismata belong to the very nature and life of the Church just as much as the institutional factors. It is further emphasized that in a Catholic ecclesiology we find neither in practice nor in the linguistic usage of the New Testament [83] any opposition or hostility between the official institutions of the Church on the one hand, and the charismatic elements on the other.[4] The Church is not only the 'holy Church' the 'communio sanctorum' in the objective sense, a community of the holy one, the dispenser of the goods of salvation, in virtue of her truth, her foundation by Christ, her sacraments and the salvation present in her. As an eschatological community, sustained in being by the victory of God's grace, she is also holy as a totality in virtue of the actual faith that exists and that is brought about by this victory of grace, and in virtue of the love of God and neighbour practised by her members. As such she manifests herself as she who demands faith and provides the basis for it, and she must bear witness to her own nature in this sense.[5] Now this is possible only through the working of charismata, the more so since in fact the sacraments can become effective for sanctification only through the extra-sacramental grace of God predisposing the subject for them.[6] Moreover under certain circumstances even one who has been sacramentally justified stands in need of a special and exceptional measure of extra-sacramental grace.[7]

There is no need at this stage to enter into a distinction which, while it may be possible, is not very decisive, between actual and effective grace for supernatural Christian activity on the one hand, and charismatic gifts of grace in the narrower sense on the other. Of course it is possible to draw a distinction of this kind if we take the charismata to signify that which, empirically speaking, is in some sense out of the ordinary, but bestowed upon an individual by God to benefit others. It must be remembered, however, that each particular instance of sanctifying grace enjoyed by a given individual is always at the same time designed to benefit the Body of Christ as a whole. In other words there is no such thing as a mere [84] individual sanctifying grace benefiting one particular member in isolation from the rest. It must further be remembered that any power, whether it be an official authority that is conferred or an endowment with gifts of a non-institutional kind, can be applied by the holder in a way that is morally right only when the exercise of such endowments proceeding from sanctifying grace also sanctifies their holder (this is in fact clear in the case of sacramental powers and their use). A final point which must not be overlooked is that the borderlines between that which is

---

J. Görres, C. Schrader, M. J. Scheeben, H. Newman, K. Arnold, O. Semmelroth, Y. Congar, F. Malmberg and many others right down to the documents of the Second Vatican Council. Cf. most recently H. Mühlen, 'Das Verhältnis zwischen Inkarnation und Kirche in den Aussagen des Vatikanum II', Theologie und Glauben 55 (1965), pp. 171-190; J. Alfaro, 'Das Geheimnis Christi im Geheimnis der Kirche nach dem Zweiten Vatikanischen Konzil', Volk Gottes (Festschrift für J. Höfer) edited by R. Bäumer and H. Dolch (Freiburg, 1967), pp. 518-535; in the light of this tradition it is of course astonishing that a merely juridical conception could have continued to be maintained so long in the official ecclesiology.

[4] A more detailed treatment of the relationship between these two basic elements in the Church as she really exists is to be found in J. Brosch, 'Amt und Charisma', LTK I (2nd ed., 1957), 455-457; K. Rahner, 'Amt und freies Charisma', Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie I (Freiburg, 1964), pp. 154-160; idem, 'Grenzen der Amtskirche', Schriften zur Theologie VI (Einsiedeln, 2nd ed., 1968), pp. 399-520; idem, 'Dialogue in the Church', Theological Investigations X (London and New York, 1972), pp. 103-123; idem, 'The Teaching Office of the Church in the Present-Day Crisis of Authority', in this volume, pp. 3-30; idem, Vom Sinn des kirchlichen Amtes (Freiburg, 1966); cf. in addition O. Semmelroth, 'Die Kirche als Hierarchie und Pneuma', Die Zelle in Kirche und Welt edited by A. Spitalen (Graz, 1960), pp. 129-150; idem, 'Institution und Charisma', Geist und Leben 36 (1963), pp. 443-454; idem, Das geistliche Amt (Frankfurt, 2nd ed., 1965); idem, 'Office and Charism', Sacramentum Mundi 2 (New York and London, 1968), pp. 171-173.

[5] DS 3013.

[6] DS 1526; 1559.

[7] DS 241.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

normal and that which is extraordinary in Christian living are wholly fluid.[8] Now when all these points are considered the distinction between actual or effective grace on the one hand, and charismata on the other is a very secondary one, which to a large extent we can confidently leave unexplored for our present purposes. What we have to bear in mind above all, therefore, is the ecclesiastical and social function of every effective actual grace, and we must not overlook the fact that as effective (distinguishing this from sufficient grace) this grace falls under the sovereign disposition of God, which can neither be coerced nor taken for granted as always present. These are factors, then, which impart a 'charismatic character' to effective grace, and in the light of these considerations we can conclude that the charismatic element belongs no less necessarily and abidingly to the nature of the Church than her official institutions and the sacraments. The charismatic element was not merely bestowed in order to facilitate the initial stages of the Church's life, though in the alarm which followed upon the Montanist crisis this view was often maintained, since then any spontaneous manifestations of the charismatic were all too easily suspected of being 'enthusiasm', and there was an exaggerated tendency to recognize the charismatic as manifested in certain specific historic forms which in fact are out of date. Against this view it is in fact the case that the very nature of the charismatic as an essential trait inherent in the Church demands precisely that in contrast to the official institutions and the continuity apparent in these the charismatic manifests itself in ever fresh and unexpected forms, and hence too needs to be discovered ever anew.

The truth that the charismatic element belongs to the very nature of the Church is also an explicit doctrine of the Church herself. It was already put forward as such in the encyclical 'Mystici Corporis' of Pius XII.[9] The Second Vatican Council too speaks relatively at lengths of the charismata [85] of the laity.[10] They are imparted by the Holy Spirit in the Church according to his good pleasure.[11] They contribute to the renewal and further development of the Church, and they can be extraordinary, exceptional, or equally well be merely simple and broadly disseminated. In principle it pertains to the Church's official functionaries to judge of them, and it is their task to examine these charismata. At the same time, however, they must not suppress them when they are genuine. A similar emphasis on the existence of charismatic, as distinct from merely hierarchical, gifts, in the Church is to be found in the Decree on the Missions.[12] The terms 'charisma' and 'charismatic' occur in fourteen passages in the documents of the Second Vatican Council. Admittedly it must also be stated that apart from the insistence on the point that the officials of the Church have on the one hand to respect the charismata, and on the other hand to examine their genuineness, not very much is said in the Second Vatican Council with regard to the relationship between the charismatic and the institutional elements and their mutual interplay. Certainly in contrast to the ecclesiology of post-Reformation times the charismatic element in the Church is explicitly referred to. But, as 'Lumen Gentium' shows, the Church of officialdom still continues constantly to occupy the centre of the ecclesiological stage despite the fact that the second chapter, concerning the people of God has been placed before the third, concerning the Church's official functionaries. Perhaps, even at the risk of seeming over-subtle, we might be permitted to characterize the position of the ecclesiology here in the following terms: In the ecclesiology of former times the official institutions were concentrated upon almost to the exclusion of all [8] In 'Lumen Gentium' No. 12 the Council too takes into account the factor of gifts of grace which are disseminated universally.

[9] DS 3807.
[10] Cf. the decree on the Apostolate of the Laity, 'Apostolicam Actuositatem' Nos. 3 and 30, and on the Ministry and Life of Priests in 'Presbyterorum Ordinis', No. 9.
[11] Cf. the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, 'Lumen Gentium', Nos. 4, 7, 12.
[12] Cf. the Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity, 'Ad Gentes', Nos. 4 and 23.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

else, and were at most regarded as also being the channels through which the charismata were mediated. Today, on the other hand, the charismatic factor is felt in some sense to supply the institutional one with the motive force necessary for it. The question still remains whether in any future ecclesiology we shall not have to regard the official institutions as the necessary regulators of the charismatic element, so that it will be this that constitutes the true pith and essence of the Church. When we consider that the distinctive characteristic of the Church as compared with the Old Testament synagogue, consists precisely in the fact that she constitutes the presence of grace as irreversibly victorious, and that the difference between these two is not to be found in their institutional aspects as such, then it should in [86] reality be perfectly possible to regard the Church primarily as the historical concretization of the charismatic as brought about by the Spirit of Christ, and to regard the specifically institutional element in her simply as one of the regulating factors (albeit a necessary one) for this charismatic element. Now precisely from this consideration the converse actually follows, namely that the official element in the Church has a charismatic character. For it is evident that ultimately speaking the gifts of the Spirit can only be regulated by a gift of the Spirit. In other words any attempt to regard the official and the charismatic elements as simply opposed to one another would be totally at variance with the real situation. It is perfectly reasonable to suppose that some of the charismata as such are destined for the official functionaries of the Church such that without them these functionaries could not rightly perform their duties. This would imply a promise which in itself and from God's point of view cannot fail that the necessary charismata will be bestowed for the performance of these offices in virtue of the eschatologically definitive possession of the Spirit on the part of the Church as socially constituted, and in virtue of this eschatological character of the Church this promise would actually constantly be being made good in the Church as a whole, even though we cannot say with any certainty that it is actually being made good in any given individual case, and even though we cannot adopt the Donatist view that the individual act of the official Church is ipso facto invalid whenever it is not supported in a visible manner by the charismata.

In this connection, and in order to understand what has just been said, reference must be made to the so-called sacramental grace in the sacraments constitutive of particular callings within the Church, and it must be emphasized that such 'graces of calling' (order and matrimony) are capable, under certain circumstances, of achieving heroic dimensions, and therefore as a moral miracle of being charismatic in a narrower sense as well. This means that the transition between the graces of calling (as actual and effective) on the one hand, and the charismata of office in the narrower sense and extending beyond the scope of official authority as such on the other, is extremely fluid. It is certain that indefectibility and life promised to the Church, and in virtue of this to her officials also, is de facto made good in the concrete in part through the charismata bestowed again and again precisely upon her officials. But over and above these official charismata there must also be non-institutional charismata. For the Church as holy and as bearing witness in the world to the eschatological victory of God's grace through the manifestation of her own true nature is in fact not a Church which is constituted solely by her official [87] functionaries. Rather she is the holy people of God. The charismata which can be present in all Christians, and which therefore actually are present at least in germ in every justified individual who, as a member of the Body of Christ has a quite specific function to perform in that Body, are different from the Christian virtues and the actual and effective graces necessary for the exercise of these only in that in these virtues they make manifest that which is ipso facto present (albeit with varying degrees of effectiveness) in order for any Christian virtue to be practised in the Church, namely the outward sign of her nature as a society, of revelation, of the creed, of witness and of mission on the Church's behalf. Of course these charismata necessarily have a significance for the world as well, corresponding to the whole meaning of the Church as 'the sacrament of the world'. It is through them that the Church fulfills her mission towards the world in serving it. It follows from the connection between virtue, effective grace and charism as described above that in addition to the major bestowals of charisms and 'enthusiastic' movements which have arisen and must arise again and again in the Church, the acts of heroic faithfulness in coping with everyday life, in standing firm in situations which are unfavourable to religious life and similar virtues can perfectly well be charismatic also, and that too in a relatively strict sense in that by their endurance and indefatigable force in the totality of an individual life or the life of the Church these virtues clearly make manifest the power of the Spirit of God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If charismata belong to the very nature of the Church it follows that the official functionaries of the Church must not merely tolerate them but actually examine them and cultivate them too (1 Thess. 5:19 f.), a point which is emphasized by the Second Vatican Council. The official functionaries must recognize, and in practice act upon, the truth that the impulses of the Spirit on the Church's behalf do not always or necessarily have to manifest themselves in and through the official institutions. On the contrary some of them can also proceed from the holy people to the extent that in that people the Spirit makes effective his gifts of grace. The Church's officials must not suppose that any movement from below ipso facto proves that it is not sustained by the Spirit and not charismatic merely on the grounds that the officials themselves succeed in suppressing such a movement. The officials of the Church can 'quench the Spirit' just as much as individuals when they do this through their own fault. Certainly it is a truth entailed in faith in the Church and in the promise of God to her that there is no question of any radical or definitive opposition to the workings of the Spirit taken as a whole in the Church's institutions [88] taken as a whole. But this does not exclude the possibility that in many cases, even important ones, the officials may erroneously or culpably suppress charismatic movements of the Spirit or condemn them in an attitude of mistrust. Nor should we euphemistically term such acts on the part of the Church's officials as simply a necessary and prudent process of testing the charismata. The officials must have the courage to allow fresh and hitherto unknown forms of the charismatic factor in the Church to appear.[13] The officials must also require, make legitimate, and give a place in the life of the Church as a whole to the further processes by which these charismatic factors are given that institutional embodiment in some form to which they have a right, and which they must achieve at a very early stage in order to be effective and to endure.

II

In the previous section we have stated, in somewhat brief summary, the basic essentials with regard to the charismatic factor in the Church, though admittedly without entering into the biblical theology[14] or the history of the charismatic element in the Church.[15] We have now to approach the question of this charismatic element from yet a different aspect, and one which has rather to do with the sociology of the Church. The following proposition is put forward

[13] On this requirement, which has also been taken up by the Council, cf. K Rahner, 'Do not stifle the Spirit!', Theological Investigations VIIA (London and Baltimore, 1972), pp. 72-87.
[14] For a more detailed treatment see E. Käsemann, 'Geist und Gesitesgaben im NT', RGG II (3rd ed., 1958), 1272-1279, and H. Schürmann, 'Die geistlichen Gnadengaben', De Ecclesia I, edited by G. Baraúna (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 494-519.
[15] Admittedly to a large extent this history also proceeds outside the Church. On this cf. the comprehensive studies by R. A. Knox, H. G. Steck, H. Grundmann and E. Benz.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

for further discussion: The charismatic element in the Church designates that point in the Church at which God as Lord of the Church presides over the Church as an open system.

In order to make this statement intelligible we must first explain what we mean when we call the Church an open system. There is a certain approach adopted both by the exponents of apologetics within the Church and also by those who oppose them, in which both either explicitly or implicitly take as their starting-point the axiom that the Church is a closed system. What we mean by a closed system here is that this system, i.e. a [89] complex of realities of various kinds which, despite their variations, are related to one another and contribute towards a common task, is defined and directed from a point within the system itself. At least so far as the life of the Church as a society in the true sense is concerned (as distinct from any purely private sphere in the life of the individual or from the merely secular dimension), friends and foes alike of the Church conceive of this system more or less explicitly in such a way that all initiatives, in so far as the only real validity they have is within the Church as such, are thought of as proceeding wholly from her official functionaries and among these ultimately from the pope as the supreme pastor of the Church. The Church is conceived of as an absolute monarchy or totalitarian system in which in principle the only measures having any force in the dimension of the social are those decreed, ordained, or at least approved in a positive manner by him who stands at the supreme point within this system. Of course in such a conception it is held that in order that the Church may abide, this supreme figure endowed with totalitarian dominion is preserved from making any erroneous decision in any essential or decisive matters by the assistance of the Holy Spirit, and hence that as constituting a society in the formal sense this totalitarian and closed system, which is adequately directed from a point immanent within the system itself, is nevertheless, in virtue of this assistance of the Spirit, precisely not a totalitarian system of the kind which must radically be rejected by reason of its total subjection to one who is omnipotent and at the same time liable to error. But however much this idea of a closed system of this kind may be furthered by a certain kind of papalism, by reason of its authoritarian outlook, the Church is not a closed, but rather an open system, i.e. a system such that the definitive condition in which it actually stands and should stand neither can nor should be defined in any adequate sense in terms of any one point immanent within the system itself. On the contrary its definitive state can only be defined in terms of a point outside the system, i.e. in terms of the dominion of God, so that to do justice to the state in which the system exists at any given stage we must say that its operations are charismatic rather than institutional in character.[16]

This last statement calls for a little further explanation. Of course within the dimension of the Church's official institutions and juridical system there is a supreme position within her which, so far as this dimension in itself is concerned, is not in its turn determined by any further point of [90] reference existing in the same dimension. To that extent there is a supreme universal authority in the Church which is not itself in turn dependent upon any other legal authority as such. In the Catholic Church the pope and the united episcopate are the bearers of this supreme authority as constituting a special kind of unity which is quite incapable of being adequately defined in terms of any further formal or juridical factors. In other words taken together they constitute a 'supreme authority which is both monarchic and collegiate (however contradictory this way of putting the matter may sound).[17]

[16] In this connection cf. also the various works which the author has written on the subject of 'Freedom in the Church', as well as the study entitled 'The Question of the Future' in this volume, pp. 181-201.

[17] Treated of in greater detail in my studies, Episkopat und Primat, Quaestiones Dispuatae 11 (Freiburg, 1961), pp. 13-36; 'On the Theology of the Council', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 244-267; 'The Episcopal Office', ibid. VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 313-360; 'On the Relationship between the Pope and the College of Bishops', ibid. X (London and New York, 1972), pp. 50-70.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

At this point we may set aside this question of how, on a Catholic view, the supreme holders of the highest universal juridical authority in the Church are to be conceived of in more precise terms, because this point does not affect the question of whether the Church is a closed or an open system. But it must be urgently insisted upon that this whole juridical dimension, taken strictly as such, is only one of the elements in the social reality of the Church herself and that too not one such that it can dominate over the total reality and the total functioning of the other elements even at the merely social level. In this statement it is of course presupposed that there are elements in the Church, at least in the social dimension, which must not be thought of simply as subordinate elements, subdivisions etc., of the dimension of the juridical, in other words that the social dimension and the organization of a society by law are not identical at least so far as the Church is concerned.

In the deliberations leading up to the doctrine of the papacy embodied in 'Lumen Gentium' at the Second Vatican Council a statement proposed by the Pope himself was rejected and deleted with a certain force, the statement namely that the Pope is only answerable (devinctus) to the one Lord (Jesus Christ).[18] The very fact that a statement of this kind could be proposed at all illustrates the tendency touched upon above to understand the Church as a closed and totalitarian system. Of course this statement can be taken as an expression of the fact that the highest, and in fact [91] personal supremacy within the officials of the Church is not in its turn subject to any other authority at the juridical level within the Church, that the supreme position (suprema sedes) is not judged by anyone else, as it is stated in the CIC, and clearly in this sense the statement which was rejected would be correct. But it almost inevitably conjures up the misunderstanding that in all that concerns his own functions the Pope acts merely on his own volition, merely as autonomous, and not as accepting the ideas of others; that his position is not merely an essential element of an indispensable kind in a greater whole, incorporating the contribution proper to himself into this greater whole without being able to recognize or define in any adequate sense what develops from this contribution of his within this whole, and what the whole itself becomes through this contribution of his. The statement that was rejected conjures up the mistaken impression that at the social level of the Church the Pope is the sole sovereign and active determining factor, so that everything that takes place in the Church, even though it is carried out by many subordinates, is properly speaking his work. It suggests that Peter is the Church, and that the Church is adequately contained, reformed, and determined in its activities in Peter.[19] It is to rule out this position that we say that the system of the Church is open, and in this sense charismatic. What we de facto observe in the Church throughout her entire history is a genuine pluralism within which the papacy has a position of its own without thereby being able to determine or to initiate the whole of that activity. And this fact is not one which must be misinterpreted in terms of a mistaken ideology in favour of a totalitarian papalism by saying, for instance, that such realities are, after all, positively integrated into an absolute system of this kind by being approved of and explicitly or tacitly consented to. The first Councils, almost the whole history of dogma, the origins of the religious orders, the greater part of the history of spirituality, the life of the Churches of the Far East including their juridical systems, the history of theology, and much more besides, have developed, as a matter of history, without any influence – at any rate any notable influence – on the part of the Pope. This is, as has been said, a fact which must not be interpreted away. In dogmatic ecclesiology it is explicitly taught that even the office of the bishops, despite their necessary union with the apostolic see, is juris divini. In other words the bishops rule their flocks not in [18] On this text proposed by the Pope, but referred back by the Theological Commission cf. my commentary on chapter 22 of 'Lumen Gentium', LTK Suppl. I (1966), 227/228, and in addition to this the observation of J. Ratzinger on the 'Nota explicativa praevia', ibid. 355/356.

[19] S. H. Meyer, Das Wort Pius XI: 'Die Tradition bin ich', Theologische Existenz heute 122 (Munich, 1965).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the name of the Pope but in the name of Christ, and hence are not mere officials of the Pope. And in this doctrine, even at the juridical level [92] of the Church, a certain inalienable pluralism is recognized, so that even at this juridical level the authority accorded to the Pope is not a totalitarian one.[20]

Now at the juridical level it is not merely the relationship between Pope and bishops briefly delineated above and culminating in the doctrine of the united episcopate as the body vested with supreme powers in the Church that could be further developed and applied in the concrete. There are other phenomena too in this sphere precisely of law which demonstrate the openness of the system. For instance there is a doctrine in canon law, and that not merely the canon law of the Middle Ages, to the effect that any new law needs to be accepted by the people of the Church. And this phenomenon actually exists in practice too down to the present day, albeit only in a few striking instances.[21]

All these observations might equally well be extended – albeit prudently – to the sphere of the discovery of truth within the Church. Here too, without prejudice to its real authority, the official teaching institutions constitute one particular element in an open system, and do not constitute that point from which, taking it simply as a point within the Church herself, the Church's awareness of her own faith can alone or adequately be defined. The official teaching institutions are not merely bound by scripture and tradition as two factors to which they are subordinate. It is also true that they can only carry out their own work in preserving, and especially in developing, the deposit of faith with the help of theology and of religious awareness in general, neither of which are simply dependent upon those official institutions.[22] So far as theology is concerned it is admittedly the case that the official teaching institutions are rightly empowered to censure or reject opinions in matters of theological doctrine, but they cannot simply dictate the direction in which theology proceeds in positive terms, if only because they cannot direct anyone in concreto to work actively at theology. A further point that is demonstrated again and again is that the history of the ideas that are applied in the official pronouncements [93] of the Church's teaching authorities are quite incapable of being directed in any complete or adequate sense, although of course the teaching of the official Church too has some influence on the history of such concepts. Thus a position can arise in which the official teaching authority itself is compelled by a developing history of ideas of this kind, independent of the teaching office, to express the content of the faith in fresh concepts which run counter to its earlier opinions in order to avoid the danger of doctrines previously expressed in terms which have become petrified no longer being understood, or being rejected as impossible to apply.[23] In the dimension of her awareness of truth too the Church is an open system within which even a Pope cannot know beforehand what course the further history of faith and dogma will follow.

All the elements which either condition or constitute the concrete life of the Church in all her dimensions, revelation, the history of the world, the history of ideas, science, political influences that are brought to bear etc., have a mutual interplay, mutually modify one another, and all this goes to make up a history which even in terms of this present world tends towards a future that is unknown and which cannot in any adequate sense be prognosticated. Even the Pope is not merely the pilot who guides the history of the Church, but he who is [20] On this cf. also n. 17 and the commentary on the Constitution on the Church referred to in n. 18.

[21] An example of this from the disciplinary sphere, and belonging to recent times would be the 'Constitutio Apostolica' of John XXIII, 'Veterum Sapientia'. The prescription contained in it to use Latin as the language for lectures in the Catholic faculties has not been carried out, and hence manifestly no longer has any validity. See AAS 54 (1962), 129-135, esp. 133 f., and also the definitive interpretations ibid. 339-368.
[22] On this cf. also my study 'The Teaching Office of the Church in the Present Day Crisis of Authority', in this volume, pp. 3-30.
[23] See K. Rahner, 'Demythologization and the Sermon', Concilium 3/4 (Pastoral), (1968), pp. 12-20.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

himself guided as well in a history the true pilot of which does not himself belong to this history. It could be said that this is something which is not peculiar to the Church, but rather constitutes a characteristic present in absolutely all forms of human history which everywhere and in all cases is open and can never consciously or totally be guided by any futurology towards a preconceived future. It may be that the openness of any social system, constituted as it is by the openness and unpredictability of the future, and present in it perhaps against its own will, is, at least in a certain sense, a mere remnant of obscurity, untouched by man's own will to plan the future rationally, and something which he is precisely forced to put up with in shaping the world and manipulating the course of human life. But even if this is true, in the Church this openness is not a mere remnant to be put up with in a system which has failed to achieve a totalitarian constitution governed from one single point, and thereby to achieve complete control of itself. This openness, rather, is precisely that which positively asserts itself as an essential element in the system. The Church must positively will to remain open because only in this way can she be true to her own nature as the exodus, the people on pilgrimage towards the inconceivable mystery of God, as [94] she who is endowed with that radical promise and hope which cannot be defined in 'this worldly' terms otherwise than as the will to the absolute future which precisely in this form is mediated through the willing acceptance of the openness to an unknown future within the present world.[24]

It is from the nature of the Church in this sense, as constituting an open system in a radical and abiding sense, that the charismatic element in the Church derives its ultimate and truest essence. This charismatic element is not merely, not even primarily, something like one particular individual factor introduced into the Church by God from without as something belonging to a particular category, and almost as an element of disturbance. On the contrary, when we use the term charismatic we are using a key word to stand for that ultimate incalculability which belongs to all the other elements in the Church in their mutual interplay. This means that the charismatic is, if we may so express it, transcendental in character, not one element in the system of the Church but a special characteristic of the system as a whole. At the same time, however, that in the charismatic element in the Church which is concrete and belongs to a particular category could perhaps, without doing violence to the nature of this charismatic element, be conceived of as constituted by the openness of history within this present world considered as creative freedom. This element of the free in history, of that in secular history which cannot adequately be controlled from any point within the world, and which is in fact also an element and a condition of the history of the Church, would on this showing become that which is charismatic in the true sense in the Church in virtue of the fact that precisely this openness of the future in the present world becomes, through the grace of the Spirit, a medium for the Church's own members to reach out to the absolute future.[25]

III

A third consideration should now be introduced: the question of the interplay between official institution and free charisma as it exists in the concrete. In accordance with what has been said in the first section let us leave [95] on one side the interplay between the teaching office of the Church and the charismatic development of faith or theology. In other words let us concentrate upon the connections between the Church's official institutions and the charismatic element in her at the level of the Christian life and the Church's life in the [24] On this see the study already referred to entitled 'The Question of the Future' in this volume pp. 181-201.

[25] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Marxist Utopia and the Christian Future of Man', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 59-68; idem, 'A Fragmentary Aspect of a Theological Evaluation of the Concept of the Future', Theological Investigations X (London and New York, 1972), pp. 235-241.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

concrete, and recognize at this level that in this interplay within an open system of the Church the very nature of the system is such that it is quite impossible to avoid cases of conflict. In the light of this we can then formulate our third question quite simply as an enquiry into the nature of ecclesiastical obedience. The question with which we are here concerned has also arisen again and again in the course of the Church's history, and particularly in those cases in which charismatic prophets, filled with a consciousness of their own mission, have come into conflict with the official Church and her leaders.[26]

When we speak of obedience in connection with the charismatic element it is evident that we are presupposing that obedience to the Church on the part of a Christian, a priest, or a member of a religious order is indeed one virtue, but not the only one, in which all else is subsumed, and further that within the scope of a Christian life, even though his obedience plays its part in determining its course, autonomous personal initiatives, conscious judgements, and a personal and inalienable responsibility for his own actions must be present; in other words that in an open system obedience, no less than official juridical authority, makes it necessary for there to be mutual influence and interdependence between those vested with authority and those who are 'subordinate' to them. Within the Church, therefore, obedience is to be conceived of otherwise than would be the case if it consisted in the legitimate response of a 'subordinate' to an authority conceived of in totalitarian and authoritarian terms. In a closed system such authority decides everything and is itself influenced by no-one. The obedience we have to consider, then, is such as is to be found in an open system in which each party influences the other; in other words an obedience which allows for personal initiative, and in which we have absolutely to allow for the possibility, even in the Church, that in certain circumstances the individual may feel called upon by the dictates of his own conscience to refuse to carry out some directive. Now on this view of obedience, and on the basis of the concept of the open system, it is clear that in all these cases of conflict there can be no formal principles on the basis of which, and purely at the level of theoretical consideration, it is [96] possible to arrive at a single univocal solution applicable to all such cases.[27]

The very process of striking the right balance in the concrete between personal initiative and obedient fulfilment of the directives from above can no longer be clearly and unequivocally arrived at on the basis of general principles. The same applies to innumerable further questions in which charismatic movements and tendencies on the one hand, and the official institutions on the other, may come into conflict. The national peculiarities of a particular local Church, and the way in which it is incorporated into the single universal Church, centralism and decentralization, freedom in theological research and certainty in matters of doctrine, devotion to the sacraments and personal devotion in the life of the individual in the concrete, interior attitudes and cult on the one hand, and Christian responsibility towards a secular world on the other, withdrawal from the world and assent to the world etc. – all these contrasting attitudes are such that each of the separate tensions involved may be maintained, preserved or evoked either by the official institutions or by the charismatic element, and hence conflicts can arise with regard to the way in which these tensions are to be smoothed out and reconciled in the concrete. For the reconciliation that is arrived at in the concrete is not in any sense itself a firm and unchangeable factor laid down once and for all. Rather it is something that must constantly be rediscovered afresh as a matter of concrete decision, and in this process it cannot be arrived at in the concrete solely on the basis of abstract principles. It might be suggested that we should content ourselves

[26] Cf. A. Müller, Das Problem von Befehl und Gehorsam im Leben der Kirche (Einsiedeln, 1964).
[27] On the whole range of problems entailed cf. K. Rahner, 'Marginalien über den Gehorsam', Sendung und Gnade (Innsbruck, 4th ed., 1966), pp. 487-509; idem, 'Christus als Beispiel des priesterlichen Gehorsams', Knechte Christi (Freiburg, 1967), pp. 142-145.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

with a statement that in cases of conflict between the official institutions and the charismatic elements it is the official institutions that have the last word (although not the penultimate one), so that our obedience is due to them. The validity of this can indeed be admitted as a certain practical rule of thumb. But the problem is not solved thereby. For the only 'last word' in the true sense is concerned with that which has already taken place or is brought into being by this word. So far as the future is concerned there is no 'last word' in the proper sense. For even one who actually obeys a directive can still always take into account the fact that at a later stage such a directive will be withdrawn, that the situation will change radically and will thus render the controversial directive superfluous, that as generation succeeds to generation in the Church, as theology progresses etc. many [97] directives are rendered out of date, and thus a whole new scope for the charismata is created in the Church.

It must be remembered that obedience itself in its turn had its due place in the open system of the Church, and that the obedient man cannot possibly be obedient and nothing more, but must rather work out ever afresh, and on his own responsibility, a synthesis between the responsible taking of personal initiatives on the one hand and obedience on the other, even having to exercise his own critical judgement on the law and the directives of the Church. In other words it must be remembered that in the practice of obedience there is no such thing as any 'once and for all' universal and formal law laying down precisely what form this exercise of obedience must assume in the individual case. Now in view of all this one of the factors entering into obedience in relation even to the institutional element in the Church is actually a charismatic element, a movement of the Spirit which cannot be foreseen or controlled either by the representative of the institutional or by those who respond to their directives.

To put the matter quite simply: obedience in itself and as such must call upon the free initiative of the individual seeking to obey in the Church, and upon the decisions he takes of his own personal responsibility. And on these grounds alone, while the institutional factor in the Church is a legitimate entity, it nevertheless remains encompassed by the charismatic movement of the Spirit in the Church, the Spirit who again and again ushers the Church as an open system into a future which he himself, and no-one else, has arranged, and in a manner which can never adequately be planned for beforehand by any man or any institution. The charismatic element does exist in the Church, and it does not merely stand in a dialectical relationship to the institutional factor as its opposite pole, existing on the same plane. Rather it is the first and the most ultimate among the formal characteristics inherent in the very nature of the Church as such.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[98]

6

SCHISM IN THE CATHOLIC CHURCH?

Everywhere in the post-conciliar Church we are afraid of new schisms, and believe that we can recognize signs that the danger of schismatic division is no mere nightmare on the part of reactionary Catholics, but a reality which has to be taken seriously into account. A short time ago the Pope[1] himself spoke of such dangers of new schisms arising in the Church. Everywhere groups of priests are formed who feel themselves to be in some sense opposed to the bishops as the leaders of the Church. Such groups may sometimes, perhaps, give the impression of being pressure groups because in certain circumstances they actually seek to make the hierarchy agree to their demands by means of threats. Here and there, for instance in Holland, Eucharistic confraternities have been set up which, on any normal Catholic understanding of what the Church is, seem to be schismatic in character so far as the Catholic Church is concerned. In Amsterdam Catholic priests have threatened the lawfully constituted bishop that they will set up a non-episcopal Catholic community unless he allows married priests to remain fully in their official positions. Even in the pre-conciliar age we were forced to face the question of whether something similar to a schismatic separation from Rome had arisen in China under the pressure of the communist régime. As the ecumenical movement has become stronger the lines of demarcation between the individual Churches have seemed less clear and less significant. Such a trend can actually lead to individual groups of Catholics forming premature amalgamations at the ecclesiastical level with other Christian groups to the point at which in reality, albeit not of set purpose, something like a schismatic separation from the Catholic Church is brought about. This means that the theme, 'Schism in the Catholic Church?' is not lacking in a certain interest and immediate relevance. We have no intention here of describing or even analysing any further the facts and symptoms indicated [99] above which are indicative of a danger of schism in the Church. Instead we shall be putting forward certain basic theological considerations bearing upon this theme of 'Schism in the Church of Today?'.

Heresy and Schism

First the difficulty of drawing a theological distinction between heresy and schism must be pointed out. The difference between heresy and schism has been recognized from ancient times. Moreover in the history of the early Church certain particular cases can be found in which this distinction seems, at least at first sight, to be actually illustrated in the concrete. At least in those cases in which the point of dispute was merely the legality of a given individual holding a leading office in the Church, whether subordinate or supreme and nothing more than this, we seem to encounter an instance in which schism is present without any heretical split having taken place. Again the present-day Codex Juris Canonici (c. 1325 § 2) draws the relevant distinction between heresy and schism, and seems to presuppose (without providing any clear definition on this point) that schism does not necessarily imply heresy and vice versa. And indeed at first sight this seems readily comprehensible. Schism arises in those cases in which someone explicitly and directly, or by implication through his actions, refuses

[1] In his address in the Lateran Basilica on the 3rd April 1969. It is interesting that shortly before in 'La Croix' Cardinal Suenens had declared that he did not believe that there was any danger of schism in the Church today.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

obedience to the Pope as the supreme leader of the universal Church and the representative of unity in her, and (or) unequivocally separates himself from the Church as a living community. This can be the act of an individual or a group, and in fact it makes no difference whether the individuals who do separate themselves from the community of the Church do or do not attach themselves to some other Church or church-like group. Now such a separation does not seem necessarily to imply the denial of any Christian doctrine explicitly taught as such by the Catholic Church.

In reality, however, the distinction between heresy and schism is not so simple. It has long been noticed that ever since the primacy of the Pope has come to be numbered among the explicitly defined doctrines of the Catholic Church, on any Roman Catholic understanding of the Church's nature the distinction between schism and heresy is no longer so simple. For to withdraw obedience from the Pope seems, after all, if it is radically carried through, to imply a denial of the dogma of the primacy of the Pope, in other words to be heresy as well. The Second Vatican Council does not state this with regard to the Orthodox Churches because it consistently [100] avoids the concepts of 'haeresis' and 'schisma'. But this does not eliminate the problem. We could of course say that the problem of whether or not it is possible to arrive at any real distinction between heresy and schism is unimportant, since we have in fact accustomed ourselves to regarding heretics and schismatics alike as in good faith, or to presume that they are so. In other words we have grown accustomed to regarding the separation from the Church which these involve as existing merely at a specifically external level, albeit an important one, either that is to say at the level of a specific conscious and abstract formulation of a reality of the faith or at the level of the Church's organization as a society. If this is the way in which we regard heresy and schism in the case of one who is, in all good faith, following the dictates of his conscience, in other words one who is merely materially speaking a heretic or schismatic, then the distinction between the two realities is from the outset not very important. Nevertheless this question, which we have no more than indicated above, has a certain importance for our considerations as we shall straightaway have to show.

A first point that strikes us is that today we speak almost more of the dangers of a schism arising in the Church than of the dangers of fresh heresies arising. The reason for this is surely not that there is no danger of fresh heresies arising in the Church.[2] Surely the explanation of this state of affairs is to be sought elsewhere in the fact that the lack of interest in theoretical questions of faith in the case of many young men is far too great to give rise to any directly theoretical dissent from the official Church at the level of conscious will and opinion. On this showing we can understand that resistance to the Church today is enkindled first and foremost at the level of concrete living, and is directed against her juridical dispensations and her 'establishment', and because of this when any such revolt becomes manifest and socially relevant in the Church it is easier to subsume it under the ancient name of schism or of the danger of schism than under the concept of heresy as formulated at the theoretical level. In the light of this we can, however, go on to ask whether in fact the phenomena which are referred to as schisms or entailing the danger of schism can appropriately be subsumed under this ancient concept at all. For this does, after all, presuppose that the theoretical reason has a certain primacy over the practical because it precedes it in time. Properly speaking, therefore, I would from the outset relegate schism to the level of a secondary phenomenon by comparison with heresy, something which properly speaking, could only constitute a reaction against very secondary factors at the [101] social level, as for instance the question of whether this or that individual is the legitimately elected Pope, whether this or that bishop is or is not exercising his authority legitimately, etc.

[2] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Heresies in the Church Today?' in this volume, pp. 116-141.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is true that in the times in which we live the practical reason has, at least de facto, attained a certain primacy because on the one hand, in the active control of the life of man and his environment by technical means, it has come to have quite new functions, and because on the other in these functions it is no longer thought of as merely the carrying out of the speculative reason. Now on this showing the dissent manifested by the Church's members comes to be quite different in kind and to have a quite different significance from what has been called schism hitherto. Basically speaking this new kind of dissent carries with it the dissent of the speculative reason because the practical reason is regarded as the more comprehensive. And because of this it is properly speaking heresy too, even though this term too can only be applied in that modified sense which has just been indicated with regard to the use of the term schism.

Schism as a Contemporary Phenomenon

From all that has been said, inadequate though it is, it surely follows inevitably that what we of today are confronted with is not simply the new danger of a schism which has remained unaltered in its essential character as such, but rather a phenomenon the true theological and social nature of which is still far from being clearly recognized. It cannot be our task here to embark upon a theological and sociological examination in order ex professo to describe this new and different phenomenon. This would be too great and too difficult a task. A point which we shall be treating of more fully at a later stage is that not everything new that is desired and striven for in the Church today in the way of doctrine and living practice is also ipso facto schism or entails the danger of schism. On this basis, however, certain insights will be provided, albeit indirectly and without being explicitly stated, into that phenomenon of modern times to which the ancient term 'schism' can be applied only hesitatingly and with reservations. For these 'schisms' are the distorted forms of those pluralist factors in the Church which are justified in the present times and only possible in the present times. And it is of these that we shall have to speak. And it is because it is only in these present times that these pluralist factors are possible that it is only now that a phenomenon arises which can only very inadequately be designated by the ancient term 'schism'.

[102] Abstracting, however, at this preliminary stage from the problems of terminology and the material questions implicit in them, we must begin by pointing out that schisms still can arise even today in which individuals or even more specific groups in the Church can separate themselves from the Roman Catholic Church by refusing to give their allegiance to the universal Church or to a legitimately established division of it to the extent that is necessary, and by refusing to obey the officials legitimately vested with authority in the Church. Just as this sort of thing was possible and actually happened in earlier times, so too it can also be possible today. The occurrences mentioned at the outset in the contemporary Church provide concrete illustrations of the fact that there is a danger of such schisms arising. Admittedly it must be pointed out at the same time that even when this general statement has been made very many individual problems of a more concrete kind still remain wholly unsolved. Presumably when men separate themselves to a certain extent from the concrete unity of life within the Church, or refuse to obey the authorised officials in the Church today this is not the outcome of a quite general a priori attitude in which this concrete unity of life with the Church and obedience to legitimately constituted authorities in the Church are rejected in general and in principle. Rather it represents a reaction against specific modes of living in the Church which are historically conditioned and are regarded as no longer in keeping with the times. These modes of life in the Church can then also be maintained and defended in the concrete by specific laws and prescriptions on the part of the Church's authorities (the Pope or a bishop).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In any cases in which an attitude was adopted of radical rejection of the concrete unity of the Church and her legitimately constituted authorities, and in which a schism arose as a result of this attitude, a heresy would be present from the outset and unequivocally, and it would be this alone that would be the source of the schism. Such a case, therefore, would imply not so much the problem of schism but that of heresy. But let us envisage the second case, i.e. one in which a reaction arises which (at least) appears to be schismatic against a particular way of life in the Church which is no longer in keeping with the times or reasonable to impose, and the ecclesiastical laws and prescriptions upholding that way of life. In such a case the question arises whether in the concrete case the ecclesiastical law or official ordinance has or has not any objective authority binding in conscience. The case of an unjust command, an unreasonable ordinance, or one in which an ecclesiastical authority exceeds its own competence is in principle possible in the Church, and it cannot be regarded as schismatic to [103] react against this by refusing to obey it even when the form this takes in a specific instance is not merely a failure to fulfil the ordinance or law in question, but a radical rejection of such a specific and particular law or ordinance. Something of this kind is at least conceivable when the law that is being questioned or the dubious directive not merely prescribes that which is less good, but actually does violence to a genuine human right, or commands something which, when all the circumstances have been taken into consideration, must be judged to be immoral. As we have said, the possibility of such ordinances being issued in the Church cannot be excluded a priori, however true it may be that the individual Christian in the individual case must exercise great caution before he presumes such a situation to have arisen. It is true that within the official hierarchy of the Church there is in principle such a thing as an authority over authority, at least in the prime instance of the Church's teaching office as vested in the Pope or in a Council. This means that when an officially defined doctrine in the strict sense is issued by the Pope or Council then it is also clear so far as the Catholic understanding of the Church is concerned that in this case the Church's teaching office is not exceeding its authority.

But this absolute authority over authority is primarily present only in official definitions of doctrine, and not in other authentic statements of doctrine. And in the case of laws and prescriptions on the part of the Church's official pastors it is only in the most exceptional cases that it becomes possible to deduce a law or prescription of the Church as a rule of action at the concrete level unambiguously and compellingly from the teaching authority of the Church in an absolute sense, and so to demonstrate that any rejection of such a law or prescription amounts to heresy by a usurpation of the authority that governs authority. This means that any resistance to a concrete law, the real binding force of which is in fact precisely disputed, cannot so easily and simply be proved to be unequivocally schismatic provided we do not fall into the false assumption that a directive issued by an ecclesiastical authority in all sincerity can never be immoral. In those cases, therefore, in which it is not any definitorial decision of doctrine that is in question, and in which a specific directive cannot be proved unequivocally to follow from a doctrine of this kind, it is in principle conceivable that a conflict between an ecclesiastical authority and one who refused to obey its directive might be a case of open conflict, one which cannot univocally be decided from either side. In such a case the question of whether the refusal to obey does or does not constitute a schism remains open, so that such a conflict can be decided not in terms of theory or formal law, but only in terms of the facts themselves.

[104] Now given that a conflict of this kind remains insoluble at the level of theory and formal law, so that the question remains open whether it does or does not constitute a schism, we cannot solve it by saying that in such a case the officially constituted authorities of the Church can eliminate a case of conflict by threatening or actually imposing an

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

excommunication. For this would merely be to transpose the problem and turn it into the question of whether an excommunication of this sort is just and effective.

From these indications it will be recognized that the question of whether it is a schism or merely a legitimate resistance to possible excesses on the part of the Church's official authorities in a given concrete instance will in many cases be difficult to answer, and that in many such cases it will often be quite impossible for the situation to be controlled by decisions at the level of theory and formal law. Such control will only be achieved, on the contrary, by the practical reason which in this case consists in patience and a Christian attitude of readiness to renounce and to serve. Despite all this it still remains valid as a principle that even today schisms can arise in the Church which really are such. Nor do we need to enlarge any further upon the point that very often if not always today, to the extent that a genuine and not merely a presumptive schism has arisen it proceeds from a heretical attitude of mind even though this may not become wholly apparent in every case. For even when individual groups attempt to assert their rights, whether supposed or genuine in a way that involves force and is devoid of charity against that concrete unity in the Church of which the official authorities are the representatives, a heresy at least of the practical reason can be present by the very failure to accord due value to the importance of this concrete unity, and also to the formal authority of the official functionaries of the Church. While, therefore, it may be perfectly true that there are real dangers of schism arising in the Church of today, still very many tendencies or actual situations occurring in the Church today should not ipso facto be condemned as constituting a danger of, or a tendency towards a schism. Alternatively we may say that the dangers involved here are such as are also inevitably involved in every good in our present world and age, and such as do not ipso facto make us suspect the genuineness of such goods. Let us identify a few such tendencies and real situations which must not be confused from the outset with schism or the danger of schisms.

[105]

The Degree of Autonomy of the Subsidiary Churches

The first factor we may point to is the tendency of the subordinate Churches to achieve a specifically greater degree of autonomy. The right of the subordinate Churches to a certain degree of autonomy and the importance of this both in itself and for the universal Church were in principle recognized at the Second Vatican Council. But the inferences envisaged in this recognition were nevertheless chiefly the subordinate Churches of the east. Obviously an autonomy of this kind could readily and unhesitatingly be conceded to these. We were already accustomed to them, and a recognition of this kind was still far from affecting that Church in which the majority of those who expressed this recognition live, namely the Church of the west, the western hemisphere, her daughter Churches in America, and the missions All of these are governed by one and the same Codex Juris Canonici, which manifestly affords little scope for the distinctive way of life proper to the subordinate Churches. The tendency to insist more strongly on their own distinctive ways of life and to achieve a more manifest degree of autonomy on the part of the subordinate Churches, therefore, is something which, though it has been recognized by the Second Vatican Council, has still been recognized primarily at the theoretical level, so that numerous grounds for conflict are concealed within this recognition, even to the point of threatening to turn into schism. But in itself this tendency is legitimate, and must not from the outset be suspected of being schismatic. Obviously this tendency meets with resistance on the part of the Church of the west, which is de facto to a large extent reduced to uniformity. If we take as our starting-point the assumption that whatever the forms in which the particular degree of autonomy enjoyed by a subordinate Church is expressed they must fall within the uniform pattern which has hitherto prevailed, then this tendency would from the outset be deprived of any real force and reduced to a mere theoretical ideal. As a matter of right and in practical terms the tendency to achieve a more emphatic degree of autonomy on the part of the particular subordinate Churches demands a wider scope than has hitherto been accorded to them by the general law of the Church and the practice of the Roman curia. On the other hand the unity of the subordinate Churches within the one Church is certainly not constituted or assured by the unity of the creed. On the contrary, it also demands, and that too precisely today, in an age in which an ever greater degree of unification is being achieved within a single world civilization, a certain measure of universal law and [106] universal patterns of life within the Church, over and above the jus divinum.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

How to strike the balance in the concrete between these two principles of the autonomy and the unity of the subordinate Churches still remains a very obscure question, the more so since in many respects today the Church is actually confronted with fresh tasks and fresh decisions which require a greater degree of unity than was formerly the case. Obviously the concrete point at which to strike the balance in the contemporary scene between these two principles, and that too in terms of the particular concrete questions being treated of in any given case, is something that has to be discussed afresh again and again. But this is a point which cannot be discussed any further here. The question which remains in this connection is how such a balance can be discovered afresh in the concrete. Now the actual situation prevailing in the Church, and that too even at the human level and in all areas of the Church's life, is that generally speaking a right and a measure of power in the concrete is only granted under the force of a certain compulsion and not on the basis of a dialogue and the arguments put forward in this. It cannot be said that a degree of compulsion in some form, brought about by newly created situations, by a certain resistance etc. is from the outset or in every case an illegitimate way of altering a given state of affairs in the Church. In human life and in human society it is in fact not the case, and can never be so, that the process of arriving at decisions takes place solely through discussions of the facts involved (however important it may be to strive for such discussions), in other words that the authority of an official institution is demonstrably nothing else than the representation of the material arguments on which a given decision is (or should be) based. Now if this is the case on any Catholic and realistic view of the matter from the point of view of the 'authorities', then we cannot fall into the utopian idealism either of demanding that the desire for some change on the part of those 'subject to authority' shall only be arrived at exclusively on the basis of a reasoned discussion of the realities involved (however true it maybe that these must be the most important factor) which comes to be accepted by the officially constituted authorities as correct. In any decision one of the factors which is constantly at work is a certain 'compulsion' from above and from below, and we do not make the process of arriving at a given decision more human by suppressing this. Only if we recognize this obscure element in the process of arriving at any decision can we restrain and control it, be self-critical in our application of it, and concede that the other party too has a right to it, recognizing that it is all too easy to condemn it as immoral even [107] while we are all too ready to overlook it as a factor in our own activities. If all this were not the case, then the very idea of consuetudo contra legem could not have any legitimacy, not even in specific instances.

On the other hand it can never be legitimate to use a schism or the threat of a schism as a means to impose by force a new balance between the unity of the Church on the one hand and the autonomy of the subordinate Churches on the other. This statement is intended to apply to those cases in which there is question of a real schism, and not to that radical situation mentioned above in which it is only a presumptive schism that is involved in the process of resisting a directive of the ecclesiastical authorities prescribing something which is not merely the lesser good, but something that is actually immoral, or against an

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

excommunication which is objectively speaking unjust, and at the same time definitive. The reason, therefore, that it is illegitimate to use a real schism or the threat of one as a means of achieving a new balance between the two principles mentioned above is that any real schism breaches the unity of the Church, which for a Catholic, and in the light of the Churches doctrine, is an entity which he can dispense with only by dispensing with the Church herself as necessary for salvation, and also that the will to enter into schism in this way runs counter to the eschatological hope of the Christian, who holds firm to the truth that, in spite of all, the good that God wills always finds its due place in the long run through the exercise of humility, patience and courage, without any revolutionary irruption into the continuity of the history of the one Church. For once and for all the Church is not a broken-down synagogue, but the Church of the final age such that the only stage which is to come after it is the eternal kingdom of God.

This eschatological hope does not imply any canonized immutability on the part of an established Church, but simply holds firm to the fact that this change within the Church and through her can take place and does take place repeatedly within her hierarchical constitution without us having to separate ourselves from the unity of the Church as it exists in the concrete, and not merely as an ideological postulate. He who attempts to oppose the due and justified differences of constitution of the subordinate Churches within the one Church by schismatic force overlooks the fact that thereby, and precisely in this present age of a growing socialization of man, he is turning himself into a religious individualist. And the ideologies on which this state is based have no real future. We can reform the Church only from within the Church, and while maintaining an eschatological hope which humanly speaking can never be proved in any adequate sense. Now it belongs precisely to the very nature of this hope that [108] even in conditions which seem to be unfavourable or hopeless it takes up the cudgels against any establishment within the Church. But when all this has been said, the fact still remains that the tendency on the part of the subordinate Churches to achieve a greater autonomy is legitimate and must not be suspected a priori as a schismatic tendency, because without a certain gentle force this aim is impossible of achievement.

Pluralism in Theology

A second phenomenon in the contemporary Church must likewise not be suspected a priori of being a schismatic or even heretical tendency. This is a growing pluralism in theology.[3] We cannot at this point set forth the reasons for this increasing pluralism in terms of the history of ideas or the history of the Church. But the time when one and the same scholastic philosophy and theology prevailed throughout the Church has passed. It is clear that several different theologies have emerged within the one Church and within her one binding creed, and that these differ from one another according to their respective intellectual backgrounds, the linguistic and philosophical presuppositions on which they are based, the concrete situation in terms of ideas to which any given theology of this kind is addressed and to which it must respond. Of course to say that there is a pluralism of theologies of this kind is not to assert that they have not all in common emerged in order to contribute to the understanding, the interpretation and the proclaiming of the one Christian creed. Nor is it to assert that these theologies should cut themselves off from this one and abiding Christian creed as it is proclaimed by the Church's authorities, the bishops and the Pope.

[3] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Pluralism in Theology and the Unity of the Creed in the Church', Theological Investigations, XI (London, 1973), pp. 3-23.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But surely this does mean that the theologies which have been developed today on the basis of various intellectual presuppositions and aims cannot simply be reduced to one and the same theology in any one higher synthesis worked out as a complete and positive system at the level of abstract speculation, however much we may have to strive for this as an ever asymptotic goal. Each of these theologies has its own special aspects, presentations of subject-matter, terminology, historical situations etc., on which they lay special emphasis at particular points, and this means that in certain respects they are irreducibly alien and unassimilable one to another.

[109] Indeed it may perfectly well be the case that in specific questions the underlying agreement between these different theologies in the one area designated by the creed can never be defined at all in any positive or adequate terms by any process of speculation on the part of the particular theologies, or by recourse to an overall authority. Instead it may well be the case that we have to be satisfied with trusting to the fact that each of the individual theologies unequivocally gives its allegiance to the one creed for all the variations of theological language between them, and that each of them adheres in a spirit of obedience to this one creed. For it is obvious that these theologies still have a duty to adhere to the creed even when the creed itself is in its turn partly determined in its very formulation by the language of one specific and historically conditioned theology. A pluralism among the theologies of this kind, even though it does not exclude, but rather constantly demands, a dialogue between them is something that we have to take into account today, and learn freely to live with as an unavoidable fact. This means that any one of these various theologies must refrain from over-hastily concluding that it can discern heretical or schismatic tendencies in the others. Of course this is not to say that a theologian no longer has the right of appealing to the teaching office of the Church to which the true and ultimate judgement belongs in expressing his opinion that a specific theological proposition put forward by some other theologian is no longer reconcilable with the creed of the Church, even though in principle this other theologian continues to submit to the teaching office. But in view of the pluralism among the theologies of today, which can no longer be avoided, any theologian has to be extremely prudent and cautious before expressing such an opinion.

Again, so far as the teaching office of the Church herself is concerned, with its task of watching over the unity of the creed and the purity of the faith, it finds itself, as a result of this insuperable pluralism among the theologies, confronted with fresh tasks in the way of working out procedures which will do equal justice alike to the task of the teaching office itself and to the contemporary situation of an abiding pluralism in theology. Concerning these fresh tasks with which the teaching office is faced we cannot enlarge any further at this point. On any showing, however, it remains a fact that a pluralism in theology has of itself nothing to do with schismatic and heretical tendencies, provided that the theologies concerned constantly and consciously submit themselves to the one creed of the Church, and are willing to make ever-renewed efforts to listen to one another’s message.

[110]

The formation of Groups within the Church

One of the points that is spoken of today is the necessity of achieving a process of democratization in the Church. Here we are abstracting from the question of whether any such concept as ‘democracy’, belonging as it does to the realm of secular society, is suitable to any extent to be incorporated into the terminology of the Church and her ecclesiology and the discussion of her interior problems. Nor can we treat of the problem of democracy in the Church at this point as a problem in itself. The question we are raising is simply what this problem has to do with that with which we are properly concerned. Moreover, however the nature of a democracy and the methods, limitations and needs of democratic life and the procedures of a democratic society should be defined, it is clear on any showing that in the broader social groups, and so too in the Church, democracy is inconceivable without the formation of informal and even formal groups too within the Church which emerge from below and are not formed as executive organs of the official leaders within the Church. Again these groups do not find their justification only at that point at which, and in virtue of the fact that they enjoy explicit approval from above. They do not have to be the upholders of a policy which is either intended (with the necessary provisos and in legitimate ways) to become general throughout the Church and to establish itself even in her institutions, or alternatively is at least intended as a struggle to achieve some recognized, albeit particular, place in the Church's life.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In order that there may be democratic procedures within the Church (to the extent that it is possible and reasonable for there to be such even in her, and that certain forms of democracy are allowed for) such groups are indispensable. Moreover such groups have always existed in the Church even though the key term 'democracy' has not been applied to them. In earlier times groups of this kind were generally informal and tended rather to bear the character of charismatic movements, at least at the beginning, inasmuch as they were not represented by religious orders or even by secular institutes. To this extent the difference between earlier times and the present day is to be found rather in the fact that on the one hand such groups are appearing more clearly than was the case as formal groups, and on the other that they regard their efforts as falling under the heading of a process of democratization or of collegiality within the Church.

It is self-evident that with a programme which they seek to carry out in one or other of the ways that have been mentioned such groups all too [111] easily incur the suspicion of being schismatic in tendency. They are in fact groups which clearly stand apart from the corpus ecclesiae considered as a totality and from the official institutions in the Church, and uphold a specific attitude and specific aims which do not ipso facto and from the outset enjoy the positive approval of the official authorities in the Church. If such groups sought to give their aims a concrete social embodiment in the sphere of religion without any regard to the Church as one and whole, and without any attempt to adapt themselves to her order, or in persistent and unequivocal defiance of the Church's official authority and the unity of this as represented in the Pope they would be de facto schismatic, though this is not to contest the fact that it is often not easy to decide in the concrete whether such a group is really schismatic in the sense defined. But the important point in this connection is the one which we have already briefly laid down, namely that the formation of a formal group of this kind from below – in other words independently of any prior authorization on the part of the official authorities is in principle perfectly legitimate, and must not be suspected from the outset of being schismatic in tendency merely on the grounds that it has not been formed by the official authority, or that its aims are not a priori brought into positive conformity with those of the official authority. In order to justify this statement reference must not simply be made to the rights of the individual to freedom, to the right and duty of every Christian actively to co-operate in the life of the Church, to the necessity for public opinion to be expressed in the Church, or to similar fundamental considerations. Nor must the proof from tradition be adduced by appealing to the fact that there always have been such groups in the Church, even though they have appeared under different labels and often with a less social formulation. In order to justify the position we have adopted reference must be made to one point alone: if there necessarily is a charismatic element in the Church, if a charismatic dynamism cannot and should not be achieved by the official institutions in the Church totally and of themselves, and if, furthermore, in the very nature of man himself and of society it is quite impossible for the charismatic element to exist or to function efficiently without any kind of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

concrete social embodiment, then 'spontaneous groupings' from below of the kind we are speaking of are in principle perfectly legitimate even if, under certain circumstances, the form in which they arise may be startling and uncomfortable to the Church's officials.

Side by side with the official institutions, therefore, and independently of them, there should also be those through whom a certain formation of will should be manifested, canonized and made effective in the contemporary [112] scene from the grass roots upwards, as for instance in councils of priests, pastoral councils etc. Just as in the secular sphere, side by side with the parliaments, despite them and at the same time for them, there are parties, and in a more complex society it is quite inevitable that there should be such if a parliament is to be set up which is really capable of its work and genuinely democratic, so too in the supremely complex society of the Church such 'spontaneous groups' formed from below, and having a certain similarity to political parties, are perfectly legitimate and necessary. Hence they should not from the outset be suspected of being schismatic in tendency.

A schismatic tendency would only be present in cases in which a group of this kind, without regard to the wellbeing of the Church as a whole, sought to uphold merely its own special interest, if it employed unfair or unChristian means in order to make its will effective, if it worked against the official authorities in the Church as a special group and with the threat of schism, if it conducted itself in such a way as no longer to make it apparent that it was sustained by that eschatological hope against all hope which to earthly man must appear as folly, but rather sought to achieve its aims by human cunning and human force alone. We in the Church of today have to accustom ourselves still more than in former ages to such 'spontaneous groups' arising from the grass roots, and we must learn to accord due scope to such groups in a spirit of fairness and brotherly openness. We have still to find, and still to discover again and again the happy medium between a revolutionary sectarianism which all too easily asserts itself in such groups, and that attitude of mere pious devotion towards the Church's officials in which we do not have the courage to hold our own opinions and to bring influence to bear at the social level.

Incomplete Identification

The problem of schism, or alternatively merely of the presumption of schism, must be approached from yet another angle. The phenomenon we have in mind here is the fact that many individual Catholics identify themselves only partially with their Church. The phenomenon in question is extremely complex and exists in very many forms, which are also essentially different from one another. To speak quite simply what we mean is that a Catholic remains in contact with his Church in his life, continues to 'practise' (at least in a certain, although it may be a very restricted sphere of that life) but in any case never thinks of separating himself from [113] the Church at the manifest and social level, yet at the same time retains certain notable reservations in his attitude towards his Church. Such reservations may be of the most varied kind. They may be such as are positively recognized as perfectly legitimate by the official institutions of the Church in their understanding of her essential doctrine, and hence too do not properly speaking affect the theological attitude of the Catholic involved towards his Church even though he has these reservations. For instance the individual has a perfect right to hold the opinion that this Pope is not a saint or not a skilful and wise ruler. He has a perfect right to consider many of the man-made laws of the Church as deficient in wisdom, as antiquated, or even as unjust and inhuman. In themselves such reservations do not affect the theological attitude of the Catholic concerned towards the Church. In fact, however, many Catholics of the present day do have reservations, and very far-reaching reservations at that, affecting the very substance of the Catholic faith and the nature of the Church herself, calling them in question or unequivocally rejecting them in themselves without the Catholic concerned feeling compelled on that account to separate himself from the Church even though he does not stand apart from it in this way, and in such cases his reasons for not separating himself from the Church, for continuing partially to identify himself with the Church, can in their turn be very varied, ranging from a bourgeois conformity to convention to motivations of a genuinely religious kind.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now with regard to this incomplete identification with the Church as it bears upon our present theme we shall only be putting forward a few observations which in no sense constitute an exhaustive treatment of this subject of merely partial identification. An initial point to be laid down: reservations of the second kind which we have mentioned above do in themselves amount to a state of objective heresy, and thereby of a partial apostasy from the faith of the Church, and so too of an interior schism even when this is not made manifest at the social level. But so far as the concrete instances of such an attitude are concerned we will have to be cautious in arriving at such a judgement, in which we actually conclude that the cases concerned do amount to heresy and schism. Very often, or even in the majority of cases, a reservation of this kind which seems to be heretical does not entail any subjective guilt. This means that in judging of the individual who makes these reservations we should have to apply all those principles with regard to membership of the Church which apply to merely material heresy and the heretic at the merely material level, and that too even in the sort of case in which a heresy of this kind is far from being manifested at the level of public and social life, and in which he who [114] makes the reservations is not for one moment deliberately separating himself from the Church and her life. In such cases a situation that has really arisen in the concrete is simply one which has constantly arisen and constantly will arise everywhere in the Church in innumerable instances, a situation namely in which some individual at once wills to adhere to the Church and so to attain to salvation, maintaining a fides implicita in the full and orthodox faith of the Church, yet at the same time upholds opinions which objectively speaking are in contradiction to the faith of the Church. If therefore we assume bona fides to be present in such a reservation, and if this reservation is not manifested in the public and social life of the Church (for instance through the heretical preaching of an individual priest in the public services of the Church) then he who makes a reservation of this kind, despite the fact that he is in a state of only incomplete identification with the Church (at the level of conscious awareness) is, nevertheless a good Christian and Catholic. There would be no need to cause him any special ‘disquiet’, especially as after all there are precisely many cases in which psychologically speaking it is in practice often impossible within the limited time available to arrive at any positive synthesis and reconciliation between the statements of the Church’s faith on the one hand (which are not always easy for every individual to understand) and the opinions and attitudes of the Catholic involved on the other, which are in themselves justified. Here too we find ourselves faced with that phenomenon which can only very unsatisfactorily be characterized by the traditional term ‘schism’.

A further possibility is that the reservation which seems to be heretical does not truly represent a judgement on the part of the Christian who holds himself apart in this way, but is merely an expression, to some extent primitive and not fully worked out, of the fact that the Catholic concerned has failed to achieve any positive harmonization of the proposition of faith which has been called in question with the remaining tenets which he holds according to his own individual lights. In a case of this kind it is even less possible to say that schism and heresy are present in any objective sense. Of course for all that we have said we are not denying that the official authorities in the Church have the right and duty to guard the unity of the creed and the full purity of the Christian faith, and to conclude that heresy and schism are present in those cases in which an attitude of unequivocal separation from the Church’s doctrine is made manifest at the social level. It is clear that in such a case he who really makes reservations of this kind can no longer be tolerated as a teacher and director in the Church at the public level. Now between these two extremes constituted [115] by the first-named kind of reservations and the second kind many intermediate attitudes of reservation, and so too of partial identification of this sort are to be found, which vary in their nature and are difficult to analyse. They may entail dangers of schism or heresy while still not as such having to be qualified as ipso facto being schismatic or heretical in themselves. Not every theological opinion which is not already positively declared to be legitimate or admissible by the Church, yet which does run counter to some currently received opinion on the part of her teachers, ipso facto constitutes a heretical reservation contrary to the teaching of the Church. Not every individual act of disobedience against the man-made juridical dispositions of the Church implies a partial non-identification with the Church of such a kind that we would be compelled to judge it as schismatic, or would be forced to regard it as entailing a real danger of a schism. Indeed certain forms of partial non-identification with the Church in the concrete are recognized in her doctrinal tradition, and these have a positive function to perform. What we are referring to here are 'customs contrary to the law' which can be legitimate and concerning which it cannot genuinely be maintained in every case that they owe their origins to an initially immoral transgression of the law. A partial non-identification with the Church in one respect can therefore in some other respect perfectly well constitute an identification with her Spirit, with other concrete realities in her, and with her future.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

All these considerations serve to bring out situations and problems which cannot be coped with by means of formal rules alone. There are many cases in which it cannot be established solely on the basis of the Church's doctrine whether they are heretical or schismatic or non-heretical and non-schismatic in character. There are conflicts between directives on the part of the Church's authorities and the resistance that is offered to them, which cannot be definitively ruled out even by the application of the principles of formal justice, since even juridical authority on the one hand and the obedience due to it on the other are not simply or exclusively the principle which dominates all else in the Church, but merely constitute a partial principle, the precise force of which in a specific case can perfectly well be an open question which cannot in its turn be decided unequivocally by this authority itself. In other words there are cases of conflict in the Church which cannot be solved simply by the rational application of theoretical and general principles to one individual case, but which can only be solved by the practical reason, i.e. in concreto by patience, modesty on both sides, efforts to overcome that intolerance which is to be found among both conservative and progressive Christians, humility and charity [116] which are capable even of surrendering a right, faith and hope which are able to overcome in weakness by keeping their gaze fixed upon the Cross of Christ.

Is it really so very surprising that there should be a situation of conflict of this kind in the Church? After all according to our Christian convictions the abiding nature and the power of the Church ultimately derive not from the univocal significance of propositions of faith formulated by human minds or from inflexible juridical rules (however true it may be that both have their necessity and their justification) but from the power of the Spirit who makes use of many human means and does not totally identify himself with any one of them. If we really believe this then we shall no longer be so very surprised at the fact that for many of the conflicts in the Church there are no smooth ready-made solutions. Admittedly in a conflict of this kind each individual, whichever side he is on, must (in a 'discerning of spirits') put to himself the critical question of whether his own attitude in the conflict really leaves sufficient room for the sway of the Spirit or is after all, in the last analysis merely governed by self-will. Often it is in fact impossible to solve such conflicts by the application of formal principles or merely at the level of rational argument. But often too it can plainly be recognized which side

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation has more faith, hope, and dedicated love, humility and readiness for genuine metanoia in a spirit of self-criticism. Given this discerning of spirits we can after all arrive at a decision as to which 'party' in a conflict we should support. Even in a case such as this God is not simply and exclusively on the side of one party alone, but brings his own work to fruition according to his own good will by means of all the parties to the conflict. Our task, however, is not to seek to be God, but rather to seek out our own decision and our place in such conflicts in whatever direction a Christian discernment of spirits guides us.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[117]

7

HERESIES IN THE CHURCH TODAY?

What we shall be attempting here is to state certain points of fundamental importance with regard to 'heresies in the Church'.[1] The theme has certainly become vitally relevant since the Council. The Christian in the Catholic Church who grew up in the preconciliar age and felt himself at home in this pre-conciliar Church not infrequently has the impression that the old faith is wavering, and that today even in the very pulpit itself doctrines and opinions are put forward which are claimed to have validity in the Church, yet which such a Catholic feels to be in contradiction to his own faith, to constitute heresy. He hears that in Holland an Adult Catechism has been published with the approval of the united Dutch episcopate which is at the same time denounced by other Dutch Catholics to the Pope at Rome on the grounds that side by side with much that is good it contains heresies or doctrines suspected of heresy. Again such a Catholic hears of the Doctrinal Letter of the German Bishops,[2] in which those entrusted with the task of preaching are warned [118] against false doctrines, attitudes at variance with the Church, wrong interpretations of the gospel, of the Resurrection of Christ, of the Eucharist etc. Such a Catholic has experience of apostasy on the part of priests who give up their priestly calling not merely because the duty of celibacy seems unbearable to them,[3] but also by reason of an interior apostasy from their very faith. And such a Catholic then feels oppressed by the further question of whether other priests too, even though for various reasons they still continue at their posts, may not fall away in their faith in a similar manner. In questions affecting his own moral life, especially with regard to married ethics,[4] such a Catholic hears of differences of opinion among moral theologians and confessors, and

---

[1] On the basic problems involved cf. also J. O. Sanders, Heresies Ancient and Modern (London, 1948); K. Rahner, Gefahren im heutigen Katholizismus (Einsiedeln, 1950); W. Philipp, 'Irrlehre', RGG III (3rd ed., 1959) 898-901; J. Trütsch, 'Glaubensabfall', LTK IV (2nd ed., 1960), 931-934; J. Brosch, 'Häresie', LTK V (2nd ed., 1960), 6-8; K. Rahner, 'Häresiengeschichte', ibid., 8-1l; idem, 'On Conversions in the Church', Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 373-384; idem, 'Some Remarks on the Question of Conversions', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 315-335; idem, 'What is Heresy?', ibid., pp. 468-512; A. Böhm, Häresien der Zeit (Freiburg, 1961); U. Ranke-Heinemann, 'Die Kirche und die christlichen Konfessionen', Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/2 (Freiburg, 1966), esp. pp. 84-87.

The chapter which follows is a very much abbreviated version, and an excerpt from a larger treatise entitled 'Häresien in der Kirche heute?' which the author prepared for publication in the series, 'Quaestiones Disputatae' (Verlag Herder, Freiburg). For a more detailed exposition of the arguments presented here the author may refer to this projected study.

[2] Schreiben der deutschen Bischöfe an alle, die von der Kirche mit der Glaubensverkündigung beauftragt sind (Treves, 2nd ed., 1968). In this connection cf. also the encyclical of Paul VI, 'Mysterium Fidei', AAS 57 (1965), pp. 753-774 and also the Letter of Cardinal Ottaviani to the Universal Episcopate, AAS 58 (1966), pp. 659-661 and on the latter, K. Rahner, 'Theology and the Church's Teaching Authority After the Council', Theological Investigations IX (London and New York, 1972), pp. 83-100.

[3] On this cf. F. Wullf et al., 'The Discussion on Celibacy, France, Germany and the Netherlands', Concilium 3/5 (Pastoral), 1969, pp. 86-90.

[4] In this connection the practice in mixed marriages and the question of birth-control occupy a central place in the discussion. On this cf. J. M. Reuss, 'Eheliche Hingabe und Zeugung', T.Q. 143 (1963), pp. 454-476; T. Roberts, Empfängnisverhütung in der christlichen Ehe (Mainz, 1966); F. Böckle, Das Problem der bekenntnisverschiedenen Ehen in theologischer Sicht (Freiburg, 1967); further, E. McDonagh, 'The Moral Theology of Marriage: Recent Literature in English', Concilium 1 (Moral Theology, 1965), pp. 70-82; J. David, Neue Aspekte der kircklichen Ehelehre (Bergen-Enkheim, 2nd ed. 1966); B. Häring, Moralverkündigung nach dem Konzil (Bergen-Enkheim, 1966), and also K. Rahner, 'On the Encyclical "Humanae Vitae"', Theological Investigations XI (London, 1973), pp. 263-287.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

indeed among bishops, even concerning doctrines which as recently as a decade ago seemed to him to be put forward by the Church's official teachers as uncompromising and beyond all doubt. In short such a Catholic asks himself whether today doctrines are not emerging unchallenged, and even being put forward within the Church herself, which, measured by the teaching traditionally upheld up to the present, would simply have to be rejected as heresies, as errors against the faith.

I

The question we are raising here is not concerned simply with heresies in the full sense. The fact is that individuals come forward in the Church proclaiming an opinion or upholding a doctrine which is then declared [119] irreconcilable with the Christian and Catholic faith by the Church's official teachers, with the result that the upholders of any such doctrine must either submit to the pronouncement of the Church in the obedience of faith or alternatively depart from the Church in a way that is manifest even at the level of her social and public life. But this is something which has always happened again and again in the course of the Church's history, and it is not this that constitutes the subject of our considerations. What we are treating of, rather, is the phenomenon that Catholic Christians uphold opinions of this sort in the Church, deviating from the Church's faith in a way that is in some degree manifest and public in her social life without on that account then departing from the Church. Indeed their way of upholding such opinions may actually be such that the ecclesiastical authorities, with the doctrinal authority vested in them, may not even take proceedings against them in a sufficiently clear manner. In speaking of heresies within the Church in this way we are of course not referring to variations of opinion on theological questions such as there have always been in the Church, without prejudice to her one faith and her one creed. Admittedly we are also aware of the fact that it is not always easy to establish the line of demarcation between such variations of opinion in theology on the one hand, freely existing side by side with one another, and heresies which are hostile to the faith on the other. In other words it is not always easy to say whether a given opinion really does constitute a heresy, and radically calls for the intervention of the Church's magisterium.

Nor do we intend here to investigate the question of the extent to which anything which has to be called heresy within the Church really is present in the Catholic Church of today, and if so how great or how small the threat that this represents for her is. All that we are assuming is that the threat is present in some degree, and that it is such that a consideration of this phenomenon does not merely constitute the heart-searchings of a reactionary Catholic who is the prey of anxious nightmares. The fact that this phenomenon is present in some measure, at least as a genuine danger, is in fact apparent from the Doctrinal Letter of the German Bishops mentioned above, and also from the warning words of the Pope. In other words it has been pointed to by individuals in the Church who certainly are not struggling against mere nightmares. What we intend, rather, is, without adopting any more precise or in some sense statistical position with regard to the phenomenon of heresies in the Church of today, first and foremost to enquire what the reasons are for this state of affairs, which is, in a certain sense at least, a new manifestation. These reasons are certainly complex and together constitute a unity, and it is only by taking [120] them together as a unity that we can to some extent explain this phenomenon. Catholics who are over-anxious and conservative in a sense that is not altogether above suspicion have already laid the blame for this manifestation at the door of the Council itself.[5] This is of course mistaken. First the Council has never in any sense cast doubt upon, or even merely obscured, any of the real doctrines of faith hitherto upheld by the Church. Perhaps, however, it is possible to say that the Council has in some respects acted as a sort of catalyst through which the true origins of this phenomenon have been set in motion and have brought these heresies within the Church to the surface at the level of the Church's public life as well – heresies which were already present previously, albeit in radice, and only in a latent form. For the Council realistically and boldly faced up to the intellectual and social situation in which the Church has to live today, and this situation, in which all of us as individuals and so the Church too have to live, is the real cause of this phenomenon.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Faith recognizes its own nature in relation to a great number of sciences, intellectual disciplines and branches of the natural and sociological sciences which have become autonomous and which show the widest possible variations. And in the questions they raise, the conclusions they arrive at, and the aims for which they strive all these have an ideological relevance.[6] Faith as it exists today lives in a world which is intellectually and sociologically speaking pluralist in character. Every believer comes continually into contact with men who have different philosophies of life, amounting in extreme cases to a dedicated and militant atheism. Even on the most basic questions of human existence there is today no one homogeneous public opinion in which the conviction of the individual could find support in virtue of their self-evident truth and universal acceptance. The world has become one in such a way that the individual has been brought to close quarters with cultures which were formerly very remote, and has become [121] familiar with their interpretations of existence and modes of living. The world which was once static has become dynamic. The changes it undergoes, planned and carried through by man himself, are becoming ever swifter, and in this world which is the creation of man himself, or seems to be so, it is not so easy to discover God. In a world of this sort it is obvious that faith is much more threatened and assailed in the individual than in an earlier static or homogeneous society, the ethos of which first bore the stamp of Christianity and in which any view that deviated from the publicly accepted and homogeneous Christian opinion immediately met with resistance from society itself.

Now in a situation of this kind, in which faith is threatened, it is obvious that more inroads will be made into the faith of the individual, and even more inculpable breakdowns of faith at this level, than in an earlier age. A further point is that in a new situation of this kind the ancient faith, precisely in order to remain the ancient one, must learn to interpret itself afresh. It must surrender old patterns of interpretation which are not identical with itself, and seek for new ones. It must express itself in new forms in order to make itself understood in the contemporary scene, and manage to make contact with findings arrived at in other branches of human knowledge and human life in such a way that it does not cause the tension inherent in the very nature of faith in relation to the rest of human experience to become too great for the individual to sustain. The root causes of the phenomenon we are considering as indicated above are still, however, insufficient of themselves, for the only effect it could produce, and in fact to a considerable extent does produce, is that those who find themselves opposed in

[5] In this connection we should notice the criticisms which the French episcopate put forward on the 27th June 1966 with regard to various articles in the periodicals, Itinéraires, Défense de Foi, Lumière and Le Monde et la Vie. Cf. also in the German-speaking sphere, Nunc et Semper. Eine katholische Korrespondenz für Kirche und Papstum 1 (1966) and ff.

[6] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'A small Question Concerning the Contemporary Pluralism in the Intellectual Situation of Catholics and the Church', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 21-30; idem, 'Reflections on Dialogue Within a Pluralistic Society', ibid., pp. 31-42; idem, 'Reflections on the Contemporary Intellectual Formation of Future Priests', ibid., pp. 113-138; idem, Theologische Deutung der Gegenwartssituation als Situation der Kirche', Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1 (1966), pp. 233-256.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

their convictions to the faith as it has existed hitherto either cease to be members of the Church even in the external sense, or alternatively become so remote from the Church at least in virtue of ceasing to take any active part in Church life or any interest in the Church's doctrine that it is hardly possible to speak of any heresy within the Church at all. There must be some further cause besides the one which we have mentioned, and in fact there is such a cause.

Modern man is, from a certain point of view, man in a strange state of transition.[7] One of the dominant characteristics of him is a kind of [122] individualism which has arisen in recent times such that it is only with the greatest difficulty that he can reconcile himself to any authority imposed upon him from without so far as his understanding of existence and his mode of living is concerned. Now certainly among the elements that go to make up this modern form of individualism there is one which we must want to endure, and that too precisely as Christians: the right to freedom of conscience and of personal decisions, which must neither be directed nor replaced by any external compulsion from the society in which we live. At the same time, however, it seems to me that contemporary man, characterized as he is by this modern form of individualism, is also in a strange way already one who belongs to a future era. Man as we envisage him here is aware of the fact that any absolute individualism is not only unrealistic and futile, but also, so far as knowledge is concerned, leads to what is merely arbitrary and capricious. He already feels, albeit not in any very explicit way, that truth itself is somehow bound up with society and institution. Unlike the man of the age of upper-class individualism, he is no longer assured of the fact that one can discover one's religion for oneself according to one's own opinions and inclinations. There is a certain scepticism in his attitude which he directs against himself, and which makes it less easy for him to regard his own philosophy of life as the only true one.

Now a man of this kind, standing as he does at the point of transition between a modern form of individualism and a new experience of the importance of the collective discovery of truth (to express it vaguely) is thereby exposed to the temptation of opposing his own views, drawn from his own personal philosophy of life, to the collective awareness of faith upheld by the Church as a whole, and yet even while doing this of continuing to claim his place in this community, constituted though it is by a body of religious convictions which cannot hastily be worked out afresh. He wills to be a heretic within the Church. He wills to remain within her in order to avoid simply degenerating into scepticism and relativism, yet without unreservedly submitting to the claims which his community makes to be in possession of a collective truth, and he does this in the hopeful conviction, which he strives ever afresh to realize, that it is possible to achieve harmony between his own individual sense of truth and the convictions upheld by the believing community.[8]

[123] In addition to this there is a further fact which, though correct in itself, has the opposite effect to what might be expected in its bearing on the case we are considering. The Council itself has recognized that in the totality of the Christian and Catholic faith there is a hierarchy of truths,[9] in other words that even though the binding force of all the doctrines of the Church (which really are such) is formally speaking the same, nevertheless there are

[7] For a description of modern man's social situation cf. H. Freyer, Das soziale Ganze and die Freiheit der Einzelnen unter den Bedingungen des industriellen Zeitalters (Göttingen, 1957); K. Mácha, Individuum und Gesellschaft (Berlin, 1964); R. Linder, Grundlegung einer Theologie der Gesellschaft (Hamburg, 1960); K. Rahner and N. Greinacher, 'Grundzüge der Gegenwartssituation', Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1 (1966), pp. 188 ff. (A further bibliography is to be found here, cf. pp. 178 ff.).

[8] On this cf. also K. Rahner, 'On the Theology of Hope', Theological Investigations X (London and New York, 1972), pp. 242-259; idem, 'A Small Fragment "On the Collective Finding of Truth"', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), pp. 82-88.

[9] Decree on Ecumenism, No. 11.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

extraordinarily wide differences between the individual doctrines in respect of their importance and the weight they carry as applied to objective situations and particular concrete circumstances. Not all the statements of the Catholic faith are equally important or central. Hence it is all too easy for an individual caught up in this state of transition to arrive at the opinion that he can preserve those truths of the Christian faith and those fundamental practices of Christian life which really are most central, in other words belief in God, prayer and hope of eternal life, and thereby remain in the Church and hold firm to the practices of Christian living, and nevertheless, with regard to the less central teachings of the faith, form his own opinion in contradiction to the official teaching of the Church.

In addition to all these other causes there is finally one further cause for the phenomenon we are considering. There are many questions which are matters of dispute in theology.[10] As the German bishops have explicitly recognized, there are de facto propositions which, though not defined, have nevertheless been authoritatively taught in the Church up to now, which have turned out to be either erroneous or at least susceptible of legitimate doubt. This applies not merely, for instance, to the sphere of biblical studies, but also to the sphere of morality in questions which have a wholly practical significance for the life of the individual Christian.[11] [124] Finally it is not always easy to draw any exact line of demarcation between that which constitutes the true doctrine of the Church, which is irreformable, and those opinions and interpretations which are open to discussion, but which have hitherto to some extent been amalgamated with this essential doctrine without sufficient conscious discrimination. In the light of this it is, once more, understandable that a Christian who legitimately rejects views which have hitherto been current in the Church may without noticing it, and indeed even while intending to achieve a new and better understanding of the Church's doctrine, overstep the limits and contest or throw doubt upon doctrines which have an absolute dogmatic binding force as well, without thereby either entertaining or enunciating any intention of separating himself from this fellowship of the believing Church.

II

We shall now attempt to formulate certain rules for a right understanding and a right attitude towards the phenomenon with which we are concerned.

1. There is both a legitimate and an illegitimate way of distinguishing between the individual and the collective conviction of faith. Not every distinction between the conviction of faith entertained by the individual and that of the Church is legitimate, for otherwise there would in fact be no heresies in the Church such as are obviously to be rejected. Conversely, however, not every distinction is illegitimate. If we were to overlook the fact that there both

[10] On this cf. n. 4, and further the discussions concerning the relationship between nature and grace, between the Pope and the College of Bishops, and also concerning questions bearing upon Jesus' awareness of himself, the relationship between scripture and tradition, the Virgin birth, the precise nature of transubstantiation, original sin etc. In these respects, however, our situation is not essentially different from that of earlier ages in which the Church likewise had to endure sharp differences of opinion (Thomists, Scotists, Suarezians, Augustinians) and had to bridge the gulf between them (Bánez-Molina, the Contritionists-Attritionists).

[11] As an example from an earlier age we might mention the following: Innocent VIII on the question of the burning of witches, Gregory XVI on the question of the press and freedom of conscience (DS 2730), Pius IX in The Syllabus of Errors (DS, 2977-2980). In this connection cf. R. Aubert, 'Religious Liberty from "Mirari Vos" to the "Syllabus"', Concilium 1 (1965, Church History), pp. 49-57; H. J. Zwetsloot, 'Witch-Hunting', Sacramentum Mundi 3 (London and New York, 1968), pp. 143-145. On the question of usury, J. T. Noonan, 'Die Autoritätsbeweise in Fragen des Wüchers und der Empfängnisverhütung', Diakonia 1 (1966), pp. 79-106; idem, The Scholastic Analysis of Usury (Cambridge, 1957); idem, Contraception. A History of Its Treatment by the Catholic Theologians and Canonists (Cambridge, 1965).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

can be and is a legitimate way of distinguishing between the individual and the collective conviction of faith, we would not merely be overlooking the situations which de facto exist, but also failing to adopt a right attitude to that element of concern inherent in the heresies within the Church which is justified.[12]

[125] The truth which this is intended to express is this: there is an illegitimate way of distinguishing; it is found in the heresies in the Church which arise in connection with some truth of the faith in the strict sense, for which the official teaching authority of the Church claims an absolute assent of faith through a definition of the Pope of the Council, or else through the ordinary channels by which doctrine is promulgated. Such heresies arise when a Catholic unequivocally denies, or of his own free decision casts doubt upon truths of the faith of this kind (though obviously the difficulties which we may feel with regard to some doctrine of the faith promulgated by the Church do not of themselves entail any such doubt or denial), and arise above all in those cases in which this denial or voluntary questioning of a truth of faith also becomes a factor in the public life of the Church. When he does deny a truth of the faith in the strict sense in this way, or at least when his denial becomes a factor in the public life of the Church, a Catholic separates himself from the Church even though juridically speaking, and so far as external Church membership is concerned he still continues to belong to her. For instance he may continue to pay the Church dues or attend Church on Sundays or send his children for religious instruction. Even so he is separated from the Church, and that too even though the Church's officials may not have laid down that he is separated from her by a distinct and specific juridical enactment. Such a Catholic is separated from the Church because the Church is a spiritual community united by all her members holding the same faith, and not merely an external juridical organization. Now a Christian of this sort separates himself from this one unified community of the faith as a matter of his own personal decision by rejecting a doctrine which this community adheres to with an absolute assent of faith, and in virtue of the fact that by his denial of such a specific truth he is also rejecting, at least by implication, the doctrine of the infallibility of the Church's faith in the strict sense and of her teaching authority. Of course in defining the general principles according to which heresy is judged to involve separation from the Church we have still not decided the practical question in the individual case of where in the concrete such heresy is to be found. For manifestly a [126] denial of a doctrine of the Church only constitutes a heresy that separates the individual concerned from the Church in the sense we have defined when it is posited with sufficient freedom and responsibility, when this denial really signifies a grave fault in God's sight, when the denial is really directed against a doctrine of the Church and not merely against some misinterpretation of such a doctrine.[13] Very often we are far from being able to establish all these conditions exactly in the individual case. Besides this a distinction which we shall not be entering into any more fully at this point should be drawn between heresy which is merely objective and that which is subjective too according to whether in the particular case supposed the denial of some defined doctrine of the Church is culpable or inculpable.

---

[12] On the distinction between the individual and the collective awareness of faith cf. M. Löhrer, 'Überlegungen zur Interpretation lehramtlicher Aussagen als Frage des ökumenischen Gesprächs', Gott in Welt II (Festschrift für K. Rahner) edited by J. B. Metz, W. Kern et al. (Freiburg, 1964), pp. 499-523; K. Rahner, Bemerkungen zum Begriff der Offenbarung, Quaestiones Disputatae 25 (Freiburg, 1965), pp. 11-24, esp. pp. 11/12 (with reference to Modernism); idem, 'Theoretische und reale Moral in ihrer Diiferenz', Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1 (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 152-163; idem, 'Questions of Controversial Theology on Justification', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 189-218; idem, 'Theology and the Church's Teaching Authority After the Council', Theological Investigations IX (London and New York, 1972), pp. 83-100.

[13] On the concept of heresy cf. K. Rahner, 'What is Heresy?', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 468-512; J. Brosch, 'Häresie', LTK V (2nd ed., 1960), 6-8; H. Flatten, Der Häresieverdacht im CIC (Amsterdam 1963).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But there is also, as has already been stated, a perfectly legitimate distinction between the individual's own convictions of faith and that of the Church as a whole. Heresy in the true sense often emerges precisely through the failure to recognize this legitimate distinction and to be bold enough to apply it to one's own case, with the result that then, when difficulties arise in understanding the faith, we go beyond the prescribed limits, not knowing how to resolve our difficulties except by specifically denying some defined doctrine of the Church.

In what does this legitimate distinction consist? First and foremost it is clear that at the level of his own personal convictions of faith an individual Christian does not have to be in possession of all the doctrines of the Church's faith with complete clarity and in a fully explicitated and developed form as these doctrines are present in the convictions of faith of the Church as a whole. The catechism or concrete body of convictions present in the mind and heart of any one individual believer is in most cases much smaller and more modest than the printed catechism or the compilation of all the doctrinal decisions officially laid down by the Church. This is not merely de facto the case – something which no-one surely will deny – but it actually should be the case. Precisely today, when it is man's most ultimate decisions with regard to God, Jesus Christ, and the hope of eternal life that are in question, it is quite impossible, and moreover not for one moment to be supposed in the case of an average Christian, even one who is interested in religion and well instructed, that his personal commitment of faith will be equally alive and vigorous to every truth without exception. It is perfectly legitimate for him to concentrate [127] his personal will to achieve the truth on the most central questions of the Christian faith and the Christian way of life, in other words upon a living and prayerful relationship with God in his history, upon Jesus Christ, upon the task of bravely enduring his life and the demands it makes upon him, upon the hope of eternal life, and all this within the Church of Jesus Christ and in the fellowship of those who do believe in this way and celebrate the memory of their Lord. Provided he does have a conviction of faith of this sort, orientated towards the most central realities of the Christian message, the Christian of today can freely leave unexplored much else that belongs to the convictions of faith upheld by the Church as a whole. He must not deny it. He will maintain an openness in the convictions of his personal faith and the development of his own religious experience to this more ample fulness of the Christian faith in the Church as a whole. But he does not need to act as though he were obliged to maintain an equally intensive attitude in his own concrete personal circumstances towards everything which the Church proclaims as pertaining to the faith, and in doing so to overstrain the capacities of his personal religious life. With regard to the less central truths of the faith, for instance the position of Mary, the number and importance of the sacraments, and other matters, it is perfectly legitimate for him to say: 'I do not deny all this; in principle I fully acknowledge that all this pertains to a legitimate explicitation of the basic reality of Christian revelation as upheld in the universal convictions of the Church. But here and now in the concrete situation of my own religious life I cannot take any special interest in these matters. I leave all this more or less on one side. My personal conviction of faith is not simply a repetition of the total convictions of the Church, but merely a legitimate part of those convictions arrived at by a certain process of selection and individual arrangement'.

Once the Christian recognizes this legitimate distinction between his own individual convictions of faith and those of the Church as a whole, once this distinction is not merely de facto present but also boldly and freely invoked, then many difficulties are avoided in a perfectly reasonable and harmonious way which in other cases lead to heresies within the Church, because in these other cases the individual supposes that as a matter of his own personal conviction of faith he has always and in every case to achieve an explicit and conscious appropriation of any and every truth of faith in his own personal life. And this may be impossible in the here and now precisely in the individual's own case. A further point is that in the contemporary scene modern man has a lively awareness of the difference between accepting a given doctrine merely at the conceptual [128] level and making it his own at a genuinely personal level in such a way that the truth concerned really does achieve a genuine effectiveness and force in his own life. Now because of this the attempt to achieve a personal appropriation of this kind of a given doctrine of the Church, such that it becomes a force in the individual's own personal life, can easily lead to an over-straining of the will, and then this over-straining can lead precisely to the heresies in the Church of which we have been speaking. These are the difficulties which we would be able to avoid if we were clearly and freely to allow for the fact that there is a legitimate difference between the message which we hear or can hear in the official preaching of the faith and that in this message which we effectively appropriate in our own personal lives, without thereby denying the rest of the message.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The situation here is the same as in other departments of life. When we demand more of ourselves or believe that we have to demand more of ourselves than we are actually capable of we do not even manage to achieve that which really is within our capacities In other words with regard to many individual truths of the Church a Catholic of today, especially an educated one, can perfectly well say: 'I do not understand this or that point. It raises difficulties for me. I cannot cope with it at all. Any genuinely personal understanding of it is simply not given to me or accessible to me here and now. But on the other hand I do not deny it. I set it on one side. I have a perfectly genuine right as a human being to do this, and in principle it has nothing whatever to do with cowardice or dishonesty', because in other spheres of individual experience and the development of ideas in his personal life every individual is aware that the totality of objective truth, of the values and benefits for human life which a given culture, or even humanity itself, has to bestow is too great for the individual to be able positively to appropriate this totality for himself at the level of his own personal understanding.

2. The justifiable pluralism arising from the theological freedom within the Catholic Church must freely be accepted as a given fact.[14] In the last century Catholic theology bore a neo-Scholastic stamp and exhibited a [129] great uniformity, and if we abstract from relatively few exceptions, it was regarded as obvious that it was simply the predominant theology in the Catholic Church, even though in principle it had always been recognized that there should be various schools in theology. Now in the last few decades the situation has been very considerably changed, and this change has been accelerated by the Council. As a result of bolder confrontations with the modern sciences, with the problems and findings of exegesis, with Protestant theology, with all the questions which are raised by the contemporary climate of ideas, Catholic theology has become far more varied than we could have imagined a few years ago. Even in those cases in which we are willing to accord an unreserved respect to the defined doctrines of the Church there are, in contemporary theology very great variations of opinion even on important questions, very great differences between the perspectives in which the reality of the faith is viewed, between the philosophies and terminologies which theology employs in its attempt to master and express its subject-matter.

The increasing pluralism in Catholic theology which has come about in this way cannot be depicted at any greater length here. Nevertheless it has a very great significance for the [14] On the concept of freedom in the Church cf. K. Rahner, Das freie Wort in der Kirche (Einsiedeln, 2nd ed., 1954); idem, 'Freedom in the Church', Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 89-133; idem, 'Dialogue in the Church', Theological Investigations X (London and New York, 1973), pp. 103-123; idem, 'Do not Stifle the Spirit!', Theological Investigations VII (London and Baltimore, 1971), pp. 72-87; idem, Das Dynamische in der Kirche, Quaestiones Disputatae 5 (Freiburg, 3rd ed. 1965). With regard to the statements of the Council cf. the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, 'Lumen Gentium', No. 37 and the Decree on Ecumenism No. 4.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

question with which we are here concerned. It is in fact not always easy to distinguish between a body of doctrine which all hold in common and the various theologies which interpret it. Indeed any absolutely clear-cut division between the common stock of dogma on the one hand and its more detailed theological interpretations on the other is quite impossible, since every theological statement of a given dogma necessarily and of its very nature involves a certain element of interpretation[15] without thereby being absolutely identical with it, yet at the same time without being able to be set apart from it by any absolute process of separation either. This situation gives rise to a danger of heresies in the Church. It is necessary constantly to reinterpret dogma afresh, though of course this does not mean to alter that essential content of its message which has a permanent validity. In order to be assimilated to the living faith of believers a dogma must again and again be brought into confrontation with the totality of the overall intellectual climate in which man lives today taken as a whole, and this is changing ever more swiftly. But precisely this necessity inevitably produces a wealth of varied interpretations of the dogma in the contemporary situation [130] even in those cases in which what is aimed at is the one essential point which the dogma is intended to convey, and even in those cases in which these varied interpretations do not necessarily simply contradict one another, but merely exhibit a certain disparity and incommensurability among themselves.

Hence it can come about that even with the best intentions, the most whole-hearted willingness to be loyal to the faith, and genuine obedience' towards the Church's magisterium the interpretations of official doctrine put forward in theology are either irreconcilable with that doctrine as a matter of objective fact, even though their irreconcilability has not been realized, or, even when they are in conformity with that doctrine and indeed may be necessary for any genuine understanding of the faith in the contemporary situation, they are still wrongly rejected by other believers or theologians as irreconcilable with the Church's doctrine. Thus over and above the differences of opinion between the various schools which have always existed, in the pluralism of theologies as it exists today doctrines are put forward within the Church which either really are heretical or are unjustly suspected of being so. In this situation it is not always easy to distinguish between these real heresies and those which are merely presumed to be so. The task of distinguishing between real and merely presumptive heresies in these new interpretations of the ancient and abiding doctrine of the Church may require long and toilsome efforts on the part of theologians, the official teachers of the Church, and in the developing awareness of the Church's faith. For this task there is need of patience, self-criticism on the part of individual theologians and of theology in general, and on the part of the Church's official teachers generosity and patience on the one hand and vigilance on the other.

What takes place at the level of specialist theology clearly also exists at the level of the less consciously and methodologically worked out theological development of the convictions of faith of those Christians who are to some extent instructed and religiously awake. At this level too real and also merely presumptive heresies are to be found as personal interpretations of the Christian faith. All, Christians and theologians alike, must be aware of the fact that it is necessary to achieve a lively understanding of the faith in the context of an ever-renewed confrontation with the climate of ideas in general, that the danger of mistaken interpretations of the official doctrine cannot be avoided merely by monotonously handing down the traditional formulae of faith, and that therefore, in a pluralism of theologies which cannot be overcome[16] (and, it may be [131] said in passing, is already present in holy scripture itself)

[15] Cf. also K. Rahner, 'Theology and Anthropology', Theological Investigations IX (London and New York, 1972), pp. 28-45; idem, 'Philosophy and Philosophizing in Theology', ibid, pp. 46-63. On the historical development of the dogma itself cf. Mysterium Salutis I (Einsiedeln, 1965), pp. 727-782.
[16] On this cf. no. 6.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

real or merely presumed heresies may arise in the Church, that it takes time to distinguish between the two, and requires patience on the part of the official teachers as well as of theologians and believers, and that for this reason we should not be too hasty to throw suspicion upon either side with regard to an interpretation of this kind, accusing it either of being stupid and old-fashioned or alternatively as avant-garde and heretical. Again the official teaching of the Church is subject to a living process of historical development, and at a time when the history of human ideas is undergoing swift transformations it too must critically, boldly and confidently accept and endure these historical conditions to which it is subject.

3. This inevitable pluralism of theologies which exists today must not and need not surrender the unity of the Church's creed even at the verbal level.[17] In the theology of the Church and in the mind and heart of the individual believer there must be a pluralism in the interpretation of any given dogma. Otherwise it is quite inconceivable that there can be any lively understanding of the Church's message such as can become a force in human life. Indeed in a situation in which each individual retains his own radical individuality, even though there may be a genuine verbal intercommunication between men, it is quite impossible, even in respect of truth itself, to establish empirically with absolute certainty whether two individuals pronouncing and accepting in common the same proposition really think and mean the same by it.[18] But all this does not exclude the fact that there must be unity of creed within the Church and, moreover, that this can be established in sufficient measure. On any Catholic understanding of the faith this unity cannot consist merely in the unity of that reality which is ultimately signified but is beyond words, and to which the various theological statements refer. There must also be a unity in the verbal creed itself within the one Church. So as to ensure a sufficient possibility and certainty of achieving and establishing this it is necessary that we both believe and express in words the same truth even though in doing so it must be recognized that differences do incontestably exist in the concrete between individuals according to their own personal conditions in their individual interpretations of what they all assert in common.

In order to ensure that there shall be a unity of one and the same creed [132] within the Church in a context of insuperable pluralism with regard to the understanding of the faith, and in order to uphold the verbal expression of the truth in its presentation at the social level, it is inevitable and legitimate to have a certain linguistic norm.[19] There are also unjustified deviations from such a linguistic norm as laid down by the Church which are illegitimate (even though they do not necessarily and in all cases ipso facto also have to deviate from what is signified in the Church's official formulation) at least in those cases in which the formulation that deviates from the linguistic usage of the official Church is presented not as a possible interpretation of this official statement of the Church, but rather itself, either explicitly or in practice, rejects this official formulation. Again a proposition which is merely presumed to be heresy though in fact it is not can in its turn have to be rejected on the grounds that it itself rejects the verbal formulation of the official Church and departs too far from it in its own formulation, so that in practice it is in danger of arousing in the hearers of such an interpretation opinions which really are heretical even though they were not intended [17] On this cf. also K. Raliner, 'The Need for a "Short Formula" of the Christian Faith', Theological Investigations IX (London and New York, 1972), pp. 117-126 and the study entitled 'Reflections on the Problems Involved in Devizing a Short Formula of the Faith', Theological Investigations XI (London, 1973), pp. 230-244.

[18] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'A Small Fragment on "The Collective Finding of Truth"', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 82-88.

[19] This requirement is emphatically laid down in 'Humani Generis' (DS 3881-3883). Cf. also on this Mysterium Salutis I (Einsiedeln, 1965), pp. 693-696.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

as such by the original upholders of this interpretation. The Christian and the theologian must adopt a policy which has nothing to do with any cowardly or facile ecclesiastical conformism, namely to strive in a spirit of sincerity and self-criticism to ensure that a verbal formulation of the creed expressing the one faith of the Church is really preserved. And to this end they must ever anew bring their own interpretation of the faith (however justified or indeed necessary it may be in itself) into conformity with the one creed of the Church, and help to promote this one creed. Otherwise in the long run the danger of real heresies arising in the Church can no longer be excluded.

4. There is a possibility – indeed under certain circumstances a necessity and a duty – for the Church to reject a doctrine arising within her as heretical.[20] Such a statement is distasteful to modern man. He feels all too easily, although ultimately speaking unjustly, that any condemnation on the part of the Church's official teachers of a doctrine upheld by an individual Christian is an attack upon the freedom of conscience and opinion. Ultimately speaking there can be no question of this, although it must be conceded that a non-definitorial rejection of a theological opinion on the [133] part of the official teachers can be, and in fact often has been in the past, over-hasty, lacking in charity, or erroneous. When the Church rejects the doctrine of a theologian or the opinion of an individual Christian within her midst as heretical she is in no sense asserting that the case involved necessarily constitutes a subjectively culpable error. Nor does she deny the possibility that an individual may be unable to extricate himself from his error, which subjectively speaking is invincible and inculpable, even though it leads the individual concerned out of the Church. On the contrary the following principles apply:

a) In any definitorial rejection of a given doctrine put forward by one of her members the Church states that such a doctrine is absolutely irreconcilable with the Church's own convictions of faith, and on these grounds the conscience of the individual concerned with regard to truth is confronted with the alternative either of abandoning this view or, if such a measure is irreconcilable with the subjective conscience of the individual involved with regard to truth, of separating himself from the Church in an attitude of mutual respect because the Church is a free community constituted by the unity of her faith, and the individual involved is precisely in the position of no longer sharing in this faith as a whole. The sphere of freedom of conscience and opinion which the Church herself protects and recognizes is not simply coterminous with the sphere of that which can be believed and taught in the Church.

b) In any non-definitorial rejection of the doctrines or views of one of her members the Church states that having examined such doctrines or views to the best of her ability with the means at her disposal at the given point in time, and while retaining all respect for it and all charity towards its protagonist, she cannot see how this doctrine or view can be reconciled with her own faith. In such a case, in which a truly authoritative but non-definitorial rejection of a doctrine of this kind has been pronounced by the Church's magisterium, the individual who has been 'censured' in this way must examine his own conscience as to how, in the concrete case, he can reconcile his own subjective convictions with the respect and the obedience due to the authority and the competence of the official magisterium of the Church. In such cases, in which the Church has taken up an authoritative but not irrevocable position with regard to certain theological opinions (which incidentally can have an effect on practical life) various possibilities are conceivable according to the circumstances involved in each particular case, none of them necessarily provoking either an internal or still less an external breach with the Church. In this connection, and for a better understanding of what has been [20] On this problem cf. the following further articles by the author: 'Membership of the Church according to the Teaching of Pius XII's Encyclical, "Mystici Corporis Christi"', Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore, 1963), pp. 1-88; 'Kirchengliedschaft', LKT VI (2nd ed., 1961), pp. 221-225.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

said, reference may be made to the [134] Doctrinal Letter of the German Bishops, in which, perhaps for the first time in an official ecclesiastical pronouncement, this point is treated of in a realistic and genuine manner. In this we find the following passage:

'On this point a difficult problem arises calling for realistic discussion, and one that in the case of many Catholics of today, and to a greater extent than formerly, threatens either their faith or their free and trustful attitude towards the Church's magisterium. We refer to the fact that errors can and do infiltrate into the magisterium in the exercise of its official functions. The fact that this sort of thing is possible is something of which the Church has always been aware and which she has actually stated in her theology, and she has developed rules of conduct to cater for such a situation. This possibility of error does not apply to those statements of doctrine which are proclaimed by a solemn definition of the Pope or the universal Council, or through the ordinary channels of official teaching as requiring to be received with the absolute assent of faith. It is also historically incorrect to maintain that an error of the Church has subsequently been brought to light in such doctrinal definitions. This is of course not to contest the fact that even in the case of a dogma, while its original meaning must be maintained, a development in the understanding of it is always possible and always necessary provided due safeguards are observed to avoid misinterpretations which may formerly have been current. Nor should the question which has been raised be confused with the manifest fact that side by side with the divine law, which is immutable, there is also a human law in the Church which is subject to change. Such change has from the outset nothing to do with error, but at most raises the question of the opportunism of the earlier or more recent juridical decision concerned.

'With regard to error or the possibility of error in non-definitorial statements of doctrine of the Church, which themselves in turn can vary greatly in their degree of binding force, it must be first recognized realistically and decisively that human life, even taken quite in general, must always be lived with the utmost conscientiousness according to those lights which on the one hand must be recognized at the speculative level as not absolutely certain, and yet at the same time which have to be respected 'here and now' because provisionally speaking they cannot be bettered as valid norms for thinking and acting. Every individual is aware of this fro his own concrete life. Every doctor in his diagnosis, every statesman in his evaluation of political circumstances and the decision he bases upon them is aware of this fact. The Church too in her doctrine and practice cannot always and in every case allow herself to be faced with the dilemma [135] of either imposing a doctrinal decision carrying ultimate binding force or simply being silent and leaving everything to the opinion of the individual to decide in any way he likes. To preserve the true and ultimate substance of the faith she must, even at the risk of error in some point of detail, put forward doctrinal directives which have a specific degree of binding force, and yet, since they do not constitute a definition of faith, carry with them a certain element of the provisional even amounting to the possibility of error. Otherwise she cannot proclaim or interpret her faith at all or apply it as a decisive reality of life to each new human situation as it arises. In a case of this sort the position of the individual Christian with regard to the Church is analogous to that of a man who recognizes that he is obliged to accept the opinion of a specialist even when he knows that this is not infallible.

'In no case can there be any place for an opinion opposed to the provisional doctrinal pronouncements of the Church in preaching or catechetics even when, under certain circumstances, the faithful have to be instructed concerning the nature and the limited range of any such provisional doctrinal decision. This is a point which has already been discussed. He who believes that he has to hold his own private opinion and that already here and now he is in possession of that better insight which the Church will arrive at in the future must ask himself in the sight of God and his own conscience, and in a spirit of realistic self-critical

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

evaluation, whether he has the necessary breadth and depths of specialized theological knowledge to be in a position to deviate from the current teaching of the official Church in his private theory and practice. In principle it is possible to conceive of such a case. But subjective arrogance and over-hasty self-opinionatedness will have to answer to the judgement of God'.[21]

However clear it may be that all this has to be borne in mind by a present-day Catholic and, in appropriate circumstances, put into practice as well, the fact still remains that one harsh truth which is still more radical must not be obscured, namely that under certain circumstances the Church must recognize her duty and have the courage unequivocally to reject specific teachings if and to the extent that they are irreconcilable with the Church's own convictions of faith. And this is true today even of those teachings the champions of which do not simply leave the Church of their own initiative because of their opinions, but suppose that an opinion of this kind has a right to be at home in the Church and is reconcilable with [136] the Church's doctrine as rightly understood, and indeed may be the only practicable interpretation of this doctrine at the present day. It is true that for very good reasons the Church has refrained from pronouncing anathemas of this kind at the Second Vatican Council. But this does not mean that the Church either must not or cannot ever again pronounce such an anathema in the future.

Certainly in a situation of pluralism in language and in the conceptual apparatus by means of which theological realities are expressed today it is often very difficult to bring different statements into confrontation with one another, to translate them, as it were, into another language and transpose them into another conceptual world, and so to come to a position where it can be recognized whether a given statement is in conformity with or in contradiction to the faith of the Church. It can also be the case – and this precise point is emphasized by the bishops in the same Doctrinal Letter – that the Church either fails to form any opinion at all or forms one only with great difficulty as to whether a specific conception as enunciated by its original learned authors is or is not reconcilable with the faith of the Church. But in this passage of their Doctrinal Letter the bishops explicitly emphasize that the Church has the right to intervene with her anathema once she establishes that in the majority of her adherents or among the faithful of the Church in their existing concrete situation and according to their present understanding a conception o this kind will be understood in such a way that at least in what is, perhaps, its over-primitive formulation of the relevant doctrine it is no long reconcilable with the faith of the Church. The Church would betray her gospel and the magisterium of the Church would betray its task if from the outset they no longer had the courage under certain circumstances to pronounce an unequivocal 'no' to a doctrine which arose in the Church and attempted to achieve a legitimate footing there.

Very many theological questions – for instance with regard to what meant by the Resurrection of Jesus Christ – may be open questions and remain obscure, and various answers to them may be found within the Church. But when someone disseminates a doctrine in the Church which so far as the Church's conscious faith is concerned constitutes in practice a simple denial of the Resurrection of Christ, then the Church can and must respond with an actual definitorial anathema. Perhaps in certain circumstances it might still be possible to say that in such an anathema the relevant doctrine has been misunderstood. But in that case it would still always be the duty of the teachers of such a doctrine, if they wanted to put it forward in the Church, to formulate it, expound it, and remove all [137] dangers from it in such a way that this misunderstanding on the part of the faithful in the Church and her official teachers would not arise. On any showing the unity of the creed of the universal [21] Letter of the German Bishops, loc cit., 12/13; cf. also B. Schüller, 'Bemerkungen zur authentischen Verkündigung des kirchlichen Lehramtes', Theologie und Philosophie 42 (1967), pp. 534-551.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Church takes precedence in value and importance in the Church and for her over the theology of an individual or of individual groups.

Even though in a specific case the Church may recognize the necessity for such an anathema, and may pronounce a condemnation of this kind, still it does not ipso facto follow that the condemnation will be successful in all respects. He who in a spirit of genuine faith assents to the Church and to her magisterium is indeed aware that the Church has pronounced right judgement (subject to the distinctions already touched upon in the Doctrinal Letter of the bishops). He is aware that teaching cannot be put forward in the Church or for her in the way that the condemned doctrine is put forward. But in a twofold respect the real success of such a condemnation is still not assured. For in the first place it can be the case, and that too for the reasons already mentioned when we were considering the causes of heresy in the Church, that those who incur condemnation in this way may perhaps indeed be silent or more subdued in the promulgation of their opinions, yet at the same time will be willing neither to depart from the Church nor to give up those opinions. Against this position the Church has only very limited possibilities at her command. Secondly it is possible that the real success of such a condemnation, namely the preservation of the faith from corruption or injury and the genuine and joyful willingness to believe on the part of the faithful are only achieved when the doctrines safeguarded by this condemnation are themselves thought out in a new and living way, and formulated in a way that can be assimilated and preached from an attitude of personal conviction. A mere condemnation taken by itself is still not enough to assure that all this shall be the case.

In certain circumstances the only way for effectively safeguarding an irreformable doctrine of the Church is – to express it paradoxically – to reform that doctrine in a forward direction. In other words while preserving that in its message which has an abiding validity, to express it in fresh terms which have a living relevance, and to set it in broader and more comprehensive contexts.[22] To put the point in what is perhaps a somewhat exaggerated form, we might perhaps imagine that in not a few cases an [138] anathema of this kind pronounced against individuals who do, after all, at least in principle intend to be Christians, is actually a sign of theological petrification and ossification on the part of the Church's magisterium. At the same time, however, even though in all realism this point may be conceded, it should not in its turn be regarded as amounting to an obligation imposed upon the Church such that she cannot reject any interpretation of the faith which she recognizes as clearly contradictory to her own faith by an unequivocal 'No', for she can do this even before she has achieved this positive task of arriving at a living and freshly acquired understanding of her faith.

5. A point which has to be borne in mind throughout the whole question which we are considering is the difference between pulpit and seat of learning, between the preaching of the faith and theological speculation.[23] Certainly close connections do exist between the preacher authorized by the Church and the theologian engaged with his problems. What the theologian is reflecting upon in his scientific study is in fact the conscious faith of the Church as it is present in and expressed in the Church's preaching and the Church's life under the direction of the official doctrinal and pastoral authorities. And conversely the preacher must be theologically educated. He must have studied before he preaches in order that he may preach the word of God in a way that does justice to his subject-matter and to the

[22] On the basic principles involved cf. Mysterium Salutis I (Einsiedeln, 1965), pp. 696-698, 756 ff., 771 f. Besides this we can see this demand fulfilled on a right understanding of the definition of 'Pastoral Aims' by the Council, cf. K. Rahner, 'On the Theological Problems Entailed in a "Pastoral Constitution"', Theological Investigations X (London and New York, 1972), pp. 293-317.

[23] On this point cf. the author's article 'Demythologization and the Sermon', Concilium 3/4 (1968, Pastoral), pp. 12-20.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

circumstances in which he preaches. At the same time, however, there is an essential difference between the pulpit and the seat of learning.

The message which the preacher utters from the pulpit must be neither in contradiction to the teaching of the Church nor something that runs counter to his own personal sense of truth as a serious student of theology. At the same time, however, the pulpit is not the place in which abstruse points of theological controversy should be canvassed. The reason for this is not that Christians, and especially educated ones, must be shielded from the problems of theology, or that in the pulpit it is a 'simple faith' that should be put forward such as the learned theologian in his study or in his professorial chair feels himself superior to. The real reason why such problems should not be canvassed in the pulpit is that here it is the word of God as guiding and vivifying that must be preached, the word that is intended to touch our consciences and hearts and change our lives. For in the pulpit it is God's truth, albeit expressed in human words, that must be imparted, and not human problems concerning this word of God. Certainly it is very often difficult to maintain this distinction in the concrete [139] individual case. Nevertheless it is in principle valid. When the preacher fails to respect it in a spirit of self-effacement and submissiveness to the truth of God and the Church the pulpit is turned into the place where heresies arise in the Church. Problems are then raised which have not yet been coped with even by scientific theology, and it is quite inevitable that the believer who is not a theological specialist, and moreover, does not need to be so, misunderstands these problems in his turn, receives a crude and inaccurate impression of the attempts that are made to solve them, fails to recognize what may be a possible way of reconciling theological positions of this kind with the substance of the Church's faith, and then supposes that in order to be 'modern' he has to surrender the Church's own statement of faith rather than the interpretation of this statement which has been offered to him and misunderstood by him.

It would be false to suppose that today it is impossible to make any statement of the Christian faith from the pulpit without explicitly embarking upon theological problems of this kind. In certain circumstances the preacher must be aware that such problems exist. He must pay due heed to them in his preaching, but in interpreting the text of holy scripture he must concentrate on a central content of faith, and for this he does not need to enter into exegetical problems in the passages concerned which are ultimately unimportant. Certainly however by keeping his eyes fixed on the essence of the Church's faith in a spirit of modesty and responsibility he will be able to express the faith as found in the gospel and the Church without thereby being false to his own conscience as a serious student of speculative theology, and without preaching in such a way that his message is no longer 'brought home' to his hearers because it sounds old-fashioned, stereotyped, and cliché-ridden. To reiterate: when we fail to observe the difference between the pulpit and the chair of learning the pulpit becomes the place at which heresies arise in the minds of the hearers, often against the will of the preacher. A situation may arise, however, in which an educated Christian who is not a professional theologian nevertheless wishes to be instructed as to the current theological problems and in which he has very solid grounds, over and above a general and praiseworthy spirit of enquiry, for wishing this. In such a case there are sufficient opportunities elsewhere for him to receive such instruction: in lectures, in conferences arranged by the Catholic academies, on the radio, in books and so forth.

In any case, however, the preacher must avoid giving any 'scandal' to believers from the pulpit such as can be provoked from both sides. The preacher can preach in such a way that he fails to do justice to the demands [140] of a hearer who may under certain circumstances be theologically very well educated. He may maintain propositions which he has no right whatever to impose upon his hearer as binding in faith. But the preacher can, however, take the opposite line by presenting a so-called modern theology which is either objectively

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

irreconcilable with the Christian faith or at least is such that the hearer fails to understand how it can be reconciled with that which a Christian must on any showing believe and hold firm to, so that in this way he takes scandal. Even today there still exists a middle course between these two possibilities of scandal. This does not mean that the preacher has to take into account any and every conceivable difficulty which may arise, or that every sort of 'pious' prejudice entertained by a narrow-minded man has to be sanctioned from the pulpit. Under certain circumstances theological findings also emerge which are sound and, subject to the guidance of the Church's magisterium, genuinely received in Catholic theology. And it is in the interests of a genuine and free faith on the part of this same modern man than these should be stated simply, even though here and there there may be some old-fashioned listeners who will take scandal at them.

III

Paul himself already recognized that divisions, 'heresies' as he puts it arise again and again in the Church. And it is even less surprising that divisions of this kind should exist today at a time of immense spiritual upheaval. Today more than ever before the ancient faith is confronted by fresh questions, so that it is not surprising to find that not infrequently even genuine questions meet with poor answers since the process by which a good answer is arrived at to such questions is inevitably only a slow one. Nevertheless even today the situation is not such that a sincere Christian with a ready will to listen to the word of God in the mouth of the Church no longer knows what he may and should believe, or that the word of the Church has become ambiguous or obscure. Certainly it is true that faith always involves a self-commitment to the incomprehensibility of God, and so to a truth which is and remains a mystery. But if we say: 'We believe in God, in his forgiving compassion and his love; we believe in Jesus Christ our Lord, the crucified and risen one; we believe in the grace of God and in eternal life, in the community of those who believe in Jesus Christ as their Lord and Redeemer and are united among themselves in hope and love', then while it is certainly true that such statements still always remain [141] mysterious and again and again provoke fresh theological speculations as to how they should be understood, still it is nevertheless true at the same time that in such statements we know what we intend to say, and we know that that truth which is mysteriously pointed to in such statements constitutes our life and our assurance in death.

Certainly our faith is not simply identical with a fixed sum of statements which have been formulated once and for all. Our faith, suffused as it is by the grace of God, ultimately speaking bears not precisely on the statements but on the reality of God himself who through Jesus Christ and in his grace has drawn near to us in forgiveness and divine self-bestowal. Hence our faith is constantly to be conceived of as the faith of men who are still on their way, making pilgrimage towards eternal life. It is a faith that is open to the future. And whatever propositions it maybe formulated in it is committed ever anew to the living mystery of God himself. It endures its own imperfections and the contradiction which it experiences, but even as such it is also a faith of the holy fellowship of the Church borne up by the assistance of her Spirit in a single creed. Yet for this very reason it should also have the humility and the courage to say 'No' to heresies which contradict it. In such a 'no' it does not condemn men, but neither does it allow itself to be drawn away by human opinions from committing itself to the truth of God which it has received from God through Jesus Christ and in his Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[142]

8

CONCERNING OUR ASSENT TO THE CHURCH AS SHE EXISTS IN THE CONCRETE

If I am to discuss the nature of the assent to the Church as she exists in the concrete two preliminary observations must first be made in order to understand what this theme involves and to define the area within which it falls. The assent of which I am speaking is an assent to the Church in the concrete. This means that what is being treated of is not, or at any rate not primarily, the Church as she is envisaged in a presentation of fundamental theology or in a dogmatic treatise on ecclesiology. In other words it is not so much the Church in her abstract theological nature, but rather the Church in the concrete, with those special characteristics which derive from the historical conditions of the present age, the Church as we find her in the contemporary situation in which she stands – in brief the concrete Church in that form which has been conditioned by the age in which we live and in which she represents at once a challenge and a burden to us.

The precisions and restrictions which we are thus imposing upon the subject-matter are not invalidated by the fact that here once more, and in the context with which we are concerned, we cannot speak of this Church in the concrete otherwise than at a very general and abstract level. In spite of this the fact still remains that it will be the Church in the concrete that we shall be referring to, the Church as we experience or even suffer her in our everyday human and religious lives. Now in speaking of the Church in this way we are speaking of Catholics, and not to those others, whether Christians or non-Christians, who do not belong to this Church and are, for that reason, quite incapable of experiencing her so immediately as we Catholics do as a burden and a challenge. We are speaking, therefore, to Catholics who are Catholics not merely as defined by the sort of rules which a state official might devize in determining a specific social group, but who will to be Catholics on the basis of a commitment of faith even though this is something which they may have to achieve again and again and only at the cost of toil and pain. It has been necessary to introduce [143] what we have to say with these brief preliminary remarks in order that the nature of our theme should be understood and that its limits should be defined.

I

If we are honest and recognize not merely that we should be honest but also that we have to be Christians, since otherwise we cannot truly be believers at all, then we must say that to us of today the assent of faith, hope, and charity to this Church as she exists in the concrete does not come easily. At this present moment it makes no difference whether there was some other time at which this was not the case, or whether in every age the Church has always been something more than merely the sustainer of faith and the sphere within which our Christian lives are lived, namely, albeit in ways which constantly vary according to the historical circumstances, a harsh burden and a challenge that threatens our faith as well. In any case this is the situation today, and that too for many reasons which derive – at least for the most part – precisely from the situation in which willy nilly we have to live today in terms of the development of ideas, of civilization, and of society. Some brief indication, albeit a very general and abstract one, must be given of what these reasons are.

Before we can arrive at a position to evaluate causes of this kind we must consider that a Catholic Christian feels himself confronted by his Church in her doctrine and in her life as an

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

entity that imposes demands and exacts duties from him. Of course within this Church there are wide areas, both in her theology and in her living practice, in which the individual Catholic is left free to decide for himself so that in these areas no absolute obligations are imposed even upon one who wills to be a Catholic Christian. His personal methods of prayer, how often (within an area defined by a minimal demand) he takes part in Church activities, attends divine service, or receives the sacraments, whether, for instance, he does or does not gain indulgences, what personal opinion he holds with regard to the traditional theology of the Church while respecting her essential dogmas – all this and much else besides is left to his own free decision even though this still does not imply that he can be arbitrary or capricious in arriving at it. But this does nothing to alter the fact that to the Catholic the Church as she exists in the concrete is an entity that makes demands upon him and exacts obligations from him. So far as the individual Catholic is concerned this Church is not the sort of authority which he can accept [144] or reject as he likes in any given case, so far as her effective reality and the decisions she takes are concerned, provided only that he maintains his ultimate commitment of faith to her. This Church has a body of dogmatic teaching which is enduring and binding. She has a specific concrete life within which the individual Catholic must lead his own personal religious life and work out his salvation. She is made up of concrete individuals, and the qualities which these possess in the concrete, and the historical conditions to which they are subject, inevitably have their effect even in the most supreme exercises of authority and the decisions of this Church, which are authoritative and binding upon the individual Catholic.

Once we have recognized that the relationship between the Church and the individual Catholic is of this kind, then it becomes easy to see what those factors are in contemporary life which makes his assent to the Church as she exists in the concrete so difficult and which represent a danger to it. It is because he cannot simply adopt an attitude of critical detachment to her, or reject these concrete factors in the Church from his own personal life precisely at that point at which the teaching and way of life proper to this Church become difficult for him to understand. Today the individual lives amid a vast multiplicity of opinions, ways of life, social groupings with the most varied characteristics and tendencies. In the milieu in which his life is passed there is virtually nothing which can simply be taken for granted and would be disputed by no-one, nothing which can find a sufficient justification simply in our personal life alone without itself in turn having further to be justified by our own personal decision. In such a situation, from which we cannot escape, even the faith which the Church herself teaches us, and even the essential nucleus of that faith as presented to us as absolutely binding dogma, can no longer appear to us simply as something that is unassailable and to be accepted without question. This is all the more true in view of two other factors bearing upon the Church's own awareness of her faith. First in the course of almost two thousand years of history this has undergone enormous developments and an immense multiplicity of further distinctions. Second it is in practice still to a large extent formulated in terms of concepts and viewpoints which are not in any simple or obvious sense those of our own age.

Hence it is quite inevitable that much even of that which is most proper to the essence of the Church's message of faith shall strike us as strange, so that it is only with difficulty that we can bring it into a reasonably harmonious synthesis with what we experience elsewhere and with the findings of the contemporary sciences which we accept and regard as established. In this present-day situation it is quite impossible wholly to [145] avoid a position (even though there is very much that could and should be avoided) in which the Church's teaching of the faith strikes us at first sight and at a first trial of it as in some sense impracticable, old-fashioned and, so far as the concrete life which we have to lead is concerned, irrelevant.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The extremely complex distinctions in the Church's doctrine, then, combined with our failure to synthesize this doctrine in any adequate way with the rest of our attitude to life is one of the factors which make our assent to the Church as she exists in the concrete difficult. An additional point of difficulty arises from the aspect of the individuals belonging to the Church and especially those who hold official positions of authority in her. If we are Catholics we have to live in a society with which, however possible and justified it may be to maintain certain reserves, we must after all ultimately identify ourselves, a society made up of individuals and official authorities which all too often appear pitiful, narrow-minded, old-fashioned and out of date. Humanly speaking they often strike us as underdeveloped, restricted in outlook and pettifogging, and yet they confront us with demands and requirements which on the one hand are put forward in the name of the enduring gospel and the enduring nature of the Church herself, and yet on the other hand are all too clearly stamped with the personality precisely of these individuals, and of the historical and human modalities to which they are subject. All too often they may receive the impression that the Church has been too old-fashioned to overcome the burden of her own past, that she preaches her message in a way in which it is simply no longer possible for us to put it into practice, that what she regards as important is in fact secondary and insignificant, and that at the same time she is overlooking points which are of decisive importance for our present age. Alternatively it may seem to us that she is merely paying a hasty lip-service, which she herself does not take altogether seriously, to these points of decisive importance, and that even after the Second Vatican Council, and in spite of all the concessions which have been wrung from her in the way of aggiornamento, she still prefers anxiously to build upon the past which she feels to be true and trusted, rather than upon a creative future which is still unsure; that she is truer to the letter than to her own Spirit. This portrayal of the factors which make our assent to the Church as she exists in the concrete so burdensome, and which represent a danger to it, is only a very pale and abstract one. But we have sought to point to precisely those factors which should recall to our minds what we ourselves experience every day in our concrete lives as Catholics.

[146]

II

We must now ask ourselves how it is that the Catholic Christian, despite all those factors in his experience of the Church which he finds burdensome and oppressive, nevertheless finds it possible to give a wholehearted and honest assent to this Church as she exists in the concrete. Before entering upon this question, however, we must begin by pointing out the following factors: viewed from a purely formal standpoint these same oppressive difficulties are also to be found in other departments of human life even apart from the Church. In all departments a tension arises, between freedom and society which can never be so completely solved at the theoretical level that all the difficulties arising from this tension are eliminated from the outset. Everywhere in the world, and in all the groupings that exist within society, the degree of social organization and the desire and will for freedom are both increasing at the same time. We all recognize that today and in the future it will be impossible for the individual taken in isolation to live outside the kind of society which is something more than a mere pre-existing entity which is taken for granted, which raises no problems and therefore is never felt to represent a burden to him at all. Today and in the future, rather, the kind of society in which the individual will be forced to live is itself highly planned, institutionalized and controlled. It is a society which imposes demands and certain inevitable compulsions upon the individual. On the other hand we also recognize that we are becoming more individualistic and more critical in our attitude towards society, its institutions, its patterns of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

behaviour and taboos, and its frozen ideologies. Indeed our reaction to all this is one of protest. Now the question of how these two factors can be reconciled on the one hand with the greater degree of social organization and on the other the greater degree of individualization is a problem which exists everywhere in the world today, and not merely in the Church, a problem for which there is no patent solution such as can eliminate all the conflicts which arise in the concrete from the outset, a problem in which we cannot short-sightedly opt for either the one or the other of the two alternatives, even though we do not find, and in the concrete may be destined never to find, any completely satisfactory synthesis between them anywhere in the world. Thus we place the question with which we are concerned within this broader perspective. While it still does not lose the difficulties with which it is burdened, still in the light of this we are reminded of the need for that patience, prudence, and courage without which we cannot endure [147] all these tensions in the living of our lives either at the secular or the Christian levels.

I believe that in seeking the point of departure for a hopeful and committed assent to the Church in the concrete we can to some extent show where this lies in three ways or from three distinct aspects:

a) Human living in the concrete is not artificially developed by a process of speculation as though in a test-tube. Certainly the power to speculate is a part of human nature, the capacity to experience the question of human existence, to adopt a critical standpoint towards, and to enquire into, that state in which all unquestioned we have been placed. Certainly there is nothing in this existence such that it either should or even may seem to be excluded from the outset from this process of critical speculation. But after all this is only one side of human existence.

We never wholly include ourselves in our critical speculation. In it we take as our starting-point again and again presuppositions which we have not subjected to our critical questioning in their own right or in the same way. Constantly we find ourselves already embarked upon a course the starting-point of which already lies behind us. In our critical evaluations we proceed from certain standards and intellectual perspectives, and even though we certainly could subject these in turn to our process of critical questioning, de facto we have failed to apply this process in their case. We never really begin from zero. Indeed we are incapable of doing this because otherwise we would be standing outside our own course of history and the historical mode which is proper to us, and this is impossible for us. Even the most radical revolutionary in his quest for an ideological critique which is unconditioned, cannot achieve this without in turn, whether he is aware of it or not, beginning from some point which he himself has not determined and upon which he has not reflected in any adequate sense.

The will to achieve a critical standpoint which is absolute, which in its concrete exercise has refused to commit itself by an act of trust to any prior assumptions, would lead only to a state of absolute immobility, to total sterility, to a radical neurosis of existence such as would incapacitate its practitioners for living. It is a fact that nothing comes from nothing. Where there is real and genuine life at the intellectual level, such as is capable of surviving and taking responsibility, there will also be an attitude of trustful and willing commitment in which that which is inevitable is accepted and accorded its due force. And for this reason anyone engaged in genuine living freely accepts, by an ultimate act of trust in life itself, the impossibility of totally comprehending life in his own speculative [148] processes and in the process of critical enquiry precisely into this life. And this remains true even though it does not mean that any one specific factor should from the outset be excluded from this process of critical speculation. Man as a being endowed with critical faculties calls all things in question, and man as finite, and as a being who exists in a specific pre-existing situation which he himself has not created is himself in turn critical with regard to his own critical faculties, and for all these critical attitudes of his, in an absolutely ultimate sense he proceeds

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in his life from an unreserved act of trust in the fact that however true it may be that any individual factor can be destroyed, that which is prior and given would ultimately speaking and taken as a whole stand up to his critique even at those points at which that critique can no longer in practice be applied to it in any adequate sense. We are speaking of a certain unity between an attitude of radical criticism at the fundamental level on the one hand, and a spirit of unreserved trust in that which is untested by criticism on the other. Now this is not something which man could control for himself in his practical life (different in this from theory which remains at the merely formal level). It is not something which he himself in his turn could master or bring within his control by achieving a standpoint of transcendence at some high level from which he could subject it to a concrete critique. Rather it is something which is bestowed upon him as that incomprehensible reality of his life which is called grace, though admittedly this must also be accepted and can be refused. The actual situation is this: the concrete human life which a man lives is not created in the test-tube of speculation. It is not first dissected by his critique down to the point of an absolute void, so that subsequently it can be artificially built up by speculation, criticism and theory.

Now so far as the Catholic is concerned one of the factors in his concrete human life is his membership of the Church and his life in and with her. For him this state of belonging to the Church is not some kind of minor incidental factor in his life which can even disappear without his life as a whole being thereby altered, as though it were like a man buying a new suit or going to live in another district. This assent to the Church as she exists in the concrete has already permeated our entire life. We have prayed, supplicated for the eternity of God in his holiness. We have heard the words of eternal life from the mouth of the Church, experienced the grace which she has imparted to us through her sacraments. Again and again we have been roused by her from the inertia and apathy of our everyday lives. Through her we have experienced the eternal in ourselves. Already in our lives we have lived, and in this sense uttered, an assent in [149] the concrete to the Church in the concrete. This assent has truly been made at the very centre of our personal human existence. Hence we also have the right and duty, precisely on the basis of intellectual honesty, freely and unreservedly to commit ourselves to this assent, to let it stand even though in doing so we are constantly aware of the fact that we have still not mastered all the reasons for this assent which have unconsciously asserted themselves in us or all the implications which it carries by our speculative processes; even though we are aware that this assent can be confronted again and again with fresh critical questionings, and that the relationship between the free and trustful prior decision governing our lives on the one hand and the process of critical speculation on the other is constantly shifting and constantly bringing us fresh surprises. Certainly even our relationship with the Church is something that we subject again and again to critical questioning. But we have the right and the duty, until the contrary is proved beyond all doubt (and this is something which we do not fear) to assume and to live by the fact that these critical questionings do not destroy this relationship of ours with the Church, just as in other ultimate commitments and attitudes of our lives, commitments to loyalty, love, integrity without thought of reward or trust, or commitments to our neighbour, again and again through life itself and through the processes of our critical speculations we experience the fact that these commitments are under assault and yet, so long as we do not fall into a neurosis of criticism and doubt, we are aware that these basic commitments endure throughout all the purgatory of doubt and questioning.

We have already said at the outset of these remarks that we are addressing ourselves to Catholics. Now these have experienced the fact that their assent to the Church is not some kind of incidental option which they have taken in their lives, but in a true sense is to be numbered among the basic attitudes which sustain those lives. But if this is true then they have the right to commit themselves to this assent in a spirit of trust, to nourish ever fresh

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

hopes that the inner spiritual continuity of their lives will endure throughout all the manifest and painful vicissitudes in the unfolding process of their lives as spiritual beings, whether these be great or small. We cannot allow ourselves to be manoeuvred into that kind of questioning which is destructive of our lives, and we would be doing this if we were suddenly to notice at some point that after all the ultimate grounds on which our assent to the Church was based had given way as a basic reality of our personal lives and that our existence had become a bottomless abyss into which we had been cast. This is a situation in which we do not stand, and we must not allow ourselves to fall into it. And hence it is [150] meaningless when faced with the possibility (absolutely speaking conceivable) of a kind of doubt which of itself does not admit of any further answer already in the here and now to react to this with a universal doubt of the kind that negates. Otherwise we would be in the position of men who for fear of death already did themselves to death in the here and now. We must recognize the fact, therefore, that human life in the concrete cannot be constructed by any absolute process of reflection. And for this reason it must not feel itself to be called in question at the ultimate level by these particular critical questionings which may arise on individual points even if there are such. Now the perception of this fact is the first aspect of the point of departure at which we must take our stand again and again in critically re-appraising our assent to the Church in the concrete in the manner that is legitimate and prescribed. The true process of critical re-appraisal is itself in turn subjected to its own critique, and with regard to our experience of the realities of life in globo, which, even though we do not subject it to speculative analysis is nonetheless genuine and sustaining, this genuine process, of critical re-appraisal trustfully allows this global experience the chance to endure and again and again to prove itself genuine.

b) This brings us to a second aspect of the point of departure for arriving at a correct answer to our basic question. Global decisions of life, which affect the totality of our human lives and which are therefore incapable of ever being totally subsumed under our critical speculations, should endure throughout those unresolved tensions which arise between the decisions themselves and our critical reflections upon them. Newman pointed out long ago that a thousand difficulties of faith such as we obviously experience still do not constitute a doubt of faith such as constitutes a negation of our commitment to faith. In view of the finitude of their intellectual resources in the concrete, the finitude of their knowledge and the brevity of their lifespan, neither the average Christian nor yet the learned theologian are in any position to solve for themselves in any positive and clear way all the difficulties which can be raised against the convictions of faith in critical questions. We are confronted with the immense complexity of our existence, with an immense pluralism among the philosophies of life and the problems and findings of the sciences, such as cannot be mastered by any one individual. We are confronted with the multiplicity of our personal experiences of life, which can never wholly be reduced to a synthesis at the level of theory. And in view of all this it is obvious from the outset that our ultimate Commitment of faith is always surrounded by an incalculable range of questions which we have not yet [151] positively solved, mastered, or reduced to a positive synthesis within this commitment of faith in any effective sense.

But we must and can in all calmness achieve the perception that this is also something which is not for one moment to be expected, because it is impossible that this tension between question and answer can be solved in any direct and definitive manner. On the contrary it has constantly to be endured in a spirit of confidence and patience in our lives until one day the eternal light illumines us. Even the Catholic Christian can say: ‘When an individual genuinely and inculpably comes to grief as a result of this tension, when he is genuinely incapable of enduring it any longer, he is guiltless and hence even in these circumstances he has not lost the true substance of his faith at all’. But in a spirit of self-criticism we must guard against the danger which arises in the concrete circumstances of our lives of supposing that we have arrived at a state in which we 'cannot do any more', when in reality the point that we have arrived at is one in which an 'acquittal from guilt' of this kind is merely serving to cover up an ultimate cowardice of life which is no longer willing to endure these unreserved tensions. In other departments of life too the situation that arises is in fact this: We have enough harsh and disappointing experiences of ourselves and our fellow men to have seemingly good grounds for adopting an attitude of doubting scepticism towards humanity. Now we can never solve such grounds as these by any process of theoretical reasoning in such a way that they no longer represent a threat to our ultimate and basic attitude towards humanity, no longer bring it ever anew into mortal peril, that basic attitude which consists in trust, reverence, and love. And yet at the same time we are aware that we must maintain this affirmative and loving attitude towards humanity right to the end. In the same way many temptations, questionings, problems and objections obviously arise on the personal, historical, and theoretical planes against our assent to the Church, her truth and institutions, objections which it is not given to us to work out in any positive and direct way until we have arrived at a complete solution to them. But the attitude of trustfully enduring unresolved tensions even in our relationship with the Church is only one instance of a reality which is actually a factor inherent in our lives. We cannot overcome such tensions by running away from them.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

c) This leads us on immediately to the third aspect of the right point of departure for finding the answer to our basic question. It is only in the act of striving for that which is greater, more enlightening, a greater force for life, that man has the right to relinquish something that belongs to his life, to surrender it. And it is only for the sake of a greater meaningfulness that [152] he has the right to abandon that which has hitherto been meaningful to him as meaningless. Perhaps this statement will not enlighten a sceptic who has allowed mistrust, and that doubt which calls everything in question, to penetrate into the innermost centre of his life. But nevertheless this statement is true, and without it life cannot endure. Indeed the radical sceptic recognizes the truth of this statement even though in doing so he contradicts his own position when he achieves the courage to embrace a scepticism which on his view is devoid of illusions as the highest meaning of his existence. And most average men are quite unaware when they adopt a sceptical attitude of this kind, of how much in the way of meaningfulness, in the way of that which is unquestioningly taken for granted and made the basis of their lives, they are still constantly allowing to remain. But he who, as a Catholic Christian, takes this statement as the standard by which to evaluate the question of his assent to the Church in the concrete can in all intellectual honesty justify this assent of his ever afresh despite all difficulties and temptations. For he can see what it will mean to depart from the truth of the Church, from her essential message, from the living and protecting mystery which we call God, from the hope of eternal life, from a hopeful sharing in the death of Jesus who, in a spirit of hope and love, allowed himself to fall into this mystery of God, from the fellowship of love called the Church, from the acceptance of forgiveness for the guilt of our lives, in brief from all that which the Church signifies. To depart from all this would not bring the individual concerned into a greater sphere of meaningfulness, of light, of freedom or of hope. Instead such a departure could only lead to one of two consequences: either an attitude of surrendering oneself to a lethal darkness of scepticism and of unworthy relativism or to the dubious attempt to live in isolation by the impoverished remnants of meaningfulness, light and courage which still remained, without really being able to see why these remnants deserve more assent or trust than that fulness of meaningfulness which is present and living in the Church.

III

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Taking this as his point of departure the Catholic can raise the question ever afresh of what the Church means for him, seeing that in spite of all temptations which persist he can give a bold assent of faith to her. Clearly she presents too complex a picture for him to comprehend in its entirety. How could it be otherwise seeing that she is intended to be the historical [153] and social embodiment of the truth and grace of God in man's personal life and in society and history, the sacrament of salvation for the whole of man and for humanity. But if in virtue of this she necessarily constitutes the most complex, the most manifold, and the most variegated entity, extending into all levels of man's existence and of society, then, from this point of view, it must be the most difficult task of all for the individual man to come to terms with her.

a) But let us take the three aspects we have mentioned, and which belong to that point of departure which any man must take in arriving at an ultimate commitment of his life, and consider her under these aspects. It may be obvious to the individual, or gradually become so, that when confronted with the ultimate realities of life, he cannot select or discard any one he likes, that there are realities in life which he will either achieve or lose as a whole, and towards these we can only adopt a critical attitude in that we commit ourselves to them immediately without reservation. Now if we recognize all this then, in spite of all, the Church, who of her very nature is too much for our comprehension, can nevertheless once more become a simple and self-evident fact for us. We who have already had a positive experience of this Church are familiar with not a few aspects and realities in her, of which we are aware that we cannot give them up, that they are in the heart and centre of our lives, even though much else in her, her doctrine, her official authorities, her institutions, her way of acting in the concrete in our own time, may seem strange, alienating and difficult to endure. Our relationship with her is similar to our relationship to a specific individual to whom we entrust ourselves and whom we love. Much in him may continue to be alien and incomprehensible to us. But nevertheless we have found a way of access to him. We have experienced what he is, and this justifies us and obliges us to accept and love him as a whole, to entrust ourselves to him as he is even in those factors in his nature which are alien and incomprehensible to us. And we know that we only have him and live with him when we do accept him and entrust ourselves to him in this way even in respect of those aspects of him which we do not understand.

So too it is in our relationship with the Church. We have never wholly understood her, and certainly in specific points we have fully justified objections to raise against much that exists within her in the concrete. We can have such objections and must have them, though admittedly they are objections which have to be endured in the Church and as an intrinsic factor in our membership of her, and not from an attitude of withdrawal or detachment from her such as would lead us to relinquish our grasp upon [154] her as a whole. We have had sufficient experience of her to give us the right to accept her as a whole in a spirit of hope, love, and intellectual honesty. In her we have achieved the experience of God, of prayer and of hope in an absolute future. In her we have encountered Christ the crucified one who gives us the ultimate trust to accept our own death and all the futilities in our lives as a means of entering upon eternal life. The Church has given us the scripture as her own book which, after all, we can read as the word of God only within the sphere of her own faith. And this is the only way in which we can approach the scriptures unless we are merely seeking to come face to face with ourselves and the unanswered questions which we represent once more within their pages.

A man cannot do away with his parents once he is born. The very fact that we are and that we continue to exist assures us of the fact that they continue ceaselessly to be our parents. Hence we cannot be Christians with these ultimate Christian experiences by quitting the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Church which has been, and remains, once and for all the mother of this Christian existence of ours. Otherwise all that we have, ultimately speaking, is an abstract God and an abstract Christ who continues to exist merely as the projection of our own subjectivity, a projection which is merely resolved into this subjectivity once more, and hence fails to escape from it. By way of analogy we may take our relationship to another man whom we have unreservedly accepted. In such a case even though there are elements in him which remain alien, so that we are constantly on the way to overcoming this alienation, nevertheless from the first we have accepted these alien elements in a spirit of trust, because we have already experienced in him that which we have at once understood and recognized as meaningful for us. It is the same with our relationship with the Church. The positive experience of this Church which sustains our life gives us the promise and the hope that that in her which is still alien and incomprehensible as well can be meaningful for us and can gradually, albeit always in an asymptotic process, be assimilated by us. Admittedly this can take place only if we constantly proceed from that threefold starting-point of which we have spoken, and which is legitimate, because even in other contexts it is prescribed and imposed upon us beforehand by life itself.

b) In this connection, and in order to understand the nature of our assent to the Church in the concrete, we must now enter in somewhat greater detail into a more specific question which bears upon our relationship with the Church as the accredited messenger of God's revelation, and as such endowed with authority to teach. For the Catholics who believe in her the Church has an authority to teach. This statement cannot be denied by the [155] Catholic, however true it may be that the forms and ways in which this teaching authority finds expression are also constantly subject to the laws of history and change, and influenced by the need to orientate the message to the particular climate of ideas prevailing at any given time. There is no doubt that precisely in respect of the binding doctrinal authority of this Church contemporary Catholics find that their assent to the Church in the concrete again and again entails a heavy burden.

There is much in relation to this question which we cannot enter into at this point. In particular we cannot treat of the question of how the immutability of a defined dogma can be reconciled with the necessity for re-interpreting this dogma ever afresh in the light of the climate of ideas prevailing at any given time. Nor can we describe the very different degrees of binding force which are to be ascribed to this authority which the Church possesses according to whether in any given case it is a dogma in the true sense that is being treated of or merely an officially promulgated doctrine which, though authentic indeed, is nevertheless in principle capable of reform. There is a further question into which we cannot enter, and which though difficult is, after all, an obvious one in view of the difference which cannot be overcome between knowledge as initially acquired and theoretical reflection upon that knowledge. This further question then is that which concerns the boundary line (which is always somewhat imprecise at the level of conscious awareness) between dogma in the true sense and other kinds of teaching put forward by the Church or by theology. Again we do not intend explicitly to discuss the question of what, in the particular concrete case, the relationship should be between the individual Catholic's personal conscience with regard to truth (something which must never be passed over) and the teaching authority which in principle is assented to by Catholics. For the decision taken by this teaching authority may vary greatly in degree in a specific instance and again the degree of binding force to be attached to such a decision may vary greatly. But my purpose here rather is simply to formulate and explain a single specific statement which can throw light upon this assent of ours to the Church as she exists in the concrete in this respect, and justify it for us in all intellectual honesty while safeguarding our conscience with regard to truth. The statement I am referring to may be expressed as follows: Truth, and that truth precisely in its specific force as illuminating and sustaining human existence as a whole has something to do with

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

institution. It is not possible at this point to reveal the full and exact significance of this statement in existential and ontological terms, or to show its precise application and justification. In order to make it intelligible [156] we shall confine ourselves merely to a few simple observations.

I am not infrequently surprised at how individuals in my own milieu give voice to their personal opinions with the utmost emotion, as though they were absolutely obvious. They call these their convictions and proclaim them as manifestly correct even in those cases in which they are either really (or often presumably) in contradiction to some doctrinal declaration on the part of the Church. It is indeed obvious that an opinion of this sort which is binding upon the individual concerned in his conscience with regard to truth can be inculpable even when such an opinion or conviction involves a rejection of some dogma (though admittedly in that case, according to Catholic convictions, it is objectively erroneous). It is inculpable even though it may be that an individual of this kind, who is led by his own conscience with regard to truth to a position in which he firmly believes that he has to reject a dogma of the Church, can no longer be called a Catholic in a theological sense. It is also obvious that any proposition which contradicts a doctrine of the Church which though authentic has not been defined and is therefore in principle reformable can objectively speaking even have a chance of being materially correct. But even while conceding and explicitly stating all this I am still amazed at the degree of naïve self-opinionatedness and emotional aggressiveness against the Church's official teachers that not a few Catholics are accustomed emphatically to evince in contradicting the teaching of the Church whether defined or not.

The present age is characterized by a pluralism of ideas, of experiences of life, of systems and theories, questions and problems, together with the constant temptation to relativism and scepticism which these entail. It is true that underlying this tendency towards relativism and scepticism there is a good and necessary attitude of openness to a truth which is broader and richer than that which we already explicitly possess. Nevertheless the attitude itself should really be directed against our own persons, and should cause us to question our own opinions in a spirit of self-criticism. Even in the purely human sphere in general it is dangerous and oddly naïve to regard one's fellows more or less from the outset as less intelligent or having less good with than oneself. Now this is far truer of our relationship to the teaching Church.

We of today, with that strange 'later individualism' of ours in thought and opinion which is, at bottom, no longer modern at all, stand in danger of being dominated by our emotions and trapped in our own subjectivity by over-valuing our personal opinion, our theological knowledge, and our capacity for theological thought in terms of analysis and synthesis [157] alike, when our opinion comes into conflict with some doctrine which is proposed to us from the Church and by her official teachers, which at first sight strikes us as alien. It is manifestly true that our personal subjectivity and our own moral and inalienable responsibility for the truth is something which we can never neglect. We must attempt subjectively to appropriate the truth of the Church and to make it our own in a process which is never completed. And we have not achieved the true obedience of faith so long as we merely repeat theological formulae, or simply leave them unexplored in a spirit of total indifference. But nevertheless it is the part of every true man to allow the truth to be borne in upon him, that truth which on his first encounter with it – and this after all is something seriously to be taken into account – strikes him as alien, difficult to understand, startling and forcing him out of his former finite subjectivity. Where there is no readiness to do this this man remains trapped in the capriciousness of his own subjectivity. He experiences himself only within the limitations of his own individual human nature and his personal experience. He is incapable of transcending this subjectivity and taking into himself that which is really new. Of course this applies primarily to those cases in which what is in question is not the particular findings of the so-called exact sciences, evidence for which can be acquired by experiments which can be repeated, but rather that truth which applies to man as a whole, that truth which imports salvation. In this quest for truth we rightly demand an authority which cannot simply be manipulated by our own subjectivity, one which, while we neither possess it nor can possess it otherwise than in the form of an utterance of our own personal and inalienable conscience with regard to truth, is nevertheless capable in particular cases of genuinely confronting us and laying demands upon us, an authority, therefore, which is something more than merely the projection of our own personal opinion. Only so can we manage to escape from the capriciousness of our own subjectivity. Only so can we strive for that freedom in which we are set free above all from ourselves.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now this authority, this archimedian point outside ourselves, on the basis of which we can overcome our own narrow subjectivity, will vary according to the particular truth arising in the concrete circumstances of our lives that is involved in any given case. Now the truth of salvation precisely demands an archimedian point of this kind outside ourselves. With regard to this authority in which the truth of salvation resides, and which frees us from our own subjective capriciousness, we may ask how it is to be determined in more precise theological terms. Are we to say that it is the historical experience of faith of the Church as a whole? Or that it [158] is scripture? Or that it is the official authority to teach instituted by Jesus Christ? We may further enquire how these various elements, which constitute this one authority, are related to one another. But for the moment it is not these questions that concern us. However there must be such an authority in order that salvation may be bestowed upon us and liberate us from our personal subjectivity. And the only real way in which such an authority is no longer liable to be subordinated to our own subjectivity is if it is upheld by other subjects existing in the concrete and capable of acting in the concrete within our own historical situation.

Even though we have only been able to indicate these considerations above, nevertheless they do surely enable us to realize the meaning of the statement that truth, when it applies precisely to man as a whole, man who can never exist in the ‘splendid isolation’ of his own subjectivity without being entrapped in it – that truth, I say, has something to do with institution. We do not need to be communists in order to understand this, although sometimes we may have the impression that this statement is better understood among them, albeit in a perverted application, than among us ‘later individualists’ with our liberalist mentality, which calls everything in question, and can still continue to do this for a whole epoch until the last remnants of what is valid from the past have been worked over.

But let us understand this statement that truth has something to do with institution, and that it is not the case that it is our own only when it is emancipated from this. On the contrary it is our own when we have grasped this statement and made it our own truth. Once we have understood this, then it can be that a radical assent to the Church as she exists in the concrete, even in respect of her teaching authority, will no longer be so difficult for us as it may sometimes seem. Obviously the difficulties which arise in points of detail, and with regard to specific individual doctrines of the Church, are still not wholly eliminated thereby. But nevertheless it has perhaps been made a little more intelligible why, and with what right, the individual Catholic conducts his dialogue with the Church (a dialogue which is always necessary and never concluded) from within the Church herself, recognizing her in principle as a binding authority for his convictions of faith.

c) For all that has been said so far, the Church still always remains – however much she may constitute the sphere of our life and our hope – a fearful burden upon us. We can neither cast this burden aside nor pretend to ourselves that it does not oppress us. The burden of the human factors in her to which we ourselves too make our own pitiful contribution. The [159] burden of traditions for which it can in no sense be claimed that they share in the promise of eternal assistance to the Church. The burden of the difference between the formulae and that which is expressed in them, the burden constituted by the fact that she falls short of the immeasurable grandeur of her task. The burden of the difference between the official and institutional element and the charismatic one. The burden of the difference between the peoples and civilizations which have to live together within her. The burden constituted by the fact that the measure of living faith, of creative hope for the future, and of selfless love is always too small. If anyone feels this burden, which always represents an assault on our assent to the Church in the concrete and makes it difficult for us, let him consider that he too plays his own limited part in increasing this burden. Let him consider above all that the Church is always the Church who wearily seeks her way through history, that she and we ourselves are on the way, and have not yet arrived at that goal at which all will be reconciled.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

And finally: all that the Church is, all that she does, all that she seeks to help us in with all her statements of faith, her sacraments and institutions, all this has after all one single significance, namely that by loving our neighbour, by hoping and working to make this life bearable, we let ourselves fall through that death which is being died throughout the whole of our lives in a spirit of submission and adoration into the incomprehensible mystery; that we achieve this in faith, hope and love in that creed of ours which runs counter to all that our experience suggests to us, telling us that this mystery is the mystery of freedom, of truth, of love and of forgiveness, and is addressed to us as such in Jesus Christ who was crucified and definitively received by God.

But because we really do find this too within her, because in her, in the hard and often harsh concrete forms of her reality the real message achieves concrete embodiment in our own lives, therefore, rising above all the burdens and tensions of our relationship with her we utter our assent to the Church. We do not take refuge from her everyday manifestations, however pitiable these may often be in ideals which are all too facile and which would merely deliver us up to ourselves in our own narrow, sinful, and pitiful limitations. We endure her in faith, hope and love precisely because so far as we are concerned, while still existing in her dimension of divine truth, she is the Church of those individuals who, as the people of God on pilgrimage, have embarked on that course in which the history of mankind opens up into the blessed mystery of God which is our own hope, but even as such the sustaining force of our life as well. We are critical in our attitude to the Church because this critique belongs to the very nature [160] of our faith itself since in union with the faith of the Church it is on the way to the eternal light. But this means that the critique itself derives its life from an assent to the Church as she exists in the concrete which is ever renewed in hope, causing our faith to rise above all temptations and constantly to renew itself.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[161]

9

ANONYMOUS CHRISTIANITY AND THE MISSIONARY TASK OF THE CHURCH

It is important to emphasize right at the outset that the following considerations do not, properly speaking, refer to that which we have for some time been accustomed to call 'anonymous Christianity',[1] nor yet to the missionary task of the Church as such,[2] but merely to the relationship which these two entities bear one to another. Nevertheless it is obvious that something must be said at least very briefly concerning the two realities, the relationship between which is intended to constitute the proper subject of these considerations.

In speaking of the universal missionary task of the Church as a right and a duty of the Church herself this is taken to include the basic duty of every man to become a Christian in an explicitly ecclesiastical form of Christianity, because it is quite impossible to separate these two entities from one another. The reason that this needs to be emphasized is that the objections raised against the doctrine of the anonymous Christianity of the [162] Church's universal missionary task[3] can likewise be raised and de facto are raised in virtue of the basic and indisputable vocation and duty of every individual to become a Christian in a sense that is manifested at the historical level, having an explicitly credal force and social dimension. The fact, therefore, that the following considerations refer more explicitly to the possibility of reconciling the doctrine of anonymous Christianity with the doctrine of the universal missionary task of the Church in itself also includes an enquiry into the question of why the doctrine of anonymous Christianity is reconcilable with the doctrine of the duty of every man to become a Christian in an explicit sense.

In discussing the question of anonymous Christianity here, therefore, we must begin by emphasizing that this subject implicitly involves two different questions: first the question of the inadequacy or appropriateness of the terminology under various possible aspects involved in the subject-matter, second the question of the objective reality referred to by this terminology independently of the problem of whether this reality is itself adequately described by this terminology.

So far as the terminology is concerned the question has already been raised of whether in enquiring into whether the choice of terms is adequate a further distinction should not be drawn between the concept of the 'anonymous Christian' and the concept of 'anonymous Christianity'. The well-known theologian Henri de Lubac, for instance, rejects the concept of

---

[1] The author has already given his views on this theme at length in other contexts On this point cf. also the bibliography supplied by K. Riesenhuber, 'Der anonyme Christ nach K. Rahner', ZKT 86 (1964), pp. 286-303; in addition to this now cf. K. Rahner, 'Anonymous Christians', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 390-398, and further idem, 'On the Theology of the Ecumenical Discussion', Theological Investigations XI (London, 1973), pp. 24-67; idem, 'Atheism and Implicit Christianity', Theological Investigations IX (London and New York, 1972), pp. 145-164; idem, 'Church, Churches and Religions', ibid., pp. 30-49; idem, 'Salvation of the Non-Evangelized', Sacramentum Mundi 4 (New York and London, 1969), pp. 79-81.

[2] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Grundprinzipien der heutigen Mission in der Kirche' Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/2 (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 46-80, esp. 55 ff.; further idem, 'Mission dringlicher denn je!' Die katholischen Missionen 86 (1967), pp. 3 ff.; B. A. Willems, 'Who Belongs to the Church?', Concilium I/1 (Dogma, 1965), pp. 62.-71; M. J. Le Guillou, 'Mission as an Ecclesiological Theme', Concilium 3/2 (Pastoral Theology) (1966), pp. 43-61; J. Schütte (ed.), Mission nach dem Konzil (Mainz, 1967); S. Brechter, 'Kommentar zum Dekret über die Missionstätigkeit der Kirche "Ad Gentes"', LTK Suppl. III (1968), 9-125.

[3] On these objections cf. also A Schmied, 'Prozess gegen den impliziten Glauben?', Theologie der Gegenwart 13 (1969), pp 103-107, and the article 'On the Theology of the Ecumenical Discussion', Theological Investigations XI, pp. 24-67, esp. nn. 14, 15.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'anonymous Christianity' but has no objections to the term 'anonymous Christian'.[4] Perhaps in order first to settle this ancillary question it might be pointed out that in German the term Christentum (= 'Christendom' or 'Christianity') can be used in at least two fairly distinct senses. Christentum can simply signify the sum total of real Christians. Hence anyone who concedes that there are anonymous Christians should not raise any objections against the point that in that case there is an anonymous Christentum (or Christendom) in this sense as well. The question becomes more difficult if by the term Christentum we understand that which constitutes a specific individual as a Christian ('Christianity'). For in that case it could be argued that one of the factors belonging to Christianity in this abstract sense is precisely its manifestation in history in the explicit [163] Christian creed, in a Church that is constituted as a society, in the fact that membership of the Church comes through baptism, and in all those other elements which go to make up full membership of the Church. On this basis the following argument might be put forward: if this explicit Church membership belongs to the very nature of Christianity, i.e. to that which constitutes an individual as a Christian in the full sense of the term, then there is no anonymous Christianity because the term 'anonymous' is precisely intended to exclude that historical and social manifestation which belongs to the essence of Christianity. But if we adopt this line of argument, basing it on this second sense of the term, then to be consistent we should also reject the concept of an 'anonymous Christian', because the objection mentioned above applies just as much to this. In our enquiry into the opportunism of this terminology, then, we can set on one side the distinction between the concepts of 'anonymous Christian' and 'anonymous Christianity' as being unimportant, and assume that for practical purposes and in the concrete we must either accept the possibility of using both terms or else we must reject both.

Even in the light of the foregoing observation it is certainly to be conceded that a certain difficulty is entailed in both concepts. For Christianity in the full sense of the term does involve as one of its factors a conscious awareness of faith, an explicit Christian creed, and a constitution of the Church as a society. And it is precisely these factors which are once more eliminated by the term 'anonymous'. This reservation is openly to be conceded. But before rejecting these terms on the grounds mentioned certain points still remain to be considered.

First the term 'anonymous' is certainly a term that, understood absolutely and in a general sense, does not provoke any special misunderstanding, and therefore is in itself legitimate. Yet the term 'anonymous' precisely expresses the fact that the individual thus designated is devoid of a name. For what leads to the naming of something is a process of explicitly reflecting upon a nature that is de facto real and existing, the explicit and public recognition of the fact that this nature is present in a specific existing individual. Now manifestly there can also be the sort of anonymity that is envisaged here, and it can be designated by the term 'anonymous' when the nature of the reality referred to is such that it makes a difference whether this state of conscious self-realization is or it not present in the anonymous being concerned, his conscious awareness of his own nature and his recognition by a distinguishing name. The term 'anonymous', therefore, is fully capable of expressing the fact that the state of anonymity is in a certain sense a state that is contrary to nature, that should not be [164] because there is an inherent tendency in the very nature of the being involved to overcome this state of namelessness. When we consider these possibilities latent in the term 'anonymous', a term which certainly contains a paradox, then the objection against the idea of 'anonymous Christianity' loses its force. 'Anonymous Christianity' serves precisely to express the fact that in the case of a Christianity asserted to be present in this way something is missing from the fulness of its due nature, something which it should have and towards which the nature already present is tending. A consideration of this kind does of course

[4] H. de Lubac, Geheimnis aus dem wir leben, Kriterien 6 (Einsiedeln, 1967), pp. 131-154, esp. 149 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

presuppose that the term 'Christianity' designates an extremely complex reality in which very many differing elements are contained, elements which do not as a matter of necessity simply have to be present at the same time, or which are removed altogether at one blow. But once we do make this assumption (and unquestionably it does apply to the term 'Christianity', as will be argued in fuller detail at a later stage from the very nature of the case) then the term 'anonymous Christianity' does not involve any intrinsic contradiction. It is not 'wooden iron' (to borrow a phrase from Hegel), for in that case this term signifies precisely the fact that while it is true that Christianity is already present in an incipient state it has not yet developed to the true fulness of its nature, not yet come to be expressed in its historical and social modality and visibility, and hence that it is precisely anonymous.

Two final points must be made with regard to this merely terminological question. First, concepts involving the use of two terms always entail a certain difficulty and obscurity. Language is never wholly precise. Concepts which are intended to express something more than the rudimentary data of sense experience, and which stand for extremely complex realities can hardly ever avoid a certain ambiguity and possibility of misunderstanding. In them we sum up an extremely complex reality for the sake of expressing it briefly. But in using a concept of this sort we omit certain aspects which are not unimportant for a right understanding of the concept involved. (As examples of this we might adduce such terms as original sin, infused virtue etc.). In such terms the adjective is precisely something more than a mere supplementary specification of the term which stands for the substantive. For it supplies a very important modification of this term (the peccatum referred to in the phrase 'peccatum originale' is not the same peccatum as in the phrase 'peccatum personale', and again the word 'virtue' as used in the phrase 'infused virtue' in its own intrinsic meaning stands for something different from virtue as used in the phrase 'acquired virtue'). So too the word 'Christianity' as used in the phrase 'anonymous Christianity' is far from signifying exactly and totally the same reality as [165] 'Christianity' as used in the phrase 'Christianity as explicitly manifested in the Church'. And this means that a linguistic process is being applied which is often found in other contexts as well, and which should not give rise to any misgivings.

To this a second point must be added: ultimately speaking it is not this terminology that is the essential point at all. Anyone who recognizes the existence of the realities signified by these terms and has a brief practical term of his own expressing these realities just as clearly or more clearly, and that too briefly enough for this term of his to be used in other contexts as epitomizing in brief the outcome of a long consideration can readily dispense with the terminology we are considering here.

We now come to the realities themselves. We will start with a brief word on what is meant by 'anonymous Christianity' or 'anonymous Christians'. What they signify is nothing else than the fact that according to the doctrine of the Church herself an individual can already be in possession of sanctifying grace, can in other words be justified and sanctified, a child of God, an heir to heaven, positively orientated by grace towards his supernatural and eternal salvation even before he has explicitly embraced a credal statement of the Christian faith and been baptized. What 'anonymous Christianity' signifies first and foremost is that interior grace which forgives man and gives him a share in the Godhead even before baptism[5]. Considered in its formal essence this concept still leaves open the question of which man can be thought of as justified before baptism, whether for example they are only the catechumens or – in accordance with Heb 11:6 – those who believe in the existence of God as the guarantor of the moral order, or even, over and above these, those too who have not arrived at any explicit acknowledgement of God or of their own guilt but nevertheless are striving to [5] Cf. K. Rabner, 'Universal Salvific Will', Sacramentum Mundi 5 (New York and London, 1969), pp. 405-409.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

live good lives even without God's grace (as is stated in the document of the Second Vatican Council, 'Lumen Gentium', No. 16). In the concept of anonymous Christianity formally as such nothing is decided with regard to this question. Of course in practice it is only meaningful to speak of anonymous Christianity if we assume that justifying grace can be present even in those cases in which there is no explicit orientation to Christianity and its official verbal revelation at the historical and conceptual level. Indeed as the Second Vatican Council explicitly teaches, it can even be present in those cases in which God has not yet been discovered at the level of conscious thought or as the subject of any explicit statement, and in which at [166] this explicit and conscious level the individual concerned believes himself to be an atheist.[6] The proposition being put forward here is that in this broadest sense there can be anonymous Christianity, i.e. justifying grace, even apart from any explicit Christianity. In other words that even in this infralapsarian order at least in the case of mature individuals no other limits can be set to salvation than those of grave subjective guilt. And this is something which cannot be established merely by the fact that in the course of his life the individual concerned has failed to arrive at any explicit Christianity. At this point we cannot embark upon any fuller justification of this thesis.

Obviously a long history lies behind the point at which it has come to be recognized. We might say that that history began with the recognition, already present in the New Testament, that under certain circumstances God imparts his Spirit even before baptism.[7] As stages in this history we might point, for instance to the teaching of Ambrose that even the catechumen who dies before baptism can attain to salvation,[8] or again the mediaeval doctrine of the votum baptismi or baptism of desire, through which the individual can be justified even before the sacrament of baptism,[9] a doctrine which was confirmed by the Council of Trent,[10] or again we [167] might point to the doctrine of the mediaeval theologians that in the normal cases the renewal of justification in one who has fallen into sin after baptism takes place even before priestly absolution has been given, indeed that properly speaking it must take place before this.[11] Or again we might point to the controversy among the post-Tridentine moralists as to which truths of faith have to be believed as a necessary means for being able to be justified. Those involved in this controversy were forced to arrive at ever milder and more generous solutions.[12] A further stage in the history leading up to this recognition is the teaching of the

---

[6] The relevant texts of the Council are discussed at length in K. Rahner, 'Atheism and Implicit Christianity', Theological Investigations IX (London and New York, 1972), pp. 145-164.

[7] Cf. Acts 10:47, with the explanations of this passage by M. Barth, Die Taufe - ein Sakrament? (Zürich, 1951), esp. pp. 154-159 and G. Beasley-Murray, Baptism in the New Testament (London, 1962).

[8] PL 16, 1374. Still more ancient is the doctrine of the power of martyrdom to justify. Taken together the two doctrines represent the counterpoint in scholastic theology to the thesis of the necessity of baptism as a medium (necessitas medii) of salvation: PSJ IV (Madrid, 3rd ed., 1959), pp. 147-170. Instructive for the whole range of problems entailed is E. Schillebeeckx, 'Begierdetaufe (als aussersakramentale Heilsweg)', LTK II (2nd ed., 1958), 112-115, and idem, Christus, Sakrament der Gottbegegnung (Mainz, 1960). On the radical turning-point which arose on this question at the Council through the doctrine of degrees of membership of the Church cf. A. Grillmeier, 'Einführung zur geschichtlichen und theologischen Problematik von Art. 14 (der Kirchenkonstitution)', LTK Suppl. I (1966), 194 ff.

[9] On this cf. A. M. Landgraf, Dogmengeschichte der Frühscholastik III/1 (Regensburg, 1954), pp. 210-253. This author is struck by the fact that the very nature of the question is such that the doctrine of 'sacramentum in voto' was formulated significantly earlier than, for instance, that of the causality of the sacraments. Indeed it must actually be acknowledged that precisely from the recognition of the sacramentum in voto which had already been achieved great difficulties arose for an understanding of the effectiveness of the sacraments (op. cit., p. 211).

[10] DS 1524, 1604, 1677.

[11] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Bussakrarnent', LTK II (2nd ed. 1958), 826-838, esp. 832 ff.

[12] Admittedly the whole question, right down to the present day, is overshadowed by the subject of the relationship between nature and grace, a subject which is very difficult to define. The post-Tridentine theology, in which there is a widespread tendency to identify faith in its explicit form more or less with supernatural grace

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Holy Office (of the 8th August 1949, against Leonard Feeney)[13] that even a merely implicit votum ecclesiae could be sufficient for justification, and a final stage is the teaching of the Second Vatican Council which in a noteworthy departure from established tradition holds that not even every kind of atheism (even when it is of a positive nature and of long duration) is ipso facto gravely sinful, but rather leaves this question open to be decided in each individual case and does not deny that the atheist who unequivocally follows his own conscience can obtain salvation.[14]

[168] Only a few remarks will be made concerning the missionary task of the Church. According to the evidence of the New Testament itself this task is in principle universal, i.e. fundamentally it is directed to all men in the sense that there is no a priori principle laying down that from the outset (for instance because of a specific nationality, a specific form of civilization, a specifically different religion) specific individuals are excluded so far as this missionary task of the Church is concerned as in principle and from the outset not being included in the offering of grace and the duty to become Christians. The universality of this missionary task does not mean, however, that this positive obligation of divine law for the Church must be actively pursued to the same extent at every moment in every situation or for every individual. The same of course applies too to the basic duty of every individual to become a Christian. This too varies greatly in its degree of actuality in each individual case according to the individual involved and the situation in which he stands.

There is a further question, that namely of whether right from the initial promulgation of the gospel and from the first Pentecost this objective duty has been laid upon all men and whether the history of this obligation is merely the history of how they come to recognize it in practice. Or alternatively whether the objective duty as such itself arises only in a process of historical development to which all men are subject, though obviously in that case the duty, the right and the dynamic force needed to engage in this historical process in order to bring it to the universal state which is proper to it are themselves subject to a process of becoming which is far from complete. But these are questions which can be passed over here.

Now that we have briefly described the two entities involved what is their relationship one to the other? It is only at this point that we come to our true theme. The crucial question, which is important for practical purposes as well, is whether these two entities can exist in unison or whether the one removes the other. There is a practical problem implicitly contained in this question, that namely of whether the will to fulfil the universal missionary in general, does at first seem to leave no possibility of salvation for the individual in the non-Christian sphere who cannot give his faith any expression ('implicit' here signifies the truth which is contained but not expressed in a given statement). The whole question, therefore, is brought to a head, however strange this may sound, by the problem of unbaptized children who now appear as a prototype example of the unbeliever in general. As a logical outcome of this Billot develops the idea of a limbo for the pagans.

---

On the way in which the question was framed by post-Tridentine theology on this point cf. S.Harent, 'Infidèles', DTC VII/2 (Paris, 1923), 1726-1930. Now however it is coming to be recognized that the state of 'pure' nature never exists in the concrete at all. Rather man is placed all along in the sphere of history and it is here that he is summoned by God. Now if this is true then it also necessarily follows that 'historical' man as such and 'historical' revelation are in a positive sense mutually conditioning entities. The offering of salvation by God is already in existence prior to the practical proclamation of it, and is the intrinsic factor that makes it possible.

[13] DS 3866-3873. A historical survey of the whole affair is to be found in C. Goddard Clarke, The Loyolas and the Cabots (Boston, 1950).

[14] Cf. n. 6. A similar development is also to be traced in other problematical areas. Thus the Second Vatican Council declares that man has the right to religious freedom (Decree on Religious Freedom No. 2), that God 'in ways known to himself can lead those inculpably ignorant of the gospel to that faith without which it is impossible to please him' (Decree on the Missions, No. 7), that the other 'ecclesiastical communities' have in principle a saving significance (Decree on Ecumenism, Nos. 19-24). On this cf. also the literature adduced in n. 2.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

task of the Church is not deprived of its force in the case of one who is convinced of the possibility and the existence of an anonymous Christianity. Of course this question can also be put the other way round, and we can approach the question from the opposite point of view by asking whether any genuine missionary energy is conceivable, at any rate today, otherwise than by assuming that an anonymous [169] Christianity of this kind is already present as an enabling condition for a preaching of the faith in that individual to whom this missionary preaching is addressed.

It is clear that to supply an answer to these questions which would be satisfactory in every respect would require a whole theology of mission, its nature and its ultimate justification.[15] And this is something which can neither be prescribed or assumed here for the very reason that there is no such theology at all of a completely satisfying kind or as generally accepted.[16] What we shall have to say with regard to our present problem, therefore, must be presented and understood with this reservation.

First we may surely say that in order to be possible or to have any hope of success missionary preaching necessarily presupposes that which we may call by the name of anonymous Christianity or by some other name. On any right understanding of the nature of the Christian faith it is clear that a missionary preaching is possible only if we presuppose the grace of faith (at least as offered). The word of God as preached can only be heard and received as the word of God through this grace of faith.[17] Obviously however this should not be taken to signify merely some kind of psychological assistance provided by God in order to overcome the intellectual or emotional obstacles involved, which derive from the nature of the hearer, his cultural situation, the kind of personal history he has undergone etc., and which always make it difficult to understand or accept any kind of teaching that is hard. The object of faith as such can itself be recognized and accepted only with the help of supernatural grace imparting a share in the divine life. Now at least according to the Thomist doctrine, which after all is relevant to this point and which has the weight of ancient tradition behind it, this grace is precisely something more than [170] what it was maintained to be by a Molinist school of thought against Thomism and against Suarez, namely a mere ontological and subconscious alteration of the act of faith. Rather it also implies a genuinely conscious alteration and imparts a dimension of understanding which cannot be attained to by any merely natural act, having a formal object which is specifically supernatural.[18] Only in the light of grace can we recognize and accept the light of the gospel. The grace of faith is the necessary prior condition for the teaching of the faith. But it would be to suppose the [15] On this cf. also the Decree on the Missions of the Second Vatican Council, which in its first chapter attempts to lay down the basic principles governing missionary activity, and cf. also the relevant commentary in LTK Suppl. III (1968), 9-125; J. Hampe (ed.), Die Autorität der Freiheit III (Munich, 1967), pp. 518-573; E. Dhanis and A. Schönmetzer (edd.), Acta Congressus Internationalis de Theologia Concilii Vatican II (Rome, 1968), pp. 340-442; Y. Congar, 'Theologische Grundlegung', Mission nach dem Konzil edited by J. Schütte (Mainz, 1967), pp. 134-172.

---

[16] In fact the missionary decree likewise has avoided attaching itself to any of the theories of mission developed hitherto.

[17] This idea is more fully presented in the section entitled 'Wort Gottes', LTK X (2nd ed. 1965), 1235-1238. In this connection cf. also K. Rahner, J. Ratzinger, Revelation and Tradition, Quaestiones Disputatae 17 (Freiburg, 1966); K. Rahner, 'Scripture and Tradition', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 98-112; idem, 'Scripture and Tradition', Sacramentum Mundi 6 (London and New York, 1970), pp. 54-57.

[18] A more detailed treatment of this point is to be found in K. Rahner, 'Concerning the Relationship between Nature and Grace', Theological Investigations I (London and Baltimore, 1961), pp. 297-317; idem, 'Reflections on the Experience of Grace', Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 86-90; idem, 'Nature and Grace', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 165-188; idem, 'Gnadenerfahrung', LTK IV (2nd ed., 1960), 1001-1002; idem, 'The Existential', Sacramentum Mundi 2 (New York and London, 1968), pp. 304-307; J. Alfaro, 'Formalobjekt, übernaturliches', LTK IV (2nd ed., 1960), 207-208.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

miraculous, almost to indulge in mythological ideas, if we were to hold that this grace of faith was conferred only at that moment at which the preaching of the gospel actually reached the ears of those to whom it was addressed. In this moment it does indeed become actual, effective and demanding, but this is precisely in virtue of the fact that it has been present all along and belongs to the enduring existential modalities of man, albeit at the level of the supernatural, in the same way as the natural spiritual faculties are present all along in man even though they only become actual and effective when they encounter an external object of experience which corresponds to them.

For our present purposes we cannot provide any more detailed justification for this conception of grace as involving a unity of so-called habitual and actual grace.[19] From the point of view of dogmatic theology, however, it cannot be contested, and is at basis already contained in the Thomist doctrine laying down that the act by which justification is appropriated takes place in the power of the habitual grace which is already present. Now if we accept this classic Thomist conception we need only to go on to consider a further point with regard to that habitual grace which is offered as the condition enabling the subject to act for his own salvation, and which, according to Thomas, is logically prior to the free act by which salvation is appropriated in the subject's own personal life. There is no longer any difficulty in regarding this grace as constituting, even from the temporal point of view, an abiding grace-given existential modality. Then [171] without further consideration it can be assumed that the preacher of the gospel who seeks to impart faith as an appropriation of grace addresses himself, and must address himself (since it is impossible to preach the faith without the grace of faith) to an individual who already possesses justifying grace at least as offered, and indeed, it may be, as already freely accepted in an implicit way. The individual concerned would in this sense be an anonymous Christian. The missionary task, therefore, must be one that can exist together with anonymous Christianity because on theological grounds we must hold that this missionary task presupposes the existence of the anonymous Christian as the only possible hearer of the gospel message.

But we can view this possibility of union and mutual interrelationship between the missionary task and anonymous Christianity from the aspect of anonymous Christianity itself. Even though anonymous Christianity is prior to explicit Christianity it does not render it superfluous. On the contrary, it itself demands this explicit Christianity in virtue of its own nature and its own intrinsic dynamism. In order to achieve a clearer recognition of this point we may begin by stating the following general thesis:

In the general economy of salvation it is a perfectly logical process for the grace that creates salvation, and indeed constitutes the individual as saved, to be both logically and temporally prior to the sacramental act which signifies it. Yet as such and in virtue of its own intrinsic dynamism it itself demands to be realized in this visible sacramental mode and in the dimension of the Church. It presses forward towards this sacramental incarnation of itself and thereby ensures that it is not impossible for this effective sacramental symbol of this same grace to be itself a cause of the grace and not merely an outward expression of it such as ultimately speaking would make no difference.

This thesis requires a little further explanation. But if it were not correct, then basically speaking it would no longer be possible to explain how in that case Paul can sometimes attribute justification to faith without baptism, and elsewhere attribute it to baptism alone. We have already emphasized above that on the occasion of the baptism of Cornelius Peter insists upon the fact that Cornelius can and indeed must be baptized because he has already received the Holy Spirit.[20] The thesis we have put forward is simply an application of the fundamental [19] On this cf. the expositions of K. Rahner under the heading 'Gnade', LTK IV (2nd ed., 1960), 991-1000.

[20] See n. 7.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

doctrine concerning salvation history as a whole to the salvation of the individual, the doctrine, namely, that the grace of Christ, as that of Christ himself was temporally present throughout the whole of salvation history and was prior to its [172] manifestation in the Ursakrament of history which is Christ himself, and that it is precisely in virtue of this fact that it issued in the fullness of time in the eschatological victory of the crucified and risen Lord.[21] This basic thesis is also to be found in many of the more particular doctrines of sacramental theology.[22] Properly speaking, when we come to baptism we must already have faith, hope and love, in other words the state of justification. It is meaningless in the context with which we are concerned to seek to raise the value and significance of the sacrament itself by saying that a sacrament can justify even one who only possesses imperfect repentance and so has not yet received the grace of justification. This may be correct, although a point that would still have to be considered is that according to Thomas it is precisely this sacramental grace that raises man in his personal life from being an 'attritus' to being a 'contritus', in other words that after all what is bestowed upon man is not that deed of salvation in virtue of which he justifies himself in an opus operantis.[23] Abstracting from this, we must say in all realism and against all the strangely heated controversies between contritionists and attritionists in post-Tridentine theology that while it is true that we can distinguish between imperfect and perfect repentance, in practice this distinction has no special significance since he who by an act of perfect repentance has achieved an unequivocal rejection of sin (something that must also be present in imperfect repentance) no longer has any difficulty in loving God with his whole heart, or in choosing him as the goal of his own personal life in an act of true charity, since he necessarily must have a freely determined goal for his personal life of this kind. Yet ex supposito he no longer seeks it in any finite good which he has sinfully made his absolute goal. Even in baptism, then, the situation is that through it an anonymous Christian becomes an explicit Christian, and in any case through such a baptism he may indeed be validly baptized, but [173] not justified. In the case of adult baptism the justification is prior to the baptism itself and it is precisely in baptism that it achieves its manifestation at the ecclesiastical and social level. This does not entail any denial of the efficacy of the sacrament as conferring grace, or make it impossible.[24] For first we can and must say that on any showing the sacrament increases the justifying grace even though this increase in its turn is mediated through the personal intensification of the subjective act in the reception of the sacrament. And secondly it must be pointed out that as 'causa finalis' of the history of a dynamic grace, as the incarnation and effective symbol of this grace, the sacrament can constitute one side of a mutually conditioning relationship being the effect and the cause at the same time of the original grace.

---

[21] On this conception of saving history cf. K. Rahner, 'History of the World and Salvation History', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966) pp. 97-114; A. Darlap, 'Fundamentale Theologie der Heilsgeschichte', Mysterium Salutis I (Einsiedeln, 1965), pp. 3-156; K. Berger and A. Darlap, 'History of Salvation (Salvation History)', Sacramentum Mundi 5 (New York and London, 1970), pp. 411-419; E. Klinger, Offenbarung im Horizont der Heilsgeschichte (Zürich, 1969).

[22] The interpretation of what is meant by sacrament presupposed here is present more fully in K. Rahner, 'Personal and Sacramental Piety', Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore, 1963), pp. 109-133; idem, The Church and the Sacraments, Quaestiones Disputatae 9 (Freiburg, 1963); idem, 'Sakramente als Grundfunktionen der Kirche', Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie I (Freiburg, 1964), pp. 323-332.

[23] On the series of connected questions here a more detailed treatment is to found in K. Rahner, 'Problems concerning Confession', Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 190-206; cf. also n. 11.

[24] This causality is investigated more fully in the author's studies, 'The Theology of the Symbol', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 221-252 and 'Sakrament', LTK IX (2nd ed. 1964), 225-230.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

All that we have stated above finds expression once more, and that too in a way that is commonly even more emphatic, in the teaching concerning the sacrament of penance. For Thomas Aquinas and the whole of theology prior to him (Scotus was the first to introduce any change) it was regarded as obvious that when the sinner came to the sacrament of penance he had already been justified once more (through penitence), and indeed in normal cases actually had to be justified in order to approach the sacrament of penance. And the theologians did not feel the smallest difficulty in regarding the sacrament of penance for all this as a sacrament that was necessary for salvation. They did not in the least feel it to be any objection to ask how in that case the sacrament was still necessary and meaningful, seeing that the res sacramenti, the justification, is already conferred even before the reception of the sacrament.[25] Manifestly in their theology of saving history and grace at the collective and individual levels it was obvious to them that the signs of grace as found in the historical dimension and in the Church were not rendered superfluous and meaningless by the fact that grace is already prior to them, for there is an incarnational order such that this grace itself of its very nature seeks its historical embodiment in the [174] word and above all in the sacrament, so that it itself would be denied if an individual sought in principle to frustrate this incarnational dynamism inherent in grace itself.

What is so much taken for granted in all the traditional theology concerning the relationship between grace and sacrament can unhesitatingly be extended to the relationship between grace and the word. For we also have need of grace in order to hear the word of the gospel, and even this word of the gospel can and must be conceived of as a kind of incarnation of grace at the level of human conceptualization in its objectifying and speculative function. For if grace consists in the self-bestowal of the triune God which of its own intrinsic nature seeks for the historical incarnation of the Logos and is, for that reason everywhere and in all cases a grace of Christ,[26] then it follows that the total reality which faith as articulated in words expresses is already present in this grace considered as the self-bestowal of God. And from this we can understand why it should be a property inherent in the very nature of this grace to press forward to this state of conceptual objectification which we call the doctrine of the faith at the level of the collective history of revelation and the personal history of faith. For it is in this explicitation as the doctrine of the faith that he who has been endowed with grace and the grace itself achieve a state of full and conscious self-possession. Grace, therefore, presses on to its state of conceptual objectification in the preaching of faith and is prior to this as its enabling condition. The explicit preaching of faith is not superfluous, because the grace which is preached is prior to this preaching as the condition of it and as the content of its preaching. Precisely because it is prior to the preaching the grace itself demands that it shall be preached. Now to say this is ipso facto to say too – for it is only expressing this in different words – that anonymous Christianity does not render explicit Christianity superfluous, but rather itself demands it, and that there would no longer be any anonymous Christianity, or at most it would only continue to exist as a judgement against the individual concerned, if he upon whom it is bestowed as offering were radically to close himself to any explicit Christianity.

---

[25] In this connection the theology of penance of the very recent past has provided a new development of the ancient conception of 'reconciliatio cum ecclesia' considered as an essential element (res et sacramentum) in the sacramental process. On this cf. amongst others K. Rahner, 'Penance as an Additional Act of Reconciliation with the Church', Theological Investigations X (London and New York, 1972), pp. 125-149. This idea could have significance for the future from the standpoint of general ecclesiology as well. For at the Second Vatican Council the Church as a whole is interpreted as the sacrament of salvation for the whole world.

[26] For fuller details on this point cf. K. Rahner, 'Der dreifaltige Gott als transzendenter Urgrund der Heilsgeschichte', Mysterium Salutis II (Einsiedeln, 1967), pp. 317-401, esp. 369 ff.; idem, 'Die Kirche als Präsenz der Wahrheit und Liebe Gottes', Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie I (Freiburg, 1964), pp. 121-131.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In the light of the consideration so far put forward it is valid to hold that the theology of mission, of the meaning of and the necessity for mission, requires in part to be interpreted afresh. In former times the [175] necessity for mission was regarded more or less explicitly and radically from the point of view of the personal salvation of the individual, and the reasons for this necessity were sought here. Mission was regarded as necessary on the grounds that those individuals to whom no mission was directed would be lost. It is true that even in former times certain theories were adumbrated in order to be able to explain God's infralapsarian will to save all men universally, such theories as that of the private enlightenment of a particular individual or that of an original revelation handed down to later ages. By these means it was sought to explain how, at least in certain instances, a real faith in a supernatural revelation (taking this to be the necessary prior condition for justification) was at least in principle possible, and so too how justification itself was possible in principle, even without the explicit message of Christianity. But it was held that in practice this sort of situation arose only in a few exceptional cases, and these exceptions were explained by referring to original sin or to the universality of the breaking of the natural moral law, this being taken, even in the infralapsarian age, to justify the withholding of the supernatural grace of faith on God's part despite the conditional will of God to save all men.

In this connection, and in order correctly to evaluate such ideas, it must be realized that prior to the modern age European theology had no true idea of the enormous numbers of individuals outside Christianity or of the immense length of non-Christian history. Thus in arriving at the basic ideas of the traditional theology of mission the following assumption was conceivable: Mission is aimed at the salvation of individuals who otherwise simply could not avoid being lost, and that too with a necessity which is properly speaking prior to any question of the grace of faith as offered being rejected in any individual case. Today we can recognize the full length and breadth of non-Christian human history, and evaluate the power of the Cross of Christ at its true worth, and in view of this we can no longer assume that a majority of mankind is destined to perdition. Formerly this was assumed, and that too not merely on the grounds that they refused the grace of faith as offered to them – in other words not on the grounds that they had specifically rejected Jesus Christ – but for different reasons. And conversely today we are in a position to consider more clearly and with a deeper theological insight the question of how an individual who is not brought face to face with the explicit preaching of the gospel can still be brought, albeit at a quite unexplicit level, to an authentic decision of faith, and how he can thereby attain to a state of justification through faith (a theme which obviously cannot be developed in any fuller detail at this point). Now in view of all this we can and must [176] take it as established that it is possible for all men, including non-Christians, to arrive at a state of justification by having supernatural grace conferred upon them. But if this is the case then we cannot deduce the meaning and necessity of the Church's missionary task primarily or exclusively from the salvation of the individual, as though apart from this (abstracting from a few special cases) he would be lost unless he were subjected to the preaching of the gospel and baptism.

A positive evaluation of the meaning of mission is both possible along these lines, and in a true sense already given in what has been said so far. The grace of God which is intended effectively to redeem all has an incarnatorial character. It wills to extend itself into all the dimensions of human life, and in other words to take effect and find expression in the historical and social dimensions of this as well. This grace is intended of its very nature to be constitutive of the Church. Mission and the missionary actively contribute to this incarnatorial dynamism of grace. Of course this represents only a brief indication of the theology of mission, which could and should be supplemented and deepened on the basis of scripture, and also, for instance, in the light of the missionary decree of the Second Vatican Council by the insight that mission is directed not exclusively to the individual in his own personal quest for salvation, but no less primarily to peoples and civilizations as such. Mission consists in a sending out to all people. It has the task in saving history of making Christ, his gospel and his grace present among all peoples as such in their own specific histories and cultures, and thereby of achieving a quite new incarnatorial presence of Christ himself in the world. Once and for all Christianity is not intended merely to assure a salvation conceived of embryonically and almost in abstract terms for the individual in the other-worldly dimension, but is rather intended to make God's grace manifest here below in all its possible forms and in all historical spheres and contexts. The palpable dimension of the present world itself is intended to be made Christian to the utmost possible extent, because it is precisely not merely the other world that belongs to God and his Christ, as though he secretly rescued a few isolated individuals out of a merely secular world. On the contrary this world too belongs to him, the earthly dimension, history, the peoples, and also the history which present-day humanity itself sets itself actively to shape, instead of merely passively enduring it.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This new interpretation of the theology of mission in no sense involves any assertion that mission has no connection whatever with the personal salvation of the individual. Even if it is maintained that there is a basic possibility of salvation and a genuine opportunity of achieving salvation for [177] all at all times, and even outside the sphere of any explicit preaching of the gospel (an opportunity which is lost only through the personal fault of the individual), still this is in no sense to assert that the salvific situation and the opportunity of achieving salvation constitute an entity that is undeviatingly the same, equally present at all times, and for every individual man. It is obvious that mission improves the situation in which salvation can be achieved and the opportunity of salvation for the individual, even though at the same time it must be recognized that according to the New Testament the situation in which salvation can be achieved is also rendered more radical thereby, and so in a certain sense more dangerous too. In principle and quite in general the following statement may be applied to the conscious objectification of the existential modalities of human life, even though in principle these can be freely realized at a quite implicit and unconscious level: the conscious objectification of these modalities, while it does not necessarily or as a matter of compulsion bring about the actual realization of them or the radical modification of personal human life which such realization entails, still does induce conditions which are very favourable to this realization. Otherwise any metaphysical anthropology, for instance, would have no significance for concrete personal living whatever, but would simply be of concern to those who had a purely speculative interest in metaphysics for its own sake. If man is consciously aware of who he is and what he is making of himself of his own freedom, the chance that he will succeed in this self-achievement of his and arrive at a radical self-fulfilment is greater than if he merely possesses and fulfils his own humanity at a merely inert and unconscious level. Hence the conscious self-realization of a hitherto anonymous Christianity brought about through missionary preaching implies on the one hand the achievement of a more radical dimension of responsibility and on the other a greater chance of this Christianity interiorly bestowed by grace being brought to its fulness in all dimensions precisely as an explicit Christianity and in a state of radical freedom. Nor let it be said that if the only difference between explicit Christianity and anonymous Christianity is that the opportunity of achieving salvation afforded by the former is greater (instead of saying that salvation is initially bestowed by that explicit Christianity), this must after all have the effect of weakening missionary zeal. It is perfectly possible for there to be an absolute duty in human life to offer one's neighbour a greater chance of freely achieving the fulness of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation himself even when in principle the chance of such full self-realization was present all along even without offering him this further opportunity.[27]

[178] No father questions the fact that he is still far from being dispensed from the duty of giving his child the opportunity of having the most favourable start in life that he can merely because his child is already assured a minimal opportunity in life. Love strives for what is greater, and this striving is not to be accounted as greed. In fact it is precisely this striving which constitutes that love which is an absolute duty. This also applies to mission, for it is in this that love for God and neighbour is realized. The doctrine of anonymous Christianity as applied to the theology of mission does not exclude, among other things, a right understanding of the reference which mission has to the personal salvation of the individual.

[27] A similar line of argument is to be found in chapter II of the Decree on the Missions.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[179]

PART TWO

Church and Society

[181]

10

THE QUESTION OF THE FUTURE

A ‘political theology’, whatever more precise interpretation we may place on such a phrase, implies a certain understanding of the questions of whether and how an individual can know something of the future. This surely calls for no further explanation. It can therefore represent a contribution to the discussion of ‘political theology’ if the question of what the future holds is considered precisely as a question. In adopting this approach we must emphasize right from the outset that we can only discuss this question from the viewpoint of the theologian. This means that our enquiry into the future cannot be presented from the viewpoint of the futurologist,[1] the practitioner of cybernetics, the politologist, or even the philosopher. By comparison with all these the theologian is certainly the one who knows the least of all with regard to any ‘this-worldly’ future, and is indeed the one who, as we shall shortly have to explain more fully, makes this ignorance of his the true pith and essence of his message, regarding it not as a mere afterthought or peripheral phenomenon by comparison with some knowledge of the future, but rather as that which as a theologian he is striving precisely to bring and to keep before men’s eyes. Docta ignorantia futuri is from the outset the theme that is proper to the theologian, which he must put forward in season and out of season, and whether it is attended to or falls on deaf ears. In these preliminary remarks it must first be emphasized simply by way of warning that the theologian is no futurologist.

[182]

I

The moment the precise terms are adverted to of the title to this study, ‘The Question of the Future’, it is immediately apparent that the point of concern is not to define in terms of actual content what actually can or will be the case in the future. This question of the future is to be considered, rather, precisely as a question – indeed as the question which man himself constitutes and which he is impelled to pose to himself from something more than mere curiosity. What we are enquiring into, therefore, is the question of the future and not the actual content of the future. If the theologian is he who inculcates that docta ignorantia futuri spoken of above, then an enquiry of this kind into the question itself is certainly appropriate to him, because he, if anyone, is most of all in a position to say something about this.

[1] The concept of futurology was applied for the first time in 1943 in the United States by O. K. Flechtheim as a characterization of the work of systematically coping with the problems of the future. The programme for this science of the future can be summed up in a few key-words: research into the future, shaping of the future, and interpreting the future. An initial introduction to the range of problems involved together with a comprehensive bibliography is supplied by O. K. Flechtheim, Futurologie – Möglichkeiten und Grenzen, Projekte und Modelle No. 3 (Frankfurt, 1968).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is proper to Christian theology of its very nature, and in virtue of its contemporary state, that it should be concerned with a question of this kind. It is proper to it of its very nature because that Christian faith which is the subject of theological speculation, the recognition in hope of that absolute future of man which is God, lays down that this absolute future of the world is not simply offered as a mere open possibility, but in Jesus Christ is infallibly and victoriously promised. And this is something that man himself confesses. Finally it is appropriate to Christianity of its very nature to concern itself with this question because however true it may be that this absolute future is constituted by God and by his activity it still remains true that the acceptance of it on man's part is undertaken only in his own personal history when he adopts a right and responsible relationship to that future of his which has to be wrought out by himself in this present world.

It is true that in Christian theology eschatology is treated as a special branch falling at the end of dogmatic theology. But for the reasons we have indicated above eschatology also constitutes the whole of Christian theology or at least a formal structural principle for all theological statements.[2] For regardless of whether this is explicitly adverted to or not we only know what is meant by God if we recognize our own state as being orientated towards an absolute future. We only understand what saving history and revelation history mean if we live through them and recognize [183] them as the history of the promise of salvation extending more and more to the very roots of our being. We only understand what it means to say that Jesus Christ is the incarnate Word of God if we believe in him as the one who will 'come again', in other words as he who belongs to the future and as such constitutes the Word of God's absolute promise of himself to the world. We only understand what faith is if we recognize clearly the edifice of hope that is built upon it, in which it accepts God's revelation as promise. We only value the Christian sacraments at their true and intrinsic worth if we also understand them as signa prognostica, to adopt the parlance of Thomas Aquinas. If we define the essence of Christianity as consisting in love of God and of man then we cannot overlook the fact that this love lives by, and necessarily must live by, the expectation in hope that that which is the counterpart to this love has still to come in the future which belongs to the God whom we love and the humanity that we love. And it is this that renders this love authentic, definitive, and blessed.

It is in the very nature of theology as such, therefore, that the question of the future belongs to it as one of its basic questions. But this question is rendered still more urgent in the light of the contemporary state of faith and of theology. The world in which man lives has been set in motion. It has become possible to plan and shape it. Man himself is no longer merely one who puts up with himself, makes himself the subject of his own metaphysical speculations or religious contemplations in the sphere of his theoretical reason, no longer one who 'works' himself in the same way as he might work a machine already in existence and working properly until it was worn out. On the contrary man is, at least in the first instance, the one who has made something of himself, one who at the individual and collective levels alike, makes plans and projects for himself – in a certain sense takes control of himself, not merely drawing out what is already there, but creatively discovering that which is not there, that

[2] This point has long been treated of clearly and thematically in its own right in the work of H. Cox, W. Pannenberg and J. Moltmann, where theology is actually interpreted as eschatology. The most recent presentation of this position is to be found in J. Moltmann, 'Die Zukunft als neues Paradigma der Transzendenz', Internationale Dialog-Zeitschrift 1 (1969), pp. 2-13. From the Catholic side the author who has probably followed this position most consistently is J. B. Metz who, in view of the primacy of the future in our contemporary world, conceives of theology primarily as providing an eschatological and social critique. A survey of this point which is concerned with the range of problems we are discussing, and which at the same time includes a prise de position with regard to the problems of futurology, is provided by W. D. Marsch, Zukunft (Stuttgart, 1969).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which belongs to Utopia. And it is in this way that man shapes the present in the light of the future. However incipient all this may seem to be, [184] however true it may be that even today man still constantly has to endure himself and the world in which he lives instead of only shaping it creatively, the prospect is still opened up to him of a future which can be shaped, and does not merely have to be endured. The future is no longer merely something which he has to wait for, something which is merely hoped for, merely dreamed about. Instead it is a reality which has achieved power to influence the present itself and in that sense has become the real.

There is such a reality as cybernetics; it is possible to develop complicated computer-programmes and the planning of the futurologists has its validity. For Christian theology this raises the question of what the relationship is between modern futurology and Christian eschatology. In earlier times what entered into the present was an eschatology and a hope for that which was not the outcome of man's planning, not capable of being developed by man himself. Today there is a future into which the designs of the futurologists enter, one which is orientated towards that which can be planned and developed. And this gives rise to the question of whether this present-day futurology has replaced the old eschatology, whether the old eschatology constitutes merely the obsolete mythological form or the preliminary adumbration of present-day futurology, or alternatively whether this futurology is embedded in the 'this-worldly' sphere of human living in such a way that this earthly sphere itself taken as a whole, despite the radical changes which it has undergone, still constantly remains circumscribed by that which constitutes the goal of Christian eschatology and hope. In any case Christian theology as eschatology has arrived at a state in which quite new demands are made upon it precisely in respect of its special and peculiar role as eschatology. Moreover it is obvious without any further discussion that a 'political theology' regards these questions as questions which essentially belong to the subject-matter which is most proper to itself.

II

Before applying ourselves directly to a theological enquiry into the question of the future certain conceptual distinctions have to be drawn which, for the sake of clarity, must be considered first even though the objective justification for them will appear only when we come to treat directly of the theme which is the proper subject of these considerations. We have to distinguish between the absolute future which is God himself and another future, whether more proximate or more remote, which [185] belongs to this world. It is self-evident that precisely at this stage we cannot supply any answer to the question of what right we have to assume at this point that the term 'God' is understood, or to introduce it into our considerations in order to define what is meant by the phrase 'absolute future'. Nor must it be denied that under certain circumstances a 'political theology' must proceed and is justified in proceeding in the opposite direction, in other words precisely from the experience of being orientated towards an absolute future. Taking this experience as its starting-point, therefore, a theology of this kind must undertake a radical critique, and one that has to be achieved ever afresh, of the present and future with which we are confronted at any given stage, for it is only so that we can arrive at an understanding of what is meant by God, and precisely in this way that such an approach becomes a political theology.

With the proviso that even when we have drawn this distinction between the two kinds of future we have still not arrived at any unambiguous conclusion with regard to the mutual

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

relationship between them,[3] we may define this distinction as follows: the absolute future is God himself or the act of his absolute self-bestowal which has to be posited by him alone. The effect which this produces does not constitute any specific event within the world, representing one particular element in it such as can be defined in 'this worldly' categories. Rather it is a specification of the world as a whole, comprehending the whole of reality and determining where its consummation is to be achieved. To this extent it has a transcendental character. Properly speaking, therefore, it cannot be planned or brought about by man either, because as the total consummation of reality as a whole it cannot per definitionem be brought about by any one particular element within this reality. This is neither to exclude nor to deny a further point regarding the subjectivity of man through which he is confronted with himself and with the whole of reality in knowledge and freedom. In virtue of this subjectivity of his he can and must accept this [186] totality of the consummation of the finite reality of the world, in other words the absolute future (with the spontaneous power that is proper to this), and in this sense the absolute future will be brought about by man's own act.

The 'this-worldly' future of man signifies that which at any specific moment, conceived of as the present, remains to be achieved, but which will come about within this world and within the dimensions of space and time belonging to it as a particular event or a specific state of this world. 'This-worldly' futures of this kind, which per definitionem always remain open to a further future, are themselves in turn radically distinct from one another. There are such futures or elements in such futures which can and must be thought of as conforming to the pattern of an evolutionary process determined by merely casual factors. In these that which belongs to the future simply constitutes the succession of the series of situations prevailing at any given time as determined by natural law, and the content of the future unfolds from the correlation of these succeeding elements. In such futures or elements of the future the content of the future is the slave who is governed by strict laws, the sheer outcome of present and past. Such futures are to be thought of not in eschatological terms but rather in protological or archaeological ones. The law of the beginnings is the law of the end. The future is the return to the arche, to paradise. Then, inasmuch as any element of personal history can still be discerned in such a process the watchword can only be: 'Back to the sources', for there that which the future is capable of producing is already implicitly contained in its pure and original form. In the sphere of the biological the potential immortality which the process of reproduction through the adult's act of generation is intended to assure would constitute one kind of a future conceived of in terms such as these. And yet a conceptual image of this kind would no longer possess any clarifying force even so far as a transspecific process of evolution is concerned.

But there are quite different futures or elements in such futures, the special quality of which cannot be conceived of in terms of any such mechanistic or evolutionary conceptual pattern: future as that which is radically new, as the creative factor which is brought about in the process by which man freely shapes his own history without having simply been contained from the first in hidden form in the origins, or consisting in a mere variation of constitutive elements present all along from the origins, a variation which is ultimately [3] This proviso must be especially emphasized here because it is important to guard against the misunderstanding that here a 'transcendence-immanence' theology is being restored as a separate polarization in each case. What we are concerned with here rather is precisely to overcome this opposition by means of an orientation towards God as coming, and as already present in Jesus as the future of this world. This idea, and the question of the necessity for a process of mediation, are also factors of decisive importance in the author's earlier studies. Cf. K. Rahner, 'Das Christentum und der "neue Mensch"', Schriften zur Theologie III (7th ed., 1967), pp. 159-179; 'Marxist Utopia and the Christian Future of Man', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 59-68; also the articles on eschatology, Theological Investigations X (London and New York, 1972), pp. 235-291.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

indifferent and to be conceived of simply in spatial and quantitative terms. It is a fact that there can in this sense be an element which is genuinely and radically new in such a future, and that taken by [187] itself any evolutionary conceptual pattern as characterized above would fail to do justice to the realities. It is a fact that it is this element of the radically new that provides the truly qualitative transition, and that at least the history of personal development implies a process of genuine self-transcendence. But all this cannot be considered here in its own right, and must be taken as recognized.[4] A further point which must likewise remain undiscussed here is whether, how, in what sense, and why even a future that is brought about creatively in this sense nevertheless still has a cause in its turn and is not generated simply from the void, from nothingness. On this point we must confine ourselves to stating quite briefly on the basis of a Christian understanding of God that the Christian calls this cause the origin of a future of this kind which is brought about by a free and creative process, by God, recognizing that it cannot come from mere empty nothingness. It must further be stated that the Christian, precisely in order to allow this genuine kind of future to emerge and to achieve its own authentic reality does not regard God as an element in the unfolding process of personal history, but precisely as the condition for any genuine future such that it does not reduce this to a mere process of evolution. It does not reduce it in this sense even in those cases or at those points at which this future is not identified with God himself as the absolute. The distinction within the 'this-worldly' future between that which is evolutive and that which is free and creative, is of course not intended to be conceived of as though in the sphere of the human these two futures simply existed side by side as two separate entities. On the contrary they are elements in the 'this-worldly' future of man which mutually demand, and dialectically condition one another. For this future of man constantly depends upon previously existing factors from which it derives by a process of evolution, and at the same time always contains also a creative and utopian element which is underivable, in virtue of which man does not merely achieve a further extension of his own past and present, but in a real and radical sense surpasses it.

III

The first thesis which we propose to establish runs as follows: The content of the Christian preaching consists in the question, which we maintain [188] open, into the absolute future, and properly speaking in nothing else besides. One point is very remarkable: Christians and non-Christians alike have the impression that in its doctrine and practice Christianity is an extremely complicated affair, a highly developed system including a multitude of factors, a doctrine which far exceeds any other philosophy of life in its claim to knowledge and the ability to supply answers.

The true position, however, if we pay close attention to the preaching of the Christian message and really allow it to impart its own message to us, is quite otherwise. Of course Christianity is an extremely complex reality, and ultimately speaking no one individual can achieve a comprehensive view of it as a whole. Nevertheless it is such only because Christianity neither omits nor neglects anything in the complex reality of man and his world whether at the individual or at the collective levels of human life, whether of the body or of the spirit, whether of the past or of the present. At the same time, however, the message which Christianity has to convey to this infinitely complex reality of man precisely as such,

[4] For the significance of self-transcendence in the total process of evolution cf. the article by K. Rahner in K. Rahner and P. Overhage, Das Problem der Hominisation, Quaestiones Disputatae 12/13 (Freiburg, 1961); idem, 'The Unity of Spirit and Matter in the Christian Understanding of Faith', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 153-177.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and the manner in which it lives in and through this reality, in other words that which alone constitutes what is specific and proper to Christianity, is something utterly simple, namely the question, maintained in openness, of the absolute future which is God or – which is saying the same thing – the question of God who is the absolute future.

In order to understand this statement we must achieve an overall view of many manifestly basic assertions of Christianity, subsuming them all in a single ultimate basic statement: the world and man have a history which God himself has made his own history. This one history of God, the world and man is, on any real understanding of its nature as history, ultimately speaking only intelligible and realizable from the standpoint of the future to which it tends. Now this future is the self-bestowal of God upon the world as radically consummated, and is not merely some kind of property of the finite world as distinct from the absolute and infinite God. This God, however, who is the absolute future of man and the world, is the absolutely incomprehensible mystery which remains, and which is now bestowed upon man in the radical openness of his knowledge and freedom and in a mode that transcends any one specific definable factor. In other words it is bestowed in the mode of the radical question as such and only in this mode, and not in the form of an answer supplied from without to this question which, supposing that this were the case, would represent only a partial fulfilment. Only when the question is posed in its radical openness do we know at all what is meant by God. We do not know this until every idol is shattered, the idol of an answer which fails to meet the [189] question in all its radical breadth, and yet at the same time seeks to bring the question to an end. Properly speaking Christianity states merely that all that we are still awaiting as our future is that this God, as the true fulfilment of the question in all its absolute extent, shall come in that which we call ‘visio beatifica’ and ‘eternal life’. And even when he comes to us in this mode he will still always remain the eternal mystery[5] to which man commits himself in the ecstasy of love. In a real sense, therefore, Christianity in its true essence is the state of radical openness to the question of the mystery of the absolute future which is God. All individual statements in Christianity, in its knowledge and its life, therefore, can be understood only as a modality of this radical commitment to refuse to call a halt at any point and to seek the fulfilment of its life, its ‘salvation’ in something to which no further name can be assigned,[6] something which still lies in the future and remains an eternal mystery, something which love alone can receive.

To understand Christianity in its truest essence in this way is neither to omit nor to overlook Jesus Christ. It is no self-evident truism to say that God himself intends to be the absolute future of man in a free act of self-bestowal, or above all that this self-bestowal of God is not merely one of the possibilities to which history is open, but also de facto imposes itself as the future end of history. On the contrary, this is something that was only promised to us precisely in Jesus Christ in whom alone, as the crucified and risen Lord, God has entered into the world as absolute future. If we seek to understand how it is that in the incarnation of the Logos God has not ceased to be the promised future of the world as still outstanding, we must consider that for a true understanding of the Incarnation of the Logos which has made itself to be history, this history is precisely the history of him who has to [5] For an understanding of the sustaining and sheltering function of the mystery cf. K.Rahner, ‘The Concept of Mystery in Catholic Theology’, Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 36-73.

[6] We cannot enter any more fully here into the discussion concerning the word of God or into a critique in terms of language and logic. Cf., amongst others, G. Ebeling, Gott und Wort (Tübingen, 1966); K. Rahner, ‘Meditation über das Wort Gott’, Gnade als Freiheit (Freiburg, 1968), pp. 11-18; ‘Gott ist keine naturwissenschaftliche Formel’, ibid., pp. 19-23; E. Jüngel, ‘Gott – als Wort unserer Sprache’, Evangelische Theologie 1 (1969), pp. 1-24; C. A. van Peursen, Das Wort Gott (Göttingen, 1969). As used here this formulation is intended to emphasize that God is not a name in the sense that through this naming the object so named has come to be unequivocally available to the investigations of the namer.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation come again, or, to put it better, his coming has only begun, and is still moving towards the future consummation of his [190] advent. We must consider that this incarnate Logos has entered precisely into the death of man, and we achieve a share in his salvation and his promise only in virtue of the fact that we die with him, i.e. that in knowledge and still more in the act of living, precisely with him we break through all provisional answers or cause ourselves to break through to that expectation which looks for nothing more and hopes for nothing more than the future of God who is the eternally incomprehensible salvation of man through his self-bestowal. Despite the many branches into which Christianity has spread, the manifold forms in which it has articulated itself, and the manifold distinctions which have been introduced into it over two thousand years of its history, it can be expressed in very brief formulae. One formula, which could in a certain sense be called a futurological one, would be this: Christianity is the attitude of abiding openness to the question of the absolute future which seeks to bestow itself, which has definitively promised itself as coming in Jesus Christ, and which is called God.

IV

The second thesis which we propose to put forward runs as follows: The 'this worldly' future of man always constitutes an open, and abidingly open, question.

No long explanation is required to define the formal meaning of the phrase 'this worldly future': it is that which man discovers by his own creative powers, sets before him as his Utopia, plans for and realizes, and thereby draws down into the world of space and time in which he finds himself placed in such a way that it continues to be subject to this world and its laws. This still remains valid even though it must not be denied that a future of this kind, definable in 'this worldly' categories, makes retrospective impact upon the conditions already existing in the world, and plays its part in altering them in such a way that, without man being able clearly to recognize or manipulate it a variable balance is struck between the previously existing conditions which make such a future possible and the future itself.

We have no intention here of treating at any length the theological question, in itself fundamental, of what in more precise terms the mutually conditioning relationship consists in between man's orientation towards his 'this-worldly' future and his orientation towards the absolute future. We must confine ourselves here to asserting without any more detailed [191] supporting arguments, that these two orientations, towards the 'this worldly' future and the absolute future, mutually condition one another in such a way that the Christian attitude towards the absolute future which is God neither diminishes nor eliminates the responsibility it entails for a 'this worldly' future, but rather imparts a radical dimension to it.[7] The reason is that the only genuine way in which man can achieve this state of readiness to hold himself open to the absolute future in his personal life is for him to adopt an attitude, at once positive and critical, of responsibility and active engagement leading to the achievement of an ever-fresh future within this world.

After these brief preliminary remarks let us consider our second thesis in itself. The 'this worldly' future always remains an open question. What we mean by this is that even with regard to a future understood in merely 'this worldly' terms man is never related to this as though it were already present, planned down to the last detail, and requiring only that a specific interval should elapse before it was an achieved reality. Not merely the absolute

[7] A full and detailed presentation of the position that to recognize God as the future of this world also implies an active responsibility for the world and for the transformation of the world on the part of the Christian is provided in K. Rahner, 'On the Theological Problems Entailed in the Idea of the "New Earth"', Theological Investigations X (London and New York, 1973), pp. 260-272.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

future which is God himself in his inconceivability, but the 'this worldly' future too is an open one. It too is always unknown, a future which, when it arrives, takes us by surprise. And it is precisely for this reason that it can also be the medium leading to the absolute future.

Why is this the case? First it must of course be stated that man can and must plan, project, and control the future. Our thesis, therefore, in no sense involves any denial of the fact that at least today, in the age of rational technology and of the exact sciences, of cybernetics and futurology, there is such a thing as a planning of the future; that by comparison with earlier ages the element of the planned in the future has increased to an extent which was formerly inconceivable; that modern man has achieved an almost qualitatively different relationship to his future, and that too both because of the possibility of planning the changes which his environment is to undergo, and also in virtue of the fact that man can plan how to manipulate himself at the individual and collective levels. All this is obvious, and is here taken as given,[8] even though it in turn should be [192] thought out in greater detail in its own right. But all this does not alter the fact that even the questions of the 'this worldly' future is in principle such that we can never arrive at any comprehensive answer to it.

In order to perceive the validity of this second thesis we may concentrate on three considerations in particular, which are of course interconnected, while passing over certain others.

First, when it is the future that is planned and brought into being by man himself that is being treated of it must be borne in mind that the achievement of a future that is planned proceeds from certain prior conditions which man finds already in existence and the full significance of which he does not perceive. Today the harvest that man gathers does not consist solely of the fruits of nature which present themselves to him spontaneously to sustain his life. On the contrary he himself alters his environment. He creates new materials for himself. He does not merely domesticate plants and animals, but alters them as well according to plans of his own, and by a process of self-manipulation gradually arrives at a state where he is actually the faber sui. But however true it may be that we cannot already in the present determine how much or how little will show itself to be possible along these lines, this does nothing to alter the fact that in this creative activity of his man proceeds, and must proceed, from certain specific prior conditions. These prior conditions are subject to a twofold limitation: first they have a specific content, a determinate state of being 'so and not otherwise' which imposes certain definite and pre-determined limitations on what can be made of them. Second, to the extent that they make it possible to introduce changes, they always require a certain period of time until these changes can emerge as the outcome of them, a period which again and again exceeds the personal life-span of any one individual.

This situation in which the point of departure is pre-determined in respect of its content and the time needed for the development to take place might at first sight lead us to suppose that because of it it was possible precisely to calculate accurately beforehand how the future would turn out, as in fact all such predictions of the future are based upon a knowledge of the conditions governing this point of departure and the intervals of time involved, which at least in macro-physical terms are accurately calculable. At the same time, however, a point that must not be overlooked is that we do not have and cannot have any comprehensive knowledge of all these prior conditions. Yet in order to make an exact prognosis possible the causes governing such concrete futures must be known not merely in their general structures, but also in their quite specific and unique dispositions [193] in relation to one another.[9] Now

[8] This problem is investigated in fuller detail in K. Rahner, *Theological Investigation*s IX (London and New York, 1972) in the articles entitled 'The Experiment with Man' and 'The Problem of Genetic Manipulation', pp. 205-252.

[9] Here we may recall the fiction of the 'Demon of Laplace' constructed within the framework of a mechanistic conception of the world. This had the power of using its knowledge of all the factors prevailing at a given point

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this is impossible. For within the system governing the one world every element in this world depends upon every other, and at the same time all depend upon each. Any comprehensive determination, therefore, would only be possible if we had a comprehensive knowledge of the totality of this cosmic system. Yet in so far as such knowledge can be aimed at at all by man it can only be aimed at in virtue of an overall mastery of the system itself, and this would itself bring about and presuppose an alteration of this system in itself, even though it itself cannot in its turn be observed in this process since it itself constitutes an element in the observer. A further point over and above this is that it is impossible to achieve any point of observation which is absolutely separate from the world. And in view of this any comprehensive formula for the world on the part of one individual element within this world called human knowledge cannot be established. But this means that the future even of an individual element within this total system cannot be determined beforehand with complete accuracy on the basis of the knowledge of the history and the situation of this element at any given moment, for this element and its future in itself always remain subject to partial determination by all the other alterations of the system as a whole and, in accordance with what has been said above, this can precisely not be perceived and comprehended as a whole,[10] unless by an intelligence which stood outside this system, in the concrete, therefore, only by a divine intelligence, since in the light of the unity between spirit and matter any finite intelligences existing absolutely outside the world are surely quite inconceivable.

In this consideration we have taken the world considered as a human environment and as humanity itself merely as a physical system, and we have considered man's ability to prognosticate on the basis of his knowledge merely at the level of physics and natural science. The openness of the future to man's knowledge which is already inherent in this is radically [194] broadened still further when we reflect upon the fact that this world, the future of which we are looking to, is far from being a merely physical and biological world. However true it may be that it is based upon this physical and bio-physical reality or contains this within itself, it is at the same time a world of the psychological, the social, and not least of freedom. We have no need whatever to enter in detail into all the radical unknown factors which this entails, factors which prevent us from achieving any totally comprehensive prognosis of the future. We need only to point out the difficulty which has already revealed itself in the task of foreseeing the development of the purely physical world and which now recurs in a fresh and radical form, for man as cognitive is himself an element in the psychological and sociological system which he is seeking to know, and he himself alters this by his own knowledge. For instance anyone who proclaims some form of determinism as an existing psychological and social factor himself modifies the social and psychological situation into which he emits this proclamation of his. In its prior assumption this knowledge itself is dependent upon that which it seeks to encompass and alters what it has to recognize.[11] In order to achieve an accurate knowledge of itself it would have to have reflected comprehensively upon the conditions which make it itself possible. In order to establish its findings beyond all doubt it would have to avoid itself altering its own subject-matter in the very process of the act of cognition itself. For the reasons that have been set in time in the cosmic order, whether momentary situations or developing processes, and so of calculating comprehensively the course of the world's history both backwards and forwards. The findings of modern physics have shown that this fiction is no longer meaningful even in the sphere of physical knowledge today. A fortiori it is no longer meaningful when we take into account in our cosmic system the factor of human awareness. This is something which will appear from the considerations which follow.

---

[10] Without any exaggeration this state of affairs might be called the factor which brings an element of obscurity into any prognostication.

[11] A penetrating investigation of these areas has been carried out by J. Habermas in Erkenntnis and Interesse (Frankfurt, 1968).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

forth such knowledge as this remains constantly in process of development and is never completed. Rather it projects itself into a future that is proper to it and unknown to it.

In all that we have said we have still not even begun to reflect on the freedom of man, which itself as an ultimate and original factor is incapable of reflecting in any adequate sense on the fact that its own point of departure is subject to prior conditions. Moreover as genuinely creative this factor of human freedom presupposes the unknown as a sphere which will be filled with a future that is known only through the creative freedom as an act which is not prior to any knowledge, for it is this that is unequivocally presupposed to it as its guide. This is a point of which we shall have to treat more fully at a later stage.

The second point to be considered for an understanding of this openness to the 'this worldly' future is the circumstance that in the contemporary situation in which man's creative freedom to shape his own future has become actual the number of possibilities available to this freedom is growing, [195] and precisely in virtue of this the question is becoming more open of which of these possibilities which have become so numerous will in fact be realized. From this point of view we shall only be in a position to answer this question when, out of all the many possibilities, one specific future has been turned into the present by a free and undeducible decision. It must be borne in mind that today the number of concrete possibilities for man to exercise his freedom has become greater than in earlier times. Two further factors are, however, first that not all possibilities can simultaneously be realized at one blow, and second that the realization of any one specific possibility renders the realization of the other possibilities which are given, and which up to that point have remained open, impossible. But these are points which in view of the linear development of history in time do not need to be expounded at any length. Admittedly it has been said that the age of a true liberation of man from his social self-alienation can, will and should be ushered in only at that point at which the most divers possibilities for self-realization available to the individual in society are offered to him as simultaneously realizable so that he is not confined merely to one specific possibility chosen by an authoritarian decision on the part of one individual, or in a democratic manner by the majority.

But however desirable it may be that the development of society should lead to the sort of situation in which each individual can determine his own personal self-realization, and has the means necessary for this realization made available to him by society without the different form of self-realization aimed at by another being thereby prevented, still there cannot be any doubt that at least in part the fact that all are confined to a single dimension of space and time, as well as the finitude of the means available in the concrete, sets certain quite notable limits which can never wholly be overcome to the simultaneous realization of alternative forms of self-realization which man may propose for himself. A further point which cannot be questioned is that because of the finitude of man's life-span the specific mode of self-realization of an individual always implies a renunciation of another possibility of self-realization subsequently being taken up, even though precisely today such a possibility would be present, at least as offered, to a greater extent than in former times. By a man's free decision to opt for a specific mode of self-realization, however, this possibility is ruled out, whether as present or as future. Which one among all such manifold possibilities which cannot be realized at the same time is in fact the one to be realized remains in principle obscure and undecided so long as the possibility opted for has not yet been realized.

[196] To deny this statement would by implication be to deny the fact that several real possibilities of a future actively to be shaped by man himself do indeed lie open before him. The increase in the number of such possibilities, however, is precisely the characteristic feature of the situation of modern man by comparison with former times. And again it is precisely this increase in the possible ways of shaping some concrete future that makes it difficult to discern which of the possible futures will be the real one. In fact all the prognoses

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

even of futurology point again and again to this indeterminate element, because no-one can really foretell the manner in which men will react to these future situations that are prognosticated. In all cases it is merely particular features of a future world of man that are predicted, and never a whole system in which some world of tomorrow can so be summed up that the reaction of future humanity to its presence can itself be taken into the calculations.[12]

In order to make clear the indeterminacy even of the 'this worldly' future there is a third point to which we can only barely refer, even though it is only when we have recognized this that we have arrived at the true and ultimate reason for this indeterminacy: it is the factor of freedom.

Once the forms in which freedom is objectified can already be taken as given, once they are in existence, they are, in principle, always capable of being explained and made intelligible in terms of causal or functional determinism from a consideration of the factors leading up to them. At the same time, however, there is a further factor, namely the free exercise of choice, which differs from that which is subject to these laws, and which can be explained in terms of them once it is an existing fact, in that this further factor cannot in its turn be explained in terms of any pre-existing conditions outside itself. It is this which most properly impells realities of this sort to emerge into existence as the outcome of the exercise of freedom, autonomously selecting and positing one specific possibility out of the wider range available to it. It is not possible here to demonstrate the existence of such freedom as the original positing factor by any transcendental deduction, a freedom which does not rule out the a posteriori explanation of what is already present as the outcome of certain laws, but [197] at the same time cannot itself be accounted for, much less predicted, by any explanation of this kind.[13]

Here we must confine ourselves to pointing out that anyone who denies the existence of this kind of freedom, in which the subject becomes the ultimate source of action, is thereby failing to recognize the phenomenon of genuinely personal historicity and the nature of history itself, and a fortiori of the real future. Thereby he falsifies and distorts the nature of personal history (which in its very existence is orientated towards the real future) in that his conception of it is governed by a purely mechanistic image of evolution in which later developments are already unequivocally present in hidden form in earlier ones, and the beginning is master of the end. It may be conceded that genuine freedom is never manifested in isolation from the other factors prevailing in any given case, and that it always appears merely as a secret repudiation of the necessary concealing itself in the forms in which it is properly objectified so that it appears to be merely the outcome of causal factors, and explicable in terms of these. But however true this may be, if there is such a thing as genuine freedom at all, then there is a 'this worldly' future which is indeterminate and obscure, one which, so far as the historical subject himself is concerned, is in principle only brought to light in the very act in which it is posited and so rendered present. Up to this point it has been hidden in the limitless breadth of the possible, especially since this broader sphere of the possible is of course not to be thought of as comprising a definite number of separate projects and plans which have already been worked out, and each of which is thoroughly understood in its own right, so that the only question still unresolved is which of them will in fact be put into execution. The interdependence of such possible projects, the infinite possible variations (which are inexhaustible so far as our conscious thought is concerned) of such projects and [12] The plans of H. Ozbekhan are to be estimated as an effort on the part of a futurologist to eliminate this uncertainty. Ozbekhan seeks to construct model futures by anticipation of such a kind that the variations in these models enable us to arrive at a conclusion as to what are the desirable reactions in the present in order to achieve, these 'ideal' futures. Cf. H. Ozbekhan, 'Skizze einer "Look-out-Institution"', Atomzeitalter, Vol. 4 (1967), p. 187.

[13] For a more detailed treatment of this point cf. K. Rahner, Gnade als Freiheit (Freiburg, 1968), pp. 31-89.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

plans, prevent us from distinguishing the one obscure possibility within a definite and comprehensive number of separate individual possibilities, and so to rationalize it in any adequate sense. To the extent that it is possible clearly to delineate certain distinctly defined possibilities for the future, what these constitute (even abstracting from what has been said at an earlier stage) is not a comprehensive articulation of the possible in general, but merely, in their multiplicity, indications of the one obscure possible course which freedom grasps at, only throwing light upon those points in them which it itself really brings into being by the decision in which it is exercised. If freedom is brought again and again to [198] the dividing of the ways, this precisely does not mean that it can first trace all these ways to their respective ends at the conceptual level as on a complete map, and then decide which way it will embark upon. It is only the way that is actually trodden that reveals its real nature. All those which are recognized as possible but not followed remain behind as the unknown ones which lead into what is unresolved and obscure. In all plans even the 'this worldly' future remains that which is unresolved and obscure.

V

In conclusion a third thesis may perhaps be adduced with regard to the question of the future: in the very nature of his function the theologian is the guardian of this docta ignorantia futuri.[14] This thesis should not be regarded as presumptuous. For it is obvious first that the theologian is, in this sense, a counsel for the defence of the openness of the absolute and the 'this worldly' future only to the extent that he takes as his starting-point the gospel which is addressed to all, and returns to it; that he makes this the subject of his consideration and finds in it the docta ignorantia. Second, in order that the third thesis shall not be misinterpreted as presumptuousness on the part of the theologian it must be realized that the Christian and the theologian can perfectly well concede that even one who does not consider himself a Christian in any explicit sense may, in his concrete personal living, be realizing what Christianity itself proclaims as its own interpretation of the significance of human life. In other words, for instance, even this wise recognition that we do not know the future, this determined submission of oneself to that which is unplanned, represents not an unhappy survival of irrationalism which will gradually be eliminated, but rather an abiding existential modality and an intrinsic element in the dignity of human freedom.

On this basis, and in the light of the mutually conditioning relationship to be found between man's attitude towards his 'this worldly' future and his attitude towards his absolute future, we will perhaps be in a position to understand that element which in a positive sense can be called the 'utopian' in human existence, something which constitutes a prior condition for every change that takes place in personal history, and so too at the social level. The utopian is the expression of the mutuality of this conditioning relationship. Anyone who, in moving towards the absolute future [199] encounters the concrete data of personal history, may experience in this concrete data the relativity of it as given in the here and now. And yet at the same time he neither can nor should let go of that which belongs to the particular categories of history as the medium of the movement towards the absolute future. In this position he must exercise his creative powers in order to construct for himself a 'this worldly' future goal, and it is precisely this which can, in a positive sense, be called the 'utopian' factor. For that which at any point is given in the here and now is real, and its historical modality does not rest merely upon rational criticisms or the assigning of a relative status to it [14] On this cf. also J. B. Metz, 'Gott vor uns', Ernst Bloch zu Ehren (Frankfurt, 1965), pp. 227-241; idem, Zur Theologie der Welt (Mainz - Munich, 1968), pp. 88 f.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in human thought. This point can be recognized so long as it is not viewed merely as belonging to the infinite perspectives of the absolute future, for it is only as viewed from these perspectives that it could still constantly and uncritically be maintained that its status as historical was due to these subjective factors. But its objective state as historically real is revealed when it is called in question by means of another factor belonging to history, and precisely to the future, in other words by the utopian factor which constitutes the point of reference for, and the representative of, the absolute future. This means that the utopian factor in history belongs essentially to the achievement of the fulness of Christian life as realized in man's assent to the absolute future and to absolute hope. This utopian factor is willed precisely because, and to the extent that, it is not yet achieved, and also not merely the foreseeable outcome of the present in a mechanistic or evolutionary sense. Christianity, therefore, should involve a genuine commitment to the world and an assent to the absolute future both in one, and in such a way that each attitude mutually conditions the other. And where this is the case its creative force gives birth to the utopian factor which becomes a standard by which to criticize the present and to impel it forwards to a new historical future. This is the medium of this mutually conditioning relationship, and obviously it always constitutes at the same time that which provides the critique of, and calls in question, the social situation actually prevailing. To put it quite simply: anyone who as a Christian sought simply and uncritically to identify himself with his existing social situation would have to ask himself whether in that case he believed in the absolute future in a really effective sense and in the real practice of his own living, instead of merely at the theoretical level and in some private and interior dimension. He should put the question to himself of how in that case he has any sincere realization of the fact that the present is that which is merely provisional, seeing that he does not critically measure it against some other 'this worldly' future, albeit one which in its turn always [200] remains provisional. Thus it is precisely our hope in the absolute future which we do not create that demands that we shall keep our eyes upon the historical utopia which introduces an element of criticism and disquiet into history, and impels it forward, and, moreover, brings it into the social dimension.

Precisely in the light of these axioms, however, it must be stated that Christianity and, as the servant of this, theology, are and must be the guardians of the docta ignorantia futuri. In fulfilling this function they are contributing to man in his role as the free subject of creative activity. For if a point were ever arrived at at which the future were really understood as something which could be comprehensively prognosticated, and that was able to be calculated in all its aspects, at that point the future would, basically speaking, be eliminated in favour of a continually abiding present. For at that point it would in principle no longer be possible to avoid a position in which the present was explained as the already inaugurated realization of that future which as outlined in rationalist planning would be the only legitimate one. Only the docta ignorantia futuri provides a basic position for exercising a sustained critique of a present which is at all times only too ready to assert itself as the only right state of affairs.[15] Only an open future, which in principle is assented to as such, can stand up to the objection which every establishment raises against revolutionary critics of the present, namely that while they are ready to criticize, they themselves have no unequivocally clear and positive alternative to offer for the future. Of course we must agree with Paul in saying that man is not meant to launch himself blindly into the void. The critique of the present should as far as possible be combined with positively formulated projects for shaping the future. But anyone who demands that projects for the future shall be just as far-sighted [15] The position that at least up to the present futurology itself has actually promoted this tendency instead of overcoming it, and indeed that it constitutes an 'ideological confirmation of an order which draws the veil over what is new in order to leave everything as it was before' (C. Koch, Kritik der Futurologie, Frankfurt 1968 – Kursbuch 14, 2) is a point which C. Koch attempts to demonstrate.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation and perceptive as is allegedly the case with the actual present, anyone who seeks in principle to rule out the possibility that the will to achieve a future also involves a commitment to the unknown, anyone who seeks radically to eliminate the factors of freedom and personal history, is adopting a rationalist and determinist attitude of radical hostility towards the docta ignorantia futuri. He is rejecting that medium of his hope in the absolute future which is indefinable, the medium, namely, which consists in a hopeful engagement of himself in [201] the daily commitment to a 'this worldly' future which is open. Anyone who rejects the docta ignorantia futuri in this way is properly speaking no longer a Christian, even though this rejection is posited in a sphere which, since it is apparently wholly secular in character, seems to have nothing further whatever to do with Christianity and theology.[16]

The controversy between Christians, therefore, in their attitude towards the 'this worldly' future can only be concerned with arriving at reasonable and responsible measures of planning on the one hand and commitment to the openness and obscurity of the future on the other. But even though a controversy precisely of this sort does demand rational and objective discussion, ultimately speaking it is precisely incapable of ever being totally eliminated solely by means of such discussion. For in fact if a discussion of this kind is to be engaged in among Christians at all, it must constantly take into account and recognize the element of the unknown in the future that has to be planned for. Moreover both sides to the discussion must take this into account as an element which is not merely something to be put up with only at that point at which it is absolutely impossible to avoid it any longer, but one which is positively sought for and welcomed by the Christian. When we consider this point it must truly be a matter of surprise that the Christianity of today has fallen under the suspicion (and not without reason) of being a conservative force which favours the present rather than the future. Of course in inculcating a hope in the absolute future Christianity does also liberate man from a hysterical quest for that which is new at the 'this worldly' level, and which tends to be sought for merely because it is different. But as constituting a cure in this sense of this kind of disease Christianity is merely credible and healing when it itself avoids uncritically defending the existing state of affairs, and thereby itself tacitly denying hope in the absolute future. For this hope, whether consciously or unconsciously, constitutes the motive force and the critique for all strivings which are directed towards a 'this worldly' future, and it is this striving which constitutes the medium in which the hope for the absolute future is maintained.

[16] In this sense it cannot be objected even to the political theology of J. B. Metz that it undervalues the autonomy of the political sphere when it makes the attempt to show that the absolute future as understood eschatologically is critically mediated by the abidingly open ('this worldly') future of human society. The autonomy of the political sphere can in fact never be interpreted in Christian and theological terms as though the political future of mankind could be brought to a future capable of being totally worked out in rational terms and comprehensively planned for by technology. On this cf. also J. B. Metz, 'Der zukünftige Mensch und der kommende Gott', H. J. Schultz ed., Wer ist das eigent1ich – Gott? (Munich, 1969), pp. 260-275.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[202]

11

PERSPECTIVES FOR THE FUTURE OF THE CHURCH

I am of course no prophet, and hence I do not know what will become of the Church of Christ in the next few centuries. The fact that we do not know this is indeed an intrinsic part of our Christian faith, for otherwise it would be quite impossible for the command to be laid upon us that we should place all our hopes solely in the Lord of history and of the future. This would be impossible if a futurologist with his computer already knew what was to come. Properly speaking, therefore, the only certain point is that the word of the Lord will proceed on its course through the ages, that the gates of hell will not prevail over the community of those who believe in Jesus Christ as their Lord, but also that a point will never arise in this world's time at which the Church will achieve, on the basis of this, a total victory such as can be made manifest in terms which this world can recognize. The only certain point is that the nearer we draw to the day of Christ the more fiercely the Church will be assailed by the threat of Antichrist. But the concrete form of the abiding Church (concrete in respect of the numbers of her members, her life, the value that is attached to her, and her weakness in secular society) and the concrete form of the abiding assaults upon her – these we do not know. For all the foresight and planning which there is and which in fact there must be to an increasing extent, we Christians make pilgrimage into the unknown future. And so far as Christian living is concerned this unknown is not a regrettable survival which continues unresolved despite our planning, but an essential element which is necessary and expected in that hope and that patience which is set before the Christian as his task, and bestowed upon him as grace. Everything which has to be said here is subject to this proviso, which must never be forgotten.

Yet precisely in the light of this the Christian must consider the 'this worldly' future, however true it may be that that which is really awaited, hoped for, and prayed for is not the Church but the kingdom of God. For it is only the planner who has something which he can freely and silently leave to the sole Lord of history to decide, and it is only in this way that [203] hope is really hope instead of being a mere apathetic sinking into the obviousness of the present. What is it that can be foreseen in this way, concretely awaited and planned for? I will attempt only a few brief answers. Whether they are the most important ones or the right ones – this is something which I do not know. Bur for the patient and submissive in the spirit of ε)λπι/φ and υ(ποµονη&, who have as their only God the absolute future, this is something which is important and yet at the same time easy. My readers will not be irritated if they notice that here and there I formulate my answers on the basis of a Catholic understanding of Christian living and the Church, perhaps without myself clearly adverting to it. Nor is it so important to draw a precise distinction between the following two factors: first that which is simply destined to come because it is either in conformity with the omnipotent will of God to bestow grace in Christ, or else is a 'must' of saving history such that through it (albeit brought about through man's sin) God achieves his gracious purpose, and secondly that which man himself as Christian desires and can or should strive for on behalf of the Church without exactly knowing whether this desire of his will be fulfilled, a desire which God permits or even enjoins upon us for the age of this world without guaranteeing that it will be fulfilled within this world.

1. The Church is destined to be the 'little flock'. This is not merely because only God knows those who are his own, whom he has chosen, while we never know it, but only hope on our own behalf (as also on behalf of all others) that we are destined to overcome all our sins and attain to the final consummation of love and to the eternal peace of God. The Church of the future will also be the little flock at the empirical level of social living. In asserting this the Christian is brought into a situation which can rightly be described only with difficulty. For on the one hand he must have the missionary will for the gospel to be preached to all peoples, and so to all social groups in the world, that all shall be baptized and that the eschatological hope (to adopt the parlance of the Second Vatican Council) shall be imprinted upon all social orders, that the name of Christ shall be recognized by the 'kings' of this earth too, that Christianity shall be not merely an affair of the private conscience or of a few, but also a factor in public life, in society, in the world, and moreover among all. We recognize the duty to will this, and no definable limits can ever be imposed upon this will. We are never allowed to say: 'At this point there is enough of the Church in the world and its public life'. But while recognizing all this, the Christian can and must know that saving history and Church history are de facto never to be identified in the age of [204] this present world, that the gospel will always be contradicted, that the Church will remain the little flock that is assailed. And the recognition of this has nothing to do with the sectarian pride of the 'righteous remnant' which regards itself alone as the elect. In fact the Christian of today can wholeheartedly recognize that from the point of view of her position in society the Church of the future will be, to an even greater extent than hitherto, stamped with the character of the 'little flock' in all its harshness. Indeed he should allow the recognition of this fact already by anticipation to have its due and right influence upon his missionary aims and, since he can foresee that those aims will in practice be restricted in their effect, he should allow this to play its part in determining the manner in which he puts those aims into practice.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In other words: Christians cannot expect that any homogeneous society will once more emerge which as such can simply be called Christian. Those factors in civilization and society which once produced and sustained a society of this sort, which was in some 'mediaeval' sense homogeneously Christian, will never return. They were in any case not specifically Christian factors but rather secular, and they produced similar effects in constituting a society characterized by homogeneity in religious matters even outside the Christian sphere. In so far as it might ever be possible to aim at producing a homogeneously Christian society in the future the only way in which this goal could be pursued would be by using the means of a system which in social, political and ideological terms was totalitarian. And this is something which the Christian, precisely on principles of freedom of conscience and faith itself, must radically and unconditionally reject. The Church can only be the Church of the free believers, and in view of this must actually champion the cause of freedom for unbelief as well. Moreover in the future – different in this from earlier times – there will no longer be any point of departure for finding a homogeneously Christian society (except possibly through forced indoctrination of a totalitarian kind). And because of these two factors the future position of the Church from the social point of view will be one in which she exists side by side with a state of unbelief which will likewise be manifest at the social level. She will be the little flock, that is to say at best, and in the most peaceful circumstances, one element in a pluralistic society, a local community Church of believers more than a national Church with a social code of behaviour of its own, even though both these entities represent extremes of abstract thought such as will never be realized in a form that is 'chemically pure'. The important point is, however, that the Church must uncompromisingly take this point into account in considering her [205] missionary plans for the future, even though this must not be allowed to lead to an attitude of defeatism in missionary work or a withdrawal into the sacristy or into a merely interior life, something which in any case a pluralistic society cannot of its very nature demand of any one individual group within it.

In the concrete this implies that the Church must not necessarily hold fast to those positions of power in society which in former times she came legitimately to acquire, and which

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

perhaps even today cannot be proved to have become unjustified in the contemporary scene. But above all this also implies that there is something which the Church must not do for the sake of still continuing to be a Church of the people and the masses in the widest possible sense: she must not tolerate without condemnation every corruption of the pure gospel within her united social body or retain within it all those who seek to uphold heresies in the Church[1] yet do not quit the Church of their own accord. Certainly full freedom of conscience is to be accorded to every individual, but the Church would cease to be the Church of one faith, one creed, of the gospel, and of the right administration of the sacraments, if she had to grant any and every individual the right to do what the freedom of his own conscience dictated to him within the Church. In a pluralistic society in which failure to belong to the Church no longer has any social consequences, or is gradually ceasing to have such, the Church can and under certain circumstances must also have the courage to pronounce a sentence of excommunication even when thereby she is even more reduced to the status of the little flock. The sphere of freedom of conscience and the sphere of the Church are not identical, though it is true that precisely on this account the Church herself must uphold this wider sphere of freedom even in those cases in which on any human estimation she is acting against her own interests in doing so.

This small group within a broad pluralistic society will gradually overcome the temptation to an inferiority complex which can emerge through tension between the claim of Christendom to offer salvation to all on the one hand, and the very restricted degree of success which it achieves at any visible level in society on the other. This little flock will not overcome this temptation by falling into an attitude of over-compensating pride and anxiety, and so a sectarian attitude in which she regards herself as the community which alone is elected for eternal life. She will overcome this temptation by recognizing that she is the recipient of the grace and the [206] burden alike of being the sacrament of salvation for the world,[2] of being the manifestation of God's will to bestow grace at the social level, that divine will which causes grace and justification to take effect in an 'anonymous Christianity' in the depths of the human conscience and in much which belongs objectively speaking to the sphere of the human spirit, even though all this may have failed to achieve any conscious expression of itself to the point at which it is recognized and objectified in social forms for what it is: the grace of Christ which has its abiding presence in the world in the Church.

2. The Christian community of the future will have a quite different sociological structure from that which she now has both in the Churches and also in the sects.[3] For me as a Catholic this cannot mean that the theological essence of the Church as constituted as a society will be altered. But even in terms of a strictly orthodox Catholic ecclesiology this essence is so broad and elastic, is capable of being realized in so many different concrete social forms, that it must not be supposed that anything like the sociological image which the Church and the local Church communities present today has always to remain the same, or even that this image is in all circumstances worth striving for. This change will, I believe, imply, amongst other things, the following:

a) The community (whether at the level of a local Church, a diocese or the Church in the absolute) will be a Church of brethren. Certainly the present-day Christian Churches differ from one another very notably in respect of their doctrinal interpretation of their own juridical constitution to the point where the differences of opinion involved lead to a separation of the

[1] On this cf. 'Heresies in the Church Today?' and 'Schism in the Catholic Church?' in this volume, pp. 98-141.
[2] On this characterization of the Church at the Council see 'Lumen Gentium' Nos. 1, 9, 48; 'Gaudium et Spes', Nos. 43, 45; K. Rahner, 'Konziliare Lehre der Kirche und künftige Wirklichkeit christlichen Lebens', Schriften zur Theologie VI (Einsiedeln, 2nd ed., 1968), pp. 479-498; E. Schillebeeckx, 'De Ecclesia ut Sacramento Mundi', Acta Congressus Internationalis de Theologia Concilii Vaticani II (Rome, 1968), pp. 48-53.
[3] cf. 'On the Structure of the People of the Church Today' in this volume, pp. 218-228.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Churches. But abstracting from the Christian sects and admitting the fluid transitions between these and Churches in the true sense, we can say that all Christian Churches, viewed from the sociological rather than the doctrinal point of view, have been or are 'clergy' Churches. That is to say, viewed in their sociological aspects they exist prior to the free unity of their members as constituted by faith, hope, and charity. Not only in its nature but also in its effective mode of existence the juridical structure is a reality which is prior to the community of faith as such. Only on this [207] showing in fact, abstracting from all other considerations, is it conceivable that the Churches can and do number almost the entire population of central Europe as members of themselves, applying very obvious criteria for this purpose, even though only a fragment of that population either feels itself to be, or can regard itself as genuinely Christian in a theological sense. Because after all it is obvious that to be a Christian is not simply identical with having been baptized in infancy.

In the future, however, this situation will no longer continue, even though, perhaps, it is far from being desirable that the change in events shall take the form of a spectacular revolution. The Churches will be Churches of brethren. They will exist because, and in virtue of the fact that men unite themselves with the community of Christ through faith and love. And everything which exists and must exist in the Church in the way of order, official authority, and constitution will be sustained in its real existence and effective force by this believing love and be virtually nothing else besides. (I say virtually because obviously it is again and again the case that those social realities which achieve objective status as a result of the exercise of freedom also achieve, and should achieve a value in their own right). Moreover, however true it may be that in the future too the officially constituted authority in the Church must be understood as an authority deriving from Christ and his mission, still the individual member of the Church will experience the one vested with official authority as he who, in his official activities, is sustained not by any social power or prestige in society such as is prior to the effective faith and loyalty of the members of the Church, but rather owes his position to the free faith, willingness to obey, and brotherly love of all men within the Church because every believer will rejoice and thank God when the grace of God makes it possible for one individual to take the burden of official position in his Church upon himself, a burden which brings with it no earthly honour and no worldly advantage. While a certain tension is inevitable in every 'society in which the work is distributed', I hope that apart from this there will no longer be any place in the Church of the future for any additional attitudes of anticlericalism or antilaicism. For in the diaspora situation then prevailing, since all will be believers as the outcome of their own free and most personal decision, and all will be seeking for the unity of love, they will also experience the Church as too intimately their own most personal concern for it to be possible in practice for the official authorities in the Church to be regarded as anything but identified with 'the Church' either by themselves or by the laity.

b) The individual communities (and on this basis the Church as such) [208] will have to create their own social unity for themselves, and in fact to a certain extent as the outcome of their own planning. Hitherto it may have appeared as though the social unity of the community were constituted simply and exclusively by the common creed and the common liturgy (together with that which is the prior condition precisely for this). It was possible for this apparent situation to exist and this impression to be given because the ecclesiastical community was able to assume as already existing a sufficiently integrated secular society (for instance that of the village or the small town), and to raise it in its already integrated form to the level of a confessing and worshipping community, and again because even from the point of view of civil administration it had an undisputed social status and so to a certain extent was held together from without. Now that the society of the masses has to a large extent been disintegrated in the large cities these prior conditions for an integrated Church community are no longer present, and the unity of creed and cult are not sufficient in themselves to sustain the unity of the Church community in any concrete or effective sense. In order to exist and live the Church community needs an integration which it can no longer assume to be already existing in sufficient measure. Instead it itself has to create this state of integration. The rock which must at all costs be avoided in this course is the danger that in busying itself to achieve a state of integration between individuals in this way we may reduce the community to the status of a sect, a ghetto of insignificant people who seek in the Church community that cosy state of concealment which is so attractive to those who have proved inadequate in the public dimension of life, and which they cannot find in the pluralistic deserts of society in the broader sense. Again – and this is something that applies precisely to the Church community of the future – we absolutely must not seek to be self-sufficient in human terms, or seek to provide everything which a man needs in order to be a man in the way of human intercourse, culture, security, neighbourliness etc. Again the Church community of the future must be open to the outside world, must be ready to be shaped by individuals who obviously and whole-heartedly engage themselves in the life of the pluralistic society in general, in its struggles, in the self-commitment which it requires, in the pluralism of 'movements', interests, parties. The Church community must not identify itself with any specific formal or informal group in secular society, and yet it cannot achieve its own intrinsic integration through the 'merely' religious factor in the narrowest sense. In its spirit of brotherhood it must provide neighbourliness. It must be capable of providing a basis for Christianity to become engaged in the tasks of the world in the sphere which is proper [209] to them. Here surely tasks are to be found which are as yet hardly recognized, still less fulfilled. The social structures of the Church community of the future have not yet been worked out.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

c) At this point a more specialized consideration should perhaps be added, one which, as it seems to me, is of concern to all Churches, even though there may be some differences in the way in which the practical consequences of it are worked out according to the particular character of the individual Churches involved. It seems to me conceivable for all Churches (including the Catholic Church) that these fraternal communities of the future may in many cases – not always or in every case – differ from the Churches on the grand scale of the past in that the official positions in the Church will be vested in individuals who undertake them only at a mature age and who emerge from integrated communities of this kind having belonged to them in the fullest possible sense. Why indeed should it not be so? Must every preacher of the gospel, every dispenser of the sacraments and everyone who presides at the Eucharistic sacrifice also be a 'specialist theologian' who has undergone a course of academic studies in his youth, one whose career is like that of a civil servant, holding a series of 'posts' in due succession in a large-scale ecclesiastical administration, being transferred to other posts, promoted, etc.? Without prejudice to the mission and (sacramental) ordination conferred by the universal Church, why should not a fraternal community of the kind we have in mind appoint an elder from its own 'elders'? Provided such a one has the theological and cultural formation and experience, and the experiential knowledge necessary in this sphere and for this community (all requirements which cannot be fulfilled merely by following the course prescribed for the academic formation of a professional ecclesiastical functionary) why should he not serve this specific community as its 'presbyter'? In this way, it will be remarked in passing, the charismatic and institutional factors in the Church would once more achieve a clearer unity, and after all there is nothing in the constitution of the Church as required by the nature of the faith which would exclude such a measure a limine. Certainly we do not need to underestimate the value of theological study in its academic form. And in the future too it may be indispensable for many of the Church's officials. But at the same time I do not believe that in the future the type of the 'civil administrator' equipped with a special academic formation will continue in all circumstances to provide the standard for the kind of presbyter to be appointed over the community in the concrete. In the future the lack of priests (pastors) will be too great for this, and the significance of the 'charismatic'-religious personality will be too important.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[210] It will be also clearly possible for older men who are still vigorous and in good health to be 'officially' appointed for fresh tasks after they have retired from their secular callings. (It may be remarked only in passing that on this basis the question of celibacy for secular priests in the Catholic Church may be raised once more in the future in a quite different form from hitherto.) Initiatives tending in this direction are in fact present everywhere. But we should have the boldness gradually to develop them, and that too not merely with a view to exceptional and particular cases, but in order that a new type of 'presbyter' may emerge as normal in the Church, one who is in principle on an equal footing with the professional administrator. In this task the Protestant Churches, with their principle of the universal priesthood, could find it easier and quicker to devize practical ways of achieving this, which could then, with relatively minor modifications, become practicable in the Catholic Church as well. A further point is that in the last analysis it would be wrong to misunderstand the efforts to restore the diaconate in the Latin Catholic Church as an emergency measure to make up for the lack of priests.

3. The creed and the preaching of the gospel will find new ways of making themselves felt in the Church of the future. Precisely in order that 'no other gospel' may be proclaimed or believed than that which is ever ancient and ever new, the interpretation of it must be presented in a different form from what was formerly the case. For in a world governed by different perspectives of thought and living it would inevitably become different in a bad sense if we sought to 'interpret' and present the preaching of the gospel in the future simply in the same way as it has been interpreted and presented hitherto. The only possible way for ensuring that it shall really remain the same is to introduce the right kind of changes. What this will mean in the concrete is difficult to predict. Perhaps amongst other things we can say this much:

a) What is signified by, and so badly formulated as the programme of 'demythologizing' and the 'existential interpretation' will, once it is both boldly and rightly carried through, become obvious. We will gradually learn in our reading of the scripture and the ancient creeds so to 'translate' them that we no longer notice at all that we are 'translating'. Instead the ancient truth contained in them will spontaneously find expression in terms which correspond to our own perspectives of thought. This does not imply that the kind of 'translation' arrived at by the school of demythologizing up to the present is correct, or that it does justice to the abiding gospel. We must recognize that an intrinsic element in that part of man's understanding of his own significance that endures is his commitment to real history (and not merely to speaking about historicity at the formal level). From our contemporary perspectives of thought we do not merely criticize those to be found in the scripture, but use the perspectives found there, and still more the actual statements contained in it, to criticize our own viewpoints. In other words we must allow them to spring up ever afresh, and to be transformed. We must not be too hasty to bring our considerations to an end. We must not be too hasty in refusing to advance beyond the point where we recognize a pluralism of theologies in scripture (though this is certainly present there). Instead we must take upon ourselves the task which this involves of achieving a synthesis (however imperfect this may be). And if we do all this then I cannot see why the basic task and the methods characterized by the sinister term 'demythologizing' will not be able to lead in the future to a new kind of theology, a theology which, while it will certainly lead man into the mystery of God, and not into the realm of a flat rationalistic humanism, will nevertheless also eliminate many difficulties of interpretation which modern man labours under with regard to the Christian message, and which we should not regard as of no account. And in all this this will

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

still continue to be a wholly 'orthodox' theology of the ancient gospel, or alternatively it will preserve such a theology. Of course this is primarily a general programme, an overall vision for the future. But at the same time it is also a firm Christian hope. Let us attempt to treat of this point a little more in detail.

b) It seems to me that Christian theology, the moment it solves to some extent the general task that is laid upon it in view of the contemporary climate of ideas, should and could arrive at a quite new and simple statement of the Christian message. The simple statement that contains the whole is always the most difficult; not the most facile, slipped in with a seeming show of plausibility by the worst kind of over-simplification, but rather the prize won by putting forth our utmost efforts of thought. At least this is the case today, and will be so tomorrow. Yet we should achieve a position in which we are able to say to a modern educated unbeliever within the space of at most half an hour what we Christians really believe,[4] and that too in such a way that this does not strike him simply as incomprehensible and beyond his powers of assimilation, as though it were like an exposition of Tibetan medicine. Do we really manage this? Are we already in a position to do it today? The recitation of the Apostles' Creed [212] is unsuitable for this purpose, even though it still constitutes an authentic confession of what is our faith even today. Again a 'penny catechism' of the common sort cannot be used for this purpose, quite apart from the fact that it is unsuitable for children as such. In arriving at such a basic statement of our faith we are no longer, for instance, in a position to assume from the outset that everyone knows what is meant by the word 'God'. We must not formulate the doctrine of the Incarnation of the divine Logos in such a way that it sounds like sheer mythology to our contemporaries. We could uncompromisingly begin at that point at which the christology prior to Paul and John began, namely with the man Jesus of Nazareth. For instance in speaking his Resurrection we should from the outset present it in such a way that while continuing to be the miracle par excellence it is interpreted initially as a manifestation of the assertion of our own selfhood, grace-given and absolute, and in doing this we should ensure that it is not a limine misunderstood as a miraculous return of a dead man into our sphere of existence. I nourish the hope (to express the matter somewhat paradoxically for the moment) that a new symbolum apostolicum will have to be composed for the Church of the future, though this is not to say that the old one will be done away with.

c) The future theology cannot surrender anything which belongs to the genuine content of the ancient faith. Yet surely in all realism we must recognize the fact that in the case of most men the catechism of real Christian living in its fulness, and the learned catechism of theology are not identical; that there simply is, and can be, a blending of fides explicita and fides implicita and moreover one that varies. And if we do recognize this then there is no objection in principle to the idea that the real catechism of the heart in future Christianity will be organized on quite different lines from the ones which prevail today; that in it what are points of departure today will be points of arrival tomorrow; that themes concerned with a particular area of theology which seem difficult today will constitute the initial and almost obvious axioms of tomorrow, etc. Thus for instance it may be the case (to take only a random example) that the conviction of the universal will to save on God's part will be one of the starting-points in a history of grace and revelation which is co-extensive with the history of human thought for a consideration of why despite this fact there should be a special history of revelation extending from Moses to Jesus, or why the idea of 'Church' should continue to be meaningful. Today, on the contrary, we are still toiling to find a starting-point in this

[4] For an orientation on the efforts which have been made to arrive at a brief formula of the faith cf. 'Reflections on the Problems Involved in Devizing a Short Formula of the Faith', Theological Investigations XI (London, 1973), pp. 230-244 (with bibliog.).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

particular history of salvation and revelation, and only timidly seeking to discover the universal will of God to save as it works throughout the whole history of [213] mankind. In view of the historical vicissitudes to which human knowledge is subject we should not for one moment expect that all elements in the Christian faith will be equally explicit at all times, that the points of access and points of departure, the basic concepts accepted hic et nunc as needing no further explanation will always remain the same. The question, 'how can I discover a gracious God?' will always remain a decisive theme for Christian living and Christian doctrine. But this is still far from saying that it will remain the point of departure and the essential heart and centre in the preaching of the Church of tomorrow. Certainly we must not transform Christian doctrine into a formal hermeneutics of language about God, and so empty it of its real significance. But at the same time there is no need on this account to exclude the possibility that one who has stated in appropriate and acceptable terms what language about God is really intended to convey may not ipso facto have expressed the content of, or at least the point of departure attainable by us of today and tomorrow for this understanding of the God of grace in his fathomless compassion. Truly we cannot reduce Christianity to a shallow humanistic love of neighbour. But again this is not to say that in the future love of neighbour may not be the key term, or one of the key terms, which, interpreted in all its radical immeasurability, leads us on into all the mysteries of Christianity. We not merely may, we should arrive at such shifts of perspective in our preaching for the future. We should arrive at a theology which from the outset takes as its starting-point man's experience of himself, and which can do this because even prior to our preaching this theology falls under God's grace. We should arrive at a theology which from the outset has its place within an evolutive and historical 'Weltanschauung', however true it may be that the theology must provide a standard of criticism for the Weltanschauung in that it imparts a radical dimension to it. We must arrive at a 'political theology', one which does not reduce Christianity from the outset to the private and interior sphere. We must arrive at a theology in which God, while infinitely transcending all other beings, still does not properly speaking move the world 'from without', but rather, overcoming the dilemma of transcendence and immanence, constitutes the innermost grace-given mystery of the world. We must arrive at a theology which does not seek to contain the mystery of God within its own system of co-ordinates, but rather launches man into these unnameable depths which constitute the incomprehensibility of love.

d) One further point should be noticed, namely that a theology of this kind, which really speaks to the man of today and tomorrow, is surely too the most 'ecumenical' theology of all. The theologies of the separated [214] Churches will achieve the most fruitful encounter and understanding if all of them, each from the point of departure given to it by its own historical background, transform themselves into the theology of the future Church, and discover that 'hierarchy of truths' which corresponds to the situation prevailing for the time being in the future.

4. What will be the attitude of the separated Churches towards one another in the future? This is a question which can be answered only with difficulty. But perhaps a few points can hopefully be raised[5].

a) All the Churches in a pluralistic society, if and in so far as they still remain as separate, will everywhere and in all countries have the status of diaspora Churches. They will count themselves fortunate if in order to avoid total disintegration and death, this society does not find refuge in a totalitarian state dominated by a forced ideology. Such an ideology would certainly not be Christian. On the contrary in its irreconcilability with Christianity it would be

[5] On this point cf. also the fuller presentation, 'On the Theology of the Ecumenical Discussion', Theological Investigations XI (London, 1973), pp. 24-67.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

forced at the social level to declare Christianity to be the enemy of society and the state in a quite new manner and, from the point of view of this society, this would represent the mere instinct for self-survival. In any case, however, these separated Churches will spontaneously be drawn closer together in the one diaspora situation applying to them all. Without prejudice to the question of truth many of the controversies dividing the Churches will inevitably lose something of their force in the actual circumstances prevailing. If God becomes the one radical question for all Christians instead of merely being the assumption which they all hold in common, it will simply be impossible for them any longer to feel so separated by the question of the Pope as was the case between the sixteenth and nineteenth centuries. And there will be no lack of tasks and decisions in relation to the secularized world in which the Churches, provided they live with one another and not merely side by side with one another, can bear witness in common to the gospel of the liberating grace of God and of eternal life leading to the absolute future of God, taking these as enduring standards by which to evaluate all 'this worldly' ideologies in both theory and practice. Much that is involved in this common witness could also achieve a common institutional basis, and in addition the situation appears to be such that God will bestow the same or corresponding charismata on the different Churches. Admittedly a necessary prior condition for the Churches drawing together in this way in the diaspora situation prevailing in the world of today and tomorrow will be that we avoid falsely playing down the difference of opinion that [215] still separate the Churches and that still have to be taken seriously in such a way that we assume the position, whether implicitly or explicitly, that the Churches have arrived at a common basic credal formulation of the gospel in the eyes of the world, one that already causes them to exhibit a real and genuine unity in relation to the world, and again we must not arrive at a false formula of unification such as is quite incapable of providing a basis for a common decision as to the task of the Churches for the world.

b) All the Churches, including the Roman Catholic one, will have to reckon in the future with a greater degree of pluralism among the theologies upheld within each Church. For our present purposes we may take it that the validity of this statement is recognized without any further explanation or justifying arguments.[6] But it does not merely imply a more difficult situation than formerly for each of the individual Churches taken separately with regard to the need to preserve substantially the same creed within each individual Church. It also implies a greater opportunity for the separated Churches to arrive at a better theological understanding among themselves. Already even now it is recognized that today very vital theological positions cut clean across the boundaries dividing the Churches. Indeed theological controversies within the Churches are no longer identical with the traditional controversies which separated them in the past. Admittedly, though it is hardly possible to dispute this finding, a further point should be added to it, even though it may sound hard to many ears and must not be misinterpreted as an attitude of presumptuousness on the part of the beati possidentes. The Protestant Christian and theologian who seeks to maintain the credo of the fathers of his Church must nevertheless ask himself today how and why he can maintain a state of association in Church matters and in worship with Christians whose interpretation of Christianity differs from his own far more radically and fundamentally than from the Catholic creed. I know that the question is not easy. I know that it is open to such a Christian and theologian to say that for the sake of freedom of conscience and doctrine he can tolerate such more radical forms of heresy within his Church because in fact they form no part of the creed of his Church. Doctrines in the Roman Church on the other hand which, so far as he is concerned impose a separation between the Churches, are regarded as intrinsically belonging

[6] On this cf. 'Pluralism in Theology and the Unity of the Creed in the Church', Theological Investigations XI (London, 1973), pp. 3-23.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

to official Catholic dogma. This reply, in itself understandable, could admittedly lead on to the further question of whether there is not a certain way of tolerating [216] specific and radical 'heresies' which is equivalent to recognizing them as equally justified as the tenets of his own Church, whereas logically speaking this is impossible. However this may be, the only real point which I would make is this: the growing pluralism among the theologies practised within the individual Churches including the Catholic Church opens up, although perhaps only gradually, a possibility for the future of being in a better position to decide what really belongs to the creed in which a Church must be at one, and what constitutes mere theological interpretation of this one creed on the part of particular schools. For at this level there is no need whatever for all the members of a given Church to be at one in order to be able to live within her single fold. If the difference between creed and theology, not merely in individual points of material content but at the essential and formal level were then made still clearer, and if it were shown that despite its essential content, with its orientation to history creed is precisely not simply 'doctrine', then this situation of a pluralism in theology which prevails in the Churches today and will prevail tomorrow would lead us to expect a greater possibility of the Churches no longer having to be disunited and separated from one another in the creed.[7]

I have made only a few points with regard to the future of the Church. Properly speaking one could and should say much more, especially with regard to the positive opportunities open to Christianity. And precisely on this point there would be much to say. For however much Christianity may be threatened by an explicitly formulated atheism or by the kind of atheism which has to a large extent ceased to pose any kind of religious question at all, still this situation has a positive significance for Christianity as well – not merely that of 'purifying' the concept of God in itself of which even the Second Vatican Council speaks, but also the significance that in a situation of this kind no new religions emerge. Yet so long as [217] religion remains – and it will remain, because man will again and again raise the question of the meaning of the totality of his existence, then the religion that does remain and is not constructed anew will be precisely that of Christianity. In a world civilization that has become one and homogeneous the different religions can no longer in the long run exist without mutual influence upon, and 'interpenetration of' one another. But in this mutual exchange Christianity will be the determining factor, because even from the empirical point of view it is the most comprehensive religion, the one that allows for most variations and is least of all attached to a specific cultural milieu.

For the Christian who is not merely a philosopher or a sociologist of culture and religion there is however one final point to be made in conclusion, and it is the most important and the crucial one: the future does not simply come in the course of a natural unfolding or as a blind fate. Rather it is wrought out in the solitary decision of the heart. In the last analysis our task is not to orientate ourselves to a future which we have already worked out beforehand, but rather to create it in a spirit of unreserved commitment and hope, fashioning it by our own decision. And this means that our glance into the future of Christianity and the Church has one message for us and only one: If you believe, if you commit yourself by hoping against all

[7] With regard to the question of what form the relationship between the Christian Churches will probably assume in the future we must view this question from yet another and quite different standpoint. The ecumenical efforts and dialogues proceed, whether tacitly or explicitly, from the assumption that the Churches involved are, regarded each in itself, homogeneous (ideologically determined) major groups, each with a firm body of doctrine (called 'creed'). It is assumed that so far as this is concerned the only disunity is between Church and Church, and therefore that they can precisely not be united. This assumption may be theologically correct, but from the point of view of the sociology of religion it is a figment of the imagination which, so far as the ecumenical question is concerned, is made a substitute for looking into the future. For further details on this point cf. the article, 'On the Theology of the Ecumenical Discussion', Theological Investigations XI (London, 1973), pp. 24-67.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

hope as the Apostle says Abraham did, then this position of faith, with the total and unreserved commitment which it involves, will of itself usher in the future which God has promised to those who believe in Jesus Christ and to his Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[218]

12

ON THE STRUCTURE OF THE PEOPLE OF THE CHURCH TODAY

The Church is neither an idea, nor a principle, nor a postulate. Nor is she simply or merely identical with that which she believes as having been promised to her by God and, moreover, ever destined in its essence to be kept alive by the power of God's predestinating grace, such that in its essentials the content of her belief will never simply cease to be a concrete reality. She is a 'visible' Church, the 'people of God' in the concrete, a social entity, a formal group, an institution in the world with all that that entails, and that too not merely in virtue of her 'nature' as instituted by God, but also in virtue of all that is in her and pertaining to her. This is because and to the extent that she is an institutionalized group of individuals who bring into this institution something different from, and more than merely that which is recognized as belonging to the Church by an ecclesiology treating of the Church's nature. If therefore the Church is to act aright, and in a manner appropriate to the particular situation prevailing at any given time (and this is something that pastoral theology has to enquire into), then she must be aware of what she is in this particular quite concrete sense. It is the constant temptation of the Church to conceive of herself merely in terms of her own nature ('juris divini'), and to conceal from herself her real concrete reality by hiding it behind this portrayal of her nature, in other words behind that which she should be. And this is all the more possible because at the same time she always is that which she must be, and this bold confession that of her nature she is what she ought to be itself belongs to this nature of hers as constantly maintained in existence by the grace of God. But in order to be able to act in a manner appropriate to the situation she must not overlook her historical and social reality, which is not simply identical with her nature. On this basis the question of the 'structure of the people of the Church' constitutes a serious question for pastoral theology. Merely on the basis of her nature there would be nothing to say with regard to this structure (or at least this seems to be the case) further than what is laid down in 'Lumen Gentium' [219] with regard to the essential structures of the people of God which is the Church. Certainly this is of fundamental importance, but it is not all, because it does not describe the concrete form which the Church assumes here and now. This is all the more true because 'people of God' and 'people of the Church' are not identical concepts. 'People of God' is to be understood as equivalent to 'Church', 'people of the Church' as equivalent to the laity. It is true that much has been said at the theological level concerning the laity in the Church at the Second Vatican Council. But hardly anything has been said which directly concerns the sociological structure which belong to the position of laymen. The people of the Church as constituted by the laity is described merely in terms of the Church's nature, or at most quite general characteristics (such as sex, age, education, professional life) have been introduced into this picture.

Now there certainly are structures of the people of the Church which are present within the Church simply because she is made up of men who are subject to natural conditions. An ecclesiological monophysitism has no place in a Catholic ecclesiology or pastoral theology. This human factor in the Church is not merely something inevitable that has to be put up with, or an irreducible remnant in a Church which properly speaking should be the invisible Church of the predestined. The human factor, including, therefore, the social life of man (with all that should be the case and all that is so merely de facto) is – 'undivided and unmixed' – an intrinsic element in the Church herself. In the light of this it is in itself permissible, indeed obligatory, to enter into a description of the 'structures of the people of the Church', using for the purpose secular sociological categories and models. In itself this is a point of which we have always in principle been aware. The old key phrase, 'societas perfecta' as used in ecclesiology still has a good sense even today, although we of today recognize more clearly that on this basis alone the hidden reality of the Church (which is accessible only to faith and hope) cannot be arrived at. When secular sociology of religion seeks to describe the Church we must not be over-sensitive in our reaction to it. It describes the human factors and (in the Church of sinners) the inhuman ones too which exist and will exist even in the Church, which is the historico-sacramental manifestation of the grace of God. For it is quite impossible for it to be this manifestation, this basic sacramental sign of grace, otherwise than through the medium of this human factor within her, which also falls within the purview of the secular sociologist in his study of human life.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But surely it is also permissible for a theologian as such, and on the basis of his own data and principles, to attempt to arrive at a description [220] of those structures of the people of the Church which are hardly ever discussed, if at all, in the usual presentations of ecclesiology. In doing this he is not disputing the right of the specialist in sociology in the true sense to evaluate the people of the Church by his own standards, and to classify those belonging to that people according to his own categories, producing a variegated and vivid picture different from the usual pallid portrayal of the people of the laity in the Church by viewing them as they are and not merely (as for instance in 'Lumen Gentium') as they ought to be. But it will appear that the theologian himself also has the right to use such data and such principles (of a Christian anthropology) which can help him too to arrive at a far more variegated portrayal of the people of the Church than is commonly supposed. And if from this certain conclusions have to be arrived at which are important for pastoral theology, and which emerge spontaneously in the process – so much the better. Nor is it matter for regret that the considerations proceeding from such principles often encounter structures which should be present instead of actually being so in any clear sense. In this way we can learn to recognize structures which are present in rudimentary form but are overlooked, and which, once we have become more clearly aware of them, turn out to be capable of and to require further development.

1. Man is an individual and, as endowed with freedom, every individual is unique. Certainly this is a datum of theological anthropology. But the Church's attitude towards this datum is different from that of any other society. For a secular society has to cater for what is common to all men, and merely to ensure that man's uniqueness is accorded the necessary scope. The Church, however, as the mediatrix of salvation, has as her goal that in the existence of a free being which is wholly unique in each particular case, namely his salvation. Certainly we should not overlook the radical difference between the mediating of salvation and the achievement of salvation. And in the Church too this distinction leaves the individual free in his inalienable responsibility before, and immediacy to God. The salvation of the individual neither can nor should be controlled in a totalitarian sense. It must be remembered, however, that the Church is not merely the mediatrix of salvation, but something more than this as well. As the visible community of those who genuinely believe, hope, and love, she is the historical manifestation of the event of salvation as effectively achieved and victoriously imposing itself (DS 3014; the question of how this is possible is difficult. How can that factor which is at once the most individual of all and at the same time the most total of all in human existence, namely its final and definitive value in God's eyes, or even merely [221] the promise of this and the process by which it is being achieved, be made available to empirical 'experience' in such a way that the Church becomes the great witness for the working of God's grace in the world? This, however, is a question which cannot be discussed here. The fact that the Church can achieve a visibility precisely of this sort is something which we simply presuppose, referring for our authority in this to DS 3014, and we shall merely draw from this the conclusions which are relevant to our present interests). But because the Church is a visible community in this sense, the personal history of the individual as uniquely vested with freedom belongs intrinsically to her. It must at least be made manifest in her, and must be capable of revealing itself for what it is. In other words the Church must make a permanent place within her for a manifestation of this sort. The biography of a 'great man' is out of place in the history of the state or of its institutions. But the life of a saint surely does have a place in the history of the Church precisely as such. The Church as such, therefore, has the duty of recognizing the great Christian personalities, the 'enthusiasts', and she must not do this only when they are dead. She must do it precisely if, and in virtue of the fact that, they are not simply the happy product of the merely institutional factors within her, but rather of the charismatic grace that moves freely within her. The official authorities in the Church are false to their own nature if they fail to respect such individuals and to make them visible in the Church. A 'pilgrimage' of the Church's officials to such 'men of God' is just as reasonable as the converse. (In former times such pilgrimages were known. Today such a thing is difficult to discover.) It would be perfectly reasonable for a certain spiritual kind of 'aristocracy' to appear in the Church even as a phenomenon in her social life, and the recognition of such an 'aristocracy' is not identical with respect for the official hierarchy. If we seek to level out this 'structure' or dimension, then we are responding to the humility of such 'men of God' in an unworthy way. A further point that will be intelligible in the light of the basic datum referred to above is that certain formal groups must emerge as the upholders of and the social manifestation of individual charisms of this kind. They must emerge in the Church as such, and as part of her manifest social image. Moreover these groups must 'emerge from below' and not as manipulated by techniques or controls from above. Thus for instance orders or members of orders are not ipso facto or of their very nature (in spite of the necessity for official recognition of them) functionaries organized to fulfil the task of the officially constituted authority in the Church. (This is at most a secondary and quite 'consequential' function). Rather they are the social manifestation [222] of the individual charisms and callings of individuals as such. And this remains true even though the 'disciples' may be shaping their lives according to an exemplary 'productive pattern established by their founder'. It is precisely as the social manifestation of individual charisms and callings in this sense that the orders and their individual members belong essentially to the Church. Now if, on this showing, exemplary Christians of this kind belong not only to the Church but also, and necessarily to her public manifestation, and if it is certainly not the case that they are a priori to be identified with those holding office in the Church, then there is or should be in the Church a movement in which the people of the Church group themselves round such charismatic personalities. And this 'structure' would not simply be identical with the grouping of the worshipping community about its official leader. We should have the courage to make room for such groups. Churches belonging to religious orders could fill this role, so long as they are not designed too much with 'normal pastoral activities' in view.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Despite all the factors of a 'mass society' to be found in her the people of the Church has become more 'individualistic', and that too not merely in the 'secular' order but in the ecclesiastical one as well. And this is in conformity with the intrinsic tendency of a community which is based, in the last analysis, on the free decision of the individual to believe. The uniform and homogeneous people of the Church of former ages, to which the hierarchy could adopt a fatherly and paternalist attitude, is becoming ever smaller in number. It its place there is an increase within this people in the number of those individuals who are vividly alive to the legitimate distinction which exists between the universal commitment of faith (as represented by the hierarchy) and the individual commitment of faith, together with the personal history of this in each individual's life. There is an increasing number of individuals in the Church who are no longer willing simply to fulfil the (passive) role of the taught, the mere recipients of directives from the hierarchy responding blindly to the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'information' supplied to them from above. Instead they seek to be selective in their acceptance of this, and wish not merely to hear but also to be heard. They demand a 'dialogue' with the hierarchy. Since salvation always takes place at the individual level (for all the institutional factors through which it is mediated), and since this individual salvation is an element in the Church as such, and even in the form of her historical manifestation, the process of 'individualization' taking place within the people of the Church is not merely a regrettable situation to which the Church is forced to reconcile herself as inevitable, but on the contrary a radical goal for the Church in [223] the achievement of her own fulness. How much still remains to be done at the institutional level in order that this process of individualization of the people of the Church may achieve its beneficial effects for the Church! It might perhaps be pointed out that 'sects' constitute (in their initial intention and origins) the socially institutionalized protest against a Church of the masses, tending to reduce all to the same level. But in reply to this we would have to say: In order to be equal to the situation in which she actually finds herself at the present the Church of today should integrate the 'sects' within herself and, while upholding the unity of the creed and of her leadership, she should maintain sufficient scope for them to operate within her. Nor should it be regarded as a criterion of whether such individualist movements are capable of integration that there shall be a total absence of friction in the process by which such individualizing movements, whether of isolated persons or of groups, are incorporated into the 'apparatus' of the Church. It is at this point that the work of the sociologist properly so called should be brought to bear. He it is who, with his own special methods, should teach us to recognize more clearly and in a more concrete form, factors which have so far precisely not been recognized from a theological standpoint.

2. Man is constantly threatened by sin and unbelief as an internal as well as an external element in his personal life. Certainly traditional ecclesiology (rightly) states on the one hand that everyone who is baptized, at least publicly professes his allegiance to the Catholic faith, and submits to the hierarchy and the unity of believers, belongs to the Church, while on the other hand there is a difference in the mode of belonging to the Church between those who belong to the holy Church 'corpore' (as sinners) but not 'corde', and those who stand under God's grace as justified. At the same time, however, as a characterization of the differences which exist between the members of the people of the Church this is still inadequate – inadequate as a description even of those differences which can be recognized from the data of theology. As applied to the various modes of belonging to the Church the norms mentioned above serve rather to reduce all to a single uniform level, instead of enabling us to recognize the differences within the people of the Church. For the difference between the sinner and the justified in their respective ways of belonging to the Church is not a sociological difference, since the basis for it (the possession of, or loss of, grace) is at least in a direct sense, and for all practical purposes, not an empirical datum, and the concept of the 'public sinner' hardly takes us any further, at any rate today. The question already appears in a somewhat different light the moment we take the abstract concept of [224] 'communio', which is one of the factors constitutive of Church membership, and seek to fill it with concrete content and to ask at what point a sufficient degree of 'communio' ceases to be present. The internal assaults through sin and unbelief manifest themselves (as in a chain process) in a state of alienation and withdrawal from the Church's life in innumerable ways and degrees, and the instance that is most evident to the sociologist is that of the 'non-practising' Catholics. The points of obscurity and controversy concerning the precise point at which such a state of alienation from the Church's life, and such a refusal to take part in it constitute an actual state of separation from the Church are well-known. The point of primary importance here is that not every refusal to participate in the Church's life ipso facto involves a loss of membership of the Church. The directly opposite thesis would materially speaking

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

lead to the position that sinners do not belong to the Church. Now there are very weighty theological grounds for holding that this thesis is untenable. This has a bearing on that grey throng made up of the weary, the indifferent, and the uninterested, and of those who, from the ideological point of view, are characterized by other and non-Christian opinions more than by faith in the Church. So long as this lack of Christianity on the part of the baptized Christian does not solidify into a clear and decisive negation of the Christian faith, such as can be recognized even at the public level, this grey throng does belong to the people of the Church, in other words to the Church herself and not merely to the objects of the solicitude of the Church (that is, of her official institutions!). Since in her explicit ecclesiology the Church regards the 'border-line Catholics' as belonging to her, she must not adopt an attitude of latent and unexplicitated Novationism by acting as though despite this it was only the 'attendants at Sunday Mass' who really belonged to her, while the rest merely had to be patiently put up with as 'bad Catholics'. However true it may be that the situation of the 'so-called border-line Catholics' also constitutes the objective manifestation of the 'sin of the world' and its unbelief, still this relationship which the 'border-line Catholics' have to the Church cannot ipso facto be diagnosed with any certainty as their personal and subjective sin. It cannot ipso facto be judged to be this even when this state has been preceded by a zealous participation in Church life during their childhood. In principle they can just as well be regarded as 'still half Catholics and Christians' as 'already half Catholics', provided the 'still' and 'already' here refer not to a practice of the faith belonging to their childhood and to a large extent to a stage when their personality had not yet developed, but to the history of a developing personal faith and life as at least possible in principle.

[225] Viewed in this light it is far from being ipso facto justifiable either objectively or as a matter of pastoral policy for us to suggest through the attitude of the clergy to those who do not regularly attend Sunday Mass that they themselves should regard themselves as centrifugal border-line Catholics. We can also adopt that attitude of Evangelical patience in which we allow them to grow in hope, and so regard them as border-line Catholics who are centripetal, as the kind of Catholics who, in the circumstances, are doing all that is appropriate here and now to their particular phase of religious development, all the more so when we consider that so long as we divide the people of the Church into those who fulfil their Sunday and Easter duties and those who do not we are, in a strange way, deciding whether individuals shall be accounted as Catholics or not not according to whether they fulfil a divine commandment but according to whether they fulfil a precept of the juris ecclesiastici. A point which we should recognize clearly once and for all is that at least from the theological point of view this distinction is a very secondary one. An adulterer or an unscrupulous and power-hungry politician is more truly a 'border-line Catholic' even when he is seen at Church on Sundays, than certain non-attenders at Sunday Mass who have not yet come to terms with this particular commandment of the Church, something which from the Christian point of view is more easily understandable and more tolerable than violating the divine commandments. The social prestige of such border-line Catholics in the Church varies very greatly according to the particular country to which they belong. An Italian intellectual who has temporarily given up practising does not feel himself so alienated from the Church on these grounds alone as a German or Englishman in the same position. In any case there is no dogmatic reason for attaching any special importance to the Church-going prestige of such Catholics. In this connection it would already be a considerable achievement if the people of the Church had a clearer awareness of the fact that the commandments of the Church have a status which is certainly relative, a fact which has been recognized by the Church herself. It can hardly be feared that even today a recognition of this would still have greater negative consequences for the zeal with which individuals practised their religion. The status of the 'border-line Catholics' in terms of the sociology of the Church carries within itself as an

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

intrinsic element its own interpretation on the part of the official Church. In the light of this alone it is a variable entity. From this point of view it could be very much altered even though to all appearances nothing is altered in the 'objective facts'. These 'border-line Catholics' cease to some extent to be 'border-line' when they are viewed from a different point of [226] view, namely as Christians who have not yet developed the course of their Christianity to that point at which an individual achieves a positive relationship to the Church and her life, something which under normal conditions is both attainable and desirable, and to be striven for as a concrete goal by those engaged in pastoral work. If the position of the 'border-line Catholics' were interpreted in this sense by public opinion in the Church, they themselves would also be more ready to understand their own position in this sense, and this (by a kind of reaction) could strengthen that development which we assume to be taking place in them in the desired direction. Hence the effects of sinfulness and assaults on the faith in the individual are also to be numbered among the structures of the people of the Church.

But even in addition to this, or abstracting from it, it would be naïve to picture the 'practising Catholics' to oneself as a crowd of uniform individuals with absolutely the same convictions in an 'ideological' sense. The fact is that faith inevitably has an individual history and development of its own, and further that there is a justifiable no less than an unjustifiable way of distinguishing between the collective commitment of faith of the Church and the individual commitment of faith of the individual. (We may, for instance, distinguish between the degrees of implicit and explicit awareness of what is contained in the faith, and between the varying degrees in which that which is conceptually believed is appropriated at the 'existential' level. Again that which is believed in theory has varying degrees of effectiveness in practical life, and these differences may be so great as to lead to 'heresies in the Church'). Now these facts give rise to the most manifold structural subdivisions within the people of the Church. The printed catechism and the unprinted catechism in the head, and above all in the heart, are not identical. Merely by way of example it may be pointed out that without any official difference of faith groups do exist within the people of the Church in whose religious life indulgences or devotion to our Lady play a significant part, and others in which for all practical purposes these factors do not exist; groups in which specific moral requirements carry a quite different weight and influence as characterizing their way of life. Precisely in those cases in which it is the effectiveness of Christianity as a force in social politics that is in question very great differences arise in the real structures of the people of the Church, but even from a theological point of view the fact that the history of the faith is ultimately not ours to shape or control should lead us to expect this. There are groups of Church Christians who live their Christianity as a basis for their social status (this must all too often be the case), and others [227] who take the message of the gospel as a critique of the social order and as a stimulus to action to bring about changes in society. There are so many ways of forming groups within the people of the Church which are ultimately based on the distinction between the commitment of faith of the Church as a whole and the personal commitment of faith of the individual considered in his own personal history.

But because this situation is precisely that of the Church herself, and because she is the Church of sinners, it is also possible to conceive of structures entering into the people of the Church which tend in a contrary direction (and it may be hoped that such structures will always be present in sufficient measure in her). There must be individuals and groups within the Church who are the representatives of a protest against the sinfulness and latent unbelief in the Church, and the Church on her side must maintain sufficient scope within herself for 'non-conformists' and 'protestants' in this sense. It is in fact simply not the case that in the points they emphasize and in their efforts to meet the demands of the particular hour and the particular age the official representatives of the Church's teaching and pastoral work are the representatives of Christianity in the absolute, pure and unalloyed in such a way that it would be impossible for any non-conformist 'protest' on the part of individuals or groups within the people of God in the Church to be directed against the officials in the Church. The worker priest movement constituted a protest group of this kind against the bourgeois tendencies developing within the Church. Were they given sufficient scope, and was their voice heard with sufficient humility?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

3. Gratia supponit naturam. This is an ancient principle, although theologically speaking it is only with difficulty that we can interpret it precisely and correctly. But let us apply it to our present question. This will yield the following conclusion: the society of the Church as such is constituted not merely by that which belongs specifically to the Church's nature (Spirit, word, sacrament, official institutions). Rather it presupposes and implies the 'natural' structures of an integrated society. If we did apply this principle it would emerge that whereas in earlier times these structures both could be and were presupposed by the Church in working out the organization of her own membership, today, because of the disintegration of society, they have to a large extent to be discovered afresh and in part created afresh by the Church herself. The parish priest with his local place of worship can no longer base himself on an already integrated village society such as existed in earlier times. But since it is no longer the case that this society is already present for him to work upon, a worshipping [228] community has a strangely ideological effect. Yet taken by themselves the common creed and cult upheld by the community are quite incapable of constituting this worshipping community as it ought to be. Anyone who holds this to be the case is running counter to the principle, gratia supponit naturam, i.e. as applied in the present instance, the social factors in the Church presuppose the social factors at the human level. If these natural structures cannot be presupposed (neighbourliness, mutual acquaintance, a readiness to help one another in the secular sphere, and the necessary conditions for all this, a common language, similar problems to face, a level of education which is to some extent homogeneous etc.) they must be created by the Church. She must constantly be looking for such structures when they are present in still rudimentary form. She must promote new initiatives in this sphere, discover and bring forward those actively engaged in promoting such structures. In our need to work out a sociology of the people of the Church we still know far too little of these structures and those who promote them: the 'natural' spokesmen of a society which aims at becoming a worshipping community, the 'trend-setters' who have a selective influence in determining which elements of the official pronouncements really shall become an effective force among the people of the Church, etc. From this aspect too there is a need for any dogmatic ecclesiology to include within its purview the researches of 'secular' sociology in order to achieve a correct view of the real structures of the people of the Church and to pay due regard to them.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[229]

13

THE FUNCTION OF THE CHURCH AS A CRITIC OF SOCIETY

The subject, 'the function of the Church as a critic of society' certainly has the utmost relevance to the contemporary situation. Everywhere in the world, and on both sides of all so-called 'curtains' the students are in revolt against the ideologies and institutions of a society that has become established and 'frozen'. When they are Christian and Catholic they demand that the Church shall take part with them in their struggle. One of the extremely wide variety of theological key-words developed today is that of 'political theology'. It has emerged in the Protestant theology of Germany and America (for instance in the works of Altizer, Cox, Marsch, Moltmann, Sauter, Shaull),[1] and also to an increasing extent in Catholic theology, chiefly in the works of J. B. Metz.[2] This political theology is already being sharpened (above all in South America) to a theology of revolution and force.[3] The Churches too [230] are already taking an official interest in the subject of political theology. In the case of the Second Vatican Council even though the actual concept of political theology has not been invoked it has ratified a long Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the World of Today. Several of the encyclicals of John XXIII and Paul VI are concerned with sociological issues and with a critique of society. On the Protestant side the same concerns are in evidence in discussions which have taken place within the framework of the World Council of Churches at Geneva and Uppsala.[4] In brief the task of the Church or of the Churches as providing a critique of society is a theme that is actual and relevant today.

It is self-evident that within the restricted scope of our present study we can put forward only a few very fragmentary observations on a theme that is so novel, so comprehensive and so difficult, and furthermore that we can have no intention of exploring all the heights and depths of a political theology of this kind.

---

[1] Cf. especially the following studies: J. Moltmann, Theologie der Hoffnung (Munich, 1964); G. Sauter, Zukunft und Verheissung (Stuttgart and Zurich, 1965); Th. J. J. Altizer, The Gospel of Christian Atheism (Philadelphia, 1966); Diskussion über die 'Theologie der Hoffnung' edited by W. D. Marsch (Munich, 1967); W. D. Marsch, Die Freiheit erlernen, Beiträge politischer Theologie (Freiburg, 1967); R. Shaull, Containment and Change (New York, 1967); idem, 'A Theological Perspective on Human Liberation', New Blackfriars, Vol. 49, No. 578 (1968), pp. 509-517; H. Cox, Der Christ als Rebell (Kassel, 2nd ed., 1968); idem, Stirb nicht im Warteraum der Zukunft (Stuttgart, 1968).

[2] Cf. J. B. Metz, Zur Theologie der Welt (Mainz, Munich, 1968); idem, 'The Church's Social Function in the Light of "Political Theology"', Concilium 6/4 (1968, Church and World), pp. 3-11; idem, Reform und Gegenreformation heute (Mainz and Munich, 1969); idem, 'Political Theology', Sacramentum Mundi 5 (New York and London, 1969), pp. 34-38. As a prise de position on political theology cf. the articles in the compendium volume entitled Diskussion zur politischen Theologie edited by H. Peukert (Munich, 1969).

[3] Material information and judgements on this are supplied by C. Jaime Snoek, 'The Third World Revolution and Christianity', Concilium 5/2 (1966, Moral Theology), pp. 18-27; J. B. Metz, 'Religion und Revolution', Neues Forum XIV (1967), pp. 460-464; 'Theologie der Revolution', Evangelische Theologie Vol 12 (1967); T. Rendtorff and H. E. Tödt edd., Theologie der Revolution (Frankfurt, 1968); on the situation in South America cf. also the bibliography supplied in the same volume, pp. 164-165, and also J. C. Bennet (ed.), Christian Ethics in a Changing World (New York and London, 1966). For a general orientation cf. E. Feil and R. Weth edd., Diskussion zur Theologie der Revolution (Munich, 1969).

[4] Cf. the official documentation in Appell an die Kirchen der Welt. Dokumente der Weltkonferenz für Kirche und Gesellschaft edited by the Ecumenical Council of Churches (Stuttgart, 1967), and also Uppsala 68 spricht, edited by N. Goodall (Geneva, 1968). On the conference at Uppsala cf. Ökumene zwischen Routine und Erneuerung. Ein Uppsala-Report, Evangelische Kommentare 1 (1968), pp. 428-435; 'Die Vollversammlung des Weltkirchenrates in Uppsala', Herder Korrespondenz 22 (1968), pp 383-388.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

I. A Critique of the Church is Implicitly Involved in the Church's Understanding of Her Own Nature.

Before attempting to say something of the sociological function of the Church with regard to secular society, it will be useful, by way of preliminary, to offer a few remarks with regard to the possibility of, and the necessity for a sociological and political critique of the Church herself. For practical purposes and in the concrete a critique of the Church herself of this kind is the necessary prior condition enabling her to fulfil her function as providing a sociological critique of society, something which is demanded of her today, and that too on the assumption and with the impression that she is not de facto fulfilling this function to a sufficient extent, and is herself insufficiently equipped for the fulfilling of it. These [231] facts in themselves are sufficient to justify the approach we are taking here.

The Church is a social entity. She is this even as embodied in the different Churches, and even though at the theoretical level these Churches have a very different theological understanding of their own nature, and that too precisely with regard to their sociological constitution. All Churches are institutionally constituted. They have social structures and institutions, and even though they may not wish to do so, they do in fact exercise an authority which is prior to the free decision and assent of the individuals within them. They do this not merely with regard to society in general, but also with regard to the individual and the smaller groups belonging to these Churches themselves. The Church and the Churches are themselves social entities. In the light of this it is obvious that they are inevitably exposed to the dangers which threaten every process of social institutionalization, namely that these institutions do not adapt themselves swiftly enough to the changes in the historical situation, that they are made an end in themselves, that they become merely conservative forces which lose living contact with other social realities. From this point of view alone it is clear that with regard to the concrete forms of social institutionalization which she has undergone the Church is open ever anew to criticism, and stands in need of criticism even while that understanding of her nature which derives from the Church's own faith credits her with an ultimately abiding identity persisting throughout history and in accordance with the will of her founder. If, as the Second Vatican Council says, the Church always remains an ecclesia semper reformanda, then there can be no doubt that this applies not merely to her 'moral' situation, and does not merely imply that as a sinful Church of sinners[5] she must take refuge again and again from her own sinfulness in the grace of God in Christ. It also implies that she stands again and again in need of reform in respect of her forms of institutionalism. Applying this to the Catholic Church, it means, for instance, that the relationship between clergy and the people of the Church, the relationship between centralization in the Church and autonomy on the part of the subdivisions of the Church, the introduction of democratic structures, and much else besides, constitute subject-matter for an ever-fresh enquiry, and are subject to historical change even though, on a Catholic understanding of the Church certain specific structures belong to the jus divinum of the Church and are abiding. For our present purposes, however, it will not be the individual material details of a [232] critique of the sociological aspects of the Church of this kind that we shall be considering, because this would lead us too far from what is our real theme.

Let us confine ourselves to adding one further observation with regard to the sociological and political criticism of the Church herself. Only a Church with a clear and unambiguous creed and dogma can be subjected to this critique. The dogma is itself the necessary prior [5] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'The Church of Sinners' and 'The Sinful Church in the Decrees of Vatican II', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 253-269 and 270-294.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

condition for a critique.[6] This statement may sound surprising. Nevertheless it seems to me to be valid. Obviously it is possible to apply negative criticisms to a social institution from a standpoint which it itself does not share. But in that case all that we can do is precisely to apply negative criticisms to it. We can only transform an institution by criticizing it precisely if we can appeal in this criticism of ours to its own understanding of its nature, if we can demonstrate to it that the actual concrete form it has come to assume is, at least in part, in contradiction to that which it recognizes as its own true nature, as the law governing its initial emergence, and which it itself seeks to approximate to ever anew, albeit as an asymptotic ideal. But in the nature of the case this means that when we develop a critique of the Church we do so on the basis of her own theological understanding of her own nature, in other words, of her own dogma. Thus this critique can constitute an intrinsic element in herself. It is not a critique ab externo which either fails to affect her or else destroys her. Rather it is a critique from within, based on the intrinsic tension within her between that which she herself seeks to be and that which she de facto is. This interior critique as an element in the Church herself does not cease to be interior to her merely because this critique always at the same time takes occasion of an external historical situation in which the Church is involved at the secular level, and needs to take occasion of this in order to emerge and to become articulate. Opposition, criticism, protest, belong to the very life of the Church herself because she recognizes her own nature as the pilgrim Church, the Church of justice, of respect for the dignity of man, of love etc., and of its very nature such criticism provides weapons to be used in the war against her own inadequacies. Any sociological critique of the Church herself is itself an element in the Church precisely at those points at which in the name of the Church herself it protests against such inadequacies, [233] where the critique as such is based upon a committed faith in her. However, a critique of the Church in the name of the Church is always possible because her own understanding of her own nature is always wider, freer, and more exalted than that which is de facto realized in the form which she assumes in history, and is in fact wider in scope than that which we have already formulated to ourselves about her at the level of speculation and theory. To understand the significance of a critique of the Church conducted from within the Church herself in this way does not mean that the critical dialogue with the official Church which we conduct must always take the form simply of a peaceful and friendly discussion between two bodies who are at basis totally at one from the first. We can already see in the controversy between Peter and Paul that this critical dialogue can also take the form of a face-to-face confrontation, a genuine struggle as to the shape of a future which neither of the disputants can plan beforehand in any adequate sense.

II. The Self-Critical Church as an Authoritative Critic of Society

This brings us to our real theme, namely the function of this Church as a critic of society when she is herself in turn subject to criticism, and changes in response to it. First let us put forward considerations with regard to why a function of criticizing society of this kind is to be ascribed to the Church on the basis of her own understanding of her own nature.

1. The Distinction Between Criticism of Society on the Church's Part and Political Action.

[6] Dogma, considered as the Christian Church's articulation of her awareness of her own nature, constitutes on the one hand the basis from which the Church (in contrast to other forces of criticism) is able to criticize the world and society from her own standpoint, and on the other the standard by which to determine more precisely the goal of such criticism.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In order to avoid from the outset certain misunderstandings which it is very easy to fall into it must first be emphasized that the thesis concerning the function of the Church as a critic of society is not intended to conjure up the idea of a Church actively engaged in politics. It is obvious that the Church cannot deprive secular society and the institutions belonging to it of its political decision making, and also that it has no intention of doing this; that the Church cannot act as a higher authority to manipulate or control this autonomous secular society.[7] Perhaps it is true that in the course of history she often has done this, sometimes for good reasons and sometimes for bad. But she should not do it, and moreover she has [234] basically and explicitly committed herself to this principle in ever clearer measure. Culture, history, society, state and the economy are all matters which the Church neither can nor should in any direct sense control, guide, or manipulate. Nor is it possible to justify such a course on her part by invoking the so-called natural law, even though the Church considers herself to be the guardian and interpreter of this. For even this natural law, considered as the sum total of those demands which have a permanent claim to be recognized as valid by man in his decisions has itself a history and, what is more important still, it does not in itself yield any absolutely unreserved and concrete imperatives such as would deprive man and society of the power to commit themselves to historical decisions, and such as could be arrived at deductively by the Church herself. The function of the Church as a critic of society, therefore, does not imply that the Church herself should engage in politics either explicitly or behind the scenes. Obviously in her position as one social group within a pluralistic society[8] she both can and should defend and maintain the position that her members, even as constituted in free social groupings, have the right to exercise an influence on society as a whole in legitimate ways, and has the same rights in this respect as any group in a society of this kind. The Church can proclaim and put forward those moral maxims which she regards as norms defining the limits within which every moral decision, and so too every political decision, must fall. And she can do this without exercising any illegitimate compulsion upon others. Again with regard to power, even though this may be engaged on the side either of sin or of the kingdom of God in the world, the Church can develop a theology of power[9] through which she can, under certain circumstances, communicate to those actively engaged in politics a more or less impartial attitude towards power. But presumably this is still far from being sufficient to enable us to achieve a clear view of the true function of the Church as a critic of society, a function which in no sense consists in political activity on the part of the Church herself. It is not easy to define in the abstract what this function of the Church as a critic of society is, having due regard to these [235] factors. Indeed if the function of criticizing society is intended precisely to be a critique of existing practical activities with a view to further practical activities – in other words a stimulus designed to bring about a real alteration in society, and not merely a theory of what social activity ought to be – it is in principle quite impossible to obtain an idea of it by means of a mere theoretical and general statement of its nature, just as it is quite impossible in any adequate sense to reduce will to intellect, hope to faith, practice to theory, orthodox practice to orthodox thought. With this proviso, which in spite of its decisive importance cannot be thought out any more fully at this

[7] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'On the Theological Problems Entailed in a "Pastoral Constitution" ', Theological Investigations X (London and Freiburg, 1973), pp. 293-317; idem, 'Theological Reflections on the Problem of Secularization', ibid., pp. 318-348; idem, Gnade als Freiheit (Freiburg, 1968), esp. pp. 64-67, 80-82.
[8] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Reflections on Dialogue Within a Pluralistic Society', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 31-42; idem, Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1 (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 208-214.
[9] For an introduction to the problems involved cf. R. Hauser, 'Macht', Handbuch theologische Grundbegriffe II (Munich, 1963), pp. 98-111 (bibliog.). In addition to this cf. esp. K. Rahner, 'The Theology of Power', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 391-409; idem, Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/2 (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 358 ff., 362 ff., 365 ff. (bibliog. pp. 337-341).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

point, we may attempt to make the following statement with regard to the nature of the function of the Church as critic of society: It consists in opening up ever anew a perspective which transcends the concrete social reality such that within this perspective the social reality concerned appears in its relative value, and so as capable of alteration. To the recognition of this relative value and alterability of the social reality as it de facto exists it adds a further factor. For it provides the opportunity and the power to introduce practical changes into this reality even though it does not supply with this any concrete formula or any absolute imperative for a quite specific new social reality to be introduced by the use of creative forces in history. It cannot supply any such concrete formula and does not seek to do so. In other words this function of the Church as critic of society does not ipso facto or in itself constitute any absolute political decision.

2. The Origins of the Perspective Provided by the Church as Critic of Society as Found in the Gospel Itself.

This critical perspective as applied to social realities and changes in social politics can, to the extent that it is opened up by the Church, only be the gospel which the Church preaches and lives by,[10] though of course this is not to deny, but rather to maintain, that the Church herself needs to be brought back ever anew by her own Spirit to this gospel as providing the perspective for social criticism. She needs to be brought back to it by her own history, to which the history of the world itself belongs. The task to which we must now apply ourselves, therefore, is first to throw light in somewhat greater detail on the question of why and how the [236] gospel of the Church has the significance of providing a perspective of this kind, opening up possibilities for social criticism.

The first point to be considered is concerned with the difference and the separation that has grown up today between the Church and secular society.[11] This is something which more clearly than in former times makes it possible and requisite for the Church to adopt a critical position with regard to society. And it is a factor which ultimately corresponds to the nature of the Church herself, albeit only in her later historical development. Let us consider the process by which the world has been de-numinized. From a position in which it and man himself constituted a static reality controlled by God and representing him directly, and immutably prior to the exercise of man's own freedom, it has come to be material for man himself to control by the free exercise of his critical faculties. This therefore is the process of secularization,[12] and despite the danger of a sinful and atheistic interpretation inherent in it it is a process which, ultimately speaking, has been demanded and initiated by Christianity's own understanding of God, of the world, of man, of history, and of the nature of the Church

[10] If the Church seeks adequately to reproduce in her own life that impulse which she must of necessity receive from any critical theory of society, her way of achieving this should not be through any excessive application of theological concepts or through the mere further exploitation of a borrowed conceptual apparatus. Instead she must achieve it by seeking the answer she needs from the gospel, critically enquiring into it and submitting herself to the message it yields.

[11] For basic information on this complex cf. Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie I (Freiburg, 1964), pp. 415-448; II/1, pp. 222-233; II/2, pp. 109-267. In particular in the context of our present enquiry cf. W. D. Marsch, Gegenwart Christi in der Gesellschaft (Munich, 1965).

[12] On the principles governing the relationship between the Church and the world cf. K. Rahner, 'Kirche und Welt', Zehn Jahre katholische Akademie in Bayern edited by the same (Würzburg, 1967), pp. 9-27; idem, 'Theological Reflections on the Problems of Secularization', Theological Investigations X (London and New York, 1973), pp. 318-348; From the comprehensive literature on this subject the following studies in particular may be mentioned: H. Cox, Stadt ohne Gott (Stuttgart, 3rd ed., 1967); F. Gogarten, Verhängnis und Hoffnung der Neuzeit (Stuttgart, 2nd ed., 1958); H. Lübbe, Säkularisierung (Freiburg and Munich, 1965); H. Blumenberg, Die Legitimität der Neuzeit (Frankfurt, 1966).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

herself. This remains true even though the Church as she exists in the concrete has very often sought in matters of detail to close herself to this development and to act against her own ultimate understanding of her own nature. This means that the development which leads away from the state Church and the ecclesiastical state towards a secularized world, and so too to a manifest separation between Church and secular society is legitimate, even though the concrete form which this separation has assumed has in practice always been subject to sinful corruption for which both parties are responsible.

Yet it is precisely through this separation, and only through it, that it has become more clearly possible for the Church to exercise her function as a critic of society. Certainly it is true that the Church herself is constituted [237] as a society. At the same time she has an abiding place in the world, and this means that she herself is justifiably exposed to contradiction arising from criticisms of her as a society. The reason for this is that even in this state of separation it is quite impossible for her to avoid participating in the social life of the environment in which she exists at any given time together with the short-comings inherent in it. But for all this the position in which she stands today – and moreover it is a position which she has accepted and willed – is one of greater separation from secular society and the institutions belonging to it which have critically to be called in question. The age of Constantine with the imperial Church and the bond between throne and altar is at an end, even though this stage must not be short-sightedly condemned as the age of a Church that has been made worldly, a base surrender of the gospel to a sinful world. On the contrary it can equally well be interpreted as a commitment of the Church to the world, albeit one which in the specific historical form which it assumed, was transient, and this commitment of the Church to the world is something which is precisely demanded of the Church today, albeit in a quite different form. It is also true that many remnants of this Constantinian age, with its naïve symbiosis between Church and society, gospel and world, still survive today in the most divers forms among the so-called Christian nations. Such survivals would only be qualified as reprehensible from the outset if we were to adopt the position that every social commitment in which the Church seeks to impress her Spirit upon concrete social realities as well is from the outset reprehensible.

The secularization of the present-day world, then, is something which derives historically from the spirit and intention of Christianity itself. And it is a primary condition enabling the Church to exercise a critical function with regard to society.

The Church seeks to be the mediatrix of salvation to the individual man in God's sight, working in God's power and towards him as her goal. But the Church has never interpreted this salvation in an individualistic sense as a matter of man's merely private and interior life.[13] It is true that as a result of the process by which the world has become more worldly the danger of misunderstanding Christianity, faith, religion, and salvation in this individualistic sense has become very great, and certainly it cannot be said that Christianity and the Churches have not in a measure succumbed to this temptation. The Churches can misunderstand the process of secularization by regarding it as a sign that they should withdraw into [238] themselves, into the private interior lives of their individual members and by regarding the sphere of interior conscience and the individual quest for salvation as the sole sphere in which the Church can still exist in the present-day secularized world. But any such understanding of Christianity and Church would, after all, constitute a radical misunderstanding in which the Church would find herself in contradiction to her own true understanding of her own nature.

[13] To the extent that political theology is directed against this tendency to restrict salvation to the private sphere it represents a genuine concern of the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

God's promise of himself to man is addressed not only to each individual in the freedom of his own unique personhood. From its very origins this promise is at the same time aimed at mankind as a unity, a unity which is always historically and socially constituted. It is aimed at history, society, the people of God.[14] As the subject to whom God's grace-bestowed will to save is addressed, the individual is always aimed at as the member of a community of mankind, and always and necessarily this also has a social manifestation. Original sin, saving history as a factor in the life of the community, the redemption of all through one, salvation through the mediation of the Church – these, and many other data of the Christian faith are in radical contradiction to a conception which would seek to confine Christianity exclusively to the sphere of the individual's private interior life. Salvation and grace are wrought out in that which constitutes the social basis for what is called saving history and the Church, and these are in themselves a historical and social embodiment in space and time. Now if this is true, then this reality necessarily comes into contact with other social realities, shares a common life with them in a single sphere of human existence in which there are no absolute rules of separation, and in view of this it must adopt a critical position towards, and call in question these other social realities which constitute its environment and modify them. As a reality which is constantly also achieving visible form at the social level, it is quite impossible in principle for salvation not to be concerned with the social realities within which it has to be realized and made manifest in history.

A further point is that the dimension of the explicitly sacral, of the cult and of the preaching of the gospel, is far from being identical with the dimension in which salvation is achieved.[15] This sphere in which salvation [239] is achieved is identical with the sphere of human existence in general. As the mediatrix of salvation, therefore, it is quite impossible for the Church to adopt an attitude of indifference towards this total sphere of human existence which also always involves social structures. And this is just as true as it is true that she should not determine or manipulate this sphere in any direct sense. For in fact it is an intrinsic part of what is demanded of the Christian as such – precisely that he shall commit himself to the world while it still remains worldly as a matter of his own personal venture and decision.

The possibility of the Church exercising a critical function towards secular society can be made still clearer from a different aspect. Christianity is the proclamation of the absolute hope in the absolute future which is God himself,[16] God himself in his unassailable dominion, a dominion which cannot be established by man, himself wills to be the infinite future of man, infinitely transcending all that man could ever plan or fashion for himself. The movement towards this future is implanted in the world all along by the universal will of God to save through that which in Christian terms we call grace. God himself is the sustaining ground, the ultimate perspective and orientation for the total movement of man through history, whether he is explicitly aware of it or only experiences it at the unconscious level and without acknowledging it in the movement of the personal history of his own spirit as it develops in freedom. From this standpoint, therefore, an infinite perspective of this kind and an infinite entelecheia implanted in history in this sense serve as standpoints from which to criticize and estimate the relative value of all the individual goals which can be planned and [14] As an introduction to the problems involved cf. K. Rahner, 'History of the World and Salvation History', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 97-114.

[15] On the question of desacralization cf. H. Schürmann, 'Neutestamentliche Marginalien zur Frage der "Entsakralisierung"', Der Seelsorger 38 (1968), pp. 38-48 and 89-104; Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/2, pp. 35-45; A. Th. van Leeuwen, Christentum in der Weltgeschichte. Das Heil und die Säkularisation (Stuttgart, 1967).

[16] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Marxist Utopia and the Christian Future of Man', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 59-68; idem, 'The Church and the Parousia of Christ', ibid, pp. 295-312; idem, the articles grouped under the general heading 'Eschatology' in Theological Investigations X (London and New York, 1973), pp. 235-291.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

set up on the part of historical man, and they impart to all these the character of the provisional, that which can be transcended, that which is merely transient and that which can be called in question. These finite, intermediate and individual goals and particular forms in which man realizes himself in his own history are not rendered insignificant or indifferent by this fact. On the contrary it is precisely in virtue of this alone that they achieve their radical importance and their inexorable seriousness. For it is only through them, and not in by-passing them, that man can realize his assent of faith and hope to his absolute future. But precisely as particular goals of this kind, and as being never [240] more than provisional and capable of being transcended, they are subject to critical evaluation from the standpoint of a higher goal. This is that perspective of infinitude, that infinite point of orientation, which man has come to terms with as such and in itself once he has been endowed with grace. A further point is that this ultimate and infinite point of orientation is something far more than merely that which enables man constantly to set before him particular goals definable in terms of subordinate categories of being. But the critical evaluation of these particular and 'this worldly' goals from this standpoint is not merely a formal disclosure of their relative status. As has already been said, a mutually conditioning relationship does in fact exist between the experience and the acceptance in faith of the absolute future of God on the one hand, and the realization of 'this worldly' tasks and goals on the other.

The assent to the absolute future of God, and so the recognition of the relative status of these 'this worldly' goals, is achieved in the affirmation of these particular goals within history, and not in a mere attitude of discarding them in a flight from the world. And the recognition of their relative status, so far from diminishing their importance, actually increases it.[17]

We can achieve a realization of how possible it is for the gospel and the Church as representative of this gospel to exercise a critical function in relation to society from yet another point of view, and one that is very well known to Christians, namely from the Christian perception of the unity between love of God and love of neighbour.[18] It is a basic conviction of the gospel that love of God can be effectively realized in the transient state only in the act of love of neighbour, and that love of neighbour achieves its radical depths and its absolute significance only when either explicitly, or at any rate in a state in which it has not been consciously formulated, it itself constitutes love of God as the innermost reality of man. This is something which we must plainly recognize, and in doing so we must grasp the fact that love of neighbour is no mere matter of natural disposition, or of some private inclination of our own towards someone else. On the contrary it is an act which has to permeate all the social dimensions of human life, and which implies soberly and realistically giving others their due and respecting their freedom in the social sphere as well. A further [241] point which we must recognize is that this love of neighbour as understood here has to impose its influence in a world that is constantly sinful, a world of injustice and self-alienation on man's part. And once we recognize all this, then it becomes clear that this unity between love of God and love of neighbour implies an attitude of protest and criticism of society.

Finally attention may be drawn to one last aspect from which we can achieve a further insight into what is meant by saying that the Church has the function of criticizing society. The gospel is always and essentially a gospel of the Cross as well, of the acceptance of failure and death within this world in a spirit of faith and hope. Christian theology is always a theology of the Cross. Even the Cross should not be interpreted in a private sense. The death of Christ is certainly not the death of a social revolutionary who, in his activities merely as a [17] In this connection cf. K. Rahner, 'The Question of the Future' in this volume pp. 181-201.

[18] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Reflections on the Unity of the Love of Neighbour and the Love of God', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 231-249.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation critic of society and nothing more, is reduced to failure. At the same time, however, this death of his did take place in the social and public life of Israel, and in a hostile confrontation with the social forces and institutions then prevailing. It was no merely private fate which befell him but a public one, a political event, if we like to express it in these terms. If we cannot be Christians except by following our crucified Lord in the assent of faith and hope to all the futility of human existence, which at least in death achieves its most radical and palpable manifestation, if, furthermore, this act of faith and hope in accepting the futility of existence on the part of the Christian has to be posited not merely in purely cultic acts or in the private and interior sphere alone, but in the hard down-to-earth secular sphere of the Christian's worldly life, then it follows that from his Christian understanding of existence the Christian can find the understanding and the courage to venture upon that commitment which he has to take upon himself without any assurance of success and which has to be ventured upon in any really effective attempt at achieving social change in the struggle against all the forces in society that cling onto their own selfish interests.[19]

[242] 3. The Upholders of the Function of Criticizing Society in the Church.

From the question of why and how the function of criticizing society is in principle to be attributed to the Church on the basis of the gospel we now turn to another question, that namely of who are the upholders of this function in the Church.

When we speak of the function of the Church as a critic of society, we are influenced by a certain concept of the Church which in practice still persists and has not wholly been overcome. This leads us to think primarily of the official Church and so of the hierarchy. In fact the protest of young Catholics of the present day, of the 'critical' movement in Catholicism, of the 'Kapo' etc., constantly involves a reproach levelled against the officially appointed authorities of the Church for their lack of commitment to social criticism. Indeed this protest goes so far as to accuse them of entering into an unChristian union with the social establishment.[20] This means that it is assumed, whether tacitly or explicitly, that it is precisely in her officially appointed authorities that the Church must discharge this function of hers of social criticism. Now certainly it is justifiable to say that a function of this kind also belongs to the officially appointed authorities in the Church as such. At the same time, however, we must recognize what this function precisely consists in and what limitations are imposed upon it to the extent that it has to be exercised precisely by the officially appointed authorities as such. The true nature of this function of criticizing society as exercised by the officially appointed authorities as such has hardly been thought out as yet at the theological level. For perhaps two hundred years we have been accustomed to distinguish the basic task of the [19] Clearly we cannot treat of all the possibilities here, as for instance the question of whether a basis can be found for the function of the Church as critic of society in that problem of biblical criticism, the 'delay of the Parousia', or whether it can be arrived at through a discussion of the reproach that earlier presentations of eschatology have been lacking in any historical sense.

A further point to be considered as a counter to that reproach which is often too hastily raised, namely that Christianity has restricted itself to the 'private' sphere, is that even the most 'private' form of religion, provided only that it is genuine and vital in its practice, necessarily has extremely significant social effects. For instance it can bring man to the point of recognizing the evil elements in his existence as merely 'relative' and to experience them as such instead of according them an 'absolute' status. Any enquiry into a function of social criticism should not neglect this simple fact.

[20] 'Kapo' = 'Catholic Extraparliamentarian Opposition'. However it is not the opposition groups among Catholics who have initiated this reproach. Rather it has already been expressed in far sharper form in other works in which it is used to express the suspicion of those concerned that the Church is collaborating with the ruling powers. Such a work is that of P. Blanshad, Communism, Democracy and Catholic Power (London, 1952); R. Hernegger, Macht ohne Auftrag (Freiburg, 1963); K. H. Deschner, Mit Gott und den Faschisten (Stuttgart, 1965).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

hierarchy into three official functions, and it has been assumed that these three official functions are sufficient to define and to delineate the total area covered by the tasks proper to the hierarchy. This threefold division has been re-stated above all at the Second Vatican Council. Yet the Church's function as a critic of society can hardly be subsumed under any of these three official functions of the hierarchy. It is immediately [243] obvious that the task of the official authorities in the Church as critics of society cannot be subsumed under the heading of the teaching or priestly office, for on the one hand the task of the teaching office strictly as such is to preach the gospel in its abiding and permanent validity, even though, of course, under the direction of the teaching office this preaching has to be made relevant ever afresh and performed in a manner appropriate to the intellectual and social situation. A further reason why it is impossible to subsume the Church's function as critic of society under the teaching office is that obviously the more practical conclusions to be drawn from this gospel, to the extent that they can be arrived at by a process of deduction, are still not sufficient in themselves to represent the total contents and the real contents of that social criticism which we can expect from the Church and even from her official authorities. Again with regard to the pastoral office in practice at least we understand this as a task of guiding and instructing the faithful in the specifically religious sphere. And this means that it would be very difficult to subsume this function of the official Church as a critic of society under this heading of the pastoral office.

It can justifiably be said, therefore, that the function of the official authorities of the Church as critics of society has still not found any clear theological topos for itself. This is not very surprising in view of the fact that this theme is capable of emerging into clarity only when social change proceeds more rapidly, comes more clearly to be recognized as a fact and a necessity, and is recognized as something that has to be planned for by man and for which man himself has to take responsibility. We must realize, then, that this task of criticizing society which belongs to the official Church has still not achieved any theological definition, and so too any recognized position in theology. And once we do realize this fact we may perhaps characterize it as prophetic[21] instruction in social criticism. There are two points to be made about such instruction. First it is something different from mere theoretical teaching, with all the deductive (still, therefore remaining at the theoretical level) applications to a historical and social situation which this entails. On the other hand it implies a practical appeal to the freedom of Christians and of the world to take historical decisions, an appeal which leaves unimpaired in those to whom it is addressed the freedom to take historical decisions of their own and their personal creative responsibility. At the same time, however, it [244] does not withhold from them the offering of a concrete course of action which of their freedom they can, and actually should decide to adopt provided only that they experience this course of action that is recommended in its own right as well, as that which is prescribed and demanded by the circumstances of that particular moment in history, something which cannot ultimately be determined on any theoretical basis.

We could call this function of social criticism prophetic instruction because as instruction it is not simply a conclusion deduced from general Christian norms, and it can be called prophetic to the extent that it is the outcome of a conviction that it is sustained not merely by those 'this worldly' forces from which the future can be held to derive, but by the spirit of Christ.

A prophetic instruction of this kind, which must be distinguished from the teaching put forward by the teaching office and by the binding directives of the pastoral office, can surely be ascribed to the official authorities in the Church, since on the one hand the function of [21] On the concept of 'prophetic instruction' cf. 'On the Theological Problems Involved in a "Pastoral Constitution"', Theological Investigations X (London and New York, 1973), pp. 260-272.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

social criticism in the Church cannot be sustained merely by the individual Christian or by individual groups of Christians alone. A further point is that in practice the official bodies in the Church actually have really promulgated guidance in social criticism of this kind, recommending it to Christians and to the world in their historical freedom, at any rate in recent times. Let us consider, for example, two encyclicals of the recent popes, 'Mater et Magistra' and 'Populorum Progressio', and also the document of the Second Vatican Council entitled 'Gaudium et Spes'. It would surely be to deny the true nature of these documents if we sought to reduce the pronouncements contained in them to mere general norms at a merely theoretical level in the sphere of social politics, albeit concretized, to some extent. What they contain is something more concrete: proposals, imperatives, a utopian element, if we like to call it so, and this is presented not as doctrine or binding prescription, but as something that is recommended to the historically created freedom of man. This remains true even though the authors of these pronouncements may not have been consciously aware, in any strict sense, of the difference between orthodox teaching and the directives of the pastoral office on the one hand, and a recommendation to orthodox practice on the other. But from this point of view too we can understand the limits imposed upon the official bodies in the Church in exercising the function of social criticism in this way. It is not only that its pronouncements in this direction are for the most part an echo of, and a taking up of criticisms of society which have initially emerged as a charismatic movement from below. It is far from being the case that they [245] can be demanded ipso facto as an exclusive initiative on the part of the official bodies. Such instructions in social criticism on the part of the official body are quite different from the doctrinal pronouncements of faith and the decisions of the pastoral office in their application to the free historical decision of the Christian and of the world, and of their very nature are (whether explicitly or implicitly) subject to criticism on the part of the faithful and of the world. In order to achieve a better understanding of what has been said by means of an example we need only for instance to think of the desire for a super-UNO, or of the concrete proposals for aid to developing countries.

But the main promoters of a function of social criticism of this kind in the Church are the Christians in general and their formal and informal groupings within the Church, in other words the so-called laity themselves. Precisely in this respect the Christians themselves are something more than mere recipients of directives from the official bodies. They have to develop an autonomous initiative of their own from which they alone are responsible. They can do this even when they are not specifically commissioned or particularly encouraged to do so by the official bodies in the Church. They can do this even when the de facto attitude of the Church's authorities is by contrast so much at variance with such initiatives as to appear to restrict them. Under certain circumstances they can and must do this in the name of the gospel and their own Christian moral responsibility even when on the one hand other Christians or Christian groups oppose them in it, while on the other an autonomous initiative of this kind, together with the antagonisms within the Church which it entails, must still preserve mutual love and the unity of the Church. This is explicitly stated in 'Gaudium et Spes' in the following pronouncement which this Constitution contains concerning the laity: 'Often precisely a Christian view of things will cause one particular solution to recommend itself to them in a given concrete situation. More frequently, however, and certainly legitimately, it is the case that other Christians, while exercising the same degree of conscientiousness and applying themselves to the same question, may arrive at a different judgement. In such cases it is very easy, even when it is contrary to the will of the parties involved, for either solution to be regarded by many others as clearly following from the message of the gospels. But a fact which should never be lost sight of is that in such cases no-one has the right to claim the authority of the Church exclusively on his own behalf and in defence of his own opinion. But they should constantly seek to help one another in an open dialogue in order to clarify the question involved. In doing this [246] they should preserve mutual love, and above all bear in mind the common good'.[22]

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We cannot interpret this text of the Council any more closely here. But it will be clear from it that even though specific individual groups of Christians cannot claim the authority of the official Church herself they can appeal to the authority of the gospel. In other words they are authorized by the Church herself to conceive of and attempt to carry through a social programme even in those cases in which their particular conception of society in the future is not that of another group within the Church. The function of specific members and groups within the Church in criticizing society extends further, therefore, than that of the official authorities within the Church as such.

III. The Problems Entailed in a Theology of Revolution

Today the question of the function of the Church as a critic of society (taking 'Church' here to include the several different sense of the term distinguished above) is sharpening into the question of a theology of revolution and force.[23] And in view of this an attempt must be made to say something further on this point within the extremely brief compass available. First it must be pointed out that the concepts of revolution and force are extremely abstract and ambiguous, so that from this point of view alone the question of any Christian justification of revolution and force becomes complex and ambiguous in the extreme. The border-lines between evolution and revolution in social relationships is extremely difficult to determine. And even if we say that revolution is the introduction of change into social relationships by means of force, whereas a social evolution takes place without force, still this way of drawing the border-line between the two is not really clear. For this is merely to shift the terms of the question so that it becomes a question of what constitutes force. If we define force (and from the existential and ontological aspect it would be perfectly reasonable to do so) as the bringing about of change [247] in that situation in which another is freely placed prior to any freely given approval on his part to this change, then it becomes clear that unless we allow an element of force as understood here to enter in it is absolutely impossible for men to live together at all. For by our activities, with the autonomy and spontaneity inherent in them, we are constantly altering the situation freely belonging to others without any prior assent on their part, whether we wish it or not. On this showing then it is clear that every evolution also includes an element of revolution in the sense defined below, so that any distinction between social evolution and revolution becomes a question of the proportion between the two elements of evolution and revolution present in any concrete social change. But this question in turn leads on to the further one of striking the right balance in a mixture of this kind, a decision which can no longer be arrived at by means of the speculative reason alone, but is a matter for the practical reason, for freedom, for social decision, and so once more in turn a question of the power which is in fact involved and applied.

But to extricate ourselves from all these existential and ontological lines of enquiry, if we want to say that in all these questions what is being treated of is not power in a metaphysical

---

[22] Quoted according to the version of K. Rahner and H. Vorgrimler, Kleines Konzilskompendium (Freiburg, 1967), p. 492.

[23] For the sake of comparison see nn. 3 and 4, as well as the compendium volume edited by H. E. Bahr, Weltfrieden und Revolution (Reinbek bei Hamburg, 1968). On the flood of studies on the theology of revolution currently appearing it must be observed by way of criticism that in their essentials they no longer have any new patterns to present, but for the most part constitute discussions of old principles with a mere change of emphasis in the direction of revolutionary pathos.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

sense but that particular kind of power which is effectively felt by the average man as an incursion upon his freedom in a concrete historical situation which is never the same – in other words of 'bloody force' – then the whole problem is certainly set on a somewhat more concrete and manageable plane, but is not rendered much easier to solve thereby, for even then it still remains an open question what such 'bloody' force, assumed to be unjust, means in the concrete. For instance those who uphold an absolute rejection of (bloody) force in bringing about changes in society certainly do not confine their objections merely to manslaughter and similar brutal measures against humanity. The border-line between justifiable and unavoidable force and the kind of force that is condemned as bloody and reprehensible remains obscure in the extreme.[24] With these provisos all that we can assert is surely the following: On the basis of the Sermon on the Mount the Christian will always argue in favour of the least possible use of power in bringing about changes in society, though admittedly with the proviso that a principle of this kind, which he accepts with absolute sincerity, does not condemn him to immobility, and that it is not used as a means for consolidating the kinds of social relationships which are unjust and amount [248] to an oppression of humanity.[25] The Christian will stand firm in the conviction that we are still far from having sufficiently thought out, formulated in practical terms, distinguished, or applied, the possibilities and methods of producing non-violent change in social conditions. At the same time, however, he will be aware of the fact that concupiscence is an abiding factor in the human situation, and one which constantly prevents man from achieving an absolute transformation of the world solely on the basis of the single and central idea of love. And in view of this the Christian will not commit himself to the declaration that any application of force, or even one which may lead to human killing, is immoral and unChristian in any possible situation in society.[26] According to Pius XI[27] situations may arise in which the social order not merely institutionalizes particular kinds of injustice but actually threatens the ultimate basis of human living and human rights. And in such cases even a revolutionary struggle in the true sense and including the use of force in the concrete sense of the term is permitted and, in certain circumstances, actually prescribed. Of course the question of where to draw the boundary line between institutions that are unjust in either the first or the second sense is, once more, a question of degree, and one surely to which no one univocal solution can be found even by Churchmen who seek to draw their inspiration from the gospel and the Sermon on the Mount. Here then we find in its most extreme form the case envisaged in the text of the Council, a case of dissent between Christians in which both sides appeal to the gospel in support of their position.

Although at basis our remarks have been only very fragmentary, we [249] have spoken at length concerning the possibility and the duty of the Church exercising a function of criticism

[24] An enlightening discussion of these questions is provided by W. Benjamin, Kritik der Gewalt (Frankfurt, 1965), and also by B. Moore, Zur Geschichte der politischen Gewalt (Frankfurt, 1967).
[25] For a general treatment of the problems concerned here cf. R. Schnackenburg, 'Bergpredigt', LTK II (2nd ed. 1958), 223-227 (bibliog.); U. Luck, Die Vollkommenheitsforderung der Bergpredigt (Munich, 1968) (bibliog.), and P. Pokorny, Der Kern der Bergpredigt (Hamburg, 1969).
[26] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Peace on Earth', Theological Investigations VII (London and Baltimore, 1971), pp. 132-135; idem, 'The Peace of God and the Peace of the World', Theological Investigations X (London, 1970), pp. 371-388 (bibliog.); also, in order to refer to the most recent manifestations, cf. the articles by H. Marcuse, H. Morgenthau, F. M. Schmölz in Neues Forum XV (1968), pp. 702-713, and H. Schmidt, Frieden (Stuttgart, 1969); A. Mitscherlich, Die Idee des Friedens und die menschliche Aggressivität (Frankfurt, 1969).
[27] Cf. Pius XI, Ep. encycl. 'Firmissimam constantiam' ad episcopos foederatarum Mexici civitatum (18th March, 1937), AAS 29 (1937), 189-199; for further information on the pronouncements of the official teaching authorities on this question cf. also R. Coste, Le problème du droit de guerre dans la pensée de Pie XII (Paris, 1962), and also the positions adopted by John XXIII in 'Pacem in terris', AAS 53 (1961), 401-464, and Paul VI in 'Populorum Progressio', AAS 59 (1967), 257-299.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation of society. All that we have said has remained at the level of abstract theory. For the question still remains: Is such a function of criticizing society in fact being fulfilled in the Church of the present day? Is it being exercised in the degree that is necessary and adequate? Is the Church – that is, are Christians and groups within the Church – such that, overcoming their own egoism, in a spirit of self-criticism and selflessness, they recognize and seek to change the institutionalized injustices in society which derogate from man and his dignity? Surely we shall have to answer this urgent question as follows: A function of social criticism of this kind does exist in the Church and is carried on by groups and individuals within her. But it is still very far indeed from being exercised in that measure which is demanded by the hour or by the historical circumstances now prevailing. The younger clergy in Spain or South America may already be alive to the necessity for seriously bending themselves to this task in the Church. Much of what the Popes have said in the last few years may represent a contribution to this task in so far as it is a task of the official authorities in the Church, though admittedly it has not met with any really effective response in the Church as a whole. But by and large the Church considered as the people of God has not yet bent itself to this task of social criticism, and not yet responded by any effective action. Where the Church herself is not directly threatened in any palpable sense by the institutions of society and the state, and where the leaders of thought in the Church (by this we refer to officials and laity alike) do not feel themselves directly injured by institutionalized injustice, there in all such cases the task of the Church as critic of society is still to a large extent neglected and remains unfulfilled. It is true that at the Second Vatican Council the Church has laid down more clearly than in former times that she exists to serve the world, that she is there on behalf of mankind and stands for a life worthy of mankind. But she is still far from having fulfilled in sufficient measure what she herself declares to be her mission. If we have understood what the Church is, namely ourselves and the whole people of God rather than merely the hierarchy, if it is clear what has been said up to this point with regard to the true upholders of the Church's function as critic of society, then we have pronounced judgement upon ourselves in saying that the Church is not yet that which the present and the future require her to be, and that she has not fulfilled her task in the political sphere, her task as critic of society. For when we say that this task belongs to the Church we have pointed to ourselves, called our own position in question, and probably accused ourselves too.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[250]

VOLUME 12

LIST OF SOURCES

THE TEACHING OFFICE OF THE CHURCH IN THE PRESENT-DAY CRISIS OF AUTHORITY
Lecture delivered at the 30th Conference of the Ecumenical Study Circle of Protestant and Catholic Theologians at the Priory of Hardehausen from the 24th to the 28th of March 1969 on the theme 'Authority in Crisis', and to the KS G Würzburg on the 27th June 1969.
W. Anz, G. Friedrich, H. Fries, K. Rahner, Autorität in der Krise (Regensburg-Göttingen, 1970), pp. 79-111.

THE POINT OF DEPARTURE IN THEOLOGY FOR DETERMINING THE NATURE OF THE PRIESTLY OFFICE
First published in Concilium (1969), pp. 194-197.

THEOLOGICAL REFLECTIONS ON THE PRIESTLY IMAGE OF TODAY AND TOMORROW
Delivered as a lecture at a Conference of the Catholic Academy in Bavaria on the 28th to the 29th June 1968 in Munich; on the 1st April 1969 to the theologians attending the Pastoral Course at Prague. First published in Weltpriester nach dem Konzil = Münchener Akademie-Schriften 46 (Munich, 1969), pp. 90-118.

ON THE DIACONATE
Delivered as a lecture on the 7th December 1968 at a conference on Questions Concerning the Diaconate at Freiburg, held by the International Informationszentrum für Fragen des Diakonats.
Published in the Reports of the Conference.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE FACTOR OF THE CHARISMATIC IN THE CHURCH
First published in Geist und Leben 42 (1969), pp. 251-262.

SCHISM IN THE CATHOLIC CHURCH?
First published in Stimmen der Zeit 184 (1969), pp. 20-34; Schisme dans l'eglise (Paris, 1969).
[251]
HERESIES IN THE CHURCH TODAY?
Lecture delivered in the context of a discussion of the 'Theological Academy' at Essen (18th December 1967), Frankfurt (10th January 1968), Cologne (18th January 1968), Koblenz (19th January 1968), and to the Movement for Catholic Education at Graz on the 1st March 1968.
Published in the following: Theologische Akademie V (edited by K. Rahner and O. Semmelroth) (Frankfurt, 1968), pp. 60-87; Au Service de la Parole de Dieu. (Mélanges offerts á Monseigneur André-Marie Charue) (Gembloux, 1969), pp. 407-430.

CONCERNING OUR ASSENT TO THE CHURCH AS SHE EXISTS IN THE CONCRETE
Delivered as a lecture in the course of discussing the theme of the 'Theological Academy' at Frankfurt (the 15th October 1968), Cologne (the 22nd October 1968), Essen (the 5th

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

November 1968) and Koblenz (the 15th November 1968).
Published in Theologische Akademie VI, edited by K. Rahner and O. Semmelroth (Frankfurt, 1969), pp. 9-28.

ANONYMOUS CHRISTIANITY AND THE MISSIONARY TASK OF THE CHURCH
Hitherto unpublished.

THE QUESTION OF THE FUTURE
Lecture delivered to the KHG Cologne on the 20th June 1969. Published in revized form as a contribution to the symposium volume, Diskussion zur 'Politischen Theologie', edited by H. Peukert (Mainz, 1969), pp. 247-266.

PERSPECTIVES FOR THE FUTURE OF THE CHURCH
Lecture given at a conference of the Protestant Michaelsbruderschaft on the 6th October 1967 at Bochum, as a public lecture at Prague on the 2nd March 1969 as one of the series of lectures entitled 'Living Theology'. Published in various forms under the following titles: 'Kirche der Zukunft - zwischen Planen Hoffen', Kirche zwischen Planen und Hoffen, edited by the Protestant Michaelsbruderschaft (Kassel, 1968), pp. 33-47 and Wort in Welt (Festgabe für Viktor Schurr), edited by K. Rahner and B. Häring, (Bergen-Enkheim 1968), pp. 369-382.
[252]
ON THE STRUCTURE OF THE PEOPLE OF THE CHURCH TODAY
Unpublished hitherto

THE FUNCTION OF THE CHURCH AS A CRITIC OF SOCIETY
Lecture delivered to the Society for Socialist Studies Unna-Soest (Westphalia) (the 8th November 1968), and to the Thomas More Study Group at Gütersloh (the 28th October 1968); also at the Ecumenical Seminary at Prague on the 1st April 1969. Published in the following: Communio Viatorum. Theological Quarterly XII (Prague, 1969), Nos. 1-2, pp. 7-22; Krestanskárevue 36 (Prague, 1969), No 7, pp. 150-156, No. 8, pp. 172-175. Further: Ulisse - La Chiesa post-conciliare 10 (1969), pp. 156-170.

In the above list of sources not all the publications in German have been recorded. Radio broadcasts are adduced only if the article concerned was specially 'written for such broadcasts. Only the publication in which they initially appeared is adduced, whether this was in German or in a foreign language.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[1]

PART ONE

Theology as Science

[3]

1

ON RECOGNIZING THE IMPORTANCE OF THOMAS AQUINAS

The purpose of the present study must be defined here right at the outset so that everyone can know what he has to deal with in it. It is intended as a call to contemporary Catholic theologians not to forget Thomas Aquinas. From the time of Leo XIII onwards he has been the teacher in Catholic theology, the Doctor Angelicus et Communis. [1] Formerly his position as such was laid down in ecclesiastical law: the study of theology should be practised ad mentem Thomas Aquinas.[2] And although the tone adopted by the Second Vatican Council was already far less forceful, nevertheless it singled Thomas out for special mention in the course of its pronouncement on ecclesiastical studies.[3] Even the past few years have seen the appearance of serious studies on his theology, which rank higher than that type of doctorate thesis which consists in the presentation of various historical details but is incapable of making any dynamic impact on the theology of the future. In Rome too one more Congress of Thomists[4] was recently added to the many which have already been held in the past. Yet even so, in contemporary theology regarded as a whole, there is a strange silence on the subject of Thomas. We need only to glance at the catalogue of recent major publications in theology to recognize the extent to which Thomas has receded into the background among all those many theologians from whom it is found necessary to quote at [4] various points in any scholarly presentation of theology. Is this state of affairs so satisfactory? Should it be allowed to remain unchanged? That is the question.

We shall not be in a position to give a negative answer to this question until we have made one proviso. Right down to the most recent times it has been possible to regard Thomas as in a peculiarly direct sense the teacher in the schools of theology and for his Summa to be used as the textbook. All that the lecturer had to do in order to discharge his duties as a lecturer in theology was merely to supply a commentary on what he had written. Whether this approach was de facto universally adopted is another question. It was possible to adopt it, and to a large extent it actually was adopted, and, moreover, with the recommendation and approval of the official Church. And once this approach was adopted it was possible for great benefits to be reaped from it. ‘Whether changes should have been introduced at an even earlier stage is again a question which does not concern us here. Today we neither can nor should adopt

---

[1] Leo XIII, *Aeterni Patri*s, dated 4 August 1879; cp. DS 34, 3135-3140.
[2] CIC c 1366 § 2.
[3] Vatican II, ‘Gravissimum educationis’ (Declaration on Christian Education), no.10, and the references there adduced to the address of Pope Paul VI to the Sixth International Congress of Thomists on 10 September 1965; cf. also ‘Optatam totius’ (Decree on Priestly Formation) no. 16, and also the references to addresses of Pope Pius XII (24 June 1939), and Pope Paul VI (12 March 1964).
[4] The Seventh International Congress of Thomists held at Rome from 7 to 12 September 1970; on this cf. the report by H. Beck in Philos. Jahrhuch 78 (1971), pp. 181-184.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

precisely this approach any longer, and. do not in fact do so. From being, in this peculiarly direct sense, the teacher of theology in the theological schools themselves, Thomas has acquired the status of a Father of the Church. He has receded into the background and become more remote. And this is something which we cannot alter. From this point of view any restoration of the former seminary Thomism, or of a direct and almost naive commitment to Thomas as to a contemporary figure, would be a betrayal of the Church and of the men of today. From having formerly been a teacher in this direct sense he has become a Father of the Church, an authority belonging to the same dimension as the great philosophers such as Plato or Aristotle, or the great theologians such as Augustine or Origen, more remote, less readily accessible, more isolated than he was before. And this remains true even though this authority which he carries is of a quite specific, peculiar, and unique kind of which we shall have to treat further. This state of affairs is quite inevitable. For after all between him and us lie seven hundred years of further and forceful developments in the history of ideas and the history of the world. Hence we cannot simply ignore all that lies between him and us. And of course this applies to theology too. The methods of teaching and the scientific approach envisaged by the Second Vatican Council for theology no longer ascribe to Thomas a status such that his works can be regarded simply as the textbook of theology for today.

But while recognizing all this we are still very far from being justified on this account in more or less forgetting Thomas, or only allowing him [5] still to have a place in our discussions as the subject of theological dissertations. He must remain alive in contemporary theology even though his function in it is more or less that of a Father of the Church. For in saying this we can still recognize that his function is of a unique kind by comparison with the other Fathers of the Church. The reason why it is necessary to recognize this is not merely that Thomas is one of the initiators of that anthropocentric approach which already has been for centuries, and still continues to be even today, a decisive influence on the cultural and intellectual life of Europe; not merely, in other words, that for anyone who seeks to reach back to the roots of his own situation, Thomas is one of the factors which he must not ignore. There are other reasons too, simpler than that which we have mentioned, to which Metz and others have already drawn our attention.[5]

Even in the speculative disciplines or arts there is a spirit of the age which raises problems. Even here, and not least in theology itself, it is inevitable that there should be historical development and change. The gospel has to be preached in ever fresh forms, adapted to the changing historical situations of its hearers. And hence theology is confronted again and again with fresh tasks. And, with the best will in the world – seeing that man and his capacity for attention are finite – such fresh tasks cannot simply be added on to those we already have, and so be fulfilled in such a way as to leave what has gone before totally unaffected. Whether we like it or not, fresh tasks tend to squeeze out former tasks and aims, which inevitably recede into the background. A theology which was not one-sided in any sense would be a bad theology. If we were so balanced as to accord an equal measure of our attention and capacities for work to every possible approach, this would merely be a secret excuse on our part for being reluctant, or even totally unwilling, to come to grips with the new tasks and duties that press in upon us. What we are saying here, then, does not imply any rejection of a legitimate one-sidedness, or of laying very strong emphases on particular aspects of a question, even in the study of theology. But there are also wrong kinds of one-sidedness, and to forget Thomas would be one such. To forget Thomas might be fashionable, but it could only lead to a blurring and circumscribing of that awareness of the past which is so fragile, [5] A survey on the question of 'anthropomorphism' is provided by J. Splett in Sacramentum Mundi I (New York and London, 1968), pp. 40-41; on the same subject cf. J. B. Metz, Christliche Anthropozentrik (Munich, 1962), and the discussion arising from this, H. Meyer, 'Zur chrislichen Anthropozentrik', Th. Rv. 61 (1965), 9-12, and J. B. Metz, 'Nochmals: Christliche Anthropozentrik', ibid., pp. 13-16.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the maintaining of which is [6] precisely the function of theology, and which, according to Metz, is the indispensable precondition for any genuinely enlightened attitude towards the present, and so too towards present-day theology.[6] Often that which we leave unspoken is precisely that which, in a strange way, we are suppressing, that which we do not want to consider because it calls for a critical questioning of our own position. In view of the silence of contemporary theologians on the subject of Thomas, this is a point to be borne in mind.

To put it more precisely: in the speculative disciplines it is necessary, if they are to remain alive, for us to maintain contact not merely with the ideas, but with the thinkers too, of earlier ages. In the physical sciences the learned figures of the past still continue to figure only through the busts set up to them at the entrances to laboratories or as names that are given to laws or units of measure. But with the speculative disciplines the situation cannot be the same. For in these the essential meaning of an idea is not present wholly and solely in the terms in which it is expressed. The actual process of thought leading up to the idea must be taken into account as well. For we always acquire deeper insights into the idea itself in and through this than in the proposition resulting from this thought process taken by itself. And we can always make the idea our own in a more satisfying way by taking the thought process behind it into account. Again and again we must think with a thinker if we are to achieve a genuine and radical insight into his ideas. In this field of the speculative disciplines the process of thinking with the thinker at the personal level is an intrinsic factor in the process of thinking objectively. It entails a dialogue that is constantly renewed with the great thinkers of the past who can never, properly speaking, be wholly out of date since the questions they raise can never be answered in such a way that the question in itself can be set aside as a problem that has definitively been solved. On these grounds alone, then, and abstracting from all other considerations, the history of philosophy, and a fortiori of theology, constitute intrinsic elements in philosophy and theology themselves such that without them these disciplines would always be subject to the contingent character of their own present, and, in the end, to destruction, and, moreover, precisely at that point at which their practitioners considered them so modern and relevant to the present that they imagined that they could dispense with that dialogue with their own past which is so necessary.

Thomas Aquinas is to be numbered among the great figures of theology [7] with whom any contemporary theology must engage in a genuine dialogue. This despite the interval of seven hundred years which separates him from us. Certainly he is not the sole partner with whom we so engage. There are others too. Nevertheless I believe that even today Thomas still remains, in a quite special and unique sense, a theologian of such magnitude that he must not cease to have a place in our discussions. In support of this opinion I will adduce only a few quite simple reasons. Thomas is first and foremost a theologian who, if the paradox may be permitted, is interested in that which is for the moment uninteresting. He is not the kind of theologian who is influenced by a mere fashion or succumbs to a monomania that blinds him to all other aspects except one. His attitude of balance and calm is such that he can give his attention to a whole number of theological questions. However true it may be to call him a systematic theologian, it is no less true that the importance he attaches to system never leads him to omit questions and valid findings which at first sight do not seem to be prompted either by his basic approach or by any special relevance they may have for him. It is consistent with this attitude that Thomas' reading and range of studies and general knowledge should also have been extraordinarily wide for his time. Points of common knowledge, points already made by others, and seemingly quite unexciting, are just as interesting to him as those which he himself recognizes for the first time or manages to embody in his system. So much

[6] Well treated of by J. B. Metz, 'Political Theology', Sacramentum Mundi, V (New York and London, 1970), pp. 34-38, together with the bibliography there adduced.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

is this the case that even when he brings out a point that is absolutely original to himself, he either never mentions the fact at all, or at most gives some indirect indication of it. Among the ancient Fathers of the Church, and among the theologians of his own age as well as of later ages, there may be not a few whom we find more immediately striking than him in virtue of their originality and creativity, their capacity for sudden fresh discoveries, the element of challenge and passionate commitment to their theories. But the theologian of today could learn certain simple lessons from him: to think in breadth, to have enough boldness to be modest and self-critical, to give devoted consideration to points which seem uninteresting or not relevant to the moment, to listen to, and take seriously, the views of others, even when they may at first be on a different wave-length from oneself in the arguments they put forward, to recognize genuinely and sincerely that one can only exercise self-criticism, and so be truly modern and avoid merely following the fashions of yesterday with the rest, by bearing in mind the ideas of earlier ages. This is why Thomas' tone is gentle and restrained. He is not concerned to dress his ideas up in impressive terms. In speaking of great matters he does not find it necessary [8] to make them still greater by the greatness of his words. His ideas are consistently developed in the perspective of, and orientated towards, the whole. He does not seek to make an impression, but is rather himself impressed by the matters he is treating of. Even as he seeks to express and impart his ideas to others he is still meditating upon them and making their reality his own. And because of all this he is almost speaking to himself, patient with himself and the question he is treating of, and courteous towards his opponents insofar as he either has, or ever could have, any such at all in view of the intrinsic breadth and magnitude of his spirit. He is the systematic theologian who consistently considers each individual point in the light of clearly conceived ultimate principles; the theologian who, in his questioning, is preoccupied with fundamentals and not much concerned with the complexities and variegations of the concrete world. But because he is a realist, the specific point of detail represents something more for him than merely an occasion for discoursing on abstract principles. He still continues to accord it all due respect even when, at first sight, it seems that it cannot, without further modification, be brought into line with the great leitmotivs of his thought.

In this sober realism of his we find concealed, or rather betrayed, a sense of reverence and yearning for the eternal light which does not yet illumine our minds directly here below; an awareness that even in theology all the theologian's insights are theological only to the extent that he remains consistently conscious of their provisional character. For the theologian must remain conscious of this even when that dimension of inconceivability which, properly speaking, it is his sole province to consider, is not being acclaimed in lyrical outpourings.

Thomas is the mystic, whose message is one of adoration of that mystery which transcends all powers of expression. He does not hold that because theology is concerned with this incomprehensible mystery of God it should speak of it in terms that are vague or imprecise. But neither does he hold that precision of language in theology should give the impression that one has penetrated the divine mystery and caught it within the subtle convolutions of theological concepts. Thomas knows (even though he may not repeat it every other moment) that the utmost precision and the soberest realism which is achieved in true theology are ultimately designed simply to serve a single end: to force man out of the brightness of the dimension which he can comprehend, and into the mystery of God where he no longer grasps but rather is grasped, where he no longer rationalizes but rather adores, where he no longer controls but rather is himself subject to a higher control.

[9] When we say the words 'Adoro te devote, latens Deitas, quae sub his figuris vere latitas' we must not always speak them in a lyrical sense, but recognize that they also express the innermost essence of all theological thought and perception. This will continue to be the case for all eternity. Even when we behold face to face, that which we behold, love, and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

praise will be the eternal mystery which continues to be such. Indeed, so far from diminishing, once it is present in itself, and no longer merely in signs and parables, it will be still more incomprehensible and more consuming. And because of all this the theology of pilgrim man must not be at variance with this recognition of God as mystery. It must point us on to the experience of the mystery in the absolute, albeit the mystery that has been brought near to us. It is not for the idle, the soulless, or the heartless to say that what is said in theology is all straw, though St Thomas himself did in fact say this. Yet, measured by the ineffable reality which it seeks to make its concern, all that theology has to say is, after all, mere 'paleae', straw. And to recognize this is a pain that slays us and raises us from the dead. And unless a man has himself, in heart and spirit, with zeal and energy, endured this pain with Thomas, then he has never given himself to theological study as a disciple of Thomas either. His theology may perhaps be ingenious, but it will never be really spiritual theology, the theology of the Pneuma, theology in the true sense. From an historical point of view it may be Thomism, but it will never be the kind of theology that is Thomas-inspired.

Obviously a Thomism that has become petrified has manifested itself in various forms and at various points in the course of history. Its practitioners have set themselves to keep Thomas alive, but in the very act of so doing have in fact brought him into discredit with their own contemporaries. But this is, after all, a fate that befalls other thinkers and other schools as well. The Jansenism of the 17th century is a petrified Augustinianism. The philosophy of such figures as Wolff is a 'boiled-down' version of the philosophy of Leibniz, truncated and adapted for pedagogic purposes, and so on. We must precisely avoid judging a great philosopher or a great theologian by the minor school which invokes his name, and the members of which are prone to deny that anyone unwilling to be associated with their pettifogging systems can be a disciple of their master at all. We must avoid viewing Thomas simply in the light of a Cajetan (though in itself his contribution is far from insignificant) – still less in the light of the Thomism of a Billuart or any other theologian of a similar kind. We must reject the attempt to reduce the truly great philosophy of a Thomas to that potted version of it produced under Pius X in the [10] so-called Twenty Theses published by the Congregation of Studies at Rome in 1914, and purporting to be the genuine philosophical teaching of Thomas.[7] In response to all such forms of circumscribed, over-systematized, and so petrified Thomism, we must insist on the point that in his own period, and measured by the philosophy and theology then accepted as traditional, Thomas himself must have been felt to be uncompromisingly progressive, if not actually revolutionary. This must have been so even though he himself never proclaimed his own theology and philosophy as progressive or revolutionary with drums and trumpets. Instead, calmly confining his attention solely to the question under investigation, and without any strident partizanship, he said what he had to say. Yet precisely in virtue of this he stood at the centre of a theological current, and was never the upholder of any final and definitive system, an edifice within which men of all subsequent ages could live. In this respect too Thomas can be an example and a consolation to those of today who seek to practise, at their own cost and at their own risk, a type of theology that has come to be discarded, and in doing so refuse to be 'modern' in the sense of falling in with mere fleeting fashions of the hour, thereby giving their work a spurious acceptability.

Certainly we should not adopt the approach of Leo XIII in regarding Thomas as the one great ocean into which all conceivable streams of wisdom and knowledge flow and converge, so that it is from this ocean alone that we must draw our knowledge and inspiration, all other sources now being superfluous. Again, he is obviously conditioned by his own age, and has not pronounced upon all those questions which we of today have to raise and to find answers

[7] cf. DS 34, 361-3624 (Decree of the Congregation of Studies of 27 July 1914).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

to. Yet we do need to be aware that even in those factors which, from a Christian and theological standpoint, we have to recognize, act upon, or endure as characteristic of our own age, we are not far removed from Thomas. The philosophical apparatus (emanating from Greek sources) which he uses in his theology may to a large extent be derived from an approach that is orientated towards objects and an objective world, an approach, therefore, belonging to a stage prior to Copernicanism, when philosophy became reorientated towards the subject and existence. In his approach Thomas may still have few explicit reflections to offer on the historicity of man and of his thought, so ingenuously – almost naïvely – near is he to history itself. Yet for all this he does stand at the threshold of that world which still remains ours of today as well, the world which is essentially secular, and not immediately [11] apprehensible as sacral in character. It is true that Thomas may be regarded as the great philosopher and theologian of a comprehensive system of ideas in which all that is genuinely real is duly recognized as such, but at the same time assigned its appropriate place within the system in all its breadth. But while Thomas is all this, he is also first and last the theologian who, in the teeth of the conservatism and pietism of his contemporaries, recognized philosophy as an autonomous discipline, one which sees God not as one particular element (albeit the highest) within the world, but rather as him who produces effects in the world only through those 'second causes', those realities and forces which themselves belong intrinsically to the world as having power over its own course. This means that Thomas himself stands at the origins of that reflexive process in theology in which Christian faith explicitly recognizes the status of the world as autonomous and responsible for its own destiny. It is true that, by a process of synthesis, this world, while still remaining autonomous and secular, is nevertheless subsumed, in Thomas' system, within the order of God as revealing himself and creating salvation. And while this synthesis may still be over-static and, as it stands, not something that we can simply accept without modification, the fact still remains that Thomas stands at the beginning of a period in the history of ideas in which his system, taken in conjunction with Scotism and Nominalism, and as developed between the earlier period and the High Middle Ages, can be set down as the beginning of that age which, in a true sense, remains ours also. Today, for instance, we are living in the age of rationalism, and of a methodological atheism, the outcome of the empiricism of the natural sciences. In our theology of creation and grace we think of God not so much as him who inserts himself into the world, as it were perforating an otherwise closed system from without, but rather as the infinite incomprehensible mystery and absolute future, present intrinsically in the world all along as that which provides its ultimate consummation and so sustains its movement towards this from within. And if all this is true, then we must feel that we are not far removed from Thomas. At the same time we must recognize in him a consoling confirmation of the fact that in the last analysis that which is special and proper to our age derives from the spirit of Christianity. Whatever disagreements there may be on points of detail – and all too often both sides are guilty of misrepresentations here – these special characteristics of our own age do not involve any rebellion against Christianity. On the contrary, they have already been accepted and recognized, at least incipiently and in principle, by him whom the Church recognizes as her 'doctor communis'. And this even though [12] much of what is said so simply and quietly would surely still seem revolutionary even today to the more timid and conservative elements in the Church if they only realized to the full the true import of his message.

As we said right at the outset, what we need in theology, if we are to practise it aright, is not only great theologies but great theologians also, so that in fellowship with them we may reflect upon the ineffable in a spirit of reverence.

I do not believe that some spectacular Thomist renaissance is on the point of breaking out in the Church. But at the same time I do hope that there will always be enough independent

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

thinkers constantly emerging afresh in theology. And by ‘independent thinkers’ I mean such as will also have the courage to be unmodern, to enter the arduous school of a great master and, when they are confronted with goals which can be achieved only slowly and at the cost of toil, will not regard them merely as a bore. So long as the Church can number such men and such theologians in her ranks and in her theological schools, so long will Thomas Aquinas always have disciples and constantly be acquiring fresh ones. For today too he still has something to say. One element in that awareness of what Christ means in the Church which renders us free and immune to the cult of mere modernism is safeguarded in the works of Thomas.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[13]

2

THOMAS AQUINAS ON TRUTH

Our purpose here is to present, in brief outline, the essence of truth as seen by Thomas.[1] For this it should be unnecessary either to point out in extenso where the relevant statements are to be found, or to draw attention to the limits imposed upon us by the very nature of an article of this kind. It should be equally unnecessary to spend much time in justifying the point that all that is possible here is to provide a few summary indications – necessarily, therefore, in simplified form. What is more important is to draw attention right from the outset to two difficulties which any such attempt necessarily entails. First, Thomas Aquinas is by profession a theologian rather than a philosopher. It is true that he consciously draws upon certain explicit philosophical tenets in that he continually incorporates them into his theology, but he had never developed this philosophy in itself into a positive system in its own right. He has not written any major work such as could, in any true sense, be said to be exclusively philosophical in character. Even the Summa Contra Gentiles[2] is, measured by the essential message which inspires it, not a philosophical work but a work of Christian apologetics.

This conclusion does not for one moment imply any pre-judgement as to the intrinsic value of Thomas' philosophy. But it does give us some intimation of the difficulties entailed in attaching a philosophy which is so much subordinated and assimilated to theology, and in presenting it in its own intrinsic significance and, corresponding to this, the principles it lays down. This state of affairs in fact leads to the position that even [14] though a point may be crucial from a philosophical point of view in Thomas' works, it does not always follow that it is also the main point at issue. This also applies to the subject of our present investigation. It is true that we have the Quaestiones Disputatae de Veritate[3] and for some years a good translation of these has been available, that namely by Edith Stein, the pupil of Husserl. This does provide us with certain important pointers (especially in the case of the first Quaestio, articles 1-12, where truth is explicitly treated of). But many of the arguments here would be quite out of place in a philosophical discussion. Of course further and more comprehensive passages are to be found which throw an important light on the epistemology of Thomas Aquinas.[4] A further factor in his teaching which the historian of philosophy cannot, properly speaking, neglect, is his teaching on angelic knowledge. For it is here, despite the fact that the

[1] The text of this essay – a lecture first delivered in 1938 and here lightly revised in certain unimportant details – belongs to the period of the author's basic works: Geist in Welt (Innsbruck, 1939) and Hörer des Wortes (Munich, 1941). The reason for publishing it here for the first time is that apart from its documentary importance it has a special value as indicating the basic preoccupations of the author in the development of his thought.

[2] In German, Thomas von Aquin, Die Summa wider die Heiden, Vols I-IV (Leipzig, 1935-1937).

[3] German, Des hl. Thomas von Aquino Untersuchungen über die Wahrheit, Edith Steins Werke, III (Louvain/Freiburg i. Br. 1952; first published in 1931).

[4] The relevant passages have been assembled and set forth by Jos. de Vries, De Cognitione Veritatis Textus Selecti Sancti Thomae Aquinatis, Op. et Textus, Ser. Schol. XIV (Munster, 2nd ed. 1953).Cf. Summa Contra Gentiles I, cc. 44-71 (metaphysics of the divine knowledge); II, cc. 46-90 (anthropology and the metaphysics of human knowledge); Summa Theologiae I qq. 14-17 (the knowledge of God; ideas; truth; falsehood), Summa Theologiae, Eng. transl. Vol.4, Knowledge in God (London, 1964); qq. 79 (the powers of reason), Summa Theologiae, Eng. transl. Vol. II (London); qq. 84-88 (how the soul, in conjunction with the body, comes to know the physical world which is subordinate to it by reason; the modes and consequences of rational knowledge; what does our reason know of material things?; how does the soul endowed with intelligence come to understand itself and its powers?; how does the human soul come to know what is above it?), Summa Theologiae, Eng. transl., Vol. 12 (London, 1968).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

context seems to be of its nature exclusively theological, that Thomas Aquinas presses his theory of knowledge to its ultimate limits in developing the concept of a finite knowledge that is not based on sense experience. This teaching on angelic knowledge in Thomas represents, so to say, a counterpart to the monadology of Leibniz.

In view of this situation and the difficulties it entails, we are justified in approaching the question in such a way that our presentation seems unconnected (at least to all outward appearances) with any specific individual passages in Thomas' writings. Instead our exposition of his basic position will be through a freer approach, and one which, in fact, in view of the difficulties described, we are obliged to adopt.

To this initial difficulty in achieving any adequate presentation of the thought of Aquinas a second must now be added: the question of its interpretation. A point which applies to Plato, Aristotle, Kant, and others [15] is just as true of Thomas here. In all cases we can discuss how far the philosopher's teaching is correct only to the, extent that we find it easy to answer, and to achieve general agreement upon, the question of what he actually taught. We can never arrive at the true philosophical content of what is being taught merely by assembling and summarizing the relevant statements. The only way of doing this is creatively to reconstruct the original line of reasoning of the philosopher himself. And this principle applies to Thomas too, for unfortunately his justly acclaimed clarity also entails a constant temptation to assume that his philosophy is easier than it in fact is. Our only reason for pointing this out in the present context is that we wish right from the outset to emphasize that in the present interpretation of Thomas nothing that we have to say either can or should be regarded as spoken in the name of scholasticism. All that we seek to convey is that particular interpretation of Aquinas which, as we personally believe, must be correct. That is our sole aim. The question of whether our understanding of the master is right or wrong cannot be decided by invoking some illusory consensus of 'the' scholastics, but only by a fresh examination of Thomas' own writings and of the matter itself.[5]

[16] Our ideas will be developed in three stages. If we were to name each stage in accordance with the basic ideas of Thomism itself they might be classified as follows: I. Judgement, 2. The Light of the Active Intellect (Intellectus Agens), and 3. God: Pure Being and Pure Thought. In terms of Hegelian terminology we might bring our threefold classification into line with the three divisions of his phenomenology of the mind as follows: 1. Awareness, 2. Awareness of Self, and 3. Absolute Mind. The first section is discarded

[5] In addition to textual studies and translations we find a whole series of attempts to provide a comprehensive presentation and interpretation of Aquinas' teaching on truth, belonging chiefly to the period of the thirties, but also, in part, both to earlier and later periods. Mention may be made of certain important works which are not without significance for the thought of the present author as well: P. Rousselot, L'intellectualisme de Saint Thomas (Paris, 2nd ed., 1924); J. Maréchal, Le point de départ de la metaphysique (Bruges/Louvain – Paris, 1923-1926); G. Söhngen, Sein and Gegenstand. Das scholastische Axiom: ens et verum convertuntur als Fundament metaphysische und theologische Spekulation (Munster, 1930); P. Wilpert, Das Problem der Wahrheitssicherung bei Thomas von Aquin (Munster, 1931); P. Wilpert, 'Das Urteil als Träger der Wahrheit nach Thomas von Aquin', Philos. Jahrbuch 46 (1953), pp. 56-75; A. Hufagel, Intuition und Erkenntnis bei Thomas von Aquin (Munster, 1932); G. Siewerth, Die Metaphysik der Erkenntnis nach Thomas von Aquin I: der sinnliche Erkenntnisakt (Munich/Berlin, 1933); idem, 'Die transzendentale Selbigkeit und Verschiedenheit des ens und des verum bei Thomas von Aquin', Philos. Jahrbuch 66 (1957), pp. 22-23; idem, Der Thomismus als Identitätssystem (Frankfurt, 3rd ed. 1961); J. B. Lotz, Das Urteil and das Sein, Pullacher philos. Forsch. II (a second edition, revised and expanded, of Sein and Wert I, 1938) (Pullach, 1957); M. Müller, Sein und Geist. Systematische Untersuchungen über Grundproblem und Aufbau mittelalterlicher Ontologie, Beiträge zur Philosophie und ihrer Geschichte, 7 (Tübingen, 1940); J. Pieper, Wahrheit der Dinge. Eine Untersuchung zur Anthropologie des Hochmittelalters (Munich, 1947); W. Kern, 'Das Verhältnis von Erkenntnis und Liebe als philosophisches Grundproblem bei Hegel und Thomas von Aquin', Scholastik 34 (1959), pp. 394-427; E. Coreth, 'Das Sein als Wahrheit', Metaphysik (Innsbruck, 1961), pp. 399-422; J. Fellermeier, 'Wahrheit und Existenz bei Thomas von Aquin', Munch. theol. Zeitschrift 20 (1969), pp. 136-145.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

because Thomas regards truth as present only in the judgement. The second section is justified on the grounds that according to Aquinas judgement consists not in any mere passive acceptance of an impression, but in a creative synthesis between the transcendental a priori of the mind (the light of the active intellect) and sense experience. Finally the inclusion of the third section is justified by the fact that Thomas recognizes, side by side with the truth of judgement, the further ontological truth of being in itself, an intrinsic illumination of that which is inasmuch as, and to the extent that it is being, an illumination which finds its absolute fulness and ultimate original norm in that absolute being which is the absolute intelligence.

1. The Judgement

'If truth consists in the agreement of an act of cognition with its object . . .' Thus even Kant opens his argument.[6] We should not, therefore, be surprised that in the Thomistic metaphysic of the nature of truth the same sentence should provide the starting-point and, so to say, the definition of truth: 'adaequatio rei et intellectus'.[7] Ultimately speaking, however, what we have here is a mere provisional approximation, a mere description, of something which we are aware of from the first when we begin to ask what truth is. The situation here is the same as with all metaphysical enquiries. It is an enquiry into something which is already familiar to us from the first, and which we fail to comprehend precisely for this reason. For what do we mean when we say that truth is present where intellect and object agree? In real terms, what is intellect? What is being? What is agreement? And how can these particular entities agree with one another? It is self-evident, therefore, that even though this initial definition is familiar to us from the first, we can only grasp its true meaning once we have comprehended the particular concepts of which it is composed in themselves, and [17] also precisely as components of this statement considered as an unity. We find an initial indication of what Thomas means by intellect (intellectus) when we find him saying that truth at the human level is located in the judgement. It is self-evident that in the normal act of human cognition it is the content of the judgement, and not the act of judging as such, that is made to correspond to the object: 'Illud quod intellectus intelligendo dicit et cognoscit oportet esse rei adaequatum . . . non operatio qua id dicit'.[8] For Thomas a meaningful content of this kind, such as – under certain circumstances at least – can claim to constitute truth, is possible of attainment only in judgement and not in the forming of a concept, i.e. what he calls simplex apprehensio or incomplexum. We must emphasize, therefore, that point in Thomas' doctrine on judgement which is most important for our enquiry. For Aquinas a judgement does not consist merely in a synthesis between two concepts so as to form a single concrete idea. In Thomas' eyes a concretizing synthesis of this kind – Heidegger would call it a predicative synthesis – would still be an incomplexum of the type, for instance, to which definition belongs. In order for judgement and truth in the true sense to be present, the concretizing synthesis must further be related to the reality itself; there must be a comparatio vel applicatio ad rem per affirmationem vel negationem. An affirmative or objectifying synthesis of this kind (and it is only through this kind of synthesis that a complexio or judgement is arrived at) is therefore a constitutive element of judgement and so too of truth (with Heidegger we might also call it a veritative synthesis), though admittedly only provided that this affirmative synthesis is also in fact a valid one. Of course the subject and predicate do not

[6] I. Kant, Kritik der reinen Vernunft, BS. 83.
[7] cf. e.g. Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologiae I, q. 21, art. 2 c, and Quaestiones Disputatae de Veritate, q. 1, art. 10.
[8] Summa Contra Gentiles I, c. 39.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

have the same place or function in the statement involved, a point which can be demonstrated by an analysis of the Thomist doctrine of the concretizing synthesis. The known content of the concept forming the predicate is applied to the object itself in its ontological reality as pointed to by the affirmative synthesis and as designated by the concept forming the subject, so that the affirmative synthesis is just as much the enabling condition of the concretizing synthesis as the other way round.

Now for Thomas Aquinas it is only in such judgements that truth exists, for it is only in them that this affirmative and objectifying application can be made of the consciously entertained content of our ideas to a reality existing in its own right, and independently of the concept as such that we form of it at the psychic level. As applied to such an ontological reality, therefore, the reason that our judgement is valid is that the [18] concretizing synthesis is merely the reproduction in the conceptual dimension of that synthesis achieved in the objective one between a subject (a hypokeimenon) and a quiddity (quidditas, forma etc.) by which that subject is specified.

But how does the subject making the judgement know that his reproduction and application of the objective synthesis is actually valid, does in fact correspond to it? Clearly there can be no question – at least in all ordinary cases – of proceeding straightway to compare the reality as known in the act of judgement with the reality in itself.

In order to understand Thomas' answer to this question we must begin by laying down, in accordance with his teaching, that every one of our judgements and every one of our concepts contain two elements: a sensible element and an intellectual one (representation and conception, to the extent that this is based on the spontaneity of the understanding, as we might say with Kant). Aquinas would wholeheartedly subscribe to the following statement by Kant: 'Thoughts without content are empty; perceptions without conceptions are blind.'[9] The point Kant is seeking to make here is treated of by Thomas under the heading of the necessity of a conversio to the phanatasma in spontaneous thinking.[10] As for Kant, so too for Thomas, there are no perceptions other than sensible ones. This proposition calls for some explanation at this point, at least in passing, since time does not admit of any fuller discussion of it. According to Thomas sensibility as such, to the extent that it apprehends the existing thing at all, apprehends it as it truly is in itself. The 'impression upon the receptivity of our mind' is, as a single and undivided reality, present at one and the same time both in the sensible object itself and in sensibility as such. This seemingly 'naïve' realism is in truth profoundly metaphysical, for the conception of sensibility on which it rests is metaphysical and ontological in character, and is not merely derived from an empiricist-sensualist approach in which the senses are regarded as instruments. This metaphysical and ontological conception in its turn stems from the conception of a finite act of perception that 'takes in' an individual object as such as it presents itself in its own identity; only so does it arrive at the metaphysical conception of what it is to be material: the materiality of the object that exhibits itself and the necessary materiality, and thereby sensibility, of a knowledge that 'takes in' and perceives. Unfortunately it is impossible here fully to carry through this transcendental deduction of the sensibility inherent in a finite act of perception. Hence, even though [19] our approach at this point is, properly speaking, quite unphilosophical, all that we can do is to give the following assurance: when we speak of the apprehending, by a subject endowed with sensibility, of certain determinations in a material object in itself this involves no contradiction for philosophy because, as contrasted with popular notions, it regards the essential metaphysic of the process by which one material being is affected by another material being as consisting precisely in the fact that absolutely one and the same reality is

[9] I. Kant, Kritik der reinen Vernunft, B S. 75.
[10] Summa Theologiae I, q. 84, art. 7.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

present in both agent and patient. Now if a determination of the patient of this kind is recognized to be such, then, since the 'patient' in this case is sensibility, this means that we are recognizing and experiencing a determination of the agent as such, and, in the case we are considering, as a determination of the sensible object.

If it were pointed out that after all, as the most universal experience attests, that which is immediately observed by the senses (the sensible qualities) is to be regarded as present only in the sensible experience itself, Thomas would surely have disposed of this by replying that the determination of a being does not cease to belong to it because it belongs to that being only inasmuch as it is posited as a specification of itself and of the patient at the same time. Two points follow from this position: first, scope is given, on a totally different scale, for a physics in the metaphysical sense, i.e. regarded as critical enquiry into the determinations of a material being, which belong to it independently of its reality, and as being the kind of thing it is and shows itself to be in the medium of the sensory cognition of the knowing subject. The second point, however, is that even prior to any physics an answer is given to the metaphysical question of how the knowledge of another being can apprehend by taking something into itself, a question which must, in principle, be resolved prior to any physics, since any physics, whatever critique it has to offer of outward appearances, basically presupposes an outside world that is already realized as such, and so a knowledge that is already present from the outset emanating from that which is other to itself. This remains true even when it supposes that what it experiences is, in itself merely a subjective affection, for even this is still external to the knowledge we have of it. The metaphysic of sensibility that is presupposed in Thomas' theory of cognition is, then, of this kind. According to it sensibility is a finite experience in which a finite being reveals itself and is 'taken in', a kind of knowledge in which a sensible object is possessed in its manifestation of itself as it is in itself. Once we assume such a metaphysic of sensibility it is immediately evident why, according to Aquinas, sense knowledge as such [20] can never be false and, for this very reason, never true either in any proper sense.[11]

The purely passive process of consciously 'taking in' – it would be called receptivity without spontaneity by Kant, or awareness without self-awareness by Hegel – in virtue of its passivity, makes it possible for the real thing to imprint its image upon the receptivity of the knower, and so to reveal itself of itself. But precisely in making this possible, this passive process makes it impossible for sensibility to stand back, so to say, from the impression it has received and from its object, and so to judge of it as it is in itself. What sensibility experiences is always a genuine reality, yet it cannot express any judgement upon it, which means that strictly as such it never rises to a level at which it is capable of being true or false. Sensibility possesses things in a single uninterrupted projection from the things themselves, but for this very reason it is also at the mercy of their obtuse particularity, their lack of reference to anything beyond themselves. Of course when such sensibility is linked with an intellectual and spontaneous power of knowledge within the unity of conscious awareness, as with man, this sub-logical certainty, inherent in the material reality itself and manifesting itself of its own power at the level of sensibility, can have a certain significance for the establishing of truth. But taken in itself and in isolation from this, it merely supplies the basis for the truth of the material content of a particular judgement. The formal structure even of such a judgement, and a fortiori the structure and content of universal, and especially metaphysical judgements, are too advanced to find any basis in this sureness of perception at the sensible level.

[11] Quaestiones Disputatae de Veritate, q. I, art. II, and Summa Theologiae I, q. 16, art. 2.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

2. The Light of the Active Understanding

We are faced, then, with a further question: what is the truth of a judgement based upon, to the extent that the judgement constitutes something more than the mere passive receiving of the impression of a particular sensible object as such? As in every major metaphysic of knowledge from Plato to Hegel, so too with Thomas Aquinas, we here arrive at a principle of truth which is prior to the sensible impression. But Thomas departs from the tradition of Plato, Plotinus, Augustine, Bonaventure, and Malebranche in refusing to regard this as consisting in any objectified a priori postulated as a second objective sphere immediately accessible to man, over and above the individual thing as perceptible by the senses. Thomas [21] stands, rather, in the line of the tradition of Aristotle, Thomas, Kant, and Hegel in regarding this principle of truth as consisting in a formal a priori of the spontaneous intellect itself. In other words it consists not in a fundamentum of truth viewed as an object, as for instance an idea, a light of God, God himself etc., but rather – to express it in Thomist terms – in a light of the understanding itself which permeates and informs the material of the sense knowledge, and raises it in acts of judgement to the level of objective apprehension and conceptuality.

It would be possible to work out a transcendental deduction of this formal a priori of the understanding in the Thomist sense in various ways. With Aquinas himself we might enquire into the a priori conditions which make it possible to raise the individual object as apprehended by the senses to the conceptual level. This is the normal way in which Thomas arrives at the concept of the spontaneity of the understanding, the intellectus agens as he calls it (following an Aristotelian conception in this), as well as the essential structure which this has. Again we might – likewise in the Thomist sense – enquire into the conditions enabling that process to take place which Thomas recognizes as the reditio subjecti in seipsum, that which sets the intellect apart from all that is non-intellectual, and which, in modern terms, and in the Hegelian sense, might be called self-awareness: the capacity which the knowing subject has to stand apart from that which he experiences with his senses so as to maintain a position of free transcendence over the sense impression, even though inevitably 'lost' at this level, to evaluate it and estimate its truth, to be conscious of himself being 'over against' the world – in brief the knowing subject's capacity to enjoy that which in Heidegger's terminology is called 'Dasein' (personal existence). We may say that the act of judgement consists in the applying of a cognitive faculty to a being as it is in itself so as to find meaning in it. In itself the being involved is set 'over against' cognition as the content of subjective awareness. Now if we accept this, then it is in fact self-evident that this act of judgement always involves a simultaneous awareness of the self as 'over against' the known object, and that for this reason any enquiry into the transcendental conditions which make a true judgement possible also involves an enquiry into the enabling conditions of self-awareness too.

We have reached a point at which we have to recognize the entire problem in the context of which the question of achieving an assured truth has to be viewed. But at this point another line of approach must at least be indicated, which is still more immediately connected with this question of an assurance of truth. The assurance of the truth of any given [22] judgement, to the extent that this is not to be derived from the evidence of sense perception, is achieved, according to Thomas, by a reduction to the first principles. These come first in the via intentionis, and in critically evaluating his own judgement, the person making the judgement returns to them 'resolvendo'.[12] It is impossible here to enter in any greater detail into the content of these first principles. We may confine ourselves to noticing that in the view of [12] Summa Theologiae I, q. 79, art. 8 c.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Thomas Aquinas we have in them something more than the mere principles of formal logic such as, for instance, the principle of non-contradiction. We are dealing, rather, with first principles of an ontological kind, with the ultimate and apodictic axioms of metaphysics, which claim to apply necessarily and absolutely to every existing thing. But where do we find the basis for the assurance of truth of these first principles themselves? At this stage there can no longer be any question of syllogistic justification. They must, therefore, be 'seen' as evident in themselves: dicendum quod omnis scientia habetur per aliqua principia per se nota et per consequens visa.[13] They are 'per se nota', as Thomas also says frequently in other contexts.

Now for any right interpretation of the Thomist argument in support of this assurance of truth in judgement it is crucially important to know what the real import of this word 'evident' is as applied to first principles. Above all a clear grasp of first principles does not consist in the mind recognizing an obvious state of affairs in the sense of being confronted with a complex entity having being (albeit not 'existence') in its own right, or a proposition having meaning in its own right. It is not as though such a complex or such a proposition were being seen by the mind in some objective or ideal mode of being of their own. Propositions, 'values', or 'ideas' existing in their own right have no place in Aquinas' system. The reason he rejects them is that, as he sees it, there is, in principle, no objective dimension of subsistent ideas such as, in terms of being and knowledge alike, would ultimately be independent of the dimension of being already in existence. To accept any kind of vision of ideas objectively subsisting in themselves (a theory with which Thomas is familiar from Plato and Augustine, but contests) must, therefore, as he sees it, logically lead to ontologism, to the doctrine of a direct vision of absolute being in itself, in other words to a conception which he rejects from the outset on theological grounds, as well as on grounds of the Aristotelian metaphysic of epistemology.

A further point is that Thomas does not recognize that the first principles [23] are evident in virtue of their objective conceptual content as such in the sense that once we have realized the intrinsic meaning of the individual concepts or of the propositions as a whole in which these first principles are expressed as such, we have immediate grounds for recognizing them as having an objective existence and validity in their own right. This thesis of the classic pre-Kantian rationalism of the 17th and 18th centuries would not have gone unopposed by Aquinas any more than it did by Kant. Thomas, no less than Kant in a later age, and for the same reasons, rejected the ontological argument for the existence of God, an argument which, according to the principles of the classical rationalism, would have been regarded as sound. Indeed it is accepted as valid even by Leibniz and Wolff, and in just the same way in the rationalism of the Middle Ages, with its tendency to an objectifying mysticism, easily turning to ontologism. This is exemplified in Anselm of Canterbury, Albert the Great, Aegidius of Rome, Thomas of Strasbourg, and Bonaventure. As with the ontological proof of the existence of God, the realization – in itself certainly reasonable – of the connection which necessarily has to be established between various conceptions and the first principles, only has an ontological significance provided that this connection is valid for the individual conceptions. And for Thomas this connection is not simply and ipso facto established in cases in which these conceptions transcend the level of concrete individual sense experience, being something more than mere pointers to such experience. These universal conceptions, which lie at the roots of the first principles, impinge upon man in his apprehension of individual sensible reality and in connection with this. To that extent (but only to that extent) the universal concepts of metaphysics are ultimately abstractions from the individual object as apprehended by the senses. In holding this Thomas Aquinas is no Platonist but an [13] Summa Theologiae II-II, q. 1, art. 5 c.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Aristotelian. But it would be totally to misunderstand his Aristotelianism if we sought to go on from this and to jump to the over-hasty conclusion that Thomas regards the particular meaning at the level of sense perception as providing an adequate basis for the ontological validity of individual metaphysical conceptions. Thomas leaves no room whatever for doubt that the only meaning which the individual, taken simply as such, can convey is that of its own self. And because of this, while the experience of a multiplicity of individual things simply as such may perhaps be capable of providing a basis for an empirical, inductive, and so assertive, generalization of experience as expressed in propositions, it is still quite incapable of providing a basis for the validity of conceptions which are universal in a metaphysical sense, and so could be in turn the [24] basis for an apodictic universality and validity of metaphysical propositions, namely the first principles. For such metaphysical conceptions to have universal validity it would be necessary to find a basis for them in a principle that was prior to the individual case, in other words an a priori principle. But, as we have already pointed out, Thomas' system is such as to exclude any a priori principle of this kind, having an objective existence of its own and independently of other being. It follows that it can only be a formal a priori principle of the spontaneous intellect itself. Aquinas calls this the lumen intellectus agentis. The light he refers to here is the a priori form in which an intellect, of its own spontaneity, apprehends the sensory material – Thomas actually calls the sense impression itself the materia of the intelligibile – that which can be understood. The intellect gives conceptual form to this material, and so makes it that which is intelligibile actu, that which is known at the conceptual level and emerges as a synthesis of the sensory material and the a priori of the intellect. And in Thomist metaphysical epistemology this a priori form in which the sensory material is apprehended is, ontologically speaking, nothing else than the dynamic movement of the intellect as such outwards towards the absolute totality of all possible objects of the human intellect, the tendentia in objectum formale adaequatum intellectus, to express the matter in the Latin terms of Thomism. To this extent, in this dynamic outward movement of the intellect as a 'hunger' (for so it might be called with Hegel), the individual object as sensibly experienced is apprehended, recognized as that which is finite, and as failing, by reason of its limitations, to measure up to the capacity of the dynamic force in all its fulness and depth. Once the absolute epistemological ideal is applied to it as a standard, it is shown to be a being as compared with being itself, and so as a 'this', a finite individuum, the limitations of which are such as to admit of other possible objects being experienced together with itself. Now in the very act of recognizing it as particular in this sense, the universal is, by implication, recognized too and vice versa. The process of transcending the particular and attaining to the totality of all possible knowable objects appears, then, as the transcendental condition enabling abstraction to take place, and so the condition of expressing a judgement, i.e. of understanding something as a 'something', and finally of thereby arriving also at the reditio completa of knowledge of the self.

At this point an initial question arises as to the extent and range of this transcendence, and of what limits can be set to this totality of all possible objects of human knowledge as opened up by the light of the intellectus agens. And here Thomas departs from Kant. For, as the latter sees it, the [25] transcendence of the understanding and of its formal a priori does not in principle extend beyond the basis provided by the power of the imagination, of sensory perception. Kant's view, expressed in Thomist terms, is that the objectum formale of the human spirit is ens principium numeri, ens materiale, that which is and which has, as an intrinsic principle of its being, that materia which Thomas too regards as the metaphysical basis for conceiving of space and time. Now for Thomas the intellect's transcending power avowedly bears upon being in the absolute. It extends beyond the sphere of the senses, thereby opening up a knowledge of being as such, and providing the basis on which metaphysics, with its specifically human characteristics, becomes possible.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Regrettably we cannot spend any further time at this point in carrying through the transcendental deduction of this extent and range of the intellect's transcending power. For this we must refer to that work by Maréchal[14] which probably constitutes the best example of a philosopher in the spirit of Aquinas coming to terms with the central problem of Kant. Here we must confine ourselves to remarking that even according to Thomas the opening up of the sphere of human thought so as to make room for a metaphysic extending beyond the sphere of sense experience, and embracing all being in the absolute, is not achieved by any direct view of metaphysical being in the sense of classical rationalism or ontologism. According to Aquinas it is of such a nature, rather (and this is precisely something that would have to be shown by any transcendental deduction of the range of transcendence in this sense) that to accept this range of transcendence and, concomitantly with it, a knowledge of being in the absolute and in its most ultimate and formal structures, is numbered among the transcendental conditions enabling an intellect endowed with self-knowledge to make objective judgements upon, and so know, the objects of sense perception. In other words it would have to be shown that that transcendence which is the enabling condition of judgements upon, and a priori knowledge of, objects of the world of perception, must necessarily be a transcendence extending beyond this world, and hence is accepted to be such in every kind of knowledge belonging to this world. Once this transcendental deduction is carried through, then that condition is fulfilled under which even Kant is prepared to recognize a metaphysic as valid. While it is true that knowledge of the world based on judgement – Kant calls it physics – does not afford any direct view of the metaphysical dimension, still it does implicitly involve what is the enabling condition of this, namely the acceptance of transcendental being and of its [26] ultimate structures. Thomas' primary and most fundamental way of expressing these is not through the categories (for him, in fact, these apply primarily to material being), but through what he calls the transcendental determinations of being. For him they are the ultimate 'categories' of metaphysical being. It is from these metaphysical concepts that the first principles are formed. These are, then, valid in their application to being in the absolute, and also, by the same token, to the being touched upon in direct sense experience.

In the light of this we are now in a better position to state the precise sense in which the first principles are said to be 'evident', for according to Thomas the assurance of truth in all our true judgements is based upon this character which they have of being evident once we abstract from the evident character of sense experience as such. For this latter, of itself and taken in isolation, is incapable of any judgements at all, much less any true judgements.

The character of any judgement as evident is ultimately based on the character of the first principles as evident. As principles these are, of their nature, metaphysical, i.e. they purport to apply to being as such. Their claim to have this kind of application cannot be regarded as justified by any 'evidentness' inherent in the reality of which they treat in itself, for this would presuppose that we were able to compare the concept with the metaphysical object, and so were capable of metaphysical intuition. Or again, it would necessarily mean being able to interchange the concept and the object for which it stands. The 'evidentness' of the first principles, rather, is the objective recognition that in every judgement which man makes as an act of cognition within the material world, the metaphysical validity of these principles is asserted, and this assertion constitutes the a priori condition, implicitly posited, which makes knowledge possible within the material world. Thus in the very act of recognizing his judgements as necessary, man is also asserting, as something posited and asserted as a necessary corollary of this, the metaphysical validity of the a priori structures of being as such. And since it is totally impossible for man to achieve an existential 'epoch' in his attitudes of judgement upon the world, he is necessarily, albeit implicitly, committing himself

[14] See n.5.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

to an assertion of these metaphysical principles such that, if in his thinking he were explicitly to deny, or cast doubts upon, the ontological laws of being which he implicitly asserted, he would be breaking that law of formal logic which is the principle of non-contradiction. The 'evidentness', at the human level, therefore, of these metaphysical principles, is ultimately based not upon any recognition of an evident identity between the concepts [27] (even for Thomist epistemology, rightly understood, these principles are a synthetic a priori), but on the 'evidentness' of a manifest contradiction, in terms of formal logic, between the positing as such of their validity and their content and the denying of this. If anyone were in a position to arrive at a metaphysical and existential 'epoch' from which to judge (and to doubt is also a form of judging), the metaphysical principles would cease, so far as he was concerned, to have any claim to validity. But at the selfsame moment such a one would cease to be that which he proclaimed himself to be in every act he performed: a finite being endowed with intellect, 'Dasein' (in the sense of modern existentialist philosophy).

In the light of this conception of 'evidentness' in finite human knowledge, it is easy to understand that Thomist epistemology cannot be accused of basing its theory of the adequateness of truth upon the naïve assumption that it is possible to compare the reality in itself with the reality as known, and so to establish an agreement between the two. This objection has no basis in the Thomist interpretation of sense knowledge strictly as such, because here the reality as experienced and the reality in itself are strictly one and the same. With regard to the objects of metaphysical enquiry and their 'evidentness', the objection has no force since, on a Thomist interpretation, the 'evidentness' of these for finite knowledge is based not upon the reality in itself, but on the a priori of the intellect; in other words at no stage is there any attempt whatever to institute a comparison. In fact such a comparison can only be based on a misinterpretation of the nature of intellect, for it is first and foremost in this that anything in the order of truth can reside. Thomas states that in the act of understanding truth is achieved by the judgement as it bears upon the reality in itself,[15] and this statement alone serves to show how far he is from attempting at any stage to institute a comparison between the reality in itself and the reality as apprehended. Ultimately speaking, however, this truth, this proportio ad rem of the act of judgement, is realized not, as we would expect, by a reflecting upon, or looking at, the reality itself, but by the understanding reflecting upon itself. We do not seek, at this point, to give a precise interpretation of the actual text of Thomas, on which so incalculably much has already been written. To conclude the point we are making, we may confine ourselves merely to observing that what has here been presented as the process of transcendental reflection upon the conditions which make knowledge possible (on the natura tritellectus, as Thomas expresses it) is, in our view, the same as that process [28] which, in the passages just referred to, Thomas calls the 'supra seipsum reflecti' of the understanding.

If, therefore, truth at the individual level consists in a judgement upon the 'thing in itself', where judgement is a veritative affirmative synthesis, then it is based upon the metaphysical first principles of being which constitute the sustaining basis for individual judgements. These principles, however, are rooted in the formal a priori of the intellect, the lumen intellectus, and their validity is recognized by the fact that our implicit assent to them is apprehended as being the transcendental condition making it possible for there to be objects of knowledge as such. Hence we can say that in all cases truth is possible only in self-awareness. The discovering of truth is always the discovering of the self as well on the part of the intellect.

But it also appears from this what truth signifies for Thomas at this level of the self-awareness which is always and necessarily involved in any true judgement. So far as human [15] Quaestiones Disputatae de Veritate, q. I, art. 9 c.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

cognition is concerned, truth is found in the judgement alone. Judgement presupposes abstraction and self-awareness. Both are possible only in virtue of the transcendental a priori of the intellect, which opens up the perspective of being in the absolute. Thus a true particular judgement on a being is possible only in and through an implicit estimation of being in the absolute, at however formal a level, only in a comprehensive awareness of being itself, and so, on any definitive understanding, in an implicit acceptance of pure being, God himself. Omnia cognoscentia implicite cognoscunt Deum in quolibet cognito. Truth is possible only in being as such.

3. Pure Being and Pure Thought

These remarks are still not enough to bring our argument to its completion. That which, for the Thomist system, constitutes the heart and centre of the metaphysical concept of truth still remains to be discussed. As Thomas sees it, truth in human judgement essentially presupposes an a priori formal principle as its enabling condition, in any understanding arrived at through judgement, and one which must be accepted as such. Yet at the same time truth consists in judging of a being as it is in itself. This means that the intelligence adduces the ultimate formal and metaphysical structure of its possible objects of its own power and concomitantly with its judgement upon them, yet must accept this structure as that of its objects, i.e. as that of being in the absolute and in itself. Now at basis this implies nothing else than accepting an ultimate unity of being and [29] knowledge, for it is only on this assumption that the validity of the formal a priori of the intellect is wholly reasonable and intelligible. Our chief point in saying this is that man, by the very fact of accepting the validity of his own transcendental a priori, and thereby the first principles of being as such, in every act of judgement he makes, accepts also that it is in principle possible to know a being as such. Quidquid est intelligi potest.[16] Furthermore, as a corollary of this, he is also assenting to the proposition that every being, as a possible object of knowledge at some level, has, as a determination of all beings necessarily present in the very nature of being itself, an intrinsic orientation to possible knowledge and a possible knower. Now if this is the case, then being and knowing (ultimately in the form of pure being, and also as realized in the existing thing to the extent that it is being and not non-being) must constitute an ultimate unity, must be unius generis, as Thomas puts it. For wherever a correlativity is found between two realities, such that it arises from their very natures, it can, in the last analysis, only have its basis in an original unity between the two. Now what this means as applied to our present question is that the reason that being and knowing are correlative is that they are originally and radically identical.

Pure being and pure knowing are the same reality, and we call it God. A finite being is endowed with knowledge, and in fact with knowledge of itself, in that it is, in a certain measure and according to a certain ‘analogy’, being. Now it is here that, taken at their ultimate metaphysical level, the concepts of knowledge, and so too of truth, are realized in their radical significance; it is here that the ultimate truth of truths is finally discerned. If being and knowledge (pure being in the absolute and a being in the measure that it is being) constitute an original unity, then knowledge cannot at its ultimate basis consist in a state of having something intentionally ‘over against’ one as an object; the only way still open to us to conceive of it is as a state in which the being concerned is ‘with’ or ‘beside’ itself, in which being is inwardly illumined to itself, in which knowing and the state of what it truly is to be known are identical, in which the knower in the true sense and the known in the true

[16] Summa Contra Gentiles II, c. 98.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

sense are one and identical in being. At its metaphysical roots, then, true knowledge consists in the unquestioning 'being with itself' of being. But knowledge and truth consist in thinking out and forming at the intentional level concepts different from the knower himself only to this extent: that that knower, in virtue of being finite, and so of the element of non-being intrinsic to him, does not ipso facto and from the outset know everything by the inner light of [30] his own intrinsic possession of himself. For he himself is not everything.

At the same time, however, to the extent that it is constantly extending itself, and to the extent that it actually 'loses itself' in the object, the act of cognition never ceases to remain a conscious 'taking possession of himself' on the part of the knower, for it is in this that knowledge first and last consists. For Thomas Aquinas the extent to which such a conscious return to the self in knowledge is possible is the essential factor showing the degree of existential power to be ascribed to a given being.[17] Thus for Aquinas an item of knowledge is true, i.e. comprehensive of being as such, to the extent that it simultaneously constitutes an opening up of the personal being of the knower, of the knowing subject. And because of this every true item of knowledge is – to put it in modern terms – always, and ipso facto an existential factor in the life of man as well. For the more it confronts him with being itself, the more it confronts him also with his own self, and brings him to self-realization.

Once this is recognized, namely that knowledge constitutes, in an ultimate unity, the 'being to itself' of being, we might go on to achieve an understanding of what ontological truth signifies on Thomas' theory. We might explain how ontological and logical truth are essentially interconnected. A being is, in the measure of its being, inwardly illumined to itself and possesses itself as an object of logical truth. It is in virtue of this fact that a being is ultimately knowable, a possible object of knowledge, and so ontologically true. This is why logical and ontological truth absolutely coincide in the pure being of God.

We must break off our considerations at this point. If we may make one further attempt briefly to recapitulate what we have been trying to say here, then it must be stated in conclusion that for Thomas Aquinas truth is primarily a state of having reality before one in judgement, the process of applying the concretizing synthesis between two concepts to the reality as it is in itself.

From this the following conclusion may be drawn: since truth, with the insights it offers, exists at the human level only in the judgement, it is always rooted in a transcendental a priori which is formal in character. The first effect of this is that being as such is always assented to in its most formal structures. Assent precisely to this is a necessary condition of realizing truth, and necessarily present, by implication, in every judgement. And this assent itself represents the ultimate assurance of truth at the human level. From this the second effect follows, namely that this transcendental [31] a priori is ipso facto the transcendental condition enabling man to have knowledge of himself.

Finally, therefore, truth is, in its ultimate depths, that state of inner illumination, that intelligibility, which belongs to any being in itself and in the degree of its being. It is the self-confrontation of being as present to itself, such that pure being and pure thinking are one and the same, the absolute intelligence before which we stand in virtue of the transcendence of our intellect. And because truth exists only where being as such is attained to in transcendence, therefore that root which is most hidden, yet which is present and active in all truth, is this one single reality: God.

Therefore the most personal of existential factors, and the most metaphysical at the same time, is that which Thomas has expressed in these words: Adoro te devote latens Deitas, quae

[17] cf. Summa Contra Gentiles II, c. 101, and III c. 51.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

sub his figuris vere latitas. Everything is a parable – figura – of God, who is constantly being unveiled yet at the same time constantly concealed in the parable.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[32]

3

POSSIBLE COURSES FOR THE THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE

For anyone seeking to achieve a balanced view of Christian theology in the 20th century[1] it becomes relevant to look to the future too, for any such attempt gives rise to the pressing question of what future can be foreseen for this theology in the next few decades. Certain forces in contemporary Christianity, as described, for instance, by the Second Vatican Council,[2] and which, moreover, are among the decisive factors for Christian theology, will certainly persist. There are many tasks which theologians of all Churches have always regarded as their special concern. Either they have been discharging them all along or they have now begun to take them in hand. From this point of view and many others besides it is, of course, possible to attempt some estimate of what form the theology of the future will take, at least to the extent of expressing certain fragmentary prognostications, desires, and conjectures. But surely the first point (this at least is my view) which any theologian must lay down for this theology of the future is that ultimately speaking it is unknown to us, not only in practice but in principle as well.[3] If is in any [33] sense true that Christianity as a whole acts as the guardian of the 'docta ignorantia futuri' for the history of mankind in general, if it represents the most radical critique of the theory that we are either able, or have the right, to work out an absolute plan for the course of history (seeing that any such plan would represent the end of history itself), then it follows that the Church must also go on to state in ever clearer terms that she herself is vitally involved in history, and yet that whatever possibilities or duties there may be to make plans for it to a certain limited extent, the future of history still remains unknown.

This precise point, then, applies to the future history of Christian theology as well. So far the Church has never, properly speaking, worked out any effective plans for it. But surely it both can and should engage in a little more planning and do a little more to provide institutions for such planning to be worked out for the future. In other words some kind of futurology for theology should be engaged in at both the theoretical and the practical level. But the future of theology as a whole, and on the longer view, will still remain unknown for the Church too. And this as a matter of principle. However obvious this point may be, it nevertheless has a practical importance as well. Just as other sciences work out scientific plans for their own spheres, so too (to the extent that all this is applicable to theology) theology itself (and the Church which upholds it) can lay down programmes of research or set up teams of researchers and, where necessary, find the resources to finance these (with

[1] The original lecture, of which this is a lightly re-edited version, first appeared under the title of 'Ausblick', Bilanz der Theologie im 20. Jahrlundert, H. Vorgrimler and R. van der Gucht edd., Vol. III (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1970), pp. 53O-551.

In what follows the impression may at times be given that it is the future of Catholic theology only that we are discussing here. No one speaking of the future from the basis of his own convictions and concrete desires would ever dare to speak on behalf of all theologies. Nevertheless the considerations which follow may, from a material point of view, evince many connections with non-Catholic theologies and – mutatis mutandis – include their special subject-matter within its purview. Y. Congar is concerned with the same theme, though he concentrates more upon the aspect of tradition, in his book, Situation et taches présentes de la théologie (Paris, 1967).

[2] cf. e.g. Conc. Vat. II, Gaudium et Spes (Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World), Nos. 4-10: 'The Situation of Men in the Modern World'.

[3] On this cf. the author's essay, 'The Question of the Future', Theological Investigations 12 (London and New York, 1974), pp. 182-201.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

greater generosity and understanding, as we may hope, than has formerly been the case). And if this course is adopted, then it can only be praiseworthy and, properly speaking, obvious as well. This is, of course, equally true of international theological periodicals if they decide to cease from publishing articles in a haphazard way simply as they are contributed and without any planned programme. It would also apply to the setting up of an international theological commission at Rome which could set itself quite specific tasks. Or again to projects, either envisaged or already in hand, to publish whole series of earlier theological literature presented according to modern principles. Or again it would apply to any scheme for using the most modern technical aids for theology as well, including even computers for verbal statistics or perhaps even for analyses of style, researches into the history of ideas, etc. (We can say this even while recognizing how large the question looms of the extent to which the financial situation of the Church of the future will really allow us to keep up in this sense with the technical side of modern science.) But all this should not blind us to the fact that the future of theology is properly speaking unknown to us. The [34] abiding character of the Church, and so of her theology as well, does not set either the Church or theology apart from human history in general. The history of the Church and theology develops essentially as the reaction of both to the historical situation of the world which they have to serve. Indeed the Church and theology have to help in shaping this situation in certain limited areas even though they cannot really or totally manipulate or control this situation.[4] Even abstracting from the free movement of the Spirit that disposes in the Church, guiding it but never being guided by it, and remaining always the uncircumscribed Lord of its history, the very fact that, despite all the plans and estimates of futurology, the history of the world ultimately remains unknown, is in itself enough to ensure that the history of the Church and its theology is likewise ultimately unknown. Now this has practical consequences. Neither theology itself nor the Church's teaching office should be over-energetic in attempting to plan or direct theology. Such a course would have very little effect. Nor should we seek too hastily, or without due thought, to organize or institutionalize the whole development of theology by devising mammoth programmes for it. I do not say this idly. For instance at the first session of the International Theological Commission at Rome it was declared, right from the outset, that this commission set itself the task of covering what I felt to be more or less the whole of theology, or at any rate its fundamental themes, embracing all the rest. My personal opinion was against this. Theology as such can really be pursued only by theologians as such, and it can never be subjected to a standard imposed upon it by planning of a totalitarian or authoritarian kind. Moreover the Church's teaching authority has never laid claim to any such authority, and will be less than ever in a position to do so in the future. It will do no harm if in the future the Church becomes the place where the original and surprising findings of the freely creative spirit can most of all be looked for and welcomed in her theology. So far from any ideological petrification [35] of its own understanding or itself, theology must, precisely in the future, continue to be the guardian of the 'docta ignorantia theologiae futurae'. Precisely because now, in contrast to earlier ages, it is possible and tempting to try to achieve the opposite of this, this manifest fact should be stated here at the beginning of this section.

However true it may be that the future of theology is unknown to us, one factor that [4] There is nothing derogatory in this statement for the Church or theology. First, reaction also implies considered and responsible action upon an already existing situation. So universal is this law that it is quite impossible for there to be any action in human affairs which is not also a reaction. Hence it is, to a large extent, an open question how the Church will 'react' to its situation. Second, the Church is aware that this situation in which it stands in the secular world is ultimately speaking willed by the Lord of history whom the Church itself serves, and whom it must precisely acknowledge as greater than itself, not claiming to be his representative in a totalitarian sense, or pretending to decide everything that takes place. Third, every reaction also implies that the situation to which the Church is reacting is itself having an influence upon it in its turn.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

belongs to it of its very nature is its attitude of hopeful belief that it will endure and keep its own identity in the future too. We must not dwell too long on this here, for we cannot offer a theology of the nature of theology within the present context. Nevertheless it does seem important in this context to emphasize that even though theology does endure and keep its own identity throughout all temporal changes, this precisely does not shield it from the surprises which its unknown future will bring. The fact that it keeps its own identity, continues in the future too to be what it has been in the past, is, indeed, not simply to be accounted for by an abiding nature which is devoid of any real historical development whatever. On the contrary, it is to be ascribed to the true historical development of this nature itself. Let us take, for instance, the following statements,[5] in themselves justified: that this Christian theology has to be the kind of theology that never ceases to have its roots in the revelation of Jesus Christ; that it never ceases to have its source in Scripture and the Church's own understanding of her faith; that this theology is a theology of the Church, and one which never ceases to be bound up with the teaching office of the Church, even though its relationship with this is constantly subject to critical reappraisal; that it must not lose its living contact with the kerygma of the Church; that it is, with a unity that cannot be dissolved, at once positive, historical, and yet at the same time genuinely theoretical, or 'speculative'; that it must never become too far removed from that theology which has been called a theology of 'genuflection', and so on. All these statements are, and will continue to be, perfectly true. Yet we must not imagine that having made them we know exactly the concrete lines of development which the theology of the future will follow.

A. GENERAL TRAITS IN A THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE

Having made these provisos and reservations, then, what can now be said about the theology of the future? The term 'future' as used here [36] stands for a relatively proximate future. Even secular futurologists, provided they are scientists and not writers of science fiction, do not in fact extend their prognostications much beyond the year 2000. What we have to say about the future as thus defined consists, as we have already pointed out, in a certain haphazard and unsystematic amalgam of prognostications, conjectures, and even desires. Even desires, for it is permissible to have these too, and, as compared with 'prophecies', for the most part more reasonable. But where are we to find any kind of basic principle to reduce such conjectures and desires in some sense to a basic common denominator, and put them on a legitimate footing? Surely we cannot dispense ourselves from the quest for a key idea of this kind. For if we sought simply to analyse theology as it de facto exists today into its various individual disciplines, and to adduce a futurology of theology on this basis, then surely all that we would achieve would be one of two things: either we would produce programmes of work for the individual theological disciplines which were already familiar to them, and which cannot be developed here, or such an analysis would lead once more to the question of how we should seek in order somehow to be able to define the basic trend of the theology of the future. In the light of this let us begin by pondering the following proposition: the future theology of the Church will become less and less that which it formerly has been, namely the theology of a society which is culturally and regionally homogeneous. In other words the theology of the Church (or the Churches) will be the theology of a world Church, yet one which will never again be in a position to find any obvious basis for itself in any one specific culture, and which will never again simply constitute an obvious social and cultural [5] cf. e.g. K. Rahner, 'Theology' and 'History of Theology', Sacramentum Mundi, VI (New York and London, 1970), pp. 233-246.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

phenomenon belonging to a particular region, one which is guarded by the society concerned as its own special possession and its own tradition. It will be the theology of a world Church, therefore, which, wherever it exists, will, be (albeit in very varying degrees) a diaspora Church, one which will have to maintain itself in a neutralist and secularist world. These social conditions under which the Church, and thereby her theology too, will operate, seem to me to be already present in part, and indeed to a large extent. I suggest that in a world dominated by rationalism and technology they can only increase. For the immediate future all this seems to me to be a manifest truism. In any case I cannot, at this point, enter into dispute with those Christians or theologians who believe that even in the future there will still be, in many great areas of the world, societies which, taken as a whole, will, in their outward character, constitute a Christian or Catholic milieu for the Church and theology in the [37] sense familiar to us up to the present. (There is a quite different question, and one which cannot be treated of here, namely whether there ever can or will be a society such that, though wholly secularist, it is nevertheless subject at a quite radical and hidden level to 'anonymous' Christian influences as one of its determining factors.) The only problem with which we have to concern ourselves here, therefore, is what the implications are of this social situation for the theology of the future. It is, of course, also obvious that such a question could be answered with much greater precision and probability by a specialist in sociology and futurology (assuming that he also understood something of theology) than it can be here, where it is being treated of by one who is a mere theologian and nothing more.[6] We must explicitly emphasize once more that we can treat only, or almost only, of theology in general. Without wishing, therefore, to underestimate other theological disciplines, their necessity or their importance, [38] the disciplines which are of most concern to us here are those which have the greatest possible relevance to the Church's task of missionary preaching – above all to the extent that she does effectively perform this.

I. Pluralism in Theology

[6] Obviously this pluralist, secularized, rational, and technological world which we are regarding as the situation of the theology of the future cannot be described or analyzed in greater detail here. Let us confine ourselves to emphasizing one point: the fact that an individual, e.g. a cleric, speaks about this world does not in itself mean that he is really living in it. It is only when he is actually living in it as well (though this does not mean identifying himself totally with it in every respect) that he can write that theology which the future needs. Now this attitude of accepting the intellectual and social situation necessarily involves something precisely more than a mere awareness of the existence of alien 'opinions' which remain just as alien to one as Tibetan medicine might to the average European who has come to know of it through indirect sources. Also, and more than this, this attitude of acceptance involves the ability spontaneously to enter into the basic attitude of mind of a man of tomorrow who is not a Christian, a man who, for instance, is astonished at the sound of church bells on Sunday morning, at the sight of religious habits in the street, which strike him as the costume of folklore; one whose impression of Rome, with its countless clerics clothed in all kinds of habits, and its innumerable churches, is not at all that of a 'holy city'. On the contrary it gives him the sort of feeling that a European might have on arriving as a tourist at Lhasa, and so on. Obviously in such cases a Christian of the kind we are thinking of will still willingly bear the scandal which his faith represents, not regarding it as interchangeable with that other scandal which arises from an obsolete culture which is not his any more than it is the non-Christian's. If he meets a cardinal who still decides to appear in his traditional 'uniform' (if there still are any such) he will not find him any more important, on this account, for his Church or his life (though in saying this we are not falling into a 'fanaticism of desacralization', for an attitude of this kind is not modern but rather inhuman). And so on. These are examples the details of which are not worth disputing over, and are merely intended to illustrate the sort of situation in which the theology of the future too will have to be pursued. But unless we have this truly living feeling for the situation, even those examples will remain incomprehensible which will shortly have to be adduced from the immediate context of theology itself.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The theology of the future will be a pluralist theology,[7] even though obviously it will have to maintain the unity of the Church's creed. This statement should not for one moment be taken to convey that the pluralism we are speaking of (one which, admittedly, should be rightly understood, and should not in practice lead to anarchy) is capable of representing something of the Church's riches, or is in itself to be regarded as something especially welcome. Our intention is simply to recognize this pluralism as a fact. We accept that the Church is, or is destined to be, a world Church, and that too not merely in the sense of having a geographical universality. It also has this character (and this is something which may soon become far more important if the Church intends to be really true to its missionary task) in the sense that it is genuinely and unreservedly committed to recognizing the plurality of life-styles among men within one and the same geographical region, variations of life-style which the Church can no longer be as swift as formerly, and especially as she has been in the last few centuries,[8] to regard as valueless, preferring [39] instead to replace them with a single type of society characterized chiefly as that of peasants or petit-bourgeois. Now if all this is true then the theology of the Church is confronted with the most varied points of departure, ranges of perspective, conceptual models, and the most diverse criteria for distinguishing between that which can be taken for granted and that which cannot. These are genuine assumptions, from which theological thought must proceed, and they cannot in the concrete be reduced to any one 'system'. Likewise they give rise to a number of theologies which cannot, in any adequate sense, be reduced to a single theology. In respect of the axioms from which they proceed, and also of those factors in them which can never adequately be expressed at the philosophical, scientific, or sociological level, their intellectual approach, the degree of importance they assign to the various points they deal with, and their terminology, all these theologies differ very vitally among themselves. It obviously follows from this that the question of how theology is related to the Church's teaching office, to the credal formulae, and to the cultic life of the community as a whole, needs in many respects to be set on quite a fresh footing, and this in itself, once more, raises problems of language and communication in these theologies. Likewise it is obvious that these theologies must, for all this, continue to maintain a dialogue with one another not merely because of the unity of the Church and her creed, but also because of the state of interdependence and mutual influence which exists between the various outlooks and schools of thought in the secular world. This pluralism of theologies is in itself enough to justify us in the assumption and the conclusion that no one of these theologies, taken in isolation, any longer has the capacity to work out fully and

[7] cf. K. Rahner, 'Pluralism in Theology and the Unity of the Creed in the Church', Theological Investigations XI (London and Baltimore, 1974), pp. 3-23.

[8] This conditional clause does, of course rest upon assumptions which it is the task of the sociologist and futurologist rather than the theologian to investigate. It is becoming ever clearer that we are involved in a culture of the masses of a rational, technical, and cybernetic kind. But however much we may assume that this will lead to uniformity and reduce all to the same level, it will presumably still at the same time offer the individual numerous opportunities for exercising his freedom such as formerly he did not have; opportunities to shape his life-style even though it may be true that the varied forms of life-style which emerge are based upon this universal and technical culture for all. Now these life-styles, which each individual is free to develop for himself within a pluralistic society, will certainly include among others some which are (either wholly or in part) anti-Christian in character, and constitute the 'reproach of the Gentiles'. And in response to these, Christians will have to find courage of a quite new kind in developing a manifest non-conformism. At the same time, however, there will also be precisely the kind of life-styles which on the one hand strike us of today as being still, perhaps, 'impossible' or 'unchristian', while on the other they are capable of fully integrating Christian faith within their framework. The situation will be similar to that of former times, when an actor who was at the same time a Christian was regarded as a contradiction in terms. Unless we can bring a missionary élan to bear, we are inclined too hastily to regard certain social classes or groups as more or less disqualified for Christianity. Yet often all that they are disqualified from in fact is a certain very restricted section of Christendom which we have regarded as the only possible one. All this too will emerge in the theology of the future.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation explicitly in terms of fundamental theology all the ideological and philosophical assumptions to which the situation of pluralism in secular life at the social and individual level gives rise (and in fact a further reason is that no one individual any longer has time or intellectual resources enough to master all these theologies). Every such theology, taken as an autonomous system in its own right, must, in a certain sense, and within certain limits, have the courage to be 'unscientific', and, indeed, is fully justified in being so. At the same time, however, it must make this clear and, in a special (we might say a transcendental) way, show explicitly (as is perfectly possible) why it may legitimately claim to have this right. The very fact that no one [40] individual man either does live or can live merely by those principles which he has proved right in conscience by a process of scientific reflection after the pattern of the present-day sciences – this fact in itself is enough to justify theology's right to be 'unscientific' in this sense.

2. Missionary and Mystagogic Theology

The theology of the future will, in a more direct sense than hitherto, be a missionary and mystagogic theology, and no longer be so willing as has been the case in the past few centuries to consign this department of missionary mystagogy to the realm of personal practice or ascetic and mystical literature.[9] For in the future the Church will no longer be upheld by traditions that are unquestioningly accepted in secular society, or regarded as an integral element of that society. The community Church will be transformed into a Church made up of those who believe as a matter of personal conviction and individual decision. (We are stating all this in a somewhat simplified form.) Again theology has to make a contribution to preaching. And whereas formerly it was possible to depute a large part of this task to the traditional practice and the strength of society in general, in the new situation it will no longer be in a position to do this. And for all these reasons theology (or the theologies) must itself be far more missionary and mystagogic in outlook than it has formerly had to be. I believe that theology, wherever and whenever it still remains alive, no longer has the time, the inclination, or even the right to write such large-scale studies on the Trinity as were written in former ages, for instance, by a D. Ruiz de Montoya. In the unceasing life-and-death struggle within a secularized society it is inevitable that theology should be fully preoccupied with having to raise and answer ever afresh the ultimate questions of a personal decision for God, for Jesus Christ, and (of course in a very derived sense) for the Church. This does not, of course, mean that we will not also have to engage in very intensive 'specialist' studies in the field of dogmatics, a point which we shall discuss more fully at a later stage. But this must be done in such a way that a strong and explicit contact is constantly maintained with the ultimate questions confronting [41] theology today. 'Mystagogy' means that the fides quae of today can be expressed only in a very explicitly recognized unity with the fides qua. Obviously it is not those preoccupations of 'modern' man which his own inclinations have fixed upon and determined that provide the criterion for deciding what should be studied in theology. But if it is true that everything that is expressed in objective concepts in theology has a reference to the interior self-communication of God in every man, then the fides qua both can and must constitute a theme in all departments of dogmatic theology and, moreover, from a different [9] In this respect theology from the age of the Fathers to the High Middle Ages can perhaps in its turn provide a new model, though of course always recognizing the necessity for having to speak in more 'abstract' and 'formal' terms than in that period. In what has been said a question which has, of course, not really been brought to the surface in any effective sense is the question of the future of the 'religious book'. On this cf. K. Rahner, 'The Future of the Religious Book', Theological Investigations VIII (London and New York, 1971), pp. 251-256.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

aspect according to each department involved. The point we are seeking to make is that it does not merely signify a subject of some pious interest operating in an area outside theology properly so called. For in all departments of dogmatic theology we have to ask 'What does this mean for me (and society)?' 'How does this really affect me?' 'How precisely can I myself really believe this? Once such questions as these are raised, once the theologian ceases to identify himself in his studies, in a manner which is at basis out of date, with a quite specific, but ever diminishing social group (which nevertheless still continues to survive in a ghetto-like existence), then theology of itself will become something quite different from what it formerly was. It will of itself become more mystagogic, more missionary, and this is something which in practice is in accordance with the contemporary and future situation. Of course we should supply examples to make our meaning clear. But this is impossible here. Yet we have only to read some teaching about the nature of God or some treatise in fundamental theology or dogmatic christology, or a substantial part of moral theology in the seminary textbooks, to receive the inescapable impression that something is being expounded and proved here about which the author has never seriously entertained any doubts. Now what this means is that the author is, without himself noticing it, sustained by that 'ideology' of his group in Christian society which is still relatively undisturbed. For what other source could there be for his certainty of the compelling force of his all-too 'binding' arguments and ideas? Now a theologian does not necessarily need to be a doubter in the sense in which moral theology treats of culpable doubts on points of faith. But how is a theologian to write a theology capable of being, in any effective sense, missionary and mystagogic if he does not maintain a constant and vital inward sympathy with those for whom, after all, he is really writing, in other words for those who have still to make their way towards belief and who for the most part still stick fast in their position in the face of those who, from the point of view of their place in society, regard themselves as good Christians and [42] Catholics. But we have not yet achieved such contact so long as, in our dealings with confirmed non-Christians of this kind, we behave towards them as I might behave, for instance, towards a Hindu or Zen Buddhist acquaintance, or as they might behave towards one of us nowadays on any secular occasion which is not concerned with religious or philosophical questions, and at which no one speaks of religious matters or has the slightest intention of attempting to 'convert' the others.

3. 'Demythologizing' Theology

The theology of the future must be a 'demythologizing' theology. In saying this lam fully aware of the disadvantages which this term has come to have. On the one hand, as a result of the use to which it has been put in the theology of Bultmann, it has nowadays come to acquire a sense which is, to a large extent, unacceptable to Catholics. On the other hand, however, we must recognize that theology as such (and beginning with the New Testament itself) has all along engaged in 'demythologizing'. But if we try to avoid these connotations in choosing the concepts we need to express what we mean, how are we to prevent these other concepts from becoming, so to say, a protective layer of cotton-wool within which a comforting theology can continue simply to reproduce itself in its attachments to those traditional forms of Christianity which do of course still exist, with some variations according to the particular countries in which they are found. When we use the term 'demythologizing' here we are taking it to signify nothing else whatever than the attempt to ensure that the essential and primary statements of faith which must be preached, will be preached in a form which will be credible and acceptable to modern man (though we must recognize to the full the radical responsibility we are taking upon ourselves in this). But this is the chief and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

primary task for which theology must prepare the ground. It must be stated boldly and explicitly that, at least for the initial preaching of the faith which is so necessary, the expressions of that faith which have become traditional are now, and always will be, to a large extent unsuitable, Obviously they will continue to provide – and, moreover, precisely and more particularly for theology – a starting-point and a norm for theological thinking. But if theology is to make a contribution to preaching, the traditional formulae of faith can no longer constitute the outcome and conclusion of theological speculation in the same way as has formerly been the case. In our preaching we cannot continue to present these statements, which come at the beginning and end of theology, more or [43] less as they stand, or provided only with a few additional explanations. In the future too the traditional formulae of faith, the official and definitive doctrinal declarations in force up to the present, will continue to constitute again and again, not merely the starting-point and the norm, but the final goal of theology and preaching as well (the more so since it is quite impossible totally to dispense with them in the liturgy). They will continue to have this function whenever, on the occasion of some fresh theological pronouncement, the following statement is made: 'When such and such a pronouncement was made in the past (or is made in the present in the form of a cultic formula) this was what is meant.' Catholic theology must be upheld by the conviction in faith that a 'demythologizing' of this kind is possible even in an approach that is unambiguously orthodox. The task may be difficult. It is only barely in its incipient stages. Nevertheless it is possible. In order to express our meaning once more in different terms: preaching and cult have drawn their living force more or less from those traditional statements and formulae of faith which emerged in the first five centuries of Christendom in a world of ideas which was more or less homogeneous in character. At the time theology provided, as it were, a musical accompaniment to these formulae (of course in circumstances of mutual interdependence) which was certainly enlightening, but which (as every catechism shows) carried no very great significance so far as understanding and the will actively to believe were concerned for the normal Christian. Today, however, theology must accept as its new and primary task (albeit in the context of a pluralism of theologies within the unity of the Church and her creed) the duty of devising fresh statements of the content of the ancient faith. As we have already said, theology has been engaged in 'demythologizing' activities right from the first. But properly speaking it is only today that such activities have come to have the status of a consciously defined task which can only be discharged in terms of this pluralism. The only question which Thomas Aquinas had to deal with, for instance, was whether God exists. He did not have to answer the question of who and what he is. Anyone undertaking to develop a theology of the nature of God must be willing to proceed very slowly in bringing his hearers to a gradual understanding (capable of being made real in terms of their own concrete lives) of what the very term 'God' is intended to signify. Obviously in any such approach he will still all along be retaining some connection with what was formerly called the proofs of God's existence and the doctrine of the nature of God. Nevertheless his approach will not be the same. For there are very many points with regard to the nature of God and his relationship with the world (for instance that [44] God takes 'responsibility' even for the wicked in the world in a quite specific way etc.) which were accorded a fairly secondary place in advanced theology and regarded as altogether too much for the average Christian. Today, however, in a mystagogic teaching on the nature of God of the kind we have in mind, such points must be brought into the discussion right from the outset if we are to avoid, once more, either presupposing or implying an idea of God which will appear unacceptable to modern man precisely by presenting God as one particular factor in the world itself. A theology which is 'demythologizing' in the right sense should clearly recognize the effect of such statements as 'there are three Persons in God; God has sent his Son into the world; we are redeemed by the Blood of Jesus Christ', when we continue to make them the beginning and end of the statement of Christian belief in the manner of the old theology and preaching. When he encounters them in this guise, modern man will find them simply incomprehensible, and they will give him the impression of belonging to the crude mythology of a religion of former ages. Of course for many of our contemporary Christians and theologians it would be necessary to provide further explanations and elucidations of this statement. And here this is impossible. All that we can manage in the present context is simply to draw attention to examples of this kind, and so indicate the quite radical difficulties which the task of a future theology will involve. And in such a context it does nothing to make such basic statements of Christian belief acceptable for us to invoke the element of mystery in them. For first the concept of 'mystery' must not be used as a facile excuse for the flabby thinking of a theology that merely repeats traditional arguments, and second, a point that precisely calls for demonstration is how such 'mysteries' have an intrinsic connection with that ultimate mystery which man really feels as an effective part of his life at the depths of his existence, and which he can discover and, in a certain sense, 'verify'. In the results it is designed to achieve the 'demythologizing' envisaged here has little or nothing to do with that residue of Christianity which survives from Bultmann's existential interpretation (even though this may perhaps amount to far more than over-hasty critics have supposed). The crucial point in what we are calling for here – to reiterate it once more – is the conviction that however true it may be that the Christian faith of yesterday and today is materially speaking one and the same, the actual expression of that faith in preaching, the conceptual models employed for it, its connotations and perspectives, will assume a radically different form in the future from that which they have formerly had. This is what theology must work to achieve, though obviously in [45] doing so it must maintain a constant hold on Scripture and the officially binding doctrinal statements of the faith of the Church of former times. To retain this hold is primarily the task of theology, and presumably it is only in a very secondary sense that it is the concern of preaching, to the extent that cubic formulae, which develop according to a tempo of their own, make it necessary. On the whole preachers will proclaim the beliefs of Christianity without constantly falling into the style and parlance of the ancient credal formulae, as preachers and catechists formerly tended to do. Thus what is truly and properly signified by the two natures or the hypostatic union in christology, or by transubstantiation etc., must always be retained. Moreover such ideas must constantly be the subject of fresh studies on the part of theologians in respect both of their history and their content. Yet is it so certain that fifty years from now preachers will still have to operate with these terms? An idea which is constantly being put forward is that while, in our use of such ideas, we do indeed have to recognize that they belong to past history, we also have to recognize at the same time that we can neither replace them nor do without them in the present, seeing that they correspond to a general common sense which has a universal philosophical validity. This thesis, however, though often stated, is still far from having been proved.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

4. Transcendental Theology

The theology of the future will be, in a far more explicit sense than hitherto, a transcendental theology:[10] not in the sense that a transcendental theology will be presented as the whole of theology, or that the Christian faith will be reduced to the private and personal dimension by an individualizing philosophy which views the individual as a monad-like 'subject'. The theology of the future will not fail to recognize that the Christian faith has from its origins, side by side with its solicitude for the salvation of the individual, a social relevance, and is, at [10] cf. Sacramentum Mundi, VI (New York and London, 1970), pp. 275-285, with bibliography.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

least in this sense, a 'political theology'. One of the factors belonging intrinsically to transcendental theology is precisely its conscious recognition of its own limitations. And this means that as the outcome of its own principles it arrives at an understanding of the fact that an individual cannot draw his life-force solely from some abstract metaphysic, or even from some philosophy of his historical mode of existence. He can only be fully alive in consciously accepting his own history as something which he must [46] endure and act responsibly in, yet which can never in any adequate sense be consciously comprehended either in its past or its future dimensions by the speculative reason. Nevertheless some form of transcendental theology will have to be worked out for the future in a more consciously reflective and methodical sense than has been the case hitherto. This does not mean the mere taking over of a transcendental philosophy into theology. As a matter of history this transcendental theology may find its point of departure in such a philosophy, and in fact it would have nothing to be ashamed of precisely in this. But the true source of any transcendental theology is itself genuinely theological. For the question theology enquires into is properly speaking this and nothing else: the salvation of man to the extent that this consists in the self-bestowal of God, and therefore the consummate wholeness which man can achieve. If man in this sense is to be taken as a subject in the strict sense of the term, and not merely as one particular individual factor among others, then we can only understand what salvation means to the extent that it (including, by the same token, all the elements in this salvation) is conceived of as applying to the subject as such. Now to understand the reality of salvation in this way means nothing else than to conceive of it as transcendental, applying, that is to say, to the transcendental subject, which is such a subject 'of its very nature', and precisely as so constituted achieves its most radical dimension through that which we call grace. All this has nothing to do with any false 'anthropocentricity' of theology, a fact which will be immediately clear to anyone who (in terms of philosophy and theology) conceives of man precisely as the subject of a radical orientation to the absolute mystery which bestows itself as such upon man in grace, without which man fails to discover his own self, and which is called 'God'. A transcendental theology could be defined as that kind of systematic theology which (a) avails itself of a transcendental philosophy as its instrument, and at the same time (b) is more explicit than formerly and, unlike fundamental theology, not wholly concerned with general principles in defining its themes for investigation on the basis of questions arising at a genuinely theological level. For these themes are the a priori conditions in the believing subject which enable him to recognize the fundamental truths of his faith. (A transcendental enquiry of this kind can be extended to all areas except one: that namely in which it is in principle and from the outset impossible to enquire into the a priori conditions on which a given piece of theological knowledge depends by reason of the nature of the subject. In such cases man has to recognize that here and now at this particular point, and in fact even in its bearing upon his own salvation, he is confronted by the inescapable factualness of [47] a free historical event, and of his faith accepts this as salvation despite the 'relativity' inherent in it.) It is impossible here to point to individual fundamental dogmas of Christianity in order to exemplify what such a transcendental theology can achieve and must achieve. For this we must refer to other studies.[11] One concluding point remains to be emphasized, however, namely that the need for a transcendental theology is not simply one and the same as the need for a transcendental philosophy in one particular historical form, as though this constituted the indispensable basis of our thinking. To that extent a transcendental theology would not even need to constitute one particular theology within the pluralism of theologies, but could represent an approach and a task which is present in every such [11] cf. the article cited above in n. 9.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation theology according to its particular mode.[12]

B. POINTS OF EMPHASIS IN A THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE

Having pointed to four general and formal characteristics of the theology of the future, we may now go on to make certain more concrete individual points on the future of Christian theology, though our choice of these points may seem somewhat arbitrary.

The biblical and historical (history of dogma) branches of theology as they exist today seem to me in a certain sense to have reached a crisis. Of course this applies to historical theology in an essentially higher degree than to biblical theology (obviously including exegesis). First with regard to historical theology, there will in fact always be a place and an important task for this, and not merely among those who have a justifiable and selfless interest in history as such, and to the extent that they have this – in other words among those seeking simply to know about past developments. Historical theology also has an important function for theology as a whole and as such. This is not only because theology must constantly be referring back to the authentic and binding pronouncements of the official Church of earlier ages which, since they still continue to remain a norm for the theology of today also, though on these grounds alone there must be a historical theology. But a further reason is that ultimately speaking the only way in which we can arrive at a sufficiently clear understanding of these official doctrinal pronouncements in their full bearing and significance, as also in their limitations, is to take account of their historical [48] context as a whole. And for this, historical theology must provide a contact with the totality of theological thinking. In other words it must embrace the study of the history of dogma and theology throughout all the centuries.

1. The History of Dogma

But unless I am mistaken in my impressions, this historical theology as practised hitherto has been sustained by the expectation that over and above the officially defined and assured doctrines of the Church, there are still teachings to be discovered in the Fathers of the Church or the theologians of the Middle Ages – if only we study them closely enough –which belong to the faith of the Church as such. This kind of exaggerated pietism and fideism, based as it is on a false conception of tradition, is something that should explicitly be abandoned – and in fact even in its application to the earliest of the Fathers. We can indeed discover in their works a theology from which we of today can still learn much. But it is precisely theology and not ipso facto or of itself dogmatically binding theses, going beyond those already recognized and acknowledged as binding by the Church's teaching office. It is true that what we find in these past ages is not merely a history of theology but a history of dogma as well. But right from the earliest ages of the Fathers of the Church onwards this is not a history of individual theological dogmas, each of which has been handed down as an entity already fully matured and existing in its own right, such that we can still discover further statements of a similar kind within the volumes of Migne. On the contrary, this history of dogma constitutes that part of the history of theology (springing from very simple sources) which already begins in the New Testament itself, and has assumed the form of irreversible

[12] cf. K. Rahner, 'Pluralism in Theology and the Unity of the Creed in the Church', Theological Investigations XI (London and New York, 1974), pp. 3-23; idem, 'Zum Begriff der Unfehlbarkeit in der katholische Theologie', Stimmen der Zeit 186 (1970), pp. 18-31.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

decisions or dogmas in the Church's conscious faith. This is not the place to treat of the question of why and how there can be any such discipline as a history of dogma in the true sense within the history of theology and emerging from it. Arising from what has been said, the point that is important for us here is that we cannot approach the history of theology in the manner of a prospector searching for metals (dogmas) still hidden beneath the rocks of the history of theology. Our way of studying it must involve, rather, two distinct approaches. (a) We must recognize both the meaning and the limitations of the dogmas actually formulated. Presumably these have reached a stage at which they are no longer susceptible of further explicitation and so of further extension through theological study, as a result of some datum [49] purely of the history of theology or dogma coming to be discerned in them, which had hitherto only been implicit. This is, of course, not for one moment to deny the Church's right to exercise her official teaching authority in producing fresh definitions in the future. But she will arrive at such definitions in some other way. (b) Our approach to the history of theology must, as Bernhard Welte puts it,[13] take the form of 'a deductive investigation of the major historical stages' which have taken place in the history of dogma, to see 'what authority they carry, and at the same time their limitations'. This means that the historical approach to the study of theology today will involve not so much an explicitating theology, one, that is, which in a direct sense yields fresh material either consisting in dogmatically binding pronouncements or providing an immediate point of departure for some new statement of this kind.[14] In its historical approach modern theology will be, rather, a 'reductive' theology. It will not involve any false or exaggerated emphasis on the formal authority of the Church's official teachings in terms either of the material it investigates or its pedagogic approach (the Church's doctrinal authority is beyond dispute. But the material and concrete factors on which it is based are precisely prior to it, and it is necessary to make these clear ever afresh). But the new theology will have to be a 'reductive' theology in the sense of showing how all the manifold individual statements of the Church's faith derive from the simple and pristine kernel of the Christian faith (even while recognizing the historical mode in which this is mediated).

2. Exegesis

The conditions governing that department of historical theology which we call exegesis and biblical theology are similar, and yet in some respects different.[15] Something similar to what has been said would apply to this [50] department of historical theology to the extent that, in terms of time and content alike, not only the Old Testament but the New Testament too has a long history. And even in the New Testament several different theologies are to be [13] cf. B. Welte, 'Em Vorschlag zur Methode der Theologie heute', Auf der Spur des Ewigen (Freiburg, 1965), pp. 410-426 (quoting from p. 420).

[14] When, for instance, the dogma of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary was due to be defined there was a reluctance to admit plainly and openly that it was not only impossible to adduce any proof that the doctrine had explicitly been believed all along as a truth of faith, but that any such proof that was adduced would certainly be false. For this reason attempts were made (e.g. by Otto Faller) to ascribe the earliest possible date to explicit witnesses to a pious belief of this kind. Alternatively its exponents sought to assemble all possible witnesses, and so to give the impression that it was explicitly attested by an existing dogmatic tradition even though 'for a lack of still available witnesses' it was no longer possible to trace the tradition right back to apostolic times.

[15] Without denying the unity of 'scripture' as constituted by the Old and New Testaments, we are confining ourselves to one observation on the New Testament, because it is impossible to say more at this point, and because even within this unity of Scripture, the Old Testament is, after all, very clearly distinguishable from the New Testament as a whole in its function and significance for Christian theology.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation discovered. If we take a dogma to mean some one specific individual statement, formulated as such by doctrinal authority, and reinforced with an anathema, then presumably it is no longer possible to discover any fresh dogmas of this kind even in the New Testament,[16] however true it may be that a 'history of dogma' in the specific sense in which it may continue to exist even in the future must constantly be proceeding from, and returning to, the New Testament. The conditions applying to exegesis and biblical theology are different to the extent that the New Testament as a whole will always remain the norm by which theology is judged, and not simply (as with the later history of theology) something from which elements, entire theologies, or trends of development can be set aside as illegitimate. (This does not, of course, mean that one particular question is thereby settled: the question, which is in fact in a true sense obvious, of the 'canon within the canon'; of whether a 'hierarchy of truths' is to be found even in the New Testament; of whether different niveaux are to be found even in the New Testament. Even for Catholics these are open questions, and Catholic theologians should be far bolder in their way of tackling them than they have been in other contexts. This is the question which has, in effect, been recognized all along under the formal heading of the analogia fidei. The only remaining point [51] to be made for the Catholic biblical scholar of the future is surely this; he has certainly the right and the duty to avail himself of all the methods of historical science in his task, and so, for instance, of those of form-criticism, redaction history, etc. He can also be far more critical than formerly in drawing a bold and explicit distinction between the truths which he can deduce from scripture working purely as a historian and fundamental theologian on the one hand, and those which he finds in it when he is working as a believing dogmatic theologian within the context of that understanding of the faith which belongs to the Church as a whole on the other. For precisely on a Catholic understanding of what faith means, a distinction has to be drawn between these two approaches. In respect of their purview, their certainty, and the kind of certainty involved in them, these two approaches do not lead simply to one and the same conclusions. And the exegete has the right to make these differences clear. But the exegete is also as such not simply a secular student of the history of religions, but a theologian who has to take responsibility for the whole of theology, and who also has a function in fundamental theology, one which he cannot shift to any fundamental theologian who is not a specialist in exegesis (and in most cases is incapable of being so). Admittedly a point which calls for more explicit reflection than has formerly been accorded to it is where precisely the task of the exegete in fundamental theology reaches its limits. What, in real terms, can or cannot be demanded of the exegete by fundamental theology or dogmatics?[17]

3. 'Ecumenical Theology'

[16] What we are referring to is the appearance of constant 'new' individual propositions such that, as new, they would belong more or less unambiguously to Scripture itself and (after sufficiently preparing the ground by exegesis) could then be defined by the Church in virtue of the fact that they were 'revealed'. In putting forward these considerations we may possibly be beating upon an open door. Yet I do have the impression that right down to our own times the old-fashioned conservative type of Catholic theology has worked with this assumption. The work of biblical theology will not become any less important once this tacit assumption is abandoned. But then the question which the exegete and biblical theologian will ask is whether he can show his own theology faithfully to reproduce the message of Scripture, whether Scripture has some fresh message for his theology, or throws new light in some way upon it. But he must pursue this line of enquiry within a pluralism of theologies which he already encounters in Scripture itself, and a fortiori in the contemporary scene, without being able fully to integrate it, in any positive sense, within any one single theological system.

[17] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Remarks on the Importance of the History of Jesus for Catholic Dogmatics', in the present volume, pp. 201-212.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

There are, perhaps, some points also to be made with regard to the 'ecumenical theology' of the future. So long as there are Christians (and, of course, among them officials too) who feel convinced in conscience by their reading of the truth of the gospel that they cannot give their adherence to this or that community of Christian believers without betraying the truth of the gospel and so forfeiting their salvation, so long will there be confessional theologies orientated each towards its own particular specific Church community. (There is a further and different question which cannot be treated of here, the question namely of how it comes about that the vast majority of contemporary Christians do not really have any confessional awareness in the theological sense whatsoever, but belong to one specific confession solely for historical and social reasons.) So long as [52] theologies of this kind exist, differing from one another in a sense that is (theologically speaking) confessional, there must also be an 'ecumenical theology' in the individual Church communities. The reason for this is simply that the Christians of different confessions have the Christian duty of being concerned about one another, and must strive for the unity of the Church. What form this ecumenical theology will take in the concrete is another question. It may be suggested that all the major institutes of theological study should, with the necessary provisos (and with intelligent concentrations of resources), set up special chairs of ecumenical theology. But almost more important than this is the requirement that there should be an 'ecumenical' element in the study of all the theological disciplines, each according to its own special approach. Nowadays this is already fairly obvious so far as exegesis is concerned. But for many other disciplines it is still more or less a demand for the future. It is necessary for each separate discipline to include such ecumenism as an intrinsic element, if only for the reason that any theology of the future must be mystagogic and missionary, and this means that the hearers who must be envisaged in such a theology can in concrete practice never again be solely, or even primarily, the theologian's own co-religionists.[18] But we have still not so much as touched upon what is surely the true problem for the ecumenical theology of the future. Future Catholic theology will have to reckon with a very considerable degree of pluralism within itself. In these circumstances it will be far from easy to establish, and give expression to, that unity of the creed which has to be preserved in the midst of this pluralism (for without every possible help from theology this will be quite impossible). Again there is an unmistakable trend for contemporary and future theological opinions, in establishing their frontiers, to cut across established confessional divisions among the Churches.[19] And a point which cannot be gainsaid is that a consensus either has already been achieved, or is perfectly capable of being achieved, on many questions on which the Churches were formerly divided in the answers they gave. At any rate it is often the [53] case that the answer given, even to a question of this kind within a particular Church, is no longer regarded as inseparably bound up with some confessionally binding doctrine. And if all this is true, then, after all, a position might be achieved in the theology of the future in which the theologies of the various confessions are no longer really confessional in any sense at all. Instead many of them, as pursued in the various confessions, while taking a clear stand against those who deny the real and basic substance of Christianity, have come to a legitimate understanding among themselves as having a unity in the midst of pluralism. Now on this showing a position might be arrived at in which the individual Church institutions, together with their official representatives, while [18] Even if in theory someone did not hold this opinion, he would have to remind himself that today (the very climate of ideas dominating human relationships everywhere makes every thinker akin to every other, and this situation in itself is enough to justify us in the point we are making) even in every Catholic, regarded from a 'psychological' aspect, a potential Protestant and an atheistic unbeliever lies concealed. If we bear this in mind, then we shall recognize that the requirement mentioned above is justified in practice at any rate.

[19] Because the current problems in theology are no longer in any sense the ancient themes of the Reformation on which the differences between the sects were based, or at least are not these in any direct sense.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

recognizing the divisions among themselves, could actually regard themselves as having eliminated the theological grounds for their state of separation, and could recognize that the only real factor causing them still to remain separated was the hold that past history and sociological circumstances had upon them. What then? Will the leaders of the Churches appoint the sort of theologians (for there both are, and will be such) who will make a 'bona fide' use of their theological acumen to develop still more doctrinal differences, possibly leading to still more declared divisions between the Churches (differences in which each theologian persists in identifying his own theological opinion with the binding teachings of his Church, and declares that anyone deviating from it is merely tolerated, and does not possess the true spirit of that Church)? Or alternatively will the leaders of the Churches have the heroic courage to draw the institutional consequences from any such possible theological situation, and to allow one single Church to emerge, which will maintain and recognize a great pluralism of Church life within itself? But let us return to those factors which constitute the prior conditions for such possibilities!

For instance we have nowadays reached a point at which it is no longer possible, in any really serious sense, to regard the doctrine of justification as a ground for division between the Churches, at least not in the sense that each of the separated Churches has its own distinct theology of justification uniformly accepted by all of its members.[20] We must maintain a version of the institution of the sacraments by Christ, and of the distinction between them, which is, in the fullest sense, possible for Catholics to hold. We must maintain a theology of the word which is fully possible for Catholics. And we must sincerely accept[21] the third canon of the seventh [54] session of the Council of Trent (DS 1603). But even while recognizing all this, the difference between the various sacramental doctrines must not be regarded as insuperable. A similar situation prevails today for the theology of established authority in the Church, even though here we do seem to have somewhat further still to travel. What we have said applies, of course, solely to the doctrines which became matters of official controversy between the confessions at the Reformation period. In addition to these, the various Protestant theologies do, of course, include opinions which, while they are not objected to by the authorities of those Churches, can nevertheless have no place in a Catholic theology. But this is, once more, a quite different question, in itself and in its consequences for ecumenism. We have to begin, in fact, by finding the answer to the first question, which, even from a theological point of view, has a different bearing, the question, namely, of what the situation is, in terms of theology, in which the various confessions as they de facto exist now find themselves, seeing that those doctrines which, as a matter of history, have been responsible for the separation between the Churches, no longer constitute unambiguous grounds for such separation. (With regard to the second question of the ecumenical relevance to be attached to other differences of doctrine which, though they do de facto exist, are not those of the official Churches, surely all that needs to be said here is that in any case it would be illusory to suppose that the various Church congregations, together with their theologians, would simply follow their ecclesiastical representatives into the unity of the Church the moment that point in the future was arrived at when these had achieved unity at the theological and institutional level between their Churches. It would be an illusion to suppose that the members of the various Churches would do this merely because these representatives of their Churches claim and exercise a certain general doctrinal authority.)

To all these considerations it would of course be possible to reply that even today the [20] We have only to think, for instance, of H. Küng's study on Barth's teaching on justification and the foreword to this study written by Barth himself.

[21] In this connection, on any serious evaluation, the history of the Catholic theology of the sacraments in the Middle Ages justifies us in developing a far more flexible theology of the sacraments than is recognized in post-Tridentine theology.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation doctrine of papal authority as interpreted by the First, or even the Second Vatican Council is still – and, moreover, in its theological aspects – a doctrine that divides the Churches, and one which banishes all the hopes of a theological unity between the Churches to an unforeseeable future. This remains true whether this doctrine is viewed in itself or in the assumptions on which it is based (e.g. in respect of the concept of truth as such or of the structure of the Church in general, with regard to the processes [55] by which the Church seeks to discover the truth, the relationship which one particular proposition of faith, taken in itself, bears to the Christian faith as a single whole). But even in this question do not misunderstandings still exist with regard both to the content of this doctrine and to the ways in which it is put into practice – misunderstandings such as the Catholic ecumenist might be able to overcome not only so far as non-Catholics are concerned, but also in his own mind and the minds of his own co-religionists? In any case, as I see it, the most notable obstacles to the progress of the ecumenical movement come not from the side of theology but from the weight of traditional and institutional factors (and sometimes factors belonging merely to the realm of folklore). Ecumenical theology, therefore, would also have the task of working out conceptual models for the leaders of the various Churches which would be comprehensible to them and acceptable to their theological conscience, aiming at a rapprochement between the confessions which can be achieved at the institutional level as well. Among other advantages it will also have the effect of throwing light on the question of what policy the authorities of the various Churches should adopt towards those Christians who find it simply impossible in the concrete conditions in which they de facto live so to understand and to realize the existing doctrinal differences (including the doctrine of papal authority) in all the seriousness which should still perhaps be attached to such differences, that, so far as their own consciences are concerned, these differences amount to confessional divisions at the level of theology, and not merely of ecclesiastical sociology. Since the various denominations are no longer confined to particular regions, or cut off from one another by territorial boundaries, such a question would have the highest urgency. The impression may possibly be given that at least among us Catholics it has not yet seriously been posed, because individuals baptized as Catholics are presumed to be Catholic Christians in a theological sense too until the opposite is proved in the individual case, whereas the real position is that despite Catholic religious instruction, the majority of them are Catholic only at the level of the sociology of religion, and very often the kind of Christianity which they 'draw' from their Church is more or less simply that which is common to all Christians. This is certainly not enough to provide any adequate account of the nature and task of the ecumenical theology of the future. But for further details we must refer our readers to the literature which has appeared on this.[22]

[56]

4. 'Political Theology'

Let us attempt at this stage to make a few brief observations on the question of 'political theology' as well.[23] They will be offered with the proviso that what the idea of a 'political theology' precisely means has probably not yet been established beyond all possible

[22] Here we may simply refer to the number of 'Concilium' deyoted to ecumenism, which has appeared every year since 1965, and in which these questions are treated of. On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Zur Theologie des ökumenischen Gesprächs', Festgabe für Bischof Volk, O. Semmelroth et al. edd. (Mainz, 1968), pp. 163-199; J. B. Metz, Reform und Gegenreformation heute. Zwei Thesen zur ökumenischen Situation der Kirchen (Mainz/Munich, 1969).

[23] For a description of Catholic 'political theology' cf. H. Peukert ed., Diskussion zur 'politischen Theologie' (Mainz/Munich, 1969); also J. B. Metz, J. Moltmann, W. Oelmüller, Aspekte einer neuen 'politischen Theologie' (Mainz, 1970).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ambiguity, and that I myself am not really sure in my own mind whether I understand what is properly meant by it. What is certain is that 'political theology' has nothing to do with any political activity of the Church or her clergy. On the contrary it recognizes the existence and the legitimacy of a secular world on theological grounds. Hence it does not in any sense run counter to that 'withdrawal' of the Church from 'politics' which has been progressively taking place in the last few decades, and which has been hastened by the Second Vatican Council. The Church cannot influence politics even 'indirectly' by invoking the natural law which it has to uphold (a temptation, not wholly overcome even today, to which those so-called 'Christian social sciences' are subject which in many cases have established themselves in the theological faculties as a theological discipline). The reason is that on any truly thought-out view of the natural law, in which its own historicity is correctly taken into account, it is impossible to deduce from it an unambiguous model for the politics of society even from the point of view of a particular historical and social situation. If we take 'political theology' to mean simply that which explicitly gives value to the relevance of all theological statements for society, then of course there must be a political theology. It will be not so much a regional theology as a formal point of view inherent throughout in all subjects for theological investigation. For on a right understanding (and without falling into any false theological anthropocentricity) all theological statements say something about man. And when we view man as a member of society we are not, in the last analysis, considering factors which are realized merely in particular individuals and in particular regions. These factors, rather, apply at all times to mankind as a whole from one particular point of view. Again the converse is also true: society is never merely the sum total of the individuals of which it is constituted. In this sense at least there is an urgent need today for a 'political theology', because traditional theology betrays [57] certain tendencies to circumscribe Christianity and to regard it as applying merely to the private life or the interior salvation of the individual man. And a further reason is that the theology of hope has likewise been conceived of at the exclusively individual level, while the earthly task of man as endowed with creativity has been regarded too little as that of communicating his eschatological hope and his love to his neighbour. Furthermore 'political theology' can be regarded as the special task of theology in maintaining a constant critical reappraisal and calling in question of the social system prevailing at any given time, seeing that there is a constant temptation to make an idol of this, and to establish it as absolute by unjust oppression. It is true that we are not forced to regard 'political theology' as a mere partial discipline (more or less subordinate to, or leading up to, moral theology or the Christian social sciences, which are themselves regarded as partial disciplines), but however true this may be, it would surely also be wrong to regard political theology simply as the theology of the future, which, in virtue of the new social situation, does away with all previous theologies. The real situation is that the significance of man is not fully apprehended even at the social level by considering him in his place in society, the influence of society upon him, or his function in society. Hence I find myself unable to see how on this showing a transcendental theology and a political one necessarily exclude one another or do away with one another. The very statement that man is a social being, and must therefore develop his theology as a political theology, is in itself a transcendental statement, which has to be based on transcendental grounds. Otherwise it may lose its validity in the future, and might be rejected even today. And this in itself is enough to show that transcendental and political theology are not mutually exclusive. This is an age in which the social sciences have come to the fore, side by side with philosophy, the traditional speculative disciplines, and the modern natural sciences, as on an equal footing with them and to be regarded as autonomous disciplines in their own right in their bearing upon man's understanding of his own nature and shaping of his own course. And obviously in such an age, and arising from this essential change in its situation, theology must and will take these

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

into account in the future far more than it has done up to now. The social sciences themselves will have a part to play in theology of the kind which up to now has at most been accorded to philosophy and, in recent times, to the scientific study of history. This means that it will also be an essential task of 'political theology' to examine more closely the precise connection between 'politology' (in the broadest sense of the term) and theology. A question which [58] may be left open is whether much which has hitherto been studied under the heading of the sociology of religion or pastoral sociology will in material terms be included as an integral part of 'political theology'. Wherever a tendency arises to erect the social sciences into ideologies, or an attempt is made (whether explicitly or in practice) to give them an absolute status as basic and all-dominating sciences, a 'political theology' should precisely serve as a corrective to such false claims.

In conclusion attention may be drawn, in quite brief and simple terms, to a few still more particular points. From what has been said concerning mystagogic and missionary theology and transcendental theology we may surely conclude, without any prolonged discussion, that a far closer unity should be forged between fundamental theology and dogmatics than is, or has been, customary in the study of theology up to the present. Hence it would be perfectly conceivable to assign fundamental theology in its explicit form a place at the conclusion of dogmatics where it could serve as a further critical reappraisal of, and reflection upon, the responsibility which our faith and our hope lays upon us. On any showing it is true that whatever the point in dogmatics at which we attempt to achieve a transcendental understanding of the basic statements of our faith, there we shall be embarking upon a part of fundamental theology which will thereby emerge from that formal void in which it is usually studied (especially in the treatises, 'De Deo Revelante' and 'De Christo Legato Divino'). With regard to the methodological and didactic aspects, and above all with regard to the question raised at the Second Vatican Council as to the essential character of a 'basic course' in theology, I must refer to observations published elsewhere.[24] The same applies to a fundamental and formal theology (which is not to be confused with fundamental theology!).[25] In this survey much is certainly lacking of what might justifiably be expected in the way of answers to the relevant questions. Perhaps we should have included a section more explicitly devoted to theology considered as the hermeneutics of the Christian message, and to the necessity and limits of a theology of this kind. Certainly we have said too little about the question of the freedom of theology, the question of how, in technical terms, the theology of the future will be organized, the questions (primarily concerning the internal policies of the Catholic Church) of theology and priestly formation, of a theology for layfolk, etc. The question [59] of the connection between theology and the natural sciences has not been treated of as a distinct subject in its own right, but who is there who would dare to prophesy, or is even in a position to prophesy, on all these matters?

Has theology still a future before it? It is not only 'heathens' who raise this question only to answer it in the negative. It is being asked by Christians and theologians too who have been thrown into uncertainty when faced with this question. If there is to continue to be any theology in the future, then this theology will certainly not be of the kind which is set up, right from the outset, simply as a world apart, side by side with, or above the ordinary world. It must not regard itself as a distinct department of life in its own right – not even by invoking the factor of divine revelation. First because this factor of revelation and gracious self-bestowal on God's part has entered into the midst of this world, and hence does not exist apart from, or above it, on any right view of the world and revelation alike. But this also has a bearing on the secularized perspectives of the thinking of modern man, in cases in which

[24] cf. K. Rahner, Zur Reform des Theologiestudiums, Quaestiones Disputatae 41 (Freiburg, 1969).
[25] cf. K. Rahner, 'Formale und fundamentale Theologie', L. T.K. IV, 2nd ed. (1960), cols. 205-206.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

these have been accorded an absolute value, and developed into an ideological system. Even when modern man is prepared to allow these ideas of his to be called in question, he still has the impression that unless revelation actually enters into his own contemporary world, it is totally unintelligible. There is, of course, the scandal of the Cross, and we are prone to appeal to this whenever we have an inexcusably old-fashioned theology to put forward. But even taking this into account, in facing up to the question so anxiously pondered among theologians of whether there is still any future for theology, we shall still have to say that this can be answered in the affirmative only on condition that theology learns to speak about God in the language of this world. To speak about God of course, and not about that world which a primitive empiricist might envisage. Such a one might suppose that the world contains nothing except those things the reality of which not even the most stupid or superficial observers would dare to contest, or which might be 'demonstrated' by electric light, drugs, or atom bombs. But theology must speak about God as he is present in the midst of the world, recognizing that it is precisely in this form that the gospel bears witness to him as the salvation precisely of this world. Nowhere are any prognoses of the future justified which can deprive man of the boldness to hope against all hope. This also applies to theology. The future which we theologians are fighting for on behalf of our theology is not one in which we have to embark on anxious calculations to see whether it has any future at all. We create this future when – if need be against all the probabilities – [60] we engage in the study of theology, doing so because we love man, for whom this theology of ours is intended to act as a light, and also because we seek to serve God, who has set us upon the course which we must follow in our study of theology, so that thereby we may perhaps discover God himself.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[61]

4

ON THE CURRENT RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN PHILOSOPHY AND THEOLOGY

The task I have set myself is a difficult one: to give some reasonable opinion on the relationship between philosophy and theology, and on the significance which philosophy has for and in theology.[1] On these questions one has to seek calm and consolation again and again by reminding oneself simply that theology and (surely too) philosophy exist and are facts, and that, in the face of such facts, one must have the respect which is due even if one cannot work out any wholly adequate justification for the fact by an interpretation of its nature which, in the nature of things, can only be human and finite.

We may perhaps come somewhat closer to a positive answer to the question we have set ourselves if we try to achieve a clear view of the difficulties inherent in it.

I. THE UNIVERSALITY OF THEOLOGY

The very concept of theology is in itself difficult and obscure. For our present purposes, it is true, we shall be quite satisfied with the statement that theology consists in a process of human reflection upon the revelation of God in Jesus Christ and, arising from this, upon the faith of the Church. It also includes the process by which this faith reflects upon its own nature as a factor inevitably entailed in any such faith. Yet this description, while it does bring us enlightenment on some aspects of theology, leaves us in darkness with regard to others. Let me draw attention to one single point, which is, nevertheless, of the utmost importance for our particular question. On any genuine interpretation of the nature of Christian faith, [62] at least as currently conceived of whether we think of it as a given fact or as ecclesiastically and theologically possible, there is such a thing as a genuine revelation of God co-extensive with the history of the world and of ideas, and in that sense universal. The first point to be recognized about this is that it is not identical with the revelation of the Old and New Testaments, for this is confined to a particular area of human life and limited in space and time. Ultimately speaking, however, it does bear a relationship to revelation in this sense, a relationship which is capable of precise definition, though we shall not enlarge any further at this point on its particular characteristics.

The revelation we are speaking of, then, is universal. And though for the most part we do not reflect upon it, we should understand it as a transcendental determination of man, constituted by that which we call grace and self-bestowal on God's part in other words his Pneuma. It may be present in a form in which it is either reflected upon or not, in a form in which it is either freely accepted or freely refused. And here again, under certain circumstances this refusal need not be at the explicit and conscious level. Nevertheless this revelation is constantly present, because otherwise it is not really conceivable how there can be any universal will to save on God's part, or any possibility of salvation which is perpetual and extended to all. For the reasons given grace (Pneuma), seeing that it is always present at least in the sense of always being offered to man, cannot be conceived of as one particular

[1] A lecture delivered on 13 November 1971 on the occasion of the ceremonial opening of the 'School of Philosophical Studies at Munich'. On the same subject cf. K. Rahner, 'Philosophy and Theology', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 75-81; 'Philosophy and Philosophizing in Theology', Theological Investigations IX (London and Baltimore, 1972), pp. 46-63.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

event in human life, making its impact only intermittently. Rather it is a transcendental determination of human life, albeit one that is freely bestowed by God, and even when it is never objectified or conceived of at the level of explicit consciousness at all. In fact it is, perhaps, quite impossible so to conceive of it without further factors being brought to bear in any process of individual reflection upon the conditions within which the concrete human spirit can operate and exercise its freedom. This is why revelation is always a phenomenon which has precisely those properties ascribed to it by Christianity in its faith and theology. It is of course, impossible at this stage or in this context to define more precisely why, how, or in what ways it is given to man, in the particular concrete circumstances of his life, freely to determine his attitude towards this grace-given and transcendental determination of his being. And this fact makes it still clearer why we both can and must understand this universal self-bestowal of God, considered as a transcendental determination of man, as also constituting revelation.

What we have just said has hardly ever found any clear expression in [63] the usual textbook theology right down to the present day. Nevertheless, if it is correct, then there cannot be any pure philosophy whatever as something produced by man himself in his concrete life. In his thinking man as philosopher is in fact constantly subject to a theological a priori, namely that transcendental determination which orientates him towards the immediate presence of God. And this determination is something of which he is fully aware, even though it does not ipso facto follow from this that he can reflect upon it. There are, therefore, no pure philosophers – not even at the level of their conscious thinking. Nor is there any such thing as a pure philosophy, if we understand by this the self-perfection of the man who engages in philosophy as he exists in the concrete. This is all the more true because philosophy, when it is really true to its own nature, enquires into all and each within the totality; into man as such, and not into one predetermined or merely regional factor present in man or affecting human living. The process of philosophical reflection (whether in principle or as it de facto exists – this is a question which we must abstract from here) will rarely if ever succeed in objectifying and reducing to human terms this gracious determination of man in his transcendentality which brings him into immediate contact with God. This applies at least to the individual philosopher in his individual studies. Nevertheless this still does not alter the following fact: that the only way in which man can, in his reflections, successfully penetrate to the very basis of his own real existence (and, after all, this is something which he can never really exclude from the outset from his philosophy) is in practice (at the initial stage in his process of reflection) through that which we call revelation history, defining it in terms which assign it to a particular place in the total context of human living as belonging to the official life of the Old Testament and of Christianity. In other words the limitations of philosophical reflection which we have been speaking of make no difference to the fact that the primary and most radical history of philosophy is the history of Old and New Testament revelation. This remains true however shocking it may sound.

We must recognize that philosophy can never exclude anything from the outset as a subject which is a priori alien to it; that that transcendental determination of man is a factor present in virtue of the self-bestowal of God, and, moreover, present always and everywhere (at least in the sense of being offered); finally, as something that follows from this, that in principle there is no so-called philosophy such that it can exclude the process of reflecting upon this. What we are saying, then, is that philosophy in this sense, in the very process of reflecting, penetrates to the [64] dimension of grace inherent in its subject as freely worked upon by God. It might then be said that at this point it should no longer be called philosophy, but rather theology, inasmuch as in this process of reflection it becomes conscious of the fact that the initial process of reflection, which is conscious of having achieved its goal, and which, therefore, is also the norm for all secondary ‘philosophizing’, is called Christian revelation.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But if all this is true, then philosophy as such, or conceived of as 'pure', can only mean that the individual engaging in philosophy methodically abstracts from this factor of grace as a transcendental dimension of his very being, and from the historical manifestation of this, even though this objectification has initially been achieved in faith, which has then in turn been reflected upon in theology. But what philosophy in this sense cannot mean is a discipline which can justifiably and successfully abstract from the ultimate orientation of the human spirit and its freedom to the immediate presence of God, as an objective factor already given and recognized prior to its own speculations, and present through grace rather than as the outcome of any reflective process. This statement that there is a theological element inescapably present in every philosophy is, of course, first and foremost a theological statement. But the theologian will precisely have in mind this further statement: that he views the philosopher as constantly subject to that a priori truth which he makes explicit in his theology through a process of historical reflection upon the transcendental process by which grace is bestowed upon man, the process which is called the revelation history of the Old and New Testaments. For the theologian there lies concealed in every philosophy right from the first a theology which is either unreflectingly accepted or rejected in a manner which is (at least materially speaking) culpable. Indeed theology is so present in every philosophy not merely in the sense that the content of the philosophical propositions involve an objective reference to the realities of faith, or are open to them as that which ultimately fulfils and transcends these propositions, but rather in the sense that the very process of philosophizing, in the unity between noesis and noema inherent in it (if we may so express it), involves, of its very nature, a hidden element of grace, and thereby of theology. The theologian, therefore, discerns in every philosopher a counterpart of himself; or better, he discerns his own theology in a situation involving either salvation or sin, present in that hidden manner in which God, the true God who is no mere 'this-worldly' idol, is present in the world as that which is most interior to it, most hidden within it, as its future.

Philosophy, then, is the partner of theology in the sense that theology is [65] its forerunner, and yet at the same time constantly retains its justified place in every one of its developments, not merely when it is engaged in evolving a 'natural theodicy', not merely when it explicitly comes into confrontation, either in a positive or a negative sense, with the statements of faith. From this point of view philosophy is properly speaking a theology that has not yet arrived at the fulness of its own nature. Now this process of arriving at the fulness of its own nature with regard to its individual themes does not always take place at the same stage. Conversely, theology too is still in process of development. And because of all this it is possible for philosophy, if we can still call it so, actually to have reached (albeit unreflectingly) a stage beyond that at which theology in its present state has arrived. Indeed under certain circumstances (after the pattern of the so-called pagan religions) it can do this not only with regard to the so-called natural assumptions or implications of theological statements, but even with regard to theological data properly so called, though unconsciously and not precisely as data of Christian revelation. In the light of this it can be seen that not very much is to be made of the well-known saying that philosophy is the handmaid of theology, even though, on any right understanding, this axiom is not necessarily false in every respect. We may remind ourselves, for instance, of 1 Corinthians 2:15, where we are told that all things, and so the wisdom of this world too, are subject to the judgement of the spiritual man. But there is one point which the theologian, in reminding himself of this saying, must not forget: that it is precisely not merely his own theology that confronts him from the world in a situation leading to salvation or sin, but the Spirit of God too who fulfils all, and has not appointed any administrator to act as his sole representative or regard this Spirit as his exclusive domain, not even the theologians. The theologian must not suppose that the only context in which theology is a living force (regarding it as the process by which we come to know of God,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

who, in a hidden manner, fulfils all and bestows himself) is in books in which citations from Scripture are adduced or references given to numbers in Denzinger.

In judging of a philosophy, therefore, the theologian will not, in any primary sense, take as his criterion the question of whether everything contained in that philosophy is correct. This is all the more true since there is an ultimate incommensurability of the two disciplines such that the question can be raised whether, in those cases in which theology disputes the truth of philosophical statements, this 'does not really and ultimately amount to the fact that the theologian is laying down in a negative sense that the given philosophical statement is not to be accepted as reconcilable [66] with the propositions of faith, and should not, therefore, be put forward in the Church. If, then, what we have just said is correct, then, when theology exercises a critical judgement upon philosophy, it is attempting first and foremost to lay bare the hidden sinfulness or the hidden state of having grace bestowed upon it by the Spirit, inherent in all philosophy, even though philosophy itself does not recognize either of these states at the level of conscious reflection. The relationship between philosophy and theology, therefore, is in itself extremely obscure and complex. To see this we have only to ask what in more precise terms we really take theology to signify.

II. THE PROBLEMS ENTAILED BY PHILOSOPHY

This relationship becomes even more problematical when we ask ourselves in more precise terms what we should, and de facto do, take philosophy to signify.

We have already alluded to a possible sinfulness in philosophy. Could not philosophy itself too reflect upon this? After all, it should without difficulty be able to recognize that the philosopher, engaged as he is with a priori principles, is all along working from prior assumptions which he never reflects upon or is capable of reflecting upon in any adequate sense at all. He is working from absolute decisions taken prior to any conscious reflection, so that the field of his activities only seems to have a greater serenity and objectivity than life itself or history, with its cruelties, its delusions, and stupidities – in brief with that state of sinfulness which the theologian (resisting the attempt to explain it) seeks to keep clearly in view and to submit to the mystery of God's compassion. The philosopher, on the other hand, despite all his proud speeches in defence of freedom, is, after all, in constant temptation of explaining this factor away and precisely in doing so falls into one of those sins which are committed in philosophy. Why has no one written a hamartiology of philosophy and of the history of philosophy? Admittedly the failure to do so could be excused on one particular ground: that we must not judge, and that even when man created a real, and not merely an apparent, darkness for himself, still the light of God devours it. But let us leave this point.

In order to throw light upon the problems with which philosophy is faced (admittedly primarily from a standpoint which is of interest to the theologian) I may take as my starting-point that evaluation of philosophy which was put forward at the First Vatican Council. Although this Council has been so much derided by many of our contemporaries, if we [67] understand it rightly it was a great Council despite all the antiquated outlooks which so dominated the conciliar fathers of the time, obviously frightened as they were by what was taking place in their own age. These fathers, it is true, would much rather have returned to the ages prior to the Enlightenment and the French Revolution. Yet for all this it was a great Council. Why? Because it declared that it was possible to arrive at a natural knowledge of God through the light of reason alone. In this pronouncement let us set aside the terms 'reason', 'proof', 'knowledge', 'natural' etc.

All this is not the main point or the essential element in the declaration. The heart and centre of it is this: man cannot escape from having to do with God, and even at a stage prior

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

to any Christian revelation conceived of in explicit or institutional terms. This is inescapable and is something he encounters before any particular prophets or pastors have reached him. And if we fail to recognize this clearly, if modern man does not explicitly assert it and the pastors cannot draw attention to it nowadays, then – if the view of the Council is to prevail, and it will prevail – this inescapable factor of God's intervention in human existence must precisely be taking place in forms, and through experiences, and giving rise to forms of expression, which are unknown or unfamiliar to us And then it is for us precisely to discover these, and not straightway to fall into lamentations over the atheism of the present age. Our task is to convey to man where, within the totality of his existence in all its breadth and depth, he is making – even though he does not recognize it – experiences of God even while the explicit statements about God among Christians may perhaps not contain very much of God within themselves. What is astonishing about the First Vatican Council, in other words, is the fact that it recognizes something that takes place in man which is significant for his salvation (if we want to put it in theological terms) and yet which is, independently of Christianity or the Church, present inescapably and always. The famous distinction which Paschal drew between the God of the philosophers and the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the God of Jesus Christ, is precisely not made here, seeing that the God who is recognized by the light of reason is precisely he who appears as the God of salvation in fundamental theology and theology. And this is all the more true seeing that it should, after all, appear obvious that if there can be any such thing at all as a knowledge of God through the light of natural reason, this cannot have that liability to error which is entailed, for instance, in what man does or does not know about Australia. Whether this inescapable reference to God is 'natural', and whether this 'naturalness' is present in every case [68] autonomously and in its own right – this is a question that does not concern us here. What is exciting in this conciliar declaration is the assertion that there is a factor of decisive importance for human existence apart from faith in revelation at the biblical and ecclesiastical level, a factor which is of radical significance for Christian faith despite the fact that it is said to have its basis within itself. Whether this does, or does not mean that a 'pure' philosophy emerges as of equal rank with revelation theology, or indeed whether it means that ultimately speaking it is quite incapable of achieving such a position – this is a question which is, for the moment, not important. But what is utterly astonishing is that the faith of the official Church, of its own volition, ascribes so fundamental a significance to a factor which lies outside the Church's own conscious faith in revelation.

Now if we call this knowledge (however we should conceive of it in closer detail) philosophy (however this should be understood on any closer investigation of it), then what is being said at the First Vatican Council is that basically speaking philosophy has a similar significance (or perhaps better an equally important significance) as revelation. Textbook theology will, of course, cry out at this and say that this is not what the Council fathers meant at the time; that they did actually defend the autonomy of theology and its dominance over philosophy. In a certain sense all that is quite true. Yet in the Council's eyes there is precisely a certain autonomous knowledge which is of decisive importance for the sphere of theology, and which, nevertheless, is not revelation theology, something which is prior, to any experience of revelation taking place at any particular time or in any particular region, as that which is universal.

The Council regards this knowledge, which is 'secular' and yet is one of the very roots from which theology springs, as having its unity only in God, the source of all truth, and not, properly speaking, in any earthly authority presiding over the two kinds of knowledge and subsuming both within a synthesis that is truly higher and in which each kind contributes to the other. Of course according to the Council in any case of conflict between theology and philosophy this faith constitutes the higher norm for the believer. But this applies so far as

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation faith in itself is concerned. Nowhere is it said that in the case of an apparent conflict between faith and worldly knowledge faith will always prevail, or that it would be impossible for someone to believe that his faith was overthrown by some piece of secular knowledge, provided always that it was not really some fault on his part that gave rise to his false judgement in favour of secular knowledge and against faith. And above all: nowhere is there any promise for [69] the believer of a kind of synthesis between faith and knowledge which is attainable immediately and in every instance. In other words in this time of pilgrimage he will actually have to live in circumstances of a gnoseological pluralism, and will never be able fully to achieve that gnoseological integrity which would overcome this unresolved pluralism. He will not even be able to achieve this in the area of those kinds of knowledge which are in some sense significant for salvation, for even in this area pluralism still prevails. What we have, then, is a knowledge of subjects which are important for salvation which, however it is to be conceived of in more precise detail, is different from the knowledge of revelation of the official Church. Now if we apply the term philosophy to this kind of knowledge, then the First Vatican Council has declared that a pluralism in gnoseology exists, in the concrete conditions of human living, between philosophy and theology. It is true that right down to the Second Vatican Council a cultural and social homogeneity in the sphere of knowledge which really belonged to earlier ages still survived for certain good Christians and Catholics in markedly ghetto-like conditions. But only this kind of outlook could fail to feel this pluralism, which in principle had been recognized by the First Vatican Council, as hard and dangerous. Only those affected by a cultural and social homogeneity of this kind could suppose instead that so far as Christians are concerned everything can easily and positively be brought into harmony in this sphere of knowledge. In other words, there is no need for any very peaceful or harmonious relationship to prevail everywhere and at all times between theology and philosophy. The conflicts which may possibly arise are not only such as the philosophical theologian or the religious-minded philosopher will have solved right from the outset, or which as conflicts arise only from the techniques of presentation in the textbooks. There will be many occasions on which there really are no positive solutions to such conflicts. We may perhaps have to allow them to continue unresolved in the conviction that we cannot do without either of the two kinds of knowledge involved in the conflict, even though they seem to us in all sincerity to be totally irreconcilable. We have really to endure under the pain of this gnoseological pluralism and this kind of concupiscence or yearning to achieve harmony. Paul's 'infelix ego homo' (Rom 7:24) has its place in this context too. Whereas the Council of Trent was the Council of a pluralism yearning for harmony in the dimension of moral decision, the First Vatican Council was the Council of a pluralism yearning for harmony in the dimension of the theoretical reason wherever this exists in concrete human life. In this area we are still constantly prone to [70] refuse really to admit this state of a concupiscent pluralism or a pluralism yearning for harmony. We recognize that faith and secular reasoning should not be opposed as contradictory sources of knowledge, and that the integration of the several different kinds of knowledge is the goal which we must constantly be striving towards, albeit asymptotically. And because of all this we regard the situations of conflict which arise between philosophy and theology as from the very outset being sinful, and believe that we should force integration in the sense we have been speaking of upon them even when in practice this can only be done at the cost of intellectual honesty. And so we lose our attitude of sensitivity and alertness for the differences between the various languages in which these different departments of knowledge can and must find expression. From this point of view alone, and abstracting from all others, it becomes clear that the history of the relationship between theology and philosophy constantly gives rise to factors that are, in a genuine sense, new and unexpected: it is the history of two realities and the history of the relationship which each bears to the other, and there is no higher sphere

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation within this world common to them both and transcending all the differences between them in which they can meet and be reconciled. It is, therefore, a history which cannot be planned, but remains open and subject to that freedom which itself has to survive in and in virtue of a number of different and unintegrated factors.

a. Pluralism in Philosophy

We have attempted to achieve a view of the problems entailed in the relationship between theology and philosophy precisely from the point of view of philosophy itself. We have tried to see how theology in itself; and according to its own principles, has to regard this. Now let us turn our attention directly to philosophy itself. In this connection we may draw attention to a quite simple fact, yet one which is of the utmost importance for theology. There are many philosophies. And theology is involved with many philosophies, and thereby is itself in turn divided into many theologies.

It is worthwhile to ponder this statement a little. When I was young I was devoted to the study of philosophy through thick and thin. And at that time our whole attitude was coloured by a belief in one single philosophy. Obviously we were aware (as men always have been) of the fact that in practice there were many philosophies. Indeed we studied the history of philosophy and there came to know of a whole range of the [71] most varied systems and theories. And in systematic philosophy we took up a critical attitude towards these systems, deciding what to accept and what to reject in them. But in all this we were, after all, constantly, albeit tacitly, taking as our starting-point the belief that in adopting this approach we were touching more or less upon everything in the philosophy of the past and present alike which was of real philosophical importance; that we could and did draw from it into our own system everything that was true and valuable; finally that we were fully justified in rejecting the rest. All this is intended as a broad and general view of our principles and our approach.

Now I believe that the situation today is radically and insuperably different. Prior to the question of truth proper (I emphasize – prior to this!) the modern philosopher is confronted with a pluralism of philosophies which no one individual is any longer capable of mastering, and we are aware of this fact. Formerly there was a total unawareness of anything which could neither be integrated into, nor rejected from one's own personal philosophy. Today we are aware that there is much in the philosophies which we can neither reject nor particularly welcome precisely because we are unfamiliar with it. But we do know that we are not really sufficiently familiar with it either to welcome it or to reject it of our own resources and on our own responsibility. The means of communication of the present age have the effect of making us know that we do not know. And in fact this also applies to the realm of philosophy. I at least would regard it as both naive and presumptuous if nowadays a philosopher were still to behave as though he could know and did know all the essential answers in philosophy as it is de facto being studied. Philosophy as a whole has grown to enormous dimensions. It has become planet-wide. It is no longer the prerogative merely of one particular culture, and precisely for this reason a whole range of philosophies has emerged, too many to be brought together in one mind, even though all possible efforts still can be, and are, brought to bear in this direction.

Now it is true that there is no such thing as a theology which does not unquestioningly include an element of philosophy within it, or which either can or would reflect upon the Christian faith without the help of philosophy in general or of one particular philosophical system. Perhaps the neo-scholasticism in the theology of the last 150 years constituted the final attempt to use one single homogeneous philosophy in the study of theology. But this is something that is simply not possible any longer, and contemporary theology also shows that it no longer in practice makes the slightest attempt to achieve this. What the implications of this are for the [72] Church's teaching authority, its methods and its effectiveness, is a question which cannot be entered into here. For our present purposes we have simply to recognize this: the fact that, prior to any question of truth properly so called, we have to recognize a pluralism of philosophies too great for us to master or control, compels us of today to recognize a pluralism of theologies prior to the question of theological truth, and without prejudice to a general orientation of all such theologies towards the original message of faith and the single teaching authority of the Church. The destiny of philosophy is today becoming, in a quite new sense, the destiny of theology too. Obviously we do not mean by this, in the case either of theology or of philosophy, that the relationship between these manifold systems is that of so many individual monads standing 'over against' each other. Obviously the boundaries between the individual philosophies and the individual theologies are in principle not such as can be precisely drawn. Obviously it is always possible to judge of the question of truth in terms of each such scientific discipline and in terms of its own individual findings.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But all this does not for one moment alter the situation that we find today, namely that as a result of the modern pluralism of philosophies our task is no longer simply to bring to light a series of theologies which speak with different tongues, i.e. use different philosophical systems. This fact has not yet sufficiently been recognized. The Church's teaching authorities have not yet taken due cognizance of it. No principles and methods have yet been developed for coping – indirectly if need be – with this fact without destroying the unity of the Church or of the Christian creed.

b. Philosophy as it Affects the Specialist in Modern Scientific Disciplines

In reflecting upon the relationship between philosophy and theology we have to evaluate the situation of philosophy from yet another point of view. Formerly philosophy was the representative embodying secular knowledge in its bearing upon the ultimate meaning and values of human life, and as significant for salvation. The prior equipment in terms of secular knowledge which the theologian had to have in order to be a sound and effective theologian he learned in philosophy, because in the concrete conditions of human living at the time this alone constituted the meaningful integration of knowledge as such. To the extent that a particular branch of knowledge was non-philosophical, to that extent it was also irrelevant for any theology in the true sense. This is shown by the [73] very fact that formerly whatever affinity theology may in itself have had with history, there was no such thing as a science of history in the true sense to act as a partner to theology. In fact it was not really until the documents of the Second Vatican Council were produced on ecclesiastical studies that any real recognition emerged of the necessity for a partnership between theology and the science of history which could be methodologically effective. Previously scientific history had never been included as an integral element in the 'systematic' theology of neo-scholasticism. At most it had been tolerated as an unavoidable preliminary course leading up to the study of theology and apologetics. Admittedly this state of affairs was in reality an anachronism at least from the 19th century onwards, and here and there it was of course recognized as such – for instance in the Tübingen school. Today, however, the whole situation has been radically altered.

The sciences which exist side by side with philosophy include not only the speculative disciplines but the natural sciences and social sciences as well. And there are two points to be recognized about these: first, they regard themselves not as subalternate sciences, depending

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

upon philosophy for their justification and the defining of their tasks, or having their methodological approach and their sphere of investigation determined for them by philosophy. On the contrary, these sciences are regarded as autonomous in origin and as self-authenticating. They are constantly liable to the temptation of regarding philosophy as a mythical prefiguration of themselves, or of thinking of philosophy as at most playing a supplementary role in reflecting upon and summing up precisely those methodological approaches which are developed within the sciences as of their own right. And the second point is that it cannot be said that these secular sciences, which have emancipated themselves from philosophy, have no relevance to our faith or our theological understanding of revelation in their bearing upon our view of the world and the concrete modes of human existence. It is true that on many individual questions an interchange of ideas has gradually been achieved between theology on the one hand and these individual sciences in their findings on the other over the last fifty years, quite apart from philosophy. Apparent conflicts between the two sides have been shown to be due to misunderstandings and so resolved. Yet at the same time the present age is dominated by a radical and all-embracing mental outlook conditioned by the natural sciences, and this continues to be something with which theology is constantly, directly, and uniformly confronted, or should feel itself confronted, and, moreover, this confrontation is not something which theology can simply [74] delegate to an old-fashioned type of metaphysic to deal with as its particular concern.[2] The following grounds alone are sufficient to justify us in saying this: that in practice these natural sciences, as practised today, are more ready to enter into serious dialogue with theology than with philosophy (whether they are justified or not in this attitude, it makes no difference to the facts). The reason is that in the positions which theology tends to adopt they are more ready to recognize points of reconciliation in which they can still remain detached and allow for differences between them, yet which, in the concrete conditions of human life, have a significance even for the practitioner of the natural sciences as such.

These natural sciences, then, regard themselves as autonomous. Yet they do have a certain radical significance, and one which applies to the whole of human life. All this is something which can no longer be denied at the present day. And from this it follows that theology has to recognize as her partner in dialogue no longer philosophy alone, regarded as the sole mediator and interpreter of man's experience of himself as such in its most radical form. On the contrary, theology has itself directly to turn its attention to the natural sciences, enquiring into their basic outlook and their autonomy, and allowing itself to be conditioned by them. Mutatis mutandis, the same must be said about the relationship between the social sciences and theology. Here too theology has acquired a new partner, one who refuses any longer to accept that the only way of communicating with theology is through the medium of philosophy. Hence theology must take due cognizance of this refusal as an actual existing fact. This remains true even if it is possible to say that theology has a duty ex officio to remind the social sciences of their theological implications. For the very act of doing this will in itself awaken a metaphysical conscience in these social sciences. Precisely in these social sciences it becomes manifest that the distinction in man between his metaphysical nature and his concrete, historically conditioned nature is far less easy to draw than was formerly supposed; indeed that it is in principle quite impossible to draw it in any full or adequate sense. Now if theology has to deal with man as a whole, seeing that it is in his wholeness that he is meant to enter upon salvation and that this salvation depends upon him in his wholeness, then it follows that it is quite impossible for theology to avoid turning its attention

[2] On this cf. the following two articles in the present volume, 'Theology as Engaged in an Interdisciplinary Dialogue with the Sciences', pp. 80-93, and 'On the Relationship between Theology and the Contemporary Sciences', pp. 94-102.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation to the social sciences, with their a posteriori and historical level [75] of experience, and to allow itself to be influenced in its lines of enquiry and its methods by these and not merely by philosophy as such. Presumably this process is still hardly in its incipient stages.

III. ASPECTS OF THE FUTURE PARTNERSHIP BETWEEN PHILOSOPHY AND THEOLOGY

Certainly it is a tenable position that metaphysics cannot possibly die so long as man has not degenerated into a clever animal or finally destroyed his own nature. But the destiny of metaphysics is, after all, precisely a destiny the future paths of which cannot be foreseen. And when it is predicted that something will bring metaphysics to an end, or asserted that it is already ended, this may itself once more be based on a wrong diagnosis. Even so, however, it is not simply a mere empty spectre, or an occasion of groundless alarm. Now on this showing it is obvious that the task of theology cannot be first and foremost to keep metaphysics alive or flourishing, even though there is inevitably a certain task to be fulfilled in this direction. Rather theology will keep its attention fixed upon man in the conditions of life in which he actually lives in the present, even though man himself may suppose that he is living in a post-metaphysical age. Theology will recognize (at least as a primary task) that it has to make man as he exists today aware of the blind spot in the vision of a post-metaphysical neo-positivism, the social sciences connected with it, and the interpretation of language which it puts forward. And theology must straightway attempt to supply a theological interpretation of this and not concern itself so much with working out, in any explicit or exclusive sense, the metaphysical implications involved in this positivism, by which modern man's whole mentality is almost totally conditioned.

In any case: with regard to explicit philosophy in the traditional sense, the theology of today cannot do this the favour of regarding it alone as its partner in its dealings with the world. To use a figure of speech that might seem almost malicious, this state of monogamy is over. Theology can no longer allow its connections with the secular and a posteriori sciences to take place solely through the medium of philosophy. Instead it has direct and autonomous connections with these. That the task of theology is not made any lighter thereby is obvious. For after all, in the sphere of Western civilization philosophy has all along been recognized as such as the sister to theology, so that in a true sense it was a simple matter for it to continue in partnership with theology. For while a dispute between relations may grow very bitter, it is much less dangerous than that situation of almost [76] mortal peril which can emerge between those who are quite unaware of what they may have to do with one another at all.

Is it the case, therefore, that the marriage between theology and philosophy, now almost two thousand years old, is at an end? Or (sit venia verbo!) has it been transformed into a strange kind of 'love triangle', in which the sciences in the modern sense are also involved as of their own right? This is a question which properly speaking it is the task of philosophy and the sciences themselves to resolve rather than theology. For it is for philosophy and the sciences to determine their mutual relationship in principle and as it has de facto developed in history. It is of concern to theology that as positive a relationship as possible should be established between philosophy and the sciences, but theology itself cannot establish this relationship of its own power, even though it would suit it best. For otherwise it would itself have to engage in philosophy in pursuit of this aim. Certainly it can de facto do this, and is not prohibited from doing so, but in that case it would precisely be engaging in philosophy, and, moreover, however necessary it might consider its findings here, it would in practice be one particular philosophy, not excluding the possibility of others existing beside it, and a philosophy which was conditioned by practical historical realities. However this is surely

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

something which theology can hardly take it upon itself to engage in of its own resources in any effective manner or one which can influence the course of history.

However this may be, nothing that we have said represents any threat to the true relationship which exists between theology and philosophy. Theology necessarily entails thinking, and thinking takes place outside the realm of theology. And provided this thinking is at a radical level, provided it touches upon man in his wholeness, provided it reaches to the level of mystery and faces up to it, provided it considers itself and not merely the things about us, it can be called a philosophy of confidence, and this prior to the question of what further developments may take place in the traditional forms of philosophy handed down through history, and how this radical self-realization on man's part may find expression in the future. Thinking of this kind must be engaged in within theology itself. First because for a Catholic theology man is the recipient of a revelation which is objectified and institutionalized in the Church as a historical phenomenon, and as such he is precisely not a tabula rasa, not some materia prima having nothing of its own to contribute to this revelation. In the very process of making this revelation his own he must recognize in himself that he is, from the outset, bringing something positive of his own to bear upon this revelation. This recognition of the part he himself [77] plays may be 'secular' in character if not actually outside the realm of grace altogether, but man must still recognize his own subjective contribution, however true it may be that this is itself transformed in a historical process in and through this encounter of his with revelation. Regarded as a discipline designed to achieve a reflexive and critical understanding of the Church's revelation, therefore, theology includes, as an intrinsic element and not merely as an external prior condition, man's secular understanding of himself; and it is only in relation to this, and as confronted with this, that faith becomes theology. This is not to say that for the believing theologian all philosophy should, or even so much as could, be pursued only within the sphere presided over by theology.

It was Thomas Aquinas who first recognized philosophy as an autonomous discipline, and its secularization, its emancipation, constitutes the first step in the legitimate process by which the world is allowed to become 'worldly', a process which, ultimately speaking, is willed and has been set in motion by Christianity itself. Theology must, of its own nature, will that man shall freely, independently, and on his own responsibility, achieve an understanding of himself. It must will to have philosophy concomitant to, and independent of itself. Only in this way can philosophy be, in any effective sense, a partner to theology (of course in saying this we are not pre-judging the issue of whether the roles of philosopher and theologian can be united in the personality of a single individual, either in a positive or a negative sense). But to the extent that, as a matter of historical necessity, a 'worldly' world is the appropriate milieu for a theology that meets the demands of the true Christian faith, to that extent an autonomous and secular philosophy will also be right as the true partner in the dialogue with theology, provided only that we take philosophy to signify that understanding of himself on man's part which considers man as one and whole, and provided that the revelation of God, as truly objectified and achieving due recognition of its own nature in the Christian Church, is not from the outset introduced as the subject of this reflection and as the norm which governs it. Of course this does not entail any clear-cut distinction between man's understanding of himself on the one hand, and the revelation of God in its a priori form, as a grace that inescapably permeates all, on the other. But this is a point which we have already made at the beginning of these considerations.

Now this secular understanding of himself on man's part, which we have called philosophy in the sense described, will not, in its contemporary form, be controlled simply and exclusively by philosophy alone. Rather it remains subject to historical conditioning and dependent upon a [78] posteriori experiences as institutionalized in the sciences. This means that theology must maintain a direct dialogue with these sciences as well, because the bearing

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which these have on man's understanding of himself is direct, and not merely mediated through philosophy. But this again is a point which we have already made.

What finally emerges, therefore, is a dialogue in which it is quite impossible to draw precise distinctions even between the roles which the partners to the dialogue should play. The theologian hears a philosopher who, ultimately speaking, bases himself from the outset on the theology of sin and grace, whether he is aware of it or not. The philosopher hears a theologian who – again from the outset (and again whether consciously or not) – has developed his theology with the help of philosophy; in other words one who, right from the outset, encounters him as a philosopher, so that, being this kind of theologian, he needs to have the problems of his philosophy set forth by a philosopher. Both, theologians and philosophers alike, are engaged in dialogue with the modern scientist who (whether consciously or not) has from the outset overstepped his boundaries and entered the spheres of philosophy and theology, thereby speaking to the theologian of matters of which the philosopher as such and taken in isolation cannot speak to him, and yet which are of crucial importance for a theologian, obliged as he is to take man in the concrete into his considerations. These are matters some at least of which it is quite impossible to reflect upon adequately from a philosophical point of view, and yet which cannot be left out of consideration in theology.

The scientist, who neither can nor should make the foolish attempt to monopolize his science and reserve it to his own official clique, may perhaps hear from non-specialists the kind of message which, however dilettante the form in which it is expressed, can still have a revolutionary, or at any rate a crucial, significance for his own science. And he hears explicitly the message involved in that tacit overstepping of boundaries on which he is forced unscientifically to depend in order to keep his own science vital, if only because the study of the particular science he is engaged in is always subject to norms which wholly transcend the material content of that science. If, therefore, the partners to the dialogue speak to one another, each in turn will be transformed, and their respective roles will be exchanged. And this transforming dialogue is an element in the true history of man, incalculable as it is, in which all branches of knowledge are constantly open from the first to the ultimate Mystery, ineffable and yet invoked, in which all science, theology, and philosophy alike, are comprehended. The label by which society assigns a particular calling to [79] the individual, and the personal decision by which that individual chooses this or that secular calling in the world of ideas in preference to others – these are, ultimately speaking, provisional factors, and little more than a welcome or unwelcome deception. There is an ultimate basis at which each is constantly engaged with all. And this basis has still to be revealed. Only if we have engaged in all branches at this ultimate level, are we saved. Admittedly this state of being saved requires also the modesty of confining ourselves to our own proper sphere, and leaving other spheres to other thinkers. It is only for this reason and in this sense that we can nowadays open a philosophical faculty. The theologian welcomes it because everything human belongs to God, and only so is truly appropriated to man, and because in the midst of all philosophy the theologian discerns God revealing himself in his grace.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[80]

5

THEOLOGY AS ENGAGED IN AN INTERDISCIPLINARY DIALOGUE WITH THE SCIENCES

Before we can embark upon any discussion of the possible participation and the task of theology in the interdisciplinary dialogue between the sciences[1] we must first have found an answer to the question of what interdisciplinary discussion is in itself. It is only when we have found an answer to this question that we can then go on to enquire whether theology has any part to play in it, and what that part is. Yet I am not aware of any real answer having been found even to the first question.

The fact that men speak with one another may be obvious, although even in simple discussions so many mysteries lie concealed, the moment they extend beyond the level of the sort of language which is necessary for the most basic human communication.[2] The fact that the specialists in the particular sciences speak with one another may also be obvious on the assumption that as human beings their interest also extends to matters which lie outside their own specialist fields, where their principal and professional interests lie. But the question becomes obscure the moment we seek to discern precisely what one partner to such discussions communicates to the other. For the question then arises of whether this is something [81] which interests the other scientist precisely to the extent that he has further interests beyond the sphere of his own particular science. For in that case what is taking place is, basically speaking, not an interdisciplinary dialogue at all.

THE PROBLEMS ENTAILED IN AN INTERDISCIPLINARY DIALOGUE

Let us suppose that one scientist communicates to another a piece of information which is of interest to him precisely as a scientist. It seems that the only cases in which this can take place are those in which the particular specialist sciences overlap with one another in their subject-matter. In other words all that the first scientist is communicating to the second is something which as a scientist, he could also have come to know, or discover by his own researches. Properly speaking, therefore, what is taking place here cannot, except in a very broad sense, be called an interdisciplinary dialogue, for the specialist in a particular science de facto always knows less than he really ought to know as a specialist in his own particular discipline. I cannot really see how we can escape from this difficulty. It is, of course, possible to say that while the particular sciences are indeed concerned with their respective areas of subject-matter from particular aspects or with particular formal objects in view, in many cases these areas of subject-matter are themselves materially speaking identical. This, then, would explain why the result of one science concerned with one particular subject might be

[1] Certain ideas on the present subject have been published by a collaborator of the author's under the same title: Fr. Mann, 'Die Theologie im interdisziplinären Gespräch der Wissenschaften', StdZ 186 (1970), pp. 109-116.

[2] This fact has also been made particularly clear from a scientific point of view as a consequence of the development of modern cybernetics and research into communication. Hence these have also given rise to a whole series of particular problems in relation to theology. Literature is available on this subject, though here we may confine ourselves to a few passing references for the assistance of those who wish to pursue the question further: H. R. Rapp, Mensch, Gott und Zahl. Kybernetik im Horizont der Theologie (Hamburg, 1967); H. D. Bastian, 'Anfangsprobleme im Gespräch zwischen Kybernetik und Theologie', Theologia Practica 3 (1968), pp. 33-42; D. O. Scumalstieg, 'Kybernetik – Theologie – Gesellschaft. Möglichkeiten interdisziplinärer Theorie', Internat. Dialog. Zeitschrift 4 (1971), pp. 130-133.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

