indissoluble part of this article itself. This must be clearly understood today in regard to the future history of dogma and realistically taken into account in interpreting the teaching of Vatican I in particular that a dogma must continue to be upheld for ever in the 'sense' it had at its first proclamation. There are amalgams of this kind; in view of the historicity of truth they are simply unavoidable; they will remain (even though in such a way that the elimination of one such amalgam means that another takes its place).

If, for instance, it is shown historically that the Fathers of Trent in their teaching on transsubstantiation unanimously assumed as a matter of course a particular meaning of the 'substance' of bread and wine, this is far from saying that this notion of substance, actually held at Trent and not excluded from what was really meant in a dogmatic sense, still remains binding today for the interpretation of transsubstantiation. If Augustine regarded a directly paternal procreation and the libido involved in it as the necessary vehicle for the transmission of original sin (with the result that, even up to recent times, the very fact that Jesus had no earthly father was seen as a reason why he was free from original sin) and explained original sin in this way as Catholic dogma, this is far from saying that we should or even could consider this understanding of original sin today as dogma. If Pius XII (and after him the preparatory commission of the [12] Second Vatican Council) still thought that monogenism is an indispensable and unrenouncable (even directly definable as dogma) element of the Catholic doctrine of original sin, we may nevertheless hold a different opinion today and, while upholding the doctrine of original sin and its essential meaning, eliminate a monogenistic interpretation of this doctrine as an historically conditioned amalgam, even though the theology of former times and the magisterium never thought and could not have thought of this possibility. Pius XII declared that it is part of the Catholic faith (DS 3896) that the human soul is directly created by God. But, as could easily be proved historically, in this statement (correct in itself) he had in mind a conceptual model which is not shared today by many theologians (with their theory of the self-transcendence – even as essential – of the living person), and Pius XII did not think of such a possibility of distinguishing between what is really meant in the dogma and the conceptual model that can be eliminated from it.

If today, as a matter of course, we stick to the teaching that Jesus 'founded' the Church and instituted seven sacraments, we shall see, in the light of historical studies, a number of things differently in these statements and eliminate interpretations accepted at first without reflection, even though the possibility of these distinctions was not appreciated in former times. In the traditional doctrine of inspiration could we not distinguish between a kind of 'authorship' of God as part of salvation history, which can truly be predicated of God, and a literary 'authorship' that must not be predicated of him, and thus eliminate from this doctrine of God as the author of Scripture amalgams which can be made intelligible today only with difficulty? Otherwise we must qualify the statement that God is the 'author' of Scripture in a literary sense with so many reservations about its purely 'analogical' meaning that any understanding of Scriptural inspiration is made more difficult instead of being facilitated.

In the light of the history of faith and the history of ideas, perhaps the most significant and almost terrifying example of an historical development of dogma as understood here can be seen in both the unity and the distinction between the imminent expectation on the part of the historical pre-Easter Jesus and what the Church today thinks is really meant in this imminent expectation. While our faith remains the same also in regard to this question, the distinction [13] became evident only in a long process which can be seen at work already in the New Testament itself but even today is not completely closed and yet is legitimate. Of course many other examples could be produced of such amalgams in a dogma and of their elimination from that dogma in its obligatory sense. But those mentioned will be sufficient.

Such a process of elimination must of course make simultaneously clear that the sameness of the dogma in the old sense is assured and the effort to do this must not be regarded in principle as dubious, as a feeble and cowardly compromise between holding on verbally to a traditional doctrine and its formulations on the one hand and a new perception on the other which, if expressed honestly, would presumably be bound to exclude the previous teaching as erroneous. This is not the situation. But neither must the proof of the preservation of a doctrine under old and new, mutually diverse conceptual models, interpretations, etc., be handled in such a way as if it had to be shown with historical certainty that this distinction had been clearly seen even in earlier times and the old interpretation understood even then as no more than an interpretation.

It is of course obvious that such processes of distinguishing will continue also in future, without there being any need to prophesy which of them will crop up today or soon. It is really obvious that the processes of elimination will go on only in the midst of friction and struggle. For what is involved is precisely the question (at first obscure) of whether something is part of what is really meant or merely an historically conditioned interpretation of the latter, belonging to a particular period and able to be eliminated at a later period. It not infrequently happens that the Church's sense of faith (as the sum total of historically conditioned convictions of the faithful and also of the teachers in the Church) has to get accustomed psychologically only slowly and with difficulty to the knowledge that the elimination of such an amalgam and the new interpretation formulated in the light of new horizons of understanding really maintain the dogma intact. If this is true, the magisterium and theology must at times allow patiently for shorter or longer periods during which the justification or nonjustification of this sort of elimination remains uncertain, when a decision for one side or the other cannot be quickly and impatiently enforced (periods which must be endured with patience and confidence). (We may recall, for instance, new [14] interpretations of the doctrine of transsubstantiation or the question of the precise sense in which a pre-existence of the Logos present for us in Jesus is to be understood.)

All this of course presupposes a religious education of the faithful, to prevent them from assuming that these periods of some uncertainty always and in every case represent a threat to the actual substance of faith and ought to be brought to an end as quickly as possible by a decree of the Church's magisterium. It also presupposes that in a period of this kind the theologians, too, will not proclaim their new interpretations too apodictically and 'infallibly'. Such periods formerly could in a sense be taken for granted simply because a slow tempo was imposed purely as a result of the sociological and technological preconditions of theological dialogue; today we would have to create deliberately the pauses for reflection that are necessary for the magisterium and theology. In many cases the magisterium ought not to try to reach a quick decision, but should stimulate and gently accompany such a process of reflection.

We may be permitted to extend these reflections with the aid of some further considerations, even though the latter perhaps reach a little beyond our essential theme. For the sake of brevity we shall refrain from illustrating them with examples. If however a concrete case is required for the elucidation of these further considerations, we may recall the above-mentioned example of Jesus' imminent expectation. We shall continue to make use here of the term 'amalgam', even though we are aware that what it means is objectively very complex and would, and perhaps should, be much more precisely stated and differentiated epistemologically and hermeneutically; but that is not possible here. We are starting out from the phenomenon already observed, that a particular truth was stated at a particular epoch only together with such an amalgam, that it could not then have been stated differently at all (since at that period a different conceptual model or anything of the kind was simply not concretely available as an amalgam), and that the objectively possible distinction between the truth as it was actually meant and the amalgam could not by any means be explicitly perceived.

We distinguish now between the question (1) how a statement of this kind as a unity of what is really meant and its amalgam is to be evaluated against the background of the historical period in which it emerged, and the question (2) how it is to be assessed (in its unity [15] between what is meant and its amalgam) at the present time when this distinction is explicitly perceived and the opportunity exists in principle of possibly excluding the amalgam itself as false or perhaps false or as dispensable and replaceable by a different conceptual model.

The first question is meaningful with reference to the evaluation of the statement as made at that time only if this evaluation is made in the light of the present time. For, without this present point of reference, the question cannot be raised at all. Seen in the light of that time (even though it belongs to that time) the problem simply does not exist. Are we to say that the statement was 'erroneous' also at that time (even though this can only now be perceived), since it was in fact made in a unity with an (ex supposito) erroneous amalgam, since the possible distinction between what (according to our present-day judgment) was really meant and the amalgam itself was not explicitly considered, and since moreover purely historically it is not certain that the amalgam itself was not then expressed with the same absolute assent with which what was really meant as the content of faith was affirmed? We think that such a statement in the situation of its own historical period cannot be qualified as erroneous or, if it is so qualified, such linguistic usage should be expressly noted: that is, attention should be drawn to the fact that the qualification of error itself in reality withdraws the statement in question from its own original historical situation. For a statement that cannot in a particular historical period express what is supposed to be true otherwise than in the light of a particular conceptual model, etc. ('amalgam'), may not be qualified as erroneous, since in that historical situation it is the only possible way of expressing the truth that is really meant. Anyone who made such a statement at that time was speaking the truth at that time. It must also be remembered that a 'present-day' distinction between what is really meant and the amalgam is not made in such a way that now what is really meant is stated 'in chemical purity', for its own sake alone, but this statement is again made in the light of different and still historically conditioned conceptual models; which does not of course mean that the models and horizons of understanding involved in this exchange must simply be regarded as absolutely equal in value and equally good among themselves.

We come to the second question. If and in so far as such a statement [16] is transferred into a different situation of understanding, if nevertheless it is considered as a unity of what is meant and its amalgam, if in this transposition into a new situation of understanding the amalgam is seen explicitly as false or as not binding or as replaceable, then of course the statement involved (in its unity with the amalgam) can be qualified as 'erroneous'. But then it really is not today in any sense the statement that was formerly made. It was not erroneous, but it has become erroneous, because it is now made in the light of horizons of understanding which were by no means those involved in its original form of expression.

All that we have been saying here refers objectively and methodically to specifically religious statements. We have no intention of making any statement of universal hermeneutical significance. Nor are we going to consider the problem of an elimination of such amalgams which might lead eventually to the elimination of what is 'really' meant, a process of elimination leading eventually to the destruction of any real meaning of a religious statement, ultimately depriving it of all meaning. On this it need only be said that a religious statement in the last resort points not to what is drained of meaning, but to the ineffable mystery that we call God, and it is this reference alone which makes a statement a religious one. In other words, these processes of elimination are basically continually recurring events pointing to that mystery and must occur over and over again in the history of abiding religious truth, since this liberating and hopeful approach to the mystery of God must take place in the light of continually new historical situations of truth.

IV

In this history of dogma, in its further course and in its presentation, there must always be a recourse to a more fundamental global approach to faith, from which, if often only with very little reflection, a particular theological doctrinal statement emerges, a statement to be examined and tested in the light of the past history of dogma and theology and of possible future developments; this recourse to the actual point of origin of a particular statement can also provide a criterion for the correct understanding of the statement and for a [17] possible and perhaps necessary elimination of traditional interpretations from it.

In the light of its nature and according to the evidence of an actual history of dogma, the Church's dogma, in the form of its individual statements and articulations, can be understood and expressed today less than ever as a purely additive sum total of individual propositions, each of these being presented as based themselves on individual statements of Scripture or of former declarations of the magisterium. Each individual statement must be presented in its coherence with the faith as one and whole and with the original and unitive centre of the reality of faith. Otherwise the teaching of Vatican II on the 'hierarchy of truths' amounts to idle talk or a feeble excuse.

The original one and unitive event of the definitive, eschatological revelation in Christianity is not something made up subsequently (not even subjectively) by adding together a sum total of individual statements to be simply accepted, seen as communicated separately by God as and when he chose to do so. It is the one event of God's most authentic self-communication, occurring everywhere in the world and in history in the Holy Spirit offered to every human being; as such it has itself the character of revelation of the truth and finds in Jesus crucified and risen its complete historical tangibility and eschatological irreversibility. (This description of the most fundamental event of revelation is not meant to be taken as the only possible or even as the only adequate characterization; but there is in fact and in content such a basic substance of the most fundamental event of revelation in the light of which individual articles of faith can and must be both positively and critically understood, even though conversely this most fundamental event of revelation itself must be grasped over and over again through the individual events of revelation and through the individual statements objectifying these events: that is, there is a mutual interdependence – a 'circle' – between these two factors.)

This recourse to the most fundamental event of revelation is often necessary and legitimate also with reference even to individual statements of the New Testament and is in fact used (more or less deliberately) in order to define more precisely in the light of the analogy of faith the actual meaning or the real status of individual [18] statements of Scripture. This of course is not to say that this fundamental event of salvation history, grace, and revelation, together with its eschatological irreversibility in Christ, is not also attested expressly and thematically already in Scripture itself. A recourse of this kind is particularly necessary in order to make clear (possibly with the aid of distinctions) the meaning and limits of later declarations of the Church's magisterium. This continually fresh recourse to the original and unifying centre of faith (which is always active in the history of dogma even though it may often occur metahistorically and cannot be shown historically to be very clearly involved in individual cases in the course of the past history of dogma) certainly does not mean at all (as already pointed out) that development of dogma (that is, the explicitation of the original and global experience of revelation) follows anything but a one-track course into individual statements; on the contrary, it can be shown to be quite compatible with the fact that an explicitation of this kind, if and when it has led to an individual, particular statement, can no longer be revised retrospectively in the sense that the statement in question might later be declared to be erroneous. Nor could it be so described even if such an explicitation of faith, which took place at an earlier stage, cannot be reconstructed and shown rationally to be conclusive in a purely logical argument.

This understanding of the development of dogma in the Catholic sense however does not exclude but in fact includes the necessity of a further question about the original understanding of faith. Otherwise the systematic theologian, for instance, would need to practice only Denzinger theology and could spare himself the trouble of doing biblical theology or might even regard the latter as no more than historical curiosity. (May it perhaps be suggested, to take one example, that the Credo of the People of God of Paul VI on the whole follows too closely the style of a Denzinger theology – that is, states too positivistically the Christian faith, making too little attempt to derive it from what we understand here as the basic substance of the event of revelation and thus makes it more difficult for people today to assimilate the meaning and status of the individual articles of faith?)

If, for example, we want to know what the doctrine of the sacramental character is supposed to mean today and in what sense it is binding for us, it is not sufficient to appeal merely to Augustine's [19] teaching or merely to collect and interpret and systematize the later declarations of the magisterium; we must also ask how Augustine came to know all this four hundred years after the Gospel; we must ask what was the point of origin (up to a point, to be inferred only metahistorically) of this doctrine of the sacramental character; what the character implies and what it does not imply; consequently in what sense the traditional teaching is really dogmatically binding, how much of it is interpretation and free theological speculation: a question which can certainly be addressed also to declarations of the Church's magisterium, while answers to it must be worked out in the light of declarations still to be made by the magisterium. There are also many other questions which must be regarded today as open in sacramental theology and which have no prospect of finding a real and convincing answer, if we appeal only to 'Denzinger' or other explicit declarations of the magisterium in the past. On the one hand we must form a truly historically convincing idea of the meaning of the statement that (or how?) the sacraments have their origin from Jesus ('instituted' by him) and on the other hand we must consider what is the connection of the individual sacraments with the nature of the Church as 'basic sacrament' of salvation. Only in this way can we hope at the present time to find a plain answer, for example, to the question of who can be a recipient of the sacrament of holy orders (a woman?), what sacramental signs may perhaps be sufficient in extraordinary cases, how the one sacrament of holy orders may possibly be differentiated into individual sacramental functions (differing in character and grade), etc.

The further questions, of which we are thinking here and which may certainly serve as a critical criterion in regard to the traditional understanding of a theological statement, appear generally in traditional textbook theology under the heading of 'reasons of convenience'. But this way of categorizing them only tends to conceal the actual nature of this recourse and prevents a correct appraisal of the process of development of a dogma and of its continually new reconstruction in the light of the most authentic original centre of the event of revelation.

At least one example of what is meant here may be mentioned. In the Apostolic Constitution Munificentissimus Deus in 1950, on the bodily assumption of Mary into definitive salvation, there is first of all a long historical survey of testimonies from the theology and [20] piety of the past to this dogmatic statement. Taken by themselves, these testimonies may perhaps be considered unsatisfactory, since they appeared at so great a distance in time from the New Testament and the primitive Church and may perhaps show that the later Church held this view but cannot make the doctrine absolutely convincing as a truth binding in faith. But then the constitution (DS 3900-3901) uses also what we have described here as a 'recourse' behind an individual statement to a more fundamental and global understanding of faith. We are not discussing here whether this recourse in the present constitution is satisfying in every respect (there is no appeal, for instance, to general eschatology; the body-soul unity of the human person is not always and everywhere made sufficiently effective). But the constitution nevertheless looks to the global and original understanding of faith as one and whole that the Church has of Mary and her function in salvation history and in that light justifies the statement there defined.

Even if it is not directed to the originally one revelation, but to a fundamental particular reality of faith dependent on the former and at the same time related to the theological statement in question, such a recourse is not simply to be depreciated as based on reasons of convenience produced subsequently to support an already established statement. For if it is decided with adequate historical certainty that this dogma cannot seriously be understood as a statement explicitly and formally taught from apostolic times, this recourse is in principle the real source of the statement, whether the explication of the latter from that source (as in the constitution above-mentioned) is sufficiently clear and comprehensive) or whether in this connection (theologically speaking) a great deal is left to be desired.

Such a recourse (to return to our general reflections) is not necessarily and always a recourse to what has always been more clearly and explicitly formulated; the recourse can certainly be from an explicit statement already present (in Scripture or tradition) in the Church's awareness of faith to a global but more fundamental reality lying behind it, a reality which itself becomes clearer and more explicit in this recourse but which thus in its comprehensive unity becomes more clearly evident as indispensable to the Church's awareness of faith than the very statement from which the appeal was made in the first place.

The recourse to this originating reality of faith, either already [21] explicitly present or only more clearly reflected in itself, is wholly suitable to provide a critical criterion for determining the exact meaning and the limitations of a theological statement, even though the latter has itself been established dogmatically as binding.

How, for example, is the question to be decided (if it should turn out to be unavoidable) whether a material identity of the risen body with the glorified body is implied in the dogma of the resurrection of the body (as very many theologians have maintained, even as a dogma, up to very recent times) if there is no recourse behind the individual dogmatic statement about the resurrection of the body to a more fundamental conviction of faith in regard to the abiding unity (even in salvation history) of the human being as body and soul and to the basic conviction of that person's definitive coming to be with God, even though recourse to such a basic conviction would mean that the latter was all the more clearly formulated? How are we to grasp properly today what is really meant by transsubstantiation without such a recourse to a more fundamental, more global understanding of the eucharist? How are we to avoid today an always latent tritheism (which, despite all verbal orthodoxy, appears illogically but actually to affect our explanations of the doctrine of the Trinity) and to interpret correctly the dogmatically binding teaching on the 'immanent' Trinity, unless we continually and repeatedly reflect on its actual point of origin for us, on the doctrine of the Trinity of God in the economy of salvation? How can we make historically credible today the doctrine of the institution of all the sacraments by Jesus Christ, if we do not have recourse to the doctrine of the Church as the primordial sacrament originating in Christ, of the Church as the abiding presence of God's irreversible self-promise made historically tangible in its word? Recourses of this kind of course do no more than reconstruct as well as possible the ways in which the Church's sense of faith extends from its global and fundamental knowledge to particular statements and forms of expression which have already appeared in the course of the history of faith and which from that standpoint alone acquire their formal binding force as matters of faith; they are not however merely pious arguments based on subsequently discovered reasons of convenience, but the way in which we can and must today genuinely achieve an understanding of faith. They provide also a critical criterion which however must in principle respect the authority of the [22] Church's magisterium, but which may question purely authentic interpretations of a dogma when they hand on the latter together with uneliminated amalgams.

All that has been said is still very vague; it could be formulated and substantiated more precisely only in a comprehensive and multidimensional theory of the development of dogma. But what has been said seems anyway to provide an understanding which results from the previous history of dogma and consequently is of considerable importance for the further course of the history of dogma and theology, which in future must not go on almost entirely without reflection but, in the light of earlier history, can and should be more explicitly aware of the principles by which its course is governed, even though it will still be far from coming under an autonomous and adequate control by people in the Church or even by the Church's authorities.

It would therefore be desirable also for the Church's magisterium in its pronouncements not merely to appeal to its formal authority or to recall former individual statements which themselves contained explicitly the teaching now to be put forward, nor simply to quote individual statements of Scripture which are perhaps not so unambiguous exegetically as is often assumed in these doctrinal pronouncements, but here, too, to show that there has been that recourse of which we spoke to the original centre of faith. Today the magisterium should not simply say or tacitly assume that this is purely a task for theologians. The magisterium must not merely take for granted its formal authority (which cannot be denied to it), but must make an effort really to gain the assent of believers to its teachings. Moreover a recourse of this kind seems more or less indispensable today, particularly since the formal authority of the magisterium is not an absolutely fundamental datum of faith, but itself as such and particularly in its effectiveness rests on this original basic substance of faith, which for the faith of the individual is prior to his acknowledgment of the magisterium.

The rules of biblical hermeneutics, which have slowly entered from the time of the Enlightenment into the Church's reflex awareness [23] and after a long and difficult development have by now been explicitly or tacitly recognized also by the magisterium, must be seen and acknowledged also (mutatis mutandis, of course) as rules of interpretation for the later teachings of the magisterium.

Considered objectively, this statement may perhaps seem to be no more than a different way of expressing what has already been said. But it is useful to look once more at the interpretation of declarations of the magisterium (which lead also to the further interpretation of the history of dogma) from the standpoint of the experiences which the exegete and the theologian have had with Scripture texts, especially from the time of the Enlightenment. For the fact cannot seriously be disputed that in both cases the same questions are involved at least wholly in principle and in the last resort, particularly since biblical theology is largely the description of what happened by way of history of dogma in the Old and also in the New Testament, a history of dogma which certainly exists even in the New Testament and without which the true meaning of many individual statements of Scripture cannot be discovered, neither with reference to the extent to which these statements in their true sense are binding in faith nor with reference to what cannot be so regarded.

On the other hand however the hermeneutics of biblical statements seems to have reached a stage of exact and discriminating reflection beyond that of the hermeneutics of later statements of the magisterium, so that the former could be useful and exemplary for the latter, even though this exploitability has scarcely yet been taken in hand and from the nature of the case must certainly be treated with caution. Here indeed there lies an important task of theological hermeneutics with reference to declarations of the Church's magisterium which has not yet been properly faced. For the exegete and biblical theologian today it is, for instance, quite obvious that the real meaning as far as it is binding in faith of a biblical statement can be discovered only by a precise and discriminating inquiry into the literary genre of that statement. Is there also an explicit and considered theory in the theological hermeneutics of Catholic theology of the different literary genres of a theological statement on the part of the magisterium? Why should there not be something of this kind?

Is it a priori certain that this sort of thing cannot exist, perhaps because of a greater uniformity of literary stylization of these declarations [24] of the magisterium? Are there not also, for example, in papal encyclicals a kind of language of piety, doxological statements, etc., with a literary genre that must be considered if the meaning and scope and binding force of these statements are to be precisely determined? Is it possible to discover in pronouncements of the Church (for example, in the social encyclicals from the time of Leo XIII) a literary genre which might be described as that of 'directives' (which certainly exist in Scripture), representing an historically conditioned synthesis between an abiding principle and an imperative or counsel which involve the application of the principle to a particular situation and is not meant at all to be valid for ever and in all situations, without this literary genre really present in such statements being explicitly distinguished from a statement intended to be perennially valid? What is meant, for example, when it is said (DS 3917) that Mary's abundance of grace at the very first moment of her existence excelled that of all the saints? Without disputing a statement of this kind, we may have the impression that it does not belong to the literary genre of a plainly objective dogmatic statement.

Is there perhaps a literary genre in which the legitimacy of a practice of the Church is defended for the present time (and really no more than that), although at first sight this statement is put forward in the style of a perpetually valid essential statement? Does the teaching of Trent, for instance, on the justification and benefits of indulgences imply that indulgences will continue to be granted in the form of the medieval practice of indulgences for all future times? Does this teaching of Trent amount to a promise that in the Church's practice indulgences will be explicitly 'gained' even in the distant future? From the standpoint represented here ought not also the declarations of the Council of Trent on the indissolubility of Christian marriage to be considered again more urgently, if the literary genre of the rejection of divorce in the New Testament is defined in its meaning and scope? If the biblical statements on the possibility of a final perdition (existentially of course to be taken absolutely seriously) are to be interpreted as 'threatening speeches', could not statements of the magisterium on this theme also be interpreted in the same way, even though at first they sound doctrinally like those simply about facts known for certain in advance?

Speaking more generally, if on the one hand statements of the [25] magisterium seem merely to pass on biblical statements and thus merely to refer back to the latter for their own more precise meaning and its limits and if on the other hand today we determine and define more closely exegetically the meaning of these biblical statements (for example, with reference to the position of women in relation to men in Paul's writings) in so far as they are binding in faith, can we not also transfer this restrictive determination to later declarations of the magisterium? Is not this the way in which modern theology works with reference, for example, to monogenism? In the light of the precise definition of the literary genre of the statements concerned it finds in the Bible that there is nothing about monogenism that is binding in faith and consequently interprets the declarations of the magisterium (for instance, in the fifth session of the Council of Treat) based on these biblical statements in the same way.

Here however questions are involved which, since they are unanswered, cannot yet even be clearly formulated or distinguished. The enormous difficulties which Catholic biblical hermeneutics had to face but which have now been largely overcome, with results that are recognized (at least tacitly) by the magisterium, should be a warning not to regard a similarly exact hermeneutics of statements of the magisterium as impracticable merely because it will come up against great difficulties.

VI

Declarations of the magisterium (even in the form of definitions and thus also dogmas) contained occasionally in the past and will also contain in the future an element of linguistic usage for the common statement of truths in the Church: a linguistic usage which on the one hand is not simply the necessary and sole possible way of stating what is meant, but can be considerably different and even apparently the very opposite, and which on the other hand in such a statement of the magisterium is not expressly identified as linguistic usage (which in principle and as such could be different and thus up to a point is freely adopted).

What is meant here is not only that in such statements of the magisterium new terms appear which were not used hitherto and which were introduced into the Church's official language only in a [26] slow historical process. It is true that this alone implies an established usage, in so far as later proclamation and theology can no longer simply ignore such terminology of the statements making use of it. But more than this is meant when we speak of 'linguistic usage'. For when such terms have been accepted and are used in the declarations of the magisterium the impression may be gained that they are the only possible terms and that these alone will be legitimate in the future; that (from now on) what is meant can be expressed only in this way; that these terms are adequate at least for the expression of the objective meaning in the sense that a statement making use of them brings out what is meant in a way that cannot be improved and as exhaustively as possible. Nor is this impression removed by the fact that every theologian of course knows that these terms have to be explained again – and this in fact is an important part of the business of theology – and that obviously different expressions and terms have to be used in these explanations; in other words, a further process of explanation of this kind is in principle never finished. Even after all this is considered, the impression may persist that these further explanations in reality continually lead us back necessarily to the term explained and are adequately summarized and safeguarded in that term and consequently that the linguistic usage cannot be detached from the objective statement. But this impression is wrong, at any rate in many cases.

Let us consider a single example from the history of dogma. As distinct from the theology of the Eastern Church, Western theology from Augustine up to the present time has been committed to the use of the term 'original sin'. Declarations of theology and the magisterium on original sin give the impression that what is really meant cannot be expressed without using the term 'sin', that the latter is irreplaceable, and therefore that there is no question here of a linguistic usage in the sense explained. For some centuries at least theology has become increasingly clearly aware that the term 'sin' in the teaching on original sin is used only 'analogously', since it means, primarily subjective, personal sin and the state of the actual sinner resulting from this. But in such an analogy it is clear that the two analogates differ in every respect from one another as much as they agree with one another. If this is true, it might be just as well to avoid a common term for the two analogates (in order not to obscure or overlook the difference) as it is to bring out the resemblance by seeing them together under a common but analogous term.

[27] In our case this means that, as far as ‘linguistic usage’ goes, without having to deny or conceal what is meant by ‘original sin’, the term might have been avoided or prohibited, in order not to obscure its very profound difference from personal sin: that is, on the assumption that a different and certainly possible way would have been found of expressing what is described in Western theology and the teaching of the Church’s magisterium, with considerable danger of misunderstanding, as original sin. Here obviously we have an example of linguistic usage in the sense explained, for on the other hand it cannot be denied that even a modern theology may not simply disregard the term ‘original sin’, however much its task today must be to bring out the purely analogous use of the term as compared with that of personal sin.

These linguistic usages may even be revised and changed also by the magisterium itself. If today we were to keep to the usage of the Council of Orange, we would have to say in the language of Augustine that every act of a person who is not justified is a ‘sin’. But this is the very thing that seems to be forbidden to us by the usage which Pius V adopted against Baius. It is also possible for several mutually inconsistent usages to be present side by side in declarations of the Church’s magisterium. It may perhaps be said that the terms ‘hypostasis’ and ‘person’ are used in the same sense in official teaching on the Trinity (at least if we prescind from the element of rationality and freedom in the notion of person). But this in no way alters the fact that the two terms in their origin and further history can be made compatible with each other only with difficulty; in other words, we have here a dual and not a single linguistic usage. If we have to allow for such linguistic usages, which are not simply required solely by the nature of what is to be expressed but which up to a point are freely chosen in the light of the development of ideas, this means for the future history of dogma that we may well expect to find this aspect of linguistic usage present in existing statements of the magisterium, even if it has not hitherto been explicitly recognized as such. It would however take us too long to suggest possible examples of this sort of thing here.

It is also possible for a process tending toward a definition based on a linguistic usage to come to a halt and eventually to be broken off. In the fifties of the present century there was a considerable movement toward defining the position of the blessed Virgin as ‘mediatrix’. Today this movement seems to have slackened and to have [28] no prospects in the foreseeable future. Despite descriptions of Mary in papal encyclicals as ‘mediatrix’ and ‘co-redemptrix’, we now hesitate to use the one term (even analogously) to describe the function of Jesus Christ in salvation history and that of the most blessed Virgin (which bears only the most remote resemblance to that of Christ) since it seems obvious that the use of such a term, even if its analogous character is subsequently stressed, obscures the radical difference that exists between the two ‘mediatorships’. Here then the policy in regard to linguistic usage seems to be following a trend opposite to that which we observed in the use of the term ‘original sin’, where the dubious character of the analogous term was accepted without much embarrassment. Might not the discovery of purely ‘verbal’ heresies, which really amount to a ‘schismatic’ rejection of a linguistic usage on the part of the Church’s magisterium, be part of a history of dogma in the future as well as of an ecumenical theology?

Despite appearances to the contrary, the fact that one ‘party’ in a theological dispute is admitted to be right does not mean that the other ‘party’ (as it actually existed historically) was purely and simply wrong.

This observation may sound like a truism; humanly speaking however it is very important when a controversy is still raging or immediately after it has come to an end (provisionally or 'definitively') as a result of a decision of the magisterium. The point of this observation is that the 'victor' in such a dispute may not triumph over the 'vanquished', nor need the latter think that he has utterly lost the battle. He need not assume this even if he cannot really say himself how his essential 'concern' can still be basically assured even after the decision has gone against him.

It is right to assume of course that the complete negation of a positively affirmative statement of the magisterium (disregarding for the moment its theological qualification) must be false. But in a concrete dispute in theological history contentious theological statements are not opposed to one another as purely contradictory and consequently the confirmation of one statement by the magisterium [29] is far from implying an absolute rejection of the other statement opposed to it in the course of the controversy. The latter may well include concerns, elements of truth which are not present in the officially approved statement, but which can be right and significant and can have a future even if the other party with its frequent triumphant shouting will not admit this, even indeed when the losing party at the very moment of condemnation cannot itself clearly see what can be rescued of its basic concern.

Was everything false, for instance, that Pelagius and Julian of Eclanum had to say against the apparently completely victorious Augustine, or have they not later been proved right in many respects in the course of a slow development up to the present time, when the doctrine of limbo, for instance, seems to have been abandoned and the Augustinian doctrine of original sin has been quite considerably modified? And has not all this led to the introduction of greater precision into Augustine's doctrine of sin and justification, through a clearer distinction between nature and grace which was not known to Augustine and which goes a long way toward the rehabilitation of his opponents? In other words, was Pelagius actually a heretic objectively, in regard to the matter of the dispute as such, or only in the interpretation (understandable humanly speaking and in the light of the historical situation) of Augustine, who could not in fact understand Pelagius in any other way and therefore attacked him as a heretic and successfully established his own linguistic usage in the Church? Was monophysitism in some churches in the East after Chalcedon of an objective or purely verbal character, in a sense more 'schismatic' than heretical, since its supporters felt unable to follow the linguistic usage of Chalcedon? Is it absolutely certain that the doctrine of justification (and sanctification), as commonly understood and regarded as binding in the Protestant churches, is quite clearly opposed to the teaching of the Council of Trent on justification? Did Bossuet turn out to be absolutely right against Fénelon? After the severe condemnation of modernism (under Pius X), how much of its aspirations and the problems it raised slowly came to be accepted subsequently in Catholic theology and biblical studies, and how often in fact did this happen contrary to the official rejection of individual propositions of the modernists by the Church's magisterium?

Decisions of the Church's magisterium, too, even in the form of [30] definitions, never incorporate the entire and complete truth in all aspects and in all dimensions of the reality of faith; even after the settlement of a controversy, history goes on, so that the 'victors' in the conflict must be modest and circumspect and the 'vanquished' can always hope for a better understanding of their real concern (and also of a great deal of what they have explicitly said) on the part of the institutional Church in the future.

The history of dogma and theology remains history: that is, in the last resort unpredictable and not under the control of human beings or of the Church's authority.

No matter how much the history of dogma (together with the history of theology) can be seen as an 'organic' process of explication of the real basic substance of revelation (and it is thus possible to attempt retrospectively to make this process intelligible as 'logical' sequence), it remains nevertheless in the last resort a history of freedom to be accepted in its indissoluble facticity as gift and as burden. This must be so if only because there is an indissoluble relationship of mutual dependence between the history of dogma and theology on the one hand and the universal history of ideas, of civilisation and even economics, on the other; but this history is and remains precisely history and cannot even subsequently be logically deduced. In the Christian view it is true that the history of faith and dogma is under the guidance of the Holy Spirit and certainly has its supreme entelechy in that Spirit; but the Spirit is effective in this history because he is also the secret and, for us in the last resort before the end of history, the inscrutable innermost principle of history as such. That is why it is not possible to make unambiguous and secure prognoses for the future history of dogma and faith.

In view of the 'single line' course of this history, we are certainly bound to assume that truths once grasped with an explicit and absolute assent of faith in the Church cannot simply be 'forgotten' again, since the Church's ever present sense of faith remains the same only by retaining also the memory of its own history. But this tells us little in regard to the future about the existential and consequently [31] theological status which such a truth will retain concretely in the Church's sense of faith and in its practice. This is particularly true for theological statements and views with a lesser degree of binding force.

Such shifts in the existential and theoretical status of truths can easily be observed in the past. How long did it take, for instance, for the ecclesiology accepted under the influence of Bellarmine in the sixteenth century to be changed again, after a recourse to older tradition, into the ecclesiology which found expression in Pius XII's Mystici Corporis and in Lumen Gentium at the Second Vatican Council? Will the widely developed doctrine of confessions of devotion keep up practically and theologically the role it has played in the treatise on the sacrament of penance for a long time up to the present? Popes from Leo XIII onward have produced a detailed teaching on devotion to the Sacred Heart. In the nineteenth and in the present century there have been almost innumerable Roman declarations on Mary and Marian devotion. Will the official theological declarations on such devotion retain the status that they once claimed as a matter of course in the life and in the theology of the Church?

We cannot really foresee the future history of dogma and theology. If however we attempt with a little futurological imagination to form a picture of humanity in the coming centuries, to envisage its quantitative, economic, sociological, mental, and political changes, there can be no doubt that the Church's history of faith and dogma will bring with it changes which we can scarcely imagine today.

IX

It might perhaps be said that the material of the future history of faith and dogma of Christianity and the Church will differ considerably and characteristically from that of the history lying between the end of the great patristic age and the Enlightenment (the dates are very provisional and imprecise, and it might perhaps be better to speak of the Constantinian turning point and the beginning of the Imperial Church instead of the end of the great patristic age and to speak, not of the Enlightenment as such, but of the acceptance of [32] the Enlightenment in the modern Church, an acceptance which has only now been completed and which required a hundred and fifty or two hundred years of the age in which we are still living).

The whole period, which might be thus marked out on the one hand against the first three centuries of Christianity and on the other hand against the modern age from the time of the Enlightenment, was characterized by the fact that this history of faith and dogma went on by and large in a homogeneous milieu which, despite everything new that entered into it, bore in all dimensions (even the secular) of human life the Christian imprint and was actually threatened only from outside.

The first three centuries of Christianity and perhaps the century and a half after these (as the continuation and completion of the influences of the first period) represent therefore a history of faith and dogma in a militant confrontation with and a simultaneous assimilation of a non-Christian intellectual and cultural milieu. On the other hand (despite the continued influence of ancient Platonism, despite the acceptance of Aristotelianism and the internal crises of Christianity resulting from the schism between the Eastern and Western churches and from the Reformation of the sixteenth century), this long intermediate period was a time of explication and differentiation of the substance of faith from its centre into increasingly systematized distinctions, which, because of their one starting point from within and the absence of any really serious confrontation with external opposition, could be worked out in a more or less uniform terminology accepted by all as a matter of course. This was the time of the summas and, simultaneously and for the same reason, the time when it was possible (since the whole scheme was taken for granted) to plunge with immense theological passion into individual questions and almost to be lost in them. It was at this time that the modern greater catechisms emerged and what we have come to describe as Denzinger theology. It was the time when lengthy papal encyclicals dealing with comparatively detailed questions of Christian faith could be taken as a matter of course; when the magisterium reacted meticulously and swiftly to real or supposed infringements of particular teachings from this detailed system; when it was assumed that the system as a whole was clear and scarcely open to further development (threatened at most in the present century from outside by liberal exegesis and theology and [33] modernism) and that consequently any serious development could only be in regard to individual questions (for instance, in Mariology), so that the main work of theology was concerned retrospectively with its own history, the ‘great’ theologians being historians and not systematic theologians.

Today (naturally, after a long period of gestation from the Enlightenment onward, a period to which the argument conducted defensively with liberal theology and modernism belongs) we have undoubtedly entered into a new phase of the history of faith and thus also of the history of dogma and theology. It is a question today no longer of an increasingly detailed explication of the basic substance of faith within a homogeneous milieu, with its own common horizons of understanding; on the contrary, it is a question of acquiring a new understanding (while preserving, of course, the traditional substance of faith) of the faith as one and whole in a non-Christian milieu, in a new period of a global world civilisation into which new world cultures which were never Christian have entered; it is a question of a history of faith and dogma in a new diaspora where there must again be both radical confrontation and radical assimilation in face of this new situation, which bears the imprint of the most diverse forms of atheism and is marked also by a despair of the possibility of the survival of religion at all. In that sense there is a formal similarity between the period of the history of dogma now dawning and its first period, which we distinguished, even though the material and the tasks of the first and the third periods are radically different.

The history of faith and dogma will presumably go on in the future, not in the style of the second period as an evolutive explication and systematizing differentiation of the basic substance of faith, but as a transposition of this abiding faith into new and pluralistic horizons of understanding, horizons of today and tomorrow. In view of the incommensurable and not adequately synthesizable pluralism of present and future horizons of understanding of the dawning historical situation, the transposition of faith into these horizons of understanding will have to be brought about by a pluralism of theologies, a pluralism which will also be impossible to synthesize adequately, despite all the readiness for necessary dialogue on the part of these theologies with one another for the protection and continually new discovery of the one faith.

[34] In this new period now begun the task of the magisterium therefore will scarcely consist any longer in the definition of 'new' individual dogmas, in meticulously looking out for real or alleged deviations from traditional individual teachings, but in maintaining the faith as one and whole in its basic substance; and even this, not by 'censoring', but by positively encouraging cooperation in the task imposed on us today of interpreting the old faith afresh in a new and by no means originally Christian milieu. This new task may well demand far too much from the means (material and personal) at the disposal of the Roman authorities on matters of faith; even in the last decade the Roman magisterium has continued by and large to work in the old style and with the old machinery and consequently, while maintaining its autonomy and special function in the Church, must search creatively for a new style in both its doctrinal and its disciplinary measures if it is not only to be right but also effectively to be accepted as right in the sense of faith of the people in the Church.

In brief: the history of faith and dogma will continue, since salvation history will continue in a new world history; but it will have a different character, not so much the character of a history of individual, newly articulated statements of faith and theological reflection on these, but the history of the new expression of the old basic substance of the faith confronting and assimilating the future horizons of understanding. It is obvious that this history will no longer be merely the history of dogma as formulated in the West and of its theology (to be exported to other countries), but the history of faith and dogma of a world Church, however little we can imagine its material and formal implications. What has been said does not exclude but includes the possibility that the new conception of the transposition of the substance of the Christian faith as one and whole will also have consequences for the interpretation of many or of all individual doctrines.

PSEUDO-PROBLEMS IN ECUMENICAL DISCUSSION

Our intention here is to say something about questions of dogmatics which remain open, although the institutional Church regards them as definitively answered. We are speaking of the institutional Church in a somewhat vague sense, in so far as it gives effect in practice to its teaching policy (in appointing professors, in censoring books – at any rate, until recently – and in other ways) in its general teaching and in its authentic doctrinal statements other than definitions. Hence it is not a question here of definitions of an absolute character of the supreme magisterium by ex cathedra decisions of the pope or definitions of a council. These decisions on dogmatic questions will be considered here (if at all) only if, while being absolutely binding, they can also leave open questions that were not directly answered by the definition, either because they were simply not noticed or because it was assumed that they had already been answered, although a determination of the exact meaning of the definition in question may show that this is by no means the case. In that sense even in final definitions it is possible up to a point to discover open questions which are only assumed to have been answered by the definition. But in speaking of open questions regarded by the institutional Church as already answered, we have in mind mainly authentic declarations, not definitions of the Church's magisterium. It can also be a question of those teachings which were qualified in traditional scholastic textbook theology at least up to the time of Vatican II as 'theologically certain' on the basis of a general consensus of theologians and therefore treated in practice as no longer open. These are teachings which can [36] also properly be included here, since the Roman magisterium usually has recourse to them when it feels that a declaration is required.

Among these questions, which are only apparently settled by the magisterium while in reality remaining dogmatically still open, we are dealing here only with dogmatic questions and not with those of canon law or pastoral theology. It may, for example, be dogmatically an absolutely open question whether wheaten bread alone can be the matter of the eucharist. This is a question that can be declared open without necessarily drawing any conclusions about possible changes in the concrete practice of the Church. Consequently dogmatically open questions need not always be a problem for the practical action of the Church.

Our theme of course is set against an ecumenical background. In other words, the questions to be considered here will be those which are important for ecumenical discussion among the traditional Christian churches. We are therefore disregarding from the outset all questions of moral theology which are relevant today, which are dealt with by the Church's magisterium at the present time in authentic declarations put forward as definitive, although they cannot by any means claim to be such. These moral theological problems we are leaving aside here, although it cannot be denied that Roman declarations of this kind actually make ecumenical dialogue more difficult. We are also leaving aside declarations on exegesis and biblical theology from Pius X onward in which the Church's magisterium overreacted to modernism and imposed on Catholic exegetes norms that brought them into conflict with Protestant exegesis and thus certainly also made ecumenical discussion more difficult. These questions can be disregarded here since the antimodernistic doctrinal statements of the magisterium by and large have become obsolete and have been tacitly dropped by the Roman magisterium.

If we restrict ourselves therefore to dogmatic questions in the strictest sense of the term, the theme still remains far from clear. In itself it would be appropriate and useful in regard to this theme to initiate general and fundamental reflections of a theological epistemology to show

(also generally and fundamentally) how and why it is continually possible in the Church's sense of faith, even though not in an absolute commitment of faith, to reach the conclusion that a certain teaching is the answer to a particular question, deciding this equation unambiguously and definitively, although this is not in [37] fact the case. With the aid of such general and fundamental reflections of a theological epistemology the attempt might be made to show what are the reasons arising from the historical and political development of ideas why we suddenly discover that the traditional teachings do not by any means answer the questions facing us today, even though we had assumed that they would. But, in view of the brevity of these reflections and the obscurity of the general problem, we must refrain here from such an undertaking. We shall restrict ourselves therefore to a few brief observations on certain individual dogmatic questions to which the magisterium and traditional textbook theology assumed too quickly and too spontaneously that they had found an answer.

It may sound odd, but I think that we can also disregard the three great groups of questions of controversial theology which are summed up under the headings of sola fide, sola scriptura, sola gratia. As far as the doctrine of justification is concerned, it can no longer be said today that the teaching of the Augustan Confession and that of the Council of Trent are certainly absolutely opposed to each other. The same holds for the idea of justification by faith alone in the sense actually understood by Lutheran theology. As for sola scriptura, we need do no more than refer to the fierce controversy during the Second Vatican Council, when the question of the exact relationship between Scripture and Tradition was deliberately left open, with the result that the teaching on this relationship which had become traditional since the Council of Trent was now likewise turned into an open question. I think then that we can leave aside here the traditionally fundamental controversial questions of the Western churches. At the same time of course it may be asked how all institutional churches would have to respond officially to the question of what must be done if they suddenly observed that the dissent which was once the source (and the sole source) of division between the churches has now disappeared. We shall therefore deal only with a few secondary questions which we regard, contrary to the traditional view, as open. At the same time no importance can be attached to a systematic treatment of these questions. Nor, with the questions as limited in this way, can an explicit comparison be made between absolutely binding Catholic positions and Protestant views. In regard to the Catholic positions, we must restrict ourselves to pointing out open questions, different possibilities of interpretation, [38] etc., so that from this standpoint it becomes clear that an absolute contradiction of the Protestant positions is not as clear and obvious as it might seem at first sight.

We may begin with some observations on the doctrine of the sacraments in general. The Council of Trent teaches that there are seven sacraments, instituted by Christ. If as Catholics we reflect honestly today on the facts of the history of the sacraments, we shall have to say that as actual basic realizations of the nature of the Church the sacraments have their origin from Christ in the sense that the Church is 'instituted' by him, has its origin from him, without having to seek or postulate generally explicit words of institution spoken by Christ with reference to individual sacraments, even though such explicit words of institution cannot be denied in regard to the eucharist. This conception of the sacraments in general as just suggested, which sees the sacraments as actualizations in the word of the basic sacrament, the Church, which is the presence of the invincible salvific act of God in Jesus Christ, ought to be acceptable to Protestants, since in this way the true meaning of opus operatum can be made intelligible and the sacraments can be understood also from the Catholic standpoint as the most intensive event of the exhibitive word of the Gospel; it is possible also to point out to modern Protestant theology that, for its present-day exegesis, baptism, recognized by the Reformation as a sacrament, cannot be shown more clearly or more certainly than the other sacraments to have its origin from Jesus. In a Catholic sense, too, the fact that the sacraments are a matter of divine law must be understood as a legitimate and irreversible decision of the apostolic Church. But from this there emerges an opportunity of interpreting the Tridentine teaching on the sacraments which on the one hand seems acceptable for Protestant sacramental doctrine today, while on the other hand admittedly raising new questions on the Catholic side, but also opening up new possibilities of pastoral action which had not hitherto been considered. In a modern Catholic sacramental theology doing justice to the historical data and with a Catholic theology of the word (unfortunately only very gradually developed today) it is no longer possible and no longer necessary to portray the Catholic Church as the Church of the sacraments and the Protestant Churches as Churches of the word.

In this connection it should be noticed that the doctrine of the [39] sacramental character as conferred in some sacraments leaves open more questions than is apparent from our textbook theology. The very fact that the Church in certain sacraments grants within itself an irrevocable status (which to all intents and purposes it will never withdraw and which it imparts as such) conveys all that we must regard as binding in the doctrine of the sacramental character without leaving scope for further speculations.

We come to the question of the understanding of ministry in the Church, in so far as here too there are very many more open questions than is commonly thought. Ministry in the Church as understood in the light of Catholic faith obviously implies that there must be a ministry of leadership in the Church as an historical and sociological reality and that its special characteristics, functions, and powers are to be derived from the nature of the Church and must be made intelligible from this standpoint. If we exclude here for the moment the papacy and its powers, in order to give them special consideration at a later stage, then the foregoing statement really covers everything that can and must be said with absolute dogmatic binding force about ministry in the Church. This holds of course in its whole extent for those holders of such a ministry who have the leadership of a major and (apart from its link with the Church as a whole) self-sufficient Church and are traditionally known as bishops. In practice this one ministry, as it is now sacramentally transmitted, is divided in the Roman Church into the three grades of episcopate, presbyterate, and diaconate. But it does not seem to me that this tripartite organization of ministry is absolutely certainly a matter of divine law. The triple gradation of ministry certainly does not go back to an explicit institution by the historical Jesus. I think it is possible but not absolutely certain that the triple ministry developed so irreversibly in the primitive Church of apostolic times as to be in this way a matter of divine law and unalterable. Even if these three grades are acknowledged as of divine law, the Church can nevertheless divide up its one ministry further and grant a share in it in different ways. In practice this is precisely what it does. Neither is it proved nor, in view of the medieval doctrine of the sacramentality of the minor orders, is it even probable that other forms and grades of participation in the one ministry of the Church cannot also be conferred sacramentally.

In the light of all this it is not a priori certain that Protestant [40] Churches which might want to be united with Rome would necessarily have to adopt precisely the division of ministry as it exists in the Roman Church. Neither does it seem to me to be absolutely certain, from the purely dogmatic standpoint, that episcopal authority as it has been defined from Trent to the Second Vatican Council, and as of course it will always be valid, must necessarily be held by an individual as a ‘monarchical’ bishop. Not of course that there is anything to be said practically and concretely against the monarchical episcopate. But when the nature of episcopal authority or the power of leadership over a major Church is described in the Church’s doctrinal pronouncements, when this authority (which is and will remain valid) is described as a matter of course as held by one man, since that is the way in which it is actually exercised everywhere, this does not seem to me to imply in the sense of a dogmatic statement that episcopal authority as one and whole cannot be held also by a small collective. The Catholic doctrine of the episcopate as a whole as the supreme governing body in the Church shows that collegial constitutional structures cannot simply be a priori essentially alien to the nature of the Catholic Church. But for our part, at any rate, we must distinguish more clearly between the question of the nature of the Church's ministry and the question of the individual or collective holder of such a ministry. The nature of ministry must be seen in the light of the Church's nature and is by that very fact different from the nature of a function of leadership in a secular society. If this is or could be recognized by all sides in ecumenical discussion, it might be possible to agree freely on many other aspects of the concrete structuring of ministry and of its holdership in the one Church formed out of many particular churches which have had different historical patterns of growth.

If ministry in the Church stems from the Church's theological nature and thus from Christ, if in this sense it comes from above and not by being freely set up from the base of the Church, nevertheless the question of how the holders of such a ministry can and should be chosen and appointed is actually still completely open and is not properly a dogmatic question. Or it is such at most in the sense that a new holder of the episcopal ministry (if his authority is to be legitimate) needs the consent of the pope and the episcopate as a whole. But this does not mean that the actual appointment and choice of a bishop according to divine law must lie with the pope. This may be [41] and is appropriately and usefully part of the positive law of the Church, but it is not by divine law a papal prerogative. This is evident also from the whole history of the episcopate. It can be shown that the determination of the holder of a ministry by an election from below and in fact by an historically conditioned electoral body cannot be contrary to the Church's nature, by the very fact that the appointment of the holder of the supreme ministry, the pope, comes about by an election from below, today by the very obviously historically conditioned College of Cardinals.

Of course, in whatever way he is chosen from below, a holder of the episcopal ministry only comes into the full possession of all episcopal powers when he is not only accepted into the unity and peace of the episcopate as a whole, but when he is also sacramentally ordained by other bishops and thus in this respect, too, enters into the apostolic succession. But this does not mean on the other hand that an election from below is impossible or contrary to the nature of the Church. In principle, unity and peace with the Apostolic See in Rome are indispensable. But this does not necessarily mean that the granting of this unity and this peace must necessarily as a matter of dogma be the central and essential event in the appointment of a particular holder of the episcopal ministry. The pope would renounce a prerogative that is not, dogmatically speaking, everlasting but acquired only in the course of history, if he were to refrain in a union with separated churches from appointing a bishop in the way hitherto envisaged in the Latin Code of Canon Law of the Church.

In this connection something must certainly be said about the obscure question of the recognition of the ministries of the Churches of the Reformation separated from the Roman Church. I stated my views on this question in my book on preliminary questions in regard to an ecumenical understanding of ministry (Vorfragen zu einem ökumenischen Amtsverständnis, Quaestiones Disputatae 65 [Freiburg, 1974]). As far as I can see, what I said there scarcely found any response and it is tacitly disavowed by declarations of the Roman magisterium and the German bishops. But, since these declarations certainly cannot claim to be irreformable, I still think that what I tentatively suggested in that book remains worth discussing. According to Vatican II there can be no doubt that these ministries as exercised in the separated churches can have a positive importance [42] for salvation. I also think that as legitimate and at least in many cases (which of course must be distinguished from others that are not legitimate) they are also sacramental in their transmission (ordination) and in their exercise (eucharistic celebration); this is true, I think, not only of the Eastern Churches separated from Rome, but also of the Reformation Churches. If this sort of opinion is to be understood, it must first of all be remembered that these churches may not be judged now from the Catholic side, as they were judged (rightly, in principle) at the very time of the Reformation, at the point of separation, as distinct from their present separated state. Then it must also be recalled that there is a kind of essential law that is prior to statute law and simply flows from the nature of a particular individual or a society. This is something that is possible also in principle in the Church, since the latter has a nature that precedes its juridical constitution and comes to it with the definitive and irreversibly victorious event of salvation in Jesus Christ and with the faith in him unconditionally granted in that event. It is from this basic nature of the Church that realities of a sacramental character can flow – at least this is conceivable in principle, even though they do not come to be in virtue of the normal, accepted procedure, if the latter is inculpably omitted.

Unless something of this kind is assumed to have taken place, it is impossible to do justice to the facts in the history of the Church. When a priest or bishop is living in undisputed possession of his powers in the Church, is he to be denied these powers if it is assumed that, according to the normal law of the sacraments, the succession has been interrupted at some point? Was Martin V (recognized as pope by the whole Church) a legitimate pope only if it can first be established that his predecessors either were invalidly elected or actually voluntarily renounced the papacy? If a Catholic priest were to celebrate the eucharist with rice bread if and because it seemed at that point that there would be no wheaten bread in the foreseeable future, would that celebration not really be sacramental? How could medieval theologians regard confession to lay persons in an emergency as sacramental? If non-Catholic Christians marry, thereby effecting a sacrament, and if this sacrament comes into existence in virtue of the basic sacramental nature of the Church, then it is not because the pope by a positive legal act makes this form of contracting matrimony a sacramental sign for such Christians, [43] even though the Tridentine form is not observed, that such a marriage is a sacrament today. Otherwise we would have to come to the absurd conclusion that the pope could require even these Christians to observe the Tridentine form and thus deny to non-Catholics the sacramentality of their marriage. The sacramentality of these marriages belongs to them directly in virtue of the basic sacramental nature of the Church, since these baptized Christians have a right to this sacrament, even though, in their good faith, it cannot be conveyed to them by the normal sacramental signs. It should also be remembered that the rite of conferring an ecclesial ministry is entirely at the discretion of the Church and need not by any means consist necessarily in an imposition of hands. In the light of these reflections, which of course as such ought to be much more detailed and precise, it seems to me not impossible to recognize to a much greater extent than hitherto in the traditional view the sacramental character of ordination and the exercise of the ministry based on this in the Churches of the Reformation. In regard to this question, which is of considerable importance for the possibility of a union of the Churches, I must again refer to the above-mentioned little book of mine. If as Catholic theologians we have a duty to bear in mind everything that can possibly help toward union, we should not be too readily satisfied with the traditional but superficial answers to the question of recognition of ministries in the Churches of the Reformation.

We come now to the main impediment to Church unity: the question of the papacy and the Roman primacy. Paul VI himself acknowledged that the papacy is today the greatest impediment to the union of the churches. In regard to this question also a great deal appears to be more open than is generally thought. Theologians and popes ought also today to consider more precisely what is really part of the inalienable substance of faith in the doctrine and practice of the Roman primacy and what is not. And in regard to what is not essential, although people cling to it in practice, the Catholic theologians and especially the popes ought to make their position much clearer. This is all the more important now that there is evidently a growing inclination on the part of Protestants to recognize a Petrine ministry in the Church as necessary to or at least in accordance with its nature. But there is scarcely any visible sign in Rome of a clarification of the self-limitation of the Roman primacy that is dogmatically [44] possible and in the present situation advisable; there is no sign that the first step is being taken toward agreement on this particular question. There is no doubt at all that much of what the Roman See still claims even today by way of powers and rights acquired in the course of history is not part of the inalienable nature of the primacy. Nor of course is there any doubt about this in Rome. But Rome ought also to say clearly what is not essential in this respect and what it is prepared to give up in regard to the churches seeking unity with Rome. Whether these sacrifices are to be made only for the sake of the churches prepared for union or whether they should hold also for the Latin Church of the West is again a very different question which cannot be discussed here.

The basic question is really to be answered not by drawing up an inventory of what Rome can renounce in principle, but by circumscribing what Rome can not renounce in the light of fundamental dogma. If the question is answered in this way, it is of course necessary to explain also what the pope's universal primacy of jurisdiction over all the churches as ordinary power of the primacy means and what it does not. There is no need to prove expressly that very many questions remain open in this respect or that a great deal of what Rome regards as an obvious exercise of this primacy of jurisdiction is by no means obvious dogmatically. (The possibility of various ways for Rome to participate in the appointment of bishops has already been discussed. The fact has also been mentioned that to a large extent presbyteral, collective constitutional elements are not dogmatically excluded even in the Catholic Church or in its particular churches.) In regard to the unlimited authority of the Roman primacy according to the letter of the law, certain qualifications need to be considered and more explicitly stated. Unlimited as this authority may seem to be according to the letter of the law, the pope is limited, not only by the fact that he cannot change the nature of the Church insofar as this is a matter of divine law; that is, he not only cannot abolish the episcopate as it is understood by Vatican II, but neither can he in practice undermine its autonomy in such a way to reduce the bishops really to the status of mere regional representatives of the pope in a development which has not ceased to be a threat even today. A further limitation of this apparently unlimited primacy arises from another side and should be explicitly stated much more clearly than actually occurs. In other words, the exercise [45] of the plenitude of jurisdiction of the primacy is tied to Christian moral norms, in fact to norms that are not always purely materially the same, but can be different in different historical situations. In practice it seems to be assumed in the Church that it is obvious and not open to any doubt that the pope always keeps to these moral restrictions of his power. And of course it is not to be denied that this is what generally happens. There may however be some doubt about whether this is always the case.

It is quite possible that certain moral restrictions on the pope's power inevitably emerging out of the mental climate and sociological situations today are present as such, but in practice are not seen and therefore not respected. It is, for example, quite conceivable in principle that in publishing Humanae Vitae Paul VI in good faith actually infringed norms for arriving at a papal judgment which were available as such. It is quite conceivable that Roman authorities may interfere in the life of the particular churches in a way that objectively infringes the principle of subsidiary function in the Church. It does not seem obvious or unquestionable to me that the law of celibacy has to be enforced uniformly from Rome in the whole Church. It is not a priori clear that every recourse to the universal primacy of the pope is always and in every case in practice also morally justified. (If, for instance, a ruling on celibacy from Rome alone for the universal Church is morally legitimate, then the pope has this right in principle also in regard to the Eastern Churches. Could it then seriously be asserted that the pope has the moral right also to forbid priestly marriage for all the Eastern Uniate Churches?) There can of course be disagreement on the exact details of the restrictions imposed on the pope's universal power of jurisdiction by moral principles and in particular by moral principles varying with different situations; but there ought to be an open and lucid dialogue in the Church, even if in a case of doubt and where the pope does not clearly order something positively immoral the presumption is that the pope is right. But it would be very important for the progress of ecumenism if Rome itself were to define concretely and clearly and in detail just what it could renounce in the light of its own self-understanding.

From the ecumenical standpoint the most difficult of the questions associated with the papacy is of course the definition of the pope's infallible teaching primacy. We cannot get rid of this difficulty by [46] seeing it in the way Hans Küng sees it and more or less interpreting out of existence the infallibility of the pope when he makes an ex cathedra decision. But it is possible to bring out more clearly what this Catholic dogma means and what it does not mean. As far as the past is concerned, the only difficulties in regard to this infallible teaching authority of the pope that arise in practice are connected with the two Marian dogmas defined by Pius IX and Pius XII. As we hope to show later, these difficulties can certainly be cleared up. The real difficulty of Protestant Christians relates to possibilities of the future, to conceivable future ex cathedra decisions by the pope. In this connection, even if a Protestant is prepared in principle to recognize a Petrine ministry in the Church, he does not think that he is in a position to make out a kind of blank cheque for the future. It does not seem to him clear and unequivocal that divine providence, which keeps the Church in the truth of Christ, is necessarily bound to be effective when the pope defines something and not on other occasions or in a different way. To the Protestant, the Catholic idea of the concentration of the efficacious grace of truth, granted to the Church, precisely on a particular and juridically determinable act of the pope, seems to be a human materialization and legalization of the grace of truth, which is incredible. It seems so incredible also because history shows that on the one hand in authentic doctrinal decisions the ordinary magisterium of the popes was often involved in error, at least up to the present time, and, on the other hand, Rome put forward and insisted on such essentially reformable decisions as if there could be no doubt about their definitive truth and as if any further discussion was unbecoming for a Catholic theologian. Against such reservations on the Protestant side purely theoretical arguments on our part will have little prospect of success in practice. We could however attempt to show better than we have done hitherto that the concrete procedure before and for a papal ex cathedra decision now and in the future will certainly take such a form that a Protestant need not fear in practice and concretely that his blank cheque will be filled out with a papal teaching which he is bound in faith and conscience to oppose. In this respect two considerations may be useful.

First of all, it is clear and conciliar teaching that a pope, who does not receive any new revelation even for an ex cathedra decision, must prepare his decision by making use of all means at his disposal [47] in that particular situation. But the moral norms implicit in this principle could be more clearly articulated and codified today, even though the observance of these norms in a concrete case would not be open to legal verification by an authority higher than that of the pope. If such norms for arriving at the truth in regard to a papal decision were not only present and observed in practice (which can be assumed on the whole to have been the case in the past, even though they could be and ought to be more differentiated now and in the future), but were also explicitly formulated and codified, there would be far less need for a Protestant to fear a future papal ex cathedra decision which might be contrary to his faith and conscience. If in the First and the Second Vatican Council it is said that the pope or his decision is infallible as such (ex sese) and not in virtue of the consent of the Church, this means merely that the pope's ex cathedra decision does not acquire its definitive validity only by virtue of the juridical verification of its correctness by a higher legal authority in the Church distinct from the pope. But this ex sese of the two Vatican Councils does not mean that the pope possesses an infallibility that is independent of God's irreversibly victorious promise to the Church as a whole.

In an ex cathedra decision the pope as head of the Church and of the episcopate as a whole acts as an authority that is restricted by the Church as a whole and its infallible faith. Consequently, in preparing ex cathedra decisions, the pope must necessarily have recourse to the sense of faith of the whole Church. If this were not so and if it were not necessary, a papal ex cathedra decision would be the proclamation of a new revelation. But the pope neither possesses nor receives any new revelation. He is the authoritative spokesman of the Church's sense of faith and for this he has the assistance of the Spirit, an assistance which must not be understood as psychological inspiration but in the last resort means the success coming from God of his recourse to the infallible sense of faith of the Church as a whole. This reference to the whole Church's sense of faith of course takes different forms at the different stages of the Church's history in the light of the opportunities available at the time. Today certainly in this respect a recourse to the episcopate as a whole is absolutely necessary, both morally and from the nature of the case. And again this recourse may take a variety of forms. But it is now not merely a laudable practice, observed by Pius IX and Pius [48] XII (though perhaps in ways that were not entirely satisfactory), but an absolute requirement.

Such an explicit recourse is technically quite feasible today. But in that case it is also a moral obligation. How could a pope today honestly say that he had done all that was humanly possible and morally required to be humanly certain that his teaching was a part of the assured sense of faith of the whole Church, if he had wanted to dispense with this consultation of the episcopate as a whole? It is obvious that such a consultation ought to take place and ought also to be publicly clear today in certain forms now possible of explicitness, transparency, easier dialogue, consultation of theologians, investigation of the believers' sense of faith, etc., even though it is evidently not yet clearly considered and practised in Rome, as can be seen also from very recent authentic if not defining dogmatic statements. If such procedures were clearly articulated, explicitly shown to be operative, and applied in practice, even a Protestant Christian would be largely relieved of the fear of an arbitrary manipulation of the papal teaching authority contrary to the true spirit of Jesus and the Church.

A second consideration may be added to the first. The Catholic faith in the existence of a papal teaching power, that is always involved in the permanent nature of the Church, does not imply that the actual exercise of this power is the same at all times (which is not true of the past), does not imply that it is independent of any historical and variable preconditions. Because of the history of dogma of the first two thousand years of the Church, we have become accustomed involuntarily to think of this history as an increasingly progressive explication and articulation of the basic substance of faith into more and more new and explicit individual statements and consequently to think naturally also of the papal teaching primacy as being actively involved in producing these new and differentiating statements. We involuntarily regard the exercise of the pope's teaching primacy, when he speaks ex cathedra, as an explanation of statements which, even though ultimately implied in the tradition of faith, seem materially new and were formerly scarcely explicitly perceptible: for instance, the dogma of the Immaculate Conception or the Assumption of Mary into heaven or even the doctrine of Mary as mediatrix of grace propagated some twenty years ago with a view [49] to a dogmatic definition. But it is completely unproven and seems to me not at all probable that the exercise of the papal teaching authority will continue in this way in the future. The future history of doctrine of Christianity and the Church seems to me to be tending, not toward a further material differentiation of the substance of Christian faith, but toward a new expression of the ultimate basic substance of Christianity required and made possible by the new mental climate and sociopolitical situation. The concrete exercise of the papal teaching primacy would also have to be understood accordingly if it is to endure in the future.

Unfortunately, it is impossible here to offer a precise substantiation of this prognosis of the future history of dogma and thus also of the concrete way in which the papal teaching primacy will be exercised. Otherwise it would be necessary to offer a precise analysis of the mental climate of the world and of world civilisation, of the present-day irreversible pluralism in a world that is nevertheless one, and thus to clarify the secular historical background to the life of faith in the modern world-Church. But this, too, is not possible here. I am sure however that from this standpoint a prognosis would be possible for the future exercise of the papal teaching primacy, a prognosis making clear to the Protestant Christian that the papal magisterium in the future will inevitably and readily be concentrated on the defence and a new up-to-date statement of the basic substance of Christianity which is just as dear and as natural to that Christian as it is to us Catholics. To sum up, it could be said that if the future themes of the papal teaching authority and the direction of its impact were clearly and frankly stated by Rome and if at the same time the procedure now possible and necessary for Rome to arrive at the truth and make a decision were made clearer and more patently observed, the Vatican doctrine of the papal teaching primacy should no longer be as hitherto a spectre disturbing the faith and conscience of the Protestant Christian. At the same time the question remains entirely open whether in the foreseeable future any papal ex cathedra decisions at all need be expected or whether there are reasons for assuming that this is unlikely.

Finally, a word about the open questions involved in the two Marian dogmas defined by Pius IX and Pius XII. In themselves and as the only really concrete examples of ex cathedra decisions by the [50] pope alone, they are also among the stumbling blocks for Protestant and Orthodox Christians in regard to the Roman Church created since Trent.

As far as the first of the Marian dogmas is concerned, I venture to suggest that a possible orthodox further development of the dogma of original sin may make it easier to prove than by an appeal to revelation in the strict sense and thus to remove also the offensive and incredible features that Protestant Christians see in it. If we want to elucidate the dogma of original sin today with reference to all human beings and at the same time equally clearly and unmistakably to grasp by faith the fact that every Adamite human being, even in an infralapsarian state, always and from the very beginning comes within the scope of God's supernaturally beneficent salvific will (a salvific will that does not merely imply an intention on God's part, but is a supernatural existential of the offer of grace presented always and everywhere), then original sinfulness is not simply a state chronologically prior to the offer of grace to freedom: it is 'dialectically' co-existent with the offer of salvation and grace as a determination of man, who is always and everywhere in his situation of freedom descended simultaneously from both Adam and Christ and freely ratifies one situation of freedom or the other. If it is recalled that Mary also is redeemed by Christ – that is, she is in need of redemption and this need is among the permanent existentials of her existence – then the normal infralapsarian human being and Mary are not really distinguished because of a difference in a period of time at the beginning of existence, but because Mary receives the offer of grace to her freedom in virtue of her predestination to be the mother of Jesus and consequently as an offer efficaciously prevailing and as such also perceptible in salvation history. A Protestant theology of pure grace, efficacious as such, should not really find this distinction offensive. The dogma of the Immaculate Conception does not necessarily imply that the beginning of grace for her is different in a temporal sense from what it is for us, who likewise do not receive grace for salvation as a permanent existential of our freedom for the first time only in baptism.

It might be almost easier to achieve an agreement with Protestant theology on the second

Marian dogma. For the content of the doctrine of the Assumption does not imply that Mary's 'bodily' assumption into heaven is a privilege granted (apart from Jesus) to her [51] alone. It was obvious, for instance, to the Fathers of the Church that the Old Testament patriarchs in limbo at the time of Christ's resurrection entered bodily into their eternal bliss. If today, as against a Platonizing interpretation of the 'separation of body and soul' at death, we may certainly hold that every human being acquires his risen body at death, 'at that very moment' (in so far as terms relating to time make sense in this respect), a view often maintained in Protestant theology and quite legitimate with the aid of a little justifiable demythologizing, then this dogma does not refer to something granted to Mary alone, but to what belongs generally to all who are saved, while appropriate to her in a special way in virtue of her function in salvation history and consequently more clearly understood in the Church's sense of faith than it is in other human beings. It can therefore be said that even in regard to these two Marian dogmas there need be no insuperable point of controversy, if the open questions undoubtedly involved also in these dogmas are clearly recognized.

On the whole, the Catholic theologian may rightly assume that there are no theological opinions today that can be shown with certainty to be absolutely binding on one side or the other in a sense that would necessitate and authorize a division of the churches. We are speaking of the present time. It might of course be said that, if there are no such diversities of opinion today justifying a division of the churches, they could not have existed in the past, which however is unlikely. Against this objection it must be said that an agreement on articles of faith, always possible in principle, needs also to be explicitly grasped as possible and this requires time and history, the length of which cannot be a priori decided and defined. Moreover it must be remembered that the schism of the sixteenth century involved not only the fact that no explicit agreement had been reached, but also an illegitimate disagreement in which both sides were at fault in regard to a linguistic usage on the part of the Catholic Church: a rejection of a common language which was not necessarily an objectively existing heretical opposition, but which in any case had a schismatic character, even though this opposition does not perhaps persist everywhere today.

If we say that present-day theology no longer sees any insuperable points of dogmatic controversy or any antagonism implying a clear and straightforward mutual contradictory opposition between the [52] teachings of the actual churches, if, that is, we think that in ecumenical questions the task is no longer really one for theologians but for the authorities in the Church, that the latter may not regretfully shrug their shoulders and blame everything on the disagreement of the theologians, this of course does not mean that the theologians no longer have any ecumenical task. The possible, already existing, or emerging agreement between the teachings of the separated churches must of course be much better elucidated and worked out in detail. It is the task of the theologians to make clear to the Church's magisterium in Rome, which is still a long way from adequately assimilating present-day entirely orthodox theology, that in theological terms agreement already exists today or is immediately possible: these theologians must seek to gain an understanding in Rome for different theological languages which could legitimately bring the separated churches into the unity of the Church; they must gain an understanding in Rome for the fact that there is a legitimate pluralism in the theologies of the one Church of the one faith, a pluralism that can certainly have an effect on the understanding of faith and the practice of the life of the particular churches. If a dogmatic agreement of the separated churches is considered possible today, the question of course remains open as to who on the Protestant side is the authorized partner, who can decide that an agreement on faith is binding. For within the Protestant Churches there are of course groups and theologies with which this agreement cannot be established, since these groups and theologians are plainly opposed to the basic substance of Christian faith and consequently cannot be positively included in this agreement. This means of course that new questions are raised that cannot be discussed here.

Traditional neoscholastic theology, in which we were trained and which still prevails in Rome despite Vatican II more or less as a matter of course and is put forward without hesitation also in present-day Roman doctrinal statements, overlooked many questions which the binding dogma of the Church leaves open. This neglect of open questions then leads all too easily to a tacitly accepted interpretation of the binding dogma which is simply amalgamated with that dogma as if this interpretation were an intrinsic element of the dogma itself. But then there arise misunderstandings of the actual dogma which make it difficult or impossible for Protestant Christians to rediscover in Catholic teaching their own Christian [53] faith. Here lies an important task of modern Catholic theology as a part of its ecumenical work. It is a question not only of misunderstandings existing among Protestant Christians in regard to Catholic dogma, but of those which we ourselves – Catholic Christians and theologians – have and wrongly identify with Catholic dogma. Our work therefore consists, not merely in the enlightenment of non-Catholic Christians and theologians, but before that in enlightening ourselves and in purifying our own faith from misunderstandings which we ourselves overconfidently and apathetically continue to drag along with us.

MAGISTERIUM AND THEOLOGY

The theme ‘magisterium and theology’ is certainly not without current interest for the educated Catholic, if we think of the new conflicts which have arisen recently between the Roman Congregation for the Doctrine of Faith and theologians all over the world and which have gained the interest also of a wider public. The educated Catholic is concerned with conflicts of this kind, since the questions raised are not restricted to the narrower field of specialist theology, but also affect the life of the ordinary Catholic; he is also concerned because in these cases at the present time on the one hand his sympathies are mostly on the side of the ‘progressive’ theologians and yet on the other hand as a devout Catholic he is prepared to respect the Church’s magisterium. Our theme then may be expected to interest the educated Catholic, even if he is not a professional theologian.

It is clear in the first place that only a few observations on this theme are possible here, since a comprehensive and exhaustive treatment would require a very large book. Even then the theme might be discussed in a variety of ways. It would be possible to attempt to state more or less precisely and to justify the teaching of the Church’s magisterium about itself, which alone would be a considerable and difficult task. But this is not the procedure to be adopted here. Certainly, this teaching of the magisterium about itself must be briefly recalled at the beginning. But then, as far as this is possible in a brief space, there ought to be some discussion of problems, viewpoints, and connections between theology and magisterium, which are not adequately considered in the teaching of this magisterium but are nevertheless important for the present-day relationship [55] between magisterium and theology and have to be understood up to a point also by someone who is not a professional theologian but who shares in the life and thought of the Church.

First of all then we may recall as briefly as possible the more important theological statements made by the Church’s magisterium about itself as the content of its self-understanding, assuming that these statements are presented by the magisterium on the whole as absolutely binding, as dogma of the Catholic Church. The Church is instituted by Jesus Christ, has its origin from him, however this institution or origin is to be precisely understood, which is also something that cannot be discussed here. As a result of this provenance the Church is to form the permanent presence of Jesus Christ in the world, the public presence of the faith that in Jesus Christ the irrevocable and victorious word of God’s promise went out into the world and will never perish. The Church, understood in this way, has a sociological structure also by the very fact that it is a community of faith. It is not merely a community of believers forming a unity in Christ; it has a mandate and a mission to attest and proclaim this faith to the world. It can fulfill both these requirements (unity of the same faith and mission of proclamation) as a sociologically structured entity only if there is in it a concretely palpable and legally competent authority, which provides in a special (but not exclusive) sense for the task of the unity of faith in the Church and the active proclamation of this faith to the world.

It is true that such an official legal authority is obviously not something confronting the Church as superior to the latter, but is itself fundamentally sustained by the victorious power of the Spirit of Christ, who alone in the last resort guarantees the permanency of the one faith in Jesus Christ, crucified and risen, and the strength to make the Christian message effective. But this very fact means that the historical sociological character of the Church as Jesus’ community of faith does not exclude but includes the presence in this community of a personal, legally competent authority, who undertakes the task above-mentioned in a special way in the power of the Spirit of Christ. According to Catholic ecclesiology, the concrete bearers of this function, who form this authority, are present in the whole episcopate of the Catholic Church with and under the Bishop of Rome, the pope; the latter is not purely and simply primus inter pares in the episcopal college, but (without canceling the fundamental [56] and ultimate magisterial authority of the episcopate as a whole) as an individual official person combines in himself this teaching authority of the entire episcopate, although at the same time the pope acts precisely as legally competent head of this episcopate as a whole. This supreme teaching authority, itself composed of pope and total episcopate in unity, exercises its function either in the activity of what is called the ordinary magisterium (that is, by the normal doctrinal proclamation which takes place generally everywhere in the most varied shapes and forms in the Church) or in an extraordinary way (as, for instance, in councils); but we shall not be concerned with the question of which ways of utilizing this magisterium belong precisely to its ordinary or to its extraordinary activity (whether, for example, a papal encyclical represents one form or the other of the magisterium).

According to the Catholic understanding of the Church, this magisterium has also a formal authority: that is, while it obviously must justify its individual doctrinal statements from the heart of Christian faith, from Scripture, in the light of the assured faith of the whole Church, this authority of the magisterium, in order to make its impact on the faith and conscience of the individual Christian, must be recognized by the latter in a decision of faith which is not itself based on the authority of the magisterium, but has a more fundamental character. In other words, the authority of this magisterium for the Catholic Christian is not justified merely by the weight of the relevant arguments presented by the magisterium for its individual doctrinal statements or by the appreciation of the individual Catholic of the importance of these arguments, but by the very fact that this teaching authority as it is grasped in principle from the outset in faith speaks in virtue of the legitimate utilization of its mandate. It is impossible here to develop the Catholic teaching on the criteria according to which the formal legitimacy of this magisterium can and in principle also must be established for the particular case.

In its ordinary and extraordinary teaching, however, the magisterium can make use of its authority in very varying degrees and in fact simply cannot concretely avoid this gradation. It can speak with ultimate binding force (that is, it can demand for its teaching a real and definitive assent of faith) and in this sense impose its teaching as irreformable and finally binding: it can proclaim a dogma. But it can also teach in such a way that a theological doctrine is put forward as [57] ‘authentic’ (as it is usually described) and yet not as ultimately binding, and thus the question remains open (even though this is generally not expressly stated) as to whether this teaching may not turn out later to be in need of completion or even to be erroneous. It is important for the educated Catholic today to understand that the magisterium can not only exercise its function by proclaiming dogmas properly so-called, that is, it need not be faced from the outset by the dilemma of proclaiming a dogma or simply of being silent. In order to be able to present the Christian faith as one and whole concretely, vividly and in a way that corresponds to particular historical situations, the magisterium must be able to put forward also provisional, more or less problematic and yet not simply nonbinding statements, since without these the Christian faith as one and whole cannot be vividly conveyed and really assimilated by the faithful in a particular historical situation. The sense of faith of the Church as a whole is like the self-understanding of a particular individual, which is always a synthesis involved in an historical process, a synthesis on the one hand of maxims grasped with absolute assent and on the other of provisional understandings formed by a person to the best of his knowledge and judgment: a self-understanding that is quite impossible without such a synthesis.

Even though theology formulates quite manageable principles, according to which it is possible to distinguish between a dogma and a merely authentic teaching, in the concrete case doubts and differences of opinion can persist also in regard to this distinction, particularly since the concrete practice of the Roman magisterium today with reference to these merely authentic declarations is almost always to avoid any explicit statement to the effect that it is a question merely of an authentic but not definitive comment of the Church's magisterium. It cannot be denied that such an authentic doctrinal pronouncement not only can in principle be erroneous, but in the course of history often has been actually erroneous; this is expressly admitted in a pastoral letter of the German episcopate on the magisterium, even though the Roman authorities on the doctrine of faith scarcely ever explicitly withdraw such concrete errors at a later date and prefer tacitly to bury them. Even according to the teaching of the Second Vatican Council the Catholic theologian is not simply free and uncommitted in regard to such an authentic teaching of the magisterium he owes it respect. But how exactly this respect for the [58] teaching can co-exist with the possibility of error in that teaching (that is, with the possibility and necessity of allowing for error and thus with the progress of theological discussion) is something on which no sufficiently clear information can be found in the teaching of the Church's magisterium. In their pastoral letter previously mentioned, the German bishops made some suggestions in this respect which were important for their Königstein declaration on Humanae Vitae. But the Roman magisterium itself can hardly be said to have spoken at all hitherto about the precise question of how the acknowledgment of a certain binding force of a purely authentic doctrinal declaration on the one hand can co-exist with the necessity and possibility of allowing for an error in that declaration on the other hand in the theoretical consciousness and in the conscience of the theologian and the believer, without cancelling each other out. To facilitate the understanding of such a possibility, we may certainly point to the situation in practical life of an individual consciousness where there are norms and principles of action which are understood and regarded as provisionally valid with the reservation that a later and better insight may lead to their revision.

As we said, the holder of this teaching authority in the Church is the episcopate as a whole with and under the pope. But, in connection with their teaching, the theologians, too, of course have a definite and necessary function in the Church, particularly if in the light of the Church's history it is assumed as an inescapable fact that the function of the theologian and that of the holder of the teaching office properly so-called are generally not combined in one person, but in practice today and for a long time have been assigned to different persons. From the nature of the case there will be more to be said later about this function of the theologians. There has been some talk here and there of a 'magisterium' of theologians and even attempts to refer to biblical evidence for this. But, without prejudice to a real and indispensable function of the theologians, it is better to avoid the term 'magisterium' in this connection, because it leads to misunderstandings arising from the fact that in one and the same society with reference to the same task there cannot really be two offices distinct from one another. In statements by the magisterium of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries the relationship between magisterium and theologians is described on the whole in a way that assigns to theologians only a function of further and more subtle [59] interpretation of the teaching of the magisterium and of defending this teaching by showing that it is contained in the original sources of revelation: theologians are thus assigned merely a subordinate auxiliary function in the service of the magisterium. We shall see shortly that this view, taken by itself, does not do justice to the actual data or requirements of the Church's proclamation. But what has been said up to now may suffice to indicate the traditional teaching of the Church's magisterium about itself. We are coming only now to our proper subject matter which, as we pointed out at the beginning, does not consist in the repetition and substantiation of the Church's teaching on the magisterium as it actually exists, but is concerned with a further and unclarified question which may be of interest, not only to the professional theologian, but also to the educated Catholic of the present time.

It is not easy to pinpoint in advance in a few words what is to be the object of our reflections, to state the 'thesis' to be defended here, to indicate from what different aspects the matter under consideration can be approached. Without putting forward a systematically formulated thesis, we may now suggest a number of observations which seem to be important for a more exact clarification of the relationship between magisterium and theology, but without setting out these observations systematically. First of all, in the whole history of dogma and theology it can be observed that the actual dogmatic substance of faith as put forward by the magisterium in the Church's proclamation is itself always theology. In this statement 'theology' means the fact or circumstance that the dogma to be stated and proclaimed is formulated with the aid of concepts, horizons of understanding, terminologies, selective considerations, shifts of emphasis, etc., which in a particular mental climate are or can be quite legitimately and concretely unavoidable and necessary, but on their own account do not themselves possess the dignity of dogma as such. The dogma is inevitably always formulated with the aid of theology, which itself is not dogma: that is, it is not as such revealed and irreformable. Even dogma properly so called is always a synthesis of what is properly and originally revealed and of human reflection, which is not actually revealed but is, precisely, theology. The successful achievement of such a synthesis, when it is a question [60] of a dogma properly so called, can be guaranteed by the defining authority of the magisterium, but a statement of this kind always remains a synthesis: a statement whose dogmatic validity and irreformability does not exclude but includes the fact that, despite its inerrancy, it is open to the future for a new form of expression, to be worked out with the tools of a different theology, to be stated in different terms, against different backgrounds of understanding, under the influence of different theological truths, etc. If this were not the case we could not speak even of a legitimate pluralism of theologies in Scripture, new and hitherto unknown terms now sanctioned by the magisterium could not appear in dogmatic statements: in a word, there would be no history of dogma, but at most a history of theology.

Unfortunately it cannot be illustrated here by concrete examples from the history of dogma, but the fact is that theology is always at work in the formation of dogma itself, that theology cannot simply be merely the subsequent reflection on dogma, not affecting the dogma itself. Theology therefore is an intrinsic element of that very process which is behind the Church's proclamation and carried out by the magisterium. This is true even when concretely and in practice the representatives of the magisterium and the representatives of speculative theology are not identical. When representatives of the magisterium teach and define, they have themselves also been theologians or have made use, explicitly or implicitly, of the help of theologians. This can be seen even more clearly when we consider that the actual history of the activity of the magisterium has scarcely been under the latter's own control. In practice in its defining or authentic doctrinal statements the magisterium sanctions a development of the Church's sense of faith which had been stimulated and sustained by unofficial theology before this sanctioning. In this respect the magisterium is always and in principle dependent on theology, even though this dependence is not of a legal character, even though it follows from this very fact that the representative of the magisterium in the exercise of his task cannot by any means avoid being himself something of a theologian, since (as it is stressed, for instance, in the Second Vatican Council) he must make sure that his decision is authorized by the original sources and data of revelation, by Scripture and binding tradition, by Christian teaching as a whole; in other words, the function of his office may not be confused [61] with a magico-mechanical process on the basis of its purely formal authority.

Theology does not merely precede the proclamation of the magisterium in the sense described (since any proclamation from the very outset inevitably contains an element of reflection, which as such is not simply identical with the primordial event of revelation) but also necessarily follows after this proclamation, a subsequent reflection which cannot be regarded as unimportant for the proclamation of the magisterium itself. Any dogmatic proclamation of the Church by the ordinary or extraordinary magisterium, if it is really to be understood, must be able to 'get across', must always also be interpreted, explained, adapted to the general and even secular horizons of understanding of those who hear it, although this task could not be said or expected to be adequately accomplished solely by the magisterium itself in its official proclamation. This is not the case, nor could so much be expected from the magisterium when it is actually teaching authoritatively. The very fact that this teaching is imposed as binding means that it inevitably falls short to some extent of the presentation of the proclamation of faith as the latter actually 'gets across' to the particular hearer in his own intellectual, cultural, and historical situation.

Strictly binding formulation of doctrine by the magisterium, valid for the Church as a whole, is inevitably something traditional in an 'old fashioned' way; it brings the Church's memory with binding force into the present, without on that account being able always to make this memory completely an actual possession of the present time. This of course does not mean that a pope or bishop cannot preach in a way that will make the message completely topical. But by that very fact such a representative of the magisterium is acting as a theologian, he works with terms, horizons of understanding and ways of access to the message which belong to the present time and with which at least generally he has no absolute guarantee that his synthesis between the binding content of his message and his present-day means of expression will certainly and entirely succeed; at the same time he is also necessarily always 'only' a theologian who speaks on his own account and at his own risk and must wait to see whether and how the concrete shape of his preaching and proclamation is recognized in the Church's sense of faith as a successful synthesis of the old faith and the present-day understanding of it.

[62] A further task of theology, subsequent to the Church's teaching but indispensable and continually to be observed in its actual achievement, consists in examining again and again the synthesis just mentioned between what is really consciously accepted in faith and its historically conditioned means of expression, to see whether it can still be adequately assimilated in faith or whether it needs to be expressed in ways more easily accessible today; it is particularly necessary to discover whether the older formulations, while remaining permanently valid, do not actually contain amalgams which, notwithstanding the normative character of the formulations, can and even must be eliminated. In this connection some of the many concrete examples from the history of dogma would facilitate a better understanding, but it is impossible to cite them here. At least one example however can be mentioned.

Up to the time of Pius XII all formulations of the permanent Catholic teaching on original sin had taken monogenism for granted. Today we can and must see that this assumption is uncertain or false, that it is an amalgam which is not binding and can be eliminated from the permanent teaching on original sin, precisely in order to render credible the proclamation of this dogma. From this indispensable task of theology, subsequent to the function of the magisterium, it becomes clear that statements of the magisterium (not only authentic statements but also definitions of dogma) do not simply represent an endpoint, a conclusion which needs only to be repeated and defended, but are continually involved in an unfinished and never to be completed process which itself is not actually inaugurated and cannot be completely controlled by the magisterium and the results of which in the future cannot clearly be foreseen. This continuing process – as the history of dogma shows – can of course again lead to new statements which are put forward as binding by the magisterium itself and guaranteed by the latter's formal authority. It can often but need not always be like this. But, either way, the history of faith with reference to a particular reality of faith is not closed but continues.

Even from these few observations, which can be made in regard to the Church's history of dogma and doctrine and which might be complemented by many others more exact, it can be seen how complicated is the relationship between magisterium and theology. For faith and its history the magisterium is not the primary and most [63] fundamental datum, since its existence and formal authority must be established and grasped by revelation and faith as prior to the magisterium itself; the magisterium always works with a theology which always precedes it as the means of its own proclamation, although this theology may not be adequately and thoroughly considered in its origin, in its usefulness, and in its pluralism by the magisterium, but is used by the latter in a trust in the power of the self-revealing Spirit of God who is not really subject to the reflection of the magisterium. If and when the magisterium has fulfilled its function for the time being on any particular occasion, the work of theology continues and does not consist merely in proving the legitimate derivation of statements of the magisterium from the sources of revelation and in defending these statements in face of critical reason, but also always leads again beyond the statements and by that very fact provides the magisterium again with an opportunity to say something new and not merely to repeat the old formulations. The magisterium and its statements are therefore a normative authority for theology, but conversely theology is an indispensable condition of existence and effective survival for the magisterium, without which the latter itself could not exist or act at all. Between magisterium and theology then there is a relationship of mutual dependence with a character of course proper to each occasion: a mutual dependence in which neither of the two elements can be completely derived from the other, a mutual dependence whose indissoluble unity is guaranteed in the last resort, not by the magisterium itself, but only by the unity of the Church, by revelation itself and the power of the Spirit of God. Within this unity the magisterium has its own and necessary function, but it is not the whole and not really the most fundamental datum from which all the rest could be deduced. Despite the commission of the apostles and their episcopal successors, its function from God and Jesus Christ is only a partial function in the Church, which is conceivable only in the totality of the Church (which is more than the magisterium) and can be shown to be legitimate and become actually effective only within this totality.

Between the individual constitutive elements of the Church (original revelation, continually renewed reflection on it in practice and theory, magisterium as event of perceptible unity concretely coming to be again and again in faith, sacrament, etc.) there exists a continual reciprocal causality, which is the history of the truth of the [64] Church and as such history sustained, controlled, and freely governed by the Spirit of God and not in the last resort by the magisterium itself. This history, never completely under the control of human beings, not even of officeholders in the Church, also always contains the relationship between magisterium and theology within its ceaseless course and thus always implies also an irremoveable historicity of the magisterium itself, of theology in the Church, of the mutual relationship between these two, a historicity consequently which maintains their permanency while continually transforming the concrete shape of their relationship, without any possibility of foreseeing clearly what this concrete shape will be in the future. The legal structure of the magisterium therefore, despite a formal definability in itself and in its relationship to theology, in its concreteness is always involved also in a process of historical change. What must be concretely the relationship of the magisterium to theology and of theology to the magisterium is not something clearly evident once and for all, but is always to be discovered afresh through new experiences in new forms.

I am acutely aware of the fact that I have spoken very abstractly about the relationship between magisterium and theology. Unfortunate as it may be, it was not possible to elucidate the meaning of this with the aid of concrete examples and individual cases. It may all become a little more clear and understandable if in what follows an attempt is made to put forward some more or less concrete and practical conclusions from these considerations of principle, which may be of some importance also for the non-theologian.

(1) Not only on the part of theologians, but also on the part of representatives of the magisterium, there must be a genuine will for dialogue. It has often been said and not entirely incorrectly that the magisterium does not discuss, but decides. It is of course true that it is not a question here of a dialogue in which the partners have the same function. But it would be wrong to suggest that the magisterium itself is dispensed from practising theology in this dialogue, that it can rely as if by magic on its formal authority and the justification of this alone, that it need not allow for error in its purely authentic doctrinal statements, that it cannot also fall short in decisions involving a definition; it would be wrong to assume that even definitions cannot turn out better or worse, may not be more or less easy to assimilate, that they cannot integrate into themselves to a [65] greater or lesser extent the totality of what was to be defined; it would also be wrong to claim that even definitions may not include assumptions, use terminology, or imply amalgams that are inadequate or even false and therefore can be eliminated, even though these need not always be noticed explicitly by the representatives of the magisterium at the time of the definition. If the representatives of the magisterium are clearly aware of all this, it will become clear that they can exercise their function properly only in a genuine dialogue with theology, even though the partners to the dialogue do not have the same function in this respect.

(2) From this it follows certainly that declarations of the magisterium today and in future will have to show more evidence than was generally shown formerly of the necessary preceding dialogue with theology and a greater readiness for dialogue on the part of representatives of the magisterium. It may and must indeed be definitely established that these declarations of the magisterium are not simply expressions of opinion on the part of a few Roman theologians who happen to be engaged in dialogue with one another, expressions of opinion which are worth no more than the arguments put forward, the importance of which is to be judged wholly and entirely by those to whom they are submitted. But none of this excludes the necessity for the magisterium today also to put forward expressly and clearly arguments of its own, which of course it must have, and the desirability of an explicit indication by the magisterium in its declaration of the extent to which its teaching is binding, in other words, whether the declaration is presented as authentic or as dogma properly so-called. Any such explicit qualification has been omitted by the Roman authorities up to the present time. It is assumed that the qualification will be immediately obvious to theologians in the light of the traditional rules; an explicit qualification is omitted evidently because it is thought that an official dogmatic statement will not be taken sufficiently seriously or respected if it is expressly assigned by the teaching authorities themselves the quality of merely an authentic (that is, in principle reformable) teaching, if the impression is not created that the teaching put forward is basically irreformable.

Apart however from the fact that a procedure of this kind creates among theologians and other believers the impression of a certain lack of sincerity and can lead to conflicts of conscience which are objectively entirely superfluous (we may recall, for instance, Humanae [66] Vitae), the method does not help the dialogue between magisterium and theology. Even when it is a question of teaching that is absolutely binding, of a dogma, this dialogue is not closed but can and must always be carried forward; but it is particularly appropriate when it is a question of merely authentic statements of the magisterium. But the exact form of dialogue is often different and the opportunities are greater when it is settled from the outset and clearly and expressly stated that it is a question merely of authentic teaching, which certainly must be taken seriously by the theologian and which acquires in virtue of the formal authority of the magisterium a different importance from that of any odd theological opinion; nevertheless it is in principle reformable and can be scrutinized and questioned by theologians in an entirely different way from what is possible with a dogma properly so-called, which cannot really be doubted, even though it can and occasionally must always be open to an interpretation leading with the aid of different conceptual methods to a better, more comprehensively integrating formulation. The Roman authorities on faith should not think that they are forfeiting their effectiveness and power if they make immediately clear by such a qualification the possible and justified continuation of dialogue with the theologians. Even faith and still more purely authentic teachings of the Church, which at least hitherto have been just that, are involved in a history that is not and cannot be closed. This history however should not be carried on by confrontations between magisterium and heretical positions of theologians, but by dialogue in which both partners unequivocally respect the unrenounceable function of whoever happens to be the other partner at the time. This respect demands from the magisterium in theory and practice an appreciation of the fact that theology is not merely the executive assistant of the magisterium, does not merely prepare the way for it or define it, but has a critical function that goes further and is irreplaceable. This is all the more important since the Church's sense of faith in practice and theology is much richer, more differentiated and active than could be objectified and set out by declarations of the magisterium alone.

(3) In this dialogue magisterium and theology must always allow for the fact that they take up positions in regard to one another which are absolutely correct, even binding in faith, and are expressly presented as such, but which nevertheless (although this is [67] not always immediately noticed by both sides) are amalgamated with ideas, terms, horizons of understanding, etc., which are not binding in faith and perhaps can be and, at a particular stage in the history of ideas, must be eliminated. If and when on the one hand such amalgams have perhaps turned up in statements actually binding in faith, but on the other hand were not noticed by one or other or both partners to the dialogue, there emerge the real situations of tension between magisterium and theology would could by no means have been avoided from the very outset, even though they are solvable in principle. The important thing in this respect of course is not the term 'amalgam'. In a more subtle and exact philosophical and theological theory of truth and its historicity it would certainly be possible to dispense with the term 'amalgam' and replace it by something better. But, since a theory of this kind is not possible here, this term can bring out our meaning sufficiently.

If, for example, it is stated as teaching binding in faith that the Church is founded by Jesus, that the sacraments are likewise instituted by him, that a conversion of the substance of bread and wine takes place in the eucharist, that three 'persons' must be really distinguished in the unity of the one God, etc., the fact is that in former times it was more or less taken for granted that terms like 'institution', 'substance', 'person', used in these formulations were quite unambiguous and clear and consequently that there could be no doubt about the exact meaning of such statements. But today in the light of history, biblical theology, and the history of ideas we can see that such terms are not as unequivocal as they were once thought and assumed to be and that on the contrary particular forms of imagery, traditional assumptions, and horizons of understanding spontaneously occur, reverberate, or are implied in them, which have by no means the binding force of irreformable statements of faith but can or must be eliminated. Without questioning, for example, the dogma of transsubstantiation as defined at the Council of Trent, we cannot think of the substance of bread today in exactly the same way as the Fathers of Trent thought of it in the concrete. In view of Jesus' imminent expectation of the kingdom of God, admitted today even in Catholic biblical theology, it is impossible to understand what is meant concretely by his institution of the Church in precisely the same way as the magisterium and theology implied in former times when they proclaimed their assurance that Jesus [68] founded the Church, which (as we also obviously maintain) has its origin from Jesus and the enduring faith in his unsurpassable importance for salvation. In the light of the ever continuing history of ideas (not, obviously, under the control of the magisterium), it may well be doubted whether the term 'person' today in the doctrine of the Trinity produces more clarity and lucidity than misunderstanding and obscurity, without at the same time raising any doubts about the permanent binding force of the dogma of the Trinity.

The amalgamations just indicated between permanent dogma and historically conditioned terminology, conceptual models and assumptions, really provide perhaps the most important object of the dialogue between magisterium and theology. Up to the present time this has occurred, as can easily be understood, particularly in the field of morality, since in its traditional formulations (for example, with reference to what is known as 'natural law', to sexual morality and socio-ethical principles) inevitably very many historically conditioned elements are contained which can have no claim to permanent validity. In this connection the question of religious freedom discussed at the Second Vatican Council would be a good example, since the processes of elimination of amalgams from the hitherto traditional teaching here took place at the council itself. None of this means that the magisterium cannot also have the right and duty to draw attention to newly formulated positions of theologians which not only eliminate time-conditioned amalgams, but perhaps even violate what must be the permanent substance of the dogma concerned. If, for example, a theologian were to deny outright the real and necessary origin of the Church and the sacraments from Jesus or to formulate a theory of God which simply eradicated what belongs to the essence of the dogma of the Trinity, the magisterium would then obviously have the right and duty unambiguously to oppose such positions. But, since in a dialogue of this kind between magisterium and theology it may often remain uncertain for a long time whether a new formulation by a theologian merely legitimately eliminates traditional amalgams or violates or denies the substance of the dogma, it is not surprising that these dialogues need time, involve conflicts, lead to justified and also unjustified and avoidable disciplinary measures of the Church going as far as the removal of a theologian from office, and cannot quickly be ended on one side or another by an authoritative decision, which theologians also often permit themselves.

[69] Hearing of these conflicts with their unnecessarily lengthy processes of clarification, the person who is not an expert in theology, the ordinary believer, can scarcely avoid a feeling of insecurity or impatience; he is inclined to declare that everything has become confused and blurred in the Church's life of faith and in its proclamation, that he no longer knows where he stands. Objectively speaking, this is not entirely true since, for the Christian who really wants to believe and who respects the magisterium of the Church, the real basic substance of his faith even today remains clear and obvious, and since, when periods of uncertainty and of controversies between magisterium and theology have to be endured, patience and confidence can be required also from the normal Christian. This is all the more obvious since a close examination reveals the fact that there were similar periods in early Church history and we may well think that they were brought to an end too quickly as a result of a pronouncement of the magisterium on one question or another, so that at least contradictions which were verbal but looked like objective heresies were consolidated, although they really could have been avoided if only more patience and readiness for dialogue had been shown on all sides at those times.

In any case the question of a new and more exact interpretation of the Church's teaching and also of its dogmas with the aid of a possible elimination of amalgams handed down at the same time is one of the most important objects of the dialogue between magisterium and theology and inevitably brings with it conflicts that are not always easy to settle between magisterium and theologians, conflicts that are simply part of the historicity of revelation. These conflicts cannot be avoided if only because a theologian before publishing his views cannot inquire first from the magisterium whether these are acceptable and because processes of learning are unavoidable and necessary also for representatives of the magisterium itself: for their own and (properly understood) normative sense of faith is not simply a rigid norm free from all historicity, but has itself a history. Of course the demand for dialogue does not mean (as theologians today often seem to think it means) that 'dialogue' has to go on until agreement is reached between like-minded people, rendering any actual decision of the magisterium superfluous. In a dialogue of this kind real decisions of the magisterium can and sometimes must be made in virtue of its formal authority, they must be respected by theologians to the extent required by their particular binding force. [79] But neither does the fact of such a decision and the duty of theologians to respect it mean that after these declarations of the magisterium all dialogue is at an end and the theologians have nothing more to do but to hand on and defend the decision. Even after such a decision the dialogue can and must go on, albeit with new assumptions. For such a decision does not leave everything quite clear, since respect for it still leaves open the question of what it does and does not contain, whether it also implicitly transmits amalgams which are not purely and simply binding, how the decision can be conveyed to the Christian of today in a way that is perhaps better than the way adopted by the magisterium itself, whether there may not be an error in purely authentic doctrinal statements. The dialogue can and must go on.

(4) In such a dialogue between magisterium and theology something else is desirable, on which we touched at an earlier stage. When the magisterium claims to be exercising its formal authority, it would be desirable and it would help toward a more exact shaping of the continuing dialogue if the magisterium itself were to state explicitly and in a new, hitherto undeveloped and unconsidered way the degree of binding force (which is not always the same) to be attached to its declaration, thus making clear what is known as the theological qualification of the latter.

This of course has happened in the course of the last hundred and thirty years when there was a question of properly ex cathedra decisions involving a definition. But ultimately binding decisions of this kind are rare and have actually occurred only twice in the course of the centuries since the Council of Trent. In former times however, at least up to the beginning of the nineteenth century, a theological qualification was often added to declarations of the magisterium; but after that, it was almost always omitted. In earlier times there was an enormous number of such abstract and formal theological qualifications, the terminology and meaning of which can now be grasped only with difficulty. Today certainly there is not much to be done with these traditional qualifications. It would therefore be a task for theologians, which has not yet been tackled at all, to produce a meaningful and manageable system of these formal qualifications: a task which could be accomplished by the magisterium only with difficulty. But if a theologically well-founded, simple and yet meaningfully articulated scheme of such graded qualifications [71] was freshly worked out from the very beginning and was available, the magisterium could be expected to add an explicit qualification indicating the degree of binding force to be attached to its individual declarations. The theologian and also the interested non-theologian would then know better for theology and practice what was really involved, exactly what measure of respect (certainly not the same in every case) they had to bring to such a declaration; neither would then so easily get the impression that the magisterium was demanding a higher and more binding degree of assent than can be required in the light of its own general principles. In this question the magisterium should not tacitly assume that its declaration would not be respected at all and would simply disappear in the subsequent dialogue, if it were itself to note explicitly in a new and really practicable way the limits of the binding force of that declaration. To get to this stage however, the theologians would have to do some preliminary work that they have not yet really tackled.

(5) A final point should be noted with reference to the relationship between theology and magisterium: we cannot restrict the formal legal competence of the latter as such more closely than it is restricted by the magisterium itself. But the magisterium defines its competence as extending to all that has to do with faith and Christian morality (de rebus fidei et morum), even though this does not clearly answer in every respect the question as to exactly what in the field of morality falls within the competence of the magisterium (as recent controversies have shown about the competence of the magisterium in regard to what is known as natural law, when the latter as such cannot simply be declared to be revealed) and even though it means that the question of the competence which the magisterium claims for itself seems to be still obscure and unsettled. But, however that may be, the fact remains that the task of the magisterium changes in practice to no small extent with the changing mental climate in which it has to operate in the course of history.

In our time we are faced by a pluralism that can no longer be adequately integrated – of philosophies, anthropologies, cultures not now restricted only to Europe – existing even within the Church itself, so that in the light of all these things theologies, too, are slowly but increasingly clearly emerging in the plural in the Church, theologies which, although centered on one and the same Christian faith, cannot be adequately integrated into one and the same theology [72] as it existed more or less until the middle of the present century, when in Japan, Africa, and Australia in the priests' seminaries the same theological textbooks as in Europe were used without any hesitation. Assuming that the existing Roman magisterium in all its necessary and also active efforts to gain an understanding and contact with all these plural theologies will continue at least in the immediate future to bear a European stamp and cannot represent all of them uniformly, then it can certainly be understood that the task of this magisterium in the time that is coming will not be so much the supervision of the detailed work of theology as the defence and vivid and up-to-date expression of the basic substance of the Christian faith. For the most varied reasons, which cannot be explained in detail here but largely result from the mental climate of the present time, we cannot in practice expect in the foreseeable future really new definitions like the two Marian dogmas of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. This is evident from the fact that the Second Vatican Council refrained from such dogmatic definitions in the strict sense of the term. For quite practical reasons in the immediate future the magisterium will have no other option but to leave for a longer time and more patiently to the theologians themselves and their work and discussion many individual theological questions in which it intervened very quickly and very decidedly in the nineteenth century and in the first half of the twentieth. Any other way would simply be impossible and would represent a dangerous waste of the practical effectiveness of the authority of the magisterium. This does not mean that the importance and the task of the magisterium are diminished, but only that they are moved into another field, which is much more fundamental and important.

At a time of worldwide secularism and atheism, threatening the basic substance of Christianity and at the same time giving a fresh shape to its themes, the magisterium ought constantly and with all the resources of the Spirit to find a way of conveying both uncurtailed and vividly that basic substance to today's and tomorrow's humanity, and particularly outside Europe. This is something which the magisterium has really scarcely attempted in the past centuries; it has been occupied with marginal areas in the hierarchy of truths of the Christian faith and beyond that has perhaps encouraged a number of special forms of Christian piety and Christian life, but very largely left the living testimony of the Christian faith in its basic [73] substance to preachers, teachers of Christian spirituality, and theologians. It seems that in this respect the task of the magisterium will have to change. It will have to be not so much merely doctrinal in regard to traditional teaching, but prophetic in such a way that the old faith and the questions of the day are brought into both vital and critical contact with each other. What this means concretely and how it could be concretely carried out is something that cannot be considered here. But it might perhaps be said that the magisterium could well become a little more theological, could undertake up to a point and in its own way tasks of the theologians that it may hitherto have left too much to the theologians and the preachers of the faith who were dependent on them. If we keep in mind the interconnection and mutual dependence of magisterium and theology of which we spoke, this new orientation of the task of the magisterium need not in the future come up against the protest that what is demanded of it is a living theology instead of the fulfillment of its specific task, which is not quite the same thing as theology. In the power of the Spirit of Christ, by common consent, magisterium and theology must work at the one task: to bear living witness to God and his crucified and risen Christ, to witness to the faith in which the final destiny of the world in the glory of God himself is victoriously grasped for all time.

Between magisterium and theology then there exists a very special relationship that makes it impossible to regard the magisterium as a factor with an impetus entirely of its own, as completely self-sufficient. If we may apply a trite comparison, it is a relationship akin to that between the bones and muscles of the body. The two differ in nature and function. And yet the bones can exercise their proper function only with the aid of the muscles and vice versa. The coordination of the two as such is guaranteed neither by the bones nor by the muscles alone, but only by the totality which is prior to the two factors, and lies in the power neither of the one nor of the other independently. So, too, not only is theology dependent on the magisterium, but the magisterium is also dependent on theology and inconceivable without the latter; and the connection and unity of the two is again not under the control of the magisterium but only under that of the Spirit, who directs the whole course of history.

ON BAD ARGUMENTS IN MORAL THEOLOGY

This article is intended to deal with an epistemological question in the field of moral theology, admittedly with the reservation that only a few vague remarks are possible in so brief an article on such a difficult theme, a theme that inevitably thrusts us very quickly from the particular concern with which we started into the most general questions of philosophical and theological epistemology.

It is a question in the first place of a quite straightforward observation which, at least in the author's opinion, continually occurs to anyone who is occupied with questions of moral theology. Moral theology contains arguments. In order to substantiate moral precepts, proofs, often very rigorous and subtle, are adduced; and yet we gain the impression that these proofs tacitly and without reflection really assume from the outset the very conclusion at which they aim, that the conclusions are, so to speak, smuggled into the premises of the argument (in good faith, of course) and that the proofs are convincing only to someone who was convinced of what was to be proved even before any proof was forthcoming.

We are not going to produce examples here to support the correctness of this observation. The reason for this omission here is easy to understand: we should otherwise have to enter into lengthy discussions as to whether the example fitted, whether, that is, the proof of a moral precept is evident only to someone who is convinced that the maxim is true prior to any proof. If then we wanted to produce proof of the appropriateness of the example to the observation just made, we would have to enter into considerations which go beyond [75] the scope of our present reflections. The reader is therefore requested to look for such examples from his own experience of moral theological discussions. If he finds them, well and good. If he thinks that he has never met with such experiences in his moral theology, this article has not in fact been written for him.

If however the observation to which we appealed is correct, it cannot be dismissed as the sort of trivial remark that occurs as a matter of course in any field of human study, simply because petitiones principii are found everywhere. In the light of an innocuous, normal logic of ordinary life and learning, it could indeed be said that this sort of thing does of course occur in moral theology, but only because it is part of the whole field of human error and must be eliminated as far as possible by continual strenuous efforts.

It is not however as simple as that – least of all in moral theology. Even though cases of this kind occur not only in moral theology, they are particularly evident there and for reasons that belong to the very nature of moral theology itself, in so far as the latter is a theoretical science which studies the practical behaviour of human beings. Here then we shall consider briefly the right and limits, not precisely of the observation from which we started out, but of what lies behind it and is not simply false. We are speaking of right and limits.

First of all there is the right of what lies behind the observation or indeed of what is in fact observed. When moral theology seeks with the aid of reflex argumentation to establish precepts for action, it is a question always (or almost always, or in ordinary life) of precepts which were put into practice in a person's behaviour even before they were given expression in theory. Theoretical reflections on norms of practical behaviour emerge from and are necessitated by what has already always occurred in practice. But, since it is supposed to be responsible and moral and when it is such, this practice has in itself in principle its own immanent experience of its rectitude. Hence (this is a truism, but one which is often overlooked in academic moral theological polemics on both sides of a dispute about the conclusiveness of a particular argument) it is possible that a necessarily subsequent theoretical reflection on a previous practice possibly containing its intrinsic evidence in itself does not by any means take in this evidence, interprets and conceptually objectifies it wrongly or inadequately, and yet the badly interpreted and [76] badly substantiated precept is right. Of course, this is always apparent to formal logic which insists that a conclusion can be true even if it does not follow from the premises, whether because the premises are false or not proved, or simply because this conclusion does not logically follow from correct premises.

This reference to formal logic however does not touch the real heart of the matter. For it in no way indicates whether and how the truth of the 'conclusion' can be known otherwise than by a correct argument. But in principle this is possible in the field of morality. In that field there can be a global, still implicit, but perhaps entirely correct and effective insight which is prior to theory, to conceptual articulation and objectification, which is itself the inner light of practice as such. This is something not to be forgotten in the appraisal of a moral theological argument. The appraisal may suggest that in a particular case this argument (taken purely in its explicit conceptuality and logical coherence) is wrong or not conclusive; but in such an appraisal it must not be forgotten that the argument criticized is really (also and in the first place) to be read as an appeal and reference to a global experience in which more can be contained than what becomes conceptually and logically explicit in the course of the argument. Any attempt to deny this would in principle mean starting out from an understanding of the relationship between practice and theory that is problematic or even false. (Here of course it is impossible to go into the difficult epistemological problems of the relationship between theory and practice, problems which constitute a large part of modern philosophy and fundamental theology.)

A bad argument in moral theology then is not simply 'disposed of' by showing that it is not logically conclusive. The person who rejects it must at least explain the fact of its existence and whether it is sufficient to say that it is false or not conclusive and only reveals the stupidity of those who argue in this way; the one who rejects the argument can be asked if he cannot see behind the terminology and conceptual reasoning the wisdom of a more fundamental experience struggling to break through its clumsy expression. A counter-question of this kind is justified and important particularly when the argument declared to be false or not conclusive is upheld, not merely by a single individual, but by many people, and was even perhaps put forward without opposition for centuries in the Church and is still widely maintained.

If these further questions are not raised, going behind the disputed [77] arguments of moral theology, there is a danger of a moral theological nihilism or scepticism or of a commonplace moral theological positivism, appealing solely to the simple fact of the existence of these badly proved convictions in the Church and leaving it at that. In other words, people see everywhere in moral theology an empty formalism with nothing but bad arguments and hair-splitting, insinuating what cannot really be proved; then they become sceptical in regard to all 'legality' (taking refuge in a pure 'situation ethic') or simply entrench themselves behind the formal authority of the magisterium, forgetting that this very magisterium in its purely authentic declarations can be subject to time- and situation-conditioned errors.

Seen more closely, what this sort of argument, inadequate in itself, implicitly indicates can be different in kind and quality. It can be a global knowledge of revelation, badly objectified in detail; it can be a question of an 'instinctive' human insight of a 'natural' character, which itself can be understood as taking on a variety of forms and perhaps as coming to be in a variety of ways in the course of the history of humanity.

The justifiable 'respect' given to a bad argument is bound to vary according to the special character of the truth that may lie behind it. If, for example, a correct global understanding of Christian revelation can be presumed behind an argument questionable in itself, then the latter must obviously be treated differently from another argument open to criticism where it is obvious from the outset that behind it there is a purely human preconception, which itself, much more easily than in the first case, can be problematic and historically or sociologically or culturally conditioned.

Admittedly, in order to be able to distinguish from the outset between the two approaches, it is necessary to have formally a principle to decide what can (and what cannot) really be regarded from the beginning as divine revelation. But this problem of a formal criterion has never or scarcely ever been considered in normal textbook theology, even though for understandable reasons it could be of great importance particularly for moral theology, if only because the competence of the Church's magisterium in the field of revelation properly so called is certainly not identical with its competence in the field of what is known as (pure) natural law. But these of course are problems that cannot be pursued further here.

If then the Church's magisterium defends a particular moral precept [78] and (which is quite possible) does so with bad arguments, the critic of these arguments, the individual moral theologian, must certainly allow for this possibility. He may perhaps therefore have the task also of defending the correct precept with better arguments and of making it more intelligible than the magisterium is able to do, for in these things the latter cannot expect to bring a higher enlightenment to its reasoning but must make use of the arguments generally found in the Church's moral theology.

So much then on the 'right' that can exist behind a bad argument in moral theology, presented perhaps in a certain way without meeting any opposition and often sustained by a long history of moral theological teaching in the Church, since the conviction of the correctness of what was to be proved prevailed long before the appearance of the proof itself – now however we must look at the limits of this right. And these are perhaps more important for the practice of the Church's moral theology and of the Church's magisterium. The tacitly and implicitly operating prior conviction of the correctness of what is to be proved can also arise from causes which are quite problematic or which have led, as a result of their own historical relativity, to false global prescientific convictions. There are also false (historically time-conditioned, global, instinctively operating) convictions which then seek objective expression in explicit conceptual 'proofs', so that to anyone who shares these convictions the proofs are very obvious and they are put forward and defended with the absoluteness with which people cling to such a prescientific global conviction, even though the latter is false or at least questionable. In life, too, prior to any scientific reflection, there are judgments that are not inspired by the wisdom of experience but are 'prejudgments', which are historically, culturally, and sociologically conditioned, are changeable, can be erroneous always or in a different situation. The actual development and history of moral theology in the Church has to do largely, not only with the destruction of incorrect or uncertain theological arguments purely as such, but with the demolition of such prescientific instinctive convictions which are false or unproved, but hitherto made the explicit arguments seem 'obvious'.

At the same time unfortunately the untenability of such moral theological arguments is actually realized and recognized very often (even though not always) in the Church only when the global prescientific [79] conviction, based on other reasons (of history, of sociological changes, of changes in the human psyche, etc.), behind the arguments has been demolished. Examples might perhaps be cited also of explicit counter-arguments against the reasons used to support false moral precepts, counter-arguments which led to the breakdown of these false global convictions; it will often also be necessary to allow for a long historical process in the course of which in many questions there is a mutual interaction between rational counter-arguments and a breakdown of preconceptions for other reasons. But it may certainly be honestly admitted that the Church's moral theology and its arguments very often cleared the field of certain positions and recognized the untenability of earlier arguments for these positions only after other historical factors had already destroyed the preconceptions on which, whether they noticed it or not, people had based their arguments. This may be understandable, but it is not very edifying for the historian of the Church's moral theology. It may be said that the Church is conservative in the light of its task of safeguarding the deposit of faith, that this conservatism gives it a legitimate albeit limited function in the history of ideas which is not to be underestimated and may not be depreciated from the very outset. But it is in fact also part of the tragic and impenetrable historicity of the Church that in practice and theory it defended moral precepts with bad arguments, based on problematic, historically conditioned preconceptions, 'prejudgments', which it did not itself abandon but which other historical causes eliminated; only then did the Church finally find the new conviction obvious and (unfortunately) proceeded to act as if the new global conviction was obvious and the Church had never had any doubts about it.

How many examples can a moral theologian produce without more ado of occasions when the Church's magisterium also expressly acknowledged such revisions of its own standpoint and at the same time admitted that it owed this better understanding to causes other than its own efforts to break down prejudices? I do not think that the average moral theologian could produce many such examples immediately. But it would be fine if things were different.

This dark tragedy of the Church's history of ideas is all the more depressing, since it always or often involved questions which have a profound influence on the concrete life of human beings, for such false precepts (which objectively were never valid or had long become [80] obsolete through cultural and economic changes not at first recognized by the institutional Church) imposed burdens on human beings (at the same time endangering their salvation) which were not at all legitimate in the light of the freedom of the Gospel.

If what we have said is more or less right, it means that moral theology in its own field has the task of analyzing much more closely, critically, and courageously the provenance and historico-sociological relativity of those preliminary decisions which are at work behind the arguments of traditional textbook theology and also of the Church's magisterium. More concretely it means that a distinction is to be made especially in the field of moral theology much more clearly and courageously between a tradition that really carries on an indubitable divine revelation and one that is merely 'human' and possesses no guarantee of its correctness and supratemporal validity, even if it has been held universally and unquestioningly in the previous history of Christianity and the Church. In regard to the critical distinction between these two 'traditions' it must also be remembered that a 'human' tradition may even have been absolutely right for a particular time, because it deduced the right precepts for that time from the human and sociological conditions and the fact of the situation which then prevailed but were not themselves unchangeable. Under certain conditions such an instinctive basic conviction was indeed morally binding for that time, but only for that time. If we consider such changes and possibilities of change, if in the light of an established (but not yet sufficiently thoroughly considered) theory of the real nature of strictly supernatural revelation we perceive that only very few individual moral precepts (which?) are a part of actual revelation as such, then we can have an idea of the changes possible in 'Christian' morality, despite the history of these prior convictions enduring almost two thousand years but largely containing only 'human' tradition.

If then it is entirely a task for moral theology in a good conservative spirit perhaps often to preserve the genuinely human element of historical moral tradition, even if the content of that tradition is historically conditioned and is explicitly recognized as changeable in itself (since not everything that is changeable must necessarily be changed), it is also the task of academic moral theology, not only to expose as such what is unproved in the course of the argument, but also to work to break down the preconceptions behind it, if these are [81] themselves historically conditioned and no longer correspond to the concrete 'reality' they are meant to support and which they reproduce without further consideration. This is a difficult task for which the Church's magisterium with its conservative attitude (understandable but perhaps also unjustified) generally shows little gratitude.

If moral theology thus has a history in its actual process of knowledge (which is by no means conditioned solely by theoretical reflection and argument since it is also conditioned by factors that do not belong to the field of theoretical reflection at all and for that reason alone simply cannot be eliminated and since theory always rests on a pretheoretical realization of human and Christian existence) then moral theology is an ongoing process which in the last resort cannot be foreseen, which cannot exclude all friction, conflict, and danger, indissolubly linked as these are with the history of ideas. The courage to take risks, to face opposition and criticism, is therefore among the virtues of the moral theologian (as we respect and admire them, for instance, in a person like Bernard Haring) since, for the reasons indicated, the moral theologian cannot be merely the interpreter and defender of the traditional teaching of the magisterium, but also its critic who helps the magisterium to understand better and more effectively to defend before humanity the teaching of Christian revelation and of man's self-understanding in the history of his morality.

It would be possible to develop the suggested starting point further. It would be possible to reflect on the fact that the concepts used in any moral theological argument always form a unity of concept and image and the argument is based on a conversio ad phantasma (to adopt the terminology of Aquinas) and is impossible otherwise; that any argument, if it is to be understood at all, always appeals also to the concrete reality already grasped in experience and action, that is always also culturally and sociologically (in fact historically) conditioned. (For when the moral theologian speaks of money, authority, family, truth in intercommunication, sexuality, and so on in the course of his argument, how can he prevent the involvement or reverberation in these terms of something that is historically conditioned and not perennially valid?) Of course in an argument so unavoidably historically conditioned something of these historically conditioned representational and visual models [82] becomes explicitly visible, can be criticized and perhaps eliminated and replaced by a different (again necessary) representational model, which admittedly itself remains historically conditioned, so that it is impossible to aim at a 'chemical purity' of the concept as such as distinct from the visual model. But the critical discrimination between concept and image is always possible only up to a point and is never completed. There is always some part of a representational model that is not seen and considered in its historical relativity, but is nevertheless secretly at work in such a moral theological argument. Hence there are two points which the moral theologian must keep in mind in his arguments.

First, the argumentative process (which must take the form of a dialogue) never reaches an absolutely definitive conclusion; the concrete representational models (especially those in a transitional stage), without which any concept would be empty, must continually be investigated under new historical conditions for their validity, their changeability and the possibility of their elimination; the experience must continually be made and permitted of the constant temptation in a moral theological argument (which is a historical process) to get away from what is really being considered, because the latter has changed in the meantime or is actually being changed.

Second, a moral theological argument is always or frequently (although mostly implicitly but unavoidably) also an appeal in a historical decision to uphold that concrete although historically conditioned reality which, as concrete, lies behind even the abstract argument as its 'visualization', without which there is no concept and no argument. Whether a latent appeal of this kind, implicit in the argument, reaches its goal, persists, and brings it about that a future history (at least history in the immediate future) also really wills it to remain not only as 'proved' in the argument but also as implicitly required as a postulate of practical reason, the future will decide, not the person who is arguing. He may be successful or he may not. He can indeed be convinced that his argument will continue to be effective also in the future, if and insofar as that argument gets to the really metaphysical, transcendentally necessary nature of the case (that is, of man). But, since he cannot ascertain this with utter clarity by an absolutely adequate distinction between (metaphysical) concept and (historically conditioned) visualization, he still cannot be absolutely clear as to whether the argument which he firmly maintains [83] as valid is one that is really metaphysically conclusive, one that will continue to be effective for all future time and that participates in the permanent validity of the metaphysical nature attained by it, or one that can be regarded as valid only if and insofar as the factor of an appeal (explicit or implicit) is also accepted.

The moral theologian need not be upset about this situation. For in principle he certainly has the right involved in every free, always unavoidable historical decision to want the concreteness of the visualization, to which he perhaps appeals without reflection or really adequate discrimination, to persist and not to be changed, even though he does not know whether this historical will of his own (that is perhaps also still concealed in such an abstract argumentation) will actually be effective. But in any case it becomes clear that the theory to be supported by argument is itself also a part of practice, whether this is known or not.

In our reflections up to now we started out from the tacit assumption that there are purely and simply two kinds of argumentation in moral theology: right and wrong (or unproved). But now we certainly ought to make some more precise distinctions. Right (correct, true) can either be one that gets at the transcendentally necessary nature of man and is consequently bound to proceed in the hope that it will continually be effective. (We are leaving aside here the question of whether and how there are positive precepts given by divine supernatural revelation which in themselves and in their demonstration do not really come under the first type of argumentation and yet possess the hope and the claim to continually enduring validity.) Or the argumentation can be right, because and if it derives its correctness (explicitly or mostly implicitly) also from the representational model with which the concepts of the argumentation are put forward.

If an argument of this kind is or is supposed to be right, two further possibilities can be conceived. (1) Either this representational model is generally accepted and undisputed, even by those against whom the argument is directed; in other words, the argumentation proceeds in the light of an anthropological, cultural, and sociological situation which generally prevails and is recognized within the concrete milieu of the argumentation, even though as such it is historically conditioned and not of metaphysical necessity. In such cases for the most part no absolutely clear borderline can be [84] drawn at all between the metaphysical element of the concepts used and the historically conditioned visual model. This kind of argumentation may certainly be described as true, particularly since even historically conditioned situations, as long as they remain unchallenged, can really give rise to a moral imperative, even though the latter need not be always and perennially valid. (2) Or the visual model used (explicitly or mostly unthematically) in the argumentation is actually imperiled in the situation of the person arguing, but in itself it is meaningful; in a case like this the argument carries an implicit 'appeal' (as we described it) for the maintenance of the situation envisaged by him in his historical decision, whether this character of an appeal as part of the argument is deliberately intended or (which frequently or mostly will be the case) not. If there is a chance in the foreseeable future that the appeal implicit in such an argumentation will be successful, the argument can safely be described as 'true', even though this 'truth' is also established by a (meaningful if not also theoretically conclusive) decision of practical reason itself, which is also implied in its own right in apparently purely theoretical argumentation. It may be admitted that the qualification of this kind of argumentation as 'true' presupposes a conception of the relationship between theory and practice in which practice is not purely and simply the application of the precepts of theoretical moral reason, but has also an underivable autonomous status, sets up truth and does not merely accept it. But these are problems of course which cannot be pursued further here.

A moral theological argument is false, untrue, not only if it cannot deduce what it asserts from the transcendentally necessary nature of reality, but also when even the representational model is lacking with which it has to work in order to be able to be recognized as true. The absence of such a really sustaining representational model can again be understood in two ways, even though these two ways coincide up to a point.

Either (first way) an appeal is made in this argument to an historically conditioned state of man (which provides the representational model) which is simply no longer universally valid (for the group involved in this dialogue) and is taken for granted as universally valid by the person who makes this appeal only because of his historical and sociological backwardness and his failure to keep up with the times, although (and this is presupposed) it cannot by any [85] means be said that man's historically conditioned state is required by his metaphysical nature or that it is disregarded only through man's (objective) fault. With the lack of historical and cultural simultaneity on the part of human beings, despite their chronological simultaneity, it cannot be denied that wrong arguments of this kind frequently occur also in the Church and are at the bottom of a good many moral theological controversies.

Or, the second way in which this wrong argumentation occurs lies in the fact that it not only cannot legitimately deduce its assertion from man's metaphysical nature, but implies an appeal to an historical decision that in practice has no serious chance of success, because the historical situation to which the appeal is made is admittedly not yet passed, but is so imperiled, so patently disintegrating, that it can be foreseen that in the long run this appeal will in fact remain ineffective. The argumentation in this second way can be described as untrue for the same reasons as those on account of which an argument with an implicit appeal to an implicit historical decision offering ample prospects was previously described as true. The two forms of wrong argumentation in moral theology naturally tend to overlap, without being able to be distinguished with absolute certainty from one another, since the judgment on the chances of success of the appeal mentioned is a matter of practical reason and can have no theoretical certainty.

All that we wanted to do here was to put forward a few considerations and ideas about bad arguments in moral theology. If these reflections once more give rise to the most obscure and difficult questions of human knowledge of the most general character (questions which were noted here without attempting to provide a clear and certain answer to them) this lies in the nature of the case. The moral theologian knows that actions which are to be described concretely as immoral always, contrary to their intention, implicitly affirm the incomparability of good in relation to evil, the inescapable dependence of man on the absolute good, the sacred dignity of conscience. But all this really means also or makes immediately evident the fact that, even in a wrong moral theological argument, at least implicitly, but really, that light is affirmed which is inherent in freedom and love and which in the last resort comes from the absolute love and freedom which we call God.

Theology of God and Christology

THE HUMAN QUESTION OF MEANING IN FACE OF THE ABSOLUTE MYSTERY OF GOD

Every age has a number of expressions, key terms which serve to sum up its task and its longings in the light of the special character of its own situation. Christians will always count faith, hope, and love among these key terms, even though they have varied the emphasis from one to another of them in the course of the history of Christianity. Logos was certainly one of the many key terms; it played an important part in the history of ideas in late antiquity. Order was regarded as a key term in the philosophy and theology of the High Middle Ages, particularly in the work of Aquinas. Enlightenment, emancipation from self-alienation, utopia, and hope are also terms of crucial importance intended to invoke human existence as a whole and ringing in our ears today. Whether key terms are genuinely of Christian origin or come to Christianity and the Church more or less from outside, critically, perhaps accusing, and in any case challenging, Christians and their theologians are certainly called upon to confront the proclamation of the Christian message with them, to measure the message by them and them by the message and thus bring about a historical kairos which satisfies both Christianity and its unsurpassable message and also the task and longing of the particular historical moment.

Among such key terms, with their evocative power and their terrible ambiguity, the term ‘meaning’ may also be included. Christian theology at the service of the Church’s proclamation is therefore called upon to look at what this term is supposed to convey, to examine it critically, to be examined by it critically, even to struggle [90] with the term as Jacob struggled with the angel, so that out of the struggle a blessing may come both for the person looking for meaning and for theology itself and thus also for proclamation. In the following brief reflections there can be no question (this would require more space than is available) of summoning up all the resources of theology in order to confront them with the question of meaning. Instead, we shall restrict ourselves to a single datum of Catholic theology in order to relate it to the question of meaning. This one datum is God’s incomprehensibility – here, always, and for all eternity. We are asking then: What is its relevance to the question of meaning within a Christian theology and proclamation, when as Christians we acknowledge the incomprehensibility of God? In such a question of course, however much it expressly refers to ‘meaning’ and looks for an understanding of that term in the light of God’s incomprehensibility, the term ‘incomprehensibility’ in its turn is also called in question.

GOD’S INCOMPREHENSIBILITY IN DOCTRINE AND THEOLOGICAL TRADITION

First of all, some observations must be put forward on the doctrine of God’s incomprehensibility, but without confronting this teaching for the time being with the question of meaning. The Church’s teaching refers quite frequently to the incomprehensibility and ineffability of God. The word incomprehensibilis occurs at an early stage of the history of the Church, in Leo the Great (DS 294), likewise in Martin I (DS 501); in the Eleventh Council of Toledo in 675 it is said that God is ineffable in his essence (DS 525). In the famous profession of faith of the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215 God is described as incomprehensible and ineffable (DS 800, 804). Likewise in the declaration of the First Vatican Council, God is called incomprehensible and it is said of him that he is ineffably exalted above all that is or can be conceived apart from him (DS 3001).

In the Church's professions of faith, then, it is taken for granted that incomprehensibility and ineffability are among the attributes of God which are meant to bring out what is really to be understood by God as such. This incomprehensibility of God, which appears even in the Old Testament, not however as the incomprehensibility of his [91] nature, but as that of his creative action on his world and its history, is celebrated in the same sense in Paul's letters when he not only extols God's saving deed as a whole in Christ as mystery, but also expressly describes it as impenetrable and inscrutable (Rom. 11:33). From this starting point, 'negative theology' then developed the idea of the incomprehensibility of God's nature, in the East particularly with the Cappadocians and in the West with Augustine.

This negative theology of the incomprehensibility of God's nature, justified as it is, must however not be allowed to obscure the fact that incomprehensibility is also characteristic of God's free decrees and that it was from this source that the appreciation of his incomprehensibility as such was originally acquired. Leaving aside here the Franciscan metaphysic of freedom and love, which as such certainly has a fundamental importance for our question, it can be said in the light of Pius Siller's research that in medieval philosophy and theology the doctrine of God's incomprehensibility likewise acquires an outstanding place and rank in the work of Aquinas.[1] For the latter it comes within the scope, not so much of a metaphysical characterization of God, as of revealed theology, in anthropological eschatology, Christology, and theological hermeneutics; it is this incomprehensibility of God alone which for Aquinas makes possible the revelation of God as such, without man becoming God.

Here we shall refrain from developing more closely the subtle theology of God's incomprehensibility in Aquinas and thus also in Siller and refer the reader to these two authors themselves for a discussion of this precise question of incomprehensibility as a mode of understanding in general and of the incomprehensibility of God in particular. We may be satisfied here with a rather simpler idea of the incomprehensibility of God, particularly since the Church's official theology and theology generally do not take too much trouble to explain this concept. Here in the first place it need only be observed that according to this traditional teaching the incomprehensibility of God persists also in the immediate face-to-face vision of God: that is, it is not merely something peculiar to the knowledge of God in the [92] pilgrim's earthly life, but also determines his relationship to God in its eternal consummation.

HOW CAN THE ETERNALLY INCOMPREHENSIBLE GOD BE THE MEANING OF OUR LIFE?

We can be satisfied with these few hints, since we have to reflect, not really on this incomprehensibility of God in itself, but on the human question of meaning (admittedly insofar as the latter is confronted with the dogmatic teaching on faith on the incomprehensibility of God). Obviously the situation cannot but be one in which a confrontation of this kind occurs continuously in religious experience, in a metaphysic and in theology, in which the adoro te devote latens Deitas ('the devout adoration of the hidden deity') is a basic determination of religious experience and speculation. This is certainly not to be denied. Nevertheless it may be said that in the Church's official teaching and in traditional textbook theology the incomprehensibility of God is one of God's attributes in addition to many others, is taught as a particular theme, but does not actually occupy a really systematically and completely dominating position, sustaining everything else, for the totality of the teaching on God and our relationship to him. When a good deal has been said and many things have been discussed about God and our relationship to him in nature and grace, it is then also added that he is incomprehensible; we talk of God, his existence and his knowability, his relationship to us in nature and grace, without from the very outset making God's incomprehensibility the starting point always and everywhere determining the understanding of his nature and of its peculiar and unique character. Moreover, when we acclaim the immediate vision of God as the one, proper and alone fulfilling goal of man, when we pray ut te revelata cernens facie visu sim beatus tuae gloriae ('that I may see your face unveiled, be blessed in the vision of your glory'), we have forgotten in practice that this blessedness of eternal glory means coming immediately into the presence of the incomprehensibility of God. After extolling the pure infinite light of the eternal deity, which finally descends into the mind and heart of the creature and drives all earthly darkness away for ever, we gently observe as a kind of afterthought that even here God remains incomprehensible; [93] but this incomprehensibility is regarded more or less as a marginal phenomenon, as a tribute to be paid to our own finite creatureliness in a beatitude as enjoyment of what is seen and comprehended in God. God's incomprehensibility is not what is seen, but what is not seen, from which we avert our gaze.

If then God's incomprehensibility, which is nowhere denied in Christianity, is seen from this odd twofold aspect, even though merely implicitly and unthematically and basically in a way contrary to its proper meaning, it is not surprising that the theme of God's incomprehensibility is not brought out really clearly and firmly in the traditional treatment of the question of meaning.

This forgetting of God's incomprehensibility at the point where we recognize God as ultimate, sole, all-illuminating answer to man's radical question of meaning seems to me to be blatant. For us the person who does not know God is wandering in darkness; but that person walks in the light who knows God and brings him into his calculations for living as the item that throws light on all the rest of his accounts. God is extolled by us as the one comprehensive meaning of our existence, ultimately solving all our dilemmas, in which alone all partial experiences of meaning find their true place and their integration. God enlightens, combines, organizes, resolves discords, is the refuge-tower abiding in a blessed, pure unity in himself: the stronghold in which we can take refuge away from all that is unreconciled in life and knowledge. For us he is light, eternal peace, reconciliation, unity purely and simply, the point (which is in fact attainable for us) from which all the terrible discords of nature and history blend in a pure, meaningful harmony. He is meaning pure and simple and, when we make this statement, which is of course correct in itself, we think spontaneously of meaning in our sense, as that which is seen, that which is understood, controlled, that which is justified in our sight and is given into our hands, put at our disposal, so that finally the pain of the emptiness of meaning of the unanswered question ceases.

All this invocation of God as the one and comprehensive answer to the one and entire infinite question that is man is really not to be rejected. Difficult as it may be to say explicitly what is really to be understood by meaning, there are partial experiences of meaning and all these partial experiences show the way to the one point lying within the infinite at which the particular experiences of meaning [94] come together, are anticipated and reconciled with one another in a fundamental unity, so that we rightly call this most fundamental, all-unifying, utopian, and for that very reason most real meaning purely and simply God. But when we thus sense and demand the highest with all our strength of mind and heart, in theory and practice, do we not again then fall from the supreme height of our existence into the empty abyss of meaninglessness, if we say that this highest is incomprehensible? How can the incomprehensible and nameless be the meaning that we have? We cannot however understand this incomprehensibility as a special characteristic of God, which he has together with the other attributes different from that, which then yield the fullness of meaning for which we yearn. These other attributes of God, which we declare to be the meaning of our existence, are themselves incomprehensible; this incomprehensibility is not one attribute of God alongside others, but the attribute of his attributes. The question then remains of how this incomprehensibility can be our meaning.

As a precaution a specifically theological observation must be made at this point. On the ground of Christian faith we cannot say that God is the guarantor and content of the meaning of our existence only in so far as he creatively produces a finite something that (formaliter, as the scholastics would say, as distinct from efficienter) amounts on the one hand to our fulfillment of meaning and on the other hand, being finite and consequently not incomprehensible, escapes the apparently insurmountable hopelessness in which we are involved. A solution of this kind is impossible because for Christian faith it is not a finite reality, even though created by God, but God in himself that is, even though by sheer grace, man's immediacy, goal, and fulfillment of meaning.

In order to clarify the difficulty, it must moreover be added that this incomprehensibility obviously radically determines, not only those peculiar characteristics of God which belong to him solely as he is in himself, but also his attributes as 'relative' to us, that is, the decrees of his freedom, his justice, his mercy, his fidelity, etc. If we do not at once and from the very start understand as incomprehensible also these attributes of God (existentially decisive up to a point for ourselves) which are relative to us, such a statement is mistaken from the outset and does not refer to the true God at all. But are we [95] really doing justice to this insight by working out an apologetical theodicy of the terrible course of world events and the horror of the history of humanity, asserting quickly and unctuously that the good meaning of the course of world events and of mankind's history will dawn upon us in heaven with blinding clarity? Are we not forgetting that, at the very stage when we see God face to face, he is the incomprehensible also in his freedom in which he guides world history and that this very incomprehensibility under which we suffer shines out more especially there in all its terrible splendour? If we take seriously the decisions of the free God, is not what the psalmist says (94:6 in the Vulgate version) particularly true for heaven: 'O come, let us worship and bow down, let us kneel before the Lord, our maker'? Does not Paul say, particularly in regard to God's free salvific action, that his judgments are inpenetrable and his ways inscrutable (Rom. 11:33)? Is this true only as long as we are on pilgrimage on these ways or is it not true particularly when we have reached the end of these ways?

With the question of meaning it is not so simple to appeal to God and at the same time to think that everything is clear, all darkness bright, all problems solved, all the pure fullness of meaning brought out, when God is called the Word. If we really understand this word, we might just as well say that it is out of the question now and for all eternity to think of seeking and finding a meaning in any reality that is perceptible and comprehensible to us.

What shall we say? One thing is certain. If we raise the question of meaning and attempt to answer it in the light of the modern ideal of knowledge, according to which knowledge gains its true nature and reaches its goal only when it sees through and thus dominates what is known, when it breaks down into what for us is unquestionable and obvious, when it seeks to work only with clear ideas and seeks to reflect to the very last detail the conditions of its own possibility, when as autonomous it seeks itself to decide the limits of what concerns it and what does not, when it seeks to be silent about those things on which it is impossible to speak clearly, when it is interested only in the functional connections of the details of its world of experience – in a word, when the modern ideal of knowledge prevails as a matter of course and without any need of justification – then any talk of God's incomprehensibility can be understood only [96] as a sentence of death on the question of meaning and how we want to cope with life in face of this prohibition of a universal question of meaning is irrelevant.

TWO BASIC QUESTIONS ON THE CLEAR-OBSCURE 'SOLUTION' OF THE DILEMMA

On the one hand, then, we uphold as inescapable and legitimate the universal question of meaning and on the other hand we not only speak of the incomprehensibility of God somewhere within the theological system, but also acknowledge the power of this expression over everything else and confront it with this question of meaning. On these assumptions, it seems to us that two questions especially must be raised. First, how must the nature of human knowledge be understood in principle and a priori, so that it can raise the question of God's incomprehensibility at all, so that it becomes clear that it cannot regard it as out of the question from the very outset to be occupied with the incomprehensibility of God? Second, how precisely must the act of man be understood in which he allows for God's incomprehensibility without being broken by this incomprehensibility or putting it aside as irrelevant for himself? These two questions of course are closely connected, but are not simply identical, since it is only the second question that makes clear how knowledge as such must transcend itself, must be raised up into the totality of human existence, when it is faced with the incomprehensibility of God.

It is clear without more ado that answering these two questions has something to do with the appropriate statement of the question of meaning and its understanding. For us, absolute meaning exists only in God and for that reason the question of meaning can be rightly understood and answered only if God's incomprehensibility is simultaneously considered and therefore also the two questions just now formulated. Here of course in regard to these two questions it is possible to put forward only a couple of suggestions from which, from the nature of the case, too much is continually expected.

(1) How must knowledge be understood even in its initial stages if it is to be able to have anything at all to do with God's incomprehensibility? [97] If reason from the very start were the power to know the individual realities of consciousness and their reciprocal functional connections, the incomprehensibility of God could not even be considered either as a question or as a statement or it would have to be set aside from the very outset as a nonconcept, like that of a square circle, and be rejected as an expression for what could only apparently be conceived.

Man's knowing mind cannot be understood merely as coming across what we call God in the course of its activities and then assigning to this contingent object the predicate 'incomprehensible' as one attribute among others that belongs to this accidentally discovered individual object of knowledge. If man's reason is thus understood in a modern way, a posteriori, positivistically, functionally (even if the rules of the functioning of reason so conceived are developed epistemologically), this reason can never be the power of knowing God's incomprehensibility, if only because God himself cannot be understood as a particular individual object among other data of consciousness and because a reason that has to do purely and simply in the first place with what can be defined by functional connections cannot subsequently come to deal with something that absolutely contradicts what is thus understood as the a priori character of possible data of consciousness. Reason must be understood more fundamentally as precisely the capacity of the incomprehensible, as the capacity of being seized by what is always insurmountable, not essentially as the power of comprehending, of gaining the mastery and subjugating. Reason must be understood (to use Aquinas's terminology) as the capacity of excessus, as going out into the inaccessible. If reason is not understood from the very outset as the capacity of incomprehensibility, of unfathomable mystery, as perception of the ineffable, then all subsequent talk of the incomprehensibility of God comes too late, falls on deaf ears, and can be understood only as an intimation of what happens to remain of objectivity, of what has not yet been processed by all-consuming reason but will sooner or perhaps later be so processed.

Actually however reason is of this nature, even if it is inclined to stop at what is clearly understood and comprehended and to linger there, even if it always forgets where the clear brightness of its individual perceptions comes from. For when it grasps and understands any object, it has already transcended the latter into an infinity [98] that is present as unexplored, precisely as such and not otherwise; it always seizes the individual object by being tacitly aware of the fact that the object always is and remains more than what is grasped of it. It locates the individual object within reference systems which themselves are not precisely fixed and determined and in which such an individual reality has a place without being absolutely and for ever settled there. It always has a bad conscience (which, if admitted and accepted, becomes a good conscience) that it has itself never adequately understood and authorized its own assumptions, although to do this would enable it to rely absolutely on its individual perceptions. It perceives, and every perception that gives expression to an individual reality is accompanied by a terrible awareness of its provisional character. It is only because we do not know that we can attempt to know something, only because we direct our questions to what is unanswered and thus in the last resort to the ineffable, that we can hear answers which, the better they are, the more they raise new questions.

Wanting to understand and, consequently, the question aimed at comprehension as such (and in all this the rational subject demanding an explanation from the very outset) are themselves put in question with every answer, so that incomprehension becomes incomprehensibility and the boundless question the sole point at which the question itself becomes the answer, the domicile where incomprehensibility (called God) resides and alone shelters us. If we want to regard it as darkness always to be already beyond the individual object of knowledge as the condition of the possibility of our knowledge, since there can be no point anywhere at which it comes to a stop, then we can confidently say that this darkness is the condition of the light that illumines an individual object, then we can say that it is only in falling into an unfathomable abyss that we grasp the individual reality to which we think we can cling. In brief: the simple fact (inevitably freshly asserted in every perception) that any individual perception is possible only within an infinite process which as far as we are concerned is never ended (and which in theological terms can be ended only by its own goal, approached asymptotically, if this is itself present, but then as naked and unveiled incomprehensibility), always asserting afresh that what is grasped lives by the incomprehensible and that understanding is governed by incomprehensibility.

[99] If we want, we can dismiss all this as idle dialectic and cheap paradox, with the invitation to stick to what is clear and comprehensible. But we can do this only with the aid of rationalistic theory and (whether we want it or not) the bitterness of life's frustrations brings us up continually against this marginal experience, so that at most we may wonder whether what is beyond this field of clear knowledge and autonomously practicable plans amounts to a fall into an abysmal meaninglessness or to being caught up by a sheltering incomprehensibility relieving us purely and simply of ourselves and our question.

(2) We thus come to the second question, which of course is directly connected with the first. We have been asking about the knowing reason and we defined it in advance of its function of definitively comprehending as the power of coming face to face with incomprehensibility itself. If this is the fundamental definition of cognitive reason itself and not simply what happens to it unexpectedly as it reaches the end of its activity, this does not mean that we are irrationalists; for this fundamental state of being exposed to incomprehensibility is understood precisely as the condition of the possibility of conceptually elaborating, delimiting, and discriminating knowledge. But when we describe reason in this way, we have already gone beyond it; precisely in order to define its nature fundamentally, we have transcended it to reach something greater and more comprehensive, because – in the last resort no one who believes in God can doubt this – it is always possible to comprehend the nature of something in the last resort only by transcending that nature. Once again then we must face our second question. How exactly must the act of man be understood in which he can allow for the incomprehensibility of God without being broken by this incomprehensibility or putting it aside as irrelevant for himself?

Before attempting to answer this question more precisely, we may put forward one or two preliminary observations to protect the answer to this question from the very outset against objections and misunderstandings.

With Aquinas we are absolutely convinced that knowledge on the one hand and will (as freedom and love) on the other can be distinguished as powers emerging as distinct out of an ultimate substantial unity of man and kept together in this unity in a kind of perichoresis ('mutual interpenetration'), to make use analogously of a term of [100] trinitarian theology. At the same time we are sure that Aquinas gets to the depths of this question of the difference of these two powers from one another, not at the point where he marks out one from the other and draws the obvious conclusions (for example, that the essential nature of the beatific vision of God consists in the act of intellect as such) but where he discusses objectively the unity and the mutual interdependence (even though within a system analogous to that which exists in the divine trinity) of the transcendentals verum ('truth') and bonum ('goodness'). When we consider and take seriously the metaphysics of these transcendentals in their unity and mutual interdependence and in their differentiation, we can give a good Thomistic answer to our question. This act in which man can allow for and accept God's incomprehensibility (and thus the comprehensive meaning of his own existence), without being broken by it and without taking refuge in the banality of his clear knowledge and of a demand for meaning based solely on this complete knowledge as open to manipulation, is the act of self-surrendering love trusting entirely in this very incomprehensibility, in which knowledge surpasses itself, rising to its supernature, and is aware of itself only by becoming love.

This statement, which still requires elucidation, may sound paradoxical, but it does no more than express the paradox of the ultimate unity of man's diverse powers in which in the last resort each power becomes aware of itself only when it is raised up into the other and in which the whole is named after the final element in the system of these elements (it is in this way that we say 'God is Spirit', giving him the name of his third mode of subsistence).

We may adopt the opposite approach in order to make the answer to the second question intelligible, by asking what kind of an act it must be in which man as reason can bear the incomprehensibility of God and does not regard this incomprehensibility as the infinitely high wall, enclosing the small field of his blessedness on all sides, so that he can enjoy his happiness in this small area only by nervously casting his eyes down in order not to have anything to do with this wall looming up to high heaven. What must the act be called (if it exists at all) in which the occurrence of the incomprehensible mystery in its inexorable unambiguity and finality itself amounts to eternal blessedness and not its all-annihilating frontier? We can only answer that, if this act exists at all, if it exists because we simply [101] cannot do without it, if we look for a name for it derived from our basic experiences, we can speak only of 'love'. Admittedly, that very thing which we call love must not be defined in the light of anything else, but only in the light of that experience which we have in the occurrence of the incomprehensible mystery. In the last resort love is precisely the acceptance of the incomprehensibility which we call God, in his nature and his freedom, as sheltering, as affirmed as for ever valid, as accepting us.

But this nature of God's love, which is revealed particularly and ultimately only in the acceptance of his incomprehensibility as beatifying and not as annihilating, is also accessible to us in the light of lesser experiences that we have otherwise in personal love. At the point where one person encounters another in really personal love is there not an acceptance of what is not comprehended, an acceptance of what we have not ourselves perceived and consequently not mastered in the other person, the person who is loved? Is not personal love a trusting surrender without reassurance to the other person, precisely in so far as the latter is and remains free and incalculable? This is not to say that the absolutely unique love of God, in its real, univocal sense, can be subsumed under an interpersonal love that we can easily experience; the two factors have only an analogous similarity, that is, a similarity in which a greater dissimilarity continually appears (to vary the terminology of the Fourth Lateran Council on the relationship between God and creatures). But interpersonal love nevertheless gives us a hint of our relationship to God; it justifies us in saying that the act in which the subject, leaving aside itself and its own claims, surrenders itself to the incomprehensible and for ever persistently incomprehensible mystery can at best be called love, since knowledge purely as such in our ordinary field of experience (even though not in its fundamental nature) bears in itself the character of appropriation and domination of what is known, while this is not the case in genuine interpersonal love, even in the empirical area of life. At the same time it remains true that only in the act of resigned and self-forsaking surrender of the subject to the incomprehensibility of God as such (which then ceases to be a limitation and becomes the very content of our relationship to God) does the most fundamental nature of love really dawn upon us, of which interpersonal love is merely a creaturely reflection.

[102] Certainly the relationship of the basic act of human beings in regard to the incomprehensibility of God, insofar as this act is knowledge and insofar as it is free love surpassing knowledge, has not yet really been adequately defined. But, as already indicated, this basic definition of the relationship is not to be put forward on the plane of a theory of faculties, as in Aquinas, but with the aid of a theory of the transcendentals 'true' and 'good' and their relationship with one another. For only in this way can it be made clear that love (praxis) – perhaps today we would also say freedom – can be and must be also the condition of knowledge of the true (theory), so that this very relationship of a perichoresis of the two transcendentals reaches its most radical essential realization in the presence of the incomprehensibility of God.

ULTIMATE FULFILLMENT OF MEANING ONLY IN THE FREE AND LOVING ACCEPTANCE OF THE INCOMPREHENSIBILITY OF GOD

In the course of our reflections on the act of accepting God's incomprehensibility, we seem to have lost sight of the human question of meaning. In reality however this is not so. We may make this clear with one or two closing remarks. Although there is a particular experience of meaning directly in the field of human experience and prior to the question of God, we assume that the question of meaning as a whole can be answered positively only with what we call God, in the sense not only that the fulfillment of the human question of meaning is guaranteed and creatively effected by God, but consists in a gracious self-communication of God in his most intimate reality. But this self-communication of God, that alone radically answers the question of meaning, seen from man's standpoint, is and remains the immediate coming into the presence of God's incomprehensibility, which, if we are to talk seriously and without reservation about real and not merely passive fulfillment, must itself be understood and realized, not as the limit but as the content of the final blessed fulfillment of meaning.

If however this is the situation, it is one to which the concrete mode of the promise in Christian proclamation of an ultimate fulfillment of meaning must also really correspond. In this proclamation there cannot be an offer of a God who is secretly subject to human selfishness, not even to the sublime selfishness of human rationality. The God of fulfillment of meaning must be proclaimed as the one who cannot be fitted into the calculations of our life, who simply cannot be regarded as the last item in our bookkeeping, bringing out the meaning of the whole series of our accounts. Our proclamation must boldly declare that the ultimate question of meaning is correctly stated only as the question of free love, which can get away from itself and experience the incomprehensible as what is wondrously and blessedly obvious. The question of meaning must itself be relentlessly clarified as a question by being confronted with the incomprehensibility of God and thus turned into a question of whether it is capable of being understood as the question of an incomprehensibility that brings final happiness or, since a third meaning is impossible, seeks to understand God's incomprehensibility merely as another expression for the empty absurdity of existence.

In this question 'objective' knowledge and ultimate free decision cannot be separated. And it is this very fact that proclamation must clearly show to be inescapably involved in any theory from the very outset; it must make clear that knowledge, too, is itself good or bad according to whether it seeks to understand the incomprehensibility of existence, which is derived from the incomprehensibility of God, as bringing final bliss or in the last resort as hateful. Present-day proclamation, particularly when it recognizes God as the ultimate answer to the question of meaning, is tempted to make God a tiny means for the small man, to permit God only what seems to shortsightedly selfish man to be useful to himself, without radically grasping and proclaiming that man can reach final bliss only with a God who is incomprehensibly greater than himself and for that very reason the true blessedness of man.

Where today does Christian proclamation speak clearly and firmly of the God of judgment, of the eternally incomprehensible ways and decrees of his freedom? Certainly Christianity is the proclamation of the victory of God's grace and not actually merely the ambivalent offer to man's freedom of two possibilities, of salvation or of eternal perdition. But this very message of God's gracious freedom is more powerful than man's freedom and is always ahead of the latter, without destroying it, only if it is heard as the event of the incomprehensibility [103] of God's freedom and not as an obvious insight with which to outwit God's judgments, if it is heard as an appeal to man's freedom to trust entirely in God's incomprehensibility without reservation and without reassurance, since it is only in this way that freedom becomes free and blessed. Recourse to God as answer to the question of meaning of man in his wholeness is right and indispensable. But it becomes the creation of a human idol if it does not bring man, forsaking himself, self-surrendering, and blessed only in that way, into the presence of the incomprehensibility of God.

ONENESS AND THREEFOLDNESS OF GOD IN DISCUSSION WITH ISLAM

The question of God's oneness is certainly one theme (if not the most crucial) that must be discussed in an encounter between Islamic and Christian theologians. The religions of Israel, Christianity, and Islam are the three great world religions which profess a primary monotheism, explicitly regarded by Christianity and Islam as derived from Old Testament monotheism. But, in a history of faith and theology that has become increasingly clear and explicit, Christianity acknowledges the threefoldness of the one God and consequently faces the question from Old Testament monotheism and the faith of Islam and its theology as to whether the profession of faith in the triune God does not amount basically to an absolutely pernicious tritheism and whether the Christian acknowledgment of the oneness of God is no more than a disguise for such tritheism or (if it is not to be stated so radically) simply a doctrine that cannot really be implemented religiously and logically by someone for whom the acknowledgment of the oneness of God is not merely a proposition maintained verbally and theoretically but the very heart of his existence in theory and practice. On the other hand of course this question as such could be put by Christianity to the other two world religions: that is, it could be asked (assuming an actual history of revelation in which the one and basic content of the substance of faith is slowly more clearly articulated in forms that cannot afterward be forgotten) whether these two world religions have not failed to achieve that elucidation and radicalization of monotheism which finds expression precisely in the doctrine of the Trinity. [106] But for the task with which I propose to deal the first way of approaching the question will suffice.

All that we are asking here then is why the Christian doctrine of the Trinity does not cancel or threaten any real acknowledgment of the oneness of God. If the question is stated in this way, it is obvious that not each and every thing can be made equally explicit in the answer, that the doctrine of the Trinity simply cannot in itself be treated expressly thematically in all its fullness and vitality. If, as far as it is given expression here, it seems to the Christian theologian to be put forward somewhat pallidly and with a kind of sceptical restraint, this can be admitted from the outset and is justified by the limited scope of the following reflections. In the task attempted here it is quite impossible to avoid putting forward theologoumena and interpretations of the Christian doctrine of the Trinity that may up to a point be matters of controversy among Christian theologians. We are starting out from the conviction that we shall not do justice to the task before us if we simply repeat the Church's defined doctrine on the Trinity without at the same time interpreting it as theologians on our own account and at our own risk. At the moment when we attempt to present the official teaching of the Church on the Trinity in a way calculated to win the sympathy of an Islamic theologian, we must avert possible misunderstandings of this doctrine which on the one hand do not seem to be entirely removed simply by repeating the Church's official teaching but which on the other hand can certainly be overcome only in a theological reflection which the Christian theologian must admittedly accomplish largely on his own account and at his own risk.

In this undertaking of mine the following points must also be stressed. Unfortunately I am not an expert on Islamic theology. This means that any attempt at an explicit confrontation between Christian and Islamic theology is excluded from the very outset, since Islamic monotheism would then have to be presented and interpreted in its basic teaching, its variations and its history. This however is absolutely impossible for me. I can therefore put forward only a few considerations on the relationship between Christian monotheism and the Christian doctrine of the Trinity and at the same time hope that these preliminary considerations may be useful for an explicit discussion between Islamic and Christian monotheism, so that the discussion does not break down at the very beginning [107] as a result of misunderstandings of the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. It is also my intention not to permit the drift of these merely preliminary considerations to be lost in a purely abstract conceptual dialectic, but, as far as this is possible in a brief space, not to lose sight of what all the sublime and by no means simply avoidable conceptualities in the doctrine of the one and triune God imply existentially and religiously. After these preliminary observations we shall turn immediately to the essential question, without announcing in advance a formal structure of these reflections, since the actual course of the reflections must be justified by its own development.

Christianity is a primarily and not merely secondarily monotheistic religion. It acknowledges the oneness of God, of the God whom the Christian worships, by whom he knows he is created and called to salvation, whom he worships in absolute obedience, in faith, hope, and love. According to the evidence of the Christian Scriptures and the creed of Christendom this belief in the one sole God is not merely any sort of doctrine which happens to occur in the diversity of Christian articles of faith, but purely and simply the really basic dogma of Christianity. In regard to the understanding of this basic dogma it must be noted that the acknowledgment of the oneness of God is not primarily a metaphysical statement, even though this acknowledgment necessarily implies something of the kind. It is a question of a statement that is part of the history of salvation and revelation and must be acknowledged within that history. Christianity does not say primarily that there is only one sole absolute, but that he alone is God who is manifested as acting on us in the history of salvation and revelation; to this one alone can we really have that relationship of absolute devotion which constitutes the fundamental nature of religion. The statement on the oneness of God refers therefore not to an abstract absolute, alongside which any other is unthinkable from the very outset, from the very nature of the case, but to the God experienced concretely in his action on us, to the God of Abraham, of Isaac, to the God of the prophets, the God of Jesus.

This however is a statement that is anything but metaphysically obvious; it is not one that could be denied only by someone who had not understood at all the statement about the necessary oneness of an absolute or who thought he could accept in a gnostic or manicheistic sense the metaphysical absurdity of a good and a bad absolute [108] existing side by side. The Christian proposition of God's oneness refers to a concrete absolute. And in this sense it is anything but obvious. For it then implies either that whatever is the object of a religious – really radically religious – experience, wherever it appears in the history of religion and is genuine, is the same thing, is that which as one holds together and authenticates by its oneness all history of religious and numinous experience, which in the last resort then turns the diversity and apparent contradictoriness of the history of religion into a universal history of salvation; or that this religious intentionality purely and simply misses its goal, worships an idol and not God. And again, understood in this way, the statement is anything but obvious. People have always been tempted to attribute their numinous experiences, because of their diversity and inconsistency, to different absolutes, to interpret the pluralism of their religious experiences as an ultimate datum, to be polytheists explicitly or implicitly; or, if for metaphysical reasons they did not venture to take up this attitude, they were inclined to banish the ultimate unity behind this pluralism of religious experiences and their object into a region where it ceased to have any religious implications. But the monotheistic religions – which are not the same thing as monotheistic metaphysics – claim that this ultimate, most fundamental unity, which sustains everything, is infinite and omnipotent, does not merely dwell in a remote solitude in principle outside the reach of man, but, without dissipating its oneness, can as itself penetrate into the pluralism even of this world and be present there, can itself become concrete.

The monotheism of Christianity and of the two other world religions therefore must be understood both as concrete monotheism and also as universal, since the concrete God, who appears actively in an authentic religion, is as such the one and absolute and, since this very God because of his absoluteness and oneness is the God of the whole world and because of his universal salvific will, is active everywhere in his world. Understood in this way the monotheism of the genuine monotheistic religions must therefore either see the trend of other numinous experiences and religions as directed to their own concrete God, or reject them as missing their goal, or radically relativize such numinous experiences and set them apart from theism properly so called by interpreting them (as can be observed in all three monotheistic world religions) as experiences of [109] created angelic powers of a good or evil nature. If the God of religious monotheism, despite his infinity, incomprehensibility, and (as Creator) preeminence over the world, is nevertheless the concrete God who appears precisely where we are, without himself disintegrating into a pluralism of numinous powers, then all these three monotheistic religions, each in its own way and more or less radically, have inevitably (in Christian terms) an incarnatory character, since the concreteness of the God who acts in history is meant to allow him to be present precisely in his sole real divinity itself. Whether then this incarnatory character, which is involved in monotheism understood in this way, is related to a 'covenant', to a sacred book that is really God's book itself, to a definite person who is the presence of God – all these are further questions which of course cannot be pursued here.

After these brief indications of the meaning of Christian monotheism, we now ask whether it is compatible with the Christian doctrine of the Trinity of God or not. Is the doctrine of monotheism and that of the divine Trinity to be made compatible only by verbal artifice? Can these two statements be shown to give simultaneous expression to a single, indisputable religious fact? Our basic thesis, put forward here, is meant to show that the doctrine of the Trinity can and must be understood not as a supplement or an attenuation of Christian monotheism, but as its radicalization, assuming only that this monotheism is itself taken really seriously as concrete monotheism based on the experience of salvation history which does not banish God in his oneness out of Christianity's experience of salvation history and into a metaphysically abstract solitude.

With this basic thesis, which must be understood in a positive and not necessarily exclusive sense, our concern, as indicated from the beginning, is not with the assertion that (from the aspect of this thesis about the Trinity as radicalness of monotheism and not as its supplement or attenuation) the whole fullness of the Christian doctrine of the Trinity can be accepted as a datum or whether it must be said that this is not the case. We can leave this question aside here. Before we turn directly to this basic thesis of ours, elucidating and substantiating it, it seems appropriate to attempt to clear up some perhaps crude misunderstandings of this Christian doctrine of the Trinity. These misunderstandings are widespread, not only outside orthodox Christianity (even in liberal theologies from Unitarianism [110] onward, which are meant to be Christian), but also seem to make themselves felt subcutaneously, latent in theologies of Christianity which as such and in principle are orthodox, although it is impossible to produce detailed evidence of this here.

Of course, it is impossible to repeat here the long, difficult and varied history of the doctrine of the Trinity, which objectively (insofar as it is dogma properly speaking) found its dogmatically binding and hitherto final formulation in the age of the great Fathers, was stated again summarily at the Council of Florence, and received further profound interpretations in high scholasticism and afterward; but all this is theology and not dogma of Christianity. All that we propose to do here, presupposing this official, binding teaching of the Church and its history, is to put forward a few remarks directed against possible or real misunderstandings inside and outside Christian orthodoxy.

I would like first of all to say frankly and sincerely that the term 'person' in the doctrine of the Trinity seems to me to be misleading or open to misunderstanding. This is not to deny that the term involves a binding linguistic usage for the Catholic theologian, that the proposition, 'The one God in his one sole nature subsists in three persons', rightly understood, is correct and is a defined truth of faith. But even if this is taken for granted, the fact remains that the term 'person' can be and has constantly been misunderstood. It must continually be recalled that the history in dogmatic statements of a particular term (which as actually understood does not retain purely and simply the meaning that the Church wants to give to it) is not a history that has been or can be guided solely by the Church's magisterium. Consequently the possibility is not as such and a priori excluded that the continued course of such a history of terminology, taking place outside the sphere of faith and nevertheless influencing the actual understanding of these terms in a dogmatic statement, may threaten or almost destroy the usefulness and intelligibility of terms used officially by the Church and that this sort of thing can be maintained only by difficult and arduous measures of support, put forward specially and subsequently, for the meaning of such a term as understood by the Church. This, it seems to me, is today and has for a long time been the situation with the term 'person'.

If someone today, whether Christian or not, hears the statement that there are three persons in God, he will think instinctively of [111] three subjects differing from one another in their subjectivity, knowledge, and freedom, and wonder what kind of logic it is that permits three persons understood in this way to be simultaneously one and the same God. Even if this modern man uses the definition of official textbook theology, that personality is the subsistence of a rational nature, and if he is told that the rational nature need not be increased numerically in line with the plurality of subsistences, he is still in danger of thinking of the rationality of these subsistences as sharing their plurality, of thinking of them as three reciprocally related centres of mental action, related to one another as such. Or, conversely, if the person hearing about the Trinity does not appreciate these logical difficulties and more or less forgets the proposition about the oneness of the divine nature, if he begins to speak of the three divine persons, he imagines these persons distinct from one another as three realities with reciprocal relationships which are understood in their diversity as at least also founded on or constituted by elements which are by no means really distinct from one another according to the Christian dogma of the Trinity, but belong to the essential sphere of God, which exists in strict identity only as one, this fact however being more or less forgotten in this conception (especially under the tacit but effective influence of a modern notion of person).

This popular, unelaborated idea of the three persons, latent even at the highest levels of theology, but heterodox if thought out radically to the end, is meant (inevitably) to fill out speculatively the reciprocal relationality of the three persons (which, according to the Council of Florence, constitutes them as 'persons') and at the same time consciously or unconsciously borrows from the content of God's essentiality, although it is in fact recognized that this nature of God and all that it contains is absolutely one and unique and that the dogma of this uniqueness of the divine nature must be completely upheld. In this conception the 'persons' know one another, have a mutual love of each other, speak with each other, and so on. If however we get to work on such elucidations of the diversity of the three 'persons', we bring into this reciprocity of their relations as constituting itself the diversity of the persons (at any rate in the light of the modern idea of person which is thrust upon us) essential realities of God which truly exist only as one and which simply cannot constitute distinctions. If, for example, it is said that between [112] the divine persons there exists a mutual knowledge and love, this is not to be rejected as heterodox; but it may be asked what precisely statements of this kind are supposed to mean if knowledge and love in any case belong in the first place to the sphere of the one nature of God, if it is not clear what we are to understand by a threefold personal relativity in knowledge and love, if and insofar as this relationality is clearly (if only conceptually) distinguished from the essentiality of knowing and loving, if, for example, it is also considered (for example, in the proposition that the Holy Spirit is the mutual love of Father and Son) that Father and Son by the very fact of possessing the divine nature are necessarily essential love and must be regarded strictly as only a single principle in the spiration of the Spirit. The embarrassment arising from the use of the term 'person' in the theology of the Trinity (at least when the modern notion of person continually and today inevitably comes to mind) was evident in the classical theory of the Trinity as taught by Augustine and in the Middle Ages. According to this theory, it must be said that the Father knows himself because he is in possession of the original nature of God, he utters the Logos because he is by his nature in his unoriginated knowing self-possession, and nevertheless we want to explain that the Father knows himself in and through uttering the eternal Logos as distinct from himself. These problems cannot be pursued further or set out in detail here.

It cannot of course be denied that in principle the problems might be endured in the last resort by appealing to the unfathomable mystery of the trinitarian God, without investigating them in a strictly logical way. But an appeal of this kind cannot be allowed to relieve us the problems when they perhaps arise, not inevitably because of the mystery, but as a result of an indiscriminate and speculatively too little considered use of the term 'person'. In the last resort, the above remarks may at least amount to a warning about the problems of an indiscriminate use of the term 'person' in the doctrine of the Trinity.

This warning may be explained from another aspect. In the Church's official teaching on the Trinity 'person' and 'hypostasis' ('subsistence') are used synonymously, if the fact is disregarded that the hypostasis of a person means the subsistence of an intellectual nature (and in God there is only one such nature). Nevertheless, these terms are not simply synonymous either in their historical [113] origins or in their use on the one hand predominantly in Latin theology and on the other hand predominantly by the Greek Fathers, as also in the subsequent history of the formulation of the doctrine of the Trinity; they are distinguished from one another at least by clearly perceptible nuances. In any case the idea of hypostasis has not developed in the same way as the idea of person, which is now more closely associated with a modern understanding of subjectivity, so that personality and subjectivity come to the fore to such an extent that the use of the term 'person' in the doctrine of the Trinity becomes increasingly problematic, both in the popular understanding of the doctrine outside orthodox Christianity and also in its speculative utilization inside a theology of the Trinity which seeks to be orthodox and not to obscure the oneness of the divine nature. In view of all this, without questioning the legitimacy of the Church's traditional official linguistic usage, speaking of three persons in God, we might wonder if it would be more appropriate to speak of three hypostases in God (or, to express it in a more modern form, of three modes of subsistence of the one God in his one sole nature) and in this way more easily to prevent popular misunderstandings of the doctrine of the Trinity and also in what really amounts to indiscriminate speculative interpretations of this doctrine in current theology. It seems to me (if it is not too presumptuous on the part of an individual theologian to say this) that the term 'hypostasis' or 'mode of subsistence' on the one hand is quite suitable to express and retain the real substance of the dogma of the Trinity and on the other hand involves fewer dangers of what is in the last resort a tritheistic misunderstanding of the trinitarian dogma. All this however amounts and can amount to no more than very brief and awkwardly expressed suggestions.

At any rate we cannot be content to make use of any kind of blurred, indistinct concept of 'person', continually in a process of historical development, when speaking about three persons in God, and then to assume that we have understood and correctly expressed the dogma of the Trinity. This warning was really the sole point of these somewhat lengthy reflections. But it is a warning that seems important to me. Even an Islamic theologian may and must allow for the possibility that his denial of the Christian doctrine of the Trinity may be no more than a denial of a proposition that by no means expresses the content of that doctrine, since even a Christian [114] theologian does not find it easy in his own thinking to avoid misunderstandings of the term 'person' which he is continually using.

Coming now at last more immediately and more perceptibly to the basic thesis formulated earlier, that the doctrine of the Trinity is not a supplement or an attenuation, but a radicalization of Christian monotheism, we begin again from a different standpoint. We are starting out from the proposition that the economic Trinity is the immanent Trinity and vice versa. I do not know exactly when and by whom this theological axiom was formulated for the first time. But it seems to be established in theology today or is at least a theologoumenon that cannot be a priori rejected as heterodox, but can safely be used in theological reflection. No Christian can seriously deny that there is an understanding of the doctrine of the Trinity in terms of the economy of salvation, that there is an experience of the history of salvation and revelation of a threefold kind. The history of revelation and salvation brings us up against the ineffable mystery of the unencompassable, unoriginated God who is called Father, who does not live and remain in a metaphysical remoteness, but who seeks in all his incomprehensibility and sovereignty and freedom to impart himself to the creature as its eternal life in truth and love. This one and incomprehensible God is unsurpassably close to man historically in Jesus Christ, who is not simply one prophet in a still continuing series of prophets but the final and unsurpassable self-promise of this one God in history. And this one and the same God imparts himself to man in the innermost centre of human existence as Holy Spirit for salvation and for the consummation which is God himself. For Christian faith then there are two utterly radical and definitive and unsurpassable factualities, modes of existence, of the one God in the world, factualities which are the final salvation freely granted by God to the world, in history and transcendence.

As permanent, these two factualities are always to be distinguished, even though (and this is not to be specially explained here) they are mutually dependent. It is of course not clearly obvious from the outset that there are only two such factualities of God himself in himself for his creation. If we could presuppose the doctrine of the immanent Trinity on the two internal divine processions as only two, it would be easy to answer the question of the exclusiveness of the two divine modes of factuality for the world. But, since we must first of all here understand the economic Trinity as immanent, the question [115] is not so easy to answer at this point. But (and this may suffice here) we could say that the diversity, unity, and mutual dependence of man's historicity and transcendality provide an adequate aid to understanding for the distinction, unity, and exclusiveness of the two factualities of God, assuming however that we regard man from the outset as the image of God and do not forget that this image 'man' must from the outset be such that he can be the recipient of God's self-communication: that is, what is to be communicated must necessarily correspond to the nature of the recipient of the communication, and vice versa. If, with all the unity and mutual interdependence, there is really a permanent duality of the divine modes of factuality in God's self-communication to the world, this means at least that there is what we describe as the economic Trinity. The unoriginated God, who imparts himself in two different modes of factuality and because of the unity and diversity of these two modes and because of the unencompassable sovereignty which he retains even in his self-communication, may not be understood simply in a lifeless identity with these two factualities. In this salvific economic Trinity the unoriginated and permanently sovereign God is called Father; in his self-communication to history, Logos; in his self-communication to man's transcendentality, Holy Spirit. (We prefer to use here the term 'Logos', which is also authorized by the New Testament, since at this point we want to avoid the question of whether the 'Son' of the Father, who is Jesus according to the New Testament, designates even in the earliest New Testament statements, as distinct from later statements of the New Testament or of the magisterium, an exclusive salvific economic mode of factuality of God and thus an immanent mode of subsistence of God, or more fundamentally the unique unity of the man Jesus with God-Father as such.) For the Christian, then, there is undoubtedly a salvific economic Trinity.

In regard to this statement however it is essential to see and acknowledge that the duality of God's factualities for us does not get in the way of the factuality of God in himself or that the latter is not mediated by something that is not God. Logos and Holy Spirit are not to be regarded as mediating modalities which are different from the one God. For since Christianity rejects any neoplatonic, Plotinian, gnostic or similar idea of a descending self-emptying God, they would then have to be regarded as created realities, which, like all [116] other created realities, would by their nature point to the God who always remains remote, but would not mediate God as such in his innermost reality. In God's self-communication to the creature, radically understood, the mediation itself must be God and cannot amount to a creaturely mediation. These reflections however would seem largely irrelevant even to a religious person who is a theist, if he wants to remain obediently and humbly alone looking to the incomprehensible God from an infinite distance, not venturing at all to realize that this infinite and incomprehensible God might also be the God who is utterly close and immediate and not only the infinitely remote Creator-God. But if and when the thirst for God in himself imparted to man by God himself is admitted, if and when the ultimate unsurpassable statement of revelation that God himself as such wills to give himself to men is heard and accepted, in the sense in which this statement emerges clearly in the New Testament in the experience of Jesus and his Spirit, then it is impossible to avoid the admission that there is a twofold self-communication of God in diversity and unity, the modalities of which in their unity and distinction are again God himself strictly as such. But this means first of all in the dimension of the salvific economic Trinity that the statement that the Logos and the Holy Spirit are God himself is not an attenuation or obscuration of monotheism rightly understood, but its radicalization.

In describing monotheism at the beginning as religious and theological, we said that it was not an abstract metaphysical theory about a remote absolute, but a statement about the sole absolute, about the God with whom we have to deal concretely in salvation history. If this God of concrete salvation history realizes there his absolute and unconditional self-communication in history and transcendence, then on the one hand the diversity of these modes of factuality cannot be denied, but on the other hand this mode of factuality cannot be thrust between the one God and the creature graced by God as something merely created, which would then establish God's remoteness and not his closeness. If and insofar as (and this of course cannot be questioned) creaturely mediations between God and men can be conceived and do in fact exist and when these occur in the field of man's religious relationship to God and thus have a numinous quality, there is really always a danger of an explicit or disguised polytheism. Man seizes on such a mediation, [117] grasps it absolutely firmly, affirms it at least implicitly in this firm grasp as God himself, and yet in truth it is no more than a finite creature that cannot by any means convey God in himself.

For the Christian then the religious monotheist is inescapably confronted by certain alternatives. He may demythologize in a theoretical monotheism all (even permanent and unavoidable) mediations of his relationship to God (whether these are understood as word, Scripture, sacrament, or institution, etc.) as purely created, in the last resort thrusting the absolute God into an infinite remoteness; thus he becomes a merely theoretical monotheist, for whom God is as distant as the supreme divinity among ancient and primitive religious figures, because in the concrete he has to cling to these particular and finite mediations of explicitly or surreptitiously polytheistic character; in practice then religion becomes again devotion belonging to the present world and is simply a numinous transfiguration of that world. Or the person takes radical monotheism seriously, but at the same time for his own part refuses to see the mode of factuality of the monotheistic God as itself divine, and then he must see God's mode of factuality as radically creaturely and finite and lying on this side of the abyss between God and creature; thus he ends up again with a merely theoretical and abstract monotheism, which places God at an infinite distance, and in the actual practice of religion necessarily clings to these created mediations as all that he can regard concretely as properly religious, whether they are called commandment, Scripture, covenant of God, or anything else. In either case he will hesitate uncertainly between an abstract monotheism, which simply cannot take entirely seriously what is proper to religious monotheism, and a concealed polytheism, which in practice makes absolute those created realities which are supposed to convey God to him, although they are finite. (It seems to me that we might follow this hesitation between an abstract monotheism and an unadmitted polytheism up to the modern Western history of ideas, in Hölderlin, Rilke, Kerenyi, Heidegger and others.) There is a continual attempt to distinguish between the divine and the gods. Or, finally, the religious monotheist, sustained by God's grace itself, has absolute confidence that the absolute God as such has come absolutely close to him. But then he must consider the mediating modes of factuality as themselves divine in the strict sense of the term. He must say both these things, even though he cannot offer for this dual [118] statement any higher synthesis, surpassing it, making intelligible from a more fundamental standpoint the statement that the one sole God as himself is close to man in two modes of factuality and that these two modes of factuality are themselves God.

This absolutely comprehensive dual statement is therefore the radicalization of that monotheism which comes within a religious dimension. For the monotheistic God is the God who is close to us in concrete salvation history. It is only when created modes of mediation (although these also exist) in the ultimate sense are denied to him that he is really the sole God, close to us, who is present as himself in salvation history. The proposition of the identity of God's modes of factuality with God himself is only the converse of the proposition that any purely created mediation between God and man removes this God into an absolute remoteness, turns a concrete into an abstract monotheism and permits man to be implicitly polytheistic in the concreteness of his religious life. God must mediate to himself through himself; otherwise he remains remote in the last resort and in this remoteness is present only by the divisive multiplicity of created realities which point to God's remoteness. This is the meaning of the proposition on the divinity of the two fundamental modes of God's factuality in the world and it thus also means that concrete monotheism is taken completely seriously.

When we reassert at this point in our reflections the axiom invoked at an earlier stage of the identity of the salvific economic and the immanent Trinity, we are brought directly to the classical Christian theology of the Trinity. Since these two modes of factuality of the one God in and despite their diversity are themselves God and not something created and different from him, they must belong always and eternally to God himself as such. In order to bring out clearly that they belong to God himself as such, they are called in classical trinitarian theology internal divine processions. The un-originated God (called 'Father') has from eternity the opportunity of an historical self-expression and likewise the opportunity of establishing himself as himself at the innermost centre of the intellectual creature as the latter's dynamism and goal. These two eternal possibilities (which are pure actuality) are God, are to be distinguished from each other, and are to be distinguished by this distinction also from the unoriginated God. Insofar as they belong to God himself as such, since they simply could not otherwise be God himself, they [119] can be called modes of subsistence, in order to make clear that the two modes of factuality of God himself as such in regard to the world really belong to himself as such and do not mean a modality which would be brought into existence by a free decree of God and would consequently belong inevitably to the sphere of what is created and finite and not of God himself. It cannot of course be shown here that the classical doctrine of the Trinity could be made intelligible from this starting point. But a traditional Christian theologian could not deny this possibility, if he considers the connection between the two 'missions' and the two 'processions' in God.

In my humble opinion, it cannot be denied that it is possible from our starting point to arrive at a theology of the Trinity which does not a priori have to work with the traditional concept of person, but can make use of the concepts of hypostases (as distinct from persons), of modes of subsistence of one and the same God. But we referred earlier to the problems created by the use of the term 'person' in the theology of the Trinity, so that the starting point suggested here cannot a priori be regarded with suspicion merely because it does not from the very outset quite clearly lead to a triad precisely of persons. This does not mean at all that it is impossible to arrive at the concept of person from our starting point, assuming of course that this notion of person is itself really clarified and remains continually clear of those misunderstandings which, as we said, at least today tend to cling to it. These however are all questions that could be discussed only in a highly developed theology of the Trinity and not in these brief reflections.

In conclusion, in this apologetic for a correctly understood doctrine of the Trinity compatible with an unambiguous monotheism, we must refer to one or two points to which, for instance, Aquinas himself also drew attention. For the most part, we Christians talk a little too ingenuously of three divine persons and then say that each one of these three is God, so that (as we should readily admit to ourselves) we are exposed to the danger of being regarded as tritheists. In the logic of ordinary speech it is possible to add together a number of things only if they are seen as similar, but not different things seen precisely as different. If then we speak of three persons in God, we suggest involuntarily that one and the same term 'person' applies in strictly the same way to Father, Logos, and Spirit and that there is a threefold occurrence of this sameness. But this is [120] contrary to dogmatic teaching on the Trinity, since Father, Logos, and Spirit are absolutely identical at every point where they are the same, so that this sameness exists strictly speaking only once, and since they are only distinguished by that in which they differ and consequently cannot really be counted together under one figure. Without wanting to abolish the traditional modes of expression in the doctrine of the Trinity, the difficulty of finding appropriate terms must be kept in mind when we are talking about the mystery of the Trinity in the presence of strict monotheists. Even if we completely respect the linguistic usages of the classical theology of the Trinity, we might say that it is by no means absolutely necessary to speak of 'three persons' even in regard to the Trinity (a usage which is not to be found anyway in the New Testament) in order to explain what Christianity really means by this doctrine. In religious language we could safely speak of the Father who is ineffably close as himself in his Logos in history and in his Spirit in ourselves; we could admit that this Logos and this Spirit, however much they are to be distinguished from him and from one another and cannot be reduced to a lifeless sameness, are God himself and not intermediate beings, which would have to be regarded as creatures or would introduce a subordinationist process of evolution into God.

If we admitted this and so kept more closely to the linguistic usage of the New Testament, we would – I think – express the substance of the Christian dogma of the Trinity and perhaps be able more easily to allay the misgivings of other monotheists, even though it remains true that these other monotheists must continually be urged to make an effort to understand correctly the Christian doctrine of the Trinity, however imperfectly and inevitably also misleadingly it may be formulated. If then the question arises of a formulation of the dogma of the Trinity which strategically and didactically is as easy as possible to assimilate outside the sphere of Christianity and if at the same time restrained formulations are recommended, not to conceal but to avoid superfluous misunderstandings, then of course Christian theology must not be prevented from going more deeply into the mystery of the immanent Trinity on the lines of the speculation of the Greek Fathers, of Augustine, and of medieval theology from Aquinas to Richard of St. Victor, assuming however that it will also consider the same mystery of the salvific economic Trinity [121] really with the utmost intellectual vigour and love and make it fruitful for Christian religious life.

As I said at the very beginning, I am aware that I have not really carried out a dialogue with Islamic theology, but only indicated a few points from the problems within Christianity with reference to monotheism and the doctrine of the Trinity, in the modest hope that it might perhaps be remotely useful for a real dialogue in which Islamic and Christian theologians would talk about a joint profession of faith in the one sole God and ask at the same time why this profession is not curtailed or threatened by the Christian doctrine of the threefoldness of this one sole God.

DIALOGUE WITH GOD?

Anyone who reads pious Christian literature or listens to sermons on prayer will be familiar with the statement that prayer is a 'dialogue with God'. Consequently there is no need here expressly to produce evidence of this stock theme of Christian spirituality and the theology of prayer.[1] But perhaps it is not entirely pointless to offer some reflections on the question of whether and in what sense prayer can be described as a dialogue with God. For the term 'dialogue' presupposes that in prayer, not only man, but also God himself speaks, addresses us and responds in his own words to what we say. The question which is to occupy us here is not the more general and comprehensive question of the possibility and the preconditions of prayer as such – that is, of the personal address which man directs to God (certainly not a simple problem today) – but only a question of whether and in what sense it can be said that in prayer God addresses man, so that we can really describe prayer as a dialogue between God and man.[2]

Modern man certainly has great difficulty in seeing and acknowledging that in prayer he experiences something like a personal approach of God. If (as is justified in this brief article) we disregard the more comprehensive questions of a personal experience of God as [123] existing and of the relationship between God on the one hand and man and the world on the other[3] – that is, the more comprehensive questions which seem difficult enough to man today – the difficulty of experiencing prayer as dialogue lies in the fact that what people are accustomed or inclined to interpret in an unsophisticated piety as God's speaking to us in prayer is experienced in the first place as their own mental state or activity (which is undoubtedly true, cannot be denied and today can no longer be naively overlooked), and the question may be asked how this can be understood as a special manifestation of God, as his speaking to us. Modern man has the impression up to a point of talking to himself in prayer and of wondering whether this conversation with himself may also be passing over God, whether his reflection on himself perhaps takes place 'in the presence of' God. If he experiences in prayer certain sudden, unexpected, and powerful irruptions and outbursts of new insights and impulses (which, of course, certainly happen), modern man will interpret such occurrences in the first place as events within his own person, as deeper mental processes seeking expression, as the emergence of what has hitherto been suppressed, as a fortunate coordination of subconscious associations, or something of the kind. He will point to the fact that the same somewhat extraordinary mental processes are also present when

[1] From the very beginning, the present author has been continually occupied with the subject of prayer in his publications. We need only refer to the book Von der Not und dem Segen des Gebetes ('On the Burden and the Blessing of Prayer'), which appeared for the first time in 1949, and also to the appropriate articles in the volumes of Theological Investigations.

[2] For a general survey of the theme of prayer, the reader may consult the article 'Prayer' by J. Sudbrack in Sacramentum Mundi, vol. 5 (London/New York, 1970), pp. 74-81, who also touches briefly on our chosen theme, but then refers for further details to the article 'Word of God' by L. Scheffczyk in Sacramentum Mundi, vol. 6 (London/New York, 1970), pp. 362-68.

[3] See the article 'Experience' by K. Lehmann in Sacramentum Mundi, vol. 2 (London/New York, 1968), pp. 307-9. But as far as we are concerned, all this involves the problems connected with the term 'person' (cf. 'Person' in Sacramentum Mundi, vol. 4 [London/New York, 1969], especially pp. 404-9) and its application to God, which has been discussed in detail from different aspects, particularly in recent times. Cf. 'Observations on the Doctrine of God in Catholic Dogmatics' in Theological Investigations, vol. 9 (London/New York, 1972), pp. 127-44.

there is no question of specifically religious contents, in artistic intuitions and fresh ideas that cannot really be preprogrammed, in sudden transformations of the whole person which are not expressly religiously motivated, and so on. Whether he is right or not entirely right is something that need not be investigated here; in any case modern man has the impression that it would mean accepting miracles or old-fashioned mythology, if he were to regard an unexpected and powerful mental experience, because of its suddenness, intensity, and significance, at once as the result of an isolated intervention of God in space and time into the normal course of the history of his consciousness. All this seems to him, at least as a general rule, to be as improbable in the mental [124] sphere as the assumption that miracles occur in the external world as new interventions of God 'from outside' into his world.[4] Even if he acknowledges the existence of God, he explains the course of his inner life by intramundane causes, which still remain intramundane even when they produce less ordinary phenomena in the sphere of consciousness.

Even today however there are many people in the Church, especially in the many groups cherishing an enthusiastic piety, who unhesitatingly regard certain mental experiences, particularly in speaking with tongues, baptism of the Spirit, in complete conversion, etc., as charismatic interventions of the Holy Spirit 'from outside',[5] who more or less ignore the simple fact that all such occurrences are primarily their own and (at least until there is conclusive proof of the opposite, which has not yet been produced even by parapsychological phenomena) must be explained as effects of conditions of an internal or external character present in themselves. Moreover, for the outsider, all such enthusiastic phenomena have their parallels in religions outside Christianity which clearly display the singularity, the horizon of consciousness, the language and the limitations of all these mental causes, so that it is scarcely possible to discover or seek there anything that would necessarily have to be attributed to a special and miraculous intervention of God. As a result of these and similar considerations, it is very difficult for modern man to discover in his conscious prayer anything that he might simply interpret as God's speaking as distinct from his own words. To him prayer seems to be a monologue or at best a conversation with himself, not a dialogue with God, not an event that could be described seriously and without too many qualifications as conversation or dialogue.[6]

[125] In this difficult situation we might be tempted to interpret prayer as dialogue with God in the sense that it means coming to terms with the word of God (reading, applying, etc.) which is present in revelation and in Scripture.[7] God speaks to us in Scripture, prayer as meditation on Scripture responds to this word, and thus there is a conversation, a dialogue with God in prayer. For the Christian, who regards Scripture as the word of God, this view certainly makes sense. But this explanation too has its difficulties. On closer examination it is clear that it only shifts the problem. For revelation received in a person's mind (it is not revelation at all unless it 'gets there') and revelation objectified in Scripture are both in [4] The suddenness of the occurrence of these phenomena – the causes of which have not been grasped and for the most part can be understood only with difficulty – is an aspect which is discussed in connection with miracles, even though not comprehensively or conclusively. Here we can do no more than allude to it. As far as prayer is concerned, in my opinion this aspect has been considered only infrequently and inadequately. There will be more to be said about this in what follows.

[5] Here we need only recall movements like 'Jesus People' and the Pentecostal movement, among others, which are evidently becoming increasingly established in Europe.

[6] On the clarification of the question of how 'conversation' as such is to be understood, cf. the article 'Gespräch' by J. B. Metz in Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, vol. 4 (Freiburg, 1960), cols. 836-37. In our context it is also useful to consider J. B. Metz, 'Akt, religiöser Akt' in LThK, vol. 1 (Freiburg, 1975). cols. 256-59, and also K. Rahner, 'Gebet IV. Dogmatisch' in LThK, vol. 4, cols, 542-45.

[7] A first approach to the vast field of 'meditation' opened up here can be found in section III.A of the article 'Spirituality' in Sacramentum Mundi, vol. 6 (London/New York, 1970), pp. 157-60.

principle exposed to the same uncertainty: that is, how a content of consciousness in a person's subjectivity and carrying with it all the limitations of that subjectivity, which must in the first place be interpreted as the effect of this human causality, can be heard and understood as God's word.[8] But, apart from this vast problem, which cannot be pursued further here, there is yet another difficulty about this explanation.

The devout person thinks he perceives in prayer a concrete approach of God, calling him in his individuality and individual life's decision. But if the person praying had to regard the application of the word of Scripture (as such universal) to himself and his concrete situation in life as his own work, undertaken on his own account and at his own risk, merely as the application of universal norms to a concrete situation for an individual decision (where the important thing is what goes beyond the universal), then there would be no dialogue in the sense understood when prayer is described as such. There would be no more than a purely human application of a universal divine word to an individual and the concrete, always unique questions relating to his own life. The person praying remains in a conversation with himself, even though with the aid of a universal divine word. The transition from universal revelation to the concrete [126] imperative is the work of that person alone, even if the transition is understood as coming about with the aid of divine grace, as long as it is not clear how the assistance of grace in the application of the word of Scripture to himself and his life's questions can be interpreted as a divine address, how then also the concrete imperative calling the person praying can be understood as a call of God.

This assistance of grace for concrete decision is known in theology as 'illumination' and 'inspiration', but it is not certain what exactly is meant by this expression. For there is at least one important school in theology[9] which interprets this illumination and inspiration, insofar as they are the condition of salvific acts, as purely 'entitative' and outside consciousness, so that nothing is gained for an understanding of God's speaking to us in prayer. Even if it is said that such an occurrence in prayer, in which a salvific decision is achieved, is accompanied, together with the entitative supernatural grace sustaining it, by 'healing' graces which urge this event on toward a salvific decision,[10] this still does not get us much further with our question. For this healing grace is interpreted as natural in itself and in the first place as the limit of intramundane causes, so that for the question of being addressed by God in prayer it is exposed to the same difficulties from which it started out at the very beginning. This healing grace too is part of intramundane reality involved in the interconnection of causes and effects and in this sense can certainly be understood (like everything else in the world) as God's creation, by which God intends our salvation, but for that very reason no more God's speech to us than is anything else that we encounter in our history.

Not infrequently we try to make the question easy for ourselves by first assuming a knowledge of the personality of God and immediately drawing the conclusion that he can be addressed by us. If we [127] get so far, it seems that we are already in a state of dialogue that [8] The author dealt with the fundamental questions of hearing revelation in his work Hearers of the Word (London/New York, 1969). This book later came up against a certain amount of criticism. We hope that our remarks here will make a modest contribution to clearing up misunderstandings and to a further development of some of our initiatives.

[9] On this cf. the surveys by L. Casutt and J. Auer in the articles 'Erleuchtung' and 'Erleuchtungsgnade' in LThK, vol. 3 (Freiburg, 1959), cols. 1014-16. In this connection also two publications by the present author may be considered and compared with one another: Inspiration in the Bible (Quaestiones Disputatae I; London/New York, 1958) and Visions and Prophecies (QD 10; London/New York, 1963). These references are meant only to underline the fact that there is still more to be done in the treatment of these questions.

[10] These aids were called 'healing graces' (gratiae sanantes) in the sense that they turn a free will that is 'sick' because of concupiscence into a 'healthy' free will. Cf. Indiculus 9, DS 248: 'liberum arbitrum . . . de languido sanum' ('free will . . . is brought . . . from sickness to health' [Neuner and Dupuis, The Christian Faith (Dublin, 1973), n. 1914]).

can immediately be actualized. But, even if we assume the knowledge that God is to be regarded in himself as wholly and entirely 'personal', this still does not justify the two further steps necessary for an actual dialogue with God. It is still by no means clear that this personal God can be addressed by us; and even more does it need to be made clear that he responds to our approach and does not remain silent. Even if we say in regard to the second step that he has come out of his silence, has spoken and imparted himself to us by his verbal revelation, there remains the question already raised, as to why the dialogue in prayer is more than a conversation with ourselves about God's universal revelation in his history of revelation, why it is more than the acceptance on our own account and at our own risk of what is said to us in this revelation.[11]

We must attempt to get further in a different way. The assumption hitherto taken for granted in our reflections on prayer as dialogue with God was that in prayer God tells us 'something'. The assumption behind our statement of the problem was that a certain individual, categorial content of consciousness, alongside many others, as directly effected in a special and outstanding way by God and in this special effectedness, constitutes something like a dialogue with God. And this assumption carried with it the difficulties of which we were speaking up to now. But how would it be if we were to say and could say that in prayer we experience ourselves as those who are spoken by God, who in the concreteness of our existence have our origin in and are at the disposal of God's supreme freedom? What if we say that what God tells us first of all in prayer we are ourselves in the determinedness of our freedom, in the indeterminability of our future, in the never completely revocable and never functionally rationalizable facticity of our past and present?[12] If in all these reflections we understand our question in this way, this means of [128] course a priori that this relationship between God and ourselves as 'partnership' and 'dialogue' is one that is unique and unparalleled and cannot simply be understood univocally according to the pattern of a relationship between human beings in the form of a partnership and a dialogue, so that of course from this standpoint also for our question the idea of 'dialogue' has the character of uniqueness and incomparability if it is meant to characterize the peculiarity of prayer.[13] If we can answer positively the questions now raised, then we are (in our transcendality which as such is experienced as derived, as we might say) ourselves the statement and address of God as heard.

This however is not to be understood simply as a universal proposition, but is a statement about a particular individual in his quite definite, unique, and historical concreteness, who is committed to himself and in this way experiences himself as the one spoken by God to himself. God's most fundamental word to us in our free uniqueness is not a word that occurs as something additional or as a single object among other objects of experience, categorically, at a definite point within the wider field of our consciousness; it is we ourselves in unity, totality, and dependence on the incomprehensible mystery that we call God, the word of God that we ourselves are and that as such is spoken to us. As soon as we read these propositions (which apparently sound purely existentially ontological), while assuming that [11] These ideas are certainly not difficult to understand, but they make clear by their unusualness how very much we are inclined here to take for granted in our thinking and arguing certain assumptions which on closer examination turn out to be far less defensible than we would wish. It is almost self-evident for this reason and in this sense that criticism is an indispensable task for a modern theology.

[12] The questions formulated here are by no means as artificial and arbitrary as they might seem at first sight. These working hypotheses – at this point they are not suggested to the reader as anything else – will turn out in the further course of this train of thought to be intrinsically and objectively substantiated, at least in the sense that such a conception cannot be rejected in principle as impossible and unjustified.

[13] This will have to be stressed in regard to a way of thinking that neglects the analogical character of such speaking and deals too directly with these structures. This is not to deny the fundamental right to do so; in fact we are attempting here to say something about this relationship as partnership and dialogue.

this transcendentality is always from the outset and everywhere (because of God's universal salvific will) raised and radicalized toward God's immediacy by what we call supernatural grace as God's self-communication, they are seen to be directly theological statements)[14] If, by mind and grace in one, man experiences himself as the one spoken by God himself and this constitutes his actual nature, in the concreteness of which the free grace of God's self-communication also participates, and if he allows in prayer for this existence and freely accepts it as God's word in which God promises himself in his word to man, then by this very [129] fact prayer (in a primary sense, to be further widened below) is dialogic, a conversation with God. Man hears himself then as God's address, which is filled with God's promise of himself by faith, hope, and love, in God's gracious self-communication. He does not hear 'something' additional to himself as to someone presupposed in his inert facticity, but himself as the word spoken to him, in which God constitutes him a hearer and to whom he promises himself as answer.

It cannot be our task here of course to substantiate the statements just made in terms of a theological or philosophical anthropology.[15] If that could be done here, it would be necessary to see that these statements were made and substantiated not only as objective statements appropriate to man as such and which occur to him only when he thinks and speaks about them in subsequent statements. Statements of this kind ought to be understood and substantiated as transcendental, that is, here simply as propositions whose content is established and known everywhere and always in man's mental and free self-realization as the unthematic condition of the possibility of all human existence, so that this transcendental dialogic existence can be admitted, thematicized up to a point and also accepted in explicit freedom in prayer, and thus prayer can be understood as dialogue. But, as we said, the meaning of these statements can neither be more closely explained nor more precisely substantiated. For that the reader must be referred to an anthropology developed elsewhere.[16]

So far, however, we have mentioned only one aspect of prayer, the 'transcendental' aspect, which enables us to see prayer as dialogue in a quite definite sense. We must now add a second aspect which both provides a real justification of the general understanding of prayer and dialogue and also clears up any mythological or miraculous misunderstandings. If, that is, man accepts unconditionally and genuinely this absolute openness toward God, derived from God [130] and his freedom (which is God's original word to man), if it is not concealed, distorted, or misused by man's prior decision in regard to quite definite categorial contents of his consciousness, then (if I may be allowed what may seem like an arbitrary leap in thought) we have what Ignatius of Loyola described in his Spiritual Exercises as 'indifference' and (when this indifference is really radically freely achieved and maintained) 'consolation . . . without any preceding cause'.[17] If, within such an ultimate dialogic freedom, a particular individual object of choice is encountered, which, even after long spiritual experience and questioning, does not distort, confuse, or restrict this pure openness to God, if it is experienced precisely as the medium by which this indifferent openness to God is accepted and remains intact in unconditional surrender to him – that is (conversely), in unconditional acceptance of God's word, that we ourselves are – then this categorial object of choice (however intramundane and relative it may be in itself) can and may be understood as a factor in this dialogic relationship between God and man, because and insofar as this chosen object is incorporated into the totality of the dialogic conversation, without imperiling or removing the latter's boundless and absolute openness. Seen objectively, as purely intramundane and categorial, such a categorial chosen object, on which a person decides in prayer, can always remain problematical, may perhaps turn out later (measured by man's intramundane needs and structures) to be inadequate, provisional, replaceable, and even detrimental; nevertheless, it is here and now the best medium of this indifferent, transcendental openness in which man knows himself as God's spoken word and consequently salvifically God's will.

[14] This means that a genuine, if specific, concreteness is asserted of the reality under consideration.
[15] The article 'Man (Anthropology)' by J. Splett, R. Pesch and K. Rahner in Sacramentum Mundi, vol. 3 (London/New York, 1969), pp. 358-70, provides a useful introduction to the subject. It includes a bibliography.

In this kind of logic of existential knowledge and freedom[18] prayer becomes dialogic even in regard to its categorial individual contents. What appears in consciousness with a kind of surprising suddenness [131] and unexpectedness or as sentimental feeling is not to be regarded simply for that reason as an effect of the Spirit and thus as an approach of God and consequently as needing today to be enthusiastically highly stylized in face of a down-to-earth and sceptical psychology. Where however the particular reality in consciousness, for which we decide, can be sustained as a positive medium in the face of a permanent and unconditional openness toward God (or, as we might say, in the face of an absolute critical freedom), this same particular object can be regarded as spoken to us by God in and together with that fundamental address of God to ourselves which we are ourselves and which we perceive and accept in prayer.

We are not claiming here that the two aspects of prayer, which we tried very briefly to outline, adequately establish the dialogic character of prayer. We shall be satisfied if it is agreed that we have elucidated a little more the dialogic character of prayer. Nor of course is it possible to explain the consequences of this conception of prayer as dialogue)[19] If it now seems more difficult than is generally assumed to see prayer seriously and realistically as dialogue with God and especially to experience it in practice thus 'demythologized' as dialogue, that is not to say that the ordinary believer has to keep all the reflections developed here explicitly in mind in his daily routine. After going through these considerations and this disenchantment, he may experience prayer in a kind of fresh naïvety as dialogue with God, simply because that is what it is in truth.

[18] The author put forward some ideas on this theme some time ago, in the light of a different starting point and with a different objective, in The Dynamic Element in the Church (London/New York, 1964), where the initiative in particular of Ignatius of Loyola was used to bring out the knowledge of God's concrete will in a specific situation. For further reflections on these lines cf. 'Observations on the Factor of the Charismatic in the Church' in Theological Investigations, vol. 12 (London/New York, 1974), pp. 81-97, and also the article in the Festschrift for J. Salaverri, entitled 'Einige Bemerkungen zu einer neuen Aufgabe der Fundamentaltheologie'.

[19] It may however be permitted to refer quite generally to 'Theses on the theme: faith and prayer' in Opportunities for Faith (London/New York, 1974), pp. 53-61, where the author attempted to formulate a few requirements for prayer today.

THE DEATH OF JESUS AND THE CLOSURE OF REVELATION

There is an old and well-known axiom in Catholic theology that Christian revelation, as addressed with binding force 'publicly' and 'officially' to everyone, was closed with the death of the last apostle and thus the history of revelation properly so-called came to an end, even though the history of the understanding of revelation, the history of faith in this revelation and the history of theology continue. Hence the Second Vatican Council says in Dei Verbum no. 4: 'The Christian dispensation, therefore, as the new and definitive covenant, will never pass away, and we now await no further new public revelation before the glorious manifestation of our Lord Jesus Christ'. This axiom of the completeness of public divine revelation is substantiated in the council with the reference to Jesus Christ, the Word of God made flesh, who completed the work of salvation, in whose life, death, and resurrection and sending of the Spirit the Father is seen. In this declaration in the Second Vatican Council on the definitiveness of Christian revelation there is no explicit reference to the apostles or to the end of the apostolic age with the death of the last apostle. But, since in the conciliar text it is not a question so much of a precise chronological determination of the end as of indicating the reason for this end, the traditional formulation that revelation was closed with the death of the last apostle is not disowned by the council. On the other hand, however, it is not claimed that this formulation is clear or that it easily stands up to any critical questioning. No lesser person than Cardinal Bea, for example, drew from this axiom in its traditional formulation the conclusion that all the canonical Scriptures of the New Testament would [133] have had to be written before the death of the last apostle, since otherwise there would have been no one to make known the original revelation of the inspiredness of the last of the writings of the New Testament. But if, conversely, the emergence of the last of the inspired writings of the New Testament is placed after the presumed death of the last apostle and at the same time inspiration and the knowledge of inspiredness is understood in the traditional sense (a sense which is not immediately obvious), then all that remains to be said is that Christian revelation was closed with the end of the apostolic age, but that this age can safely be extended to the time of the emergence of the last of the writings of the New Testament. But however the end of the epoch of Jesus and his apostles is to be precisely chronologically determined (the age of the Church's coming to be as distinct from that of the fully established Church) the basic substance of the axiom in any case remains clear. God's revelation in Jesus Christ occurred historically once and for all, occupies a definite and limited spatio-temporal position in history, and is nevertheless unsurpassable and for all subsequent time irrevocably valid, so that nothing that is really 'new' can ever again occur in the history of revelation.

This axiom (given more precise expression, which is desirable but cannot be provided here) must be regarded in the light of the doctrine of the new and eternal covenant in Jesus Christ as Christian and Catholic dogma, but this certainly does not make it any easier for a modern mentality to assimilate. Joseph Ratzinger draws attention in his commentary on Dei Verbum to this difficulty of understanding for modern man. Here we cannot explain more closely either the difficulty or its solution. But, since this difficulty is important for our present question concerning the connection between Jesus' death and the completion of revelation, we must at least briefly give some attention to it. Modern man sees himself as existing in history, as a being absolutely open to the future, as a person who does not simply possess his nature from the beginning as something to which merely accidental modifications are added in the course of history, not permitting this statically conceived nature to be itself truly historical. He sees the necessity of coming to be in freedom, not as the stigma of his finiteness, but as the distinguishing mark of his freedom that is always freshly and surprisingly realized in self-transcendence into the future. Consequently man today will [134] always regard the history of religion (particularly if he does not dismiss this as a now obsolete and finished period within his history of emancipation) as opening out on to an unknown future. And if as a Christian he sees the history of revelation as always and everywhere at work, at least in the past, in this history of religion, since history is always salvation history and since salvation history is not possible without faith or, consequently, without revelation, then the proposition about the end of the history of revelation in the midst of the continuing course of history as a whole seems to him at least difficult to understand. To say that the history of revelation is at an end seems to him to deprive history as a whole of its ultimate depth and dignity.

If in response to this difficulty it is pointed out that the Spirit of God of course always continues to lead the Church into all truth, that the history of the acceptance of revelation, of its adaptation to the ever new human person, the history of faith, continues, then at least it becomes easier than it usually is to see how to work out in theology the unity and continuity of (completed) revelation history and (continuing) history of faith, and thus up to a point to modify more clearly and legitimately the caesura laid down by the axiom. If it is said that the axiom teaches not so much the completeness as the unsurpassability of revelation in Jesus Christ (Dei Verbum has oeconomia christiana . . . nunquam praeteribit, translated 'the Christian dispensation . . . will never pass away'), then a terminological aid to understanding the axiom is certainly provided for modern man, since the latter can grasp the possibility of a chronologically fixed historical event being authoritative for all later times (but particularly for a genuine future) more easily than a historical event that is itself simply finished, does not continue, and yet claims a significance for later times. If however the axiom is understood in this sense of an historical unsurpassability, it needs to be given first of all a more exact formal explanation in terms of the philosophy and theology of history (something that has not yet been adequately considered in theology) and there must be an indication of the content implied in this unsurpassability of revelation in the Christ event.

In regard to this latter task, admittedly, a great deal has been done in theology and also in the Second Vatican Council. Since in Vatican II revelation is no longer understood as a mere communication of propositions (as it used generally to be), but as history (of which of [135] course propositions are also a part), the question of the unsurpassability of Christian revelation has become the question of the unsurpassability of the Christ event. Then of course it can be claimed that nothing further is said after Jesus Christ, not in the sense that a good deal more remains unsaid, but in the sense that all has been said, all is in fact given in the beloved Son in whom God and the world have become one. Then it can be said that God has irrevocably promised himself as historically perceptible in Jesus Christ to the world as its effective salvation in a self-communication of the absolute God himself as the absolute future of the world, a self-communication which from God's side effectively and irreversibly prevails in the world; then, too, it can be said that this promise is unsurpassable, because it is the self-promise of the absolute God in himself to the world. This promise then is not actually closed but opens out into an infinite future and in this sense is unsurpassable. History remains open in all its dimensions, even those of grace and revelation, and now moves in its openness within the historically accomplished promise of an absolute salvation, a promise which, from God's side, encompasses victoriously the ambivalence of the world's freedom for salvation or perdition.

As we said earlier, it is not our intention in these reflections to reconcile this axiom in detail and comprehensively with modern man's self-understanding. For this, something more would be required than the few and fragmentary suggestions just put forward. What will occupy us here is only the specific question as to whether and how the death of Jesus as such has a significance for the unsurpassability of the revelation event in Jesus Christ, and how in this light it is possible to make a contribution to the reconciliation of the modern mentality of an open future with the dogma of the unsurpassability and 'completedness' of Christian revelation. The latest official formulation of this axiom by the Church (as above-mentioned) at Vatican II does in fact refer to Jesus' death and resurrection in the statements preceding this conciliar axiom. But it is not clear whether this reference to the death (and resurrection) of Jesus occurs only because a mention of Jesus' death and resurrection cannot be omitted in a description of the final bearer of the original revelation or whether the death as such (completed of course in the resurrection) has an essential and irreplaceable significance for the establishment of this unsurpassability of Christian revelation.

[136] It is the latter explanation which is upheld in the thesis we are attempting to put forward and substantiate here. The thesis might also be formulated in this way: it is only by the cross of Jesus as such that the unsurpassability of Christian revelation can be and is established; the theology of the cross is an internal constituent of the doctrine of the unsurpassability of the Christian revelation as one and whole. That of course does not mean at all that the theology of the cross is exhausted in this function. What we are saying is that in the reality of man presented in this revelation and in the continuing course of history, the 'end' of a revelation history can come only in the death of the person who is revelation bearer and revelation event in one. The theology of the cross has this aspect and this function, even though it does not come to an end there.

Let us look more closely at what has been said. If history as history of man's freedom is to continue and to persist as salvation history, and thus in a broad sense (that is, implying also the history of faith) as revelation history (since otherwise the history of man as a whole in all his dimensions would not continue), then the 'conclusive' and 'unsurpassable' character of a revelation event in the continuing course of history can only consist in the historical manifestation of the absolute self-promise of God as such and in fact as the goal of this history itself. Any other 'word' of God that, being finite, is not himself, could essentially be only provisional, leaving the way open for further new words of God, replacing (or perhaps, in the Hegelian sense of aufheben, 'canceling and preserving') the earlier word. Otherwise such a word with its finite content would have to be understood as linked with a merely declaratory explanation that it is final because of God's arbitrary decision, even though in principle there could certainly be further new words of revelation. But anything of this kind would not only deny the openness of man's history as he understands it today, but would also in the last resort debase revelation to the state of a now incredible mythologem, would postulate an arbitrary God who would suddenly cease to be a partner in the history in which he had previously become involved. It might also be said, if the terminology is approved, that a prophetic word of revelation is always and essentially provisional; the eschatological word of revelation can consist only in God's self-promise as the absolute future of the world, leaving open here the question of whether also every prophetic word – if it is to be a personal word of [137] a 'supernatural' character – must carry with it a reference to the future and openness toward God's eschatological word, in order to be really God's genuine word of revelation in the Christian sense at all. The (sole) eschatological word of God's self-promise as such, as the absolute goal of history, as the absolute future, implies a further peculiarity which needs to be considered.

God does not offer this eschatological word of his merely as the supreme and unsurpassable opportunity for man's freedom and his history in freedom, leaving open the question of how the history of freedom of mankind as a whole will react to the opportunity thus offered. It is God's offer as such – an opportunity that alone establishes the history of mankind's freedom as it is in fact, as a whole and always and everywhere, not as an individual event in the history of revelation by which the latter enters into an unsurpassable, an eschatological phase. The eschatological word of God's self-promise to the world must be the irreversible triumph of this offer of God of himself to the world, must in a sense be the proclamation, not merely of sufficient grace, but also of efficacious grace, for the world and its history as a whole, even though of course (as the doctrine of the co-existence of efficacious grace from God and of man's freedom implies) the freedom of the history of humanity is not nullified and the proclamation of the victory of God's offer of himself does not involve a theoretical statement by God in favour of the individual in regard to the latter's destiny in this history. In the eschatological word God promises himself to the world, not merely as its final and unsurpassable opportunity, but as his own effective fulfillment of this opportunity. This, I think, is also the meaning of Jesus' message that in him a victorious immediacy of God's kingdom is present, as it had not formerly been present and consequently cannot consist solely in the opportunity already existing, albeit through grace, of freedom to decide for God.

How then are we to think concretely of this one eschatological and unsurpassable word of revelation? For the sake of simplicity we assume here that 'this plan of revelation is realized by deeds (gestis) and words having an inner unity', as Dei Verbum (no. 2) of the Second Vatican Council states. We also assume that the history of humanity has from God and in itself a unity and solidarity of its events among themselves of such a kind that a single event in the course of that history has some meaning and also 'speaks' for all the [138] rest. In the light of these assumptions, we are faced with the question of how God's eschatological word of the irreversible victoriousness of God's promise is to be conceived, if this victorious self-promise of God is to appear historically and in fact in the still continuing course of history? Allowing for these assumptions, we may say somewhat briefly that God's self-promise, if it is to be not merely words but also deeds, can be granted only in a person who has accepted this self-promise freely and definitively. Only in this way can the victoriousness of God's self-promise be seen, can be deeds and not merely words. In addition of course it is necessary for the free and definitive acceptance of this self-promise of God by a human being to become historically perceptible for us.

Before we go on from this point, if our train of thought is to be protected against misunderstandings and any suspicion of heresy, an incidental remark is necessary. It cannot be our task here to work out a Christology uniformly in all its aspects: that is, to show that the bringer of absolute salvation – the reality and the bearer of the absolute, irreversible, and victorious self-promise of God to the world in historical perceptibility – is necessarily the person described in the classical Christology of the hypostatic union. All that is important for us in regard to this question is that this historically manifested self-promise of God to the world (if it is to be eschatological, not merely an offer but the victoriously prevailing offer of God by God himself) must necessarily occur in a person who freely and definitively accepts this self-promise. And this acceptance as definitive must be made historically perceptible for us.

To me all this seems really obvious. A mere word, in which a self-promise of God was thought to be taking place, would in fact be a mere offer to the addressee of this word, an offer to man's freedom; it would then be an offer whose definitive acceptance was still uncertain. If it is said that this word of God assures us also that it is actually accepted and prevails, we may still ask when this acceptance in fact takes place, whether it has already happened or is still to come in the course of history, whether as past or future (if it is not itself the salvation of the world as a whole and thus the end of history) this acceptance occurs in such a way that the blessed outcome of history as a whole is irreversibly decided by a single event in that history. The word of God as such, that guarantees God eschatologically as the actually victorious end of history, must then [139] necessarily occur through an historical event, an event that can occur only in the factual and definitive acceptance of this offer by God of himself to the world by a person who of course must be seen as so constituted that his acceptance of this self-offering in obedient and increasingly definitive freedom guarantees the salvation of the world as a whole. This might be the starting point for the classical Christology of the hypostatic union, which however would have to be completed in greater detail and more precisely by a theology in which the solidarity of this God-man with all humanity and its history would need to be brought out.

Here, however, only one question remains: how are we to conceive more exactly and concretely this free and definitive acceptance of God's offer of himself as the absolute future of all history, the acceptance by which alone God's offer becomes the eschatologically definitive word of God to humanity? To which the answer must be that this free and definitive acceptance of God's offer of himself, which makes God's word to the world eschatological and predestines world history to salvation, can come about only by the death of the person who freely accepts that offer: a death of course which must be seen as redeemed and more palpably as redeemed, that is, taken together with what we describe as the resurrection of Jesus. In this sense the death of Jesus is an internal constitutive element of God's eschatological self-promise to the world.

It is of course impossible here to work out a detailed and precise theology of death in general, which was presupposed to the basic thesis, above-stated, of our reflections. In this connection we must refer to other studies of the theology of death in general. But here it is sufficient to say that death (which is something that goes on throughout the whole of life to its very end) understood in wholly human and theological terms, is not a merely biological occurrence at the end, a medical exitus, but a self-realization of creaturely human freedom in which man faces God and disposes of himself completely and finally for or against God: this he does in that final state of creaturely powerlessness that reaches its uttermost realization and manifestation in what we commonly experience as death. For the Christian understanding of freedom, the one act of freedom that centres on finality in a human life takes place in the course of actually dying and not independently of this, even though, as far as our experience goes, the act of freedom of the one life definitively [140] disposing of the person cannot necessarily be chronologically localized at the very moment of its medico-biological termination. For Christian anthropology a definitive self-realization of freedom is inconceivable either as happening independently of death somewhere within the ordinary course of life (in a mystical act, for instance, not continued into death) or as occurring only after death. At the same time the concrete way in which a person dies is in principle irrelevant. But the acceptance of the concrete way in which ultimately death uncontrollably occurs is also part of the successful definitive act of freedom that we describe as death. And a theologian should not be forbidden (if, indeed, he is not required) to consider why and how the concreteness of Jesus' death (its violence in the conflict with the political and religious authorities, the extreme God-forsakenness of this death, etc.) is also essential and significant for the salvific import of this death for Jesus himself and even more for us. But even then the decisive factor is that death, for Jesus also, must be understood fundamentally as the act of supreme freedom in absolute powerlessness, centred at the same time on finality.

If then the final and definitive acceptance of God's offer of himself is supposed to take place in Jesus and he is thus to be the eschatologically victorious word of God to the world, this can come about only in and through his death. Of course the successful achievement of this acceptance in the powerlessness of death must also become perceptible for us in faith; in other words, it must be seen together with his resurrection.

The death of Jesus and consequently his passion as a whole is a necessary constitutive element in the eschatological word of God's self-promise to the world as its absolute future. If, as we said earlier, this word of God and this alone is unsurpassable, if this word and this word alone is the now the unsurpassable revelation of God which reaches its close by itself opening up the infinite incomprehensibility of God as such and makes possible and authorizes by this very fact a still continuing history (since the latter now has an infinite goal as victoriously prevailing), then it can and must be said that the death of Jesus is this disclosing closure of revelation and without that death the closure is quite impossible. While textbook theology usually says that revelation was closed with the death of the last apostle, it would be better and more exact to say that revelation closed with the achievement of the death of Jesus, crucified and [141] risen, that is, with the cross, since God himself promised himself irrevocably there to history and God can add nothing more to this final word of God, even though within this final word history also continues as God's revelation – the history that we usually describe as history of the Church and history of faith, which is the history of this final word of God and thus, rightly understood, can also continue to be described as history of revelation.

If the cross as Jesus' death achieved to the point of resurrection must be described as the end of the history of revelation, this is not to deny, but implicitly to assert, that in this cross as the victory of God's offer of himself to the world, the Church, too, of course is established as the historical and (as public) institutional palpability of faith in the crucified and risen Christ, a faith without which God's self-promise to the world in Jesus would not be victorious at all. Today also then it may be said that public Christian revelation was completed with the end of the apostolic age, assuming that this 'completedness' is rightly understood and that this apostolic age is seen as centred in the cross of Christ as such, the cross that is not merely one of the events within this phase but also its gnoseological axis. In the cross of Jesus the transcendental and historical dimensions of man are definitively and irrevocably reconciled; man's absolute dependence on the self-bestowing mystery of God becomes an historical event, realized in fact in the death achieved there as such, and otherwise impossible. That man's transcendence toward God in his immediacy is really finally achieved through God himself and carries the person away beyond all detailed and provisional classifications: this is the substance of the Christian revelation that became an event in the cross of Jesus and was made evident there. And for that reason the cross is the completion of Christian revelation.

We can look at what has been said from a somewhat different standpoint and thus examine again expressly the problems with which these reflections opened. I mean the problems arising from the contrast between the modern mentality of an absolute will for a boundless future on the one hand and the doctrine on the other hand of the completedness of public revelation, which is nevertheless the ultimate content of history itself. As we said, these are problems which cannot be treated comprehensively or adequately here. But if it is the will of modern man not merely to exist like his ancestors as [142] the same person, even though under somewhat different conditions, but also in creative freedom to establish really new futures (individually and collectively, while embracing these two dimensions), then this will of man today is nevertheless continually repudiated and foiled by death, which, by its very contradiction to what is up to a point a new will of man, acquires a new distinctive character and radicalness. This fatal contradiction between man's absolute will for boundless freedom and the death to which he is doomed becomes obvious, even though it is suppressed in all the ideologies of our time and is not compensated for the individual in his own existence by thinking of the succession of the generations of those doomed to death as continuing indefinitely. The fatal contradiction does not become acceptable when understood as continuing for ever and when each generation is seen to be merely the pedestal on which the statue of victory is erected by the next generation, a generation that likewise perishes with its victory.

Each person has a responsibility, not only for those who are to come, but also for the dead who went before; not only for his own life, but also for his own death. If it is not to lie, the modern mentality of an absolute will for the future must therefore recognize the fact that it is foiled by death. If then it is possible at all to conceive and hope for a vindication of the intersection of all history by death, it can lie only in the fact that death itself is not the nullifying end of history, but the event in which history is dissolved by God's own act into the infinite freedom of God. That death can be this event, that it has already been achieved as such and as such is promised also in regard to our own death: this the faith of the Christian learns at the cross of Jesus.

WHAT DOES IT MEAN TODAY TO BELIEVE IN JESUS CHRIST?

In regard to this theme I think it is appropriate to begin with some preliminary observations.

First, it is obviously impossible to provide anything like an exhaustive treatment of the theme. It is a theme that aims at Christianity in its wholeness and in its essence, at the totality of human and Christian existence with its unfathomable mystery and with all its dimensions. The theme is concerned especially with the Christology which has been believed, lived, prayed, and sustained for two thousand years, which the best minds of Western history have considered over and over again; it is a theme that really presupposes an entire anthropology and theology, that as such demands the most detailed knowledge of biblical studies and of the history of dogma; it needs to be considered in the light of the present situation of our own time and of the world in which we live. In view of all this, it is obviously impossible to do more in regard to the theme than to put forward a few observations which are inevitably arbitrarily chosen and thus carry with them the danger that precisely what is left unsaid might have been more helpful to the reader than what is actually said.

Second, it is a theme that would fail from the very outset to cover its subject matter if it did not invoke the one whole and mysterious existence of man, if it were understood as one particular object of man's questioning curiosity among countless other equally important objects of his questioning and searching. It can be treated only if the whole person with his ultimate mystery, which is called God, is actively involved, the one human being with his question of salvation [144] and concern for salvation, which he mostly suppresses or leaves aside in the banal variety of his life. Only when the one whole person in his free responsibility for himself as one and whole becomes aware of himself can Christology be properly pursued, since it is meant to be the answer to the one and entire question of human existence. This does not mean that we are concerned here with directly meditative or edifying talking or preaching, that we are to spare ourselves entirely the exertion of conceptual speaking. But what must be clear from the very beginning is the approach to be made by the reader in order to understand these reflections: the approach of a conscious and free responsibility for his existence as one and whole.

Third, access to a modern Christology might be found in a variety of ways. It would be possible to begin with a theology of love of neighbour, with a theology of death, with a theology of the future, and from one of these starting points (which presumably might be still further increased) to show that they lead to a questioning and questing Christology which finds its own answer in the Church's profession of faith in Jesus Christ as the unsurpassable and victorious word of promise of God to man, in which God makes his own self-promise to the world historically tangible and irreversible. By following more explicitly such ways of access to Christology it would certainly be possible to make clearer how today in particular an assent of faith to the Christology of Christianity can be justified. But we must necessarily simplify the matter a little more and, as far as possible, see together the different and as such to be differentiated ways of access to a modern Christology.

Fourth, it cannot be our task in these reflections to present the Church's official Christology as such in its fullness and differentiation in terms of academic theology or even merely in the conventional catechetical form. All that is possible here is to attempt to suggest to a modern person a starting point for such a Christology. The fact that the Church's Christology provides a starting point of this kind, if its content is unfolded and taken seriously, is something that can at best be merely indicated here with the assurance that it is possible to find in this very starting point what the official teaching of Catholic Christianity states about Jesus. Consequently, we do not say right from the beginning that Jesus is God, that Jesus is the Word of the eternal God made flesh who existed from all eternity with the [145] Father; we are not speaking from the very beginning about the hypostatic union of the divine and human natures in the one person of the divine Logos; we are not starting out from the Christological formulations of the New Testament in Paul and John which themselves represent a highly developed reflection in faith; we are not assuming the impossibility of going behind such a 'late' New Testament Christology to ask about a more original and somewhat more simple experience of faith with the historical Jesus, in his message, his death, and his achieved finality that we describe as his resurrection; we do not think that it must be a priori certain and obvious that the orthodox faith in Jesus as the Christ can be expressed only in those formulations which have been adopted in the classical Christology of the Western Church, even though they retain a normative significance for our faith for us today and in the future. What is meant by this fourth preliminary observation cannot be explained more precisely here, but it may perhaps be deduced from what is now to be said.

We begin with a reflection that might perhaps be called questing Christology. What is meant by this? Freely tending toward finality, man has to be concerned with himself as one and whole. Admittedly, he can permit himself to be driven through the diversity of his life, occupied now with one, now with another, detail of his life and its possibilities. But he is expected to have in mind and to be responsible in freedom for the oneness and wholeness of his existence; he has to be concerned with himself, with his 'salvation'. If he does this, he will find himself in a peculiarly and fundamentally embarrassing situation. Since it is a question of the totality of his existence, it seems that here this very totality alone as one and whole can be important for salvation, it seems that no particularity of his life, of his individual and collective history, can from the outset, from the nature of the case, be crucial for this one and whole. It seems therefore that, however much in other respects he remains unquestionably an historical being, in the question of his salvation man must become unhistorical.

He may attempt in a variety of ways to place the one totality of his existence before himself, regardless of history: becoming aware of himself in a mystical experience in the depths of his being, seeking salvation in the contemplation of this totality; trying to grasp in a metaphysical upswing the eternal truth that hovers constantly over [146] history and assures him of his everlasting nature beyond the many-coloured variety of his history; seeking his real truth, while exposing in a spirit of sceptical resignation all truths as historically and sociologically conditioned. But all this is irrelevant in the last resort, since in all these and other conceivable ways the person thinks he can find himself as one and whole only outside his authentic historical existence; history as such seems to be beyond salvation, merely the outward show that disguises man's true nature in a thousand empty appearances.

If however a person is sure that he can also achieve and experience his salvation only in his history (since he becomes aware of himself and realizes his freedom in contact with his contemporaries and his environment, that is, in history, and cannot even in metaphysics or mysticism really step out of his history), he looks for another human being in whom, by God's free power of course, such salvation has really been achieved and as achieved becomes perceptible to him, in whom then, because of his solidarity with him, for himself, too, not only the abstract possibility of salvation, but salvation also as promise for his hope, becomes concretely apparent. The person who really seeks his salvation and knows that he is responsible for it in his freedom looks in the history of the one humanity to which he belongs for a human being in whom this salvation has not only occurred as promise to himself, but also becomes tangible as victoriously achieved by God's power and permits him to hope for it concretely as more than a merely abstract possibility for himself. Whether such an achieved and thus also experienced salvation event is merely sought in history or is already actually found there, is not a question that need be considered at this stage in our reflections.

The person at least sought in this way we may call the absolute salvation bringer (although our reflections on this point must be somewhat hasty and spasmodic), since, as we said, it is a question, not merely of the fate of an existing individual solely for his own sake, but of one that promises salvation as a firm hope for us and assures us effectively by God's grace of our salvation. This of course assumes that the person who is sought and who has reached salvation exists in an absolute solidarity with us and that we can offer and do actually offer to him the same solidarity. In our human situation as it is in fact, this salvation achieved in the persons sought cannot be understood as occurring otherwise than by death, since it [147] is only there that history is completed, freedom becomes definitive, man surrenders himself freely and finally to the mystery of God and thus man's transcendence into God's incomprehensibility and his history reach their definitive unity. But since it is meant to be the effective promise of salvation for us, God's gift of himself to us and not merely the individually isolated fate of this person, this death rescuing the person for salvation, as achieved and saved for us into God, even though in an absolutely once-and-for-all experience, must also become tangible: that is, the death of this person must be capable of being understood as passing into what we describe in traditional Christian terminology as the resurrection of this person. This also implies of course that this person (still being sought) in his life and his self-understanding was such and is historically grasped by us as such that we can believe seriously in this life as redeemed, in his 'resurrection'. But, on these assumptions, such a person, hitherto to some extent projected a priori by our question about salvation, can certainly be understood and described as absolute salvation bringer. Seen merely as such a person, he is not himself salvation, for, in view of man's boundless transcendentality beyond any particular good and in view of this transcendence as radicalized by what we describe as grace, this salvation can only be God himself and can be given immediacy and finality only by the self-communication of this God. But this person who is sought is the absolute salvation bringer insofar as his consummation occurring through death and resurrection in the power of God in solidarity with us is for us the irrevocable sign that God has promised himself as the consummation of our salvation.

As we said at the very beginning, we cannot attempt also here to prove expressly and in detail that what is meant, at least implicitly, by the absolute salvation bringer thus depicted and sought is the same as what the classical Christology of the Church means and teaches in talking about incarnation, hypostatic union, God's eternal Word becoming man in the unity of one person and in the unconfused duality of a human and divine reality. But we think that this proof is possible in principle and we presuppose it here as possible and practicable. When in the redeemed destiny of one human being and in that destiny experienced as redeemed a person grasps God's promise of salvation to himself, he is practising Christology explicitly or implicitly; if in his history he seeks such a human being, he is [148] practising questing Christology explicitly or implicitly. And, since a person can really only culpably suppress the question of his own salvation, such an explicitly or implicitly realized questing Christology involves in every human being today also the presence in transcendence and grace of the prerequisite that he is seeking and will eventually find his own private Christology. The fact is that we do not have to regard classical Christology today merely as an odd and no longer realizable piece of mythology.

It is now time for us to pass from a questing Christology seeking to discover the absolute salvation bringer in history to a Christology which has actually found this salvation bringer in history. In this conviction of having found him lies the real core, the substance, of Christianity. This ecclesial Christianity declares that we have found this absolute salvation bringer in Jesus of Nazareth, the Christ of God, the Son of God purely and simply.

Have we any reason or right to say this even today? Of course, seen merely from the standpoint of the human being, the statement that Jesus of Nazareth in particular is the salvation event achieved and known in faith as achieved, that he is the absolute salvation bringer who guarantees for us in history the concrete hope of our salvation, is a statement loaded with all the difficulties (uniqueness, historical distance, unrepeatability) which are involved in any statement about an historical event. But, for a person who learns in his own individual history that his concrete existence rests not solely on scientifically verifiable propositions, but more crucially on historically unique experiences, despite their permanent uncertainty, for a person who learns that he must stake and does stake always inescapably his existence on such historical experiences (even if it is only an absolute trust in the love of a neighbour), it is impossible to evade the historical experience of this Jesus by adopting a superficially sceptical attitude and claiming that in the last resort everything in history remains obscure, uncertain and ambiguous. He knows that he must transcend the uncertainty of his historical experiences inevitably and courageously in fundamental decisions in regard to other human beings. Why then should this riot be possible and legitimate also in regard to Jesus?

In the first place it cannot be maintained that we know nothing with adequate certainty today about the historical Jesus, or at any rate nothing that is relevant to faith or theology. It is true that [149] historico-critical exegesis has shown that even in the earliest New Testament writings about Jesus we are dealing with testimonies of faith in him as the Christ and not merely historically neutral accounts of his earthly life; it is true that modern biblical theology reveals a history of a great and dramatic development, even within the New Testament, between the preaching of the historical Jesus on the imminent approach of the kingdom of God and the self-understanding of Jesus implied in this on the one hand, and on the other hand a highly developed Christology in Paul and in John's Gospel, which as a whole borders closely on the classical Christology of the Church. But none of this (which is common property, not only of Protestant theology, but also after some delay of Catholic exegesis and theology) means that today we know of the historical Jesus nothing relevant for our Christology or that the legitimacy of the history of faith from Jesus' historical self-understanding to the Christology in Paul and John and to the Christology of the Church cannot be explained, at any rate if Easter is taken into account. The historically still perceptible proclamation of Jesus and his self-understanding implied there have also a peculiar character and unsurpassability, an incomparability, which permit us to say that in him God's self-promise as our salvation became event historically in a matchless and irreversible way and was then finally sealed by his redeemed death, that in his proclamation and his death Jesus thus became God's definitive word to us in history.

We cannot explain this precisely in detail here or (as we said) still less here and now develop explicitly from this starting point the classical Christology of Scripture and the Church, which is implied in the self-understanding of the historical Jesus. Here we need only say that Jesus does not merely proclaim a liberating image of God as the Father, before whom all – even sinners and the socially and politically downgraded – are equal, a God who forgives and liberates, whose grace reaches and relieves all apparently hopeless human situations. Jesus does all this and, even if there were nothing else, in its purity and absoluteness it would certainly not be negligible. But if this were all that Jesus' proclamation contained, it might be asked whether this liberating knowledge of God as Father could not be gained even without Jesus, whether it really goes essentially beyond the greatest heights of prophetic piety in the Old Testament, whether it could not be grasped in hope even without Jesus and [150] whether therefore in the last resort it could be detached from Jesus and in particular from his proclamation. We need not answer these questions here and now. For Jesus did in fact proclaim more than this, wonderful as it may be on its own account and however much it is experienced as liberating and gladdening today in modern 'Jesus movements' of liberty and fraternity, of unselfish love between human beings. Regarded simply as a matter of historical fact, Jesus had a more radical message which cannot be separated from his person or eliminated from his proclamation.

His proclamation speaks of a new turning of God to man in a form hitherto unknown, a new coming of the kingdom of God, since this coming does not represent merely an offer to man's historical freedom, for which it remains open whether and how it will react by assent or refusal in regard in this offer by God of himself, thus leaving open once more the history of this divine offer by God of himself. Jesus proclaims that this offer by God of himself as salvation and not judgment of humanity on God's side and by his power is irreversibly victorious and as irreversibly victorious becomes historically tangible in him, in his proclamation and then finally in his redeemed death, even though the individual human being is not released by the reality and tangibility of God's victory in the history of humanity from the responsibility of his individual freedom, but can grasp for himself this victory of God only in hope.

It may be asked how the man Jesus can be aware of this actual victory of God in his unreconciled and sinful world as present with himself and his message, how he can know that God's offer of himself not only offers man his last opportunity to find God in immediacy, but itself effects the victory of this offer. The answer can only be that on the one hand Jesus is aware of being in an ineffable and indissoluble unity with his God and sustains this in absolute fidelity through all the disasters of his life up to the point of death and on the other hand Jesus has such an absolute solidarity of love for all men that he does not even consider the dilemma of taking the side either of God or of men, but grasps his own salvation as that of humanity. Of course, from Jesus' standpoint it can be said that this salvific will of God was at work creating not only the possibility but unreservedly the reality throughout the entire length and breath of the history of humanity. But it is only when we look towards Jesus in faith that we can say that he is not merely the offer of the opportunity [151] but the reality becoming effective of itself, that as such he became irreversible in his own history and as such historically tangible. This however is essentially what Jesus said in his messages, about the new and final coming of God's kingdom in that very message which cannot be separated from his person, and this was definitively sealed in his redeemed death. Thus he is the new, invincible, and unsurpassable word of God's promise to us, even though history goes on and what is established in Jesus' message and fate must still be filled out and continue to appear in the whole course of the history of humanity right to its end.

At this point in our reflections we must speak more explicitly about a matter on which we have touched several times: the resurrection of Jesus, which is the historical seal and manifestation of what is involved in the person and message of Jesus, the historically apparent victory of God's self-promise to humanity. We can grasp in faith what is meant by the resurrection of Jesus only if we keep in mind four factors in their indissoluble unity.

First, we must have a correct understanding of what is meant by resurrection. It amounts to a statement about the person as one and whole; it means the definitive redeemed state of the person and the history of a human being with God; it does not mean a return to our spatio-temporal biological life, it is not a raising of the dead in the form of a return to the bodily existence of the present time as described elsewhere in the New Testament and in the history of the saints; our experience of it, gained through the witnesses of the resurrection, has an absolute singularity which in the last resort cannot be compared with other experiences and consequently is 'historical' in a special way; it is historical because and insofar as in it there is experienced the definitive redemption of a history for its elevation.

Second, man can gain such an experience of a unique character only when and insofar as he brings to it his own hope for himself that his own existence will be definitively revealed. If this does not happen, there is nothing for a person to do except to adopt a sceptical attitude toward the account of the resurrection of Jesus and to leave it aside as something belonging to an inexplicable past that really does not concern him at all. But a person can have his own hope of resurrection without destroying himself, and may not (for himself and also in solidarity with the dead) simply permit human existence [152] and history to sink into the empty nothingness of merely having been. Wherever there is real hoping and loving there is faith in one's own resurrection (which need not necessarily be localized at a 'later' point of time in the remote future), even when a person with this hope and love lacks the ability or courage verbally to thematicize and objectify the hope of resurrection implicit in the mere continuance of his existence. But if a person boldly admits his own hope of resurrection, if he sees himself as the one who is called into the definitiveness of his existence, if he encounters in this way the message of the resurrection of Jesus and in view of the claim of the life and death of Jesus in absolute love for God and men, then he knows that he is justified in grasping by faith the resurrection of this Jesus. He is faced with the question whether he would not be denying his own hope of resurrection in a final culpable despair if, in view of this life and this death of this Jesus, he did not find the courage to believe that the latter is the definitively redeemed, the Risen One.

Third, this hope of ours of our own resurrection and the encounter with the claim that Jesus' fate makes on us then encounter the disciples' message of his resurrection and the faith of two thousand years of the history of hope of Christendom, and we are faced with the question of whether we can rightly refuse our assent to this message and this faith merely because what is definitive and inconceivable extending to the incomprehensibility of God must be believed. Jesus' disciples attest an Easter experience: 'The Lord is truly risen.' For the reason already given, it is only with difficulty that we can elucidate for ourselves the peculiar character of this experience and distinguish it from apparently similar visionary and mystical phenomena, which cannot in the last resort be compared with this resurrection experience. The individual appearance of the risen Jesus, described in the New Testament accounts which cannot in the last resort be harmonized, may certainly be regarded as vividly arranged presentations and in a variety of ways as already current interpretations of the original and authentic resurrection experience of the first disciples. But this by no means disposes of the experience itself; it was perceived and attested to by men plunged into despair by the sight of the disaster of Jesus' life and in no way inclined to believe anything of this kind, men who were certainly in a position and qualified to distinguish this experience from apparently similar visionary and hallucinatory phenomena with which they [153] were familiar. What reason could we have for not believing their testimony, assuming of course that in the absolute hope of our own existence there is an implicit yearning for our own resurrection and that we face the claim of the life and death of Jesus and are not prepared to permit this unique life of unconditional love to sink into an absolute emptiness of merely having been? Certainly we must be aware of our solidarity with the dead and not simply dismiss them as those who have been, who are good for nothing else except to make possible our own history.

Fourth, if our own transcendence to God's immediacy in freedom is alive in what we describe as grace, if it is realized and becomes explicit in history and in the encounter with history, if with our questing Christology we encounter Jesus of Nazareth, then we certainly have the opportunity for our own experience of the Risen One, even though that experience is not entirely independent of the testimony of the first disciples. The experience of our transcendence toward the immediacy of God in history here reaches its unique pinnacle. In grace we experience an ultimate freedom over all powers and forces of history, of law, of sin, of the tyranny of all human relativities; this experience seeks its tangibility and sealing in history; this experience comes in the Easter testimony of the disciples and the Church to Jesus, finds in him the seal being sought and finds it precisely in this Risen One, if only because such an offer never took place elsewhere in the religious history of humanity. Experience of freedom in immediacy to God and encounter with this risen one come together in an indissoluble unity and are mutually dependent; we hope absolutely for ourselves, since we encounter this redeemed fate of Jesus as the unsurpassable word of God to us, and we believe in the resurrection, since for ourselves in ultimate freedom we hope for everything, for God in himself. And this unity of experience in mind and history at the same time is certainly an experience of the Risen One in ourselves, even though we can describe it according to the testimony of the first disciples and the Church only with the name of Jesus and this experience would otherwise to some extent remain anonymous.

If the four factors mentioned are clear and seen in faith and hope in their unity, even today we can and may believe in the resurrection of Jesus without on that account getting the impression of being lost in a mythological interpretation of a banal past where in the last [154] resort nothing happened except utopian hope, which perished in a cruel and final emptiness. The Christian has the courage to believe in the resurrection of Jesus, since he seizes on it in a responsibility for the ultimate import of his own existence and ventures hopefully to believe in his own redeemed history.

With these aphoristic observations on our general theme, which leave out and are bound to leave out many important questions (since there is no other way), we may at least draw attention to one particular theme within the whole: to the personal relationship of the individual Christian to Jesus. As risen and exalted, Jesus may, or should at least, not be a mere symbol for a personal relationship of the Christian to the eternal God; particularly as exalted, Jesus should not simply vanish into the nameless mystery that ineffably and incomprehensibly rules over our existence and is called God. He, the person redeemed, with his concrete fate now become definitive, is the guarantor that we can reach God himself in the fullness of his life and his freedom, in his blessed light and his love. But for that very reason this guarantor is eternally effective, the permanent intermediary to the immediacy of God in himself, and consequently as Christians we should have a personal relationship of hope, trust, and love, to this redeemed Jesus in the uniqueness of his human reality. This is something that is possible, something that should be developed and cultivated by Christians.

Why should it not be possible? Even in our own hope of resurrection, in which we anticipate hopefully the redeemed finality of our person and our history, we include the hope that there are such human beings who are redeemed and have become definitive. We have no right to shut out from our world simply and entirely the dead of history and those who have passed from our own circle into the silent eternity of God, those with whom we were united in fidelity and love, and to behave as if they had nothing more to do with us. We shall of course not attempt to set up a relationship with these dead who still live, to get into contact with them with the aid of parapsychology or spiritualism; the Old Testament itself rejected such conjuring up of the dead and practices of this kind are offensive to the majesty of God and to the mysterious redeemed and definitive state of the dead that is beyond our control. But this does not mean that, as Christians who acknowledge the communion of saints in our creed, we could simply abandon our loving fellowship with the dead [155] and behave as if in themselves or at least for us they were no longer living. And if perhaps we did that and allowed the Church's commemoration of all its departed members to be for us an empty ritual, this would not mean that we were acting rightly, but would only show up the incompleteness and partial emptiness of our own existence. But if all this is correct in general, it is true particularly of the relationship that we can have and should have to the living Jesus.

He – the person redeemed in a unique way as guarantor of our own existence – lives in himself and for us. We can hope in him, love him, call to him, we can build on his love and fidelity to us, meditating on his earthly life and death, we can be assured by faith that this life's fate is redeemed and deposited for us with God as the eternal guarantee of our own hope. In his Spirit we can learn that he loves us, each of us in a unique way, that we love him, each of us also in a unique way that is part of the uniqueness of every human existence and history. In such love for the concrete Jesus in God's eternity there occurs the final reconciliation of time and eternity, of history and the preeminence of the eternal God over history. In and with Jesus we grasp the blessed inviolability of God in himself, since in him God gave himself to time and history with his infinity and freedom irrevocably for Jesus and in Jesus for us as our own. But in Jesus and in love for him we also grasp that he and we in him with our individuality and history will not be consumed and will not perish if we approach in immediacy the burning absoluteness of the eternal God, but in this very way will be those who are definitively redeemed and enduring. In him and with him we learn that God and world can exist together in blessed unity, without either one or the other having to perish. He, Jesus, is the unique and irrevocable seal of final reconciliation. Consequently, for the Christian, the loving, always unique relationship of the individual to Jesus is not something that must vanish in the presence of the silent and nameless incomprehensibility of God in immediacy, but is in fact an intrinsic, essential element of this immediacy to God by which it is established and confirmed that we shall remain at the very moment when God becomes all in all and history as redeemed reaches God.

If in faith, hope, and love, we enter into the fate of Jesus, into his unconditional love of neighbour and into his death, if we live with him and die with him in the empty darkness of his death, we shall grasp in his Spirit (in the Spirit that we know as his) that we really [156] can enter into contact with God himself beyond all secular reality, that we can fall into this God of incomprehensible judgments and ineffable mystery without perishing there, in order to find there our final and definitive reality. If we love Jesus, quite personally and directly, if in our love we allow his life and his fate to become the internal form and entelechy of our own life, then we learn that he is the way, the truth, and the life, that he leads us to the Father, that we may and can call the incomprehensible God Father despite his namelessness, that God's namelessness and pathlessness can be our own home, bringing us not extinction, but eternal life. We must love Jesus in the unconditional acceptance of his life's fate as our own norm of existence, in order to experience serenely and joyously our own existence as finally redeemed.

FOLLOWING THE CRUCIFIED

The theme of these reflections is ‘following the Crucified’. First of all, two brief preliminary observations. Taking the theme as it stands, it would certainly be possible and indeed appropriate to deal with it expressly in the light of the New Testament. For it was in the New Testament and only there that the message of Jesus, as crucified, and of following him, was first given. But a really unobjectionable and exact exegetical treatment of the theme in the light of the New Testament would require more space than is available here and a professional skill that I do not possess. I hope then to be allowed to put forward a few reflections that come within the scope of systematic theology, even though they are bound to seem rather colourless and abstract and even though they are selected somewhat arbitrarily from the whole range of statements which systematic theology might make on the theme, although it must be admitted that systematic textbook theology has not hitherto been particularly interested in the question and that Christian spirituality (without avoiding or wanting to avoid the theme) very easily becomes a mere exercise in edification. The second preliminary observation is that these reflections are simply reflections and nothing more, not a sermon or a prophetic address seeking to rouse in the hearer that existential situation in which man stands before the Crucified and has to decide whether in his own life the message of the cross is accepted as God’s power and God’s wisdom or rejected with a shrug of the shoulders as folly. These reflections here and now cannot aspire to the function and dignity of such preaching of the cross. As compared with that preaching they remain both tentative and derivative. Moreover our reflections are secondary in the sense [158] that they cannot claim to be systematically constructed or comprehensive, nor will there be any attempt to conceal a certain unsystematic arbitrariness in the choice and sequence of the reflections.

In the exegesis and in the theory of Christian spirituality it is pointed out that ‘following’ and ‘imitation’ (despite the iridescent expression ‘imitation of Christ’ as used in traditional Christian spirituality) are not absolutely synonymous terms, that we must start out from the New Testament idea of following, even though Paul is aware also of the idea of imitation. Certainly we are not really expected to copy and reproduce the life of Jesus as such. We live in historical situations different from those in which Jesus himself lived, we have a different and always unique task which is not the same as that which confronted him in his own historically conditioned and restricted existence; he and we together form the one Christ of the one and unique total history of salvation, in which, for all our crucial dependence on him and on his historical existence in life and death, we do not reproduce him, but (as Paul says) complete his historical individual reality, to become the one Christ in head and members, who is identical with all redeemed humanity, hidden in God and belonging to God himself. In the light of all this, rightly understood, we could say that Christians are followers and not imitators of the Crucified. And yet this is still not the whole truth.

If we were to consider and realize only what has just been said, there would be a danger of turning the imperative of following Jesus in practice into abstract moral principles, perfectly clear in themselves, and reducing Jesus, his life, and his death, to a merely illustrative example of a moral precept which could exist independently of him. But following Jesus, his life, and him as crucified, is in the last resort something different from the realization of a universal ideal, perhaps realized particularly explicitly and purely in Jesus, but in fact simply as an ‘instance’ of a universal idea that in principle is independent of him. In his life and in his death there must be something that is unique and as such the content and norm of our following of Jesus, so that this following is itself authenticated as such by him and not because his life and death are in their turn authenticated by an ideal, a norm, claiming validity in themselves and independently of him.

If we keep this in mind and do not explain this unique following solely as being driven by his 'Spirit', regarded also as a suprahistorical [159] factor, it becomes understandable and in principle legitimate that the whole history of Christian piety should have brought an element of imitation of the concrete Jesus into his following, should have been oriented to his stay in the wilderness, his fasting, his nightly prayer, his concrete poverty, his renunciation of concrete power and so on, although it cannot be proved or can be proved only with difficulty that following Jesus, seen theoretically and practically, is not possible without these concrete ways of imitating him. This must be remembered when we are talking of the following of Jesus; this following must not a priori be absolutely opposed to the imitation of his concrete life, difficult as it may be to say and obscure as it may be in the meantime what exactly can and should be present concretely in the life of Jesus for this imitative following, which can be found in him alone and by which alone this imitative following can be authenticated. If in this question we were to appeal immediately and solely to a disposition in which we follow him and thus attempt to evade all questions about a concrete content of this imitative following, then the question would promptly have to be raised about what this disposition really consists in and why it cannot be made intelligible also without direct recourse to Jesus.

We are thus faced with an obscure problem, the difficulty of which becomes apparent in the whole history of Christian piety. In the earliest Christian times the devout person sought to imitate Jesus by following the example of the first witness, by martyrdom. But when martyrdom ceased to be possible, people imitated him in the wilderness, in nightly prayer, in poverty, in renunciation of marriage, but then became somewhat embarrassed when faced with the question of how those Christians were to follow Jesus who could not adopt these particular ways of following him, how this following is possible without having to appeal merely to a 'disposition', a following in the 'Spirit'. Today we might perhaps think that we can and must follow Jesus concretely by a solidarity with the poor and downgraded, by a critical attitude to institutionalizations asserted by power in society and Church, by courage for conflict with the powerful. In principle it is certainly possible in this way for what is up to a point a new form of imitative following of Jesus to enter into the Church's sense of faith and from that standpoint also to resist any retreat to a purely internal and private disposition in the following of Jesus. And, since we certainly ought to follow Jesus not only in [160] death but also in life, the emergence of such a new way of following him is certainly of the greatest importance, particularly since the established forms of this concrete following have hitherto been more or less identical with the ways of life of the religious orders, while the 'laity' found such a life-style alien and had no desire to regard themselves as belonging to the following of Jesus only insofar as they remotely or closely imitated the style and mentality of the religious life. But, even if all this is evident and must be regarded as important, the real question that faced us with reference to an imitative following, not to be reduced to a mere disposition, does not yet seem to be solved.

The preference which Jesus showed and lived out for the poor and downgraded in society and which certainly cannot be deduced from an abstract and universal morality, not even from Christian love of neighbour alone, does not present any style of following for the poor and downgraded themselves in society, unless it is to suggest that these poor and downgraded are to follow Jesus by bearing their lot patiently. This is a conclusion drawn only too often and too recklessly in the course of the history of Christianity; but it seems to make religion the opium of the people, it is highly problematic and fails to grasp the difference between voluntarily showing solidarity with the poor and downgraded as a supremely personal act and being caught up in poverty and distress in a way that simply cannot be completely transformed by concrete freedom alone. Moreover, the question will have to be left as it stands, without an absolutely positive answer, whether the preferential treatment of the poor and downgraded on the part of Jesus must be a crucial principle for the style of following on the part of every individual Christian or whether this must be said or perhaps desired seriously at most of the community of believers, of the Church as a whole.

This brings us to the question whether there cannot be a particular, concrete, in a sense imitative following of Jesus which must be neither attributed to an internal disposition alone nor merely regarded as taking individual forms and as changing at different periods of Christian history. If we are not to take refuge in an abstract moral idealism, it seems to us that this question can be answered only with the proposition: the Christian, every Christian at all times, follows Jesus by dying with him; following Jesus has its ultimate truth and reality and universality in the following of the Crucified. It [161] cannot, I think, be proved that there is any other concrete substance of that following which could hold for all Christians taken together and which remains concrete. Our reflections up to now on the following of Jesus thus lead naturally to the reflections on the following of Jesus precisely as crucified.

Before we continue here, there are still some things that must be noted or more clearly stated in advance if the thesis proposed is not to be misunderstood from the very outset. First of all, it is clear of course that the thesis may not be taken to imply a dispensation from following Jesus during life, from a following of his life and not merely of his death. But, if it is not located or diluted in a purely internal attitude or disposition, this following will be very different in the lives of individual Christians and can scarcely be reduced to a common denominator. A socio-critical courage and protest unto death can certainly be a following of Christ, without our having to be able to prove with speculative perspicacity that something of this kind could be found in some sort of homeopathic dilution also in other authentic Christian lives. Life in a Carthusian monastery can certainly be a following of Jesus and in fact also and particularly in what cannot be found in other Christian lives. Jesus' life is reflected diversely and fragmentarily in the lives of Christians. At the same time there is no need to discuss here the question (important for its own sake) whether and how in the life of human beings endowed with grace by the Spirit of God and Christ there can and must be realizations of faith, hope, and love, which as such cannot be found at all actualized in the historically restricted life of Jesus of Nazareth himself and yet are absolutely constitutive of the Christian life of these persons. (Jesus was in fact a man and not a woman, he could not have realized and experienced the burdens and tasks of old age, of a permanent invalid, of a scholar, and so on; and yet these burdens and tasks in their concreteness and not merely in a disposition – which can also be realized elsewhere and otherwise – are part of such Christian lives.) These Christian realities certainly belong to the totality willed by God of the one mystical Christ (with head and members) who is identical with redeemed humanity or the Church. But we shall not pursue further here the question of whether the acceptance of these realities by Christians, by which, according to Paul, they 'complete' Christ's life and suffering, is to be regarded as part of the following of the historical Jesus or not. In any case there [162] are ways of following Jesus which occur in the life of Christians and are not to be regarded as identical with one another, but as particular expressions of that following, which the Spirit of God assigns differently to individuals, as he wills.

There is a further preliminary observation to be made. When we say that the one following of Jesus common to all Christians consists particularly in following him in death, this of course does not merely refer to death solely in a medical sense. For death in the sense of dying begins at the very dawn of life, as existential pervades the whole of life in what Gregory the Great described as the prolixitas mortis. Consequently, the following of the Crucified as participation in his dying and death goes on of course throughout the whole of life. Christian tradition has always been aware of this in taking the following of Jesus by accepting his cross to mean also patience sustained by faith in the midst of suffering, in the inevitable disappointment and bitterness of life as long as it lasts. This must always remain clear now that we have to examine more closely the meaning of the following of the Crucified.

In what exactly does the following of the Crucified as participation in his death consist and why is this equality of fate, the solidarity of death, something in which we not only resemble him, but depend on him in the proper sense of the term (resemble him not only because like him we also die, but rightly die because we imitate him and by imitating him and inasmuch as his death is the imperatively productive model for our death)? This is evidently the question that faces us. A part of this question is of course, to be more precise, also the question of what is peculiar and unique about the death of Jesus, so that only in the imitation (possibly, of course, merely implicit) of his death can there be a true dying.

At first, the very opposite seems to be the case. Despite its extraordinary concrete peculiarities as a violent death, Jesus in his death shares the lot of all of us; in his death he seems to be following in the way of a dying humanity and not humanity following in his way. There is no need to insist at length that our following of Jesus in dying refers to death as such and not to an historically individual peculiarity of his death, which (at least normally) we cannot share at all. But in this respect is he not following us more than we follow him?

We may safely and must ask about the equality of his death and [163] ours, before we raise more explicitly the question why we are dependent on him in this respect – follow him, that is, in the proper sense – and we and he thus do not simply share as equals the same lot that is assigned to all of us. If we ask first of all only about the equality of our death and his, the question is also of course but by no means solely about death as a physiological event. But we are certainly asking too about this physiological event of a medical exitus, since man not only has a body, but also is body, the entire breadth and depth of human existence up to the most sublime actualizations of that existence is realized corporeally, in a true sense: that is, it is not the body that dies, but the person in his body. But this means that death in a human and Christian sense is thus essentially more than a mere medical exitus, in which the heart stops and the electrical brain currents cease. Death rightly understood is an event involving the whole person and might take place at that crucial point where the act of freedom is finalized, not by any means necessarily in the chronological moment of the medical exitus (even though this is a real factor in the finalization of man's history of freedom), but occurs in a true sense throughout the whole of life and reaches a climax at that moment not ascertainable by our reflection in which man's temporally extended history of freedom reaches its finality. But what does the person do when he thus brings his history of freedom to its finality and irreversibility in death, in what way ultimately and at the hidden core of existence does the one decision of freedom become irreversible, the decision which, although temporally extended, is achieved in the one life of man? We cannot answer the question here by developing precisely and at length an existential ontology and theology of death. It is possible to answer this question only briefly.

It is true that the individual decisions of freedom, which are integrated into the one life's decision, occur during life on a categorial individual material of our life presented to us from our milieu and environment. But these individual decisions are elements of the one life's decision only insofar as (over and above their finite and particular content, even though by their mediation) there occurs in them an assent or a refusal to that infinite horizon and objective of freedom which alone makes possible freedom in the proper sense in regard to the subject and its individual objects and in the final understanding is known as God. If and insofar as the decision of freedom [164] in regard to an individual categorial object of an intramundane character is also a transcending of this object, leaving it behind and in a sense renouncing it, and in this respect and in this way the infinite objective of freedom (called

God) is recognized as such and thus as dissociated from the individual object, such a decision is right, affirms God himself as such, although this does not of course require the innermost structure of the true act of freedom to be present as such explicitly and objectified and verbalized. This innermost structure of every real decision of freedom, insofar as it is an internal factor in human death as an existential act, makes itself clearly felt in what we experience empirically as death. In death, empirically seen, the world withdraws from the subject of freedom, and even the latter is lost to itself. Everything perishes; it is, as Scripture says, the night in which no one can work.

How does the subject of freedom encounter this decline, in which it can cling to nothing individual and not even to itself in its explicit factuality? There are two ways in which the subject of freedom can accept this decline. Either the subject in the last resort culpably refuses to accept any freely bestowed love from another person, regarding itself as condemned to an absolute autonomy and autarchy as to absolute futility, against which only a radical protest is possible; or it accepts with resignation and hope this eclipse of all particular realities as the dawn and approach of that silent infinity into which each particular act of freedom has hitherto always risen above its individual object, in order in a sense to be lost into this merely apparently empty infinity. In the first case death is the event of final perdition, in the second the beginning of redeemed finality in God. It is impossible to explain more precisely here why and how this self-surrender to the loving incomprehensibility of God, in the decline of all particular objects of freedom occurring in death, involves what we describe in Christian terminology as the one triplicity of faith, hope, and love, which justifies us and brings us to final salvation, assuming of course (and this has to be assumed as a datum) that this self-surrender of the subject of freedom to the loving incomprehensibility of God, leaving behind and transcending everything individual, is sustained in the present and only real order of salvation by a self-communication of God (described as grace) always and everywhere forestalling our freedom, by which God himself radicalizes our self-surrender toward his immediacy and gives himself as response [165] to it. Nor can it be explained in more detail why and how this decline of all individual realities, making itself felt in empirical death, why and how this decline is initially present as an internal factor within every act of freedom in life and that it so happens that dying proceeds during the whole of life toward a death in which what is or (better) ought to be done in the whole history of freedom of a lifetime becomes apparent and reaches finality: the relinquishment that does not take or hold any particular good as absolute, but lets go of it, in order to entrust itself to the nameless incomprehensibility that we call God.

Perhaps we can now say a little more clearly in what the common feature in Jesus' death and ours consists, what we do when we follow him in his dying, even though this does not yet explain why in the death that we have in common he is the imperative, productive model, why our dying in the proper sense depends on his dying and is thus really a following of the Crucified. According to Scripture we may safely say that Jesus in his life was the believer (notwithstanding the traditional teaching that at the innermost centre of his existence he had an immediacy to God such as is given to us only in eternal life) and that he was consequently the one who hopes absolutely and in regard to God and men obviously the one who loves absolutely. In the unity of this triplicity of faith, hope, and love, Jesus surrendered himself in his death unconditionally to the absolute mystery that he called his Father, into whose hands he committed his existence, when in the night of his death and God-forsakenness he was deprived of everything that is otherwise regarded as the content of a human existence: life, honour, acceptance in earthly and religious fellowship, and so on. In the concreteness of his death it becomes only too clear that everything fell away from him, even the perceptible security of the closeness of God's love, and in this trackless dark there prevailed silently only the mystery that in itself and in its freedom has no name and to which he nevertheless calmly surrendered himself as to eternal love and not to the hell of futility. In that sense his death is the same as ours, even though the concrete circumstance of dying vary between a gruesome stake at which the cruel madness of human beings tortures another human being to death and a deathbed in a modern hospital where white uniformed doctors do everything possible to prevent the dying person from noticing the state he has reached. Whether we die in one way or [166] another can make a vast difference in many respects, so that we may rightly wish for an easy and gentle death. But in the last resort what happens in death is the same for all: we are deprived of everything, even of ourselves; we all fall, each of us alone, into the dark abyss where there are no further ways. And this death – which in the first place is simply ours – Jesus died; he who came out of God's glory did not merely descend into our human life, but also fell into the abyss of our death, and his dying began when he began to live and came to an end on the cross when he bowed his head and died.

Jesus died as we die. When we say this and visualize up to a point the content of the statement, what we see is Jesus following in our way and not ourselves in his. If and insofar as we continue always to see him as the eternal Word of God, who assumed our human reality, our life, and our death, as his own reality, the statement that Jesus died as we die can of course give ineffable dignity and eternal consolation for our own death. If we believe that our own human reality has been assumed by God, this is true also of course of our death. Since the eternal Logos of the Father suffered it as his own death, this death must be redeemed, sanctified, emptied of final despair and futility, filled with the eternal life of God himself. This can and must be said, if we assume what Christian faith professes about Jesus Christ as the only begotten Son of the Father himself and if in the light of this faith we say that he died as we die, even though we shall not go on from this point to develop its implications for our own death as redeemed.

Can we now say however that we have answered the second question above-mentioned, the question of whether and in what sense we really follow in our dying the dying Jesus on the cross, so that Jesus' death truly becomes the productive model of our death, that our death is different from what it would be if we did not die precisely as following him. It would certainly be possible to work out an answer to this question by continuing from the point now reached in our reflections. It could be shown more explicitly how the assumption of our death by the eternal Logos as his own does not merely assimilate him to us, but also transforms our death. But we want to try to answer this second question in the light of a somewhat different consideration, since this makes it more simple and more tangible. Jesus died into his resurrection, his death is the event of gaining the finality of his human reality in the life of God himself. Of [167] course it is impossible here to work out a fundamental theology and dogmatic theology of the resurrection of Jesus. All that we can do is to bring out a few points that are particularly important for our question.

First of all, Jesus' resurrection is not merely an event that could not be expected, attached in a singular way to his death. It is the consequence of his death itself as such, if it is seen at the same time as the death of him in whom the eternal God imparts his own life to the world as its gracious endowment and as the event in which this Jesus accepts finally and irrevocably this self-communication of God through death. However the 'three days' between Jesus' death and the awareness of his resurrection are to be more precisely theologically interpreted, the idea of this temporal interval must not be allowed to obstruct our view of the intrinsic unity of the death and resurrection of Jesus. In his resurrection the very thing that happened in his death is completed and made effective: the incomprehensible God finally accepted this human reality as redeemed, precisely because the latter was surrendered unsupported and unreservedly into the incomprehensibility of God himself. We can really say that (in the sense of an indissoluble essential connection) his death is his resurrection and vice versa, since he entered into definitive life precisely in death and in no other way. But since this is true in the first place only of the only-begotten Son of the Father and in the radical sinlessness of his faith, hope, and love, as distinct from us sinners, his death, despite all its similarity to ours, is in itself quite different from the death that we for our own part and independently of following him can die and must die. If then his death is to become a real determinant of our own death and in that very peculiarity which as such distinguishes his death as death into resurrection from our death as penalty of sin, he must give us a share of his death. But this again implies two things: on the one hand his death must take place for us; he must die in a community of fate and in solidarity with us, and the Spirit of God, in whom he accepted his death purely and simply as the dawn of life, must be offered to us as the opportunity of a death with him. On the other hand, for our part, this opportunity of dying with him as a beginning of life must be accepted in freedom. Since both preconditions exist or can be realized in freedom, it is possible to die with him; the determinant of unity with the resurrection, essential to his death, can also as grace become a [168] determinant of our death, and this death of ours then has a peculiarity which is not merely (like the other determinants of death) common to his death and ours, but belongs to our death only in virtue of his, so that there is present that peculiarity by which a mere similarity between us and Jesus is turned into a real following. In faith in him and his grace our death is transformed from a manifestation of sinful God-forsakenness or an open question that is involved in the mysterious incomprehensibility of God into a death leading to the loving acceptance of our existence by God into his own life, a death into resurrection. There is still something explicitly to be added however to this consideration of the way in which the similarity of death with Jesus and with us becomes a real following of the Crucified in dying.

Our death and Jesus' death, even and more especially as resurrection, occur as a passing into the silent incomprehensibility and unavailability of God. It is for this reason that death is the supreme and most radical act of faith. The following of the Crucified as such is in itself a supreme act of faith, a surrender in hope and love to the incomprehensibility of God which completely takes away from us who are here the result of this act of death, as into a total extinction. We must say this in the first place about our death as following of the Crucified, but that is not all that is to be said about this singular unity of Jesus' death and our death.

It is true that Jesus by his resurrection vanishes from us into the unavailability of God. But his resurrection is at the same time the event of salvation history which, even if grasped only by faith, is part of this history of this world and this humanity and is grasped and acknowledged precisely by faith as such an historical event that truly changes the world. His resurrection took place in this world, even though it is the event that raises this historical world of becoming into the eternity of God. The resurrection has an absolutely peculiar and unique but nevertheless real tangibility in history. This must be remembered also in regard to his death as entry into this resurrection. If in his following we die with him, the question whether we die into the life of God or into sheer annihilation is not answered in a way that is empirically verifiable in regard to our death as such; there is certainly no tangible assurance of a death leading to a resurrection, since (at least normally) we cannot for our own part make any unambiguous judgment about the final destiny of [169] a dying person. But from the clarity of Jesus' death as the way to his resurrection, from the historicity of Jesus' resurrection, a light is thrown on the ambivalence of our own death and this light, too, is part of our dying with Christ. In this matter the situation is the same as in world history in general.

In the history of the world itself as distinct from God's eternal plans, before the resurrection of Jesus, the victorious irreversibility of God's self-communication to the world was not firmly established or tangible, the final outcome of world history was not perceptible as salvation in history itself. The drama of world history as a whole was also still unfinished and ambivalent. Things are different after the resurrection: there the peripeteia of the drama of world history to good, to eternal salvation, has already taken place. It is true that we cannot deduce from this any unequivocal conclusion for the individual and his individual destiny of salvation; but even for the individual the situation of hope is different from what it was before Jesus' resurrection. From the one reality already existing the success of other possibilities can be presumed. This is true particularly when an historically and sociologically explicit relationship to Jesus' resurrection is present as promise to the world as a whole. What has been said here in general about the relationship of world history to Jesus' death and resurrection is therefore true also of the relationship of our dying to Jesus' dying, particularly when this relationship is explicitly realized in faith. Our dying admittedly retains an openness and ambivalence, but it is encompassed by the promise that exists for us in the victorious death of Jesus into his resurrection. Paul says: 'Here is a saying you can rely on: if we have died with him, then we shall live with him' (2 Tim. 2:11).

We said earlier that death in a theological sense does not in the last resort coincide chronologically with the medical exitus, but occurs throughout the whole of life and reaches its completion only at the end. Hence, from the nature of the case, it was legitimate for Christian piety in its entire history to seek to realize the following of the Crucified in Christian life, in the acceptance of everything that Christian usage even up to the present time described as the 'cross': the experiences of human frailty, of sickness, of disappointments, of the nonfulfillment of our expectations, and so on. What occurs in all this is part of man's dying, of the destruction of life's tangible goods. In all these brief moments of dying in installments we are faced with [170] the question of how we are to cope with them: whether we merely protest, merely despair (even for brief moments), become cynical and cling all the more desperately and absolutely to what has not yet been taken from us, or whether we abandon with resignation what is taken from us, accept twilight as promise of an eternal Christmas full of light, regard slight breakdowns as events of grace. If in this second way (which cannot by any means be so easily distinguished from the first) we take the cross on ourselves daily, we are accomplishing part of the following of the Crucified, we are practising faith and loving hope in which death is accepted as the advent of eternal life and the following of Jesus, the Crucified, reaches its completion.

Experience of the Spirit

EXPERIENCE OF TRANSCENDENCE FROM THE STANDPOINT OF CATHOLIC DOGMATICS

Before attempting to say anything directly on the theme proposed for me, I may be permitted a few preliminary observations. In the first place I am not an Indianolgist, but only a teacher of Catholic dogmatics. I must leave it to the Indianologists, the historians of religion, and the historians of the different interpretations of mystical experience to see for themselves whether these reflections of a teaching theologian can provide them with any assistance in dealing with their own problems. Furthermore, when the title speaks of the view of Catholic dogmatics on the problem of the experience of transcendence, the term 'dogmatics' must be understood in a very wide sense. There would be very little to be gained from these reflections if we were restricted to statements which have an absolutely binding character in Catholic dogmatic theology. The Catholic theologian cannot avoid putting forward here also views, theories, and theologoumena which are neither imposed as binding by the Church's magisterium nor supported in textbook theology by a general consensus, but represent his personal opinions which are worth as much as the reasons which can be adduced or suggested in their favour. Of course it is also assumed and claimed that these personal views of an individual Catholic theologian are at least compatible with the Christian faith as it is presented by the Church's magisterium. I think therefore that these reflections may be useful despite a certain lack of binding force from the standpoint of the Church's magisterium. It must also be observed that it is of course no part of our task to show with the aid of an epistemological and [174] existential-ontological reflection that the experience of transcendence (which forms our present theme) actually exists as such in man: to show that, in its transcendental necessity with which it is present as a condition of human knowledge as a whole, it also includes an equally necessary and irreversible dependence of the mind (in knowledge and freedom) on that which or him whom in Christian terminology we call God. All this is simply presupposed here. All that is to be done here about this transcendental experience (which is not really proved nor actually demonstrated in its essence) is to put forward, more or less as supplementary, some theses which seem to me important for a discussion devoted to a comparative study of those experiences of transcendence the interpretation of which is a matter of dispute between East and West.

The limits of these reflections must then be expressly stated. We are talking about transcendence; we assume that the experience of transcendence is philosophically objectified and verbalized. But how exactly this happens in the religio-philosophical systems of East and West, whether these philosophical interpretations are more correct, better, or more convincing here or there, how the objective of this experience of transcendence is to be correctly described – whether as absolute nothingness or as absolute being or as absolute mystery – and how these different interpretations can be brought together with some prospect of success into dialogue with one another: these are topics which are not actually to be discussed in my reflections. The questions raised here come before and after these questions. What I can say on this proposed theme will be presented more or less in the form of theses, since it would be quite impossible to cope at all with the task assigned to me if the individual theses had to be closely elucidated and substantiated in each case. I must refrain also from any attempt to present these theses in a strictly systematic sequence that is cogent in every respect. I come then to the matter itself.

(1) On the one hand, Christianity refuses to recognize a systematic and more or less technically developed 'mystical' experience of transcendence as the sole and necessary way to man's perfection and, on the other hand, Christian theology, at least in Catholicism, will not cease to regard such mystical experience of transcendence at least as a possible stage on the way to perfection and as a paradigmatic elucidation of what happens in faith, hope, and love on the [175] Christian path to the perfection of salvation wherever salvation in the Christian sense is attained.

This first thesis must be further elucidated in its two aspects.

On the first part of the thesis, Christian teaching and the practice of authentic Christianity cannot admit that the 'mystic' (whatever may be the exact meaning of this term, of the phenomena of immersion, of the formless experience of the absolute, etc.) is the only one who has gone or goes on that path to perfection of which the last stage directly and alone borders on man's perfection (however the term 'perfection' is to be more precisely interpreted). The teaching of the New Testament that the fulfillment of God's commandments in the conscientious observance of routine duties in faith, hope, and love for God and men bring the person through death immediately to perfection and unite him finally with God, the description of the last judgment in the eschatological discourses of Jesus (for instance, in Matthew 25), and many other things in the teaching and practice of Christianity that need not be mentioned here: all this forbids us to regard mysticism and particularly its more or less technically and explicitly developed form exclusively as the necessary and final stretch of the way before attaining perfect salvation or all ordinary practice of the Christian life merely as the preparatory phase of the way of salvation which leads to perfection only when it ends up on the higher path of contemplative mysticism. Christianity rejects such an elitist interpretation of life, which can see man's perfection as attained only in the trained mystic. This is particularly important, since Christianity rejects the theory of the transmigration of souls and cannot localize such an explicitly mystical phase for the individual in a subsequent life. This in brief is the content of the first part of our first thesis.

This however does not mean simply that mystical experience as such could be or ought to be regarded merely as a single and rare exceptional case in individual human beings and Christians which is granted to the latter either by psycho-technical effort or by a special grace of God as a rare privilege or by both together, without really having any constitutive importance for the actual way to perfect salvation. In the Christian theology of mysticism up to the present time views have been maintained which denied to mysticism in any way a constitutive importance for the process of salvation or conceded something of this kind at most in cases where it is a question [176] of a special 'heroic' heightening of perfection, of 'holiness', of gaining a particularly high degree of final glory (which, despite its finality, can, according to textbook theology, have varying degrees). But the first part of our thesis does not necessitate such an interpretation of the really crucial phenomena of mysticism, an interpretation of this mysticism in which the latter has absolutely no constitutive importance in any respect for the event and achievement of final perfection. It seems to me (from the nature of the case we shall return to this point) to be the task of Christian theology as a whole and the Christian theology of mysticism in particular to show and to render intelligible the fact that the real basic phenomenon of mystical experience of transcendence is present as innermost sustaining ground (even though unnoticed) in the simple act itself of Christian living in faith, hope, and love, that such (as we may say) implicit transcendence into the nameless mystery known as God is present by grace in this very believing, hoping, and loving; it seems to us that mysticism in its explicit sense and as expressly practised may signify a higher degree of the Christian ascent to perfection from the standpoint of an objectively reflecting psychology, but not from a properly theological standpoint, and that mysticism in an explicit experience has therefore (conversely) a paradigmatic character, an exemplary function, to make clear to the Christian what really happens and is meant when his faith tells him that God's self-communication is given to him in grace and accepted in freedom whenever he believes, hopes, and loves. The proof of such a perichoresis between the normal and routine practice of the Christian life and an ultimate and absolutely radical experience of transcendence into the mystery of God cannot of course be produced here and now in this first thesis. Otherwise a whole theology of the Holy Spirit, of possession by the Spirit, of experience of the Spirit by grace, of the theological virtues (as event of immediacy to God as distinct from the intramundane moral virtues), would have to be developed (which of course is not possible at this point).

(2) A Christian theology is always required to make clear that an irreversible difference exists between an original experience of transcendence (as 'natural' and as radicalized to immediacy by God's gracious self-communication) on the one hand and the objectifying and verbalizing reflection on this experience of transcendence on the other. Christian theology will always maintain that a creaturely 'mediation' [177] (which would need to be defined more precisely by a developed theology – which is not possible here – distinguished in its different forms and more closely investigated in regard to its specific function of mediation) does not remove, but under certain conditions can even make possible the immediacy of the mind (at least of the mind endowed with grace) to God. These two statements are connected and may therefore be combined in a thesis, but are not simply identical. They cannot be substantiated in detail here in a theological argument, but they may be elucidated a little.

We come to the first part of our second thesis. The original basic realization of man's transcendence as mind and freedom toward the mystery that we Christians call God on the one hand and the categorial and verbal, reflective objectification on this basic realization on the other are never identical; the result is that on the one hand this basic realization can exist even when there is no such theoreticizing and verbalizing objectification of the basic realization of the mental, grace-endowed, and perhaps really mystical transcendentality, and on the other hand that such a theoreticizing and verbalizing statement about this basic realization (even when the latter is genuine) can be true or false, adequate or inadequate, making use of different conceptual systems and forms of imagery. It follows that even the genuine 'mystic' can present a philosophy and theology of his mysticism as original experience which by no means corresponds to that original experience. The first statement of our second thesis implies that there can be and are many theologies of mysticism differing from and even contradicting one another and that nevertheless these differences do not a priori exclude the possibility that all these theologies are meant to describe the same original experience. Even when the attempt is made in principle to produce in such a theology only a pure description of the original experience of transcendence, a merely descriptive theology of mysticism, this inevitably comes about with the aid of conceptual equipment that is by no means acquired from the original experience itself (for then even the description would be bound to remain completely unintelligible to the outsider), but makes use of images, ideas, and horizons of understanding, which are drawn from different sources and carry with them the relativity of the religious, cultural, historical milieu of the person providing the description.

Contradictions in the theologies of mysticism, even when the latter [178] are meant to be no more than descriptions, can thus be due to the fact that the original experiences (which were to be described and theologically interpreted) were themselves actually different, or can occur simply because (for the reasons given) the description of what was originally the same experience is not so apt that it can be made to coincide with other descriptions. Whether the former or the latter explanation is correct is a fundamental question to which an answer must be sought in a dialogue between the different theories of mysticism. It is not possible to discuss here and now the possible methods of such a comparative mystical theology. It seems to me that such a formal methodology has not yet been adequately developed in the discussion between the world religions. But a methodology of this kind in any case could never forget that mystical experience (of whatever character) on the one hand and talk about it on the other hand always remain two different things.

If hitherto we have stressed the difference between man's original, existential, basic experience of transcendentality on the one hand and its conceptual interpretation and terminological theorization on the other and attempted to draw the appropriate conclusions, this should not of course obscure the fact that these very diverse factors also form a unity, are linked with each other and are mutually dependent. If we disregard any possibility of an absolutely imageless and nonconceptual mystical experience, then in any case, after this original experience itself, it is present only as combined with an at least rudimentary imaginative and conceptual interpretation and can be (as it evidently should be) important only in this way for the whole life of the mystic. If moreover, despite their distinction, we did not stress also the unity (which does not mean sameness) of these two factors, the meaning of the actual 'teaching' of the conceptually formulated faith in Christianity could not be made intelligible or authenticated. But Christianity is far from regarding such a conceptually articulated teaching in the last resort as a superfluous, merely accidental, and arbitrary phenomenon within the totality of Christianity. In view of the unity of the two factors, despite their permanent diversity, it is of course also quite possible for a person to identify himself with a particular philosophico-theological interpretation of his whole reality with such decisiveness that this identification (if the interpretation is false) substantially removes or destroys also the original phenomenon, as far as this is possible at all [179] in face of the transcendental necessity of certain ultimate structures and realizations of man. A 'theoretical' atheist, for example, can possibly (not necessarily) identify himself so closely with this interpretation of his existence that in the real depth of his existence in freedom he is an atheist and is not merely erroneously interpreting himself as such, even though there persists an ultimate transcendental necessity of his dependence on God, which, however, he denies not only theoretically but existentially. This sort of thing must also be remembered even when it is a question of the unity and difference between originally mystical experience and its theoretical and conceptual interpretation. In any case a theoretical interpretation of a mystical experience can (but need not) change the latter by existential freedom. But this of course should not be obscured by the first part of our second thesis.

The second part of our second thesis is perhaps even more important. Christian faith and theology see the historical reality of Jesus, the Church, the sacrament, and the proclaimed word, as ways of reaching God, not in the sense that all these things are merely elements of a subsequent reflection on the actual salvific relationship of man to God and not constitutive of the relationship itself, but in the sense that they are themselves internal and constitutive elements of this salvific relationship to God. For Christian theology not only is the recipient of the divine self-communication a created finite reality that does not perish and is not consumed in the event of this divine self-communication and is even perfected and validated in its positive and sound finiteness, but for this Christian faith there are also between the absolute God and the finite recipient of his self-communication created realities (of which some of the more essential have already been mentioned) which have a mediatory function in this relationship. Nevertheless (and this is crucial) Christian faith and its theology, if both are absolutely correctly understood, firmly maintain that this mediation does not remove or obstruct an immediate relationship of (grace-endowed) man to God, but makes it possible, guarantees it, and attests it in the historical-categorial dimension of man. Christian faith denies that radical immediacy to God, who imparts himself to man as himself in his absolute reality, and creaturely mediation of this self-communication of the absolute are Opposed to one another as mutually exclusive alternatives.

For Christian faith the situation is not such that it is possible in [180] principle to receive absolute reality in its divine purity only when this relationship involves the formless disappearance of any finite reality or when a created reality (even though understood as available by the grace of God) is all that is actually present and merely points vicariously to the always distant God. How this conception of a mediation to immediacy can be more precisely understood and theologically substantiated cannot be more closely explained here. For that, it would be necessary to discuss the difference and the unity between created and uncreated grace, the created lumen gloriae in the immediate vision of God (a vision itself constituted by God's own reality), the theological virtues as distinct from the moral virtues, the indwelling of God himself by grace in man, the specific nature of Christ's and the Church's causality of salvation on the one hand and the causality of the divine pneuma on the other. If and insofar as an Eastern mysticism (however theoretically understood) were to seek to reject such a notion of a mediation to immediacy, its attention would have to be drawn to the fact that it would consistently have to leave the finite recipient of such an immediacy to God himself to perish in the event of such a mystical theophany, that it would have to reject the permanent significance of history in its concreteness and the notion of a sound finiteness. Then it would have to be asked whether such a metaphysics and theology are true in themselves and really covered by the original mystical experience. The second point in dispute, the appeal to the mystical experience itself, would then have to be seen in the light of the understanding formulated in the first statement of our second thesis.

As far as the second part of the second thesis is concerned, it must certainly be pointed out that Christian theology also is aware of many modes and degrees of creaturely mediation to the immediacy of God: that is, it does not hold that the forms of mediation are the same always and in every case when a person has to deal directly with God himself. The question, for example, of whether mysticism in the present world can include that immediacy to God which Christian theology asserts of the immediate vision of God in the hereafter, is a matter of dispute in the Christian theology of mysticism. If and insofar then as mystical theologies outside Christianity teach an absolutely 'formless', purely and simply 'unobjective' experience of God, this is not a reason why a Christian theology must necessarily be opposed to them, but only why it should point out [181] that this sort of formless immediacy to God is always sustained by the grace of God's Holy Spirit who is irreversibly promised in historical tangibility through the historical event of Jesus Christ; a Christian theology would insist that such a mystical experience of a decline of all 'normal' mediation would be a participation in the death of Jesus who in his actual death as absolute decline came to the final dawning of God himself.

(3) The third thesis may be formulated with the reservation that what is put forward and defended here is not universally accepted among theologians. Whenever there is a final radical self-realization of man in mind and freedom and the person thus commits himself to finality, it may be assumed that such a self-realization (which can also, if not solely, take place in a mystical experience of transcendence) in practice is always sustained and radicalized by what is known in Christian theology as Holy Spirit, supernatural grace, self-communication of God, even though this fact of being sustained by grace is not itself as such made an object of reflection or given thematic expression in this occurrence.

In current textbook theology (which, however, carries no absolutely official guarantee of the Church's magisterium) grace (also described as a supernatural elevation of mental acts) is generally understood as an intermittent happening at isolated points in space and time. But if we start out from the Christian teaching of a universal salvific will of God, who offers the concrete opportunity of a supernatural salvation, a salvation, that is, that reaches the immediacy of God himself, always and everywhere in history and thus outside the verbalized message of Christianity and the Church, then we can and indeed must assume that what we Christians describe as Holy Spirit, supernatural grace – at least in the mode of a real offer to man's freedom as radicalizing existential of man's transcendentality – exists as such always and everywhere and therefore also outside institutionalized Christianity, even though of course in the concrete individual this supernatural existential of dynamism toward the immediacy of God can exist either in the mode of pure factuality from the outset or in the mode of rejection or in the mode of free acceptance.

As we said, it is impossible of course here to explain and substantiate more precisely in theological terms the thesis of the universal factuality of grace as God's self-communication. This would require [182] close reflection on the Church's teaching of the universality of God's salvific will, on the possibility as taught today (for example, at the Second Vatican Council) of real supernatural faith always and everywhere and consequently even where the explicit message of Christianity has not yet been heard; it would be necessary to try to show how and why there can be such a universal possibility of faith always and everywhere and even in a person who regards himself as an atheist, without implying a denial of the necessity for salvation of faith in an actual and verbalized revelation; it must be made clear why and how a theology of grace properly understood must interpret the latter as the self-communication of God in his most intimate uncreated reality and how this grace must be understood originally as elevating, radicalizing communication to man's transcendentality as such. But all this is impossible here and the thesis can be put forward here only as one that is not supported by a universal consensus, but which can certainly be justified.

If we presuppose this thesis of the universal reality of the offer of grace always and everywhere and primarily to the transcendentality of man as such and if we consider the fact that this grace is present as accepted and justifying if and when this transcendentality of man is accepted and sustained by man's freedom, if moreover we start out from the assumption that such an unconditional acceptance by man's freedom of his own transcendentality can exist also, if not solely, particularly and with a special intensity in mystical experiences of transcendence, then it follows that the mysticism rightly interpreted by Christian theology as a real experience of grace can and must be found even outside institutional Christianity. Nor can this thesis be opposed by the dilemma that mystical experience of transcendence must either be interpreted in an explicitly Christian sense or can at best be only some kind of natural mysticism. It is true that the traditional theology of mysticism in Catholic Christianity has been inclined up to the present time to accept this dilemma as real and inescapable, just as the theology of grace especially from the time of baroque scholasticism has taken it for granted that there are existentially radical mental acts of man (what are known as actus honesti) which concretely are not supernatural salutary acts. But if we recall our second thesis and firmly maintain the universality of the factuality of grace from the outset as an existential of man's transcendentality as such, then the possibility of a supernatural, [183] grace-inspired anonymously Christian mysticism outside verbalized and institutionalized Christianity cannot be denied.

The Christian philosopher of religion, therefore, if he is to remain within the limits of Christian orthodoxy, need not assume as a hermeneutical principle of his study the impossibility of discovering outside Christianity any mysticism that can be recognized as substantially the same as Christian mysticism. Whether this philosopher of religion takes into account our second thesis, examining the extra-Christian interpretation of this extra-Christian mysticism in regard to the original mystical phenomenon, and thus in practice succeeds in making such a discovery, or he does not succeed in practice in establishing the discovery with historical and psychological realism and exactitude, is not a question to be answered by the Christian dogmatic theologian as such, but one which must be decided by the philosopher of religion himself. But in any case Christian dogmatics does not forbid the philosopher of religion a priori to discover grace-inspired mysticism in the experience of God's self-communication by a transcendentality of man radicalized by the Holy Spirit even outside Christianity. If and when such a discovery is made a posteriori without premature blurring of distinctions by passing over the points of difference between Christian and extra-Christian subsequent descriptions of the original mystical experience itself, this is a result that should not be surprising for the Christian dogmatic theologian. It is not surprising if only because he does not interpret mystical experience even within Christianity as something that really goes beyond supernatural faith, supernatural hope, and love, but as one possible radicalized form of realization of these three theological virtues and because the same Christian dogmatic theologian, if he does not want to contradict the Second Vatican Council, cannot deny today that supernatural faith in the strict sense of the term can exist everywhere, even outside explicit Christianity, and even in a person who regards himself in his theoretical reflection as an atheist, since the original self-realization and verbalizing reflection on it are never identical and can even contradict one another.

(4) The proclamation of the theological possibility of a grace-inspired, salvific mystical experience of transcendence even outside explicit Christianity admittedly does not settle the problem to which the Christian dogmatic theologian for his own part is expected to contribute. I think that the dogmatic theologian ought to add a self-critical [184] thesis defining negatively the limits of his competence. We might attempt to formulate it in this way: the Christian theologian does not know and cannot judge whether there may not be experiences possibly outside everyday psychological experiences which on the one hand we can or must qualify as in some sense 'mystical' and which on the other hand cannot be regarded as experiences of supernatural, grace-inspired mysticism as understood in the third thesis.

In this sense the Christian theologian must practice self-effacement and self-restraint, leave the field of nonroutine experiences to the historian of religion, the psychologist of religion, the phenomenologist; he can only invite these experts themselves to examine the question closely and discriminatingly and not to reduce all nonroutine experiences of man too quickly and too hastily to one and the same denominator.

This very negative and abstract statement calls for some clarification. If and insofar as the third thesis which we put forward is correct, it must be said that all mysticism in which man's ultimate transcendentality toward God is experienced and accepted in freedom is also grace-inspired, supernatural, at least anonymously Christian mystical experience, since this third thesis starts out from the impossibility of there being any actus honesti in the concreteness of man's actual existence which are not also supernaturally elevated by grace. But this does not mean that an answer is provided to all the questions that can be raised here. The theology which assumes the real unity of personal-radical acts in which man's ultimate dependence on God is accepted in freedom on the one hand and of supernaturally grace-inspired, salvific acts of man on the other, has no reason to claim that there are no other experiences (apart from these mental-natural and grace-inspired mystical experiences of transcendence) which admittedly do not amount to such a natural-supernatural experience of transcendence and yet go beyond the ordinary routine and can therefore in certain circumstances and in regard to certain peculiarities be subsumed up to a point under the heading of 'mystical', if this term is understood in a sufficiently wide sense. The theology assumed here – for which a properly mental act in the strict sense, permitting the experience of transcendence, radically actualizing personal freedom, is in practice always also a supernatural experience of transcendence – does not for that reason [185] need to claim that all experiences are such actus honesti et salutares. Man's experience of his corporality, of his biological-physiological condition, of his subconscious and his depth-consciousness, of collective archetypes, of an 'id' in his consciousness, of an embeddedness of his consciousness in a collective reality, etc., are certainly experiences which exist more or less clearly in man, but which are not identical with what theology describes as mental-supernatural experience of transcendence and can also occur apart from such an experience of transcendence. The theologian will naturally and without prejudice allow for this possibility, just as the older moral theology was aware of the existence of what are known as actus indifferentes, lying outside the strictly personal sphere of moral decision and of morality properly so-called. Even though the Christian theologian has no real competence in the question raised here, he can nevertheless without prejudice allow for the fact that the experiences indicated on the one hand reach an intensity and radical clarity and peculiarity in certain people, so that they somehow assume a 'mystical' character, and on the other are not part of a really mentally supernatural experience of transcendence which constitutes the essence of properly Christian mysticism.

Quite apart from a posteriori empirical evidence, why should not man as subject establish, for instance, by a psychological training a relationship to his corporality that is different from and more perfect than what exists in the 'normal' human being, without this relationship or its attainment belonging to the sphere of man's actual grace-inspired transcendentality? It is, to mention a further example, quite possible that there are experiences of the emptying of consciousness, of absorption, etc., which belong to the sphere that is prior to the actual experience of transcendentality. Whether then such phenomena, whatever their exact form, can be brought about by a psycho-technical training or even by a Christian mystic, for whom they are aids or accompanying phenomena to mysticism properly so-called and are interpreted as subsidiary grace, or whether (as is quite conceivable) they are both in one: this is a question which the dogmatic theologian as such is not required to decide. Presumably (purely hypothetically) it would be appropriate to subsume such phenomena under the heading of parapsychological occurrences and not properly under the heading of mysticism, since they can certainly be largely produced by psychological training and can occur [186] also outside a religious sphere, without our being able or having to rescue these secular forms of phenomena for a properly religious mysticism by explaining that as such they are events of religious transcendentality to the absolute, to God, interpreted only subsequently as secular and therefore wrongly. But, since such phenomena of a properly parapsychological (that is, here, prereligious and preexistential) character occur also together with a properly religious and radical-existential experience of transcendence, it is understandable that these, too, are generally qualified as 'mystical'.

As a matter of fact, traditional Christian theology treats such phenomena as part of its own, albeit secondary object; it speaks of, ecstasies, elevations, knowledge of the future, telepathic powers, etc., and in the past has been only too much inclined to interpret these things as extraordinary graces, as if they could occur only within mysticism properly so-called. On the other hand the Christian theology of mysticism (especially as represented by John of the Cross) recognizes that in the last resort these phenomena are not essential and ought really to disappear with the attainment of the highest mystical union with God, even though this creates a special problem for Christian mysticism, which cannot a priori reject a mediation to immediacy, as can be seen in the distinction between the mystical theology of Teresa of Avila and that of John of the Cross. If and insofar as these phenomena, which as such are prior to the actual experience of transcendence toward the absolute mystery, can be a preparation and aid for these properly mystical experiences, exactly as a normal everyday ability to concentrate is a condition and an aid for the average Christian's ordinary meditation, it is understandable that in the practical business of higher spirituality even in Christianity there should emerge more or less spontaneously a psychological training (fasting, solitude, silence, exclusion of the uncoordinated variety of objects of consciousness) directed to experiencing more clearly and appropriating with a more radical freedom even the actual grace-inspired transcendentality of the mind toward God. As we said, the success of such psychological training can be understood without prejudice as subsidiary grace. But, conversely, it follows from our theses that the true grace of the actual experience of transcendence toward the immediacy of God is not present only when and where it is explicitly regarded as grace or (still less) when it is understood as a particular intermittent effect of God, although in [187] reality it is always and everywhere sustained in the mode of an offer by God's self-communication. From the Christian standpoint the actual acceptance in freedom of this self-communication of God is certainly to be understood as a grace of God, since (in Pauline terms) not only the capacity, but also the actual accomplishment, is given by grace and effected by God.

The really important thing about this fourth thesis was simply the understanding that in the concrete realization of the religious relationship to God there can be phenomena (whether regarded as mystical or as parapsychological) which are not really strictly part of the experience of transcendence as elevated by grace and are consequently outside the competence of the theologian. This is the situation even if the theologian thinks that actually any real experience of transcendence in the concrete order of reality is itself an experience of grace and therefore that there is no 'natural' mysticism which is not in practice also supernatural mysticism.

In the light of this self-effacement on the part of the theologian, it is possible to find experiences, rules, practices for the creation of more suitable preconditions (perhaps of a parapsychological character) for the better and clearer achievement of mysticism properly so-called: experiences, rules, and practices which exist outside the history of the Christian religion and Christian piety. In principle these can be taken over by Christianity as useful for itself just as readily as it takes over other experiences, rules, and practices of normal everyday psychology and makes use of them in the religious field. This is certainly possible, even if Christian theology is convinced that the reflex interpretation in Christianity of actual experience of transcendence in grace is correct and true (which does not mean that this interpretation and verbalization is adequate, leaving nothing more to be learned).

Christian faith and its theology are persuaded that this mystical experience of transcendence is wrongly or inadequately interpreted when it is objectified and interpreted with a real denial of its grace-inspired character as a free personal relationship to a free and personal (or suprapersonal) absolute, with a denial of a sound finiteness and of an involvement even of the mystical in a salvifically significant history, with a denial (at least implicit) of a universal opportunity of salvation for all human beings even outside an explicit form of mystical absorption. But Christianity must not claim that such a [188] wrong or essentially inadequate interpretation of grace-inspired mysticism (a mysticism which as such it admits to be possible even outside organized Christianity) is what actually occurs always and everywhere outside Christianity. There is no need for Christian theology to make this claim. It will of course say that all mysticism, wherever it exists, has an objective relatedness to Jesus Christ which admittedly is not explicitly grasped in extra-Christian mysticism; this however does not mean conversely that such a mysticism, which has not yet expressly found Jesus Christ, ipso facto has no importance for salvation and cannot be salvific faith. Christian theology will in fact consider how and why it can interpret a mysticism of this kind as 'questing' Christology, just as Jesus himself rightly understood an act of love of neighbour done without knowledge of him as in fact done to himself.

EXPERIENCE OF THE HOLY SPIRIT

What theme can there be for a meditation at Pentecost other than the Holy Spirit, given to the early Church in the midst of phenomena of enthusiasm, with the promise that he would remain with it always to the very end, with his power, his consolation, and his freedom? In a meditation of this kind we must certainly speak about the Holy Spirit as the gift in which God imparts himself to man.

But what is to be said and how exactly is it to be expressed? Certainly we could look up the Scriptures and read there about the Spirit of the Father, who is given through the Son to all who believe in him; about the Spirit who flows as living water out of the pierced side of the Crucified, as a fount of life, welling up into eternal life and quenching our thirst for eternity; about the Spirit who makes us sons and enables us to say 'Abba', 'Father'; about the Spirit who signifies the coming of the triune God, who gives us a share in God's love, truth, and freedom, in whom we are united with one another and have hope, by whom we are anointed and sealed, who prays in us and with us in ways too deep for speech and in access to the Father gives us assurance of eternal life. These and many other marvellous and sublime things could be found in Scripture, collected for a Pentecost meditation, and offered to the person within us to aid courageous faith and joyful reflection.

To the Christian believer who approaches these words of Scripture with an open mind it is obvious that he can meditate on Pentecost in this way even at the present time. And, even though here and now we are trying to follow a somewhat different way of meditation and want to raise questions about our own experience of the Spirit, [190] it is also obvious, but should be stated expressly, that we always tacitly make use of this teaching of Scripture and that we ourselves could not so clearly grasp our own experience (which is offered to all human beings in the depth of their existence) if it had not been made explicit in the words of Scripture, even before our own efforts.

But, precisely because this Scripture does not speak to us merely doctrinally about this Spirit who is given to us, but at the same time itself appeals to the experience of the Spirit as we know it ourselves (for instance, in the Letter to the Galatians and elsewhere in Paul's letters, in John's writings, and in Scripture as a whole), we may rightly ask when and how such an experience occurs in us.

At the same time we are of course aware from the very outset that this is an experience incommensurable with what we ordinarily describe as 'experience' (especially in a scientific or empirically psychological sense), for the experience of the Spirit begins at the very heart of our existence, at what might be called its subjective pole, and does not signify an encounter with any sort of particular object that happens to come upon us from outside with its effects on us. Apart from experiences explicitly interpreted in a theological way in our consciousness and our reflection, there is an experience in us which is different from and not comparable with the experiences which first come to mind when we hear the word 'experience'.

In the first place the word suggests to us the fact, the impact, of individual realities of our milieu and environment or individual psychological objects in our consciousness: pain, for instance, that can be localized, an individual thought with a particular content, etc. All these individual realities are present to us as individual within the total framework of our consciousness; there they fit into some kind of arrangement, they are distinguished from one another and connected with one another.

But, in addition to these individual experiences of certain individual realities, there is a quite different experience, not by any means given thematic expression in the ordinary routine of our experiences: the experience of the one subject as such, that has all these experiences as its own and has to answer for them, that is itself present in its original unity and totality, even though it cannot itself be thematically objectified in detail but takes the form only of an apparent void when it passes into the multiplicity of its everyday experiences and seems to forget itself in the process.

[191] There will be no attempt here in an epistemological or existential-ontological reflection to analyze this singular, original, primordial experience by the subject of itself, always and everywhere present behind all representational experiences. (We shall return later to this 'transcendental' character of man as subject.) All that is intended by this reference is to recall the fact here and now that there is in any case a kind of experience which is not commensurable with the ordinary experiences of individual realities, but which nevertheless is always present, even though it is generally overlooked. The experience of the Spirit which we are considering here is therefore not to be rejected a priori as nonexistent, merely because, just like the factuality of the subject as present for its own sake in all individual experiences, it can always be overlooked.

Of course, if we think we cannot really discover in ourselves the experience of the Spirit as understood here, we can accept the testimony of its existence as coming, so to speak, authoritatively from outside, from Scripture and the teaching of the Church. But, however much it must be interpreted in faith and given expression in words with the aid of Scripture, if we did not here and now ask also about the actual experience of the Spirit, there would be a danger of regarding sceptically as ideology or mythology all that Scripture tells us of this Spirit in ourselves and we might wonder with some irritation whether or where everything that Scripture says of the glory of the possession of the Spirit is present in us; we might wonder whether it should not all be set in a dimension (particularly when there is an assent in faith to the teaching of Scripture) which lies outside our consciousness and outside our freely realized piety.

Is there such an experience of the Spirit which on the one hand makes understandable and authenticates the testimony of Scripture to the indwelling of the Spirit in us and on the other hand is confirmed and put into words of truth by Scripture? We say that there is such an experience.

This statement is not refuted by the fact that we can and must ask with some hesitation and doubt about such an experience, that consequently this is not an absolutely indisputable experience, of the kind we have, for example, of the external world, without feeling (unless we are philosophers in an ivory tower) any need or necessity to ask whether a person really has such an experience of his milieu and environment. There are in any case also other genuine experiences [192] which exist in fact and about which questions nevertheless simply must be asked. If, for example, a German idealist philosopher or even a modern Christian philosopher asks about the transcendental subject of knowledge and freedom and about its structures, if the modern depth psychologist tries to track down deeply repressed attitudes, they are all rightly convinced that there can be real experiences in man which are felt only unthematically, which are not verbalized, which are perhaps suppressed and not brought to man's free attention. Experience as such and objectified, representational and verbalized experiences are not simply the same thing, although it might seem so to consciousness lost in the objective reality of ordinary life and worried only about what goes on there. There can therefore be an experience that amounts simultaneously to a genuine question.

The question then about the experience of the Spirit cannot be dismissed a priori as contradictory. But how can it be answered?

Today, as often also in the Church's past, it is perhaps appropriate to recall the fact that there have always been mysticism and enthusiastic occurrences, experiences and movements in the Church which, even though in the most diverse forms and interpretations, have been understood as experiences of the Holy Spirit.

There has been and there is mysticism. Here, those who have been so privileged said and continue to say that either in a sudden awakening or in a long and gradual ascent they experience grace, God's immediate proximity, union with him in the Spirit, in a holy night or in blessed light, in a void silently filled by God, and, at least at the moment of the mystical event itself, cannot doubt their experience of the immediate proximity of the self-communicating God as effect and reality of God's sanctifying grace in the depth of their existence: in other words, as 'experience of the Holy Spirit'.

How this experience has been described in the course of the history of mysticism in Christianity factually or in theological terms; how this objectifying and verbalizing interpretation has taken the most diverse forms, dependent on the background of the history of ideas, the history of civilization, of philosophy and theology; how the question is to be answered about the relationship of this Christian mysticism or mysticism interpreted in Christian terms to similar mystical phenomena outside Christianity, particularly in the East and especially in Islam and Buddhism; how such an experience can [193] co-exist with ecclesial-social and sacramental-ritual piety: all these are questions which need not occupy us here and now.

The mystics tell us of an experience of the Spirit and in principle there is nothing to prevent us from regarding their testimony on the whole as credible, particularly if on the one hand we justifiably allow for the fact that the original experience is the one thing and the philosophical and theological interpretation of it another and that consequently diversity and inconsistency in the interpretations need not discredit the original experience, and if on the other hand we remember that among these mystics there have been persons of the utmost sobriety and with acute powers of observation up to the present time, including Carl Albrecht, the mystic who was also an outstanding doctor, psychologist, philosopher, and natural scientist. The fact remains that there are people who have the courage to provide us with credible testimony to the experience of the Spirit.

Admittedly in the theology of Christian mysticism there has been considerable insistence on the extraordinary and elitist character of such mystical phenomena; on the one hand because people (rightly) wanted to stress the grace-inspired character of these phenomena and at the same time were guided by the tacit opinion that what is effected by grace and unmerited must by its very nature be rare and on the other hand because such clearly mystical phenomena are generally accompanied by circumstances of an ecstatic, almost para-psychological nature, which really are rare. Hence it is understandable up to a point that the normal Christian is inclined to leave aside such mysticism as a matter which has nothing to do with him.

But if we were to distinguish (which is not possible here) the really central mystical experience more clearly from these rare marginal phenomena such as ecstasy, absorption, etc., then it would be easier to understand that such mystical experiences are certainly not occurrences lying completely outside the experience of an ordinary Christian; that what the mystics talk about is an experience which any Christian (and indeed any human being) can have and can seek, but which is easily overlooked or suppressed. But in any case it is true that mysticism exists and it is not as remote from us as we are at first tempted to assume.

In addition there are enthusiastic phenomena and movements in non-Catholic and Catholic Christianity. Whether these things also involve a mystical closeness to God and union with him in the sense [194] of classical, more or less individual and individualistic mysticism, or whether and how mysticism and (former or present-day) enthusiasm of a more social character must be distinguished phenomenologically and theologically, this is a question into which we cannot directly enter here. It is not really necessary to do so, particularly since the classical theology of mysticism recognizes very diverse forms and degrees of mystical experience and consequently allows for the possibility of arranging enthusiastical experiences in a series of steps on the mystical ascent, without making them coincide with the peak of mysticism, the final unification by grace with God in the mystical union.

Enthusiastic movements exist anyway in Christendom at the present time. People are looking for the experience of the Spirit and his power. Lengthy charismatic religious services take place in a community, where people think they perceive the presence of the Spirit and particularly in ecstatic speaking in tongues and marvelous cures of the sick. At these times of prayer there are not a few who think that they are experiencing what they describe as 'baptism of the Spirit', being filled once and for all with the Spirit of God.

Even a solidly rational theology does not need to reject such enthusiastic experiences out of hand and in all cases or to regard them completely sceptically. This is true even though the fire of God often produces a lot of human smoke, even though many of the phenomena of American enthusiasm may not appeal to us, even though many features of these phenomena can be explained (if not theologically interpreted) with the aid of very secular psychology and take exactly the same form outside a religious context.

Even though in such enthusiastic movements the person who is still on pilgrimage in time and history may never assume that he is perfect, that he has received and experienced an absolutely certain and even final promise of the Spirit (something that traditional theology would describe as 'confirmation in grace' and would count among the most sublime mystical experiences), it need not be disputed that there can be particularly impressive liberating experiences of grace here transforming the person and providing quite new horizons of life, which mark for a long time the innermost attitude of the Christian and can certainly be described (if desired) as 'baptism of the Spirit' and also (particularly within such community prayer [195] meetings) experienced as effect of the Spirit given to the congregation.

II

But – and here we really come to our proper theme – where do we stand, who do not venture to describe ourselves as mystics and who, perhaps for the most diverse reasons, can find no personal approach to such enthusiastic movements and practices? Have we no experience of the Spirit? Can we merely bow respectfully before these experiences of others regarded by ourselves as elitist? Do these people merely give us an account of a country that we ourselves have never entered, whose existence we admit as we admit that of Australia which (perhaps) we have never seen.

We say that as Christians, supported by the testimony of Scripture, we confess that we can have such an experience of the Spirit and even necessarily have it as an offer to our freedom. It is an experience that exists, even though in the routine of ordinary life we mostly overlook it, perhaps suppress it, and do not want to admit it.

If in what follows we try to draw attention to such an experience, it seems impossible to avoid prefacing these concrete references to our own experiences with some more or less theoretical considerations on the intrinsic nature of human knowledge and freedom, even though they can only be brief and to some may seem very abstract. It is only in this way that the actual structure and peculiar nature of our experiences of the Spirit can be made clear and understood, why in our explicit and verbalized representational consciousness we can easily overlook them and thus be led to think that they do not exist at all. We must therefore ask particularly for attention and patience for these theoretical preliminary considerations.

We may consider together man's knowledge and freedom, since, despite their radical difference from each other, in the last resort they have a common structure. In knowledge and freedom man is inescapably the being of transcendence. This term may sound pompous, irritating, and redolent of ideology. But it is difficult to avoid, referring as it does to an ultimate, inescapable, essential structure of man, whether the ordinary person or even the empirical scientist is [196] inclined to take note of it or not. In knowledge and freedom man is always both involved with the individual object (nameable and distinguishable from others) of his ordinary experience or of his particular fields of study and at the same time carried beyond it, even though he leaves this always implicit trend unconsidered and unnamed. The movement of the mind to the individual object, with which it is occupied, always goes toward the particular object precisely by going beyond it. What is objectively known and named as individual is always grasped in a wider unnamed, implicitly present horizon of possible knowledge and freedom as a whole, even though it is always with difficulty and only subsequently that reflection succeeds in making this implicitly present awareness into something like an individual object of consciousness and giving it objective expression in words.

The movement of the mind and freedom, the horizon of this movement, is boundless. Every object of our consciousness which confronts us, making itself felt in our milieu and environment, is only a stage, a continually new starting point of this movement, which passes into the infinite and unnamed. What is present in our ordinary and academic consciousness is no more than a tiny island (even though it is large enough in itself and continually and increasingly enlarged by our objectifying knowledge and action) in a boundless ocean of the nameless mystery which grows and becomes clearer the more precisely we know and will in detail. And if we want to set a limit to this apparently empty horizon of consciousness, we would by that very fact have again transgressed this limit.

In the midst of our everyday consciousness we are saved or damned (as we will) for nameless unencompassable infinity. The concepts and terms that we use subsequently of this infinity to which we are continually referred do not represent the original form of our experience of the nameless mystery that surrounds the island of our ordinary consciousness, but the small signs and images that we set up and must set up to remind us continually of the original, unthematic experience – silently present and silencing its presence – of the strangeness of the mystery in which we live, despite the clarity of ordinary consciousness, as in a night and in a pathless desert, reminding us of the abyss in which we are unfathomably rooted.

Anyone who wants to do so can of course angrily claim that too much is required of him and leave all this aside and continually press [197] on to what is new; he can attempt to disregard the night which alone makes visible our little lights and gives them their brightness. But a person who takes up this attitude is really acting contrary to his fundamental nature, since this experience of being referred to the boundless mystery, seen more closely, is not a superfluous mental luxury, but the condition of the possibility of ordinary knowing and willing, even though in the routine of ordinary life and in academic activity this is generally disregarded and not considered.

If we wanted to describe as ‘mysticism’ this experience of transcendence in which man in the midst of ordinary life is always beyond himself and beyond the particular object with which he is concerned, we might say that mysticism always occurs, concealed and namelessly, in the midst of ordinary life and is the condition of the possibility for the most down-to-earth and most secular experience of ordinary life.

He whom we call God dwells in this nameless and pathless expanse of our consciousness. The mystery purely and simply that we call God is not a particular, especially peculiar, objective piece of reality which we add to the realities named and systematized in our experience and fit in with the latter; he is the encompassing, never encompassed ground and precondition of our experience and its objects. He is known in this strange experience of transcendence, even though it is not possible here to define metaphysically more precisely the unity and difference between the experience of transcendence on the part of the intellectual subject in knowledge and freedom on the one hand and the experience of God himself on the other hand that is present in the experience of transcendence. Such a definition would be a difficult philosophical undertaking at this stage and it is not necessary here.

The fact remains that the boundless expanse of our mind in knowledge and freedom, which is inescapably always present unthematically in all ordinary knowledge, permits us to learn what is meant by God as the ground opening up and filling that expanse of the mind and its limitless movement. However and wherever it is brought about by a concrete, categorial object, transcendental experience is always also experience of God in the midst of ordinary life.

At this point an observation must be made, of which the philosophical and theological senses are linked in a peculiar relationship of mutual dependence. The unlimited transcendental movement of [198] the mind toward God has actually a radicalness that makes it tend toward God, not merely as an asymptotic goal, itself remaining always at an infinite distance, but as that which itself forms in immediacy the attainable goal of this movement.

Philosophically we can think of and hope for this radicalness by which God himself becomes in himself the goal of this movement, at least as a possibility that cannot be excluded; theologically we grasp this possibility as in fact given by God and describe as grace this actually available radicalness of the transcendental movement toward God's immediacy in himself up to the point one day of the immediate vision of God, for it is in this that the actual and ultimate nature consists of what we call grace, self-communication of God in the Spirit, and of what finds its ultimate fulfillment in the immediate loving intuition of God; existentially we freely grasp this radicalness of our movement toward God in immediacy, sustained by God's Spirit, when we surrender ourselves unreservedly and unconditionally to this movement of the Spirit as it actually ranges of itself, when in our freedom we set no limits to it, but let it in a sense swing out in its own boundlessness up to the immediacy of God himself.

If grace is so understood, as it must be grasped philosophically as possibility, seen theologically as reality, and existentially realized (thematically or unthematically) in hope, then, in the actual order of reality, experience of transcendence (which is experience of God) is always also experience of grace, since the radicalness of the experience of transcendence and its dynamism are sustained in the innermost core of our existence by God's self-communication making all this possible, by the self-communication of God as goal and as strength of the movement toward him that we describe as grace, as the Holy Spirit (at least as offer to man's freedom). The experience of transcendence permitting God to be present (because of God's salvific will in regard to all human beings, by which man is oriented to God's immediacy) is in fact always experience of the Holy Spirit, whether a person can or cannot interpret explicitly in this way his inescapable experience of the unknown God, whether or not he has at his disposal theological expressions such as those we have just been using.

There is something more to be added to what has just been said. It is true that all this applies to the average person in the ordinary activity of knowledge and freedom, at least where (but always [199] where) we find really intellectual knowledge and freedom, in which a human being as real subject is aware of himself and definitively disposes of himself. But this transcendental experience of God in the Holy Spirit is present in the ordinary course of human life only unthematically, covered and concealed by preoccupation with the concrete realities with which we are involved in our milieu and environment. In everyday life this transcendental experience of God in the Holy Spirit remains anonymous, implicit, unthematic, like the widely and diffusely spread light of a sun which we do not directly see, while we turn only to the individual objects visible in this light in our sense-experience.

But even if we disregard the question whether this transcendental experience of God in the Holy Spirit can occur quite independently (for instance, in phenomena of a formless absorption, in an attitude of consciousness emptied of objects of an individual character, in mystical experience), there are in any case concrete experiences in our existential history in which this transcendental experience of the Spirit always present as such is thrust more clearly to the fore in our consciousness: experiences in which (conversely) the individual objects of knowledge and freedom that concern us in ordinary life, by their singularity, bring to our notice more clearly and more urgently the accompanying transcendental experience of the Spirit; in which these objects of themselves silently refer more clearly than otherwise happens in our ordinary and banal daily life to that incomprehensible mystery of our existence which always surrounds us and also sustains our ordinary consciousness. Everyday reality then becomes itself a pointer to this transcendental experience of the Spirit, which is always present silently and apparently facelessly.

This reference – which our everyday reality grasped in knowledge and freedom as such always carries with it and announces more forcefully in certain situations – can also be implied by the positiveness of this categorial reality in which the greatness and glory, goodness, beauty, and transparency of the individual reality of our experience point with promise to eternal light and eternal life. But it is also understandable without more ado that a pointer of this kind is perceived most clearly where the definable limits of our everyday realities break down and are dissolved, where the decline of these realities is perceived, when lights shining over the tiny island of our ordinary life are extinguished and the question becomes inescapable, [200] whether the night that surrounds us is the void of absurdity and death that engulfs us or the blessed holy night already shining within us is the promise of eternal day. If then in what follows attention is drawn particularly to such experiences which bring to the fore in this second way the transcendental experience of God in the Holy Spirit, this does not mean that the human being and the Christian are forbidden to allow this experience of God to occur also in the first way indicated and to accept it. In the last resort the via eminentiae and the via negationis are not two ways or two successive stages of the one way, but two aspects of one and the same experience, even though (as we said) it is right for the sake of clarity to stress particularly the via negationis.

We may now at last begin to point to concrete experiences of life which, whether we are explicitly aware of it or not, are experiences of the Spirit, assuming only that we cope with them in the right way. In regard to these references to the concrete experience of the Spirit in the midst of the ordinary routine of life there can be no question of analyzing them in detail to their ultimate depth, which is in fact the Spirit. In this connection what was said in a formal preliminary outline of the real nature of all these experiences in general must suffice. Nor can the attempt be made here to offer a systematic chart of such experiences. All that is possible is to give a few arbitrarily and unsystematically selected examples.

Here is someone who cannot get his life's accounts to come out right, who cannot balance the entries in these accounts, consisting of good will, mistakes, sin and disasters, even if he tries (impossible as it may seem) to add repentance to these entries. The accounts simply do not add up and he does not know how he can insert God as an individual entry in order to strike a balance between debit and credit. And this person, unable to balance his life's accounts, surrenders himself to God or, to put it both more and less precisely, to the hope of an incalculable final reconciliation of his existence, marked by the presence of him whom we call God; trusting and hoping, he gets away from his unfathomed and uncalculated existence and does not himself know how this miracle occurs, bringing no advantage to himself and not to be regarded as his own possession.

Here is someone who can manage to forgive, although he gains no reward for it and the silent pardon is taken for granted by the other party.

[201] Here is someone who is trying to love God, although there appears to be no response of love from God's silent incomprehensibility, although he is not sustained by any feeling of enthusiasm, although he cannot confuse himself and his desire for life with God, although he thinks he will die of this love which seems to him like death and absolute rejection, which apparently calls him into the void and the wholly unknown: a love that looks like a terrifying leap into unfathomable depths, since everything seems to become intangible and utterly futile.

Here is someone who does his duty even when it seems that he can do it only with a burning sense of really denying and annihilating himself, when he can do it only by doing something terribly stupid for which no one will thank him.

Here is a person who is really good to someone from whom there is no sign of appreciation or gratitude, while the good person does not even have the feeling of satisfaction that he has been 'selfless', decent, and so on.

Here is someone who is silent, although he could defend himself, although he is unjustly treated; who is silent without being able to profit by his silence as evidence of his supreme irreproachability.

Here is someone who has to make a decision purely in the light of an innermost dictate of his conscience, a decision that cannot be made clear to anyone, in which he is quite alone and knows that it is a decision of which he cannot be relieved, for which he has to answer always and eternally.

Here is someone who obeys, not because he must or because he must otherwise put up with some inconvenience, but merely because of that mysterious, silent, impalpable reality that we call God and his will.

Here is a person who renounces something without thanks, recognition, or even any feeling of inward satisfaction.

Here is someone who is utterly lonely, for whom life is drained of all its colour, for whom everything tangible on which he could rely fades into an infinite distance, but who does not run away from this loneliness which is felt as the last moment before drowning, but endures it with resignation in an ultimate hope.

Here is someone who sees that his clearest ideas and the most intellectual operations of his thought are disintegrating, that in the breakdown of all systems the unity of consciousness and what is known consists only in the pain of not being able to cope with the [202] immense variety of questions and yet of not being allowed and not being able to cling to what is clearly known from individual experiences and from learning.

Here is someone who suddenly notices how the small rivulet of his life winds through the desert of banal existence, apparently aimlessly and with the terrifying possibility of completely drying up. And yet he hopes, without knowing how, that this rivulet will find its way to the infinite expanse of the ocean, even though this is concealed from him by the dark sand dunes apparently stretched out endlessly before him.

It would be possible to continue in this way for a long time and even then not to have visualized in particular that experience which for a certain individual is the experience in his life of the Spirit, of freedom, and of grace. For every human being approaches it in the particular historical and individual situation of his own unique life. Every human being? But he must admit it, dig it out, so to speak, from under the refuse of the ordinary business of life, and, when it becomes faintly visible, not irritably turn away from it, as if it only created uncertainty and disturbed the obvious course of his daily routine and his scientific clarities.

Permit me to say it once more, although I am merely repeating the same thing with almost the same words:

When, over and above all individual hopes, there is the one and entire hope that gently embraces all upsurges and also all downfalls in silent promise, when responsibility is undertaken and sustained, even though no evidence of success or advantage can be produced, when someone experiences and accepts his ultimate freedom, of which no earthly constraints can deprive him, when the fall into the darkness of death is accepted with resignation as the dawn of incomprehensible promise, when the sum total of all life's accounts, which we cannot work out ourselves, is seen as good by an incomprehensible 'other', although this cannot be 'proved', when the fragmentary experience of love, beauty, and joy is felt and accepted as promise of love, beauty, and joy purely and simply, and not regarded with deep cynicism and scepticism as facile consolation in face of ultimate bleakness, when the bitter, disappointing, and fleeting monotony of ordinary [203] life is borne with serene resignation up to its accepted end out of a strength whose ultimate source cannot be grasped and so cannot be brought under our control, when we venture to pray into a silent darkness and know that in any case we are heard, although there seems to be no response from there about which it would be possible to reason and argue, when we get away from ourselves unconditionally and experience this capitulation as the true victory, when falling becomes standing firm, when despair is accepted and mysteriously experienced as assurance without any easy consolation, when man entrusts all his knowledge and all his questions to the silent and all-sheltering mystery which is loved more than all our individual perceptions that turn us into petty lords, when we practise our death in the course of ordinary life and then attempt to live in the way that we wish to approach death, calmly and with resignation, when . . . (as we said, it would be possible to go on for a long time), then God is present with his liberating grace. Then we experience what we Christians describe as the Holy Spirit of God; then an experience occurs that is inescapable in life (even if it is suppressed) and is offered to our freedom with the question of whether we want to accept it or to barricade ourselves against it in a hell of freedom to which we condemn ourselves. The mysticism of everyday life is there, God is found in all things; here is that sober intoxication of the Spirit of which the Church Fathers and the early liturgy spoke, which we may not reject or despise simply because it is sober.

Let us look ourselves for such an experience of our life, let us look for our own experiences in which something of this kind happens precisely to us. If we find them, we have had what we mean by experience of the Spirit. The experience of eternity, the experience that the Spirit is more than a part of this temporal world, the experience that the meaning of man is not absorbed in the meaning and happiness of this world, the experience of risk and of overwhelming trust which really has no demonstrable justification based on success in this world.

From this standpoint we can understand what is the secret passion alive in those people who really belong to the Spirit and in the saints. [204] They want this experience, in a secret fear of being stuck in the world, they want to be continually assured that they are beginning to live in the Spirit. They have acquired the taste for the Spirit. While ordinary people regard experiences of this kind as unwelcome if not entirely avoidable interruptions of normal life with the Spirit merely providing the flavour and the trimmings of another and not wholly real life, the people of the Spirit and the saints have acquired the taste for the Spirit purely and simply. Spirit is in a sense drunk pure by them and not merely as a flavouring of earthly existence. Hence their odd life, their poverty, their desire for humility, their longing for death, their readiness to suffer, their secret yearning for martyrdom. This does not mean that they are not also weak. It does not mean that they do not also need constantly to return to the ordinary routine. It does not mean that they are unaware of the fact that grace can bless also ordinary life and rational behaviour and can turn all this into an approach to God. Nor does it mean that they do not know that here and now we are not and are not expected to be angels. But they know that man as spirit in his actual existence and not merely as a matter of speculation is meant to live really on the frontier between God and the world, time and eternity, and they are constantly trying to reassure themselves that this in fact is what they are doing, that spirit in them is more than a way of giving a human character to life.

When we have this experience of spirit, then (at least if we are Christians living by faith) it becomes ipso facto the experience of the supernatural. Perhaps very anonymously and inexplicitly. Probably even in such a way that we may not and cannot at the same time turn to catch sight of the supernatural itself. We know however, when we lose ourselves in this experience of spirit, when the tangible, the demonstrable and available, is lost to sight, when all that is heard is a deathly silence, when everything acquires the flavour of death and corruption, or when everything vanishes as in an ineffable, strangely white, colourless and incomprehensible bliss, we know then that what is active within us is not only spirit but truly the Holy Spirit. This is the moment of his grace. Then the seemingly unfamiliar unfathomability of our existence as we feel it is the unfathomability of God, imparting himself to us, the advent of his infinity that is pathless and appears to us as nothingness, precisely because it is infinity. When we have freed ourselves and no longer belong to [205] ourselves, when we have denied ourselves and no longer dispose of ourselves, when everything (including ourselves) has moved away from us into an infinite distance, then we begin to live in the world of God himself, the God of grace and eternal life.

At first all this may seem bizarre and terrifying and we shall constantly be tempted to take refuge in our more familiar and intimate world, in fact we must and may often do this. Nevertheless, we should gradually get used to the taste of the pure wine of the Spirit, filled with the Holy Spirit, at least to the extent that we do not thrust back the chalice when it is offered to us by his guidance and providence.

At this point the question might be raised as to whether we have not hitherto extolled a mysticism of ordinary life which is by no means properly Christian and not related to Jesus Christ, crucified and risen, but which can exist even apart from any explicit religious or theological interpretation. It is admittedly a question that cannot be answered adequately here, but for which some few hints of an answer will be given.

First of all, if and insofar as the experience of the Spirit mentioned above is present in a mysticism of ordinary life, even outside a verbalized and institutionalized Christianity, and is discovered there by the Christian in the life he shares with his non-Christian brothers and sisters or in his study of the history of religion, this observation need not upset the Christian. It merely makes clear to him the fact that his God, the God of Jesus Christ, wills the salvation of all human beings, offers to all his grace as liberation for the incomprehensible mystery, that the grace of Christ is effective in a mysterious way beyond the limits of verbalized and institutionalized Christianity and gives a share in the paschal mystery of Jesus even when someone who is faithful to his conscience has not yet been confronted by a convincing presentation of the explicit message of Christianity and has not yet been marked by the Christian sacraments.

An observation of this kind is not only not forbidden to the Christian when and where he can make it; he must also expect it, since his faith requires him to believe in the universal salvific will of God, which reaches its limit only at the personal mortal sin of an individual and even offers the grace of Christ again and again to every human being in his whole life.

The grace of God (which the history [206] of the Crucified and Risen One made effective and irreversible in the history of humanity) is consequently the grace of Jesus Christ even when it is not yet explicitly and reflectively grasped and interpreted as such. This is not merely an opinion which a Christian may hold; it is part of his faith, which acknowledges the universal and supernatural salvific will of God for all human beings and forbids him to hold the opinion that this salvific will of God in Jesus Christ effects a person's salvation only when the latter has explicitly become a Christian.

If we also recall what we said about man's experience (radicalized by God's grace) of transcendence into the ineffable mystery of God, it becomes clear that this experience has something to do with the death of Jesus, whether this is explicitly considered or not.

The real experience of transcendence in the Holy Spirit accepted in freedom is primarily and ultimately not a matter of theoretical reason, but something that involves the whole person in the concrete history of his life and his freedom. In the last resort then it occurs at the point where it is impossible to stop at any individual reality of life as if it were final and absolute, where a final, autonomous self-defence is abandoned in free and liberated hope unsecured by anything else: in a word, at the point where dying is a passing into the incomprehensibility of God.

For the Christian who cannot and will not shut his historical existence out of his relationship with the absolute God, the moment of his mystical union with God and the climax of his experience of the Spirit is present, in the last resort, not in a sublime experience of mystical absorption as such, but in his death, even though the latter event must not necessarily take place at the very moment of his medical exitus and even though (conversely) truly existential dying as the final self-forsaking which is actual death may possibly (but necessarily) occur also in a mystical experience of absorption (assuming only that this experience is not regarded as secure and final before death in the ordinary sense of the term occurs).

It can be seen therefore that there is an identity between experience of the Spirit and participation in the victorious death of Jesus, in which alone the real success of our death is experienced and experienced within a believing community. In this life the chalice of the Holy Spirit is identical with the chalice of Christ. But it is drunk only by someone who has slowly learned up to a point to taste [207] fullness in the void, dawn in doom, discovery in renunciation. A person who learns this experiences the Spirit, the pure Spirit, and this is the experience of the Holy Spirit of grace. For this liberation of the Spirit comes about as a whole and permanently only in faith by the grace of Christ. But when he liberates this Spirit, he liberates him by supernatural grace into the life of God himself.

III

Before closing these reflections, two observations may be put forward, both of which lead us back expressly to the point from which our reflections started and from which, it is to be hoped, they never became entirely remote. What we mean is the connection between experience of the Spirit and the ordinary routine of life.

As always understood here, experience of the Spirit in the first place has nothing to do with an elitist sense on the part of the chosen, claiming to be the only ones so dedicated and setting themselves apart from the great mass of Christians and ordinary people. If what has been said hitherto is really rightly understood, experience of the Spirit in the sense meant here as such occurs always and everywhere in the life of someone who has awakened to personal self-possession and to the act of freedom in which he disposes of himself as a whole. But in most cases in human life this does not come about expressly in meditation, in experiences of absorption, etc., but on the material of normal life: that is, when responsibility, fidelity, love, etc., are realized absolutely, while even in the very last resort it remains a secondary question whether this activity is accompanied by an explicitly religious interpretation, although (conversely) it is not denied that a religious interpretation of this kind is right and also important as such. Meditation and similar spiritual 'exercises' are not thereby depreciated. They may be rehearsals, so to speak, for admitting and accepting in radical freedom fundamental experiences of the Spirit whenever they occur in life; these exercises can also (but not solely) be the point at which such experiences of the Spirit become clearer and more explicit and are grasped by man's ultimate basic freedom in such a way that they amount to a decision embracing the whole of existence and leading to salvation.

Christianity however is not elitist. The New Testament is aware [208] also of sublime experiences of the Spirit in the most varied forms, which can be summed up under the heading of 'mysticism'; but it also assures to all who love their neighbour unselfishly and thus experience God that final salvation in God's judgment which is not surpassed even by the highest ascent or the deepest absorption of the mystic. The New Testament then (even without expressly considering the matter) is certain that this unsurpassable salvation in the self-communicating Holy Spirit of God can take place even when apparently all that happens is the observance of the harsh duty of ordinary life and the resigned acceptance of death. The fact that such a fundamental experience of the Spirit (contrary to all elitist pride on the part of 'pneumatic' enthusiasts) can happen in the midst of ordinary life and how this can be regarded as possible: these things are just what our reflections as a whole were meant to show.

Admittedly, when there is a genuine concern for salvation, when God is loved, when a person learns increasingly clearly that he may never finally come to a stop on the way of freedom to himself (and thus to God), when he faces the terrifying and blessed excessive demands of the Sermon on the Mount, then neither will he ever refuse to follow at least those explicit ways of meditation and spirituality which are in fact opened up to him in the ultimately uncontrollable history of his life.

In the course of reading the letters of the apostle Paul, we come across his teaching on the charisms. These are not simply identical with a possession of the Spirit and an experience of the Spirit on the part of the person justified by faith; but they are intrinsically connected with this possession of the Spirit and the experience of it. They are regarded by Paul as diverse powers and commissions for building up the Christian community, continually assigned in different ways to individuals, never in their entirety to a single individual. They may (for instance, powers of healing and speaking in tongues) have an extraordinary, almost spectacular character; but they can also certainly be present in the form of more or less secular, everyday abilities, including, for example, ability to manage the funds of a community. Here for the time being the significance of these charisms for the building up of the community can be ignored. We can safely say that all powers and possibilities of Christian action, as authorized, sustained, and animated in the last resort by the Holy Spirit of God, are charisms, gifts of the Spirit.

[209] If at the same time we do not forget that the manifold and diversely assigned charisms are distinct from the possession of the Spirit which is one and the same in all those who are justified, it may perhaps be possible to elucidate up to a point the connection and distinction between possession of the Spirit and the charisms. Charisms, seen quite prosaically, are primarily individual commissions, individual abilities and individual offers, which the ordinary routine of a person and of his varied life puts before him. These possibilities are always more than an individual with his limited powers and time can actually realize. He must choose, distinguish. If he makes this selection rightly (that is, in the Spirit and in virtue of it) he can regard what is chosen really as 'charism', as 'God's will'.

How is a choice of this kind made correctly? The masters of the spiritual life reflected and experimented considerably on the rules of such a discernment of spirits, of finding the will of God in the concreteness of life, particularly since they were sure that finding what is here and now concretely right is not merely a matter of rational consideration and theoretical moral theology. We cannot repeat here this teaching of the masters of the spiritual life. But, in the light of all that has been said up to now, we can perhaps very briefly add something of fundamental importance which combines once more the ultimate experience of the Spirit and these ultimately 'charismatic' individual decisions continually demanded by life. When such a choice of an individual object by freedom in the course of ordinary life is not only (this is an obvious assumption) justified rationally and according to the principles of a Christian morality, but also (which is not obvious) does not obstruct and does not obscure an ultimate openness to the real experience of the Spirit in unlimited freedom; when a Christian is aware of the presence of an ultimate synthesis (not to be produced at will, not open to rational analysis, but simply there as a fact) between the basic experience of the Spirit and the will for a particular individual object of his everyday freedom: then he is acting, not only reasonably and morally, but also charismatically. Of course a great deal of practice and spiritual experience is needed to see more clearly when a will for an individual object offered by ordinary life does not obstruct this fundamental experience of the Spirit passing into the apparently empty freedom of God and beyond all individual realities, but precisely as material and starting point of this experience of the Spirit offers it to an [210] effective synthesis between experience of the Spirit and everyday duty. But the experience of such a synthesis, in which a person abandons everything to admit the boundless mystery of God and makes the courageous decision for a concrete reality of life and the 'world', is possible and alone constitutes the totality of Christian life. In that life man forsakes everything with the dying Jesus in order to reach the inescapable and formless freedom of God and accepts lovingly the individual reality of this world intended for him in ordinary life in order to take it up into this Spirit of God.

Let us look in the very consideration of our life for the experience of the Spirit and of grace. Not to say: 'There it is; I have it'. We cannot find it in order to claim it triumphantly as our property and possession. We can seek it only by forgetting ourselves; we can find it only by seeking God and surrendering ourselves to him in self-forgetting love, without returning to ourselves. But we ought to ask from time to time whether anything like this deadening and reviving experience is alive in us, in order to judge how far the way still is, and how far away from the experience of the Holy Spirit we are still living in what we describe as our spiritual life.

Grandis nobis restat via. Venite et gustate, quam suavis sit Dominus! ('A long road still lies ahead of us. Come and taste, the Lord is sweet!')

FAITH AS COURAGE

The theme ‘faith as courage’ was suggested to me by others. However unusual and surprising the suggestion to say something on this subject may sound at first hearing, I gladly accepted it. It gives me an opportunity to explain that Christian faith (and this is what we are talking about), contrary to popular impressions, is really a very simple affair and difficult only because it is the concreteness of something that we can describe as ‘courage’. All this assumes that this kind of ‘courage’ is understood in all its radicalness in relation to the totality of human existence.

Without claiming the competence of a linguistic philosopher, I think nevertheless that it is perhaps possible to distinguish between two groups of substantive terms. In the one group the terms have a quite firmly outlined sense, which can be defined even more closely by the exact sciences: a sense that unambiguously distinguishes them from other terms. Hydrogen, beetle, house, etc., may serve as examples of these terms. They define and distinguish an absolutely definite individual reality in the variety of our empirical experience of the world.

There is however a second group of terms which are quite different, although they cannot be denied sense and reality because of a demand for clear and exact speech. They are terms which have a particular starting point within human existence and nevertheless are not restrictive or conclusive, but – if the radicalness of their meaning is admitted – are open to the totality of human existence and reality as such. They are terms of a specifically human character and always involve the whole person. They involve the human person who as mind and freedom always reaches out beyond the individuality [212] and definability of particular realities within his empirical experience and thus in the last resort is always lost in that mysterious darkness which permeates and encompasses the whole of human existence.

The rationalistic positivist may say that terms like this are unscientific and should not be allowed to occur in science or in sober philosophy, which eschews poetry; what cannot be said clearly (that is, cannot be unambiguously determined in its meaning) must be passed over in silence. But is it possible to be a human person and to exist in a human way, while seeking to avoid terms like freedom, love, fidelity, joy, responsibility, fear, etc.? It is not possible. Terms like this however are lost into the totality of human existence, albeit from a particular starting point, and consequently cannot be defined in the same way as individual realities which have a quite definite place within human existence and its milieu. For this whole existence of man as one and whole is always imposed on the person; in his discouragement or irritation, he cannot therefore simply leave them aside as ‘incomprehensible’ or as ‘not clearly expressible’. When he asks and knows that ‘he’ is doing this, when he decides freely and responsibly and can no longer shift this responsibility on to others, then in fact he is always involved in this totality of his existence, no matter whether he is explicitly aware of it or ‘forgets’ or suppresses it in his preoccupation with a particular individual object which is clear or can be ‘scientifically’ made clear.

When he is very busy a person can in fact allow himself to be driven by the variety of the individual things in his life and by the detailed knowledge of these things and the particular moods they create; he can forget himself in all the thousand details of what he is doing and what he has: he can then try to make every effort to restrict himself to the area of language of the first group of terms. But even in this way he will never really get away from himself. The totality, the oneness of his existence, that he is trying to suppress and forget in the routine of his everyday life will emerge constantly out of its dark roots and present him and his freedom with the one and final question about his attitude to this oneness, what he wants to do with that and not merely with the thousand details of his life. In his concrete life of freedom and responsibility therefore no human being can live only with the first group of terms, which are those of what are known as the exact sciences. If he asks again what science, [213] truth, etc., are themselves, he is landed once more unavoidably in the field of this mysterious second group of words, which are inescapable even when he denies them the character of scientific clarity and unambiguity.

The term 'courage' is also one of those unavoidable terms which point to the mysterious totality of human existence. It is this term which will be considered now. What is to be shown is that this courage, if it is understood in its necessity and radicalness, is precisely what Christian theology describes as faith.

First, however, a brief preliminary observation to prevent the stated intention of these reflections from being misunderstood from the very outset. As we said, the terms of this second group refer to the totality of human existence. If a person speaks of freedom, he is primarily thinking of something different from what he means when he speaks of responsibility. Joy and fear, despair and hope, and so on, look at man's totality from different angles, describe different ways in which man's basic freedom approaches the one totality of existence. But since each of these terms always refers to the one human being in his unity and the boundlessness of his questioning and action, they always merge into one another, draw into themselves (by affirmation or denial) the meaning of the other terms; this means that they are not merely synonymous, but neither are they absolutely clearly distinguished from each other. This strange relationship between such terms (which can be barely indicated here) involves also the possibility of a variety of 'key terms' which become detached up to a point in the course of the history of ideas and faith of humanity. These key terms are meant on each occasion to throw light on the mysterious totality of human existence, but do so every time from a different starting point, are different and yet, if they are understood radically, merge into one another. Consequently, without on each occasion being involved in their ultimate task of giving meaning to the totality of human existence, they can either exist alongside one another or become separated in the course of the history of ideas.

The Christian is familiar with at least three such key terms: faith, hope, and love. All three are found in the New Testament, but the emphasis is different in its individual writings, so that one key term can also lead to the understanding of another. In Catholic theology (especially at Trent) the attempt has been made to distinguish these [214] three terms, describing the human and Christian basic realization of existence, as clearly as possible from each other and to see them as successive phases in which the one basic realization increasingly enters into consciousness. This effort may be regarded as wholly legitimate. But in the last resort it can be seen again and again that all three terms and each of them apart look to the one whole basic realization of Christian existence. Each of these three terms acquires its radical and full meaning only when it is 'elevated' into the other two.

There are, of course, in the New Testament other similar key terms, all of which belong to our second group: freedom, logos, light, truth, possession of spirit and grace, atonement, peace, righteousness, etc. All these terms (which in themselves are all or can all be key terms of this kind) have had a varied lot in the course of the history of Christian ideas, since of course the peculiar character of the age did not always permit them the same effectiveness in throwing light on the totality of human existence. Hence, in the course of this Christian history of ideas up to the present time terms arising mainly from the dimension of man's knowledge or from his individual concern for salvation – like logos, truth, intuitive vision of God, love, justification – had a function of this kind only for that particular epoch.

Today, however, in the age of creative freedom, of openness toward the future, terms like universal justice, emancipation, and hope can be more effective in this way as key terms.

These new key terms do not simply abolish the old, but themselves, rightly and radically understood, in turn throw light on the old. If, for instance, someone really and radically hopes, he also believes and loves, since hope has always also an element of knowledge of faith as a constituent of itself and only reaches its own plenitude when hoping means love for the other or when loving is hope for the other.

If today perhaps hope is the 'principle', the key term, the term preferred among those belonging to the second group of which we spoke at the beginning, the term 'courage' promptly springs to mind. For courage in the last resort is hope and hope is not hope if it is not courageous. If then we consider the term 'courage', that is not to confer on it precisely the quality of an epochal key term for Christian existence, for each and everyone. But in the light of the term 'courage' the term 'hope' can be understood better and more radically. [215] It can become clearer that hope is not (as it is always in danger of seeming to be) a way of escape, feeble consolation, or, still less, 'opium of the people.' It can become clearer that hope is decision, deed, venture, all of which are typical of the courageous person. And, as we said, we shall try to show that such courageous hope and hopeful courage, if only they are sufficiently radical, are eo ipso the very thing that a Christian theology describes as faith in the strict sense of the term. This is not by any means to deny that the faith present from the outset in this courage must be developed and made concrete as actual Christian faith, if it is to reach its own fullness of being.

It is difficult to say what courage is. Not because we do not know, but because as a peculiar realization of the existence of the whole person it cannot be defined as a particular occurrence distinguished from many others, in the sense of the first group of terms of which we spoke; because it is related to the totality of human existence, because it is no more open to an adequate reflection or definition than is this existence itself; because the courage that we really mean here is not courage for one thing or another that we can do, but courage for ourselves in the one totality of the human reality.

Nevertheless, it is possible to provide many hints of the meaning of courage and in this way to bring it before man's reflex consciousness. Courage has something to do with uncertainty, with the danger of missing the reality to be actualized and sought by freedom, with decision. Certainly courage can and even should be co-existent with planning, calculation of opportunities. But courage is really required when rational reflection is faced by an obvious distance between the calculation of the possibilities of success and the deed as actually posited, a deed of whose success it is impossible to be certain before it actually occurs. The deficit between the precalculation of the goal and its prospect of success is made up in a deed precisely by what we call hopeful courage or the courage of hope. The distance between the deed as not adequately calculable in advance and the real deed is bridged by what we call courage.

The rational human being today has indeed entirely the right and the duty, in his undertakings and actions, to calculate in advance as accurately as possible and to try to achieve certainty. In advance of the deed, he must reduce the distance as much as possible up to the point at which in practice courage ceases to be necessary for the [216] deed. So, for example, the structural engineer knows with almost absolute certainty before the completion of a bridge that the bridge will hold and that consequently no courage is required to walk across it. But in a thousand human actions the distance remains, the effect to be realized cannot be adequately calculated in advance, no adequately comprehensive knowledge of all the factors of an action is possible, and if action has to be taken courage remains indispensable. This is true even in ordinary life with its thousands and thousands of particular undertakings. It is particularly true when there is a question of that deed and that courage for the deed which are related to the totality of the one human existence. In what follows we shall be speaking only of this courage.

That there is and inevitably must be such a radical and total courage assumes of course that man as subject of freedom has to do, not only with one thing or another, with the thousand particular objective realities of his existence, with this partner, with that professional task, with this vocation and that individual difficulty, etc., but with himself as one and whole. The assumption we make for the notion of courage as it is meant here cannot now be justified more precisely. We assume that man as subject has to do not merely with an enormous mass of details of his life, by which he is driven or permits himself to be driven; in and through all these detailed realizations of his life he is himself absorbed as one and whole, whether he knows it explicitly or not. In real freedom man as oriented to finality is himself subject and object in one. He has not only to be concerned with a great deal and with a great variety of things in his life, he is concerned for himself as one: a task that we describe in a theological language as concern for salvation. In the varied business of his life he can forget or suppress this one and ultimate task. From being an 'I' he can become a 'one'. This being absorbed in ourselves, being condemned to freedom, being ultimately always responsible for ourselves, is however present even as suppressed and forgotten, and comes clearly to the fore in moments of solitude and final decisions, in the invocation of a final responsibility applauded by no one, etc.

If we may assume here what has just been merely indicated, it becomes clearer what is meant by that total and radical courage of which we want to speak. Man is imposed on himself in his freedom as one and whole, he is himself his one and ultimate task. But at the [217] same time he knows that the fulfillment of this one and entire task depends on a thousand conditions and causes that he cannot wholly understand and that are not within his own power. And over and above all this he experiences his own freedom as already posited and threatened in itself, he experiences what is most properly his own in his character as subject as mysteriously alien to himself.

For both reasons there exists here in the most radical and irremovable fashion that distance between the acting subject with its capacity, its power, its means which can be calculated in advance, on the one hand, and, on the other, what has to be done in this one life's deed: the ultimate and definitive self-determination in a fulfillment of the boundless possibilities initially present in man as mind and freedom, the ultimate self-understanding that a person does not merely passively accept, but gives himself creatively in freedom. He experiences this distance, since he experiences himself at the same time as the being with unlimited claims, as the person who can never definitively stop at a restricted goal, and as one who is powerless, the person doomed to death, who is always fragmentary, an unhappy consciousness. This distance is bridged only by absolute hope, by the anticipation of a fulfillment which is not one's own achievement, by a hope of an absolute future as possibly and actually offered, that we call God and know originally and properly only in this hope.

The decision for such hope implies however also that courage with which we are concerned here. In this courage the totality of human existence is hoped for as achieved; the ground of this hope is not an empirical detail which could be completely understood and possessed; this hope is founded on the incomprehensible God, and on this God as free. Man must then entrust himself to another's freedom and accept this, not as imperiling, but as redeeming. This hope has not really anything outside itself which could serve independently as its ground and security, since the ground of hope, called God, is experienced only in hope itself. But such hope is for that reason courage purely and simply.

Before we can prove that this hopeful courage is faith in the strictly theological sense, something important must first be mentioned. We can of course objectify and verbalize the nature, content, and ground of this hopeful courage (just as we have done here and as every religion does with the aid of the most varied formulations) and [218] realize a free act of courageous hope in regard to this reality as so verbalized. In other words it is possible to attempt expressly to hope courageously in an explicitly religious act. But however good such an act may be (and, under certain preconditions, even required) it is not simply to be identified with what we mean by this courageous hope. For in the first place it is by no means certain for man's reflective consciousness whether such an explicit individual religious act comes from that deepest centre of the acting subject from which the totality of human existence is really hazarded and surrendered, as redeeming and reconciling, to the ultimate mystery, called God. Not every religious act, however clear and well-meant, really itself disposes of the whole of existence for finality. Even if someone says sincerely, 'God, I hope in you, I love you,' it is far from certain that what is thought and said here really happens, that the person's whole existence moves toward God in a free decision from its innermost centre.

What is still more important, however, is that this hopeful courage can be realized very unthematically and without much reflection in the most varied free acts of life, without any attempt verbally to thematicize its nature in explicitly religious terms. If someone remains faithful to his conscience to the very last, even without reward; if someone succeeds in loving so unselfishly that in reality there is no question of a mere balance or harmony of egoisms; if someone quite calmly and without any final protest allows himself to be taken in the night of death; if the one life of a human being, despite all unceasing evil experiences and sad disappointments, opts for light and goodness; if someone, perhaps in apparently total hopelessness and despair, nevertheless hopes that he is hoping (since even hope itself cannot be established for certain as a solid fact on which further calculations could be securely based, but that very hope must be hoped for), and so on, then that courageous hope is always realized, even if it is not explicitly thematicized in religious terms. At this point man's freedom is at once identified with that hope which is the basic structure of human existence and continually offered to man's freedom throughout all the individual occurrences of life. In that very hope there is experienced and known what is really meant by 'God', even if this expression is not part of the vocabulary ordinarily used by such a person.

What is courageous and final about this free hope in courage is, [219] spread up to a point anonymously over the whole course of the history of human freedom. That, of course, is not to say that explicit realizations, verbalized in religious terms, of courageous hope are superfluous or worthless. On the contrary, they can be so many ways in which this generally anonymous hope becomes fully conscious. They represent the practice of this basic hope in freedom at the heart of existence. They protect the person as much as possible from the danger of failing to make the final act of hope in the decisive moments of his history of darkness and menacing despair.

This courageous hope however is itself faith in the properly theological sense of the term. Many theologians will readily admit that this hopeful courage has the character of a 'trusting belief', of a kind of provisional human form of faith properly so-called, but shrink from describing this courageous hope as itself faith, faith in revelation. They will say that this courage of absolute hope, essential as it is for a person's existence, is not yet to be described as faith, since faith in the strictly theological sense of the term is an assent to God's personal revelation, but this is not present in such a human hope as it were 'from below' and thus cannot be accepted in faith.

Conversely however the theological 'lay person' will perhaps be too quickly inclined to regard this hope as salvific faith, on the assumption that a person who seeks God in hope must certainly find him. This is true, but it does not answer the question raised by the theologian when he declares that faith, properly so-called, in revelation is necessary for salvation, appealing to Scripture, Christian tradition, and (when he thinks he cannot really see how this hope, this total courage, can itself be the response of faith) to God personally revealing himself.

But it can certainly be said (and it can be admitted that the merely apparently naive lay person is right in this) that such hope is in fact faith in revelation, even though only in a rudimentary form that needs to develop into its full nature. Why? First of all, it must be remembered that freedom is always also an acceptance of what is concealed, unconsidered, in a decision of freedom. Freedom is always acceptance of a 'risk', always takes on more than it explicitly and reflectively intends. This is true especially of that act of courageous hope which is being considered here. For here man's one whole and never completely explicable existence is staked on God's incomprehensibility and freedom. Hope is centred on the uttermost [220] reality, on everything, in fact on God himself, transcending all particular individual realities and individual goods which man encounters in the course of his history. That it is possible to hope in this way not merely for a great deal or for one individual reality after another; that hope is of God in himself; that the movement of mind and freedom, transcending all individual realities that can be grasped successively, does not in the last resort peter out into the void or need eventually to come to a stop at any individual reality, however significant, as the sole really possible fulfillment, at a 'creaturely' good, but will reach God himself, the original fullness and creative ground of all individual realities; that God himself is the absolute future of our hope: these things do not amount simply to an obvious possibility of our own, but to a gift that might be refused, purely and simply grace. God himself is the innermost dynamism of this boundless movement of hope toward himself.

The very fact that God himself thus becomes by grace the dynamism and goal of our hope means that revelation has taken place. Grace, given to spirit as such, the possibility of hope founded on grace, anticipating God himself as its goal, this is revelation. It need not be explicitly grasped as such or explicitly distinguished from the rest of the experience of the spiritual subject of freedom, nor need it be expressly understood as distinguishable on each occasion from an isolated individual event. But this in no way alters the fact that it is a question of really personal divine revelation. It does not in fact take the form directly of the communication of certain propositions, but starts at the innermost core of the free spirit-person, opens up the latter in his dynamism toward the immediacy of God and thus gives him courage to hope for everything, that is, for God himself. When this innermost dynamism of man is accepted in freedom, when it is not diverted as a result of false modesty (implying a deep-seated secret fear of life) to a particular good as its ultimate goal, then what is described theologically as faith is ipso facto present.

Again, this acceptance in freedom of boundless and absolute hope must not be understood primarily as a single explicitly religious individual occurrence. When a person is faithful without any reservations to the dictate of his conscience, when in a final decision (despite all disappointments and adversities of his earthly experience) he does not reject an ultimate and absolute hope, then he surrenders in hope to the unrestricted, not wholly calculable movement [221] of his spirit. At that point there is revelation and faith. From the Christian standpoint, what is present there is the Holy Spirit, whether this can be explained in express terms or not. This courageously hopeful acceptance of one's own existence (which is released into the salvific incomprehensibility of God and his freedom) can take place in the midst of the dull ordinary routine of the average person, since even this ordinary average person cannot avoid such final decisions, even though they generally occur very unobtrusively. Consequently such a faith in courageous absolute hope is certainly something that can occur even where religion does not occur or scarcely occurs in thematic form. Such a faith can be present even when a person, for whatever reasons, hesitates to give a name to the incomprehensible and ineffable character of his existence. Courageous hope, which is real faith, is required everywhere and is found even among those who are merely anonymous Christians. Actual faith in the full sense of the term is possible only in free hope, which is absolute courage; and, conversely, such absolute courage of unconditional hope is itself faith in the Christian sense.

We must however also consider the courage of hope (which is faith) from quite a different aspect. We must think about the courage for explicitly Christian faith, for explicitly Christian hope. We might then get the impression that Christian faith with its almost incalculably great quantity of doctrinal propositions, dogmas, etc., in all Christian denominations, despite all denominational differences of opinion, is something quite different from the faith in hope of which we have hitherto been speaking. It might be thought that the courage required for the hopeful acceptance of existence as one and whole, oriented to the incomprehensibility of God, is something quite different from, more simple and more obvious than, the courage to cope in faith with the complicated doctrinal fabric of Christianity with its detailed theology.

Of course the one courage and the other are not simply identical. Not only from the evidence of solid everyday experience, but also in the light of the conviction of Christianity itself, it is certainly possible for a person to have that innermost faith in courageous hope for the totality of his existence as oriented to God, to realize it freely in the commonplace routine of his duty and love and yet inculpably to be unable to produce that courage which is required in principle from the Christian for faith in regard to Christian teaching as a [222] whole. In the vast confusion of religious and ideological opinions which are part of his life's situation, in view of the intellectual difficulties involved in the understanding of the Christian faith as subtly formulated and so articulated as to be almost incomprehensible, it is certainly possible for a person to abandon that faith without any real fault of his own and to take up toward Christian teaching the attitude of indifference and scepticism widespread today among both educated and uneducated people. But in principle it must be said that the courage for Christian faith properly speaking is nothing but the concreteness of the courageous hope of which we have been speaking up to now. In the last resort then it is a question of the same courage and the two forms of courage, which can certainly be distinguished, differ in fact only more or less as the seed differs from the flower.

In order to appreciate this, we must now ask what exactly Christianity teaches in its message, if the latter is grasped at its deepest level. Our answer can be given in two parts.

First, Christianity declares explicitly precisely what we have indicated up to now as the 'content' of the courageously hopeful faith on which we reflected here as best we could. It states then that we may hope that futility, darkness, and death by no means have the last word, that we may hope absolutely and boundlessly, that we are hoping for God himself and experience him in the unrestrictedness and absoluteness of this hope. It states that we may and must have the courage still to hope even if we have offered to this hope a desperate refusal in what is described in Christian terms as guilt and sin. It tells us that in this hope we may accept forgiveness particularly when our sin is hopeless and insurmountable as far as we ourselves are concerned. This courage, which, sustained by God himself, constantly breaks through the banality of our ordinary life and the weary scepticism of our mind, may be difficult and may call on the very last resources of our heart, resources which in fact are no longer our own. But in this respect the courage for hope that is in our existence and the courage of Christian faith are in the last resort the same thing. It may also be true that the religious explicitness of this hopeful courage within Christianity (as distinct from anonymous faith existing in the secular world outside Christianity) not only, as is certainly true, incites and fosters that anonymous courage for life of an absolute character which is faith, but also up to a point creates a [223] new difficulty for it, akin to the difficulties which an explicit theory of action can create for the spontaneous carrying out of this action instinctively and without reflection.

Second, in addition to this statement to the effect that the one and the other form of the courage of faith are really the same thing, distinguished only as an unthematic and a considered realization of existence, there is in Christianity a second fundamental statement:

the statement about Jesus Christ. But what does this statement about Jesus crucified and risen really say? Properly speaking, only that here in this man doomed to death the absolute hope which was his and is ours was really achieved, reached its goal; that the consummation of the hope that is also ours became palpable and historical also for us in what we grasp in faith as Jesus' resurrection; that the fulfillment of our hope, which is the heart of our existence, has been promised to us by God in Jesus as also historically irrevocable. This is not the place to make clear that what has just been said about Jesus itself contains the rudiments of the classical orthodox Christology of all Christian churches. That ought of course to be explained in greater detail than is possible here.

If however we start out from the thesis, simply assumed here, which certainly relieves the dogmatic conscience of the ordinary Christian who is not a professional theologian, then the situation of the Christian today in regard to faith, his courage for faith, is relatively simple. He takes hold on Jesus, crucified and risen, on him who is plunged into the radical powerlessness of death and as saved is known in the faith of his disciples and of all Christendom; he grasps him then precisely as the historical happening of what he grasps for himself by hope in that courage of which we spoke in the first part of our reflections as the ultimate achievement of our existence.

Ultimate courage for existence and explicitly Christian faith in Jesus, crucified and risen, are not therefore two areas of the one Christian faith brought together externally as lying alongside each other. What really happens is that Christian faith grasps as fulfilled and achieved in Jesus and there also promised by God to us what the Christian (and, in fact, any human being) hopes for himself when he accepts in hope his own existence at the very point at which it is plunged into the incomprehensibility of both God and his own death. Despite the possibility and necessity of a thematic distinction between [224] fundamental courage for life and explicit faith in Jesus Christ, in the last resort these two factors are one. In the Christian they enter into a relationship of mutual dependence; since in his fundamental courage for life he believes in his 'resurrection' (that is, in; being redeemed in his own death), he believes in the resurrection of Jesus, which for him is not then a miraculous coincidence within the field of his purely external historical experience, but the historical manifestation of the structure of his own innermost existence grasped in hope. Since he is human, he gives his assent in faith and hope to the Son of Man, crucified and risen in Jesus. But likewise, conversely: since with the disciples of Jesus and a worldwide history of faith of Christendom in past and present he finds courage for faith that Jesus in his death fell into God's redeeming freedom and not into the empty void, the Christian has also the courage expressly to profess his own hope, which he always realizes (if not perhaps explicitly) in his existence, so far as he does not surrender himself in a final culpable despair. Since the Christian believes in the God-man, he has also the courage to believe in hope in himself and in his supreme possibility, the possibility of reaching the absolute God as his own most intimate life.

Of course, over and above its innermost core, which is related to its ultimate realization of existence in the courage of hope purely and simply, the Christian faith contains many individual statements, especially about the community of those who believe in Jesus as God's historically palpable self-promise to us (that is, about the Church), about the sacraments as the concrete realization of the Church in the life of the individual, about Christian life and, thus, about Christian morality. But all these further dogmatic and moral theological statements, so far as they become relevant and binding in the light of particular situations in the life of the individual, can always be differentiated at a variety of levels and thus related to and derived from this ultimate faith in the risen Jesus, a faith in Jesus himself which for the Christian is his fundamental courage for life. Hence there is no need to speak here about all these varied explications of Christian faith.

It can happen in the light of his concrete possibilities and situations in life that the individual Christian in his fundamental courage for life does not succeed in actively linking the derivations and, references in particular statements of faith to the centre of his faith [225] in Jesus, the Risen One. He should not then deny these individual statements, for he has neither the right nor the obligation to do so in view of the faith of Christendom as a whole; but for the time being he may patiently leave them aside and simply entrust the further explication of his own actively realized faith in the explicit totality of the Church's faith to the further development of his own sense of faith, a development to which he remains open in principle.

It is by no means so certain that we really have an ultimate and total courage for life centred on our existence as definitively achieved. For such courage is always the act of our freedom in the depth of our life. But a person can fail to accomplish this act, however firmly or defiantly he stands up to the thousand details and individual tasks of his life. But when there is such a courage for total hope in the success of our one whole existence, in the success which itself is grace and rooted in the incalculable freedom of another – of God – and precisely in this way hoped for in the ultimate courage of existence, then faith in the Christian sense is present and achieved in freedom. But when a person looking to Jesus, crucified and risen, accepts as historically palpable and as confirming his ultimate courage for life the answer to the question raised by his hopeful courage, then Christian faith is present in its explicit and proper form. This kind of human and explicitly Christian courage of absolute hope is both difficult and easy.

CHRISTIAN DYING

I. PROLIXITAS MORTIS

1. Introductory Preliminary Remarks

Reflections on Christian dying are prior to eschatology properly speaking, although they are on its borderline. This means on the one hand that theological reflection on dying must refer to those phenomena of human life which are not really part of man's definitive mode of existence in his consummation, but belong to the life of history in the present world and to a freedom not yet fulfilled, and can consequently be experienced in principle in the way in which human experience, enlightened by revelation, is related to other factors of human life and its history of freedom. But on the other hand, despite all experience of dying, we can speak appropriately of Christian dying in the light of the event of death and the dawn of eternal life only by looking to death itself as such and to the permanence of the eschatological consummation which it involves. The experience of dying can thus always be lived and understood in a Christian way only in the light of the knowledge of faith in regard to the condition of being dead and to the final consummation. How these two elements of dying can be coordinated with each other in a Christian death and what hermeneutical principles result from this mutual relationship are questions which would have to be discussed at the beginning of eschatology properly speaking. In this reflection then death will be discussed as the advent of consummation only insofar as this is indispensable for the understanding of Christian [227] dying. If and insofar as we must say of Christian death substantially what is usually said about death in dogmatic theology, this is unavoidable from the nature of the case and creates no special difficulties, as long as it takes into account a preliminary glance at general and individual eschatology. But the fact remains that our theme here properly speaking is Christian dying. And to that extent it is possible to discuss here particular themes which are not usually discussed in a dogmatic theology of death.

For a great variety of reasons arising from the nature of the case and from traditional habits the theme of dying and death is never treated completely and comprehensively at any one point in a Christian dogmatic theology, even though this as such would not be impossible, if it is appropriate to conceive a Christian doctrine of faith as an 'anthropology' of salvation history in the comprehensive sense of the term and thus perhaps to concentrate all the themes related to dying and death at one point. However that may be, it is possible to find in different parts of this dogmatic theology important statements on dying and death which must be presupposed here and cannot really be repeated in all their breadth and depth. We may refer particularly to the treatise on man as sinner and to the treatise on the cross, dying, death, and descent of Christ into the underworld, in these two treatises especially, what is essential about dying and death is said, since both are understood in a Christian sense only if they are seen and realized as both the manifestation of the sin of the world and of the sinful condition even of the Christian and also a dying with the redeeming death of Christ. This means that on the one hand not everything mentioned in these two treatises can be entirely omitted here, but on the other hand these things may and must be repeated only in a kind of formal abstractness referring back to their full content in the original treatises. But conversely a number of things must be discussed in regard to the theme of dying and death which could certainly find a place in other parts of a dogmatic theology. For, fundamentally, there is no element of a Christian anthropology which, if it is really to be understood in a Christian sense, need not be confronted with the doctrine of death in a Christian understanding, whether this happens or is overlooked in a traditional theology. The orientation of human existence as a whole to death is in reality, as a co-determining factor, part of any treatise on a dimension of human existence, of a theology of mind and knowledge, [228] of a theology of freedom of a theology of human fellowship and love, of a Christian description of the basic realizations of human existence (fear, hope, joy, despair, trust, etc.), and so on, since this 'being for death' co-determines everything in human life and imparts to the latter its uncertainty, its openness to mystery and its ultimate seriousness. This more or less transcendental occurrence of death in the totality of human life, the whole of anthropology as theology of death, can of course be put forward here only in a very rudimentary fashion and in a somewhat arbitrary selection. Otherwise the whole of dogmatic theology would have to be repeated here.

2. Fundamental Option and Clinical Death

The point of the theme of Christian dying to be discussed here would be missed from the very outset if death were seen only in the generally accepted sense, as consisting in those biological and medical occurrences which directly and immediately closely in time lead to death, to being dead. Specifically, Christian dying (insofar as it is supposed to be not sheer suffering, but a Christian deed in freedom) cannot simply and certainly be located in the last hours of a human being, since as human and Christian he may perhaps be no longer capable of such an act of dying and yet the latter may not simply happen (even though this act may be conceived under certain conditions as produced without much reflection and 'anonymously', depending on the individual's disposability even within the history of his freedom). For this reason dying must be recognized as an event that is taking place throughout the whole of life, even though at all times with varying intensity and with a fresh application of the freedom that accepts death in life or protests against it. This prolixitas mortis (as Gregory the Great describes it) must be borne in mind. In this connection we must at once issue a warning against a possible misunderstanding: we should not ascribe to death as an event corning at the end of life and only there peculiarities (apart from those to be mentioned later) which we deny in principle to other moments of time within the life of a human being.

At the moment (immediately before or in or 'after') of death everything possible can 'happen' that we regard as conceivable, that we [229] may presume, for which we can appeal to accounts given to us by those who have endured more or less the agony of dying and nevertheless escaped. But in principle to ascribe to the moment of medical decease a theological significance that cannot belong to any moment in the rest of life, to assert that in the moment of clinical death and only at that point there occurs man's real and comprehensive act of freedom in the total disposal of his existence for or against God, since this passing alone offers an adequate situation and opportunity for it: this is an assertion which is not probable in the light of empirical psychology and biology,[1] can be supported

[1] Medical and psychological scrutiny of dying people and those who have been 'rescued' after 'death' from heart failure may yield interesting factual conclusions. These facts permit us to hope that in very many cases of a slow passing there occurs a phase in which the individual's physical condition makes his personal surrender to his destiny of death easier and consequently that the basic act of the history of human freedom is possible also at the time of clinical death. But this in no way alters the fact that there is no return to the present life after a real death (from the very nature of actual death as the definitive end of the history of freedom) and that all accounts of dying are accounts of experiences before death and that there is no guarantee that what sometimes happens on these occasions must always happen.

only with the aid of ideas savouring of mythology, and which theologically is neither probable nor necessary. If and insofar as the total disposal of freedom in regard to our own existence before God (for or against him) has to be understood as localized at all as such at a definite point or at definite points in time, although in our reflection we can never or (apart from a mystical 'confirmation in grace', traditionally accepted in mystical theology as possible, even though considerable misgiving must be expressed in this connection because of man's continuing and always threatened history of freedom) rarely determine with certainty where exactly such a moment lies within the temporal course of our life's history; that moment need not in any case simply coincide with the moment of clinical death, since, as we said, empirically this is extremely unlikely in the majority of cases and theologically in no way necessary. It is the same even if we take an optimistic [230] view of salvation for as many as possible or for all human beings (and this is the hidden motivation for this false hypothesis) and assume that they are saved despite the empirical appearance of their sinful life. For on the one hand our general thesis to the contrary does not exclude the possibility in individual cases of a more or less exact coincidence in time of the final basic option for God and clinical death, and on the other hand it is possible to think of a sufficient number of other ways of an explicit or of an unthematic character in which this fundamental option could occur within the course of life. The assumption behind this understanding of a totally free decision for or against God that does not need to happen mysteriously at the very moment of physical death (as, for example, Ladislaus Boros seems to think) lies in the fact that we understand and take seriously the prolixitas mortis in life itself as the permanent and inescapable even though unthematic confrontation of freedom with death in the whole course of its history.

3. Experiences of Oncoming Death

We are not yet going to provide the ultimate existential-ontological and theological justification of this idea of prolixitas mortis throughout the whole of life in the light of the nature of human freedom. (This will be attempted in section 2 of the second part of this chapter.) At this point it is a question only of straightforward indications of various experiences which herald the coming of death and do so from very different aspects.

(a) There is something like an experience of death even when there is no question of suffering and sickness in the proper and ordinary sense of the terms. The transcendental constitution of man, who in all his mental achievements of knowledge, freedom, production and in all other intellectual-personal achievements aims at a particular categorial object and at the same time (even though generally only unthematically) surpasses it, produces to a continually increasing extent the experience of the finiteness of his milieu and environment and thus, too, of himself and consequently that 'disappointment' as a basic mood of our existence which the Preacher in the Old Testament described in radical terms at an early stage. This very experience itself is a presence of death in which all the 'disappointing' [231] individual realities of life perish and thus the finiteness of the subject itself becomes a matter of radical experience. Here there is an experience of dying inwardly that is not an individual occurrence here and there in the course of life, but a basic mood permeating all things,

The question whether individuals have been 'raised from the dead' in the sense that they really died and yet returned to this earthly life (Lazarus, etc.) is one that cannot be examined here. It would be impossible to clarify the many preliminary questions. Certainly those who were resuscitated in this way had not died in a theological sense of death as the finality of a personal life's decision. But it is impossible to explain here what this 'not dying' means in the concrete, not even on the assumption that the stories of raising from the dead in Scripture and in the lives of the saints can claim historical validity.

whether the latter is accepted in freedom and resolution or not.

(b) This basic mood makes itself felt as warning and herald of death whenever suffering, failure, and the like are experienced, as something that even an average, everyday consciousness regards as what ought not to be. All this (which need not be presented here in detail in its thousand shapes) is every time a partial death, no matter what attitude a person takes toward it. Something perishes that the person judges to be possible, realizable, and desirable, and yet he is deprived of it. Hence the theodicy relevant to suffering in the world, possible only in the hope inspired by faith, is an element in the theodicy of death, and vice versa. At the same time we should be under no illusion that bravery, rationality, and so on could so remold and transform all these disappointing experiences, that the 'maturity' of a person could be so effective and assured and thus the success of 'heroically' coping with death could be established. Consequently there will be no attempt at this point to produce (once again) a theodicy of death in terms only of an unconditional surrender of man to the incomprehensibility of God in what in the last resort is a self-evident hope; it would in fact be nothing but the understanding of faith, hope, and love in regard to God's incomprehensibility in face of death, before which alone the meaning of these basic Christian achievements can be made radically clear. This is true then also of that prolixitas mortis which consists in suffering of every kind in individual and social life.

(c) This infiltration of death is felt most clearly in real (that is, dangerous) illness, for it is the danger of biological death as directly perceptible. That is why in the Old Testament also death through sickness as distinct from a smooth fading out of life at an advanced age was regarded as particularly hard and problematical and liberation from sickness as a special mark of God's favour. Even apart from all the discoveries of modern psychosomatic medicine, sickness is distinguished as a total human phenomenon and not merely as a disturbance of man's biological dimension, because in the light of our very ordinary experience (even though not clearly verifiable [232] in every individual case) it threatens and reduces even man's intellectual and free subjectivity, diminishes or withdraws from man the possibility of reacting to it, so that this helplessness of the subject itself is an element in a really human and not merely biological sense. But in this way and not as a purely biological disturbance sickness points and tends toward that endpoint of life in which man as a whole is deprived of himself and his sovereignty, and which we call death. The experience of a sickness rendering the whole person helpless up to a point itself shows that human death is not to be identified simply with clinical death understood in terms of natural science with its immediate causes. By its individual peculiarities also sickness proves to be as such preeminently prolixitas mortis. The impossibility of completely foreseeing and manipulating sickness; the helplessness into which it thrusts us; the special, remote relationship to society into which it forces us; the solitude and the curtailment of possibilities of communication; the weakening of the capacity for active self-direction; the permanent uncertainty of any interpretation of its 'sense' and its causes within the total structure of a human life; the burden it imposes on the people around the sick person; the withdrawal from an efficiency-oriented society; the sick person's experience of being useless to others; the impossibility of integrating sickness meaningfully into a plan of life, and many other peculiarities of sickness make it a herald of death.

4. Memento mori

In the light of this constant presence of death in the whole course of life Christian wisdom has always been aware of a memento mori. If and insofar as dying and death amount not only to a purely passively endured happening at the end of life, but also to an active deed of man

(as will be explained more precisely in the second part of this chapter) and if this act, as we said, cannot be located simply at the moment of the advent of death in the medical sense, then for the Christian, coming death cannot be something which does not concern him 'for the time being', something that he might now suppress as much as possible. Within life he has to live with death. This happens primarily and fundamentally through all those accomplishments of freedom in which a person accepts with resignation the [233] finiteness of his milieu and environment and of himself in hope of the incomprehensible and thus abandons the attempt to regard as absolute anything that can be experienced in itself; this sort of thing happens also when someone simply accepts as unanswerable the question of his ultimate identity and his relationship to God as sinner and (as he hopes) justified before God. This ultimate acquiescence, too, is an anticipation of that 'night in which no man can work'. But, in addition to these basic, even though unthematic realizations of a memento mori, in Christian life and in the life of the Church there is rightly an explicit remembrance of the prospect of death. There is no need to describe here in detail these ways of keeping death in mind, of explicit preparation for death, of organizing life with an eye on death, etc. Despite their derivative character, they are of great importance, since in the light of man's nature the reflex thematicizing and practising of basic realizations, which, whether accepted or rejected, are in any case inescapably present in human life, is of great importance for the very reason that it renders more secure retrospectively the true and radical acceptance of these basic realizations by fundamental freedom and because man is bound in principle (of course, only insofar as it is possible) to make these things secure.

5. Styles of Dying

In the history of the Christian life and also in the history of the life of mankind as a whole there can be found obviously varying styles of dying. The method and custom of a particular society presents to its individual members a definite style of dying, to be preferred as right and proper, at least for the 'normal' case. In Christendom, too, there are such 'rules for dying' and they have not always simply remained the same. In particular a certain style of dying was expected from those holding important positions in the Church, a style in which their rank, their responsibility for others, their Christian faith, could be presented as an example. Formerly, a Christian died within his family circle, said goodbye there, blessed them, had a few last words to say, asserted his orthodox faith and his Christian hope, etc. It is very different today, when, as a result of thrusting the sick into the impersonal atmosphere of public hospitals, dying has largely become [234] styleless. This may be deplorable and need not simply be accepted as inevitable; but it is part of that lack of style (that is, shapelessness) which we accept as belonging to death and thus also to dying, which in the last resort is beyond our control. The individual styles of dying possible to a Christian and up to a point being successively eliminated in the course of history need not be described here in detail. Their alteration and the continually changing concrete circumstances of dying, which determine this style on each occasion, are also part of that radical uncontrollability that is proper to death. Thus all that remains to be noted here in theological terms – as distinct from those of a (perhaps ecclesial) cultural history of dying – is that the Christian is bound to the Christian Church's style of dying in the 'normal case', that is, when the concrete possibilities are available and can be realized without recourse to extraordinary measures, insofar as he is 'bound' to die in an explicitly Christian way. Concretely, this means that he is expected to receive the 'last sacraments'. An attitude of this kind, in which there is also realized an indispensable readiness to accept death, is present (to put it circumspectly) according to general Christian feeling also when the dying person can regard himself as being at peace with God, as justified, and thus the 'last sacraments' are not for him the obligatory mode of sacramental reconciliation with God and the Church. The exact form of this obligation to an ecclesial 'style of dying' can be examined in a work of moral theology.

6. Advent of Death

The question of the advent of death, that is, the criteria according to which a person is already dead or is still living although unconscious, is in itself primarily a question of a natural empirical anthropology. But it has theological consequences for the Church's practice: for example, for the decision as to whether a Christian can still be given the anointing of the sick. Since and insofar as death in a theological sense is the end of an historically personal life in freedom, it can be said today that death has come at the point where the functions of the brain as the foundation of this life have irreparably ceased, no matter whether other 'organs' of the person continue to 'live' or not.

[235]

II. DYING SEEN IN THE LIGHT OF DEATH

1. Official Statements of the Church

We come at once to the official statements of the Church on death. The reason for this is simply that the Christian tradition on death cannot really be set out in all its fullness at a later stage, so that it is possible only to put forward the essentials of this tradition in a certain formal abstractness.

(a) What strikes us first all in these official statements is that not all aspects of death or, consequently, of dying find adequate expression in this teaching. Of course Jesus' death as the crucial salvation event is frequently mentioned, but at the same time the real nature of this death is not clearly considered nor is there any attempt to deduce from it statements of the magisterium about human death as such. It is also shown there that death is the consequence, the 'penalty', of original sin, but its positive significance for salvation is scarcely given clear expression in the statements of the magisterium. In addition to this hamartiological aspect of death, little more is stressed than the fact that 'all' human beings must 'die' and with death the mental-personal history of man passes directly into the definitive permanence of the subject and its history before God; in other words, the idea of a migration of souls, of reincarnation, etc., is incompatible with a Christian understanding of man and his death. In view of these gaps in the teaching of the magisterium on death, it is not very important how we are to arrange these somewhat amorphous statements. Some observations on the meaning and limits of these statements of the magisterium are here directly linked with the presentation of this teaching.

(b) Death is seen as penalty (poena) of original sin (DS 146, 222, 231, 372, 1511-1512, 1521, 2617). This teaching need not be described here in detail. It is sufficient to refer to the treatise on sin. Insofar as 'original sin' as compared with grave personal sin can be called 'sin' only analogously, can certainly be understood as an historical and universal condition of man's freedom and must be regarded as an element in the 'sin of the world' (while, admittedly, the lack of grace resulting from sin must be seen as part of this situation in the sense that there would be this lack of grace from the [236] dawn of history if it had not been surpassed by the redemption of Christ), death, too, is a penalty only in an analogous sense, a penalty really surpassed by the death of Christ and thus turned as such into a redemptive event. The relativity of the hamartiological interpretation of death (insofar as it comes from 'Adam') is not explicitly brought out in the texts of the magisterium on death as penalty for sin, but it may be assumed as implicit in them if the other statements of Scripture and tradition on the positive meaning of the death of Christ (and of Mary) and on death as dying with Christ (cf. DS 72, 485, 3901) are given their full force. Neither is this 'penalty' to be understood as an additional element, as God's reaction attached as it were to sin extrinsically, but as a consequence of the intrinsic nature of sin itself. Nor can the penal character of death consist in the appointed ending of man's history of freedom as such. For it is part of the nature of a creaturely history of freedom to reach a definitive consummation in a unity of restraint and freedom, a consummation which might as such also be called 'death' and which is prior to the distinction between guilt and innocence. It will be explained at a later stage what exactly is the element that enters into this 'death' in the concrete history of man and makes this 'death' into death in the traditional sense as penalty for sin (as understood in the doctrine of original sin). Then it must also be seen how the character of death as penalty for sin can be compatible with the teaching against Baius and others (DS 1955, 1978, 2617) that death is a 'natural' characteristic of man.

(c) With death comes the finality of man's basic option, which permeates his history and in which he disposes of himself in confrontation with God, set before him by world and history (DS 410, 839, 858, 926, 1002, 1306, 1488).[2] With this official teaching of the Church, which, with certain qualifications still to be indicated, must be understood as the teaching of faith, a number of theories are rejected as incompatible with the Christian understanding of man and the seriousness of a unique history. These include the theory of an apocatastasis (at least and certainly also merely as a firm, theoretical statement, as distinct from a hope, that respects God's sovereign and unknown disposition and the openness of every history of [237] freedom known to us)[3] or the theory of a migration of souls (metempsychosis, reincarnation). From both aspects however it can be said with some caution that this doctrine of the uniqueness and permanent validity of every personal history secured by death is certainly true when such a history of freedom has actually occurred. Every human being and Christian has to admit that in his own life he must allow concretely for such an absolute and definitive history of freedom has actually occurred. Every human being and Christian has to admit that in his own life he must allow concretely for such an absolute and definitive history of freedom and can never discard the burden of such a responsibility, that he must presume such a history of freedom in every other human being when he encounters rational life in freedom in the course of his secular experience. But, despite the declaration of the Fifth Lateran Council (DS 1440, cf. 2766, 3771, 3998) and the ordinary understanding of faith in the Church, it can be said that in the last resort we do not know how or whether this doctrine of the always unique history of freedom passing through death into finality is to be applied to those who die before the moment at which, on the basis of ordinary experience, we would be inclined to ascribe to them an actual decision of freedom in the radical sense; nor do we know whether in fact everyone who is 'adult' in the sense generally understood really makes that decision of freedom of which the official teaching of the Church says that it is raised by death into finality. From the Christian standpoint, all that we can really say must be about the 'normal case' of humans and Christian life, we must take this seriously on each occasion for ourselves, read official teachings of the Church which seem to go beyond this normal case

[2] Cf. also Collectio Lacensis VII, 567; Pius XII: AAS 47 (1955) 64-65.

[3] At the same time of course we are disregarding our profession of faith on the eternal redeemed state of Christ and of Mary and the teaching of theologians that the saints solemnly canonized by the Church have certainly gained eternal happiness. But it must be remembered that the good news of salvation and of God's victorious salvific will certainly does not permit us unconditionally to expect that the possibilities of life on the one hand and of death on the other form part of the content of the Christian message in precisely the same way.

more or less as broad, general statements, not intended in the last resort to express anything purely and simply about marginal, if very numerous, cases; for the rest, we must admit an ignorance which in the last resort is obvious from the nature of the case.

[238] The Church's official teaching says nothing about whether death as biological demise (understood of course within the totality of the one person) implies as such the finality of personal history or whether the coincidence of biological death and the end of personal history arises simply from an independent decree of God, who could also have decreed otherwise without destroying the unity of man's body-soul nature. This question has been disputed in theology up to the present time. But, as will be repeated later, it will be appropriate to opt, with Aquinas, for the first alternative and also read the official statements of the Church in the light of this assumption.

(d) The Church's official statements on death include also its universality (DS 1512), which extends as widely as the universality of original sin. In view of the literary genre of these ancient narratives, the old question as to whether Enoch and Elijah were exempted by a special privilege from this universal law has ceased to be relevant today. The same certainly holds for the question of whether, according to Scripture and tradition, those human beings whom we think of as existing at the end of the whole course of history will die or enter 'alive' into the consummation of history. In any case they will experience 'death' in the sense that it is the consummation decreed by God of their history of freedom. And, beyond this, there is no more to be said except that all, living or dead, come in the end to the consummating immediacy of God in judgment. Insofar as Paul, too, speaks in the light of the hypothesis of his eschatological imagination (1 Cor. 15:51), it is impossible to deduce from his work any dogmatic decision on this question.

2. Death as Close of the History of Freedom in the Presence of the Pardoning God

(a) The doctrine of Sheol, as found at least in the older strata of the Old Testament, speaks of a shadowy continued existence of the dead. But if in the first place we read these texts 'literally' (which is not the same as 'correctly') they suggest that these dead are remote after death from God, deprived of his power and care, of no account. But if this doctrine is not to create great difficulties for us in regard to the inerrancy of the inspired Scripture of the Old Testament, this imagery must actually be an expression of the devout person's conviction [239] in Old Testament times that with death an absolute definitiveness and a real end is reached. Despite its vivid imagery, the doctrine of Sheol does not really provide a view of a world beyond death, is not meant to indicate the substance of a 'hereafter' as such, but refers purely and simply to death as such, in order to see it in the radicalness in which death brings to an end the life of man as one and whole. If the later parts of the Old Testament (in the doctrine of the resurrection and in a differentiation of the lot of individuals hereafter according to moral standards) and the New Testament (in developing further belief in the resurrection of the just and in view of Jesus' resurrection and the indissoluble union of the believer with the Lord) offer the dying person a hope, this hope, arising from the basic experience of the Old Testament of the radicalness of death, cannot consist in the fact that the dying person is promised a 'further' life that on the one hand might be understood as 'living on' with different means but in the last resort in the same style, and that on the other hand would be bound to raise the question of why in this further life there might not be new moral decisions, conversion, etc. Only on the ground of the radicalness with which the earlier strata of the Old Testament bring the life of the whole person to an end at death can the later hope of an eternal life hereafter be rightly understood.

This life is not a continuation of earthly life; on the contrary, it is only by this afterlife that the impossibility becomes clear of escaping the radical importance and the inalienable seriousness of the responsibility of freedom even by a flight into the void, since this eternal life is nothing but the finality (as redemption or perdition) of this earthly life and its subject possessing it in freedom. If we think in terms of biblical theology and at the same time evaluate positively the Old Testament's radical experience of death and yet (in the same light however) go on to the New Testament hope, it cannot be a question of the conception of an immaterial intellectual subject surviving and 'going on' as soul after the biological death of the body, but of seeing the one human being radically affected by death and nevertheless inescapably burdened and hoping with an absolute responsibility of freedom. That is not to say that a positive appreciation of a Platonic theory of the 'immortality' of the spiritual soul is not at all possible, particularly since even the Western Christian tradition understands the fundamental definition of man within the [240] scheme of a distinction between body and soul and death accordingly as separation of body and soul (cf. DS 991, animae separatae; and DS 1000, ante resumptionem suorum corporum, etc.).

From the original starting point of Scripture, however, it is understandable that the one fate of the one human being should be seen as a resurrection of the dead, a resurrection that does not come subsequently as the lot of the body as additional to that of the soul; that the doctrine of the judgment (in the last resort impossible to systematize) sometimes places that judgment as an event occurring at the death of the individual and sometimes as what happens for all at the same time at the end of world history. If all this is considered without tacitly assuming a positivistic understanding of revelation, then it must be said that for the theology of Scripture death sets an essential internal limit as a consummation of freedom from within and not merely an end of the history of moral freedom assigned arbitrarily by God 'on the occasion' of biological death. Otherwise the ancient doctrine of Sheol could have no positive meaning for us, but would raise the unanswerable question as to why it had not been simply erroneous even in its earlier form. The later teaching in the Old Testament and particularly in the New on an eternal life of a positive character could not be understood as a radicalization of what was really meant by the doctrine of Sheol, but would be merely additional, leaving it still obscure why a supplementary teaching had not developed only out of the experience of Jesus' resurrection, but had also been present at an earlier stage. If it were to be said here that this teaching had developed out of the conviction of Yahweh's irrevocable fidelity to the people of the covenant and from the feeling that a history leading pointlessly to breakdowns must have a meaning in the sight of this God of fidelity, this would be merely another way of saying what had hitherto been meant: there is only this one earthly history, which is ended by death as its internal limit, and this history has an irremoveable finality and permanency before God.

It is from this standpoint alone that the fundamental meaning of particular texts, especially of the New Testament, is really to be appreciated. The final sentence of the judge of the world with its irrevocable consequences is related to man's deeds accomplished in his earthly life and to nothing else (Matt. 25:34-46, etc.). The time of earthly life is the day that is followed by the night when no one can [241] work (John 9:4). We must work 'in the body', 'while we have the chance', and this alone is the standard of the final judgment (Gal. 6:10; 2 Cor. 5:10; Rev. 2:10). The free sovereignty of God frequently stressed by Scripture, with which he decides on the death of a person, need not mean that the restriction of the opportunity of merit is based on a divine decree external and additional to the nature of death, but is assured simply by the fact that man's death as such by its very nature has in itself a passive, incalculable element not completely at man's disposal.

If we disregard the always sparse remaining supporters of an apocatastasis doctrine from Origen onward or interpret this doctrine as the expression of a universal hope impossible to work out in theory and consequently permissible, then it can certainly be said that the Christian sense of faith was always and unambiguously sure that death is the end of the history of human freedom, in which that history is raised up into an enduring finality. As we said, it remained and still remains a matter of dispute in this Christian tradition whether the finality of history arises from the nature of death as a biological event (affecting however the totality of man) or whether this death and the end of personal history are linked with each other by a supplementary decree of God. It has also been said that the first alternative is accepted here, because otherwise it is quite impossible in the last resort to see that this connection can be revealed or how it can be revealed. (If someone wanted to say that this link, despite the lack of an essential connection between death and the end of the history of Jesus, arose with his death as such and consequently this link had to be accepted also with all other human beings, then it must be recalled that the actual experience of Jesus' resurrection – however much it must be understood as something new and fundamental – is also and indissolubly associated with the belief in a future resurrection of the just: a conviction existing even before Jesus' time, which must have been formed legitimately, and, as indicated above, could have emerged only on the assumption of an essential connection between death and the end of history, even though Scripture never explicitly considers the reasons for this connection.)

(b) The understanding of death as the elevation of the history of freedom into its finality must take into account three factors simultaneously: the intrinsic nature of freedom; the unity of the self-realization of the corporeal-historical and spiritual-personal human being; [242] the precise nature of the consummation which is made possible for freedom and required of it. As a result at least of the third factor, the doctrine with which we are concerned here belongs properly to the field of the mysteries of faith and is not merely part of a philosophical anthropology. If the doctrine in question here is derived from these three factors, that is not to deny that a clear and certain understanding of the factors can equally well be conceived up to a point in the light of the conviction of this doctrine, of a conviction attained unthematically but firmly rooted in life. In its fundamental nature freedom is not the ability to do or to omit one thing or another of a categorial nature, but the basic condition of the subject in its transcendentality, in which it disposes of itself for finality.

Freedom thus opens up history, but this history is by no means the opportunity of being able permanently to go on into the void, to be occupied with what is irrelevant (since it is always open to revision), but is precisely the opportunity of establishing something really definitive. The inalienable responsibility imposed on the subject in its freedom, which alone makes the subject what it is as such, would not exist if the self-disposal of the subject could at any time be revised, so that each particular decision would become irrelevant since it could always be revised and replaced by another; the subject could always relieve itself of itself and its freedom, continuing into a future of empty opportunity. Freedom would possess an infinite potential which would make it, not more significant, but irrelevant in everything it really brought about. The fundamental nature of freedom is therefore the opportunity of a 'once and for all' disposal by the subject of itself, a definitive self-disposal. This uniqueness of a self-disposal, which aims at being definitive and irrevocable, in man of course has a temporal extension and dispersal throughout the multiplicity of single moments that make up the corporeally historical life of man. The uniqueness of this free self-disposal is not something lying behind man's spatio-temporal life, the latter being merely the ultimately superfluous projection of a fundamental option, timeless in itself, on the part of the subject of freedom on to the conveyor belt of time; this uniqueness occurs within time itself, but is not annulled by the multiplicity of the individual moments of time. For this very reason however the uniqueness of the one total self-disposal by the subject of freedom of itself as one and whole cannot be regarded as bypassing spatio-temporal historical life, it is pointless [243] to think of this corporeal history of freedom as continued beyond death as the end of man's historical corporality; otherwise this self-disposal of man would be placed from the very outset and always somewhere outside his spatio-temporal history, but in such a way that this history itself would be understood as no more than an appearance spread around true freedom and concealing it. If the history of freedom continues in death after the end of corporeal history, then history properly so-called was never actually present as such in this spatio-temporal life. But a person who is down-to-earth and Christian is aware of only one history, which is true history of freedom before God and thus possesses unfathomable depth and absolute radicalness, but occurs in the course of the ordinary routine of life.

If we introduce into this context the third factor mentioned above, this both renders more acute and clarifies the problems involved in the conviction that man achieves the uniqueness of a final self-disposal in an earthly history spread over space and time and only there. If this self-determination decides on an ultimate and definitive relationship to God, who makes himself in his most intimate reality and in immediacy the ultimate content of this history of freedom and thus in particular of the finality of this history, this certainly imposes an enormous and ultimately incomprehensible burden on the problem of this unique history of freedom of a spatio-temporal subject of freedom. How can a subject of this kind, with the creaturely finiteness of his freedom and in the poverty of his spatio-temporal history, really and definitively and once and for all decide for or against this infinity of his real life, which is purely and simply God himself? But if we regard this as possible and as Christians must so regard it, this possibility also provides some relief to the problem with which we are concerned. A preexistence or migration of souls, the disclosure of opportunities of freedom that lie before or after or behind this corporeal history of ours, even apart from the fact that they are not comprehensible in the light of sober experience, provide no help toward a solution of the actual problems involved here. If it is a question of a decision of freedom, involving radically the infinity and permanent incomprehensibility of God in himself, then this opportunity is not made any easier to understand if we say that man can cope with it if he has a few more opportunities of freedom available to him behind, before, or after his earthly life.

[243] The theory of a migration of souls can be attractive only if we have in mind the particular categorial contents purely of moral life: then the impression may be given that man needs more and better material on which to achieve his moral decisions than he is granted in the course of a short and miserable life. But if we consider the nature of freedom as the one self-disposal into immediacy before the incomprehensible infinity of God, an increase (that always remains finite) of the historical material provided is no answer to the basic question presented by the nature of freedom as self-disposal toward God. Even additional material always remains incommensurable with this basic nature of freedom. If we wanted to avoid this incomprehensibility of a decision for or against God as such, produced by a finite material, then no idea of a migration of souls or anything of that kind would help; all that would remain would be the possibility of a never completed realization of freedom and the denial of the Christian teaching that freedom can really have something to do with God pure and simple. But such a freedom would contradict the basic Christian sense that, at least by grace, we have to do with God himself and in the last resort would become irrelevant and irresponsible, since it could only continually choose options open to improvement. What has been said does not of course decide the question touched on above, whether there are not phenomena of human life that do not in fact involve any history of freedom in a Christian sense (ending of life at an embryonic stage, biological life that never comes to ‘the use of reason’, etc.) and whether in such a case the attainment of an eternal consummation must or can be conceived.

(c) The history of freedom of the subject’s decision in regard to itself in its relationship to God as self-communicating grace, ending with biological death, is in a dialectical relationship to man's disposability which finds its radical manifestation in death. Only in the dialectic between freedom and disposability, completely radicalized in death and in such a way that the concreteness of this dialectic is still absolutely hidden from man, is the real nature of 'infralapsarian' death present, that makes it possible for death in this hidden dialectic (beyond our understanding) to be the manifestation of sin and redemption and liberation. As present in knowledge, human freedom has an infinite horizon, particularly since on the one hand in the concrete order of salvation this freedom has to do with God himself [245] in immediacy and on the other hand this freedom is not related solely to those finite realities which it can produce or achieve in a popular sense, but at least in the form of free renunciation or unselfish recognition can be related to everything. But this infinite freedom is nevertheless finite in its concrete realization; it is faced from the outset by certain finite preconditions and restrictions of its possibility; it always has its own place. But if freedom properly so-called is not placed behind or before or after its encounter with the concrete realities which draw this freedom to themselves, then it must be said that, although it is related to the infinite God as such, this freedom retains in itself as realized the finite categorial constituents which draw it to themselves and thus always remains finite and controlled freedom. Only in this way can the consummation of freedom be the permanent finality of man's history. Over and above this, freedom is aware of being finite and under control, since it is aware of itself as set up, as initiated by an infinity which is not itself, just as the boundless transcendentality of man's knowledge does not make the latter an absolute subject, but makes him aware of his beginning as appointed by absolute being and thus of his createdness.

This disposability of finite freedom, both by its nature and also in virtue of the material of its environment and milieu drawing this freedom to itself, is experienced radically and irrepressibly in dying and death, no matter where precisely this radical experience (which must not necessarily occur at the very moment of clinical death) has possibly to be located in life. Wherever the experience is made as an act of freedom accepting its radical finiteness within the one and unique act of freedom of life, it reaches in dying and death its complete realization and manifestation. For at that point man is drawn away from himself and rendered powerless. Because he is deprived of everything of which he can dispose and the subject of freedom is withdrawn from itself, freedom is seen in the last resort as something granted and assigned. Insofar as freedom is aware of itself as finite as it is actually situated, man's radical disposability in death cannot be understood as something external to the one and unique act of freedom by which a person disposes of himself for finality; this disposability of man in death is in fact an intrinsic element of the one act of freedom consummated in death by which a person disposes of [246] himself before God. Death is both man's final self-determination and final, irrevocable disposability,[4] even if we try to appreciate better the active-passive finalization of man and his freedom by identifying the moment at which he is rendered utterly powerless with the point in time at which clinical death occurs, while assuming the man's free self-disposal of himself takes place at some other moment within the course of life. Even then the unity of the history of freedom, to which the factor of disposability is intrinsic, would keep together these two factors in the unity of a specifically human death. This unity is also involved particularly as a result of the fact that the absolutely proper 'object' of freedom is the very acceptance or rejection of this disposability, that is, of finite creatureliness, which enters into our experience precisely through the infinite horizon of freedom.

[4] It is no different with suicide, which has only the semblance of a self-disposal greater than that which is present in normal death. In this respect, too, freedom acts in the light of existing factualities, not determined by ourselves, and tends toward powerlessness. The theme of suicide, incidentally, must be left to moral theology, however much it needs to be considered as a whole by an anthropology and however often it is there made to seem too easy and too simple.

At the same time of course this passive disposability of man conceals the nature of freedom as self-disposal. In death it seems as it man no longer has anything on which self-disposal can be achieved as the means of its self-realization or as if all former results of his individual free acts as elements of the one and entire self-disposal had been annihilated. And conversely the act of freedom in the boundless range of its possibilities can always spread the impression of an absolute autonomy and conceal the disposability of freedom, so that eventually biological death would present itself as something that really does not touch the person properly speaking and his freedom. But since the appearance exists on both sides and all appearances are deceptive, since moreover in his fatal impotence man cannot break down this impression, nor can he judge or effect the dialectical relationship between absolute powerlessness and absolute deed from a higher standpoint, particularly also since (because of the impossibility of adequate reflection) the act of freedom as such cannot be judged in its concrete reality with certainty in the light of explicit knowledge: for all these reasons death has the character of hiddenness and of an insoluble question. No one knows [247] concretely what sort of death he will face. He must see it as the event of active finalization of the one act of freedom of his life; he experiences the same death as the height of his powerlessness; he knows that his freedom must accept this powerlessness while hoping to the very end; he cannot tell explicitly and with certainty where and how, in living or dying, the opportunity of such an acceptance by an act of freedom has been given to him in his powerlessness and whether he has actually accepted it. Insofar as this death involves the approach of God's incomprehensible mystery, embracing both the incomprehensibility of his nature and also that of his freedom in regard to man, the incomprehensibility of death becomes definitive in its hiddenness.

3. Death as Manifestation of Sin

(a) Attention has already been drawn to the texts of the Church's official teaching which speak of death as the penalty for original sin. But it was also pointed out that statements of the Church's magisterium nevertheless describe death as 'natural', as a consequence of man's natural essential constitution. As the teaching of the Church and of tradition is that in the first justification (at least as achieved in baptism) not only are original sin and personal sins remitted, but also all punishment due to sin, so the traditional theological formulation was that death for the justified person had the character only of a poenalitas and not of a poena, although and even because death comes also to those who are justified. In the first place the term poenalitas is one that conceals rather than illuminates the problem facing us. For it is not clear how the empirically existing factuality, at least apparently permanent for all (justified and sinners) can be at one time a punishment and at another merely a poenalitas. Nor does the explanation that the punishment due to original sin is turned by justification into a mere poenalitas bring out the positive importance for salvation of the death of the justified person, an importance that cannot be denied to this death as dying with Christ and in view of Jesus' salvific death.

As far as the first problem is concerned, it can of course be said that death can be a pure poenalitas also because it is itself natural and a consequence of man's natural being as a biological organism. [248] But then the question again arises as to how death can be conceived and experienced as punishment, if it is a natural essential consequence in human existence. Certainly in human life there are particular occurrences and injuries which are contrary to man's natural being and thus can be seen and experienced under certain conditions as 'punishment'. But if such a penal character is to be assigned to death as a universal natural phenomenon, this penal character and the experience of it cannot be seen as related to man's natural being. But if something that ought not to be (without which punishment cannot be conceived) is present in death, this can be understood only as relative to the claims which man as a being committed to a supernatural goal and endowed with the offer of God's self-communication by grace rightly raises and simply cannot fail to raise. In order to understand the penal character of death, it must also be made clearer what there is in man that ought not to be (purely relative to his supernatural destiny, since the character of death as the consummation bringing to an end the history of freedom in deed and endurance evidently cannot be seen as something that ought not to be) but under any circumstances belongs to man's nature.

(b) The penal character attributed to death can therefore consist only in what was described as the hiddenness of death, insofar as this is or can be experienced as something that ought not to be, relative to man's supernatural elevation, at least as a retarding factor that must be overcome in the development of man's life under the influence of grace. In the first place it is at least not unthinkable that a history of freedom can clearly grasp, in the increasing radicalness of the fundamental option gradually integrating all plural elements of human existence, the success of this process of integration and thus the outcome of the history of freedom. This cannot be unthinkable, since man actually has at least partial experiences of this kind of maturing, of the growth of his 'identity', of at least a partial 'integrity' which overcomes (up to a point, at any rate) 'concupiscence' as the nonintegratedness of many of man's realities into his free fundamental option. From this standpoint in the first place it is at least not positively contrary to man's nature as subject of freedom, even though not completely attainable by his natural being, that in his history of freedom, which finds its consummation in the finality of his self-disposal (described in a metaphysical sense as 'death'), he [249] should experience the complete success of this process of integration, which means that the hiddenness of death ceases when it becomes an act of freedom by the endurance of a helpless passivity in which the subject and the outcome of his act of freedom are withdrawn and concealed from him in life. For there are styles of dying and death in which (at any rate, as it appears to us) a death in 'integrity' is attained at least asymptotically, where someone can die 'old and weary of life', where death is freely accepted in complete peace and final composure, in possession of the intrinsic results of a life brought to its fullness.

It should not be claimed that (apart from Jesus) such a death in pure integrity, where what is really meant by 'concupiscence' has been overcome, is ever fully realized. But it can be seen from such approximations that a 'death' in integrity without this hiddenness of death, depriving the subject of freedom of the clear and palpable outcome of a life, is not under all circumstances contrary to man's nature. If then the official teaching of the Church and the teaching of the New Testament explain death as 'payment' for sin and the experience of man (which can or must be seen as affected by grace) in which a protest is made against the darkness of death and its concealing powerlessness is regarded in this teaching as justified and 'encouraging', then it can easily be understood that the real punishment of sin consists in this hiddenness of death; it can be understood that this situation corresponds to man's natural being, but need not be present in human existence under the influence of grace, that this hiddenness of freedom in concupiscence and death would not have appeared if there had been grace at the beginning of the history of mankind and increasingly at the end, and consequently this hiddenness of death is seen in the light of this grace and the experience of it as something that ought not to be, as a punishment of sin.

(c) Contrary to a widely held opinion, it must now also be said expressly that death in its hiddenness is not merely an expression and manifestation of that remoteness of God which humanity brought on itself by sin at the beginning, in 'Adam'. Closer consideration of the New Testament statements on death (Rom. 1:32, 6:16, 21, 23; 7:5, 9, 10; 8:2; James 1:15; similarly in John) shows that it is regarded there as also the consequence of serious (unremitted) personal sins and (as with original sin) as intrinsic, essential expression [250] and manifestation of these personal sins also in the total corporeal reality of man. Death then is the manifestation of the one 'sin of the world', beginning with 'original sin', built up from the sin of mankind as a whole, and manifested not only in the internal and external situation creating suffering for the individual or in the bad social conditions that can never be completely removed but also in concupiscent death, death as hiddenness.

With the principle that death is the expression and consequence also of personal sins the teaching of Paul can be connected without more ado, that there is a link between death and a law of God that is not under grace. If the law of God apart from the grace of Christ in fact (even though contrary to its own original and intrinsic intention) becomes the dynamism of sin (1 Cor. 15:56), it is understandable that mere law, by rousing man's sinful protest against itself, produces death as the consequence of this sin, not only death of the soul, but also death purely and simply, including also man's bodily ending in the peculiar form in which-we actually experience it, that is, in its hiddenness (2 Cor. 3:6; Rom. 7:5, 10, 13).

(d) In this connection attention must be drawn also to the link attested in Scripture and the Church's official teaching between death resulting from sin and the devil (Heb. 2:14; John 8:44; Wisd. 2:24; Gen. 3:13, 19; DS 1511). As death is the consequence of sin, so, too, it appears in Scripture as expression of the devil's sphere of power as ruler of the world. If and insofar as the 'sin of the world' is connected with the 'authorities and powers' that we sum up and interpret in the term 'devil' and that are part of the situation in which and in the light of which the sin of the world takes place, the relationship between sin that means death and the devil already exists in principle. To describe this relationship more closely would lead us into an angelology and a demonology that cannot be discussed here.

(e) Death is the most universal of all realities and everyone admits that it is natural and a matter of course for us to die. And yet in everyone there is a concealed protest at this end and an irresolvable horror of it. A metaphysical anthropology alone cannot explain this fact. If it recognizes that man as a spiritual being is 'immortal', that his death is 'natural' to a biological nature, and that by the very nature of freedom he cannot want merely to live on endlessly, it is really impossible to see why he is so afraid of death, unless that fear [251] is no more than the expression of frustration of a purely vital drive for self-assertion, the very thing that fades out at death: thus the problem of the fear of death is distorted.

At this point the testimony of Christianity comes in. Man rightly has a fear of death. For he was and is expected in the act of his life (carrying with it an element of passivity that admittedly can be integrated as such into his freedom) to raise up his history of freedom into finality and in this sense to 'die'; but he ought not to have to suffer this darkness of death, since even now he has within himself that vitality of divine life which, if it had been able to find pure expression from the beginning in this world of ours, would have outdone death from the outset. The fact that man dies and is not simply brought to fulfillment is the consequence of sin at the dawn of the history of humanity as a whole and of all those sins in which man makes the sin at the beginning and the situation it created his own. This consequence is not a punishment inflicted by God, breaking in upon man from outside, without having any intrinsic material connection with the punishable offence, even though of course death as suffering and as a rupture inflicted from outside, as the 'thief in the night' which it always is, is concretely under God's free decree and thus always carries with it the character of the intervention of a judgment of God. But what especially comes to the fore in death is sin.

Emptiness, hopelessness, surcease, insubstantiality, the indissoluble conjunction of supreme deed and sheer instinctive submission, of utter clarity and fundamental dubiousness: all these peculiarities of the death that we actually die are nothing but manifestations of sin, to which the same peculiarities belong analogously in a higher and more hidden dimension of the subject of freedom. But since the creature belonging to God, by its very nature as elevated by grace, shrinks from the ultimate mystery of emptiness and helplessness and nothingness, from the mystery of wickedness, and since – holy or sinful – as long as it lives it is always driven also by the power of the divine life that calls it and is active within it, this creature feels a secret dread (not self-explanatory) of death as the rising to the surface of visible life of that which alone is death properly speaking. If it wanted really existentially to conceal this horror of death by simply interpreting it as a fact of life, whether by taking refuge in superficiality, [252] by taking refuge in despair or in a tragic heroism, then it really would turn this death into that aspect of it which rouses an unadmitted terror: the advent of eternal death.

4. Death as Dying with Jesus and as Event of Grace

(a) It was pointed out earlier that death as dying with Christ, so far as a person dies in grace and from it, does not find any clear expression in the Church's official teaching or in textbook theology. Textbook theology only says, with reference to the Council of Trent (DS 1515), that the death of the justified person is not really a punishment for sin, but only, like concupiscence, a mere consequence of sin, poenalitas and not poena, which God permits for the testing, purifying, and probation for the justified person, something to be wrestled with. We spoke about this at an earlier stage. But the New Testament has more to say about the death of the justified person. There is a 'dying in the Lord' (Rev. 14:13; 1 Thess. 4:16; 1 Cor. 15:18), a dying that is not really death, since anyone who lives and believes in Christ will never die (John 11:26), a dying with Christ that gives life (2 Tim. 2:11; Rom. 6:8). According to the New Testament, the acceptance in principle of the death of the death of Christ takes place of course by faith and baptism, so that dying with Christ and the gaining of new life even now secretly permeates our present life (Rom. 6:6, 11; 7:4-6; 8:2, 6-12, etc.).

Apart however from the fact that these statements of the New Testament assume that real death must be understood as an axiological factor permeating the whole of life and also as an act of freedom, if dying 'during' an earthly Christ-like life shaped by faith and the justification that comes from faith is not to be dissolved into an ethical-idealistic conception and to lose any connection with the reality of death, we must conclude from these very statements of the New Testament that for the justified person actual dying, too, determined of course by life, considered as the end-event, is a dying in Christ. But this means that death itself in the person endowed with grace is to be regarded as a salvific event, while of course this death must also be seen as an act of freedom recapitulating that person's life; it can then remain an open question at what point in time this act as such occurs in life, to what extent it coincides in time with the [253] biological cessation of life or is distinct from the latter. Those who die in faith are 'dead in Christ', not only because they lived their earthly life in Christ, but also because their dying itself was in Christ. If and insofar as death as an act of man is the event that gathers together the whole personal act of man's life into the one consummation, and if in 'death' there occurs 'pragmatically', as Eutyches said, what had occurred 'mystically' at the sacramental high points of Christian life in baptism and the eucharist (that is, assimilation to the Lord), then death must be regarded as the culmination of the work of salvation and its final acceptance.

(b) What has just been said refers only to a fact attested in Scripture, but it has not yet really been made clear how this dying with Christ in our death is to be conceived. This further question as such would best be answered by referring to the theology of Jesus' dying and death, since this death as a once and for all event was not only effective of 'objective' redemption, but, in view of Jesus' consubstantiality with us as man in grace, it is also of the same nature as our death, and since Scripture says more and speaks more clearly about this dying of Jesus than about our own death as such. But at this point we cannot refer again expressly to Jesus' dying and death. All that can be done is to draw attention once more quite briefly to the fact that Jesus did not redeem us 'on the occasion' of his death in a moral achievement of obedience, love, etc., which would have had nothing to do with death as such, but that this redemption came about by the very fact that death as manifestation of sin, as the visibility of the emptiness and hopelessness of this sin, as domain of eternal darkness and God-forsakenness, was accepted in faith, hope, and love, and transformed in the midst of desolation and loneliness into the manifestation of the obedient surrender of the whole person to the incomprehensibility of the holy God. All this must always be kept in mind, if the dying of the justified person with Christ in grace is to be rightly understood.

(c) We are attempting therefore to gain an understanding of death as dying with Christ in the light of the nature of grace, while assuming always that this grace is the grace of Christ, which is given by him and for him and incorporates our life into his life and conforms us to him. We must then briefly recall what is the real nature of grace and then show that dying and death constitute a situation corresponding to its nature and excellent for the free realization of grace. [254] Grace consists fundamentally in God's self-communication to enable man in freedom by faith, hope, and love to accept the immediacy to God that is offered to him. Since and insofar as grace makes God purely and simply the immediate goal, content, and condition of the possibility of an immediate relationship to God, grace and its free acceptance always imply a self-abandonment, a self-transcendence above all finite realities (among which the human subject of freedom itself must primarily be counted) toward the incomprehensibility of God as blessed fulfillment, attainable only 'ecstatically'. In that sense, in every act sustained by grace toward God's immediacy there is an element of self-surrendering, 'renouncing', becoming free, which is also explained in Scripture by the assertion that faith, hope, and love 'remain' (1 Cor. 13:13), that is, they are also elements of the eschatological consummation, among which particularly in hope (but also in the vision of God's incomprehensibility and in love) the peculiar character of a self-abandoning getting away from self is plainly evident.

This character of a 'renunciation' does not of course remove the possibility of a blessed consummation, since man as creature (which he remains even in a supernatural consummation) finds himself only when he radically submits to God's disposal, seized and overpowered by God and not an autonomous subject; when, in other words, he summons up courage (again by God's act of grace), embracing and surrendering his whole existence to believe, hope, and love, that he finds himself only when he loses himself to God. But as long as freedom continues in the present world and this realization of its nature has not yet become blessed and obvious factuality, but still remains an overtaxing task which may not be accomplished, as long as freedom still coming to be is situational, there are undoubtedly situations in which the element of renunciation in every realization of grace becomes clearly present as task, manifestation, and import of this realization of grace. Certainly we may not adopt a more or less tragic attitude, assuming that grace and its realization are present only when and insofar as 'renunciation' (to the point of extinction) is imposed on man. This is contradicted by the fact that the bliss of eternal life is the supreme act of the grace of Christ, that the positivity of the finite and not only its negativity has a positive relationship to God, that a positive relationship to reality distinct as such from God can certainly be an internal element of man's relationship [255] by grace to God. But man's experience and the event of the cross of Christ as redemption in death as such show that at least in practice the situation in which the element of renunciation (present as such in every act directed toward God as grace-given goal) appears in a particularly harsh form and to immediate experience as exclusive, is the situation preferred for the event of grace in the present order of salvation. Insofar as Christian teaching sees the peculiarity of this situation of renunciation as 'infralapsarian', as consequence of sin and thus of the freedom of sinful man and of God as 'permitting' sin, the situation is not made absolute, as if we knew and could say that it could not be otherwise and that, to use gnostic terminology, it arises solely from the mysteriousness of God himself; but on the other hand this situation of renunciation is explained and maintained as the universal and inescapable situation of our self-realization toward the immediacy of God.

This renunciation as present in the very nature of grace and inescapably required of us in our infralapsarian situation reaches in death its unsurpassable culmination. Since in death as an event affecting all humanity man is deprived of everything and thus even of himself, since in death the actual success of the act of freedom in which as a justified person he accepts and approves this self-withdrawal in death remains hidden, in our infralapsarian situation (in which the subject cannot realize itself in integrity and cannot grasp the effect of this realization in final bliss) death is the culmination of the grace of Christ crucified and thus a dying with Christ. At the same time it cannot be overlooked that part of this renunciation in death is to accept in self-denying freedom the fact that this concealed and concealing death in particular need not have been, that 'essentially' things could have been different, so that death now contains within itself the acceptance of its own not derivable and not 'ideologizable' facticity.

(d) None of this of course means that dying and death are the mode of realization only of an 'abstract' renunciation. This self-abandonment radicalized in death is in fact an aspect of the realization of grace as faith, hope, and love. Dying can be an act of faith, since it thwarts any recourse by man to a categorial justification of faith or (if that is perhaps an exaggeration) since this justification of faith in terms of fundamental theology in the light of man's intramundane rationality proves to be something that simply cannot produce [256] faith as such. Dying is love of God insofar as this renunciation in freedom required in death is brought about as the effect of a love in which God himself is loved for his own sake and consequently the person never recovers himself. The acceptance of death can certainly be seen also as an act of love of neighbour, insofar as the historical subject then leaves the mundane sphere of freedom and the stage of history free for others. This of course does not mean that man's dying can be seen only in this respect as an act of love of neighbour. If we are obliged in love to bear witness to our neighbour by our whole life of grace, of God's freedom and the hope of eternal life, this is true also of the witness of love that we must bear by our dying. 'Both during his whole life and also and even more at the time of his death,' says Ignatius of Loyola, 'each one . . . ought to strive earnestly that through him God our Lord may be glorified and served and his fellowmen may be edified, at least by the example of his patience and fortitude along with his living faith, hope, and love of the eternal goods which Christ our Lord merited and acquired for us by those altogether incomparable sufferings of his temporal life and death'.*

(e) Christian tradition, beginning with Scripture, has always seen martyrdom, a death freely endured and accepted to bear witness to the faith as the most perfect way in which a Christian can die with Christ. And rightly so. For in a martyr's death the universal essential constituents of Christian death are most clearly manifested: the indisposability of death, death as free act, death as testimony of faith for others. The secret yearning for martyrdom, which

JUSTIFICATION AND WORLD DEVELOPMENT FROM A CATHOLIC VIEWPOINT

I agreed to the theme of 'justification and world development from a Catholic viewpoint' because it surprised me on the one hand but interested me on the other. In regard to this task, it is true, I feel like a schoolboy unexpectedly presented with a difficult and unusual mathematical problem. But this is the very reason why the theme attracts me, for it is odd in some ways. As far as I know, it is not a familiar theme in Catholic theology. Of course there must be connections between justification and world development. But at the point where justification is explicitly discussed in Catholic theology the theologian considers only the isolated subject in its relationship to God alone and there is no mention of the task of world development. World development may be a theme that certainly receives attention in a variety of theological treatises, particularly in moral theology and Christian sociology. It may have become clearer in 'political theology' and in the 'theology of liberation;' it is now considered much more than formerly and became a conciliar theme in Gaudium et Spes at the Second Vatican Council. But this is still far from clearly explaining the connection between the theme of world development and the Catholic doctrine of justification. That, in fact, is to be our theme. In this state of theological reflection it is obvious that there can be no question here of any more than a modest attempt to discover connections between the two ideas, an attempt that is more or less entirely the responsibility of the author alone and which cannot be covered here by explicit declarations of [260] the Church's magisterium (or, at any rate, it is not possible to attempt so much here and now).

It also seems obvious to me that in this essay we are not dealing with a theme that properly belongs to controversial theology, although the title speaks of a 'Catholic viewpoint'. All that is meant by this qualification is that these reflections make use of a terminology familiar in Catholic theology and that our starting point is the Catholic doctrine of justification without any explicit consideration of the Protestant doctrine of justification. But this does not mean at all or at any rate does not certainly mean that we are engaged in controversial theology. For one thing it is no longer possible today to claim that the Catholic doctrine of justification in the sense in which it is absolutely binding on the Catholic as the Church's official teaching is completely opposed to Protestant teaching on justification; more importantly, a Christian theory of world development, of the Christian's world task in history and society, is itself expressed in different ways among Christians of all denominations, different ways that cut right across the denominations, so that none of them (apart from the most extreme cases) can be unambiguously attributed to a particular denomination. In fact and insofar as a theory of the Christian's world task by and large is perhaps common property, it can be approached in the light of different ideas of justification. For it is doubtful whether subtle distinctions of controversial theology in regard to justification need to affect our understanding of world development or whether (when it is a question of concrete and practical precepts for this world task) they can be overcome by a more global and common understanding of Christian existence. It seems to me that our theme has nothing to do with controversial theology properly speaking, particularly since the Protestant theory of the relationship between law and Gospel, of the two kingdoms, etc., and the Catholic theory of natural law, of the relationship between nature and grace, etc., are so diversely interpreted even by each denomination on its own account that there is no basis there for a controversy which would mean exactly the same to both parties.

After these preliminary observations, we may come to the actual theme. The reflections put forward here will have to find their way and their method for themselves, without the possibility of assuming a formal structure in advance and as unambiguous from the nature of the case.

[261] These reflections therefore begin, with a certain arbitrariness (which is readily admitted), with the traditional Catholic teaching that the event and effect of justification consist in the realization and free acceptance of the three theological virtues of faith, hope, and love. For the Council of Trent, justification as being justified consists in the possession of these three habitual theological virtues as 'infused' and justification as event in a responsible person consists in the actual realization of these three virtues. The Council of Trent leaves the question open as to whether what is known as 'sanctifying grace' is identical with these three theological virtues or merely inseparably united with them. In any case then, if we want to know what is the grace of justification, we may turn without more ado to the consideration of these three theological virtues. In our context, too, the problem is irrelevant as to how precisely the doctrine of the 'infusedness' and the character of a habitus of grace – that is, an ontically objective conceptuality – can be reconciled with the Reformation teaching on grace, with its more descriptive and existential conceptuality; we assume merely that this is not impossible in principle. Here we can also safely leave aside the fact that the Tridentine doctrine of justification, based on the medieval theology of grace, arbitrarily and tacitly assumes that these three theological virtues are realized in a temporal succession and acquired habitually and therefore that it is possible in principle for the habitus of faith and also of hope to be present without the habitus of love.

If we recall with the Council of Trent that the real and sole justification comes about only by the realization and possession of the three theological virtues together (that is, in fides spe et caritate formata) and if we also recall that the council does not forbid us to think existentially and concretely of these three theological virtues as jointly realized and present in this unity, even though, because of their conceptual distinction, they can be seen abstractly as developing in a temporal succession to one another and, in view of the intrinsic temporality of the one realization of the one existence, this is not a priori pointless, then we can safely regard the three theological virtues here as one factor. We may see these three terms, faith, hope, and love, as three aspects of the one realization of Christian existence, as three key terms for this realization of existence as one and whole, which inevitably merge into one another conceptually and objectively, even though in the history of the Church's sense of [262] faith and in the history of theology at any particular time one or the other of these three key terms came to the fore and represented the one totality of the Christian understanding of existence (as perhaps today 'hope' is the key term mainly emphasized). For our question about the relationship between justification and world development we may therefore consider without prejudice all three factors of justification and ask what they contribute taken together and as distinct from each other to the understanding of the Christian's world task.

We are asking then whether in this one triplicity of the three theological virtues in their unity there is involved a particular relationship of the Christian to the world, insofar as this world as finite and created on the one hand is distinct from the God to whom in justification man acquires a positive, salvific, and comprehensive relationship and, on the other hand, as historical, presents a task for man's active freedom. If we can answer this question up to a point comprehensively and appropriately, we shall have found the answer to the question which is the theme of these reflections. At the same time it is obvious that an answer sought in this way can in any case turn out to be only very formal and abstract. For concrete history as act of man's freedom and as free endurance of the history of nature, in which man is rooted from the outset and never adequately available for his freedom, is and remains precisely history: a history that is never concretely derivable for men from the concepts of justification (which always remain somewhat abstract) or from the incomprehensible mystery called God, to which man is related in justification. With this reservation, however, we are attempting to gain from the Christian teaching about the triplicity of the theological virtues a few insights into man's relationship to the world, into a Christian world development. In this connection we are starting out from statements referring either to the triplicity as a whole or to one particular theological virtue.

In the light of a view that is legitimate, although not universally accepted and binding in Catholic theology, it can be said that this triplicity as a possibility effected by God at least in the mode of an offer to man's freedom is always and everywhere present in the individual human being and in mankind, that this triplicity as a possibility of man's historical freedom effected by God is not merely an event occurring at a definite point in space and time, but an existential [263] (although the effect of God's grace) that always co-determines man's existence and history. At least according to the teaching of the Second Vatican Council there is a universal salvific will of God everywhere offering justification; real faith, real hope, and love, imparting God himself and justifying man, are possible spatially and temporally in the whole history of mankind and consequently even outside verbally expressed, sacramental, and sociologically institutionalized Christianity to include also a theoretical verbal atheism. It is not the place here and now to consider how this opportunity of justification in faith, hope, and love, offered by God's salvific will always and everywhere, can be seen to be possible even where man has not been touched by the explicit message of salvation of Christianity. This, too, is something that cannot be discussed here.

We may however assume what may be called this radically optimistic view (contrary to an Augustinian conception of history); we may assume therefore that the possibility of justification as a permanent existential is offered to man always and everywhere and can therefore be accepted by man's freedom even outside explicit Christianity (an acceptance of course, if it actually occurs, which is itself again a grace of God); we may further assume that on the one hand (as will be shown later) this acceptance of justification has also an essential importance for man's relationship to his world and on the other is also actually realized by man's freedom. Assuming all this, we can and must say that man's relationship to the world, his development of the world, is always and everywhere and consequently even outside institutionalized Christianity characterized at least anonymously by what we Christians call justification, that is, by man's liberatedness for the immediacy of God. But from this there results an important insight: much of what we encounter in the history of humanity as interpretation of the world in practice and theory outside and inside explicit Christianity can by no means be taken a priori as an interpretation that is without grace outside Christianity and in this sense is unchristian or achristian or has something to do with justification only within explicit Christianity. Christian interpretation of the world in theory and more especially in practice can be Christian even outside explicit Christianity and indeed, according to Vatican II, in its realization in practical life is actually Christian (that is, sustained by grace) where a person does not seriously and culpably reject the dictate of his conscience, even [264] though this practical development of the world is not interpreted in explicitly Christian terms and perhaps co-exists with theoretical interpretations of the world and man that Christianity rejects as false, even though such a concrete interpretation of the world in practice occasionally occurs in a way that explicit Christianity has not yet expressly and clearly realized in its own historical and sociological situation.

In the Catholic understanding the triplicity of the theological virtues means an immediacy of man to God in a form which would he absolutely impossible without the gift of these theological virtues as God's grace; but, if and insofar as it is accepted in freedom as justifying, this immediacy to God involves a particular relationship to the world that consequently would also be utterly impossible without this justifying grace and conversely is both required and brought about by this justifying grace. This is the second point to be made and elucidated to some extent about the relationship between justification and world development. According to traditional Catholic teaching the triplicity of the three theological virtues does not mean merely the restoration and the factuality of some kind of good and right relationship of man to God as Lord and Creator, merely forgiveness of man's sins, merely a purification of man's moral relationship to God in a form that could be recognized as binding even independently of a divine verbal revelation. Since and insofar as the ultimate salvific relationship to God (as made possible by God and on this assumption required by God) is from the very outset God's free grace, is 'supernatural', it is on the one hand the supreme and most radical realization of man's nature and on the other hand a grace that is in no way due to man, not only as sinner, but to man as such. This is implicit in the Catholic teaching on the distinction between nature and supernatural grace. This supernaturality of grace and the relationship to God that it makes possible and sustains can be explained by the fact that this grace gives man a relationship of radical immediacy to God, not only existentially, but also ontologically; by this grace God is not merely the creative precondition of a creaturely reality that as such in its self-realization would merely remain entangled in its own finiteness and would have God only as its creative ground and only as the always remote mover of its self-realization always remaining within the finite. The truth is that by grace there is present a real and veritable self-communication [265] of God in his own absolute reality to the intellectual creature, so that the latter is moved toward God strictly in himself. For a Catholic doctrine of grace the principle is really inescapable: finitum capax infiniti.

This is implied (which can only be briefly indicated here) in the doctrine of uncreated grace, of the communication of the Holy Spirit who is God himself, of the immediate vision of God in eternal life, which is not mediated by any created reality. This doctrine of grace as the most intimate self-communication of God in himself to the intellectual creature has an effect then on the traditional doctrine of the triplicity of the theological virtues. These must be strictly distinguished from the moral virtues, even if the latter require a particular religious relationship to God as Creator and Lord of the creature. All 'moral' virtues have a finite reality, a finite moral value, a creaturely formal object, even though these realities of course always carry within themselves a reference to God as to their ultimate precondition. But in this triplicity of the three theological virtues and only there we have to do with God in himself in immediacy. This of course assumes that the acts in which man is related to God immediately and not mediated by a created reality representing him are themselves sustained by God's self-communication, that God himself is not merely an asymptotic goal of a purely creaturely movement toward him, but with his own reality is himself an internal constitutive element (albeit by grace) of the spiritual movement of the creature toward God himself. In faith God himself is heard and not merely in a finite word 'about' him; what is received and heard is the divine Word who is God himself; in hope God himself is hoped for and not merely a creaturely reality created by him as salvific, because he himself sustains this movement of hope toward its consummation by himself, moves the creature in the goal toward the goal; love for God is itself sustained by God's love for us, in which he gives himself and not merely a gift representing and mediating him and his love. None of this may be understood as a purely verbal emphatic enhancement of the importance of a banal reality, in which the finite creature still remains stuck in its finiteness and God is attained only in the sense that he, the absolute Other, unattainable in himself, enables us to grasp and admit our own finiteness.

If and insofar as there is in God such an immediacy to God, either in the mode of an offer to man's freedom or in the mode of free [266] acceptance (then called 'justification', which of course implies forgiveness of sin), then there exists that freedom over all powers and authorities of the world of which Scripture speaks and which constitutes the real nature of the relationship of the justified person to the world and thus characterizes the development of the world which is proper to him. This person justified by grace (whether inside or outside institutional Christianity) is not really turned away by justifying grace from the world and his task in the world (something will be said about this very shortly), he remains turned to his world and thus participates in God's self-communication to the world, a self-communication that establishes God in the world as its most proper goal and innermost dynamism; but for that very reason the justified person is not merely a piece of the world, its servant, its element determined solely by the world, neither collective nor individual, he realizes his relationship to the world in the light of God himself, who is not a part of the world, not even its supreme part. Unfortunately it is not possible here to explain more closely how this relationship to the world, transcending the world, on the part of the Christian, is to be considered and experienced more precisely. It would be possible, for example, to refer to the doctrine current in Christian spirituality of resignation, of indifference, which, rightly understood, is an essential and constant modality of the triplicity and in the last resort can be justified only by the latter; we could also safely refer to a mysticism in East and West of a formless experience of God, which can explain by its radicality such a relationship to the world, even though (as will be pointed out later) it is not the sole form of this Christian relationship to the world. But in any case the attitude to the world produced by the triplicity means a radical, more or less demythologizing relativizing of all secular, finite, immediately present values and tasks in the world, a destruction of all idols (that is, of all absolutizing of intramundane values and tasks), and an ultimate reservation in regard to all these things, a reservation which is really possible, since God in his own self-communication (if only this is grasped) has made himself man's final standpoint.

In this way there is actually a realization of man's existence – in which life and death, rise and decline, historical success and failure, experience of meaning and meaninglessness, and so on, are all caught up together – toward the absolute God, who really permits him self to be attained through the possibility given by himself in his [267] self-communication of an immediate relationship to him in the triplicity of the theological virtues. In other words, the traditional teaching on this triplicity can and must be seen as the doctrine of an ultimate absolute freedom of man in regard to the world (to which, of course, he himself belongs with his essentially finite subjectivity and historical relativity) since in fact in this triplicity, in which God in himself is attained, man experiences also his liberatedness in regard to himself. There is no need to explain further that all this is 'fundamental' also to the Christian character of the task of world development.

To this first statement about the relationship to the world established in the triplicity of the theological virtues (that is, in justification) we must immediately add a second statement which has a certain dialectic relationship with the first. In order to elucidate the radicalness of the immediacy to God involved in this triplicity and thus man's preeminence over the world in his world task, successful or unsuccessful, we referred briefly to formless mysticism in East and West. But that was meant only as a clarification and by no means implies that man has immediacy to God as such primarily or solely in this way. On the contrary. Presumably as essentially distinct from Eastern mysticism, Christianity is assured (paradoxical as it may sound) that there is at least normally a necessary and possible mediation to this immediacy to God.

This is evident from the very fact that Christianity, when and because it seeks to be the event of immediacy to God and thus to an ultimate preeminence over the world, nevertheless regards itself as founded on a revelation of God that finds objective expression in human words, as Church of the word and sacrament as a historical and sociological institution. It is evident on the other hand from the fact that Christianity believes that man can reject an elitist esotericism and find complete salvation in the straightforward fulfillment of God's commandments (admittedly by faith, hope, and love) in the midst of ordinary life. As this Christianity cannot of course regard the ordinary routine of fulfilling the commandments of God in fidelity to conscience as a substitute for 'mystical' immediacy to God, as ordinary routine fulfillment of duty which only after death will be rewarded by something quite different (that is, by this immediacy to God), and as Christian teaching insists that this normal fulfillment of everyday duties as the way of salvation must spring and can spring [268] from the triplicity of the three theological virtues as immediacy to God, so Christianity's understanding of existence implies the conviction that categorial involvement with the world, when it occurs in ultimate freedom, is also the realization of the theological virtues toward the immediacy of God; that this is the categorial mediation, take-off point, and historical concreteness precisely of that absolute transcendentality in grace in which man reaches God himself as such. Man does not realize primarily and still less solely his immediate relationship to God in a formless mysticism in which the world fades out and is dismissed as unreal. The categorial factor, the historical and concrete world task of man, when it is effected under the influence of the triplicity of the theological virtues (and this in fact is both possible and necessary), is mediation to the immediacy of God. The world is rightly grasped and faced precisely when this happens in virtue of that freedom and superiority over the world which God offers to man in his threefold grace and in which he is himself immediately God.

If we disregard the question of an absolutely unworldly mysticism (a question that remains open in Catholic theology and, even if it is answered in the affirmative, raises a new question in regard to the condition of the finite subject itself in such mysticism, the subject which Christianity could not regard as perishing even in this form of mysticism), it must in any case be said that according to the Christian conception of man his immediacy to God and consequently his God-given status over the world and over himself is, must be and can be mediated by his world achievement and world task in his history of freedom. Unfortunately it is not possible here to explain precisely how and why such a mediation to immediacy to God does not contain a contradiction, but is rooted in the fundamental structures of the intellectual subject, whose transcendentality toward the absolute has always been the condition of categorial knowledge and freedom and yet is not totally exhausted in this function, but has a possibility of being radicalized by grace toward God's immediacy without thereby losing its function as condition of the possibility of intramundane categorial knowledge and freedom. Assuming all this however, it can be said that the realization of man's world task at least normally can be and (when this world task is objectively and subjectively rightly accomplished) actually is also the realization of his immediacy to God in the three theological virtues.

[269] In regard to this statement of course it ought to be made clearer than is possible here that such a categorial mediation to God's immediacy can exist not merely where this categoriality is of an explicitly religious character, is explicit faith verbalized in Christian terms and sacramental, but also where it is 'merely' fidelity to one's own conscience and consequently objective and subjective fulfillment of the world task (assuming, of course, that such a secularity of the categorial mediation to God's immediacy does not imply a culpable rejection of those categorial mediations which are explicitly religious and Christian and appear making their demands in the collective or individual history of man and offer themselves as such mediations). But at any rate, if what has been said is correct, there is a very differentiated mutual relationship between justifying grace and the Christian's world task. Justification offers man as equipped for absolute freedom for his world task a standpoint over the world from which in ultimate freedom he both accomplishes and endures this task, and this world task itself even to the very limit of its apparent secularity is the mediation for the free acceptance of this immediacy to God which is given to him as the grace offered always and everywhere as supreme possibility and absolute salvific task. Grace, we might also say, has always and everywhere an incarnatory structure; it descends into the world, does not make this world unreal, but gives this world as it is realized in persistence and breakdown the immediacy to God in which the world accepts God himself as such as its consummation.

If there were more space available, what has just been said might be explained very simply and perhaps more understandably by appealing to the traditional Catholic teaching on the unity of love of God and love of neighbour. For traditional textbook theology basing itself on the New Testament, love of neighbour is not merely the fulfillment of another commandment derived from the love of God. If only it attains to its own radical nature, this love of neighbour is understood as love of God itself. As textbook theology expresses it, the formal object of love of God and love of neighbour is one and the same (in fact, God himself) without the concrete individual neighbour being reduced in his importance and claim on us to a merely external occasion for loving God himself alone. According to this teaching therefore, love of neighbour at its root is itself the realization of God's love, even if it is not expressly thematicized in [270] this realization; it is the event of the transcendence of the person toward God's immediacy, the assent to God's offer in which God imparts himself to man in the miracle of his own love. When it reaches its own fullness of being unreservedly, when the loving subject really breaks out of the prison of its egoism and really surrenders itself unconditionally, love of neighbour is the event and factuality of justification.

At the same time of course (though it is not possible here) it ought to be shown that, if it reaches its own absoluteness and radicalness, such a love of neighbour includes within itself what are known in theological terms as faith and hope. In regard to this traditional teaching on the unity of love of God and love of neighbour in their mutual perichoresis, it ought also to be remembered that love of neighbour is not restricted here to a sphere merely of feeling or individual intimacy, that it may not be interpreted as a merely private affair; it is realized in deed and action, has a sociological dimension, must be realized in justice and the maintenance of a sphere of freedom for the others, must be seen in the light of a political theology. But then the connection between the one love of God and neighbour, between justification on the one hand and the Christian's world task on the other, is immediately visible, even though the concrete precepts for this world task in a particular historical and sociological situation cannot be deduced solely from that source, but must be found in some other way.

As such, the theological virtue of hope, too, which is a constituent element for justification, ought to be considered expressly with reference to its importance for the Christian's world task. For the theme of hope is now very topical among both Catholics and Protestants, even though less attention is usually paid to hope as a constituent factor of justification in the classical sense of this term. As a theological virtue, which is not to be understood simply in the light of the existential-ontological reflections of an Ernst Bloch or other present-day philosophers alone, it is first and last a hope of the absolute future, which is God in himself, a future given to man purely and simply as free grace and not simply and originally produced by man's own historical efforts and action: a hope for the absolute future which alone can liberate man wholly and finally from his self-alienation. But if in regard to this hope of the absolute future [271] in immediacy to God himself we remember what was said earlier with reference to the whole triplicity of the theological virtues about the categorial (that is, intramundane) mediation to the immediacy of God, then of course this hope positively and negatively has a meaning for the hope in which man in his world task anticipates his continually new, historical, individual, and collective future which he creates himself. Such a hope and its objective are necessary mediations for the hope of the absolute future, which is God. Only in the realization of intramundane hope can man realize his hope in the absolute future in genuine freedom. And only if he aspires in this theological hope to his intramundane goals of his history, continually to be seized on creatively in hope, does he gain the right attitude to his desired intramundane goals and tasks. Since he has an absolute hope in which he reaches out to an absolute future, which is granted to him by God throughout victories and downfalls, he has the right relationship to his intramundane goals: he will deify neither his present nor his intramundane future, he can accept and endure utterly without fear his continual historical turbulence, he can live genuinely historically without simply being surrendered and subjected to his historicity. He can really live tranquilly; he will not flee from his historical task as something that is ultimately unreal, since it is the categorial and necessary mediation to immediacy toward the absolute future, and he does not cling either to a past or to a present or to a future intramundane future so absolutely as if he could not exist without it.

For the Christian the theological virtue of hope is the ground and liberation of his secular hope, even if he knows that this theological hope can be an event even outside institutional and verbalized Christianity. For him his world task and his salvific task do not simply coincide, but are mutually dependent. In its concrete realization justification may certainly demand the relinquishing of an intramundane value, if and when the realization of faith and hope in an absolute future means giving up some worldly idol; it can therefore imply asceticism, insofar as this is an anticipation in faith and hope of a death in the course of which the absolute future is grasped in all its purity; but it can never mean purely and simply a flight from the world, since escapism of this kind, seen in isolation as a means adopted by man to reach his absolute goal, would be a denial of the [272] fact that the absolute future, which is God, must in the last resort be granted entirely for its own sake as free grace.

There is still a great deal that could be said in regard to our theme as a whole, but which can only be outlined here. For example, the Christian logic of existential decision might be discussed: the question, that is, of how a Christian really knows here and now in a concrete situation, precisely in his world task, that just one and not another intramundane goal as object of his choice is the mediation to God's immediacy required as binding here and now, the material, the bodily presence of his immediacy to God, that justifies him and brings him to salvation. For this knowledge cannot be acquired deductively solely from the universal norms of Christian morality; discovering the concrete will of God in a concrete situation is not merely the application of universal norms to a particular case; practice and freedom do not emerge merely as consequences of theory and universal reason. But how such a logic of existential decision in the light of grace, the 'discernment of spirits', the discovery of an individual decision as willed by God, is arrived at: this is a question that has not been at all adequately considered in the traditional textbook theology of justification and grace, but it cannot be pursued further here. A theology of sin and the cross might be brought to bear much more explicitly on our theme, since it is impossible without these two aspects to understand objectively and realistically either justification or the Christian's world task. If even in a Catholic doctrine of justification man can and must certainly be seen as simul justus et peccator, this implies that his 'state' as justified and his world task are always faced by the threat and the actual reality of what in Christian terms is known as 'sin'. In the last resort it remains a secret and must be left unconditionally to God's judgment whether the individual has grasped his justification, whether his world task has been objectively and personally fulfilled as the concreteness of his justification. At the same time (also with recourse to a rightly understood doctrine of original sin) it should be remembered that sin is not merely a private matter, an internal disposition, but is also objectified in historical and sociological institutions where there is also the mingling of righteousness and sin which is not completely separable from man. Our theme ought likewise to be confronted with a theology of the cross as the concreteness of both sin and [273] salvation. From this standpoint the peculiar character of the Christian world interpretation and world task would have to be more precisely defined, since the Christian world task obviously shares the peculiar character of the existence of the justified person, who exists in this life before death in the transition between the death of Jesus and his resurrection.

LAW AND RIGHTEOUSNESS IN THE CATHOLIC UNDERSTANDING

Given this theme and knowing that he has only a few pages in which to deal with it, the Catholic theologian cannot fail to have serious misgivings. Where is he to begin? Should he start with the New Testament? Begin with Paul and ask how his very wide-ranging teaching on the law and the righteousness granted us by grace and not by fulfilling the law, how this according to his own perhaps very problematical conception is related to the teaching of the Old Testament and to the Jewish theology of his time, and whether and how Paul's teaching can be incorporated into the teaching of the New Testament as a whole? Is this theologian to follow the history of this doctrine in its vicissitudes through all the periods of Christian theology? Are the contrasts and the compatibility between the teaching of the Reformers and the Catholic teaching on law and righteousness from the time of Luther and the Council of Trent to be discussed? Is this Catholic teaching, which is perhaps by no means as consistent as the theme implies, to be set in the context of a modern mentality in order to bring out clearly its peculiar character? These particular themes present the theologian who has to deal with the relationship between law and righteousness with an immense amount of material, requiring careful, objective, and historical differentiation. Is it surprising if he is discouraged, if he cannot see the forest for the trees and has no idea where to begin?

In this desperate situation I think I have the right to leave aside all learned exegesis, all expertise in the fields of history of dogma and history of ideas, and try to say simply what occurs to me as the quite normal Christian that I want to be, in the light of Christian life and [275] not of theological scholarship, when I hear the terms 'law' and 'righteousness'. If at the same time a joint Christian (and not by any means specifically denominational) statement should emerge, I shall neither be surprised nor shocked. For I think (incidentally) that from Reformation times onward the theories on righteousness and law in Catholic and Protestant theology have been so clarified and more particularly further differentiated in each church that this theme no longer presents any reason for a schism between the churches. Of course, both Protestant and also Catholic theologians will discover in what I say defects and omissions, subjective emphases, etc., with which they certainly cannot simply agree. If the theme here requires the exposition of a Catholic understanding of the relationship between law and righteousness, this can mean from the very outset only that the author is persuaded with good reason that his understanding of this relationship is set within the framework of Catholic theology and the Church's proclamation, without claiming to be simply identified with these factors. I shall not venture at all to explain how what I have to say is related to a modern Jewish understanding of life. But, after these preliminary remarks, let us begin with the theme itself.

I hear the word 'law'. It rouses in me thousands of different and mutually contradictory ideas and emotions. I can think of hundreds of kinds of laws, norms, regulations, rules, customs, patterns of behavior, which demand my attention, require the homage of my freedom and my obedience. The origins of these innumerable laws with the most varied names are also very diverse. There are laws of what we call 'nature' and these punish disobedience with sickness, death, disruption of our lives, even when we infringe them in ignorance and inculpably. I try to obey them, even though they create the impression of visibly restricting me as subject of freedom, because I fear the sentence of death they pass upon me and, prior to all deeper considerations, in the last resort do not see much point in opposing, attractive as it may sometimes be, the sentence of death threatened by these laws.

There are laws, norms, and customs of the society in which I was born and in which I must live. Up to a point they appear to me as a kind of continuation and interpretation of the laws of nature already mentioned, as relatively meaningful, as useful and unavoidable, and I obey them more or less as I obey the laws of nature, as norms [276] which there is not very much point in infringing. But up to a point also these norms and laws of society seem to me questionable, pointless restrictions on my freedom against which it is possible to protest, thrust on me purely from outside, without the opportunity of really internalizing them, making them my own, regarding them as laws given by my own freedom itself. Where these laws of society can be seriously regarded as merely such (and there are laws of this kind), the only question that arises is how far we must be prepared to adapt ourselves to them, since it is not worthwhile to infringe them in view of social sanctions, or whether we are shrewd enough to get out of them, since even from a Christian standpoint there is a legitimate demythologizing and 'de-tabooizing' of the binding authority with which a society is accustomed to clothe its norms of this kind in order to secure obedience to them. (The emancipation of early Christianity from the social and religious norms of its Jewish origin can certainly be interpreted primarily as a process of this kind. In the concrete case it is very often not easy to say whether such laws of society are of the first or the second kind; and most of the norms of society as they affect us are an amalgam of the two kinds that we distinguished and consequently are not as such completely homogeneous in their durability or their moral claim.

In addition to all these however, I am aware of laws of a different kind which cannot simply be derived from society or from nature in a physiological sense. In particular, the person who knows he is free (that is, who is not prepared to shift off responsibility for his actions to an anonymous 'it' behind his subjectivity) is faced with requirements which do not have their force from nature and are not objectifications of society alone, but impose themselves on freedom as such, acquit or condemn, rise out of a mysterious depth of the free subject itself, so that, if they are not observed, they bring the subject into a fatal conflict with itself. Truthfulness, love, loyalty, readiness to accept responsibility, the requirement of maintaining the dignity of our own existence and likewise that of other human beings: these and other 'laws', as far as the concrete substance of their claim is concerned here and now, may always have in themselves an element of historical and sociological relativity, but their real meaning and their real dignity are independent in the last resort of this relativity, are the expression of what man as free subject ought to be, have a dignity of absoluteness and unconditionality. Opinions diverge as to [277] how they are to be further and more deeply interpreted in this absoluteness. But it is very doubtful that there are more or less normally developed human beings who have not come across such laws. For even someone who denies the fact of such absolute requirements will make this denial with an awareness, even though perhaps merely implicit, that he must cling to his conviction and not deny it at any price: he thus affirms the absolute binding force of his profession of truth. Nor, as we said, is the existence of such laws brought into question by the fact that their material content with which they make their appearance in particular periods, nations, cultures, societies, is very different, even materially contradictory. The Christian interprets the absolute authority of these laws, at least in their formal claim, as the will of God, as God's law. We shall not argue here for the accuracy of this interpretation, it can simply be assumed as a fact.

This is not a mistake or a feeble excuse, since we can certainly assume that knowledge of God and of his deliberate claim on us is not simply another piece of knowledge added from outside to our experience of absolute laws, with these two items of knowledge being subsequently linked; knowledge of God is nothing but the radical interpretation of the experience of absolute laws, of freedom and its responsibility. When we encounter the dignity of these laws in free obedience we have already learned what is meant by the word

'God', even if we do not know or understand how to use this explicitly theological vocabulary. But some observations must be made on law as God's will in order to gain an understanding of explicitly Christian theology on this theme.

At any rate in their widest extent (we shall have to speak later of other material) these laws, understood as God's holy will and insofar as they raise claims to concrete fulfillment, are related to finite, intramundane realities and values of man and his society, distinct from God: respect for a meaningful order of society, for the life and scope for freedom of one's neighbour, etc. But this involves a fundamental problem which, it seems to me, has not been considered clearly enough on the whole either by Jewish or by Christian or by 'Mohammedan' theology. How can an absolute claim be based on a finite value, however highly esteemed? Without appealing to God, this question seems to be a priori unanswerable. But if it is said that these values raise an absolute claim on our freedom (as Christian [278] theology says) as the will of God, the question still remains open as to how God can meaningfully will such finite values as absolute, how he can regard them as more important than they really are (and as they appear in his own attitude to them), how we can perceive this absolute claim of these realities as derived from God. In face of this question, must a Christian have recourse to an ethic of secular realism, calling for rational objectivity, the infringement of which in the last resort leads man to evils that he cannot bring himself to admit are avoidable only hypothetically and conditionally? Are these laws God's will only insofar as we cannot think meaningfully of the God known from other sources except as the one who now wills the finite sum total of realities and values, because he willed them as Creator? But is the will of God as legislator then not simply identical with the will of God as Creator, who willed a very finite and relative world in which there can be nothing at all that is absolutely and unconditionally important?

At this point of course it is possible to refer to the fact that the real and express relationship of man to God, because God is its reference point, has such a dignity and absoluteness that our problem no longer arises in regard to this relationship, that the law of seeking God and being open toward his incomprehensibility, of worshiping him and (which is certainly possible) loving him, has in any case this absolute dignity which permits no doubts in regard to divine laws with an intramundane content. We can insist then that commandments with a finite material content might nevertheless have such an absolute character as law of this God to whom we have an absolutely binding relationship, even though their material content as such cannot confer it. But we are then involved in a new question: how is this relationship to God, which is supposed to sustain the absolute dignity of the moral law properly so-called, to be understood more precisely, so that this relationship can sustain that absoluteness of the law or (and this is still far from clear) even of itself curtail it and up to a point relativize it?

With this question we have reached a point at which we must make an entirely fresh start and at which we catch sight of the other, term of our theme as a whole: righteousness. How this comes about will soon be made clear. Righteousness, or 'justice', in the sense understood by Christian theology is not a particular virtue within the sociological sphere, but means purely and simply the right relationship, [279] the relationship that ought to exist, of man to God, bringing man to salvation; it means holiness, peace purely and simply, reconciliation with God, to mention at least a few other words of Scripture and tradition which in the last resort mean the same thing as righteousness, but get rid of the impression given by that term of a legal relationship between God and man, which is regulated by an authority superior to both parties and establishes the right relationship when both parties keep to this higher norm. It is clear that this is a form of righteousness that does not exist for the Christian.

This righteousness of the finite and sinful creature must be seen quite differently from the Christian standpoint. It is the unmerited gift decreed by God's supreme love; although it must be accepted in freedom, it is God's Holy Spirit himself (in a word, God himself) who gives himself with his most intimate divine life to the intellectual creature, so that God is not only the creative donor of a finite gift distinct from himself and perfecting man, but is as such the gift itself. It is impossible to explain more clearly here how this is to be understood and how man himself must be seen if he is to be able to be the recipient of such a gift, to be capax infiniti. But if the teaching of Christianity on the nature and definition of man, of his perfection and righteousness, is understood radically and we are not content with naive metaphors, there can be no doubt that the right relationship of man to God can be established only by God in his own free initiative, that it cannot really mean a 'between' between us and God, as something also different from God, but is God communicating himself, the Holy Spirit who is himself God. He himself gives himself as the innermost centre of our existence; for in this respect he does not really come upon us from outside as an additional reality, but is from the very outset what is most deeply rooted within us, because what we call the creation of the finite distinct from God occurs in the concrete order as a result of the fact that God as love wants to lavish and does lavish himself and thus at the same time creates the finite on which the miracle of this self-surrendering love of God can occur. Once more, it is not possible here to elucidate more closely what has been said or to make clear that it did not amount to a utopian speculation, of which there is no evidence in the real experience of everyday life.

What has just been said places us in an odd situation in regard to our question about the relationship of law and righteousness. The [280] term 'law' led us to an experience of a sacred unconditional requirement from the subject of freedom, to a law that had to be seen as God's holy will and could only be understood in this way in its true nature. But the term 'righteousness' did not lead us, as might have been expected, to the idea of the status of the subject fulfilling the law in freedom, but to a reality which at least in its initial stages has nothing to do with law or the fulfillment of law, with morality, but is infinitely above this moral sphere and consists in the miracle of love in which God gives himself as innermost life to man. In this properly biblical sense law and righteousness are primarily as remote from each other as objective norms arising from the nature of finite realities are from the infinite God, as the fulfillment of norms reaching man externally and which are up to a point 'external' (if they are demands of the noumenal subject on concrete freedom) is from the love in which God's love and that of the subject of freedom become one: because in the radical freedom of such love the human subject of freedom really becomes completely aware of itself and not merely of a norm from outside; because in this love God gives himself and does not merely authenticate a norm distinct in its content from himself; and because in this self-communication of his he makes possible our love for him, sustains it and so liberates it that it really attains God himself and does not collapse into its own finiteness at an infinite distance from him. For a Christian understanding law and righteousness are in the first place quite disparate factors.

It can of course rightly be said that this God of infinite love imparting himself in this righteousness is in fact the one whose will requires the observance of individual material moral norms, of 'law', so that it is only conditionally on the fulfillment of the law that the miracle occurs of the unity of God and man in righteousness, which is the love between God and man from within. This, of course, is true. The thesis according to which fulfillment of the law is made the precondition or the consequence (these two amount to the same thing) of righteousness as unity of love in no way alters the radical distinction between law and righteousness, which simply is not the fulfillment of the law. It is possible, of course, though only by obscuring the facts, to say that man has a 'commandment' to love God and thus love of God can be subsumed under fulfillment of the law and made a part or (if we want) the whole of the righteousness which is the fulfilling of the law. This kind of language is not simply forbidden to [281] us by the New Testament, since it is in fact occasionally used there.

But it we not only speak of the commandment of love of God, but go further and subsume this commandment under law in general, it is no longer clear that this love of God is not the fulfillment of a law which by its dignity, albeit finite, demands respect and worship for God's greatness, that it is not, in scholastic terms, religio rather than love of God; it is not clear that we are speaking of the most immediate closeness of God and man, where there can really be no talk of law, since the legislator outdoes himself by his self-communication and in man's personal love for God every external norm disappears or is surpassed. This love between God and man knows no commandment, is not law in the real sense, since it does not consist in respect for a moral requirement over and above what is materially commanded, since it is this love alone which itself gives content, meaning, and demand.

This dissociation between law and fulfillment of law on the one hand and righteousness as love on the other of course does not dispose of the problems of the relationship between these two ideas. But neither are they disposed of, as we saw, when fulfillment of the law is proclaimed to be the precondition or indispensable consequence of righteousness as unity of love between God and man, using 'precondition' in the sense of a logical and not chronological priority, although only in a certain respect. We then came up against the problem of how exactly the material content of a moral law can be seen to acquire an absolute character from the will of God. We can now state this question more precisely, although this may mean that the answer is thus made all the more difficult. We may ask: Does the absoluteness of particular moral laws consist in the fact that, over and above their objective (but up to a point hypothetical) significance, their fulfillment is a precondition and consequence of the love between God and man? If we commit ourselves to this assumption, if in other words we assume that individual commandments and laws acquire their absolute binding force by the very fact, and only in this sense, that they are the preconditions and consequences of the love between God and man and that without this connection they might express what is reasonable, appropriate, and preferable, but would not be purely and simply absolute, if we assume all this we would certainly make things easier for ourselves by interpreting the absoluteness of law as theonomy. But this would not [282] dispose of the problem indicated earlier: the question, that is, of whether, why, and how God's holy will can endow finite values, which make up the material content of the law, with such a character of absoluteness if these values nevertheless are and remain finite. At least to modern man it is perhaps not so obvious that it is possible to love God only by respecting intramundane norms, when the values they protect seem very finite and consequently relative and to be continually in conflict with one another; when it also seems as if God did not attach too much importance to their realization through blind nature and its antagonisms. Do these finite values, which form the material content of the laws, acquire an absolute character from the will of God because this will as it refers to them is conveyed to us by a positive revelation of God and it is through, and only through, this revelation that these norms acquire their character of absoluteness which otherwise they would not have at all?

It might be possible perhaps to think in this way, even though such an idea of the unity between objective norms and the will of God can scarcely be reconciled with the traditional doctrine of natural law, since this doctrine ascribes to natural law an absolute binding force, independently of a properly supernatural revelation. But even if we thought we had overcome this difficulty, a great deal would still be far from clear. In the first place it is certainly not yet clear how an absolute will of God, even though now understood as expressly revealed, can be linked with finite values and material norms in such a way that the norms asserting these values become absolute commandments of God and an infringement of them becomes really an offence against God as such. The question would also arise as to how a revelation properly speaking can really be directly related to such material norms, which belong to the world as such, if we have a correct idea of supernatural revelation, which does not permit each and every thing that is objectively right to be made a possible object of an actual revelation (unless God wanted to reveal something of this kind). It is clear that a divine revelation can be and is related to God's self-communication in grace and the incarnation of the Logos to man's transcendentality and history, since this is what can be communicated only by God himself and not by setting up a finite creaturely reality, which is distinct from God. But, if their real nature is understood in the way indicated, it is not clear that intramundane norms can also be the object of such divine revelation.

[283] It is easy to see that in the light of this understanding of revelation in the properly Christian sense the Old Testament history of revelation and the Old Testament itself as a book create a serious problem, since the essentially New Testament self-communication of God in Jesus, the Word made man and in the Holy Spirit as God himself, had not then occurred. An attempt might be made to overcome these dilemmas by assuming that actual divine revelation occurs always and everywhere by God's inward grace, offered to every human being always and everywhere, so that revelation properly speaking as God's self-communication is present unthematically, and in a sense anonymously of course, also in the sphere of the Old Testament, where it can convey the character of absoluteness to the old law and from that standpoint (that is, in the light of God's self-communication as grace and revelation offered to all always and everywhere, even apart from an explicit, thematic, and verbal revelation) the character of absoluteness of the law can be experienced. This would bring us once more to the basic problem of why and how God's holy will, now seen as God's gracious and revealing self-communication, is connected with finite values and thus gives them the character of an absolute obligation. I must admit that the answer to this question, which in fact is identical with the question of the connection between law and justification, is not clear.

Is this connection to be established directly in a general way by saying that the holy God, who imparts himself in his most intimate reality in justifying us, is identical with God the Creator who must demand respect for the structures of reality, since he himself willed them and therefore cannot enter into any loving union with the human subject of freedom if the latter does not respect this will of his? But against this explanation the objection might perhaps be raised: Is this will of God, as related to something finite and relative and often to what is antagonistic to other realities, so absolute that the absolute purely and simply (which is God in himself and in his self-communication) depends on respect for it? We might also be tempted to shift off the solution of the dilemma into a more subjective dimension by saying that in every human life there are constantly concrete situations in which a person knows that he cannot in practice and concretely synthesize the rejection of a particular intramundane finite value of a normative character with an absolute and unconditional openness to God himself, who wants to bestow on him his own reality. But it is still by no means clear in the concrete [284] individual case why this discrepancy and incompatibility can exist and does exist between the rejection of a finite value and the acceptance of God's self-communication. But I think there is nothing to prevent the assumption of an individual revelation, not only making known this discrepancy but also setting it up, a revelation which need not be regarded as striking or miraculous, but would simply be part of the concreteness of God, who according to Christian belief imparts himself in any case at the heart of our existence. If this teaching is concerned, not with God abstractly, as being, but with a God of personal freedom approaching the individual as such on each occasion, the doctrine of an individual revelation making what is right in intramundane terms something absolutely willed by God here and now (that is, actually connected indissolubly with his self-communication) would not be more surprising or incredible than the doctrine of a general revelation.

We cannot pursue further here this problem of the relationship between law and justification as reconciliation with God himself. The distinction between the two factors (stressed by Protestant theology) and the connection between these two distinct factors (to which Catholic theology attaches more importance) are both facts which must be clearly seen and realized in Christian life. Human morality has something to do with our relationship to God, and this relationship of unifying love between God and man is something quite different from a man's moral worth which is recognized and rewarded by a Lord of the world.

It is time to point out, at least in a sentence, that we have not hitherto spoken about one aspect of our theme as a whole: namely, that justification in biblical and ecclesiastical usage implies also forgiveness of sin, granted to the sinner by God's free grace, while the initiative in this forgiveness lies exclusively with God and the renewed turning of the sinner to God itself the effect of this divine initiative. But although this aspect of forgiveness of sin would also help to elucidate the radical distinction between righteousness on the one hand and law and fulfillment of law as such on the other, it cannot be further considered here.

A more important consideration must be put forward in conclusion. Hitherto we treated this relationship of law and justification as if it were static, remaining invariably the same. But this is not so. This relationship itself has a history; the two factors involved do not [285] always occupy the same existential place in a person's life and consequently their mutual relationship has a history. Before attempting to say something about this history, we might look at the general history of salvation and revelation. Paul at any rate (to put it cautiously) was acutely sensitive to the historicity of this relationship, to the dividing line drawn by the cross of Christ across this history. It marks a dividing line at least because on the cross the victory of the free grace of God bestowing righteousness over a mere fulfillment of the law took place and was declared irreversible. Nevertheless, this general history of the relationship between law and righteousness is also something that cannot be further considered here. But we may attempt to glance at the particular history of this relationship in the life of the individual.

In the life of the individual, too, there can and should occur this victory of God-given righteousness, of grace, over the sacred dignity of the law which summons and overtaxes man. In the history of his existence a person will normally begin with the experience of the sacred dignity and the claim of the law on him. Even this experience is of essential importance and turns man from an ingeniously selfish living being with knowledge and social training into a person who exercises his freedom responsibly; it is this in the first place that gives man his dignity and his inalienable responsibility. The experience of the moral subject with his moral autonomy, as it was made clear particularly in the ethos of the Enlightenment, is an experience which man cannot renounce and which even today he cannot shrug off by pointing to all the internal and external, psychological, depth-psychological, and sociological determinants to which he is exposed. But the experience of the moral subject (which of course varies greatly with individuals, with their very different opportunities and at different phases of life) is no more than the beginning of religious experience. The law that created and confirmed man's lofty dignity slowly becomes an oppressive burden, a law that makes excessive demands. Slowly we get the impression that we do not know exactly what is really required of us, the impression that the law's demands force us into insoluble dilemmas, the impression that it overtaxes us and thrusts us into sin, leaving man to sink again into the still undrained morass of his shortsightedness and his selfishness. We also feel increasingly that all the splendour of the morally good as man's achievement is very finite, very ambiguous, very [286] selective (where there should be no selection, but complete righteousness), that it becomes pale, until eventually we do not really know if all this splendour of morality does not fade out in the unconsciousness of the history of nature.

In brief, man experiences the finiteness also of what is humanly moral, and this experience is not disposed of by saying that the decisive factor is not the formal dignity of the law as external norm, but that to which this formal normativity protectively points: beauty, love, fidelity to truth, etc. For even a law understood in this way and even under God's sanction remains a law of finite man, a law of finite goodness. But in man there is an experience of an infinite claim, even though he cannot authenticate this for himself, a claim that is not satisfied by the finite reality of his fulfillment of the moral law. But man thus comes slowly to experience the secret hope, almost in fear of itself, that, despite the finiteness of human morality and despite what for us is irremoveable guilt, there is a fulfillment of our own existence, an infinite fulfillment that we call God, a righteousness that does not come from us and does not suffer from our finiteness. If this experience continually grows, is increasingly radically accepted by freedom, is increasingly obviously spread over existence as a whole, then our relationship to the moral law is changed. The law is surpassed by this experience, the over-taxing and always overexacting obligation from outside is slowly dissolved into a want and capacity from within, into the inward law of love that the Holy Spirit writes in our hearts (as Ignatius of Loyola says), its fulfillment is turned from an achievement of respecting a holy law from outside into the utterance of a love which, since it possesses God himself, is not a law and lives in the freedom of God himself.

This transformation of course does not take place suddenly and all at once; it is completed only when man has left everything in the renunciation of death and in this emptiness receives without mediation the infinite mystery that is God. But, even though it is found at different stages with different individuals, this process of transformation of the holy law (that is not God himself) is following its course from the outset in every human being. The theoretical dialectic between law and righteousness and the history of the relationship between law and righteousness, as it happens and is documented in the wider religious history of humanity, in the history of revelation, [287] in the books of the Old and the New Testament, is no more than a reflection of the history of this relationship as it occurs in the heart of every human being when he slowly turns from being a sinner and a doer of the law into a person justified by God himself, someone who beyond all legal justice receives the life, the holiness, the freedom of God, who is infinitely above all laws. When God, as promised in Jeremiah (31:33), plants his law deep within man, writes it in his heart; when, as Ezekiel promises (36:26), a new heart and a new spirit is given us instead of a heart of stone, when the law, as Paul says (2 Cor. 3:3) is not written on stone tablets, but by the Spirit of the living God on the tablets of our hearts themselves, then there is no problem between law and righteousness, then the law is fulfilled by a fulfillment that is no longer God's law, but God himself.

ON THE IMPORTANCE OF THE NON-CHRISTIAN RELIGIONS FOR SALVATION

The theme presented to me runs: The importance of the non-Christian religions for salvation.

Here, in this question (as distinct from Nostra aetate of the Second Vatican Council), the term 'non-Christian religions' must be understood as excluding the Jewish religion and Islam, since the Old Testament contains part of that divine revelation which Christianity regards as its own and Islam is related expressly at least to Christian revelation as a whole. In these reflections a systematic theologian can obviously speak only of what lies within his own field. Consequently he cannot incorporate into his reflections what the empirical sciences of religion, especially history of religion and phenomenology of religion, can contribute to this theme. What is to be said here must therefore inevitably remain very abstract and formal. In the last resort it amounts only to an inquiry in regard to these sciences as to whether they can really discover historically and concretely in the individual religions what the systematic theologian thinks he can find there at least partially and imperfectly. If the systematic theologian, the dogmatic theologian, puts this request to the historical sciences of religion, working with their a posteriori method, in order not to exceed the limits of his own competence, what he is doing is only analogous to what the dogmatic theologian expects from the fundamental theologian in the light of the Catholic understanding of the relationship between faith and human experience; his request therefore cannot be a priori rejected as impossible or unreasonable; [289] on the contrary, it gives the dogmatic theologian a better right and a better conscience to keep within the limits of his own competence.

For the dogmatic theologian Nostra aetate is on the one hand a precious guide and on the other hand leaves to him what is theologically the ultimate and essential question as a quaestio disputata. For a variety of reasons this declaration of the Second Vatican Council is an important aid for the dogmatic theologian. The declaration begins with an aspect that the Church had not presented with this clarity before Vatican II. There is a relationship of the Church to the non-Christian religions as such (that is, as concrete sociological realities with their doctrinal structures and their life as such) and not only a relationship to non-Christian individuals. Moreover, the declaration by no means presents its theme from the standpoint of how the Church in its own self-understanding is distinct as a unique force from all other religious communions. This customary apologetic-missionary aspect is deliberately omitted here. The motif of the declaration is taken, not from the missionary command, but from the Church's task 'of fostering unity and love among men, and even among nations'. The council does not for that reason raise doubts either about the Church's self-understanding as the presence of the fullness of revelation or about its pressing obligation to engage in missionary activity. But the council opens up a perspective of a greater tranquillity in its mission and in a missionary method which permits a patient and positive co-existence of the Church with the other religious communions and a dialogue with the latter as such. The council sees the basis for this relationship in the universal salvific will of the sovereign and benevolent God, the author of the universal history of salvation, lasting from the beginning to the final consummation and not abolished even by sin. The declaration recognizes what is 'true' and 'holy' in the different religions and that the concrete forms and doctrines of these religions are to be regarded with straightforward seriousness. The declaration sees the ultimate root of these religions in the quest for an answer to the unsolved riddle of human existence and in a certain perception and acknowledgment of that hidden power which is present in the course of the world and in the events of human life. In a word, the council invites us to take seriously the non-Christian religions as such.

In view of the limited scope of our theme here, the question can be left aside as to whether the far too brief descriptions of Hinduism [290] and Buddhism are beyond all doubt and whether too little attention has been given to other religions among non-Christians, especially among the culturally less developed peoples. On the other hand it must be said (although this is not meant as a criticism of the declaration) that the essential problem for the theologian has been left open. In the Constitution on the Church (no. 16), in the Decree on Missionary Activity (no. 7), in the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (no. 22), it is said that even a person whom the historical message of Christianity has not reached, even an atheist, can be without fault and thus touched ('in ways known to God') by God's redeeming grace, can have a salvific faith in the proper sense of the term and so can gain salvation. Consequently it is really obvious that effects of this inward possession, even in the 'heathen', of the authentic content of salvation, acknowledged in a spirit of vast optimism, must be found in the religions themselves in which such a person concretely lives out his relationship to God. But this conclusion from the premises of the council is not drawn by the council in Nostra aetate. In this declaration the properly theological quality of the non-Christian religions remains undefined. Are they religious constructs which human beings themselves in virtue of their 'naturally' religious inclinations, albeit under a certain salvific providence of God, have created with all the limitations and debasements which are attached to such human achievements?

Are they (as institutions and doctrines) merely 'religion' as opposed to 'faith'? If in these and other passages the council admits that properly salvific faith is possible in principle even in pagans and atheists, does this mean that it is achieved only outside the life of these religions as such – for instance, fidelity in the dictates of conscience, in love of neighbour, etc. – so that acts within the sphere of these non-Christian religions as such are not effective of salvation? Or can such acts, achieved within the non-Christian religions as such, perhaps be evaluated as salvific acts? Despite the depravities occurring there, is it possible to regard the history of these non-Christian religions as a part of the history of revelation properly so-called? Is the contrast between revelation and faith from above on the one hand and religion from below on the other hand terminologically correct, but only in the sense that the real religions from below are always (although in very different ways and to a different extent) also determined by revelation and faith from above? Understandably, [291] Nostra aetate gives us no information about these questions. But they are of the greatest importance for a theological appreciation and interpretation of the history of religion, of the right approach to missionary work. In more than a millennium of struggle theology has overcome Augustinian pessimism in regard to the salvation of the individual and reached the optimism of the Second Vatican Council, assuring supernatural salvation in the immediate possession of God to all those who do not freely reject it through their own personal fault; our question now must be whether theology can regard the non-Christian religions with the same optimism. In order to get further with this question, the systematic theologian must consider several things which admittedly are themselves disputed or disputable theologoumena and can be treated only very briefly here.

A doctrine of God's universal and supernatural salvific will and other reasons lead to a theory of the relationship of grace on the one hand and man, mankind, and its history on the other which sees this grace (if it is to be brought at all within the traditional systems) more as 'habitual' than as 'actual'. 'Habitual' of course does not mean here that state of grace in which grace is accepted by man's free consent. It means grace seen as present from the outset, as offered to freedom, as we generally think of it, for example, as 'habitual' in the baptized infant. When textbook theology considers supernatural grace (as possibility of faith, hope, and love), seen there also as possible even before baptism and outside an explicitly Christian situation, it always assumes that this occurs at isolated points of time, here and there in particular situations. But this grace need not be seen as 'actual' to that extent. Notwithstanding its supernaturality and unmeritedness, it can certainly be seen as a permanent existential of man, of mankind and its history, always and everywhere present, as permanently present possibility of a salvific relationship of freedom to God, as innermost entelechy of the history of the individual and of mankind as a whole, in which the unmerited gracious self-communication of God to the world is the ultimate finality and dynamism of the world and world history, whether the human freedom of any particular individual accepts this innermost entelechy or closes itself up against it.

This endowment of the world and its history with grace, thus understood as 'habitual' by the very nature of grace as supernatural [292] finality of the transcendentality of mind-in-world, is always also the most fundamental event of revelation, since it opens up this transcendentality toward the immediacy of God, whether this is made explicit and objectified or not. Because of this the history of supernatural revelation and the history of supernatural salvation are necessarily co-extensive and co-existent. What we generally call history of revelation and history of faith is therefore the history of the acceptance and objectification of this innermost deification of the world offered to freedom, which is also an offer of salvation and revelation and a permanent existential of humanity and its history. This 'habitual' existential is nothing other than the reality of God's universal salvific will, which should not be seen as a mere intention of God existing 'inwardly' in him, which is objectified as 'actual' grace only here and there in the world. All that has just been said ought of course as such to be more clearly developed and substantiated. But for the moment this must suffice. Even where it is really present, history of revelation is not a priori immune from the possibility of not being fully objectified in objectification and deed by man's reflective knowledge and his freedom, and of being debased in a way contrary to its innermost nature. It is only the history of salvation and revelation in and after Jesus Christ as the eschatological and unsurpassable Word of God, by which God has irreversibly promised himself to the world in historical tangibility, that excludes and renders obsolete an ultimate denial by human freedom of the grace-given existentiality of history.

The thesis of the imperfection or even the possible failure of a genuine history of revelation is implied for Christian theology by its teaching on the failure of the Old Covenant and the rejection of the Messiah by the institutional religion of ancient Israel. It is also evident from the whole history of the Old Covenant, in which the incompatibility between the people of God as they actually were with their religious institutions on the one hand and the claim of God represented by the prophets on the other hand was continually present. But this Old Testament history of revelation in particular before the coming of the salvation-bringer in Jesus Christ shows that a concrete, verbalized, and institutionalized religion cannot be regarded a priori and in principle as either pure objectification of the grace and revelation of God, or as the absolute rejection of this offer by God of himself, or as merely a religion 'from below'. The history [293] of the Old Testament shows that an institutionalized religion as objectification of divine revelation in social life can in the last resort appear to human eyes to be no more than an indissoluble mixture of both divine revelation with its sociological institutionalization and also blockages of further development and debasement of this revelation and its history. At the same time it must be remembered that, if we Christians today regard and apply the Old Testament canon as an unambiguous norm for what God willed in the Old Covenant and what was contrary to his will, we are using a criterion which the people of the Old Covenant simply did not possess completely and as clearly defined before Jesus Christ and were thus faced with a question that they could by no means answer adequately and with certainty. For these people the origin of their religion from God was a factor that was no easier to determine than it was for people of other religions. They could neither simply accept the actual reality of Old Testament history as entirely caused by God nor could they reject it outright, nor had they an institutionally established criterion of a permanent character in the light of which they could distinguish with certainty between what came from God in the Old Covenant and what was merely a transient phenomenon or a debasement of what God had effected. But if that is true even of the Old Covenant, then it may be regarded as true particularly of non-Christian religious objectifications and institutions. These are not to be regarded either entirely as objectification of divine revelation and grace or merely as a human invention from below or purely and simply as an evil perversion of divine revelation.

A third point must be made. If, according to Vatican II, an opportunity of supernatural salvation and the opportunity of a real faith in revelation is offered always and everywhere to every human being at all times; if revelation properly so-called is not possible without faith in the strict sense and must be offered always and everywhere (and in this connection it is not possible after Vatican II to have recourse to a fides virtualis as substitute for actual revelation and faith), then such a revelation and such a faith, whose intrinsic possibilities in the subject we cannot explain at greater length here, occur concretely and on the whole only by the mediation of those categorial, institutional, and verbal realities which we know as non-Christian religions. In man, his transcendental, mental, and supernatural relationship to God is always mediated by categorial realities of his [294] life, and in the last resort the most sublime and formless mysticism is no exception to this. This categorial mediation of the transcendental relationship of man to God – that is, of the acceptance of the openness of the mind to God in freedom radicalized by faith, an openness we know as faith, hope, and love – can certainly occur also through categorial objectivities (as far as the individual act of this kind is concerned) which are not explicitly religious. For Vatican II, accordingly, there are circumstances where such a mediation exists (for example, an atheist who is faithful to his conscience) which is certainly not thematicized in an explicitly religious way. But since the view cannot be maintained that explicit, verbalized, and institutional religiousness can be irrelevant to man's relationship to God in human life as a whole, this verbalized and institutionalized explicit religious factor certainly cannot be denied this categorial mediatory role for the totality of human life and of mankind. At any rate, a person to whom such a religious factor (of whatever kind) is actually offered in his life and accepted by him in freedom can obviously apply and will in fact apply that factor as a categorial mediation of his relationship to God, unless it is absolutely contrary to the latter. Catholic moral theology, however, admits that an objectivity objectively and as such opposed to God's will can nevertheless mediate a positive moral act; it must consequently be recognized that such objectivities may in principle be ways of mediating positive religious acts, even though objectively and implicitly they are in a certain sense opposed to God. It is, for example, quite possible for a polytheist to act positively in regard to the true, absolute God, for whom in his objective, verbalized consciousness he finds a name from his polytheistic pantheon. In their institutions and theoretical objectifications non-Christian religions can be categorial mediations of genuine salvific acts, both because they always retain some truth (at least the postulate of a transcendentality of man beyond the field of his immediate experience) and also because even false and debased religious objectivity can be a way of mediating a genuine and grace given transcendentality of man.

Non-Christian religions then, even though incomplete, rudimentary, and partially debased, can be realities within a positive history of salvation and revelation. They are able admittedly to overcome their ambivalence (between objectification of God's first and last self-communication to the world as grace and revelation on the one hand [295] and the incompleteness and debasement of this objectification to the point of an absolute existential rejection of God's self-communication on the other hand) and to reach a final discernment of spirits only in the light of Jesus Christ as eschatological Word of God. But this is true also of the Old Testament and, to a lesser extent which cannot be precisely defined here, can be true of non-Christian religions, to which as such therefore a positive salvific function cannot be a priori and entirely denied.

Here the systematic theologian must stop and hand over the question to the historian of religion working on experience. At this point the systematic theologian can at most draw the attention of the historian of religion (if the latter wants to work not simply historically, but also up to a point in terms of 'fundamental theology') to certain aspects from which he might consider this history of religion and which might perhaps otherwise escape him. The systematic theologian might, for example, ask the historian of religion if he cannot discover in a concrete and religious form those 'sacraments of nature' which the dogmatic theologian postulates in the abstract and acknowledges as important for salvation. He could offer the empiricist fundamental insights perhaps revealing in and under an apparently solid polytheism a genuine relationship to the absolute God. He could show him that it is not a priori forbidden to discover genuine supernatural mysticism in the 'mysticism' of religions of higher cultures, even when this extra-Christian 'mysticism' is not itself by any means thematicized in an explicitly religious form. In a word (and this has largely not happened and is not possible here) the systematic theologian could offer viewpoints and a framework to the historian of religion which would make it easier for the latter, even in all the diversity and sometimes terrible debasement of extra-Christian religions, to discover that God's grace is always and everywhere active for man's salvation and its salvific power, although obscurely and imperfectly, also manifested in the non-Christian religions, making them ways of salvation by which human beings approach God and his Christ.

FOUNDATIONS OF CHRISTIAN FAITH

I hope it will not seem presumptuous on my part to offer some introductory observations on the purpose and content of my book Grundkurs des Glaubens: Einführung des Christentums.* In West Germany eleven printings, comprising more than forty thousand copies, have appeared. It has also appeared in the German Democratic Republic. Dutch, Italian, Spanish, French, Anglo-American, and even Japanese editions have been published, all of which would seem to justify these comments.

It is not a question of commending the work or defining its place in modern theological literature. Nor does the author want to praise the book, but to explain quite straightforwardly his purpose in writing it and to describe its contents. It is obvious that this can be done only in a fragmentary fashion. I cannot deal, for instance, with the many reviews and criticisms that have appeared since the book was published. But perhaps I may be permitted to quote the conclusion of the longest review that I have seen up to the time of writing. Joseph Ratzinger, now Cardinal Archbishop of Munich and a well-known German theologian, writes:

> A large book always provokes discussion. Rahner's basic course is a large book. It is sustained by the same passion for knowledge as that which led Anselm of Canterbury to attempt to deduce Christianity rationibus necessariis. Even someone who is not disposed to accept in its entirety the 'idea of Christianity' elaborated by Rahner will find here a presentation of the Christian reality which [4] he cannot positively or negatively refuse to consider. We cannot but be grateful to Rahner for producing now, as the fruit of all his past efforts, this impressive synthesis, which will remain a source of inspiration long after much of modern theological work has been forgotten.[1]

That is Cardinal Ratzinger's opinion, not mine. But it certainly provides me with a moral justification for saying a few words about my own work.

First of all, the title of the book. For my own part, I would have liked to call it simply Einführung in den Begriff des Christentums ('Introduction to the Idea of Christianity'). The publisher wanted the title Grundkurs des Glaubens ('Basic Course of Faith'). This title is not wrong, but it could be misleading if it were taken to mean a popular presentation, a kind of catechism, of Christian doctrine in its traditional form for everyone. But this is not what the book was meant to be. Certainly it is to be hoped that the content of the book, when translated and popularized (by others, of course), may form part of the Christian proclamation to all; but the book itself is intended as a scholarly work, to be understood only as a result of what Hegel called the 'exertion of the idea.' As the subtitle indicates, it is presented as an introduction to the idea of Christianity; there is no question of repeating in their traditional formulations particular statements of Christianity about God and salvation history, but rather

(so far as this is possible in view of the historicity of salvation history and of God's freedom) of bringing Christianity as a whole under one idea, of reflecting on the ultimate unity and the essential coherence of everything that Christianity proclaims. It is true, of course, that such a study, properly understood, amounts to a basic course of Christianity in the sense of a quest for the ultimate grounds of faith; but it is not a popular catechism for the multitude.

Despite the endeavour to establish a comprehensive idea of Christianity (as is made clear again in the book's closing remarks on brief formularies of faith) and despite the academic level which the book attempts to maintain, its distinctive feature really lies not in its conceptual presentation or its scholarly character but in the firm determination it expresses to pursue the question of the essence of [5] Christianity on what I would describe as a 'primary plane of reflection'. What does this mean? Certainly not that I intend to get involved in deep and serious problems of a theory of knowledge. The term 'primary plane of reflection' means something quite simple, but it also involves the explicit and resolute acceptance of all the consequences. What is the position of the Christian today who wants honestly to justify his faith to himself and others, and to make really clear to himself up to a point what as a Christian he accepts as true and how he must live?

The normal Christian and even the professional theologian (who can really be an expert only in a tiny sector of theology as a whole) are faced today by a philosophy and theology to which there appear to be no limits. It was possible for Francis Suarez (1548-1619), for example, to assume rightly that he could have present in his subjective consciousness more or less everything that might be important for the justification of Christian faith at his time and in his situation (I mean, explicitly and reflectively present). This has become simply impossible for any individual today. No one can know and write everything that would be necessary for the justification of faith 'as such' in the light of the requirements of scholarly reflection (requirements of reflective knowledge, philosophy, and its modern divisions and problems; exegesis and its assumptions; history of dogma that is not adapted from the outset to school use; general linguistics and epistemology, and all the questions about the assumptions derived from the history of ideas and sociology behind religious statements as a whole). No individual can present and justify his Christian faith today in the way that traditional fundamental and dogmatic theology formerly assumed to be possible. If I wanted today to justify the primacy of the pope in the light of a traditional scholarly reflection on Matthew 16:18, I would need to have studied exegesis all my life, to know from the sources the theology of Judaism at the time of Jesus, and to write some hundreds of pages about this problem. But even then I would certainly not know enough about philosophy, epistemology, about the history of the Church, of law, of dogma, to defend in the traditional fashion the legitimacy of the papal primacy – which is certainly not to be found simply and literally in Matthew. Another example: I once had a clever student who wrote a dissertation on the question of how, in the light of the problems of modern philosophy as a whole, we must methodically set to work [6] epistemologically and philosophically merely to raise at all the question of the personal character of God.

When all is said and done, no one today, entirely on his own, can present his Christian faith as substantiated by fundamental theology and in its dogmatic content in the way that really ought to have been possible and was in fact pursued according to the scholarly ideals of former fundamental and dogmatic theologies. (Nor, of course, can someone who interprets himself from the standpoint of unbelief claim support for his opinions in science as understood according to the ideals of the nineteenth century.) Merely incidentally, it is really obvious that it is impossible to get out of this difficulty with the aid of teamwork, since in this matter each individual ought to test the conclusions of the other person's scholarship for their soundness: in these disciplines it is not possible as it is in the natural sciences to rely on the conclusions of other scholars.

Nevertheless, since we can realize Christian faith only as freely responsible subjects, we must be able to justify it rationally and understand its statements. Consequently there must be a way of justifying and understanding Christian faith that does not emerge as a conclusion and synthesis from the study of all the individual theological disciplines. In this respect, in the last resort, it is irrelevant whether or not we describe as a science this justification and understanding of the meaning of Christian faith, which does not emerge from the individual theological disciplines (unmanageable for one person in their present-day complexity) but is prior to all such studies. It is also obvious that such efforts by individuals will be made in very different ways and in varying degrees and in varying planes of reflection, dependent on the character of the person involved and the mental climate and the existential situation in which he is placed. If then we speak of a primary plane of reflection, this does not mean that the primary plane is the same for all or that it does not exhibit substantial variations: the term 'primary plane of reflection' is meant to contrast with that scholarly reflection on the Christian faith which is made up of all the methods, considerations, investigations, and conclusions of the many individual historical and philosophical sciences which on the one hand must find expression on this 'secondary' plane of reflection and on the other cannot today be mastered in their entirety by any one person. Consequently the task envisaged in my book was simply to explain how a normal Christian (who cannot [7] be an expert on all the relevant disciplines) can justify the legitimacy and meaning of his faith to himself and to others, without at the same time attempting in a little book to investigate in all their complexity the problems and conclusions of all the individual philosophical and theological disciplines.

Of course, modern works on dogmatics and fundamental theology nowhere actually manage to carry out the abstractly conceivable and scientifically exact study of all the individual disciplines on which they objectively depend; they do not, however, admit expressly and precisely this impossibility, but they are presented as if they were the result of a critical appraisal of all the disciplines they presuppose. A short book of that kind on the totality of Christian belief cannot be written today by any one person. That is why I make the explicit claim that this book belongs merely to a primary plane of reflection, that it is not meant to be a learned work, but is itself based on scholarship (if we may use these terms) in its own right and its unavoidability. From what was said about the nature of the primary plane of reflection in the field of existentially important knowledge and decisions it is immediately obvious that a book of this kind must nevertheless be written (as far as one individual can do this) with a view as wide and clear as possible of the problems of the disciplines relevant to theology, that even this work is arduous and perhaps could not be directly accomplished by many people, that it is the sort of book that might be written quite differently. It is impossible to explain here at greater length how and why, even on this primary plane, in practice reflection partly goes on as theology hitherto proceeded (on a plane of higher scholarly reflection), but partly also is compelled, to proceed by other ways. Hence, for example, it is impossible on this primary plane of reflection and in a book like this to examine the question of why a person should be a Catholic and not a Protestant precisely in the way in which traditional fundamental theology discussed it with the aid of an immense amount of historical research; this task is today quite beyond the resources of any one individual, if these reflections are to be exact, based on the sources, and without bias. In a word, this book is meant to be a study on a primary plane of reflection, giving an account of the meaning and credibility of Catholic belief precisely in the way that is possible for one person, for one theologian. The absence of 'scholarship' is admitted and intentional, but, I think, is [8] itself existentially-ontologically and theologically justified; it is a question of an explicitly and deliberately accepted lack of scholarship.

In addition to its form, it seems to me that the contents of the book have their own special characteristics. In what follows, I may be permitted to draw attention to some of these.

My theology has often been described as transcendental. I have nothing against this description as long as it is correctly understood and is not meant to suggest that my theology as a whole can quite clearly and unambiguously be characterized in this way. As I understand the term, it simply means that, with reference to all statements of faith and theology (if they are to be justified) the question must be asked how and why man, in virtue of his own nature (which is concrete anyway and thus from the outset irrevocably under the influence of the grace of God's self-communication), is the one with whom these statements can and must actually be concerned. The description does not mean that in my theology man is a subject of faith and religion only in his abstract transcendentality and not in his historicity and his history. For me, he is a subject of faith as a historical being in his concrete history. This, however, is the very thing that is not obvious but must be shown to be possible in a transcendental reflection. It must be shown that history can really be significant for salvation to the intellectual subject, who is always more than space and time. In the last resort it must be shown that man's history is not something in which he is involved over and above his transcendentality to God as the absolute being and mystery, but that it is only as history of this transcendentality in freedom that history is actually history in which salvation can come about.

It is typical and important for this book that grace in its first impact and ultimate meaning is always understood strictly as God's self-communication and consequently that a proper understanding of the Catholic doctrine of grace and a real understanding of the 'supernatural' can be attained only in the light mainly of 'uncreated grace', although this does not mean the denial of the traditional teaching on created grace as (simultaneously) precondition and consequence of uncreated grace. The dimension of the supernatural and also of revelation is primarily established by God's self-communication, in which God with his own nature, albeit as unmerited grace, becomes an actual internal principle of man: that is, when God [9] represents in regard to man not only the principle of efficient causality, but also the principle of a quasi-formal causality by which the finite becomes really capable of the infinite. But this self-communication of God may not be understood, as in Jesuit baroque scholasticism, merely as entitative objectivity, outside the scope of consciousness; it always means essentially also the a priori dynamism of man's knowledge and freedom towards the immediacy of God himself. Man's mental transcendentality as knowledge and freedom is the real and original point at which the grace of God's self-communication is received. This grace is originally a transcendental and not a categorial factor in man's existence.

This gracious self-communication of God as the radical orientation of human transcendentality to the immediacy of God (so that this transcendentality does not always merely point to God, while forever remaining at a distance, but also actually attains him in himself) is not something that happens to man as an isolated event in space and time. It is a permanent existential of man, present always and everywhere, even though in man as inarticulate it takes the form merely of an offer and a precondition for his freedom and in man as historically mature in the form of free acceptance or in the form of free rejection.

Insofar as this self-communication of God present everywhere in history as an existential of man involves a radical orientation of man's transcendentality to the immediacy of God, there is also present a genuine, supernatural, personal revelation of God, even though the latter as the radical orientation of man's transcendentality has not yet been consciously considered and objectified, or at any rate not clearly or perhaps badly. Consequently the history of mind co-exists with the history of revelation. What we usually call history of revelation (what is known as primitive revelation, revelation from Abraham and Moses to Jesus Christ) is therefore not the history of revelation as such, but only a particular, selected part of the history of revelation generally and as a whole, which is established by God's self-communication as an existential of man and as occurring everywhere on very diverse planes of reflection in the history of mankind. Hence the history of religion, even outside explicit, verbalized, and institutionalized Christianity, together with the Old Testament, is not merely the vain attempt of man with the aid of his natural transcendentality to establish from below a relationship [10] to God, but is also always and everywhere from the outset a history of revelation and salvation coming from above, even though this history of grace is really history: that is, a slowly increasing articulation of this grace in man's consciousness which can take on a variety of forms and even be terribly debased.

It is in this light also that the meaning of anonymous Christianity and anonymous Christians must be understood. The term as such is not important. Anyone who thinks it implies a depreciation of explicit and institutionalized Christianity need not use it. The thing itself, however, cannot be disputed, at least after Vatican II, since it is taught there that always and everywhere in the world anyone who is faithful to this consciousness is living in the grace of God and united to the paschal mystery of Christ. In such a view of the co-existence and co-extensiveness of the history of humanity's mental existence, of the history of salvation and revelation, the absolute necessity of Jesus Christ must not be obscured; but it is permissible to approach Christology from a universal pneumatology and not only to proceed in the opposite direction, so that Jesus Christ appears as the unsurpassable peak of a universal history of grace as God's self-communication to the world as a whole, a peak at which this universal history of salvation is no longer merely at the stage of an open offer of grace to man's freedom, but where this offer from God has been established victoriously and irreversibly, as far as mankind as a whole is concerned.

Something must now be said about the treatment of Christology in this book. Compared to the total content of the book, Christology occupies a very large space. This is because the fact that Christianity after all is about Christ must not be obscured, even though the most fundamental idea of Christianity as presented here is that of the gracious self-communication of God in himself. It is a Christology which must, of course, make use of historical statements and which cannot be a merely speculative development of a 'Christ-idea' (even though a transcendental Christology is legitimate and has its part in this book), insofar as the history of man's transcendentality and its radicalizing by grace is shown to be directed unquestionably toward a point at which it is established as irreversibly victorious and there appears as historically tangible. The fact remains, however, that in principle (and consequently in this book) there must be a place for an a posteriori Christology based on historical experience of Jesus [11] as the Christ: that is, the question must be answered as to where in the concrete course of history it is legitimate to find that God-man toward whom a transcendental Christology is directed as to the irreversible culmination of universal salvation history. A Christology 'from below', an 'ascending Christology', is therefore legitimate and necessary.

All this was understood by traditional theology when it included as part of its fundamental theology a treatise De Christo legato divino. In this sense the Christology of the present book is meant to be and is in fact traditional, since it asks in the first place who this Jesus was, what he proclaimed, and what account he gave of himself. But traditional Christology considered Jesus within the scope of fundamental theology only in the light of the formal, abstract idea of a divinely attested prophet and then went on to assume that testimony of the God-manhood, the incarnation, and the hypostatic union was to be found, not only in Johannine and Pauline theology, but also expressly and directly in Jesus' own statements about himself in the Synoptics. According to this traditional theology, the divinely attested prophet Jesus himself proclaims directly and explicitly his divine sonship in the sense of Chalcedonian Christology.

On this point the author of the present book felt it necessary to proceed more cautiously if the conclusions of modern exegesis were to be honestly respected. There is no attempt here (at least, no systematic attempt) to find in Jesus' own words a statement about himself which is directly and formally identical with the teaching even of Johannine and Pauline Christology and its further development in the dogma of Chalcedon. This does not mean breaking or denying a genuine, legitimate, and necessary connection between the historically demonstrable self-interpretation of Jesus and the Church's dogma. With reference to this question the basic thesis of the book is that Jesus proclaims that in him – in his person and his teaching – the kingdom of God (that is, God's gracious self-communication) is not merely always present as an offer to man's freedom, but has reached us victoriously and irreversibly, has been actually victoriously established by God, and that the last, definitive word of grace has been irrevocably spoken in history: a word that in Jesus' resurrection, where he is definitively accepted in his solidarity with other human beings, has become the unsurpassable and definitive word of God in history. From this standpoint, the view is [12] maintained in the book that this historically tangible self-interpretation of Jesus as the definitive, unsurpassable prophet, as the definitive word of God's self-promise to the world in its history, also contains implicitly the Chalcedonian Christology and simultaneously offers a critical norm to make sure that the Church's ecclesial Christology, in itself absolutely true and binding, is not misunderstood in a monophysite sense (a misunderstanding that undoubtedly always represents a serious danger in Christendom and psychologically is the reason why the Church's Christology is rejected by many as mythological). In these brief reflections of course it is impossible to bring out in detail the content of the historically demonstrable self-interpretation of Jesus as the last of the prophets and the final bringer of salvation and the connection of this content with the Church's Christology; even in the book itself these themes are only incompletely explained. Here we must be content with having at least indicated the specific nature of the Christology of this book. Nor can we enter more closely here into the book's teaching on Jesus' resurrection. This teaching also has what we may describe as a certain transcendental approach, based not on a Platonic anthropology but on the correctly interpreted unity of spirit and matter in man (which does not mean a monotonous sameness), in its view that man's final achievement of salvation and fulfillment with God itself implies what is really meant by man's resurrection and consummation.

We must pass over the treatment of ecclesiology and eschatology in the sections after that of Christology. At the end there is a discussion of a number of 'brief formularies' of faith. These brief credal statements are not meant, of course, to replace or suppress the Apostles' Creed or other official creeds of the Church. But they can help to make clear the fact that Christianity, despite its historicity, can be condensed up to a point in a brief 'compendium' and that there are many ways of acquiring a general understanding of the Christian faith which perhaps have been too much neglected in the traditional forms of proclamation.

Any book by a theologian has its flaws and deficiencies. The most important of these are bound to escape the author's attention, otherwise they would have been avoided. All this is obviously true of the present book. The most important flaws and deficiencies in regard to the themes will have escaped this author's attention, even though he [13] is not to be blamed for the absence of anything which cannot be part of his theme in the light of his method and basic approach. But the author is also aware of deficiencies and faults which might perhaps have been avoided. The treatment of the doctrine of the Trinity, for instance, has turned out to be perhaps briefer than it might have been in the light of the book's aim and structure. I think however that the charge of modalism in my treatment of the doctrine of the Trinity, made by a German theologian, is unjustified. It has been refuted in fact by a lengthy Roman dissertation of a Brazilian theologian[2] and Cardinal Ratzinger did not notice any such modalism. Unlike some other modern theologians, however, I readily admit that I fear the danger of modalism less than that of an implicit tritheism, which cannot easily be avoided. For the rest, I must point to what I said about the Trinity in the large work of dogmatic theology Mysterium Salutis.[3]

Another theme perhaps inadequately considered in my book is that of 'evil' in the world and its compatibility with faith in an infinitely holy and purely good God. The book does not put forward any theory of an apocatastasis, but stresses the importance of a legitimate hope of an eschatological universal reconciliation, even though man in his still open history of freedom must always and incessantly allow for the possibility of final perdition. But perhaps the theology of evil is not outlined vividly enough in this book. Nevertheless, it seems to me that a Christian with a humble and universal hope that knows no bounds does more credit to God's holy goodness than one who even now wants to know precisely that evil, even though condemned by God, has a certain finality in this world.

There is nothing in this book about angels or devils. Whatever its theological importance, it does not seem to me absolutely necessary to deal with this doctrine in a book mainly concerned with the ultimate basic idea of Christianity. Anyone interested in my views of the subject will find them in the essay 'On Angels' in this volume.[4]

[14] My friend Herbert Vorgrimler[5] has rightly drawn my attention to the omission in the chapter on ecclesiology of any reference to a theme on which I have elsewhere written comparatively freshly and insistently – the theme of the Church of sinners, of the sinful Church – although an impartial consideration of this theme could be of great importance particularly at the present time to enable people to adopt an uninhibited attitude towards the Church. As I said, Vorgrimler is right in this respect. The ecclesiology of this book has turned out to be perhaps too innocuous, even somewhat triumphalist.

Finally, I can see and expressly admit the limitations of the book insofar as it represents a certain individualistic approach to theological problems as a whole. Political theology and the theology of liberation are not expressly represented here. This does not mean that I simply reject these theologies: that would contradict much that I have said about them elsewhere. There are completely orthodox and legitimate political theologies and theologies of liberation, even though we need not for that reason approve them in all their forms. There are theologies which rightly bring man's sociality to bear on all theology from the very outset and consequently are not to be identified with the particular discipline of Christian social science. It would be possible therefore, even in an introduction to the idea of Christianity, to work from the outset with the basic conceptions of a political theology and a theology of liberation without for that reason betraying the orthodoxy of an ecclesial theology or reducing theology, contrary to its true nature, to themes which do not cover its entire scope. But I think it is also possible to justify the admitted absence of political theology and the theology of liberation from this book. For one thing, in a comparatively small book in which an attempt is made to consider all the traditional themes of dogmatic and fundamental theology, the limitations of space make it almost impossible to integrate also these theologies, particularly since, as they now exist or continue to exist, they have not shown very clearly or in detail that it is possible in the light of their approach to cope with all that is binding dogma in all its parts. If they are to be justified and to cover the whole of dogma, these theologies, too, [15] need transcendental-speculative reflections and historical material; they must not only proclaim passionately their formal nature, but also engage in a theological activity which they have in common with traditional theology. These theologies anyway are also in danger of becoming so enthusiastic about the novelty and urgency of their task that they are liable to forget difficult and absolutely imperative theological problems and tasks. I agree that my book suffers from a certain one-sidedness, but this may serve to correct the fashionable and misleading exuberance on the part of these theologies which is also possible and actually exists here and there. My book is to be read, not in an exclusive, but in a positive sense. Then, I think, it can be approved even by a defender of a political theology or a theology of liberation.

I would not like this book to be regarded as a systematic, all-integrating presentation of my theology. For this, too many problems with which I have been occupied for some forty years are disregarded here. But on the primary plane of reflection it offers a survey of Christian doctrine as a whole. This is difficult and involves many more risks than are involved in a theological study, however exact, within a particular field. The greater the task, the more likely is it that the result will fall short of complete fulfillment. But we must have the courage to make the attempt, even though the accomplishment of the task remains almost hopelessly inadequate.

ON THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN NATURAL SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY

In the light of its own ultimate intention and its understanding of itself, theology is likely in the first place to adopt an attitude of tacit mistrust towards the natural sciences. Regarded objectively and historically, this is not at all surprising. Directly or indirectly, all natural sciences involve anthropology; they all say something about man. Examined closely and in the end result, what they say is never the expression of a precisely definable material understanding about something in man; it defines or influences the idea of man as one and whole, even when the particular science tries to avoid exceeding the limits of its method or of its content. At this point, however, the theologian almost inevitably begins to feel irritated, since he regards the doctrine of man revealed in the Christian faith (which is the object of his reflections) as the proper, true, and unsurpassable self-understanding of man. He can hardly fail to regard the anthropology of natural science in its method and conclusions as a threat to his own theological anthropology. There is a theological uneasiness in regard to natural science: an uneasiness in principle and (as the history of the last centuries shows) also in practice. Even at the point where no insuperable contradictions can be seen between a theological and a scientific anthropology, where both exercise a wise self-restraint and restrict themselves closely to their own field (being prepared thus to make concessions), this uneasiness continues and, in fact, on both sides (there is always someone on whom no regulations can be imposed and who nevertheless can interfere in the other's business).

In the light of his own self-understanding, the theologian must [17] recognize this situation as legitimate, must admit that his own business does not permit or enable him to abolish the situation, that (to be exact) there is a scientific anthropology existing in its own right which must be acknowledged by the theologian and which in virtue of its contents and in a critical spirit can and may in principle always have something to tell the theologian about his own anthropology. Of course it is true that there can be no absolutely contradictory opposition between faith and knowledge, between theological and scientific anthropology; in the last resort a 'double truth' is nonsense. Of course it is true that very many conflicts between the two anthropologies can be cleared up by a closer reflection on the nature of the methods of each, by a more exact definition and demarcation of their particular subject matter, etc. It is also true that in the course of the history of theology and of the empirical sciences the attempt has repeatedly been made so to define the respective fields of theology and the natural sciences that they could be seen not to border on one another and that conflicts could not only be solved up to a point but were impossible from the outset. But such an oversimplified clarification of the frontiers is not possible.

The natural scientist cannot from the outset always and unambiguously restrict himself only to those anthropological statements which by their very nature and unequivocally are irrelevant for the theologian and in no way touch on the latter's field of study. An unequivocally and radically materialistic biology, materialistic not only in its method, not only considering its object merely insofar as the latter is accessible to its method, but also declaring that there is no reality beyond the reality investigated in this way – a natural science claiming thus to be science purely and simply would be a natural science which could not co-exist with a Christian faith in one person. Consequently it is impossible for natural science and theology to accept a clarification of frontiers which would prevent them from the very outset from coming into conflict. They must coexist, they must exist alongside one another, without being absorbed into one another; they cannot assume from the outset that they have nothing to do with each other; hence they inevitably threaten and disturb each other.

This obvious and yet uneasy situation could, of course, be much more fully clarified and more deeply investigated in principle and historically. In this question, too, differences of opinion in the light [18] of controversial theology must be noted between individual theologians of the different Christian churches. If, for example, Catholic teaching states that God can be known by the light of natural reason or if the typical Catholic understanding of fundamental theology is considered, it can also be seen that specifically Catholic teaching in principle allows for a larger field of conflict than does a Protestant theology, which in general has a notion of faith that of its nature is placed at a greater distance from secular science.

However odd it sounds at first, it can nevertheless be said that the relationship between theology and natural science can be defined theologically perhaps most clearly in the light of the theological notion of concupiscence. The assumption behind this at first apparently strange thesis is merely that the understanding of man which finds expression in the notion of concupiscence holds equally for the dimension of knowledge and for that of the will and freedom. This assumption is really obvious in view of man's original unity, in view of the mutual dependence of his individual dimensions and realities, in view of the interconnection of his dimensions. Knowledge is itself one act, even though a specific act, of freedom, and consequently carries with it also all the peculiarities of creaturely and specifically human freedom. Concupiscence in the theological sense means that despite an original unity of man there is a pluralism of his faculties and impulses which in practice can never be integrated into an absolute unity surveyable and controllable from a single point. Concupiscence also means that man nevertheless has the task and obligation of working asymptotically toward such a unity, even though it can never be established completely in man's individual and collective history and within the course of that history; it means finally that this pluralism, which can never adequately be integrated, although not really sinful in itself, can always lead to essentially destructive sin and is in any case the reason for the agonistic character of human existence. This nonintegrated pluralism of human existence known as concupiscence, having always a complete integration before it as a task, leading to sin, unavoidably involving conflict, is a peculiarity also of man's gnoseological dimension. From this standpoint and in the very light of theology as such, it is possible to make something out of the relationship of theology to the natural sciences.

From this standpoint it must be said first of all that man, particularly as a Christian, has to allow for an irreversible pluralism of [19] sciences. These sciences do not originate at a fixed point of unity under man's control and power, from which their multiplicity could be maintained indisputably and harmoniously in unity from the very outset. The sciences exist in a plurality as alien to one another; they arise in the course of man's history without looking for mutual recognition from the outset; subsequently it may perhaps be possible with a great effort for scientific systematology and theory to work out a system of the sciences, but in the last resort this system does not permit the individual sciences to be brought under control, with each of them being assigned its own task and method. Theology, too, must live with and find its place in this insuperable pluralism of the sciences. Theology deals with the one all-embracing and sustaining source of all reality and with the one all-integrating and reconciling goal of all history that we call God. But, insofar as theology acknowledges this God precisely as the incomprehensible mystery and declares man to be eternally distinct from this God of original unity, the singular uniqueness and dignity of theology in principle simply does not provide the means and the way to overcome this pluralism of the sciences. Theology (together with metaphysics), known as the supreme science, is not a kind of sovereign ruler reducing the other sciences to acting as its instruments and carrying out its plans; it is one science among others, with the special task of providing a living example of the fact that the pluralism of the sciences does not permit any dominion that could be exercised by man in a kind of theological totalitarianism.

The traditional teaching of Christianity on concupiscence states also that there is an insuperable pluralism of the sciences which cannot be completely reduced to a humanly comprehensible system, but must be endured with a prudent restraint and the humility befitting the creature. It is therefore the task of theology both constantly to unmask the claim of an individual science to an ideological totalitarianism as an arrogant falsification of reality and also to return itself to the attitude of modesty which permits all sciences to be subject to God but not to itself. In this sense also all the unease which the sciences mutually generate today and all the uneasiness felt by theology in regard to the natural sciences, because of the threat which these present to it, can never mislead theology into denying their autonomy and meaningfulness. Theology is accustomed to declare that in a case of conflict it possesses ultimately the [20] competence to decide between true and false, since it can appeal to divine revelation. This traditional statement of its claims by theology may in principle and formally be completely correct. But, fundamentally and in the light of historical experience, in such cases of conflict between theology and natural science, theology is equally and frequently compelled to reexamine itself, to understand itself better, to give way to natural science. Even in a case like this the revision of theology may certainly consist in a return to a better understanding of its own principles. But this in no way alters the fact that this return to its own principles is in practice caused and necessitated by the conclusions of the natural sciences. In practice, therefore, there is an open relationship between natural science and theology: possible situations of conflict, even though they can be solved in principle, are not a priori avoidable. As reflection on divine revelation, theology does not dissolve the pluralism of the sciences in which it is a modest individual science and is not itself the power of a manageable unity.

Seen in the light of the notion of concupiscence, this pluralism of the sciences, including also theology, is not a static reality remaining always the same, but takes the form of a task demanding a truly historical even though asymptotic trend toward an integration and a unity. Pluralism of the sciences does not exist merely in the one human being, whose original unity would not need to have anything to do with man's actual history. Achieving man's unity in the integration of everything with which he is involved and thus also the unity of his sciences is a wholly existential task. Interdisciplinary discussion (as it is described today) is not merely a game or a diversion to be taken up or abandoned at will. If the individual sciences were separate territories without any common frontiers, the striving for unity of the sciences, interdisciplinary discussion, and a general course of studies could be left to the choice of the individual person. But since every science (because of the unity of the one God, of a unity of man, of the one human being, in origin, nature, and goal), without detriment to its own character, its specific method, and its formulation of the question, etc., can properly sort itself out only (paradoxical as it sounds) by transcending its own nature; since the individual sciences in each case reach a complete understanding of themselves only when they know more than themselves, the continually fresh, albeit asymptotic, attempt at an integration of the different [21] sciences, including theology, is a task and a moral obligation imposed on man.

There must be universities of knowledge which are more than organized collections of different faculties. This task of integrating the individual sciences (including, that is, the natural and the mental sciences) into a unity will continually achieve positive results; people will continually perceive (at least, bit by bit) how things hitherto merely juxtaposed in consciousness fit in with each other. But there will never be a single, all-inclusive, universal formula in this history of knowledge; and the ultimate unity to be granted to man seeking knowledge pluralistically – already present and yet remaining also a task that is continually new – is the surrender of all knowledge in a docta ignorantia to the eternally abiding mystery of God and his underivable will. This unity also, granted and not produced in the entrusting of all plurality to the only radically one God, is part of the task of integrating the pluralism of our knowledge into a unity.

Christian teaching on the concupiscent plurality of our unintegrated impulses states that this plurality, although not necessarily and always itself sin and guilt, can lead to sin and in any case causes an agonistic situation in man. The fact that the mirror of our consciousness as such does not reflect all reality as one and entire in unity but has in a certain sense been shattered into a thousand fragments each of which reproduces only a part of reality that is never completely understandable, all this is not yet necessarily sin in man, even though it is interpreted in Christian anthropology as the consequence of a sin at the primordial beginning of the mental history of mankind. But it can lead to sin and in fact continually leads to sin in individual and collective history because this gnoseological pluralism is not endured in patience or continually, freshly, and asymptotically integrated towards greater unity but is simply accepted uneasily and lazily as a matter of course or is supposed to be abolished by an illegitimate claim of an individual science to dominate the others. The indifferences of a particular science and of individual scientists toward other sciences and their representatives, what is known as one-track specialization, the narrow-minded selfishness with which individual scientists or institutions attempt to claim for themselves as much as possible of the limited resources of the state; the attempts (sometimes truly ridiculous) to rig up out of the categories of an individual science a universal formula meant to [22] explain everything without exception; the inclination too often implicitly to refuse to acknowledge as scientific other efforts to acquire knowledge with other methods, as a result of the desire presumptuously to reserve the predicate ‘scientific’ to one’s own field of scholarship – these and similar phenomena in the field of the sciences (whether they are peculiarities of the individual scientist or are institutionalized) are occurrences or evidences of the sin that arises out of the concupiscent pluralism of our knowledge.

A theory of the actual sinfulness of our knowledge and its institutions ought sometime to be developed. Science is not a paradise of innocence. And who knows if the greatest lapses have not already taken place in this area? If – and this is a serious problem – there could be a moral obligation to be content to leave unknown something which, as we are aware proleptically, could be studied and known, there might be moral problems in the field of knowledge which we are presumably completely disregarding today. But in any case, there exists also in the field of knowledge the agonistic situation which is involved permanently and irremoveably in man’s concupiscent state. If the representatives of the different sciences arrogantly make excessive claims for their own special fields, if we regard with amusement or irritation the wrangling of the scientists and their institutions for social esteem and for endowments as large as possible, in the last resort these things are not incidents that could be eliminated with a little wisdom and decisiveness, but tokens of an agonistic situation which could not simply be removed, where the sciences and scientists struggle with one another in conflicts never to be definitively resolved, since there is no earthly authority able to create from the outset a situation in the society of science and scientists in which conflicts simply cannot arise. Knowledge of the agonistic situation even of the sciences (rightly understood) provides no excuse for as much selfish conflict as possible among sciences and scientists, but serves as a reminder humbly to allow for conflicts that are never wholly avoidable even in the field of the sciences and thus to strive for as much peace and integration as possible.

The agonistic situation even in the field of knowledge is one that exists also in the mind and heart of each individual scientist. He wonders which task of knowledge among the many possible tasks open to him should have priority. The older scientist may perhaps wonder in some anxiety whether he should continue his intensive [23] investigation of a single problem within his science or (in the light of the basic problems of his science) become a metaphysical philosopher or a universal guide, if his limited resources and brief lifetime do not permit him to do everything together and at one and the same time. For the individual scholar, who even as scientist never can or even should wholly exclude his own existence, the agonistic state of his existence as a scholar has another aspect. In the last resort his struggle ends in a defeat which only the believer knows to be possibly his greatest victory. He grows older, his powers fail, interest in his special field becomes faint and feeble, his achievements are surpassed by his colleagues in that field, he dies. At the same time in the last resort it is no consolation if the contribution he has made to knowledge by his scientific work lives on in the heads of a future generation. For that generation is likewise doomed to death, the death that renders all actual science itself mortal.

In conclusion it may be said once more that the right to existence of the natural sciences cannot be questioned, even by theology, despite the unease which they cause. Faith and theology do not really give the natural sciences their right to exist, but find them already existing and thus see that their validity must be recognized even in the light of the very nature of the understanding of man produced by faith; they see that they must live together with these sciences in an open dialogue the concrete outcome of which cannot exactly be foreseen by either side. At the same time, theology also admittedly has the task of rejecting the arrogance (always present as a temptation) of every science as it tries to establish a monopoly and a totalitarian claim to be the complete solution to all the riddles of the universe. Absurd as such an attempt may seem to us human beings of the present time with our weary scepticism, it has constantly been made from the period of the Enlightenment onward, and even today the danger persists that this arrogance of the empirical sciences will be upheld with the aid of the powers of the state.

THE CHURCH'S REDEMPTIVE HISTORICAL PROVENANCE FROM THE DEATH AND RESURRECTION OF JESUS[1]

I would like first of all to attempt to say something about the problem raised here and about the solution traditionally offered in Catholic textbook theology in the last centuries, together with the problems in turn raised by this traditional but not officially defined solution. After that, I would like to suggest that the same question of the origin of the Church from Jesus Christ can now perhaps be understood and interpreted somewhat differently, so that this possible solution can be more easily and more simply reconciled with the conclusions of modern historical science.

The question before us (which I can consider here only as a systematic theologian, with the opportunities at my disposal, distinct as such from those of an exegete) really amounts simply to the problem of whether we can speak of an institution of the Church by Jesus Christ. When the problem is raised in this way today, in the first place we must ask the question whether Jesus of Nazareth of the pre-Easter period, as historically palpable (perhaps only with difficulty), or the risen Christ is meant.

In practice this distinction does not appear in traditional textbook theology, in traditional ecclesiology, or in fundamental theology. If [25] something connected with the Church is put into the mouth of Jesus, in the Synoptics or in John, whether it is the Jesus of the pre-Easter period or the risen Jesus creates no difficulties for traditional textbook theology. But when the question is raised today, this distinction must obviously be considered. The fact that the approach to a solution as outlined in the second part of my exposition again carries with it a special problem is something that must emerge from our reflections in that second part.

What then does traditional textbook ecclesiology say, as it existed especially in the post-Tridentine period and mainly under the aegis of St. Robert Bellarmine, the Doctor of the Church, with his notion of the Church, and as I heard and learned it myself when I was studying theology forty or more years ago?

It might perhaps be said (I am concentrating the problem, of course, on the questions that are of interest here) that in traditional textbook theology the Church is regarded as instituted by Jesus (of the pre-Easter or post-Easter period) insofar as and because this institution is ascribed to explicit, propositional statements of Jesus, interpreted more or less juridically even at that stage.

The traditional conception is of Jesus appointing Peter to be the first pope, gathering around himself a group of apostles who formed the first college of bishops; and he gives to what I might describe as this society juridically established on the basis of the explicit words of institution, understood in this sense, quite definite powers, which he can give precisely because it is he whom Christian faith perceives in Jesus of Nazareth.

The crucial point of this sort of ecclesiology then is that these ideas of the Church's institution belong a priori to a propositional, juridical plane. This ecclesiology is conceived in terms of the institution of a specific society. Consequently, even for Bellarmine's ecclesiology (which, up to Pius XII's Mystici Corporis, was, I might say, not the sole and not the complete but certainly the dominant ecclesiology) the idea of the Church up to the present century was that of the societas perfecta, the perfect society, a juridical organization of Sociological character. Of course it was always known that this Church is something more than a secular society, a secular state or some other secular combination of human beings, but (and here we come closer to our real problem) it cannot be denied that the institution of this society by properly and explicitly juridical statutes can [26] be associated only with difficulty with Jesus as Redeemer, the Crucified and Risen. I said earlier that for this traditional ecclesiology it is basically irrelevant whether Jesus said any of these words of institution as the pre-Easter Jesus (who, for us today, did not from the outset expect the failure of the cross) or as the Risen One. The conception of the Church in fundamental theology as, we might say, a sociological factor, established by Jesus' words of institution, understood juridically, and an ecclesiology which, in Paul's words, regards the Church as the mystical body of Christ, or (as we might express it today) as the basic sacrament of salvation, or (as we could also say) as the enduring presence of the salvific deed of Jesus Christ: these two conceptions (that is, the sociological ecclesiology of fundamental theology and the properly soteriological dogmatic ecclesiology) were formerly not expressly separated, but in fact existed side by side, basically unreconciled and unconsidered in their duality.

Today an ecclesiology of this kind as a part of fundamental theology (as I have just attempted to explain it, if only very briefly) of course presents extraordinarily serious difficulties. It was in fact simply taken for granted in classical fundamental theology up to the 1950s, as we can see by looking up H. Dieckmann or other fundamental theologians. The problems arising from this approach to Jesus' institution of the Church became clear as such sixty or seventy years ago, in the modernist period. But, as things go, it is not surprising that it takes some time and occasionally too long before such problems are faced and not simply pushed aside in a premature conservative reaction, but really admitted, worked out, and surmounted. Hence (at least it seems so to me) we can say in all modesty and cautiously that Catholic ecclesiology needed fifty or sixty years to master to some degree the ecclesiological problems in Catholicism (we are leaving Protestantism aside at present for practical reasons) as they were brought to light by modernism.

What, then, were the difficulties brought to light here? An important fundamental theological problem which, as I said, was so to speak swept under the carpet and not really faced at the time of Pius X by Lamentabili and Pascendi was, of course, Jesus' imminent expectation. Jesus, it was said, expected (without indicating a precise time) the early advent of the eschatological, definitive kingdom of God in his own generation, and in view of this imminent expectation [27] could not have intended to institute a Church. With the world coming to an end in a few years, who would begin to organize a Church which would be pointless and without any function? All that remained was the early approach of the Last Day, the kingdom of God, the judgment, perhaps the salvific and redeeming judgment of God's mercy. But since, as it was claimed, Jesus was mistaken in his imminent expectation, the Church did come into existence, not however from him, not by his intention. What happened was that this imminent expectation gradually waned and from the community of disciples who believed in him as the Risen One there developed in practice slowly in the course of history what came to be called the Church. Whether this happened more quickly or slowly in one place than in another was regarded as a secondary question and not urgent here and now.

The first problem, then, raised by historical-critical exegesis in regard to the traditional understanding of the Church as instituted by Jesus is that of his expectation of the imminent end of the world. A second problem, among others which could certainly be mentioned but which I am leaving aside at present, is the fact that the Church in New Testament times in Judaistic and Hellenistic areas or elsewhere does not present the image of something absolutely fully constructed as it is described in traditional ecclesiology as the institution of Jesus. Thus it is said that in the early Church, in addition to Paul, there might perhaps be discovered somewhere a Peter, but not a pope; that in the first Church of Pauline times there were apparently the most diverse possibilities of a community organization existing alongside one another and formed in accordance with the different sociological conditions present in the Judaistic or Hellenistic areas or elsewhere. It is said that Catholic ecclesiology is episcopal and papal in character and this episcopal and papal structure is explained as a structure instituted by Jesus Christ himself, permanent and unchangeable by divine right –that is how we Catholics expressed it at the time. But within New Testament times it is possible to discover any structure of this kind at most only in its quite modest beginnings. Can we then (and this is the problem) speak at all of Jesus 'instituting' a Church?

Before attempting to answer these questions, I would like to say that I have no doubt that with the pre-Easter Jesus and the group of disciples gathered around him there were already the rudiments of a [28] certain sociality, of a sociological organization, that Peter had already been given a prominent position by Jesus, and so on; that Jesus and his group of disciples did not secede as a Church from Israel and its covenant, but nevertheless had already something of a sociological structure. Of course, I have no wish to obscure or deny these things in the second part of the present essay, but they could be dealt with more precisely only by an exegete or a biblical theologian and I neither can nor will play that role here. The problem facing us in the light of Jesus' imminent expectation and of the appearance of the communities in New Testament times is that Jesus does not seem to have instituted a Church. Despite the Church's radical opposition to modernistic ecclesiology at the time of Pius X and even subsequently, the situation today is such that, for example, Hans Küng can uninhibitedly and, I would like to say, with a sincerity which cannot now be denied or concealed declare that Jesus did not institute a Church. The fact that Küng nevertheless regards the Church as meaningful, necessary, etc., is a different question which must not be obscured by my reference to his statement that Jesus did not institute a Church.

What could I recommend here (without claiming any special competence) as a suitable approach to a solution of this question of the institution of the Church? Again, it is possible only to make a few suggestions.

First of all it is of course obvious that, although the theme attracts me, I cannot here and now in this connection deal with the problem of Jesus' imminent expectation as such. If Jesus expected the advent of God's eschatological kingdom, was he 'mistaken' or can this qualification of his opinion and teaching be rightly avoided? What remains concretely that is absolutely right, still radically important and valid even today, about such an imminent expectation, when we must now obviously admit without hesitation that two thousand years have passed since Jesus' time and the world has not yet been transformed in the fire of God's anger into God's eternal kingdom? These again are of course questions into which I cannot enter here. I mean that (obviously unlike what happened in the time of Pius X) we must admit impartially, sincerely, realistically, and clearly that with Jesus there was a chronological imminent expectation which, as he 'imagined' it and expressed it in words, was not fulfilled. But this is far from saying (I cannot now develop this point) that we ought for [29] this reason to admit that within his horizon of understanding, etc., he was mistaken. If however someone were to say just this, it would not be heresy, but essentially a wrong expression which (without wanting to leave anything obscure) can and should be completely avoided, since behind it is an existentially false notion of truth. But I cannot now discuss this further. And obviously it is of decisive importance (from the nature of the case we shall return to this question anyway with our actual offer of a solution) that there is certainly contained in this imminent expectation of Jesus something that is absolutely essential and enduring, something that even today is of absolute importance for faith for all of us.

Our real problem, however, and our real theme is the question: What can we say and how can we speak of an institution of the Church by Jesus or its provenance from him, if and although he proclaimed this imminence of the kingdom of God? Although Hans Küng might perhaps charge me with the dubious tactic of coming to an arrangement, I would like to ask now if there are circumstances in which I can do without the term 'institution' and yet see what is meant by this traditional term and what it is intended to maintain as a matter of faith better and more straightforwardly and nevertheless honestly in the term 'provenance'? The term 'institution', if understood in its varied and possibly analogous usage, need not be synonymous with the description of the juridical organization of a society. Admittedly, the latter is the kind of institution of which we generally and instinctively think when it is said that Jesus instituted the Church, although it is not a conception that could easily be upheld today in face of the critique of historical-critical biblical scholarship. In order, therefore, to maintain what the Church has always said and taught (in asserting that the Church was instituted by Jesus), it is sufficient, I would say, not to replace this term, but at least to interpret it in the sense of 'provenance'.

If something originates from something else in a really understandably practicable way, if reality a necessarily involves reality b (this must of course be shown to be the case), it can be said either that b is 'instituted' by a or that b quite clearly 'comes from' a. This however is merely a preliminary terminological observation.

After this terminological observation, I now come directly to what is implied in the title of this article. The Church comes from the death and resurrection of Jesus as part of the eschatological permanence [30] of the Crucified and Rise One. This is more or less the thesis I am now trying to make to some degree intelligible.

To speak about the redemptive historical, eschatological meaning of the death and resurrection of Jesus is, of course, to touch on a theme that in itself is extraordinarily difficult, mysterious, profound, differentiated (more so than can be made clear here). Nor can I at this point deal with questions like those of whether Jesus actually rose or how he himself, the historical Jesus, interpreted his own death, etc. Here, where we are attempting to reflect on the provenance of the Church from Jesus, crucified and risen, we assume the Christian-Catholic dogma and the conviction of the New Testament of the redemptive, historical, universal, and eschatological significance of Jesus Christ himself.

But if, in connection of course with our intention in these reflections, it is asked how we can state quite briefly what came about by Jesus' death and resurrection, this is what we can say: Through Jesus Christ, crucified and risen, the victorious self-communication of God, established by God himself, has been manifested as victorious, as eschatological, as definitively final.

The fact that God loves the world from the very beginning despite all sin, that this God with his grace is always from the beginning and everywhere in the history of the world and humanity the innermost dynamism, the innermost entelechy of this world, driving on this whole, perhaps two-million-year-old history of humanity toward that immediacy of God which we call the beatific vision – all this was really something not known so clearly before the time of Jesus, but even then was the internal structure and dynamism of this world history. From the very outset God himself with his own glory had always been established in the world as power, source, and goal, in the form of an offer to the world's freedom. In relation to the world, God is not merely Creator in the sense of placing as it were something different from himself in the empty space of nothingness surrounding God, not merely keeping this distinct reality, as we might say, at an absolute distance, although he remains Creator and Legislator; but God takes this other world, creatively produced by him, in what we call grace and glory, into his own splendour. He gives us, his creatures, not only something he creates as distinct from himself; but he gives himself to this creature, at least he offers himself as gift to the history of freedom of this humanity. But, in the light of this [31] self-offering of God to man's freedom and in the light of the ambivalence of all creaturely freedom, the fate of mankind, the end of history, always remains open; the concrete outcome remains uncertain.

Whether this tremendous offer (in which God gives, not something, but himself) is accepted or rejected, remains for the time being an open question. And all the terror of world history, all the sense that an Augustine had of this massa damnata of a world history – none of this seems to suggest from the outset that this tremendous, final, unsurpassable height of the history of humanity which plunges into the glory of God himself is actually scaled by man as one and whole. Where, then, does Jesus Christ come in? What we call the preaching of the kingdom of God, what with Paul we know as justification not by the works of the law but by grace, what is proclaimed in John as the descent of the light into the darkness of this world, really means nothing other than this: that through the death and resurrection of Jesus this actually ambivalent salvation history in acceptance or rejection of God's self-offering does in fact have a definitively good outcome.

All this of course is far from making anything clear about the fate of each individual, but what it does imply is something wholly unparalleled, something not at all obvious, which is actually left to God's freedom and man's: that this appalling, terrible history, always, as it were, hurtling down into the abyss of death and sin, nevertheless, by the power of God's grace, has in fact a positive outcome. Jesus (if I may put it in this way) enters into solidarity on the one hand unambiguously with God and is aware of himself in an indestructible unity with him whom he calls his Father and this same Jesus enters into solidarity on the other hand unambiguously and indisputably with human beings, with sinners, with wastrels, and hence, as from the outset (sustaining his conviction even throughout his failure), he can scarcely do anything but reject an alternative of deciding either for God or for men and must say: No, this pitiful humanity is victorious, not only by way of offer but by way of real success, it is a humanity victoriously saved by God, loved into God's own glory.

This is then definitively sealed by what we call the resurrection. This Jesus, crucified and risen, is therefore the permanent promise of God himself to the world, not merely in the offer, but in factually [32] definitive victory. This the crucified and risen Jesus can be only if and insofar as this so victorious self-offering of God is permanently present in the world.

From this standpoint we can perhaps even say in a completely positive, albeit not in an exclusive sense, with the exegete Willi Marxsen, that Jesus must rise into the faith of those who believe in him. Not in the sense that he exists only in that faith; but if and insofar as there is not a community of faith, believing in Jesus as crucified and risen, as vindicated Son of God, as the eschatologically unsurpassable, definitive prophet (or however it is expressed), if there is not such a community of faith as permanent presence of this self-communication of God present in history and now victorious over the world, then this very Jesus does not exist at all as God's self-promise to the world.

The Church as eschatologically definitive and nevertheless historical, as a community of faith, is the permanent presence precisely of this eschatological and eschatologically victorious self-promise of God to the world in Jesus Christ. And he is what he is only if this community of faith is always there in the world, to make sure that he remains historically as God's eschatological promise to the world. In what numbers the Church exists or will exist is quite another question. In the last resort, the Church as 'sacrament' of the world's salvation, as the 'primordial baptism' of the world, is not tied to any particular size or sociological power.

All this of course is only by way of suggestion. But at least the implication is clear that from Jesus, crucified and risen, there is a provenance of the Church, which as such a community of faith is itself constitutive of the reality of Jesus and is consequently necessary as such. He would not be what he is if there were no such Church. His proclamation that God's salvation is now irreversibly present in the world would not exist at all if the Church were not present as the enduring community always upholding this proclamation in the world. If Jesus is not reduced to a preacher of morality or a revivalist, doing no more than making statements which might perhaps not have been made without him but which anyway can easily be approved and understood; if Jesus is not regarded as a preacher of morality or a revivalist talking about a kind of humanitarianism that depends for its realization on man's freedom and arbitrary choice; if we believe in God and know who God is, and are [33] convinced by faith that this absolute God in his absoluteness, unapproachability, and incomprehensibility has promised himself as himself definitively to the world as its very own salvation, then I think it is clear that this has happened only in Jesus, crucified and risen, and that consequently the Church really exists even now as the permanence of this historically perceptible, eschatologically irreversible self-promise of God.

It might be claimed that what I have just said is all very fine, that a normal Christian, at any rate a devout Protestant who believes in Christ, would not deny it; in this respect at least Catholics and Protestants could certainly agree. But, it might be said, the concrete structure of this eschatologically invincible, enduring community of faith is still not clear. It might be said that if the Crucified and Risen One exists historically as God's irreversible self-promise in the world this promise must obviously remain and there must be a community of faith; but how this is canonically organized is quite a different question; things do not have to proceed (it might be added) episcopally or papally in this Church; it might be said that even according to the New Testament the most diverse sociological organizations of such a community of faith are equally justified and have in fact existed; the claim of the Roman Catholic Church to be the sole legitimate organization of this community of faith of a juridically sociological character must be rejected.

Despite what has just been said about the provenance of the community of faith from Jesus, crucified and risen, we have here undoubtedly a very difficult problem that cannot be solved today as simply as it was formerly solved in traditional fundamental theology.

According to this theology, Jesus chose twelve apostles, thereby instituting the episcopate; when he took Peter from this group, he appointed the first pope. Consequently the problem arises as to how this Peter can be regarded as the first pope (even though he appears here and there in the New Testament to have a certain, even theological, importance) since he seems to have played practically no part in the Pauline communities. Why, it might be asked, did James not get a chance to be a kind of caliph of the community of disciples? Why is this episcopal constitution (which first appears as explicitly developed with Ignatius of Antioch and, in the third century, with Cyprian and others) something that not only can but must be? Why, as it might be formulated with traditional ecclesiology, are such [34] constitutional structures belonging to the later period of Jesus' community of faith really juris divini, of divine law, instituted by Jesus Christ himself?

To all this, as I have already ventured to suggest, there appear to be a number of objections. But I would like now to suggest that there is certainly something like a divine law that comes to be, that can come to be. What then is the traditional teaching, stated also in Vatican II in Lumen Gentium, on the ius divinum of the papal primacy and the episcopal constitution, that is, of the monarchical episcopate?

In the first place this teaching states simply that such a structure is binding on the Church of the present time and also of the future and cannot be abolished by it. If we admit this, what is concretely practical about the teaching on ius divinum has already been grasped in its essentials. But then it can also be asked whether such a ius divinum must always have been clearly directly palpable, even in apostolic times. I ask: Must it always have been so clearly palpable as irreversibly binding? And I would answer that this is not necessary. To dispute such a necessity, such an explicit and formal palpability, such a ius divinum, is not to deny that these modern constitutional structures of the Church became perceptible more or less slowly (if we recall the First Letter of Clement or Ignatius of Antioch's theology of the Church at the turn of the first century) and then only in later history were increasingly clearly considered and in particular set up by the Church as permanently binding.

In order to make that intelligible I want to say that any history of one and the same reality follows a single track and that such a reality can be collective or individual. In both cases, in the light of a really humanly authentic anthropology, in principle it is quite possible to explain how in the course of a history such a collective or individual reality (a single individual or a collective society that is, however, essentially consolidated into a permanent unity) makes decisions on which it cannot go back and which bind it for later times; in other words, the idea of an historically free act of institution does not in any way imply that this free decision, because freely made, could also be revoked at will, that it remains permanently at the free disposal of the agency that made the decision. The history of freedom, as itself free, also follows a single track, creates what is permanently binding, what can be eliminated only by culpable rejection (if [35] at all), since freedom in the last resort is the institution not of what is momentarily chosen but of what is irrevocable. This need not happen, of course, always and in every case, but in principle it is part of the true nature of a history of freedom.

Someone who has been married can perhaps get a divorce, but this cannot alter the fact that two people were married to one another as a permanent reality, binding for eternity. If I have followed a certain calling for forty years, I simply cannot revise my original, free decision in such a way, as to be able to start again from the beginning at the exact point from which I started out forty years ago. Putting it very simply, history follows a single track, it is a kind of one-way street on which historically irreversible decisions are continually happening. On this one-way street, made up of historically free decisions, it is fundamentally impossible to turn back and start out again from this earlier point in a quite different direction, at least not if we assume that such decisions were admittedly not necessarily made to be binding in the light of the former situation, but are binding as corresponding to the beginning, which is the permanent law of the whole route.

In the light of these very simple reflections, I would say that I can imagine without more ado that the history of the Church at least during apostolic times saw decisions made about its sociological structures which, even though not coercive, were in accordance with its original and already theologically interpreted nature and cannot be reversed. And such historical decisions – which continue to be developed in a forward direction, but cannot really be simply abolished (with the Church returning as it were to an earlier stage of its history) as far as the Church's concrete sociological structure is concerned – in the sense of being irreversible, at least in their conformity with its beginning, can certainly be regarded as ius divinum. Whether such free decisions juris divini are still conceivable or not after apostolic times, is a question that can be left open here.

We might venture to say that the Church in apostolic times, from the fetal stage, so to speak, of its first origin, had certainly the right and duty to organize itself, to articulate itself, in a more concretely sociological way and at about the end of apostolic times did in fact acquire a constitution which, even though rudimentary, was nevertheless perceptible: a constitution which we describe today as Catholic, as of divine law, and with reference to which we deny the [36] Church any possibility of changing these ultimate constitutional structures of divine law. This need not imply that the decision in apostolic times in regard to a constitution must itself necessarily be based on an explicit will of Jesus to institute a Church, expressly stated in propositions. This, I think, cannot be proved and, even if we postulated theologically such explicit words of institution by Jesus, it would be useless from the standpoint of fundamental theology. On the other hand, I think we can and must regard such free decisions in apostolic times (a period which must not be unduly shortened, as is evident with the formation of the canon and the inclusion of later books) as wholly of divine law, without ascribing them to a verbally explicit will of Jesus to institute a Church. Such irreversible decisions, obviously in accordance with the essential nature and origin of the Church as Jesus' community of faith, cannot, it is true, be deduced juridically from certain historically palpable words of Jesus; but this is not necessary, they can still be regarded as constitutional structures of the Church which are of divine law in the sense explained.

They correspond to the institution or to the origin of the Church and as historical decisions they are authorized by the concrete historical situations into which the Church entered and had to enter. This, I think, is really all that is necessary.

Looking at the matter in this way, it also becomes clear that the Church's future is an open future. That is, if even divine law in the Church (the ultimate constitutional structures of the Church which rightly claim to be derived from Jesus) has a real history and, obviously, if this history, in which the Church lives and in the light of which it must assert itself and make its decisions in any particular situation, always continues, it must naturally be assumed that the Church as such in its concrete appearance (without abandoning the divine law which has accrued to it in history and without denying or obscuring its provenance from Jesus Christ, crucified and risen) still has before it an open and quite unpredictable history.

What the Church will look like in the year 2000 or 2500; whether the pope will then be in Rome, or somewhere else; whether there will still be all the bureaucratic machinery that we see and accept today in Rome and under which we perhaps groan; whether perhaps many other things of which we have no idea today will then be taken; for granted; whether the Church will perhaps learn suddenly or [37] slowly that women, too, can be holders of the priestly office; whether it will learn slowly that an academic training for the priest (despite all the respect I have for it as a former teacher) is not perhaps so absolutely necessary as we imagine today; whether it will perhaps become much clearer that leaders of a basic community, themselves emerging charismatically from the base, will also have sacramental approbation from above, and so on and so on: to all these, and to many other perhaps more important questions which we can regard as open, we cannot expect to find an answer purely deductively from theological principles or solely from ancient tradition.

From the very nature of the Church, which is an historical factor and whose ius divinum even has a historicity, the possibilities to be expected in all these things are endless. If in such transitional phases of Church history progress is too slow for some and too rapid for others, if in these transitional phases various things seem to be becoming obscure and uncertain, if then some people moan about the insecurity of the faithful, these feelings certainly need not be wholly wrong or stupid; it is a question of the phenomena of transition and of growth, which simply cannot be avoided in a real and genuine history.

From the time of Jesus, crucified and risen, to that of the Church today vast historical developments and transformations have taken place. These should be admitted without prejudice and without assuming, for instance, that Peter, when he heard the words subsequently recorded in Matthew 16, thought of himself as the first pope with a few hundred other popes coming after him and ruling in Rome with the aid of a complicated Curia. Such an idea could never have crossed Peter's mind. Nor did Paul rack his brain about leaving behind a collective or single person to rule a community; the pastoral Letters reflect the conditions of a later period.

The Church is always in history, always in a one-way history in which it never loses its legitimate past; and in this unpredictable, dark history of suffering the Church always comes from Jesus Christ, crucified and risen. Because, however, it is precisely sociologically organized, it testifies that God so loved the world that his love does not fail even as a result of our sin, but that, at least as far as humanity as a whole is concerned, he, the God of the grace that is victorious, not from us, but from God, prevails in the world.

[38] This simple, straightforward message is simultaneously the most obvious, most mysterious, and most tremendous. That God himself is the ultimate content, the ultimate dynamism, the ultimate goal, definitively of this miserable finite creature, really not only in the plan but in the end result: this is something known only by looking to the risen Christ. That this salvation also actually prevails through him is the message of Christianity, a message that really exists nowhere else. And so that this message will always remain present in the world the Church is there; without it this message would not be definitive and final. Consequently, despite all its historicity and also despite all the historicity of what is called its divine constitutional law, the Church really has its origin in Jesus Christ, crucified and risen.

BRIEF THEOLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS ON THE 'STATE OF FALLEN NATURE'

I propose to offer here a few somewhat arbitrarily selected observations on the term 'state of fallen nature' (status naturae lapsae). The reason for the arbitrariness of the selection lies in the fact that a theologically adequate interpretation of the term would be possible only within the framework of a complete theology of the 'states' of man. In these brief observations, of course, it is not possible to give references to the sources of this theology and to the history of this term. Even so some discussion of the problems involved in these venerable elements of theological tradition may perhaps be useful.

We shall assume a certain acquaintance with the scholastic terminology used in this connection: pure nature, elevated nature, fallen nature, nature elevated and restored (natura pura, natura elevata, natura lapsa, natura elevata et reformata). The basis for this distinction is the Catholic teaching that justifying, deifying 'grace' as pledge of the intuitive vision of God (the state of complete union with God and of orientation to eternal life) is not due to man, not only if and because he is a sinner (through original or personal sin), but even prior to this insofar as the state of salvation is not unmerited in the same way as being created by God's free choice is unmerited. For a Catholic theology the created human being faces God and receives his definitive salvation and the orientation it implies of his existence toward this eternal salvation in the vision of God as free unmerited love of God, which in itself God could refuse man even though the latter already exists as a created being. If it is also assumed that man by this free decision can reject God's offer of himself [40] and thus become a sinner; if furthermore it is assumed that God's offer of himself in forgiveness to the sinner as such implies a far more radical unmeritedness of grace than its unmeritedness on the part of the created human being as such; and if again it is assumed that this second and more radical character of unmeritedness is already involved in the grace of every human being by the very fact that the first human being sinned in a solidarity of weal and woe of the community of mankind, then all the above-mentioned distinctions in man's nature are really quite obvious. 'Nature' means man's reality as unity of mind and matter in self-transcendence toward God, insofar as this nature is the recipient of God's self-offering that, on the one hand, perfects man in deification and yet, on the other hand, is in no way due to this nature. 'Fallen nature' means the reality of man insofar as he is unworthy of God's gracious self-offering (as a result of 'original sin' alone or also of his personal sin) and in a certain sense has added a new and more radical unmeritedness to the unmeritedness of deifying grace as such. 'Nature elevated and restored' is man insofar as by God's forgiving grace (despite his previous sinfulness in the form of personal sin) and as a result of his free acceptance of grace he possesses a positive orientation to his own eternal goal, the vision of God.

At first sight then the idea of fallen nature seems to be clear. In Adam mankind fell. As a result of this sin on the part of the first human being, mankind does not possess the grace of deification through God's self-communication which is indeed unmerited but which it nevertheless requires; it is sinful. Humanity is fallen. The traditional view in Catholic theology is that each individual human being (with the exception of Jesus and the 'immaculately conceived' mother of Jesus) possesses this sinfulness before he enters by baptism (and/or by the free acceptance of grace in faith, hope, and love) into possession (the 'state') of sanctifying grace. 'Fallen nature' is a description of man insofar as he culpably lacks possession of sanctifying grace. Certainly it must be added that this state of man as culpably lacking grace (which is, properly speaking, the essence of being fallen) includes other peculiarities which determine the reality of man even when he has again obtained divine grace by justification: that is, he is in the state of nature fallen and healed. For the original justice of 'paradise' was associated with a freedom from the necessity of dying, from concupiscence, from suffering and pain, [41] from ignorance and error. But these paradisiacal gifts are not returned to man when he enters, as a result of justification, the state of nature fallen and healed. In that sense then, the justified human being remains in the state of fallen nature, even though this necessity of dying, concupiscence, and involvement in suffering does not have the character of 'punishment for sin' properly so-called but provides the dimension (in itself 'natural' and 'innocent') within which man is now expected to work out his salvation.

It cannot be denied however that there are many obscurities attached to this term 'fallen nature' which make it very difficult for us to appreciate its meaning today. In what follows we shall deal with these problems, without raising doubts about the fundamental justification of the term.

In our discussion of the problems, for the time being we shall pass over the question of whether and how the idea must or must not be maintained today of a paradisiacal state of freedom from death, concupiscence, and suffering preceding chronologically the state of fallen nature. The author has dealt with this question elsewhere[1] and has no wish to take it up again, at least for the time being.

Classical Lutheran theology regarded the essence of original sin and consequently also of fallen nature as consisting in concupiscence, the stirrings of which are opposed to the law of God and sinful, so that persistent concupiscence always makes man a sinner and he therefore remains a sinner even when he is justified by faith in God's forgiving grace: simul justus et peccator. The opposing declaration of the Council of Trent starts out from the assumption that the stirrings of concupiscence, unless ratified by man's free will, are not sin (since the justified person – who, as Paul says, is in Christ Jesus – is not condemned). For this reason concupiscence as such cannot constitute the real nature of original sin. The essence of original sin is therefore to be sought in the lack of justifying, sanctifying grace, while concupiscence is merely a consequence (not in itself sinful) of the loss of paradisiacal righteousness, which can remain in us without our being for that reason alone sinners in the proper sense of the term.

In this way, according to Catholic theology, original sin and consequently the state of fallen nature are transferred to a dimension [42] which at least is not as immediately accessible to existential and religious experience as the dimension of concupiscence, which is in fact directly experienced. Original sinfulness here seems to become a mere theological postulate. All that man directly experiences of himself seems to be good: his intellectuality and freedom in which (since this is how he can know God) he has a positive relationship to God; his corporality, involving a 'natural' and as such innocent concupiscence which, after all, is nothing but the ambivalence of the material of freedom that must continually be processed by the history of this freedom. From this standpoint we can understand the axiom of at least one school in Catholic theology that has always remained undisturbed: namely, that fallen nature is distinct from pure nature only in the way that a person who has been robbed of his clothes differs from one who is naked from the start. If we leave aside the question whether and how the obligation and necessity (never, of course, denied in Catholic theology) of possessing justifying supernatural grace must work out empirically in someone who is not actually justified but in the state of fallen nature, what is really involved in such a view of fallen nature (if not commanded, then at least commended by Trent) is modern optimism as a whole from the time of humanism: man is free and good and the fallenness bound up with his natural being is understood in such a way that it does not infringe the goodness of this natural being. Man's nature as experienced is good and only good, even though it has the obligation of being open to deification by God's gracious self-communication. In this conception of fallen nature originating at Trent the fallenness of this nature properly consists only in the fact that this nature originally ('in paradise') possessed a grace-given perfection that it can now regain only in justification by baptism or by subjective conversion to the God of grace in faith, hope, and love.

Before we continue our investigation of these problems, a very different aspect of the meaning of fallen nature must be made clear. In all these questions Catholic theology in practice works with the model of infant baptism. The unbaptized child is regarded purely and simply as an originally sinful, unjustified human being; at the moment of baptism this human being is changed by the 'infusion' of sanctifying grace from a sinner into a justified, sanctified human being. Thus, from the very outset, an element of time enters into the notion of fallen nature. This does not mean simply that there would [43] be no such thing as fallen nature if the sin of the first human being, understood as a particular historical event, had not occurred. An element of time is involved in the notion of fallen nature also insofar as this nature is regarded as ceasing to be fallen at the moment of baptism or of a subjective justification seen as happening at a point in time and at that point transformed into a nature fallen and restored, in which the original fallenness becomes perceptible only through the persistence of concupiscence and the absence of other preternatural gifts. In any case, within the life of the individual person, fallen nature as such belongs only to a certain period of time in that person's history and ceases with his justification. It is true that this theology is aware of the fact that God's universal salvific will embraces every human being always and everywhere; but in a sense it penetrates into the life of a human being only at a certain point in time, while his fallenness 'in Adam' determined him inwardly from the very beginning, making him a fallen nature; nature restored and elevated comes chronologically after fallen nature.

In the traditional textbook notion of fallen nature in Catholic theology then, we find an odd tension. This fallen nature in virtue of its temporality is a highly empirical factor: in the conception suggested by Trent, man before baptism is a sinner, deprived of sanctifying grace, under the power of the devil; after baptism he is justified and sanctified, divine grace has taken possession of him, is imparted to him after he had previously been without grace. At the same time in post-Tridentine theology this fallen nature is a very abstract transexistential factor, which as such cannot be experienced existentially at all and can become known only by theological indoctrination from outside, since man can experience himself directly only as good, personal-intellectual nature with concupiscence that in itself is inculpable, even though it carries with it also danger and struggle.

With all respect then for the Council of Trent and also recognizing that not everything implied in the textbook notion of fallen nature is ipso facto part of the Council's binding teaching, it may be said that the traditional notion does not possess all the clarity and internal homogeneity that might be desired. It suggests a temporality of salvation history prior to the temporality involved in freedom and its history. The unbaptized baby and the baptized baby (or the same child before and after its baptism) are distinct from each other as one human being under the power of the devil and another in the loving [44] embrace of the power of God's sanctifying grace. This enormous difference, producing in the one an objective damnation (even if described as limbo) and in the other eternal bliss, is at the same time a difference which, as a theological postulate and as object of indoctrination from outside, lies beyond human experience in freedom and action. If the internal tensions in the notion of fallen are thus elucidated, this is not to deny the existence of theorems within traditional theology as a whole and in certain schools which make these internal tensions less tangible or (if they are fully developed) remove them all together. But they persist in the average textbook notion of fallen nature, even though (particularly as a result of a certain lack of theological interest) they do not disturb the normal theological consumer very much. Such a calm in the field of theology is still far from being a sign that the contentedly accepted answers to theological questions are correct or adequate. The calm is often merely a sign of theological wariness and lack of interest, since people do not understand and cannot show that these old problems have a fundamental significance and importance even today for modern man's self-understanding.

We are attempting, under modern perspectives and assumptions and with the aid of the conceptual equipment at our disposal, to say what is meant by the state of fallen nature and also what importance it has for a modern anthropology. With such a description, of course, problems arise as to how one statement or another is at the same time compatible with the dogmas of the Church's magisterium, which of course we have no wish to dispute or obscure. Here, in a brief essay, it is impossible expressly to examine all these problems. But the author may perhaps not be too presumptuous in thinking that he sees the problems and knows an answer to them, even if it cannot be presented here.

There really is something that can be called status or 'state' in anthropology of a philosophical or theological character. 'State' means realities connected with man that, on the one hand, are not simply part of man's metaphysical, transcendentally necessary nature and, on the other hand, are not odd, partial realities of man, but determine him as a whole in all his particular realities. They determine man always and everywhere. If there is about man a definiteness of this kind which, on the one hand, does not belong to his metaphysical, transcendentally necessary and enduring nature and, [45] on the other hand, always and everywhere determines and binds this very nature, then this determination must be grounded either in God's free disposal of this nature or (and purely conceptually this seems at first an obscure and difficult hypothesis) in a free decision of man or of men, a decision which occurred 'at the beginning' of the history of all mankind in its entirety in such a way as to be and remain the factor determining the situation for all subsequent history. That this second conceivable possibility has in fact been realized (that is, is really also actually possible) can, of course, be known only from mankind's experience of salvation history. 'State' as concrete and inescapable situation for freedom in salvation history is therefore founded on God's and man's situation-creative freedom at the beginning. This means, of course, that we have developed theologically in terms of salvation history a concept of state that ought to be distinguished more precisely from other concepts expressed by the term 'state'. But we cannot enter further into this question here.

This state of man is originally grounded in God's free will in which the latter offers himself with his very own uncreated reality to the freedom of his intellectual creatures as meaning, dynamisms, and goal of man. Insofar as this free self-offering of God to his intellectual creature means always and everywhere the most radical opportunity and thus the most radical obligation for man, insofar as it not only hovers over man as an ideal possibility but is man's most real and innermost possibility (constituting also the possibility of the free acceptance of this self-communication of God), this freedom of love in which God gives himself to man really establishes fundamentally the state of man. It is really 'state', since it is not simply involved in the very nature of man who as already really conceived and existing must welcome the love of God imparting God himself as free grace that is not owing to him. It is really 'state' in the most fundamental sense, since man with his freedom can never get away from the situation that really determines him in which God with his infinite reality offers himself to man freely and lovingly and at the same time gives man the opportunity freely to accept this offer.

The state of elevated nature is man's most fundamental determination. It is not part of his nature, not because it is not internal to him, but because God's personal love in the light of God's own nature is always unmerited, must in fact be freedom and love. It is [46] also deeply implanted in man, since (as distinct from the usual perspective in textbook theology from the Middle Ages onwards) the will of God for his own self-externalizing self-communication can certainly be regarded as the actual ground of creation and not as the will for a kind of subsequent elevation of the reality created by God. This state is not lost by man's sin and God's will for this state (assuming the existence of sin in the world) is the cause and not the result of God's salvific action in the world to overcome sin. This state is unconditional and cannot be abolished by sin. Man's freedom can sinfully say no to this state but cannot abolish it any more than man's freedom can abolish his nature and existence by saying no to them. To put it more clearly: this state does not hover above the reality of the world and man as an ideal postulate, which could be known only by a verbal communication from outside, from God, but is established by God's self-communication, which as a real offer to freedom is always and everywhere a real existential (that is, a state) of man, even though, through this self-communication of God, grace exists in the infant merely as an offer, in the mature person either as accepted (as in justification) or, in the sinner, as rejected. The state of elevated nature is really the unavoidable situation of man's freedom from which he can never escape.

He learns of this state as a result of a complex of experiences (in the last resort of a transcendental character) which must now be analyzed a little more closely. In this analysis it is not assumed that it could be made sufficiently clear always and everywhere by a single individual in the privacy of his life. The original and primary analysis takes place in the experience of the salvation history of mankind as a whole, culminating in the experience of Jesus Christ (the genitive is subjective and objective). Secondarily this experience is then reflected and interpreted in theology. This interpretation again appeals to the experience of the individual human being and confronts him with the question as to whether and how far in the history of his individual experience he can discover what this analysis in terms of salvation history and theology says about man.

All this is assumed here when we attempt to describe the experience of man's nature as elevated by God's self-communication offered always and everywhere. Man is the being with a radically unlimited transcendentality. But this is experienced de facto, not only as the condition of the possibility of a cognitive and active engagement [47] with the categorial realities of the world, but also as endowed with the promise of an infinite fulfillment by God himself. If our transcendentality reaches out, not only to one object or another but also in a kind of paroxysm of absolute hope to the original unlimited unity of all that is, then (whether it can reflect on this or not) it is already sustained by God's self-communication, which we usually describe as sanctifying grace and which, at least in the form of an offer, exists always and everywhere. Insofar as this radical transcendentality of the human mind in knowledge and freedom is in fact the radicalness of a personal spirit, the sustaining ground of this radicalness – God himself – is experienced (reflectively or not) as freedom and love. Grace is experienced always and everywhere in man's existence. This proposition has no postulatory or mythological overtones if this experience is seen in the radicalness of man's transcendentality, a transcendentality that is not merely realized and understood as the condition of man's being-in-the-world, but (as given by God) implies the assurance in faith and hope (at least as an offer to free self-understanding) of finally reaching God himself, of being filled with the reality of God in himself. Man's ineluctable status-assuring self-understanding (which exists even if his ultimate self-destructiveness makes him refuse to admit it) consists in the fact that (also as intelligible subject) he recognizes that he is not God and that he respects himself as the recipient of God in himself. This (already existing or accepted or freely and culpably rejected) basic experience of man is originally not an isolated 'thought' occurring only spasmodically with the aid of a difficult reflection, but is veritably man's basic experience involved prior to any reflection in all thought and action.

In practice, however, this basic experience of divine origin and consummation is oddly fragmented in man. It is made by and in a human being who experiences himself simultaneously as one who is doomed to death and as one who is unable to gather the whole of his human existence with his knowledge and impulses integrally into this experience he has of a divine consummation. He experiences a contradiction between his concupiscence and mortality on the one hand and his absolute destiny to the immediacy of God on the other. The existence of such a contradiction cannot perhaps be deduced from abstract ideas of the realities involved here, nor will there be any attempt here to maintain that the individual human being in each case for himself alone experiences the contradiction so clearly as to [48] be able theoretically to reflect on it. Of course, the contradiction also means that the two contradictory elements co-exist in one and the same person and for that very reason the contradiction really exists and can be experienced. What is involved in this contradiction is that man's state of grace, his divine origin and consummation ought 'properly' to exclude man's concupiscent situation, that is, it ought to place man's whole reality integrated and united completely at the disposal of man's freedom, in which, as empowered by God's gracious self-communication, man commits himself entirely to God. (The fact cannot be overlooked that actual death, which is not simply man's perfected self-determination as final and definitive but is also the culmination of man's incapacity to dispose of himself, is nothing but the most radical event of concupiscence in the sense in which it is understood here.)

If we really want to understand existentially and ontologically man's condition and situation, we cannot tacitly start out from the assumption that a particular state of man must either be sinful in the proper sense of the term (as habitual sin) or it must fit in consistently with the wholeness of man. Such an assumption would not only render impossible any understanding of man's 'physical evil' or lead to the conclusion that any evil of this kind can be understood always only as the consequence of moral fault in man. The contradictoriness of which we are speaking is experienced as actually existing and must therefore be conceivable. Man experiences his concupiscent distractedness and unintegratedness as something other than what must be regarded and experienced simply as obvious and innocuous, resulting from his corporality and biological origin. He feels this concupiscent condition as something that really ought not to be, when he measures this state against the claim involved in his transcendentality as radicalized by grace. In the light of this claim he cannot simply accept as justified and as a matter of course categorial realities which prevent him from realizing this infinite claim (and do not merely, as is obvious, fail to fulfill it). In the light of this claim he must protest against his concupiscent situation, and must feel (as Paul already expressed it in his Letter to the Romans) 'unhappy' about it. If this is denied or overlooked in a theory of fallen nature (because man's destiny with his transcendentality to God's immediacy is transferred to a dimension wholly beyond consciousness, where concupiscence can no longer be experienced as something [49] that ought not to be), then the doctrine of fallen nature can be regarded only as a mythological interpretation of man, as an assertion that has no place in religious experience and is only indoctrinated from outside. At the same time, of course, the question of the source of this mythological interpretation of man itself remains unanswered. In brief, man experiences at every turn a contradiction present now and always between the radicalness of the claim of his deified transcendentality and the concupiscent situation in which he must realize it. The claim aims at integrating man as a whole into his assignment to the immediacy of God; but the concupiscent situation prevents this.

In biblical terms, we have the ability and obligation to love God with our whole heart, and yet we do not succeed in this. In Catholic theological terminology this contradiction (which ought not to be) is not described in itself as 'sin', since in another (Lutheran) usage the difference has been blurred between this contradiction and the act of freedom in which in a personal sinful decision man not only does not love God with his whole heart but actually rejects him. But this legitimate usage should not be allowed to minimize the contradiction between the duty of radical love of God imposed on man and what he actually achieves in his concupiscent situation. This sort of minimizing has often happened in post-Tridentine theology, since in that theology (which paid little attention to the religious experience of devout people) this concupiscence was abstractly related only to 'pure nature' and the fact was overlooked that this concupiscence always exists in the actual human being who by grace is always and everywhere permitted and required to fulfill divine claims, who in practice is never a 'pure nature' and can never experience himself merely as such.

If we maintain and regard as justifiable by the Church's official teaching the view that neither eschatological nor protological statements are part of reports of events from past or future but are legitimate conclusions from man's self-understanding (itself drawn from his present experience, sustained by grace, and thus implying revelation), then the question arises whether and how it is possible to draw from the experience of the contradiction of which we are speaking those protological statements which in traditional theology explain this contradiction by a primordial sin at the dawn of history, or whether these protological explanations are only more or less mythological elucidations of this disintegratedness of man experienced in oneself. Was there, it might be asked, before me a sinful 'Adam' whose action was the cause of my concupiscent situation or am I myself 'Adam', without any light really being thrown on my existence by an interpretation based on a cause sought in the most distant past? It must be said that, on the one hand, a Catholic interpretation of one's own existence and the experience of that existence cannot dispense with a recourse to history and that, on the other, all that can be said about this past as the cause of one's own concupiscent situation is no more than what is yielded by the present. If it can be assumed that the contradiction experienced between man's infinite destiny and his concupiscent situation must be understood as universal and that this contradiction moreover cannot be experienced as 'normal', then at the very beginning of mankind's history there must be a culpable event of freedom that explains this universal abnormal fissure in man. This aetiology presupposes the experience existing everywhere that a decision of freedom on the part of one person affects the other person's situation of freedom. But it is then conceivable that a decision of freedom occurring at the beginning on the part of all together provoked this abnormal condition, which as such obviously does not imply any personal guilt on the part of human beings who came after that beginning, but nevertheless creates a situation which as such ought not to be and is experienced as a contradiction.

It is difficult to say exactly how the beginning of mankind's history as set up by God as Creator is related to the 'beginning' of mankind's history established by human freedom of a culpable character. These two beginnings are certainly not identical, since the divine ordering of things as such cannot be understood simply (as Barth at first maintained) as the setting up of the creature precisely as contradiction to God, nor, however, can the second 'beginning' be understood as placed at a distance of an empirically temporal character in which everything possible within a history of freedom could have happened to prevent a later sin from being understood as a universal determinant of mankind's history. Consequently, the idea of a paradise of mankind at its origin lasting for a period of time is not only scarcely compatible with modern ideas of the evolution of the biosphere and of mankind, not only rouses suspicions of a mythology no longer acceptable, but also contradicts a serious theology of the beginning. The two beginnings must be brought so close [50] to one another that a history in the usual sense of the term coming between them is inconceivable. The very first self-realization of creaturely human freedom must therefore have been a culpable act and the starting point of history. The idea of a paradise 'previously' implies the real necessity of a distinction between the two 'beginnings': origin of history from God, origin of history from sinful man (even though the establishment of this second origin can and must be conceived as an historical event in a metaphysically more abstract sense).

The idea of paradise has its legitimacy also insofar as it provides an explanation of the abnormality of the concupiscent situation in the light of a divinely given absolute claim. But in the last resort all these protological statements do no more than make man aware of the fact that he may not regard as normal the situation of his freedom between an absolute claim and the actually existing distracting possibilities, that he may not clear up this situation by settling for one side or the other of the contradiction, may not regard himself either as the subject of an absolute freedom for himself alone or as a being that can accept its concupiscent situation contentedly as a matter of course.

If concupiscence thus becomes an element of essential importance in the notion of fallen nature (before and after justification), this does not mean that concupiscence as such constitutes the real nature of original sin. But the essence of original sin will have to be understood now and in the future as the initially culpably caused absence of God's grace, sanctifying man prior to his decision of freedom: a grace that has an absolutely sanctifying quality prior to man's free decision, precisely because it is not a creaturely reality always ambivalent prior to the decision of freedom, but the self-communication of the holy God himself.

If we speak of a 'lack' of this grace, the term does not, or does not necessarily, imply that this 'lack' is chronologically prior to a (later) possession of this at first absent gift. All it means is that man, precisely as a member of this initially sinful humanity, although he ought to possess this gift, does not possess this sanctifying self-communication of God (as offer, as freely accepted, or as freely rejected). Whether he possesses this gift simply and as a matter of fact (at least in the form of a real offer) because of God's gratuitous salvific will in regard to mankind and despite the latter's initial culpability, is quite a different question. If and insofar as this 'infralapsarian' [52] salvific will of God (which cannot be denied) can certainly be regarded as equally comprehensively and concretely effective always and everywhere and is not something at first existing only in God's intentions (in other words, as equally real as the impact of the beginning on all humanity) there exists in man prior to his free decision for or against God a dialectical simultaneity of 'original sin' (as lack of a claim to sanctifying grace from the very origin of mankind) and the grace existing always and everywhere as an offer because of God's infralapsarian salvific will. Prior to his personal decision in freedom man is simul justus et peccator.

He experiences the justification offered to him in the question put to his freedom by the absolute, never-to-be-silenced claim in his existence, in the radicalness of his transcendence, the demand for God himself as such. He experiences his sinfulness by experiencing the contradiction between his concupiscent situation and his absolute claim, a claim that can never be satisfied in this situation, since the definitive acceptance of God's absolute self-offering is not possible in a situation where a person cannot use his freedom totally to commit himself to a definitive finality. This does not mean that the experience of concupiscence in face of the absolute claim of proffered grace is in identity the experience of original sin, but only that it leads ultimately to this other conclusion about original sin. For if the contradiction between concupiscence and the claim of grace is traced back protologically to a sin at the beginning and man with his concupiscence originating at that point thus learns that of himself he has no claim on God's loving self-communication, then he knows his state to be that of original sin. If this original sinfulness as an inability to claim divine grace originating in a history of sin at its beginning is clearly to be understood as merely 'analogous' to personal sin, this is no argument against these reflections. For today it is certainly a generally accepted theological conviction that original sin and personal sin are two concepts that agree only analogously.

If this is how man's condition is regarded, the classical conception of original sin (lack of sanctifying grace) can be maintained and yet (as against a post-Tridentine theory) concupiscence can be more closely and more clearly intrinsically linked with original sin. The assumption behind all this is, of course, the proposition that man's concupiscent disintegratedness (that is, the impossibility of totally integrating his whole reality into the basic decision for or against [53] God) as such contradicts a self-communication of God (sanctifying grace) offered to man's freedom, a self-offering of God to man's freedom (at least in the form of an offer) which exists always and everywhere as an existential of man. But when man experiences and accepts his supreme vocation, sustained by God's self-communication, to love God with his whole heart, to love him divinely, then he can no longer experience and accept as a matter of course his concupiscent disintegration, his inability here and now to love God with his whole heart, but must experience it as something that really ought not to be, even though this something that ought not to be is not really sin prior to any personal decision but lies at a point difficult to determine between purely prepersonal evils (physical evil) and personal fault.

If concupiscence and, consequently, fallen nature are understood in this way, it should not be overlooked that this impossibility of a pure integration of human realities into the decision of freedom for God is not to be understood as the reality and experience of a mere privatistic inwardness, but also implies a situation of human corporality and especially of sociability. Sociological disintegratedness, the impossibility of complete harmony in society, unreconciled pluralism in society in all its dimensions, are primarily wholly part of that concupiscent situation of which a theological anthropology is accustomed to speak. This theology however does not merely note the banal fact of the concupiscent situation as now (still) existing, but also explains that this fact will be removed only with the end of history, since it was so firmly planted (even though by creaturely freedom) into the very beginning of this history that it cannot be removed by this history itself, since the latter, striving dutifully for its removal (the removal of alienation, etc.), again works from and with this concupiscent situation.

In the light of such a theology of fallen nature, of its concupiscent situation, the question ought to be raised about the peculiarity of a Christian ethic: that, on the one hand, it involves the precept of an approximative and asymptotic struggling and coping with concupiscence (with alienation, etc.) and, on the other hand, it cannot proceed as if this concupiscent situation could be purely and simply removed within the course of history. But it is impossible to deal further with this question here.

CONSECRATION IN THE LIFE AND REFLECTION OF THE CHURCH

In order to anticipate at once the following reflections as a whole, I would like to say that they are meant to make clear in theological terms the fact that in the concrete order of salvation (from which no human being can escape and which extends to man's innermost a priori definitive state) there is a sanctifiedness, or what may be called a consecratedness, a sacrality, of man, present in advance as the condition of the possibility of any ecclesial-cultic consecration, even though these latter consecrations elucidate in the most diverse forms and expressions the innermost and inescapable consecratedness of man here envisaged, while manifesting and locating it in the public-sociological area of the Church. Consecrations in the ordinary sense of the term (that is, baptism, confirmation, ordination, forms of consecration generally described as sacramentals for special functions, minor orders as preparation for properly sacramental ordination, and also consecration of virgins, consecration of abbots, etc.) do not establish for the first time a person's consecratedness, as if he had previously existed in a purely profane state; they are the ecclesial-cultic manifestations of a consecratedness conferred by grace, but always existing, embracing, and sustaining man's whole existence, always and everywhere present in the light of God's salvific will as offer of God's self-communication to man's freedom. That is really all that I want to explain and substantiate in the course of this essay. In this respect I think that what must be said has also its practical consequences in the spirituality of the priest and others consecrated by a sacrament or sacramentally [58] and for the life of the Church, even though these more or less practical consequences can at most be mentioned only marginally.

In order to reach the heart of these reflections as quickly and as safely as possible, we may recall in the first place a theological datum that is certainly disputed by no one working in the field of Catholic theology: all consecrations, if they are to be meaningful and effective, are based on baptism. This (we may say, quite without prejudice) is the first basic consecration, the fundamental dedication, the fundamental initiation, which is the indispensable and necessary precondition for all other actual or conceivable consecrations in the Church. It is true that consecrations subsequent to baptism (for example, priestly ordination) in the area of the Church's sociological, public manifestation can assign to someone so consecrated tasks and powers that he would not (at least, not normally) possess without such a subsequent consecration. But this by no means alters the fact that a consecration of this kind, based on baptism, is an ecclesial-sociological expression of a particular kind, with a particular orientation, of sacramental consecratedness, of the incorporatedness and membership of a person in the Church, which in the dimension of the Church's sociological visibility is conferred only by baptism. Otherwise, in the very nature of things, it would be quite impossible to understand why all ecclesiastical tasks and functions, transmitted by other consecrations, should not be valid without being preceded by baptism.

Assuming all this, we now ask what is the position of baptism itself? Is it purely and simply the first and fundamental establishment of a person's 'consecratedness', of his admission into the dimension of the holy God and his love, in which God by 'consecrating' man imparts to the latter his own holy life? Or is baptism, albeit normally and as such necessarily, the manifestation (but an effective manifestation) of an internal consecratedness of man by grace, ontologically, existentially, and chronologically prior to baptism: a consecratedness which always and from the outset fundamentally determines man's existence, so that he simply cannot escape from this ultimate sacral sphere of his existence, even though he has either not yet reacted at all in freedom to this definitive state or exists freely in opposition to this existential established by grace?

It is the second view of baptism which we are supporting here. We maintain, then, that consecration in the diverse forms in which it [59] appears in the Church is derived from a consecratedness more fundamental than ecclesial-cultic consecration and is not purely and simply a consequence and effect of the latter. This thesis is not obvious, it seems to contradict the view (more or less taken for granted) that any possible consecratedness is simply and solely the consequence of a consecration that takes place at a definite point of time as part of the public worship of the Church. Neither can it be denied that the formularies of the Church's official teaching on the nature and effects of baptism tacitly assume that there occurs for the first time and purely and simply in baptism what is usually described as the effect of baptism: infusion of justifying and sanctifying grace and of the supernatural habits known as the theological virtues of faith, hope, and charity; remission of original sin; the transposition of man from the kingdom of darkness and evil into the kingdom of God; of love, of friendship with God; the granting of the status of a child of God, etc. (Before pursuing our problems further, in order to avoid misunderstandings it should be stressed that it is not our opinion that simply every effect ascribed to baptism exists in man even prior to baptism; it is obvious that those effects which by their very nature belong as historical and sociological factors to the visibly sociological dimension of the Church are produced only by baptism itself, although there is no need to consider here more exactly which effects of baptism are of this character: whether, for example, what we called the sacramental character conferred by baptism must be numbered among these effects.)

We claim, then, that the fundamental effects of baptism (that is, the most fundamental consecratedness of man, man's existential always and everywhere) are present even before sacramental consecration, that baptismal consecration therefore comes after and is based on the consecratedness of man which is derived from grace, that this consecratedness as ontological and existential is the ground and not originally the consequence of baptismal consecration. We hasten to observe that this does not mean that the efficacy of baptism as sacrament on this fundamental consecratedness of man need be denied, even though our thesis of course makes the elucidation of the efficacy of the sacrament of baptism on this fundamental consecratedness more difficult than it was generally considered to be in normal sacramental theology on the efficacy of the sacraments.

This thesis, whose practical consequences will be indicated only [60] at a later stage, implies, of course, a basic conception of the relationship between God and the world, of the nature of the supernatural endowment of grace and the vocation of the world and humanity to God's immediacy, of the nature of salvation history: a basic conception which, on the one hand, cannot be taken for granted in Catholic theology and whose interpretation, on the other hand, would of course go far beyond the scope of a brief essay. Hence only one or two modest observations in regard to the substantiation of this basic thesis are possible here.

How, we may ask, do we usually imagine the gracious, unmerited, and supernatural sanctification of man in the course of the history of humanity? We imagine the world, mankind and its history, first of all as a spatially and temporally extended reality of a profane character, even though created by God, into which God as distinct from the world and confronting it from outside enters at certain individual points and then acts by the revelation of the word and the communication of grace (the latter mainly through the sacraments). This is brought about by individual events coming on top of the otherwise profane course of world history, at different points, as additional to the ordinary course of things and which in principle can be individually located. These individual events produced by grace, occurring at definite points in space and time, may certainly belong together in God's intention and thus form the history of revelation and salvation as conceptually a single factor; they can also be linked together in the sociological-institutional dimension by the transmission of this successive revelation and by the religio-sociological institutions willed by God (for example, by the sociological factor of the Old Covenant and by the institution of the Church); but in the last resort this makes no difference to the traditional pattern of ideas, according to which the really constitutive events of revelation and inward sanctification by grace originally made their impact successively and from outside on a profane world and history. We think, however, that such an ideal scheme is inadequate and does not match up to the reality. God, in himself infinitely perfect and existing in glory, does indeed create in freedom a world and history absolutely distinct from himself, but he creates it from the outset as the recipient of his own self-communication by grace, in which from the very outset and always and everywhere he gives himself as the innermost dynamism of world and history and as their proper and very own goal.

What we call revelation history and salvation history is not the [61] sum total of particular interventions of God at different points from outside into an at first merely naturally created world and history, but the history (the interpretation in space and time) of a self-communication of God in free grace in which God from the very beginning established himself in the innermost centre of the world as its salvation. As seen from God's standpoint then, his gracious self-communication to the world is not to be conceived as a kind of second initiative of God in regard to a natural world created in a first initiative, but as God's free will toward a world distinct from himself as the condition of the possibility of a more fundamental free will of God to bestow himself in love to the non-divine. Salvation history and revelation history take place from the innermost centre of the world and history where God as imparting his own sacred glory has always already established himself, is already always in immediacy the dynamism, sanctification, and goal of the world. Of course, this self-communication of God, through which he is the innermost centre of world and history, is always and from the very outset understood and willed as free offer to the freedom of the creature. Consequently, through the freedom of the creature in accepting or rejecting this self-offering of God, the latter has a history: that history which we call the revelation history and salvation history of humanity. But this precisely is the history of this self-offering of God conveyed by man's freedom to man himself, even though the history of man's freedom is itself the act of the free God and of the sovereignty of his own grace. What we otherwise usually call the sanctification of the world and of the individual human being is the free acceptance by creaturely freedom of the sanctification of the world and man, which has always been present in the form of God's real self-offering as the centre of creaturely reality as a whole. World and man become holy in an existential sense through man's freedom in accepting God, since they are always also sanctified prior to this by God as origin, dynamism, and goal precisely of this history.

Once again, may we understand what we call revelation history and salvation history in this way? Once again, I think we can. I would go further and insist that we cannot think of it otherwise if we see the relationship of God and the world to one another as we must see it today: that is, so that God does not appear as a particular element in reality as a whole, as incorporated into what we regard as the whole system of reality.

Why may we think in this way today, even in the light of the [62] familiar data of traditional theology? On this, of course, only a few suggestions are possible here.

First of all, we may be permitted an allusion to Islamic theology, even though this goes beyond the scope of Christian dogmatics. Fischer-Barnicol writes, > Islam has kept its understanding of revelation free from the internal contradictions which are unavoidable when the self-communication of the eternal to the temporal is nailed firmly to the historical crossbeam, to the time sequence. Then divine mercy is subjected to temporal ideas, as if it could be imparted only in slices, in installments, more clearly from one chapter to another, and completely only at the close and not in all essentials all the time. Islam's economy of salvation does not allow for a steadily improving performance over the course of history with a final examination at the present time when an official certificate is awarded which states that the truth is now known, understood, and expressed better than it was by the generations of believers who went before us. According to the Islamic view, God has revealed himself always and in all respects completely and unrestrictedly. Never provisionally, always finally. It is taken for granted that we shall appreciate this at the end of time when the religions of the book will be discovered in their unity.[1]

We need not and cannot simply share this Islamic view. Nevertheless, it contains a profound truth which we overlook or suppress in current theology. If we understand God's self-communication to the world in the form of an offer to freedom and history as one and whole and always present and allow it as such to have a history in the history of its own free acceptance by mankind's reflection (known as history of revelation in the word, which reflection must itself, of course, be controlled by this self-communication of God) and by freedom (known as salvation history), then we have a reconciliation between God's self-communication (which by its nature cannot be understood as happening 'in slices') and a true salvation history and revelation history as reflected in the Old and the New Testament.

[63] In fact, if man's whole history of freedom is governed by a supernatural, salvific providence of God and is thus as a whole oriented to God's immediacy, if all creation from the outset is established 'in Christ' and oriented to him, then this fundamental determination of all reality cannot be understood as at first existing in the mind and intentions of God. This determination of the world and of mankind's history must be objectively established in the world itself. It is a determination that does not exist only when it is objectified by explicitly verbal revelation; the latter simply makes evident objectively and as open to reflection what has always existed in the world as a result of God's self-communication to it. It is because of the presence in the world of this determination that we know that it exists also in the mind and intentions of God and not vice versa.

This becomes still more clear when we consider with Vatican II the fact that always and everywhere in the history of humanity there has been and is a real possibility of attaining supernatural salvation, that this salvation is possible only by faith in the strict theological sense and that this very faith is itself possible only if and when it is sustained by the grace that imparts God himself as its intrinsic principle. But this means essentially that the grace of faith (which in the last resort is God himself as uncreated grace) must be present always and everywhere in the world in the form of an offer and (as Vatican II expressly states) is rejected only when a person acts against the final decision of his conscience and even in this rejection remains confronted by God's offer of himself. But if this is the situation, then there is no point in regarding what we call the sanctifying grace of faith, hope, and love, as consisting in separate and intermittent offers by God, occurring only occasionally on the time-axis of an otherwise secular history. This grace (free and unmerited, of course) must be understood as an intrinsic existential of the history of humanity, but in no way due as a result of being present always as an offer to man's freedom and of having a history in this freedom itself. If the nature of creaturely freedom does not in the last resort consist in the ability to do something with this or that particular object but is the freedom of the subject to itself, then freedom and salvation history amount in fact to a freedom toward the subject endowed with grace and sanctified in the form of an offer prior to its self-determination. Incidentally, however, it may be noted that no lesser existential-ontological apriority can be ascribed [64] to this a priori endowment of grace and sanctification, such as that which traditional theology assigns to what we call original sin.

We cannot go more closely here into the question of how this conception can be reconciled with the certainly correct and traditional view of the sacraments, understood as events of grace occurring at definite points in space and time. To deal with this question we must not start out from the model of infant baptism but must think of individual sacramental events in space and time as they occur in and with adults. But it is obvious here with reference to baptism and penance that these sacraments, even for traditional theology, without detriment to their efficacy, come upon a person who has already accepted in freedom the grace always offered to him and is justified. It is the person who believes and is justified in faith and love who is baptized, and only in such a person is the sacrament of baptism effective. In the sacrament of penance the penitent receives the word of forgiveness and must approach this word of forgiveness as already converted to God, his conversion being itself salvific and sustained by grace. Traditional theology also therefore presupposes a person already endowed with grace and justified. But this condition, which is presupposed, is itself sustained by the grace always preceding it and reaching the person in the form of an offer. Yet again this offer itself certainly need not be understood as an isolated event occurring for the first time and solely at the particular moment when it is accepted or rejected. Why and how exactly a real efficacy of grace is to be and can be attributed to the sacraments is a question that cannot be further discussed at the moment. In this respect it need only be said that traditional sacramental theology is also faced with the same problem as that which is linked with our own basic conception and that the latter consequently presents no difficulty that does not always exist whenever God's original turning to us in grace, sustaining all salvation history, is understood as an event occurring at a definite point in time.

Before turning finally to the implications for our theme of the basic conception of grace that sanctifies man, presented here by way of suggestion, an interim consideration must be interposed. We are occupied with those sacraments which might be described as sacraments of consecration: that is, with baptism and confirmation, also up to a point with the sacrament of matrimony and especially with the sacrament of order in its different grades. These sacraments [65] have in common the fact that they establish, each in its own specific fashion, a permanent consecratedness on the part of the person who receives them. This consecratedness established by the 'status-conferring' sacraments (and this fact will in no way be denied) is, on the one hand, a reality which certainly cannot be conceived as existing before the sacraments but, on the other hand, lies within the historical, sociological dimension of the Church: reception into the visible Church through baptism, explicit authorization to participate in the visible Church's witness to the faith, the permanent bond of marriage, official authorization to participate in the function of leadership on the part of the Church's ministry through the various grades of order. These realities of course do not exist before reception of the sacrament and for this reason they are distinct from the real grace-given consecratedness and holiness which exists always and everywhere in the form of an offer to man's freedom; as such, these realities affect the dimension of the Church as a 'visible' society, leaving aside here the question whether as such they can be identified with the 'sacramental character' which the Church's teaching assigns as an effect to these sacraments or (which seems to me less probable) must be distinguished from the sacramental character.

Whether these realities in the sociological dimension of the Church must be understood (as appears to be usual) as a consecratedness and holiness already conferred by this Church as such, is in the last resort a question of terminology which in turn depends on the question of whether, in what sense, and with what justification we want to assign the predicate of consecratedness and holiness also to the Church as a sociological factor as distinct from secular societies or think that such a qualification for these realities should as such be strictly avoided, since holiness in the strict sense of the term can be understood only as participation in the glory of the holy God by his self-communication in grace, 'in sanctifying grace', in the grace which alone places the creature in the sphere of the blessed untouchability of the holy God. In whatever way we answer these ultimately terminological questions, while not overlooking the fact that the 'status' given with these 'sacraments of consecration' within the sociological dimension of the Church can exist also in sinners and therefore as such can be described only in a secondary and analogous sense as consecratedness, it is in any case a fact that these realities of the sacraments of consecration, constituting a status [66] in the Church, refer back to the proper consecratedness of man by grace, that they should in principle be sustained by grace and are in fact so sustained even in the sinner, insofar as the sinner, too, is always determined by the existential of sanctifying grace in the form of an offer and a demand for its acceptance.

This connection between the real holiness of man through the grace which exists always and everywhere and the 'consecrated-ness' established by the sacraments of consecration has in principle always been seen in the teaching of the Church and of theology: these sacraments of consecration are supposed to be received 'in the state of grace' and they may never be understood as mere conferments of status in the sociological order of the Church, to which man's innermost relationship to God by the free acceptance of his consecratedness by grace is a matter of indifference; the sacraments of consecration are always also signs of this proper and innermost consecratedness of man and are always also the offer (effective by its very nature) of the 'increase' of sanctifying grace, that is, the offer of God's help toward an existentially increasingly radical acceptance by his freedom of the already always proffered holiness of man. The ultimate ground of this connection between the sacraments of status, the sacraments of consecration, and the proper holiness and consecratedness of man by grace lies in the fact that the Church is supposed to be and is the eschatological sign, the basic sacrament, not only of God's self-offering to man's freedom, but is also the basic sacrament which secures that this self-offering of God of itself is actually victoriously established in man's freedom; the Church as a whole is the holy, not only in the dimension of word and sacraments, but also in the existential acceptance of grace by man's freedom.

Presupposing this interim consideration on the relationship between the sacraments of consecration and the 'consecratedness' established by these on the one hand and the holiness and consecratedness of man existing always and everywhere because of God's self-communication on the other (the latter being always and everywhere the innermost centre and dynamism of revelation history and salvation history and not merely something that comes from outside occasionally at certain points upon an otherwise secular history), we can now attempt to consider a number of consequences which will lead us back more closely to the basic theme.

[67] If someone has himself 'consecrated' (we are thinking now mainly of ordination, although what is to be said is true also mutatis mutandis of the other sacraments of consecration), he is nevertheless, prior to this consecration, not a secular, unholy person receiving through the sacraments, as something coming from outside in what seems almost a miraculous and magical fashion, a holiness which raises him in an elitist sense above the mass of secular, unsanctified human beings. What really happens in such a sacrament of consecration is the historical manifestation and the sociologically concretizing specification in the dimension of the visible Church of a holiness and consecratedness which has always existed inescapably in that person in the form of an offer in virtue of God's salvific will. The external and visible sign of a sacrament of consecration always refers the recipient to the ultimate and most fundamental depth of his own existence in which he has always been consecrated (whether he is explicitly aware of this or merely lives implicitly in accordance with it) by the self-offering of the holy God. The sacrament invokes this innermost consecratedness of the person and charges him to enter increasingly clearly and, existentially, increasingly radically into the experience of this innermost consecratedness of man; it charges and enables him to understand and realize his ecclesial-sociological consecrated status increasingly clearly and radically as the sociological concreteness and specification of his ultimate consecratedness which he possesses in common with all human beings, even outside the circle of those established by baptism as members of the Church in the narrower sense.

It is only from this standpoint that it is possible in the last resort to understand what is being said everywhere in the Church today: that those who are consecrated by ordination are each and all both servants of the Church and its members. The hierarchical separatedness of the person consecrated by ordination exists solely in the dimension of the sacramental sociological reality of the Church as such, not however in the 'hierarchy' of grace, of holiness, that is constituted by the diversity of radicalness in which human beings believe, hope, and love. The ordained person is called continually to discover afresh in himself this ultimate experience of the Holy Spirit, whom he shares with everyone, and to make it fruitful for the special task to which he is appointed by the sacrament of order. His official task in the Church is the concrete form in which he must also [68] concretely accept his grace-given holiness and give it expression. However great the variety of ways of life and callings in which Christianity can be realized, the priestly ministry is not an additional task undertaken by the priest as supplementary to his being a Christian, but for him – for one who is called – it is the way of being a Christian. It is from this standpoint that the lifelong character of the priestly office can be made intelligible as the concreteness of inescapably being a Christian, even though this means that the concrete questions of the possibility or impossibility of priesthood for a time are not yet answered. 'Consecratedness' by the transmission of office in the sacrament of order acquires its ultimate truth and urgency in any case from that consecration which exists through grace.

A further problem must now be faced and I hope that the previous reflections may contribute, at least up to a point, to its answer. The problem consists in the fact that in recent decades, apart from the permanent diaconate, pastoral ministries have emerged in the Church, not based on any form of consecration and having behind them no more than a commission from the Church. In the light of this there is a special urgency about the question of the permanent significance and never ceasing importance of consecration in the life and in the reflection of the Church.

Before attempting in the light of our previous reflections to make a contribution directly to answering this question, there are still a number of preliminary observations to be considered.

We assume as a dogma that the papal primacy and the episcopal constitution of the Church are part of the Church's perennially valid essential structures, are of divine law, even though this divine law has had a history in the Church itself. We also assume that there is an office in the Church below the episcopate which is conferred in a sacramental happening called ordination. It is possible also to say without prejudice that imposition of hands is the sacramental sign of conferment of office in the Church today, as it was in the early Church, but that in principle it is within the Church's discretion to determine and to change the precise mode of the sacramental rite of ordination. But, in the light of these assumptions, it must also be said that the extent to which orders are sacramentally conferred and the grades of order are matters which lie within the Church's discretion. Today, for instance, the diaconate is undoubtedly a participation in sacramental ordination, but this is not a reason for claiming [68] that Jesus himself expressly instituted the diaconate as a sacrament and as a specific participation in an office that must exist in the Church. In the Church's understanding at the present time the minor orders below the diaconate are not sacraments, but this does not mean that the medieval persuasion of their sacramentality must be rejected in principle; this opinion is still justified in the sense that the Church can institute such grades of order and also confer them sacramentally if it wants to do so and considers it opportune at a particular time. Nor is it impossible historically to assign a sacramental character to the consecration of deaconesses in the early Church. In general, then, without coming into conflict with a dogma of the Church, it can be said that there must exist in the Church an office that corresponds to the nature of the Church; that this one office implies a variety of powers corresponding to the Church's nature, such as the power to teach authoritatively, power to govern in the individual churches and in the universal Church or in the larger particular Church, sacramental powers; that the Church has the right and duty to confer in a variable and graded form a share in this one office and also to a limited extent to impart powers that are implicit in this one office; if and insofar as the Church confers, even to a limited extent, a considerable share in this one office (in the light of the importance of this participation and perhaps also in the light of its ultimate lifelong irrevocability), such a participation is or can be regarded as sacramental. Without this understanding, I do not think it is really possible to cope with the actual history of office, of ordination, in the Church. It seems to me that, in regard to the development, articulation, and division of what was originally one office, the Church has greater opportunities of variation than textbook theology ever recognized. This greater breadth of variation extends both to the possibilities of dividing and concentrating the power of office in a variety of ways and also to the determination of the holder of this power (man or woman, individual person or collective holder) and again to the question of the sacramentality or non-sacramentality of such a conferment of office.

In the light of these assumptions, we may now return to the problem. It was said that in the Church today there are pastoral ministries which do not presuppose any consecration, but are based 'solely' on a commissioning by the Church. In order to stress the urgency of the problem, it might immediately be added that, if the [70] present development continues, the greater part of the administration of the one ecclesiastical office will be in the hands of those who undertake it 'solely' in virtue of a commission from the Church, without 'consecration'. I think that the problem should not be stated in the first instance as if its most urgent and most important aspect was the possibility in theological reflection and speculation of preserving enough significance and importance in the consecration of those who are today or will be tomorrow priests or deacons with a consecration whose sacramentality is (rightly) certain from the very outset. What we should and can say in the first place is that those Christians who undertake essential functions of the one office in the Church in virtue of a commission from the Church do not act 'solely' in virtue of this commission. They are in fact members of the Church, they are baptized and through this baptism their ultimate and never-ceasing consecratedness by grace (of which we spoke at the beginning) is symbolically and perennially present in the public, sociological reality of the Church; they regard their office as a participation in the one office of the Church in virtue of this ultimate grace-given consecratedness of their existence and its sacramental actuality in the Church; they, too, concretize and objectify this ultimate and most fundamental consecratedness of theirs in the office which they exercise. If and insofar as this office of theirs, based on a consecration, nevertheless differs (which is certainly not a priori to be denied) from the office of the priest or deacon, the real and fundamental difference between these offices lies not in the fact that a special 'consecration' as distinct from a mere commission belongs to the office of the priest or deacon but in the fact that these offices are different and have a different importance in the manner and degree of their participation in the one office of the Church. For the conferment of the office of presbyterate or diaconate does not imply a sacramental consecration as an addition to the transmission of the powers involved; it is sacramental because and insofar as it confers these powers and promises the grace necessary for their exercise.

Only in this way, I think, can we reach the real and still unsolved problem, which is twofold and which I can only describe as one that remains open. Whatever the rite by which office is conferred, ought not the Church in future to assign a pastoral ministry of some importance (as I certainly think it could do) in a sacramental rite? Ought it not to do so when this particular pastoral ministry, in practice and [71] seen as a whole, is of the same importance as the pastoral ministry of the priest or deacon? Otherwise, is there not a danger that the ministerial priest properly so-called will be degraded to the rank of a mere cultic functionary when it looks as if all the functions he formerly possessed (that is, leadership of the community and official proclamation of the Gospel) had really nothing essentially to do with his office, since these can also be conferred by a mere non-sacramental commission? If we recall the fact that in the Church in the course of its history there were certainly conferments of office in themselves sacramental but not understood as such in theological reflection (as, for example, episcopal ordination in medieval theology), it is possible to raise even the (second) question: Is it not possible in practice in the Church of today or tomorrow that there will be conferments of important and enduring official powers which are so important that they cannot be conveyed otherwise than by a sacramental authorization, regardless of the manner in which this authorization takes place and even if its sacramentality is not explicitly taken into account?

There is no point in upholding the theoretical principle that the ordained priest is and must remain the proper leader of the congregation if the increasing shortage of priests means that without laymen as leaders the congregations will cease to exist. If this schizophrenia is allowed to proliferate, the Church will be involved in a tacit Protestantization which it has hitherto so abhorred, merely because of the desire (without convincing reasons) to continue to link the priesthood with an academic training and celibacy. Why, in fact? From the time of Pius X onward the requirements for receiving Holy Communion have been reduced to a minimum, while requirements for presiding at the eucharistic celebration have been extended to what might be called a European maximum, which seems unreal at least to the majority of people in the present-day world. If leadership of the community is an intrinsic and essential element of the priesthood, in which this function and that of the presidency of the eucharistic celebration are mutually dependent, then the very people who in fact in the future will be leaders of a priestless community should themselves be ordained priests and thus sacramentally recognized for what they are and what they accomplish as actual leaders.

It cannot be denied that the right of the community to have a [72] sacramentally ordained leader takes precedence over the efforts of the Church (which certainly deserve respect) to have community leaders who accept the obligation of celibacy. No one can claim with certainty that for all times and for all cultural groups the association of priesthood in the unity of its governing and cultic functions on the one hand with academic training and celibacy on the other will be and will remain feasible to a sufficiently large extent. If this were not so, the Church ought incidentally to have pressed long ago for celibacy also in the Eastern churches and to have said that here, too, a sufficiently large number of celibate clergy would be possible. But if this dual trend of which we spoke causes us to have reservations, then certainly we must boldly face the question as to whether differently defined and delimited official powers may be conferred by a special ‘consecration’ in the Church in the new forms of the one sacramental ordination, if the above-mentioned laicization of the Church is to be avoided. Of course, it is clear also from our earlier reflections that this again is not simply a question of life and death, since there can be no office of importance in the Church which is not based on the holder's ultimate consecratedness and the visibility of the latter through baptism.

Here, I think, are open questions in theology which are not purely academic but have a considerable importance for the self-understanding and the spirituality of the holders of these pastoral ministries. Within the one Church in which all are sanctified at the centre of their existence so that this holiness is the ultimate sustaining ground also of all offices in the Church, there is certainly a real if secondary distinction between lay people and a clergy with a special consecratedness in the dimension of the sacramental sign and of a definite commission for an office which does not belong to everyone in the Church. But where the real dividing line lies between clergy and laity, where it ought to lie in the light of a theologically clarified understanding of office, these are questions to which the answer is still far from clear in every respect.

PASTORAL MINISTRIES AND COMMUNITY LEADERSHIP

After working out his ideas on the theme, the author felt that a preliminary observation would be appropriate. These reflections deal only with pastoral assistants who act as permanent and normal pastors in parishes without priests. Other pastoral assistants who are working interparochially and with reference to a particular field of pastoral care do not come within the scope of the present essay. There are pastoral assistants as understood here, and in the future there will inevitably be such in greater numbers (even though today their number varies greatly in different dioceses, and here and there – as a result of the problems with which this essay will deal – can be observed to be declining). This is so and will be so, even though a more general idea of the pastoral assistant can be developed, but to which what is said here does not apply directly and unambiguously.

Of course, it is possible to go to some trouble to avoid the use of pastoral assistants as understood here, to organize the structures of pastoral care in such a way that these pastoral assistants will become to a large extent unnecessary or cease to be so clearly visible. But (and this is what is assumed here) if in the future we are not to leave whole regions without local congregations bordering on other fully constructed communities, then there will be pastoral assistants in the sense understood here or it will be really be possible to find priests in sufficient numbers of the kind required for such communities. But both, as we hope to show, amount to the same thing.

PRIESTHOOD AND DIACONATE

A problem of considerable importance in pastoral theology and pastoral care in Central Europe today is that of the essential definition of the diaconate and of the function of what are known as pastoral or parish assistants and the relationship of these two ‘offices’ in the Church to the nature and function of the ministerial priesthood.[1]

In the Western Church for many centuries up to the present time, all that was known in practice and concretely of an articulation and gradation of office as one and whole in the Church, involved in the very nature of the Church as a grace-given and yet sociologically organized factor, was the episcopal office and the priestly office. The diaconate as known in the early Church had practically disappeared and remained only as a liturgically defined transitional stage on the way to the priesthood. Vatican II revived in principle the diaconate in the Latin Church as an independent office of a hierarchical and sacramental character. This raises afresh the question of the definition of the exact nature of the diaconate and of the relationship of the diaconate to the priesthood. This question is all the more difficult because the question of the nature of the ministerial priesthood again came to the fore at the same time and for a variety of reasons, with the result that the question of the relationship between diaconate and priesthood had to be worked out from the outset with two factors, neither of which as such was very clearly or comprehensively defined.

[1] It is impossible in a brief essay to give a full account of the relevant literature. Here we can refer only to the declaration of the German Bishops’ Conference of 2 March 1977, ‘Zur Ordnung der pastoralen Dienste’, and the commentaries provided by Bishop K. Hemmerle and Professor K. Forster; the articles by W. Kasper (‘Die schädlichen Nebenwirkungen des Priestermangels’, Stimmen der Zeit 195 [1977]: 129-35) and Bishop P. J. Cordes (‘Pastoralassistenten und Diakone’, Stimmen der Zeit 195 [1977]: 389-401).

As far as the priesthood is concerned, the most important groups of problems are well-known. Should the office and task of priesthood be made intelligible in the light of the fact that it is conferred by a sacramental ordination, or is it the other way round? If the latter is the case, how is the nature of this office to be defined? Is its nature to be defined solely in the light of the powers which, according to traditionally Catholic teaching, are reserved exclusively to the sacramentally ordained priest: that is, in the light of the eucharist and [75] the sacrament of penance (together with the anointing of the sick)? Or, if such a definition seems too narrow and to contradict what seems in practice to be the task of the priest and what is suggested by the history of the priesthood, is it possible to produce a more comprehensive definition implicitly accepting these sacramental powers as part of his function but also covering comprehensively more meaningfully and concretely the priest's office as it exists in practice?

This, more or less, is the trend of all reflections on the subject today. By analogy with the bishop, the priest is seen as leader of a Church, as leader of a community which really is the Church in that locality. He must, then, have all the powers which necessarily belong to such a leader of a Church in a particular locality in the light of the theological nature of the Church as such. He is the leader of a local Church insofar as the latter is truly (in the theological sense) the Church at that point. Speaking in the name of the Church as a whole, he is the official proclaimer of the Christian message and at one and the same time the president at the eucharistic celebration; he has the function of guiding and maintaining in unity all other functions and their holders, constituting and sustaining a Christian community as Church, functions which, of course, cannot really belong exclusively to any single individual. It can confidently be said (even if this seems to involve us in theological and practical difficulties) that the task (and consequently the nature) of the priest is to be a pastor. Here at least is the basis for any understanding of the nature of priesthood. (This is also clear when the priesthood is seen in the light of the episcopal office, as in fact it must be seen according to the theology of the episcopate expounded at Vatican II.)

This is not to deny the fact that there can be (and, in certain circumstances, ought to be) priests who are concretely not pastors, either in the simple everyday sense of the term or as defined in canon law. That there can also be other priests is obvious from the very nature of a sociological function which, although ultimately one, can be variously differentiated; a particular individual power within the function as a whole can be given prominence in a single holder, the whole power can belong in principle to one person without being realized for that reason in every respect; someone can be the assistant of another person, even while possessing as such the same power, etc. In the light of such considerations the number of [76] priests in the Church who are not pastors properly speaking also becomes understandable (and by and large legitimate). But all this in no way alters the fact that the nature and task of the priest is most simply and clearly understood in the light of the position of community leader, of pastor.

If the essence of the diaconate is to be defined, this definition must of course be framed in such a way that the nature of the diaconate is clearly distinguished from that of the priest. This is not so easy. If, that is, it is desired to define the diaconate as possessing (although under the overall control of the priest), apart from the two above-mentioned powers (eucharist and sacrament of penance), everything that essentially belongs to the priesthood, this must lead to embarrassing consequences. The deacon would then seem like a kind of minor priest and the question arises why he is denied power over the eucharist which, in a more profound and comprehensive view of the priesthood, is part of the function of leadership in regard to the community: a task of leadership also undertaken by the deacon, at least in practice in the present-day situation (especially in parishes without priests).

It seems appropriate, then, to see the task of the diaconate not as a curtailed, partial function of the priest and exercised under the priest, but as a distinct and separate function existing as such independently alongside that of the priest; this however does not imply any doubt about the fact that the deacon, with his independent task alongside the priest, is also in a congregation under the leadership of the priest who guides and unites it. This is no more than a formal outline of a definition of the diaconate; how its material content can be ascertained is something that will not be discussed further here. In this connection there are various theories, but not yet any real agreement.

In any case, it must remain clear that the deacon is not merely an auxiliary worker for the priest in the parish, but has a function which is a priori distinct from that of the priest, even though it must not be denied that in practice and concretely the deacon can and should undertake in a subsidiary fashion tasks in a parish that come within the scope of the priest's overall task. In the midst of all these difficult and troublesome definitions, which always seem somewhat arbitrary, it should not be forgotten that all these offices are ultimately extensions and concretizations in varying degrees of office as one and [77] whole in the Church and that these extensions are largely a matter for the Church itself to decide and do not by any means need to be undertaken in the same way at all times and in all historical and pastoral situations.

PASTORAL ASSISTANTS

This complex array of questions becomes all the more formidable as a result of the emergence in Central Europe today of the office of what is called the parish or pastoral assistant, in addition to the two hierarchical offices and difficult to harmonize with these, either systematically or in practice. This new function is not a project formed in the light of a systematic and fundamental reflection and afterward put into practice. The opposite is the case. It was practice, without much theological reflection, that led to these pastoral assistants. And only when they had appeared on the scene to perform a task which was far from being theologically clarified did it become apparent that the questions must be asked about the theological significance of their function and its relationship to the two traditional offices in the Church.

There are too few priests willing to accept the obligation of celibacy; there are parishes without priests, where a regular eucharistic celebration and administration of the sacraments is no longer assured. An attempt is made to provide for pastoral care, first by concentrating the activity of the few remaining priests increasingly on functions which are clearly and exclusively reserved to them; then by assigning to persons who are not priests other functions which certainly belong to the nature of the priesthood (such as the official proclamation of the word in a particular community) but which traditional sentiment does not regard as so clearly possible only in virtue of sacramental ordination. For these tasks there are not enough deacons, but there are lay persons who have had a complete theological training and in that sense are on the same level as the priest. These are prepared to undertake in regard to an ecclesial community all functions assigned and transmitted to them by the diocesan authorities; in view of the pastoral needs, the diocesan Church officially assigns to these theologically trained lay people as many as possible of the tasks and powers as, on the one hand, a [78] priestless community needs and as, on the other hand, are not certainly tied to sacramental ordination. That is why we have pastoral assistants. They are there in fact. But theologically they are a problem.

It is a problem that is keenly felt today. The declaration of the German bishops 'On the Organization of Pastoral Ministries' attempts to solve it. If we look more closely at the way in which pastoral assistants emerged, without previous theological reflection, it is easy to understand where the problem lies and also how the German bishops reached their conclusions. Pastoral assistants are not to be confused with priests. If we attempt (as we ought to do) to understand priesthood not solely in the light of the two sacramental powers (since otherwise the priest could claim exclusively for himself merely the singularly unattractive and humanly frustrating function of the producer of an opus operatum), if, then, we rightly understand the priest in principle as the proper and unique community leader sacramentally prepared for this, then we must deny to the pastoral assistant (as the bishops do) the function of a community leader properly so-called. But if his existence is assumed as a fact and as unavoidable today, the attempt must be made painfully and discriminatingly to describe his function in a way that corresponds up to a point to the reality and yet distinguishes him from a community leader properly so-called, who is supposed to be the priest alone.

The same is true of the difference between pastoral assistants and deacons. We start out from the assumption that the diaconate is conferred sacramentally and incorporates the person into the official hierarchy; we observe that pastoral assistants do not receive their office through a sacramental ordination. We conclude that these two offices must be essentially different. We seek to define the diaconate on the one hand and the office of pastoral assistant on the other in such a way that the difference becomes clear, since the two functions must be distinguished in themselves and not merely in the way the office is conferred. A distinction of this kind may be possible in principle, particularly since (as we said earlier) the extension and gradation of what is ultimately and originally the one office of the one Church can be understood in a variety of ways and may vary also with the variations of times and of pastoral requirements. But in practice this distinction between the pastoral assistant and the deacon [79] is also something that can be established only painfully and discriminatingly and the way to do this is by no means obvious.

We shall not however go further here into the difference between pastoral assistants and deacons, since the deacon's own particular function, which exists independently of any need of help for priestless communities, has clearly a priori nothing to do with the function of the pastoral assistant. Any attempt to ordain pastoral assistants as deacons in order to link them more clearly with the hierarchy would only obscure the problem: they would then be deacons, whose function as such is different from that of priests or pastoral assistants, and nevertheless exercise the function of both community leader and pastoral assistant. The question would remain as to how their function is distinguished from that of the priestly community leader.

Where does the difficulty lie in distinguishing between the pastoral assistant and the priest? If we consider the matter concretely, realistically, and sincerely, despite all sublime and well-meant distinctions the difficulty lies in the fact that the pastoral assistant in a priestless community has and exercises the function of the priest, with the exception of the two sacramental powers. From the standpoint of the community, such a pastoral assistant is the person linking them with the Church as a whole, just as the pastor is in a priestly community. In practice, concretely, and as distinct from subordinate parish assistants, both men and women, priests are distinguished from pastoral assistants in a priestless community only by the presence in the former and the absence in the latter of the two sacramental powers mentioned. Any assertion to the contrary is pure ideology or means that the pastoral assistant in a community without priests simply does not exercise the function that he ought to exercise in this pastoral situation and that in practice he is merely a subordinate parish assistant. This sort of thing is certainly possible, but it does nothing to alleviate the pastoral need that has led to the institution of pastoral assistants.

But if in practice, despite all sublime theological distinctions, the pastoral assistant in a priestless community exercises all the functions of a priestly community leader (apart from the two sacramental powers), we are faced with a dilemma. Either the functions actually undertaken by the pastoral assistant are regarded as by no means specifically priestly. Then what is truly priestly about the ministerial [80] priest is reduced to the two sacramental powers reserved to him alone; the priest becomes a purely cultic functionary. It has been said often enough that this interpretation of priesthood is no longer acceptable today and we need not discuss it at length here. This narrowly ritualistic interpretation of the specifically priestly task is not only humanly intolerable, but also theologically wrong, since it is contrary to a modern ecclesiology and to the history of the priesthood. Or it is admitted that the functions actually undertaken by the pastoral assistant are at bottom specifically priestly or can be distinguished from priestly functions only by subtle, academic distinctions. But then difficult theological questions arise. If the commission to exercise permanently the functions of a pastoral assistant as a real community leader assigns an office that, judged soberly and sincerely, is more important and more comprehensive than the diaconate (and the lesser offices of the minor orders, which were regarded as sacramental in the Middle Ages), why should not or in principle (at least if the Church wants it) could not the conferment of an office of a permanent character be regarded as sacramental?

COMMISSION AND SACRAMENT

It is not a conclusive argument against the sacramentality of this commissioning to say that it does not take the form of an imposition of hands, since it is within the power and the discretion of the Church to decide the concrete form of the rite of conferring office. It also seems far from being theologically settled that a certain rite important for the Church can be sacramental only if its sacramentality is explicitly and reflectively perceived. (If this was necessary what would be the position of marriages of Christians outside the Catholic Church? Could they be sacramental? Were episcopal ordinations not sacramental in the Middle Ages, when their sacramentality was disputed?) If the Church (which is the basic sacrament) confers a permanent office of considerable importance for its own reality, can it simultaneously not want such an office to participate in the promise given by God to the Church? Can the Church prevent such a conferment of office from being an opus operatum, if this term is rightly understood and seen in the light of its derivation from the nature of the Church?

[81] A further question: If in practice the leadership of the community is entrusted to pastoral assistants and this commissioning can be distinguished from a priest's community leadership only by subtle theories, if in a modern theology of priesthood the two sacramental powers reserved to ordained priests are basically articulations and extrapolations of the priest's fundamental task as leader of a local Church and official representative of the episcopal major Church and of the Church as a whole, by what right are these two powers denied to the pastoral assistant as community leader in a priestless community?

If someone as pastoral assistant is in fact appointed community leader, he is granted in this capacity the basic nature of the priest and at the same time refused the sacramental powers that flow from this basic nature. Is this theologically consistent? Ought we not almost to say that such a pastoral assistant possesses these sacramental powers in virtue of his basic function, but that they are 'suspended' in the same way as the newly ordained priest's power of absolution (which he possesses as such) is 'suspended' until he is granted the 'jurisdiction' which enables him to exercise it? It is possible, of course, to say that these sacramental powers are conferred only by imposition of hands in priestly ordination, which is the very thing that is lacking in the pastoral assistant. But this kind of argument does not dispose of the real theological problem. For it is not only a question of whether the appointment of a pastoral assistant as community leader without these sacramental powers (or perhaps only as 'suspended') is legal and must be respected. It can rightly be asked whether this procedure ideally corresponds to the properly theological nature of the powers and conferring of powers that are involved here. This can certainly be doubted or disputed.

Again, it is possible with the aid of acute perception to describe and with the aid of legal regulations to delimit the nature and task of the pastoral assistant in such a way that the latter is not distinguished from the priest merely because of the absence of the two sacramental powers. There can, of course, be people who have tasks in the Church, especially outside the strictly parochial sphere, whose function is unambiguously and clearly distinguished from that of the priest and who can, if it is so desired, be called pastoral assistants. In the present context however we have in mind only those with tasks in the Church who in practice in a priestless [82] community take over the task (apart from the two sacramental powers) otherwise fulfilled by the pastor. In this case, too, the attempt can be made to distinguish between priests and pastoral assistants with the aid of subtle theological arguments. It is difficult to make an effective response to someone who takes the trouble to do this and is satisfied with the abstract conclusion. But it could at least be asked why these pastoral assistants did not exist in the past. If their office as different from the priestly office and as clearly distinguishable from the latter is supposed to flow from the very nature of the Church's pastoral care, it might be expected to have existed always or at any rate for a long time.

RESPONSIBILITY AND OFFICE

The question is how to resist seriously a tendency for the 'profile of the pastoral assistant to merge into the profile of the priest',[2] if the former is responsible for religious instruction, catechesis, training, counseling, and care for particular groups. If he can be assigned a 'commission to participate in certain tasks of the Church's ministry' and if such a commission leads in a priestless community, whether it is desired or not, to a commission to undertake all the pastoral care of the community, even if the expression 'personally responsible' is avoided, what really remains of the 'irreplaceability of the priest as leader of the community'? If religious instruction, catechesis, training, counseling, and care for particular groups are tasks which are undertaken together by one pastoral assistant in a community, is this a 'responsibility for certain specific fields' which belong to the lay person as such and have no intrinsic orientation to priestly orders? Why should such a complex and comprehensive task as a whole still not be an 'office in the theological sense of the term'? Is it possible so to organize concretely and in practice the pastoral ministry of a pastoral assistant in a priestless community that no sort of 'office without ordination' emerges alongside ecclesiastical office in the ordinary sense of the term or must we admit that what is exercised here is to a large extent the pastoral ministry normally conferred [83] by sacramental ordination? If in a priestless community a pastoral assistant is the person to whom that community as a whole actually relates, it is pure theory to talk about the profile of a pastoral assistant not being alienated by an accumulation of the priest's functions.

The only way to get out of the undergrowth of these theological and practical difficulties is to ask again more precisely what was the situation and what were the circumstances out of which the institution of pastoral assistants emerged and whether these circumstances must be assumed to be unalterable. The institution of pastoral assistants emerged without previous deeper reflection simply because it was no longer possible to provide priests for all local communities. On the other hand, there are persons who have had a complete theological training and are prepared to undertake permanently even in a pastoral sense the leadership of a parish, but for their own part reject priestly celibacy. But it is taken for granted that the law of priestly celibacy remains unalterable. On this assumption (but only on this assumption) the institution of pastoral assistants emerges. Community leaders are sought, they are given everything that seems possible by way of powers, they are denied only the functions which are known from tradition to be reserved to the priest, without asking more closely in theological terms whether the powers and functions actually assigned to pastoral assistants are not (according to more exact and objective criteria) quite as important as those which are denied to them. People cannot and will not see this because otherwise pastoral assistants from the nature of the case would have to be regarded as priests; and in the Latin Church only a celibate can be seen as a priest.

It is therefore quite safe to say that the actual reason or the decisive precondition for the emergence of the institution of pastoral assistants is the law of celibacy. (We need only ask whether pastoral assistants would be possible in the Eastern Uniate churches with their married clergy or whether it would not be taken for granted there for a married ‘pastoral assistant’ to be ordained as a priest, since that would merely be a sacramental corroboration of the task which he performs or is expected to perform anyway.) When we say that the actual and necessary precondition of the emergence of this institution is celibacy, we are of course not denying that there are other reasons why someone who would be glad to undertake the [84] office of a pastoral assistant nevertheless does not want to be ordained. But the other reasons involved in the sociological image of the modern secular priest, which create anticlerical prejudice against the priesthood, are so closely linked with celibacy that it is still absolutely correct to maintain that the law of celibacy is the precondition for the institution of pastoral assistants.

Let us assume that there were no law of celibacy for the secular priest. On this assumption there would not be any pastoral assistants in the modern sense, at least none who had undertaken this function as their permanent task in life and been appointed to a specific individual community. They would in fact be the real community leaders. In the light of their task they would regard the power of presiding at the eucharist and pronouncing the words of reconciliation as the natural consequences of their basic office. In a rite appropriate to the conferring of these powers they would receive from the Church the whole power of the community leader which develops out of the Church’s very nature. They would then be sacramentally ordained priests, even though the ecclesial-sociological image of such community leaders (as married and perhaps exercising their office together with an ordinary secular calling) would differ considerably from the image of the priest today or even from that of a priest of the future exercising supra-local functions in the Church. In brief, without the law of celibacy, pastoral assistants in fact and in practice would become priests.

We can approach the question also from the opposite standpoint. We can start out from the axiom that a permanent task of fundamental importance in the Church should also be assigned by the rite envisaged for appointing someone to this task. (For example, if someone exercises as his permanent task the functions of a deacon, he is expected to receive these functions by the sacramental rite known as ordination to the diaconate, even though the individual functions, regarded in the abstract, can be undertaken by a ‘lay person’.) This axiom ought to be obvious, just as the obligation of baptism is obvious for someone who has already been justified by his subjective acts. The pastoral assistant ought therefore to be commissioned in a way appropriate to his actual function. If this function corresponds to the tasks of a deacon, he should be sacramentally ordained deacon. If the function of a pastoral assistant is in fact that of a community leader, he should receive priestly orders, since a [85] partition between the function of the community leader and the function of presiding at the eucharist is contrary to their very nature.

CELIBACY

The whole question then centres on the problem of celibacy. In principle it is not denied by anyone but repeatedly stressed that the Church must give up the requirement of celibacy for the pastoral clergy if it becomes clear that this requirement means a considerable loss of badly needed pastoral resources. Provision for sufficiently large numbers of pastoral clergy is an obligation imposed on the Church as a matter of divine law, an obligation that takes precedence in a case of conflict over the Church's legitimate desire for a celibate pastoral clergy. Ten years ago, in an article defending celibacy, I wrote: 'If the Church cannot in fact find everywhere or in certain areas a sufficient number of clergy unless it gives up celibacy, then it must give this up, for the duty of providing a sufficient number of pastoral clergy is prior to the possibility and the desire (legitimate in itself) to have a celibate clergy'.[3] The numbers are increasing of those who maintain that this case of conflict exists now in Europe. (The co-existence of the Uniate Eastern churches with a married clergy and the Latin Church with its celibate clergy proves that the very nature of the Church does not require the question of celibacy always and necessarily to be settled uniformly in the Church as a whole.)

This is a problem that cannot be made dependent on the question of how many would want to be ordained priests if the Church abandoned celibacy, or whether giving up celibacy would alleviate the present shortage of priests. A Christian parish which by its situation, its structure, the number of members has the right to exist and live as a local Church, has also the right to a priest as leader of the community and of the eucharistic celebration. This is not a right that exists only when it can be fulfilled, not merely in this particular community, but also in all the others. And it seems to be prior to the right of the Church to a celibate clergy. In this essay, however, we [86] shall not pursue further the question of priestly celibacy and the possible necessity of its abandonment.

What is important in our reflections is only the fact that celibacy is the actual reason for the creation of the institution of pastoral assistants, the actual reason why this institution leads to theological difficulties and pressures which really ought not to exist. If the circumstances which led to the institution of pastoral assistants are allowed simply to persist (that is, especially celibacy and the 'clerical' image of the pastoral priest resulting from it), there will inevitably emerge two classes of clergy: sacramentally ordained priests mainly undertaking supra-local functions in a diocese, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, pastoral assistants who are in fact the leaders in very many local communities and who do not really understand in theological terms why they are denied certain sacramental functions which are properly involved by the very nature of their basic function as community leaders, or why the attempt is made to explain with the aid of theological subtleties that a community leader who is a priest and a community leader who is a pastoral assistant are exercising two different functions.

Certainly we can agree with the claim in the bishops' declaration that 'there could be no justification for starting out to organize the pastoral ministry with a change in the conditions for admission to the priesthood by the Church as a whole.' It is true that we cannot 'start out' from such a change. But we might be faced with a pastoral situation in the Church calling urgently for this change. Neither is it necessary for these changes to occur simultaneously everywhere in the 'whole Church', particularly since the 'whole Church', if it is not to be identified with the Western Church, does not by any means have a celibate clergy everywhere. When the bishops' declaration says that such a change offers no assurance 'that sufficient priests will be at the Church's disposal in the long run', then, as we said, the counter-question can be raised as to whether a priestless community has the right to a (celibate or married) priest only if this right, which exists in principle, can be fulfilled simultaneously in all communities.

THEOLOGY AND SPIRITUALITY OF PASTORAL WORK IN THE PARISH

The theme of 'theology and spirituality of pastoral work in the parish' was chosen for me. The concrete and practical aspects of the theme must be left largely to others to explain. These general reflections are put forward by a priest who is not actively engaged in pastoral work in a parish, but he is sure that the true nature of the Church is more clearly and decisively involved in parochial pastoral work and, of course, in similar self-realizations than it is in theological reflection on the Church's faith as it is to be proclaimed: a reflection that is the business of the theologian, who has merely a secondary, albeit indispensable, function by comparison with this proclamation and the proclaimers. If we recall that, despite the importance of theory, practice is not only the execution of theory, but that the final, decisive, and complete theory emerges only from a practice on which reflection can never be complete, it becomes quite clear that the theorist can approach the practitioner only very modestly and unobtrusively, that he can offer the latter only very humbly whatever can be made of his theory and ask whether any conclusions can be drawn from it to put into practice.

The title, in fact, requires us to consider two themes: theology of parochial pastoral work and spirituality of parochial pastoral work. The first theme, theology of parochial pastoral work, is again, as such, very ambiguous. On the one hand, theology of parochial pastoral work can mean that we are asking about the theological nature of parochial pastoral work, of pastoral ministry precisely in the parish, and about the description in terms of Christian theology of the pastor's activity, since the latter is simply not a secular, social [88] functionary and manager. But on the other hand, theology of parochial pastoral work can also involve the question of whether and how the pastor must be and remain a theologian if he is really to be able to fulfill his task, and why and how a study of theology continually renewed and carried further, a permanent contact with theological scholarship, must retain a place in the life of a pastor. As we said, theology of parochial pastoral work will be the theme of these necessarily brief preliminary considerations. What is to be said under the heading of spirituality of parochial pastoral work will, of course, become clear at a later stage.

THEOLOGY OF PASTORAL WORK IN THE PARISH

There really is something like a theology of parochial pastoral work in the first sense mentioned of the term. The parish and with it, of course, its leader, the pastor, are not merely secular, sociological concepts, but have a religious, dogmatic, spiritual content, which can exist and be understood only in the faith of Christianity.

The Parish as a Reality of Faith

If and insofar as the Church as one and whole is itself a reality of faith and not merely a secular sociological organization (even though the latter would serve a supernatural purpose, comprehensible only in faith) and if, however, this Church as itself a reality of faith has inevitably a spatial character, then it must also be said that a territorial parish within this Church likewise participates in the peculiarity of the one Church as a reality of faith. In the Catholic understanding of faith the Church as a whole is indeed one Church, but an episcopically (that is, spatially, territorially) constituted Church. This territorial structure of the Church is obviously in the first place an empirical and secular reality, but this very reality is nevertheless taken up into the mystery of the Church as the unity of human beings in the Holy Spirit and in the profession of faith in Jesus Christ as Son of God, crucified and risen, the historically palpable, irreversible self-promise of God as salvation of the world. This mystery of the Church as sacrament of the world's salvation becomes effective [89] territorially, it becomes effective in space and time. The nature of the Church does not consist merely in the ubiquity of the Spirit of God, who is poured out equally on all flesh as innermost dynamism of humanity and its history. The nature of the Church consists even more in the fact that this undeniable although hidden ubiquity of the Spirit is manifested historically, sacramentally, sociologically, and incarnationally and that this incarnational and sacramental manifestation makes the ubiquity of the Spirit of God (unconfused and undivided) irreversibly and historically palpable in the world.

The Territorial Character of the Church

Thus the Church as sacrament of the world's salvation (as seen from above) has an unquestionably territorial character and this territorial character of the Church as sociological factor (as seen from below) shares in its quality as mystery (as, for instance, the water of baptism is earthly water and yet in baptism becomes the actual and effective manifestation of man's sanctification by grace). The parish, too, as a territorial factor participates in this quality which is part of the territorial organization of the Church. This becomes even clearer when we remember that the most effective and radical sacramental self-realization of the Church as the redeeming unity of human beings together in God occurs in the eucharist. Here the Church is present in its completeness and here it is unquestionably in place, in the local community, which is not absolutely necessarily but preferably and normally the parish community. It is understandable, therefore, that the New Testament, especially Paul, sees the Church first of all as the local Church, as (we may say without prejudice) the parish Church, at a time when there was still no difference between an episcopal and a parochial community Church. There can indeed be communities for the eucharistic celebration which are not parishes in the modern legal sense: personal parishes which do not have a directly perceptible territorial character, eucharistic communities which are not directly supported and authorized by the parish, monastic communities, etc. But when the eucharist is celebrated, people must always meet together in some place; if the eucharist is to be celebrated legitimately in this way at a chosen place, there must always be a relatedness to a local bishop or at least the explicit or [90] tacit reference to the pope, who is not everywhere but resides in Rome. Hence it is clear that the Church's territorial character, particularly in its supreme realization, can nowhere be eliminated. And it is precisely this territorial character which is most simply and normally present in the parish community, the community, which is based on a primordial human reality that can never be wholly eliminated, on a group of people living together in a particular area. Precisely because this primordial human phenomenon, despite all opportunities for people to form a community or society for other reasons, can never be excluded from human existence and because it enters into the eucharistic celebration (as the matter of the sacramental sign enters into the sacrament in its unity with sacramental grace), the parish community participates in the territorial structure of the Church, which belongs to the latter's substance, since it is part of the Church's sociological, historical, and incarnational nature.

The Parish – A Tangible Spiritual Reality

A parish is not merely a secular concern belonging to a religious society as a police district belongs to the state, but a spiritual reality in which a person learns or can and should learn that not only his temporal existence but also his cosmic-spatial existence is sanctified and encompassed by the grace of the holy God of which it is the incarnation. Of course, this theological thesis of the spiritual potentiality of human beings living together is not merely an indicative, but also an imperative. As the person who baptizes is required to provide water, the Church must provide a local group of neighbours in order to be able to celebrate the eucharist and thus fully realize itself historically and sociologically as sacrament of the world's salvation. This sort of local gathering of neighbours, of course, is not to be understood merely as a physical and geographical reality, but as a truly human factor of a genuinely neighbourly fellowship in righteousness and love, such that this human reality can enter into the eucharistic celebration. And it is to this human reality that the imperative resulting from our theological thesis on the spiritual quality of the territorial parish refers. This imperative, of course, must be fulfilled in the first place through all the other functions which belong directly to the parish as such, even though this does not mean that [91] these other tasks of a parish as such are merely means to the end of forming this territorial community which is to be the human substratum of the eucharistic community. But all the rest of the functions of the parish as such (religious education, religious courses for adults, welfare work, etc.) also contribute to the formation of such local neighbourliness in the full human sense of the term, even to the formation of a spiritual community as such, and may and must therefore be appreciated and promoted also from this standpoint.

Advancement of Human Fellowship in the Secular Sphere

This imperative for the formation of local neighbourliness can and should relate, as far as it is possible and necessary, to more than is directly envisaged or implied by the specific tasks and functions of the parish. As far as it is possible and necessary, the work of the parish and the pastor may and should relate to the secular reality of local neighbourliness as such. Let us assume that parish and pastor, when necessary, make the greatest possible effort to see that a spatial agglomeration of human beings becomes even in the secular sphere a genuinely human fellowship, a truly human fraternity living together in mutual knowledge of one another, in sticking together, in trust, and providing mutual help. By this very fact they are contributing to the conditions in which a real spiritual community in common praise of God, in a common acknowledgment of expectation of the coming Lord, in unity in the Holy Spirit, can be realized in the eucharistic celebration; in this way the eucharistic celebration is not merely a casual external assemblage of individuals looking for the satisfaction of their personal needs as they might look for this in a department store. If a country-parish priest, in a place where it is possible and humanly appropriate, meets the farmers and farmhands after mass for a meal in the local inn, this, too, can be a consequence of this spiritual imperative established by the above-mentioned theological thesis. If, as hitherto, we tried to envisage the theological quality of the Christian local community, of the territorial parish, in the light of the eucharistic celebration, this does not mean that the theological character of the parish is solely based on the act of worship; all that was intended was to make clear as simply as possible the fact that the territorial parish has a theological quality.

Insofar as the rest of the functions of a parish have, on the one [92] hand, an independent theological significance and are not merely means to the end of the eucharistic community, but have, on the other hand, more or less necessarily a local basis, even in the light of these other functions of the parish there emerges a peculiar theological, spiritual quality; it is not merely an unavoidable secular reality, but is assumed in its human spatiality into the mystery of the Church.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THEOLOGY IN PAROCHIAL PASTORAL WORK

As indicated at the beginning, the term 'theology of parochial pastoral work' has a second and different meaning. In the latter sense the term means purely and simply that theology has and must retain its place and its importance in parochial pastoral work. Parochial pastoral work directly aids the realization by word and sacrament of Christian existence in the community as such and provides also for the Christian life of the individual, who as an individual Christian can never exist in a Christian way entirely outside the Church or, therefore, outside a community, and yet in his individual existence is not simply absorbed collectivistically either in secular or in ecclesial social life.

Priority of Pastoral Activity to Theological Reflection

This task of making the Christian reality effective in word and sacrament, in community and individual existence, is therefore something different from and prior to theology, which, even if it grows out of and is directed to Christian practice, is in fact theoretical and scholarly reflection on this more fundamental Christian reality. To that extent, the pastor is not really a professional theologian and need not be one in the sense of being engaged in scholarly reflection. If we define exactly and straightforwardly the really correct relationship of theory and practice (if, for example, we keep in mind the correct relationship from the Catholic standpoint of bishop and theologian), then we cannot regard the relationship between pastor and theologian as if the pastor were more or less only the retailer distributing to individual consumers the commodities produced by a large-scale [93] theological industry. Proclamation comes before professional academic theology and is not simply a way of expressing and transmitting the latter. For theology reflects on the reality presented to it in the proclamation and ritual self-realization of the Church.

Reflection as a Constitutive Element of Practice

True and important as all this is, important as are the consequences of all this also for pastoral work (which cannot be considered here in detail), it remains true nevertheless that even theology properly speaking – academic theology – has its place and its importance in pastoral work. For a certain element of reflection is contained from the beginning as a constituent part in any practice, in any fundamental self-realization of the individual, of society, and of the Church, and cannot be excluded from it without practice itself being destroyed. Practice and theory are not identical, but are not placed side by side as separate areas, purely and simply independent of each other. If only because of these ultimate peculiarities of the relationship of theory and practice, close reflection on the element of reflection known as theology, which is itself a constituent part of practice as such, can never be irrelevant to practice.

The pastor must have a positive attitude to theology properly so-called, since the latter, seen more closely, is itself involved in his proclamation and since this reflex theology helps him to grasp and express more clearly and purely what he proclaims, even though the experience of his own proclamation always contains more than what academic theology as such, working reflectively and systematically and historically, can understand and objectify of it, Today, there are in addition all the necessities of an academic theology that are involved in the present state of proclamation. The pastor is not a ritualist, a magician, or a spellbinder who can simply rely on the opus operatum of traditional verbal formularies and sacramental rites. He is required, to the best of his ability and by the word of proclamation and sacrament, to produce in the recipient of his pastoral efforts the existential preconditions for a genuinely human, [94] believing reception of those realities which he offers in word and sacrament to man for the latter's salvation. The recipients of his efforts are not merely simple and straightforward human beings sustained by a homogeneously Christian milieu who rely purely on his formal authority as an ordained expert on religion and accept what he says. They are educated people living in the midst of the contradictions and pluralisms of a secularized world who do not get their view of life only from their pastor; they are also people who are Christians by choice and who live in crises of faith. How is a pastor to proclaim the Gospel and the message of the Church to these people with any hope of success if he has no contact with modern theology, a theology which is attempting to consider and cope with all these critical inquiries addressed to Christianity by the world of today? How can a pastor perform adequately the task imposed on him of interpreting Scripture if he is not to some extent applying the methods of modern exegesis and noting the conclusions of modern biblical studies? Unless he has a basic knowledge of these studies, how can the pastor's homily amount to any more than a lecture on his own pious opinions which he presents as best he can in the light of a biblical text? How can a pastor, addressing educated and uneducated Christians, distinguish between the really binding substance of faith and other perhaps traditional but nevertheless time-conditioned interpretations of this faith? How can he avoid imposing on people today as a matter of faith burdens which they are not bound to bear and perhaps cannot bear, if he is not also aware to some extent of the efforts of modern theology to bring out these distinctions? If he is not constantly in touch with present-day theological work, is it possible for a pastor to go beyond the traditional catechism formulas, to retain, enlarge, and change that vocabulary and those horizons of understanding and ways of access of an up-to-date proclamation which are necessary today and are in fact being established in the first place by academic theology?

Contact with Theologians, Reading New Books, Keeping Up with Periodicals

It is obvious that the ordinary pastor with so much work to do on the one hand and with his limited intellectual and spiritual possibilities [95] on the other can gain and maintain only a limited contact with modern academic theology. It is also unfortunate that academic theology often makes too little effort to convey its questions and its conclusions to the ordinary priest in such a way that he can utilize them in his pastoral work. But this in no way alters the fact that the pastor in his own way must be engaged in theology and must remain in contact with modern theology. He ought also always to be reading discriminatingly and after consultation selected new publications and unhesitatingly to set aside a certain time for this if he is not to continue forever performing his task with an outmoded theology which he learned many years ago or if he is not to sink back to the theological and spiritual plane of an innocuous childish faith, the faith he brought with him to his first studies in theology, only to lay aside the latter also as useless after he had been ordained. If he is to carry out his mission responsibly, the pastor must really exploit the opportunities of further education offered to him in training courses and similar arrangements. Deanery conferences and similar institutions ought not to be merely friendly gatherings of clerical colleagues or conferences of pastoral managers, but should also provide a little theological work and further education. Where it is possible the clergy should also have the courage to do some biblical theology, working together on a text in preparation for a sermon. The existence of theological reviews should not be constantly threatened because of the small number of subscribers; they should be bought and read by the pastoral clergy. In a word, theology of pastoral work in the title of these reflections means also that theology is and must remain an indispensable element of pastoral work itself.

We now come to the second part of our theme.

SPIRITUALITY OF PASTORAL WORK IN THE PARISH

In view of the range and the difficulty of this second theme, it is obvious that only a few, somewhat arbitrarily selected observations are possible here, particularly since spirituality of parochial pastoral work as such of course integrates into itself everything that pertains to Christian spirituality as a whole and consequently cannot be described here in its whole range and in all its depth.

A Preliminary Reflection

In order to get some idea of the particular themes implied in the overall theme of the spirituality of parochial pastoral work, we may first mention a more general consideration. This preliminary consideration might be summarized in the thesis that the spirituality of parochial pastoral work as such must be the spirituality of a basic community today and of the team directing it.

First of all, there are basic communities of the most varied kinds (which cannot be described here and distinguished from one another) which are justified and meaningful, which are different pastorally and in terms of the present canon law from a parish community. We cannot explain here the meaning, justification, and limits of such basic communities. Without going into that question, we are starting out from the persuasion that, even as compared with these basic communities of the most varied kinds, the parish communities will maintain their irreplaceable importance today and in the foreseeable future, that they are not merely fossils from earlier pastoral epochs, nor are they simply administrative districts of episcopal major Churches, but are, remain or must become real Christian communities on the spot (as we tried to suggest in theological terms in the first section of the first part of this chapter). Allowing for all this, however, it must be said that by their very nature and seen from both sides these basic communities and these parishes do not simply exist separately, side by side, but to some extent interpenetrate and depend on one another. In other words, if and insofar as a parish community is more and should be more than an administrative area of an episcopal major Church, if and insofar as it is or is to become a truly Christian community in all dimensions of Christian existence, with the eucharistic celebration at its heart, actually based on local but authentically human neighbourliness, then the parish, too, has in itself as its centre, as its most compact realization, what might be called a basic community.

Core Community as Basic Community of the Parish

It is not without reason that we speak today of a 'core community' also with reference to the parish community. A present-day parish [97] must certainly offer a welcome to everyone: it cannot neglect Christians by choice (for example, people who have a merely casual and qualified attitude to Christianity and the Church) and it must not become a ghetto for a few pious Christians from a very particular and restricted social milieu, sheltered from civilisation, society, and politics, and having a sectarian and bourgeois character. Nevertheless, an authentic and living parish today cannot be sustained merely by the power of the major, episcopal Church and its administration; it must likewise be sustained from below, from the base, by the faith and by the spiritual and not merely folkloristic attachment to the Church of convinced Christians and their fellowship; consequently it must itself form and carry within itself something like a basic community. But if all this is assumed, the thesis stated above is understandable: the spirituality of a parish, of its pastoral work and pastor, is today (in a positive, but not, of course, in an exclusive sense) the spirituality of a basic community.

Parochial Pastors – All Priests and Lay People Officially Active in the Parish

All that, of course, amounts only to a very broad and incomplete framework for articulating the question of the spirituality of a parish, of parochial pastoral work and of parochial pastors, particularly since parochial pastoral work and parochial pastors are not in principle to be understood as referring merely to the function of the pastor in charge of the parish, but as related to all those who are engaged together officially and as full-time workers in this pastoral activity. Nevertheless, and even though we are making a somewhat random selection, we may now ask: What must be the special characteristics of the spirituality of parochial pastoral work and parochial pastors, if it is to be the spirituality of a basic community, of a core community and its representatives?

In order to answer this question, even though obviously only very partially, it is possible to suggest two headings which are linked with each other in a kind of dialectical unity: loneliness of faith and fraternal fellowship of faith. With all due reservations, these are the headings under which the spirituality of parochial pastoral work today is to be characterized. What does this mean?

The Loneliness of the Faith of 'Parochial Pastors'

I shall speak first of all of the loneliness of the faith of those who have to carry out this pastoral work in the parish. In itself fides qua was always a matter of personal responsibility, it involved the decision and freedom of the individual: a decision of faith that he could pass on to others less than anything else in his existence, that he could not leave to other authorities and could not base on grounds already present. But formerly this faith found expression in a homogeneously Christian milieu even though the outlook of the public at large was secular and indifferent; it was possible to believe what more or less everyone seemed to believe, at least in public and in ordinary conversation, so that it almost looked as if, within the dimension of faith, the individual could be relieved of what had seemed the irremoveable burden of responsibility, of the decision for faith against unbelief, of hope against all hope, of unrequited love. It is different today. Christian faith must now be continually realized afresh, in the atmosphere of a secularized world, against a background of atheism, in face of a technical rationality whose advocates declare a priori that all statements which cannot be justified in terms of this rationality are meaningless or (to use Wittgenstein's term) belong to the realm of 'mysticism' about which we can only be silent.

Decision of Faith More Radical Than Formerly

In such a situation the solitary responsibility of the individual in his decision of faith is necessary and required in a much more radical way than was formerly the case. Consequently, part of the present day spirituality of the Christian in general, and in particular of those who have to represent this Christianity publicly by carrying out pastoral work, is the courage for a lonely decision contrary to public opinion, the lonely courage analogous to that of the martyrs of the first centuries of Christianity, the courage for the decision of faith that draws its strength from itself and does not need public support.

Personal Experience of God and His Spirit

This loneliness of the individual's conscience in regard to faith must have, however, an absolutely positive side in order to be able to endure. If it is to persist, it will live out of a wholly personal experience of God and his Spirit. It has been said that the Christian of the future will be a mystic or he will not be a Christian at all. This statement is very true if we mean by mysticism not singular parapsychological phenomena, but a genuine experience of God emerging from the depths of existence. According to Scripture and the Church's teaching, properly understood, the final conviction and decision of faith does not come in the last resort merely from a didactic indoctrination coming from outside, supported by public opinion in secular society or in the Church, nor from the purely rational arguments of fundamental theology, but from the experience of God, of his Spirit, his freedom, bursting out of the innermost centre of human existence where it is wholly real, even though it is an experience that cannot adequately be reflected upon or verbally objectified. Possession of the Spirit is not merely something known to exist as a result of didactic indoctrination from outside, but experienced from within. The solitary Christian in silent prayer in the final decision of conscience, not rewarded by anyone, in unlimited hope that must no longer cling to any calculable assurance, in the radical disappointment of life and the powerlessness of death willingly permitted and accepted, in the night of the senses and the Spirit (as the mystics say), etc.: this solitary Christian experiences God and his liberating grace, as long as he accepts these experiences (just indicated) and does not run away from them in an ultimately culpable fear, even if he cannot interpret and attach a theological label to the experiences of God and his grace transcending all individual realities. The Christian today must live from this loneliness of fundamental religious experience, he must clarify this experience and increasingly appropriate it in radical freedom. Only then does the theological indoctrination of Scripture and the Church's teaching acquire its ultimate credibility and existential practicability.

Independence of Public Opinion

This loneliness, with the scope it gives for freedom, with its negative side of being independent of ordinary public opinion and its positive side of admitting the experience of God in his Holy Spirit, is above all characteristic of the spirituality of those who represent Christianity in their pastoral work in the parish.

The pastor and his assistants in the parish today cannot be functionaries and managers representing a sociological factor called 'Church' and promoting its ideology in competition with others. They must be people who have had in solitude a living experience of the Spirit. They do not really need for that reason to talk about their experience (although Paul eventually did so). But the proclamation of the objective message of the Gospel and the Church must in any case be sustained and inwardly illuminated by their own solitary experience of the Spirit. To put it quite simply: those engaged in parochial pastoral work must themselves be spiritual persons. This is obvious, it is easily said, and yet it is the most difficult thing that is demanded from these people. If they can manage this most difficult thing, then everything else they have to do is easy. If the apparent lack of success in their work, their disappointments in pastoral activity, thrust them back, so to speak, into loneliness and forsakenness, this experience at its deepest level is the mystical phenomenon of that lonely and silent night in which a person silently encounters the mystery of God accepting him, sheltering him, and assuring him as a perhaps bitter but final consolation his ultimate freedom – assuming that the pastoral worker has come to learn better than to run away from the mysterious experience of God in ultimate loneliness and forsakenness. A primary characteristic of the spirituality of pastoral work today is loneliness in the sense in which we have at least tried to outline it.

Fraternal Fellowship and Its Experience of the Spirit

A second characteristic of the spirituality of pastoral work today, linked with the first in a singular dialectical unity, is fraternal fellowship in which the same all-sustaining experience of the Spirit is possible. This is a phenomenon which is perhaps only now becoming [101] clearer, of which we older persons can speak only hesitatingly and cautiously while awaiting its future. It seems to me that this phenomenon is something that we older persons never experienced or experienced only in the traces it left behind. In the light of our background and education we older people were also spiritually individualists, even though we gladly carried out the liturgy together as our obvious, objective task and duty. We need only look back into the past of the Church and of its life. We can see then that experience of the Spirit, 'mysticism', was understood and lived as obviously a purely individual occurrence on the part of the individual person for himself alone. When did anyone think of a common experience of the Spirit, when did anyone long for it or know it as it came about evidently on the Church's first feast of Pentecost, which presumably was not the occasion of a casual local gathering of a number of individualistic mystics, but of an experience of the Spirit by a community as such? An experience of this kind, of course, cannot and is not meant to relieve the individual Christian and to spare him that loneliness of the most radical decision of faith, since human individuality and solidarity are not factors that can be set off against one another or substituted for one another.

From Spiritual Individualism to Common Experience of the Spirit

This does not imply that an experience of the Spirit in a small community as such is a priori impossible, even though we older members of the clergy have never or scarcely ever known anything of the sort and still less attempted to bring it about. Why should there not be something of this kind? Why should not younger Christians, including the clergy, find an easier way to such a joint experience of the Spirit? Why should not something of this kind be more easily possible and more necessary today and in the future than it was formerly? Why could not phenomena like joint counseling, genuine human communication in the form of properly human conversation and not merely of superficial technical explanations, group dynamics, etc., be accepted, exalted, and sanctified among Christians by a common experience of the Spirit of God, so that a truly fraternal fellowship in the Holy Spirit emerges? In the last resort this sort [102] of thing need not take place in extraordinary, apparently almost parapsychological circumstances like those seen sometimes in enthusiastic groups of American Pentecostal movements. There is no need to speak in tongues, nor need there be any attempt to produce phenomena of healing by imposition of hands. But if people perhaps have little or no time for such things, that is far from saying that there simply cannot be any sort of communitarian experience of the Spirit at all. Why should there not be a really spiritual discernment of spirits undertaken jointly?

Why is the prayer to the Holy Spirit at the beginning of a meeting of a parish council or a pastoral team concretely and practically merely a pious opening ceremony, after which everything goes on as it would at a secular gathering, making use of purely rational arguments in the style of any sort of management? All this can be put forward by older people like us only very humbly and self-critically in the form of a question. But in this connection the younger clergy should at least suspect and try both cautiously and courageously to realize and test opportunities in the Church and consequently in pastoral work which are not yet by any means exhausted.

Growth of a Spiritual Team

A team engaged in pastoral work in the parish might perhaps slowly become a properly spiritual team, a fraternally spiritual fellowship, might have or slowly but courageously try to acquire a spirituality lived together in the proper sense of the term. I will not venture to offer any prescriptions as to how exactly this could happen. But it does not mean that there are not starting points or ways of access for this kind of spirituality in fellowship as such, even though they must first be sought and tested with patience, even though a critical transposition of occurrences in group dynamics into a properly spiritual event has still to be made, even though prayer together and Scripture reading together (purely as such as outward rite and as the study of exegesis by several people together) do not yet amount to a spiritual event. Here only the modest surmise may be expressed that in the future which has already begun a pastoral team must become a spiritual fellowship with a communitarian spirituality if it is really to do justice in adequate measure to its task in pastoral work.

THE SPIRITUALITY OF THE SECULAR PRIEST

I must declare from the outset that I am not exactly going to attempt to answer the question raised by this theme in the form of a plain, straightforward thesis, affirming the existence of a spirituality peculiar to the secular priest as distinct from lay persons and members of religious orders and at the same time indicating to some extent in what precisely this peculiarity consists. It is impossible for me to defend a thesis stated so unequivocally, but that is not the same as saying that this spirituality certainly does not have a specific quality of its own. What I can say, then, amounts only to some preliminary observations on the subject, which fall short of an answer but may explain why I am not venturing to make a clear decision on the essential question.

(1) It might be said that there are as many diverse spiritualities as there are different human beings; or, if we want to reduce the number of these spiritualities (which is identical with the number of human beings) to a manageable size, we could say that there are as many spiritualities as there are more or less stable, diverse types of human life and occupation. Every human being has his unique and never recurring individuality. If spirituality is simply a question of coping with our life's work in a Christian way, there are as many spiritualities as there are human beings. But if these human beings, each of them unique, both differ from one another under the most diverse aspects of sex, age, calling, social position, specific historical situation, etc., and come together under these aspects as groups, and if then the peculiarities of such groupings necessarily determine the spirituality of the people in these groups, the most diverse spiritualities [104] can be distinguished in the light of these considerations and we can rightly speak of a specific spirituality related to age, sex, historical period, nationality, calling, function in the Church, etc. This is as obvious as it is important, if we want to elucidate more exactly a spirituality appropriate to a concrete human being and assigned to him by God.

In this sense it is obvious that concrete spirituality (for example, as the concrete Christian way of coping with his life on the part of a secular priest) is inevitably different from that of a lay person or a religious, if and insofar as this calling and task of a secular priest differs from that of a religious or a lay person. But this statement of the obvious, whether the result of reflection or not, is not an answer to our question. A concrete secular priest is also a man, a human being in a particular historical and sociological situation, at a certain age, in a particular situation in the society of the Church and in secular society, with a particular physiological constitution, and so on. The concrete definitive form of his spirituality is therefore dependent on all these factors, a number of which he shares with some human beings, and others with other human beings who are not secular priests, If then we do not want to distinguish too many types of spirituality for the requirements of shaping a life in practice, the question arises as to whether the specific character of the spirituality appropriate to the secular priest as a result of what is certainly the peculiar nature of his vocation is of such consequence that it cannot in practice be neglected in favour of forms of spirituality in which people today are distinguished from one another under other aspects and for other reasons much more essentially than, say, a modern secular priest from a modern religious or from a lay person living a truly and radically Christian life. Seen in this way, the question of a specific quality of the spirituality of the secular priest that is of considerable practical importance as compared with other factors determining a person's concrete spirituality has not yet been answered.

(2) For the time being, however, we may disregard this problem of the question of what truly existential import the specific character of his vocation (which must certainly not be denied) brings to the spirituality of the secular priest, if this import is compared to what is brought into his life by other factors which he shares at all times (or at least today) with people who are not secular priests. But if we [105] disregard this question and simply ask about what is specific to the spirituality of the secular priest (which undoubtedly exists) if and insofar as this state of life is distinguished from others, from those of lay persons and religious, we are faced in turn with the question of how to define the nature of the secular priesthood and to deduce from this the peculiar character of the spirituality of that priesthood. But then we are faced with a new question which is not easy to answer, as is evident from the great and confused discussion of recent years about the nature of the ministerial priesthood.

Is this nature to be defined in the light of the sacramental powers which belong to the ordained priest as distinct from the lay person? Is the priest to be understood in the light of his mandate to proclaim the Gospel, even though the ministry of the word has its culmination in the exhibitive word of the sacrament? Is the priest to be regarded fundamentally as a (at least potential) leader of a local Christian Church (regional or personal in character)? Is his nature to be defined in the light of the episcopal office? Is he simply the concrete bearer and representative of all the peculiar qualities with which the Church confronts the individual Christian, from whom it is distinguished, even though he, too, is simultaneously a constituent member of this same Church? These and similar questions cannot, of course, be worked out and answered in detail here. But, even if we assume that they have been answered in a general way and feel certain that the different aspects of the priesthood as indicated are not mutually contradictory but form together an integrated nature, many questions still remain open with reference to this attempt to deduce from the nature of the priesthood a spirituality specific to the secular priest in which these essential elements really gain a considerable existential weight.

We ought first to ask what diverse elements in the nature of the priesthood really have a considerable importance for the priest's spirituality. For example, if we really take seriously the active participation of lay people in the eucharistic celebration, it may not be simply taken for granted, for example, particularly by a young priest today, that the sacramental powers as such have existentially a considerable importance in his life. As distinct from the outlook of an older generation which stressed the existential and consequently spiritual significance of belonging to the sacral sphere distinguishing the priest from the lay person, perhaps a young priest of today will [106] grasp more easily and more clearly the existential importance of his life and consequently the considerable influence on his spirituality of his task of proclaiming the word of God. But, even if we leave aside the delicate question as to which of the different elements of the nature of the priest are of decisive importance for his spirituality, there still remain further questions. For a start, the specific quality of a spirituality derived from the nature of the priesthood belongs, of course, also to priests who are members of a religious order. In this sense, then, there is no difference between the secular priest and the priest belonging to a religious order.

There can be no doubt that spirituality in the orders of priests over the past centuries has been deduced more from the priesthood as such than from what is specific to the religious state as distinct from the secular priesthood and that, consequently, until recently no one saw any problem in the fact that spiritual directors in priests' seminaries were mostly regulars. Although things are now gradually changing, until very recently it was scarcely possible to suggest that such a spiritual director, not being a secular priest, could not understand at all or at best only from outside the spirituality he was supposed to instill in his students. If the spirituality of the secular priest, then, is determined by his priesthood, the question remains open as to how it is distinguished from that of a priest in a religious order. At the same time it is scarcely possible to be satisfied with the explanation that the spirituality of the priest in a religious order involves an addition to the priestly character that is determined by the specific qualities of the religious state. This would mean that the spirituality of the secular priest is defined merely negatively and it would still not be clear what distinguishes this spirituality from that of the priest belonging to a religious order.

A further question arises if we want to define the spirituality of a secular priest in the light of the all-around, complete nature of his priesthood. We may ask whether the essential elements of the priesthood are of very considerable weight for the existential Christian attitude, for the spirituality of the secular priest, if we take into account the motivations which assume these essential peculiarities in the different historical, cultural, and sociological situations in the world and in the Church. Of course, if we want to do so, we can deduce from the nature of the priesthood the character of a spirituality corresponding to it. But is not this spirituality utterly pale, or [107] easy to confuse with the spirituality of a Christian as such, or merely the sum total of precepts for fulfilling properly the tasks and the duties of his state on the part of the priest, if it is compared in its abstract nature with that priestly spirituality which differs with different times and situations? If we consider priestly spirituality in the Church under these aspects, differentiations begin to appear that make it impossible to reduce this spirituality to a common denominator, unless we take refuge in what is wholly abstract and therefore cannot be binding.

What did a priest or bishop (in practice, the same thing) look like at the time of the Pastoral Epistles? What did a missionary as mentioned in the Didache look like (if we want to regard him as a priest)? What was a cleric like under the strict control of a Cyprian in the third century? What image of the priest did Chrysostom see reflected in his first ‘mirror’ of the priesthood? What is the type of the secular priesthood presented in the community life of Augustine with his clergy? How did a medieval parish priest behave in his parish? Assuming that they were not merely caricatures of the priesthood, what were prince-bishops and warring popes really like? What is the spirituality of a specialist theologian, of a Curial official, of a worker-priest? What is the image of the priest in the Ecole francaise or as suggested by Pius X? We have only singled out quite arbitrarily a few of the variations in the course of history of the image of the spirituality of the secular priesthood. But these alone make it clear that the secular priest’s spirituality is so greatly differentiated by the different cultural and ecclesial situations in which it has to be lived that what is common threatens to disappear as a theoretical, abstract idea behind these differences or in practice is scarcely different from the general Christian attitude of all times and all states of life.

In addition to all this, there is a further question to which we can draw attention only in passing. Is the secular priest’s celibacy in the Latin Church to be included among the essential elements of the spirituality of the secular priesthood? If it is, then we have here a spirituality different from that of the priesthood in the Orthodox and Catholic Eastern churches. If not, then this spirituality of the secular priest, deduced from the nature of the priesthood, but in which celibacy has no part, is so general and abstract that it cannot be very helpful, since it leaves out a very typical element in the life of a [108] priest in this Latin Church of ours. But if we decide on an affirmative answer to the question just raised, a great deal still remains obscure. For it is not at all clear from what standpoint the secular priest observes the celibacy that is supposed to determine his spirituality. Is the meaning and motivation of this way of life identical with the meaning and way of life observed in accordance with the evangelical counsel of chastity by members of religious orders? Or is this celibacy of the secular priest in the last resort to be assimilated to the unmarried state contrasted by Jesus in Matthew 19:12 precisely with that accepted ‘for the sake of the kingdom of heaven’, without however suggesting that the former, enforced by circumstances, must necessarily be considered immoral or un-Christian?

If the celibacy of the secular priest has to be regarded as identical with the single state of the religious (at least on the assumption that it cannot otherwise be lived truly and in a way commensurate with human dignity), then between the spirituality of the secular priest and that of the member of a religious order there would be a convergence which would render any further distinction between the two spiritualities a matter of idle speculation, since (in Germany, at least) the financial situation of the secular priest and that of the regular on the whole (apart from wealthy professors of theology among the secular clergy) can in practice scarcely be distinguished; it is the same with obedience, which as applied in the religious orders today amounts to little more than the secular priest's acceptance of his bishop's directives. If it is said that secular priests may live as individuals while priests in religious orders have a community life with its own social structures, it can also be pointed out that in practice the life of a religious is often very isolated and, on the other hand, in practice and in theory the secular priest is not debarred from leading a community life, as we see it lived in various forms and to varying degrees of intensity, for example, by Oratorians and other communities of secular priests.

(3) A further difficulty in defining a spirituality peculiar to the secular priest arises from the fact that, for very far-reaching and profound reasons, no human and no Christian life can be lived in the light solely of a single basic attitude or precept. Every human life must necessarily grow out of a plurality of attitudes which can never be wholly united under the control of deliberate human planning, but must be left in obedience to God, to his providence and his decrees. [109] Even the most radical Christian way of life not only cannot but may not be determined and shaped in the light of any single precept. Neither flight from the world nor love of the world, neither action nor contemplation, neither passive identification with the downgraded nor struggle to change social conditions, neither theology of the cross nor theology of glory, neither renunciation nor human enjoyment of the world, neither life nor death, nor any of these things alone and as such can be the sole precept or the sole formative principle of a Christian life. We are not going to explain at length here why this is so, why really Christian life-styles in all their variety and differences of emphasis (which are necessary and justified) can essentially have only a single and absolutely final radicalness: that is, to entrust the plurality of life (which can never be completely rationalized) calmly and silently to God; to project life plans and lifestyles, aware that none of these can be realized and certainly may not be realized in 'chemical purity', if they are to remain Christian. Even Francis of Assisi's life of poverty, radical as it was, did not display any monomaniacal exclusiveness; a radical 'corpselike obedience' in a religious order is necessarily combined with a person's own free self-determination which cannot be subject to anyone else's approval. Humility is human only if the humble person is not merely humble, etc.

What is at once so obvious and at the same time supremely wise is what makes the distinction of life-styles and spiritualities so difficult. If we want to set apart the meaning and spirituality of the religious life from the life-style of the Christian in the world, we run into the danger of proclaiming and canonizing a monomaniacal radicalness of certain attitudes – escapism, renunciation, otherworldliness, etc. – which cannot actually be made effective and which are simply not human and still less Christian. If it is claimed that these distinctions between the religious life and life in the world are not completely exclusive, but involve only differences of emphasis, of priorities among possible structural principles of a Christian life, this is certainly important, but it also obscures again the distinctions between the two lifestyles as we first come across them, especially when these variable and fluctuating shifts of emphasis have to be translated once more into the life of the individual or the Christian in the world as such. Then it is possible for the religious, without being disloyal to his vocation, to enjoy life uninhibitedly and spontaneously [110] to a considerable degree, injuring no one, but not experiencing the reality of the law of the cross; and conversely a Christian 'in the world', governed by the law of the cross, can live in the shadow of continually renewed self-denial. But if we take refuge (not entirely without justification) in the concrete differences in the outward mode of life in order in this way to clarify the difference between religious life and life in the world, we have certainly pointed out differences (for example, in clothing, in the external life-style, etc.), but we have not answered the question of how these differences have a considerable influence on a person's innermost feelings and on spirituality itself. We have to allow also for this basic difficulty when the nature of the spirituality of the secular priest is to be defined. It is clear from the outset that it is determined by a large number of contrasted peculiarities.

It is also understandable that the concrete situation in which a particular secular priest is living is of decisive importance for the place where the emphasis is to be laid among these dialectically mutually opposed peculiarities of his priestly existence. If a Roman Curial cardinal and an African priest in the bush or a worker priest in a French factory are all priests, the 'dosage', the emphasis among these individual dialectically opposed peculiarities, is vastly different for each of these priests and it is difficult to speak, except in a very abstract way, about a common spirituality. The conditions of life in which the nature of priestly spirituality must be realized are so diverse that the 'mixture' of contrasted essential peculiarities inevitably takes such varied forms that the one spirituality appears concretely to be determined almost by one peculiarity alone, the other spirituality almost solely by the other peculiarity, even though in, every spirituality (if and insofar as it is Christian) both peculiarities must exist. Unfortunately, it is not possible here concretely to describe such historical examples of these diverse spiritualities in detail.

(4) With all these difficulties, another solution might be suggested. Let us see in what this consists and whether theoretically or at least practically it is effective. It consists in the thesis that the spirituality of the secular priest in itself is materially the same as that of other Christians in the world and is distinguished from the latter only formally insofar as (in addition to the obligation which rests on other Christians in the world) a second obligation to the same spirituality [111] arises for the priest when he comes to practise it: an obligation arising from his special office, which as such must also urgently impel the secular priest to practice this spirituality.

This thesis certainly has its attraction. In a sense it recognizes completely a spirituality of the secular priesthood, but it evades the painful effort to mark out the content of this spirituality as distinct from that of the Christian simply as such; instead of this it can remind us that every Christian is called and obliged to the perfection of Christian existence. From that standpoint what we call 'the evangelical counsels' (in certain circumstances, also the celibacy of the secular priest and other spiritual obligations laid down by canon law for him) do not imply a higher degree of Christian perfection as such and thus of the spirituality characterized by the counsels: all that they do is to provide for those aspiring to the one perfection of love of God and neighbour common to all Christians different conditions of life and special aids by which they are distinguished from other Christians. In favour of this thesis it can be said that it provides a simple explanation of the immense variety of spiritualities of the secular priesthood, since this variety is basically identical with the diversity of serious Christian living which is found among normal Christians as a result of differences of age, culture, sociological status, etc. The thesis could also be recommended because it prevents from the very outset any pretence on the part of the clergy to be a spiritual elite; the cleric, too, has nothing else to do but to become as good a Christian as possible, but he has an additional obligation in this respect arising from his special vocation. But, despite its apparently neat solution of the problem, the thesis also has its difficulties.

In the first place, would not this thesis have to be regarded as valid also for the religious, so that no further distinction between different spiritualities in the Church could be made at all? But have we not then thrown out the baby with the bath water? Are we not contradicting a unanimous tradition in the theology of spirituality which always sought to distinguish essentially between several spiritualities, at least between that of Christian lay people and that of religious, as Vatican II made clear, even though, as the Würzburg Synod stressed, one and the same goal of perfection of life is common to Christians in the world and to religious and their different ways may not be distinguished as higher and lower realizations of Christian [112] existence? This seems to be a real difficulty, at least when we recall the fact that priestly celibacy in the West brings priestly spirituality very close to the spirituality of the evangelical counsels, despite the query we raised earlier in this respect.

A further difficulty about the thesis just formulated consists in the fact that, at least at first sight, the office of the priest obliges him to fulfill his life in certain ways that do not otherwise occur in a Christian life in the world and that consequently his office does not involve merely a new, additional obligation in a Christian life, but materially determines this life as distinct from that of the Christian lay person. This seems obvious and certainly finds expression in all descriptions of priestly spirituality. There should be really no dispute about this. But we ought to look a little more closely and introduce more exact distinctions if we want to make clear why and how the specific official obligations of the priest also introduce material peculiarities into his spirituality, assuming that such peculiarities have considerable existential importance in the life of the priest. For example, the question might be raised (however tiresome it might seem to some people) whether participation in the eucharist in the way proper on the one hand to the priest and on the other to the lay person is really considerably different in the existential spirituality as such: in other words, in the opus operantis necessarily sustaining the opus operatum.

If we raise doubts about the view that the sacramental power proper to the priest as such is what substantially distinguishes the priest's spirituality from that of the laity and then go on to ask what other official tasks and obligations impose a special character on the content of priestly spirituality, then presumably we shall be referred to the ministry of the word: the obligation of the priest in the name of the Church, in a missionary spirit, in season and out of season, with his whole existence, to stand up before an unbelieving or purely secular world for the Gospel of God, his forgiving grace, his crucified and risen Christ as the irreversible self-promise of God to the world. Such a ministry of the word must undoubtedly leave its mark on the innermost life of the priest. So, too, on his spirituality. But if with the Second Vatican Council's theology of the Christian laity we stress the laity's ecclesial mission in the world, if we are clear that a lay person really radically convinced and leading a radically Christian life in the modern atheistic or secularized world simply cannot [113] avoid or may not avoid bearing witness to his Christianity by his life – of which bringing the word to his fellow men is a part – then this determination of the content of the secular priest's spirituality in the light of his ministry of the word is again not so absolutely clearly convincing and does not distinguish priest and layman so obviously, as long as we assume that the layman, too, lives radically a real spirituality, as he ought to do. If we take these things into consideration, the difference between the two spiritualities is very greatly reduced and amounts more or less to the fact that the priest in virtue of his office has simply an additional obligation really to live one and the same Christian life, one and the same spirituality, which he has in common with all, and so also to bear witness to the Gospel which it is his official mission to preach.

The reader may deplore the apparently irregular course of these reflections and blame us for not having the courage to put forward a metaphysically and theologically clear and decisive theory of the spirituality of the secular priest as distinct from that of the laity or of the religious. I think, however, that this vacillation in the last resort springs from the very nature of the problem. The one Christian life from the one Holy Spirit in the one following of Christ takes concrete shape at different times, in different callings, under the influence of different charisms, in thousands and thousands of forms, always new, always different, continually surprising, and yet in all these countless variations remaining the same. Both because of the innumerable possibilities of the concrete development and because of the ultimate unity of this life and this spirituality, it is enormously difficult and even a little futile to work out a kind of Linnaean botanical system for all these countless forms of spirituality and set them out neatly within the scheme, only to discover once more that the concrete spirituality of a particular human being, because of the plurality of its elements and the different stress laid on these elements, could again be brought simultaneously under different types of spirituality; and it is by no means certain from the very outset that the specifically priestly element even in the life of a holy priest must be the particularly and all-around determining characteristic of his spirituality.

(5) Bearing in mind all that has been said up to now, including all the queries, we may attempt in conclusion very briefly to say something more about the content of the spirituality of the secular priest. [114] It does not really matter whether what we have to say applies only to the secular priest or whether a priest in a religious order, or even a lay person, can claim it as true also for himself. Neither would we want to claim that what is said here about the spirituality of the secular priest is valid for all times and for all historical and cultural conditions everywhere in the world. We are speaking of the secular priest in our own country and at the present time. But it must again be expressly stated that this spirituality cannot be defined (either theologically or humanly) in the light of the spiritual 'exercises' planned for the secular priest in the Code of Canon Law hitherto in use. The spirituality of the secular priest necessary today in our country will not become a reality as a result of retreats based on monastic spirituality.

It may sound old-fashioned, but it seems to me also that the spirituality of the secular priest needs to be deliberately cultivated, to be systematized and exercised. The importance of this insight, derived from the monastic life (which, it seems to me, still has its value) was formerly exaggerated and the unsuccessful attempt was made to bring the secular priest's spirituality into line with a system aimed at producing ascetical and spiritual profit. This, of course, did not work, and it is even less likely to work today. The spirituality of the secular priest will be a truly Christian endurance of the life that is particularly his own and really involves a spiritual task for him. This, however, does not exclude but, in fact, includes a certain system, exercises, an agenda for each day, planning in advance, the coherent organization of his time, etc.

It can certainly be said that the secular priest today must regard himself as the preacher of the Gospel, commissioned by the Church. He must be convinced that this calling of his can be fulfilled only with the involvement of his personality and his life, that it is consequently not a task only for part of his time, for office hours. From this it follows that the priest's professional task and consequently his spirituality cannot consist merely in the completion of a number of measurable individual achievements, that the rest of his life, too, is subject to the always overwhelming demands of the law of his priestly calling. Precisely in order to be able to fulfill this calling, the priest certainly needs leisure, a sphere of privacy in his life, recreation; but all these things must be determined by what is properly the law of his life and do not amount simply to a right that can be taken [115] for granted and must not be disputed by anyone. If the priest's task, to be paid for by his life, is to spread the message of the Gospel, if that very message requires him with Jesus to take the side of the poor and deprived, then I do not know whether the prosperous lifestyle (adopted as a matter of course by a majority of the clergy in this country) really corresponds to the spirituality required of the priest. In other countries, even in Europe, it is different. There priests are mostly poor, simply because they can scarcely do anything about it. But does not Christian spirituality consist in realizing without affectation a life-style that brings the priest at least close to the poor, so that people can see that there is someone here who renounces, for the sake of the kingdom of heaven and without reward, something that no one could prevent him from keeping?

A revision of the average life-style cultivated by the German clergy would do them good, particularly before external circumstances compel them to do so. Such a revision today would certainly be a part of a modern spirituality of the secular priest. If we look to Jesus, it seems to me that it is not absolutely clearly a part of our spirituality to be counted in the German Federal Republic mainly, almost entirely and rightly, among the defenders of present social conditions. To be honest, we priests in this country are not particularly obviously and impressively the conscience of the nation where this conscience ought to prick us – and not only with reference to the struggle about the abortion laws. Such a socio-critical involvement is not merely part of the priest's professional task, but ought also to leave its mark on his spirituality, since it brings with it resistance, opposition, and similar experiences which must be understood as participation in the lot of Jesus. The priest of today can bring life to the preaching of the Gospel only if (as well as and as far as it is granted him) he is a mystagogue of that ultimate, internal, religious experience of God and his grace without which no one today can in the long run resist the pressure of his secularized environment and remain a Christian. But this assumes that the priest himself, as well as and as far as he is capable of it, has that personal internal experience of God without which he would be degraded to a cultic and ecclesiastical official celebrating magical and today no longer credible ceremonies.

We said elsewhere that the Christian of the future will be a mystic or he will not be a Christian at all. If this statement is true in any [116] sense, it is true especially of the priest. We may be very sceptical in regard to religious imports from the East. But is the spirituality of the normal priest such that he can rise to the challenge of this Eastern spirituality and that he can have a justified feeling of superiority on the basis of his innermost experience and the treasures of the Christian mystical tradition? Have we not too many priests here who rely on traditional popular piety and help to cultivate it, almost like enthusiastic chairmen of local associations for Christian folklore, but do not see that for socio-political reasons the 'people' are increasingly melting away; who do not see that the 'people of the future' are settled somewhere quite different; who simply ignore their properly missionary task of making new Christians out of pagans? Undoubtedly, there ought to be invested in this priestly task of proclamation rightly understood a spirituality which already exists here and there but has not yet acquired the clarity and obviousness which is the condition of the priest's effectiveness today.

THE SPIRITUALITY OF THE PRIEST IN THE LIGHT OF HIS OFFICE

The theme here is 'starting points for a spirituality of the priest in the light of his office' – of his office, that is, both as it is seen in what is properly the binding teaching of the Church and theology and also as it confronts us today in its historically conditioned concreteness.

First of all, a few preliminary observations:

(1)When I was invited to take part in this conference,[1] I had to stipulate (more from necessity than from my own choice) that I should be allowed to talk freely: that is, I would not bring with me a carefully prepared, written address. There may be advantages in this procedure insofar as there will not be any attempt to cover too much ground and consequently there is less danger of talking over people's heads. But the condition put forward and accepted has the disadvantage that I am liable to go round and round the point, to say and to stress some things and leave others in the background or forget them and thus to speak vaguely about a matter which certainly deserves exact and well-considered treatment. I must ask you, then, from the very outset to allow for this disadvantage and forgive me. In view of my declining strength, the pressure of other work, and my age, it would have been simply impossible to adopt a different procedure.

(2)You are listening to an old man. I certainly don't feel young; I am in my seventy-third year and at that age a person knows very exactly his limitations and particularly his limited opportunities of [118] practical experience. You are really pastors who have borne the burden and effort of pastoral work for years and decades; I have always been a teacher and, although very occasionally engaged in pastoral work, for the most part theologizing and philosophizing in my ivory tower. I am aware of this and must ask you also to allow for the fact and forgive me if this address turns out accordingly. Moreover, if we are talking about the priestly office and the spirituality it involves, each of us has inevitably a concrete image of this office and the spirituality resulting from it which is concretely determined also by our life, by our experience of life, our sociological, ecclesial situation – so much so that none of us can adequately portray this concreteness of our image of the priest and the image of priestly spirituality and consequently we impress on this image features that may well be legitimate, but which are not present in this way in the priestly image of another colleague. And if the same thing is noticeable also in the present lecture, that is, if you have the impression that I am going on and on about things which are of no interest to you, which really do not affect you, which strike you as odd, this, too, of course is an unavoidable situation which, we might say somewhat pretentiously and pompously, is part of the historicity and individual relativity of one man's perception of truth, particularly in his old age.

(3)I would like to say right from the beginning that I completely agree with what Father Zulehner has said about this theme as a whole and I think that what he has said about Type B as the type to be preferred today (since it brings out more clearly than Type A the special features of the present-day priestly situation and spirituality[2]) is in perfect harmony with my own opinion. And I even have the impression that there is nothing particularly that I can add to his comments, except at most to observe that this conception is absolutely legitimate and can be maintained in the light of the dogma of the priesthood.

(4)Obviously there are plenty of concrete individual types of priestly spirituality. Each of us has the right to give concrete shape to the possibilities of priestly existence and priestly spirituality as they occur in our own life. It is clear that a priest who allows his [119] spirituality to be shaped and conditioned in the light of his particular office and task will have as his ideal (and as what, in fact, he realizes) a spirituality and a priestly image differing according to whether he is a teacher of religion in a city school or living as a country pastor. Each way has its concrete justification. The conservative and the 'progressive', the intellectual and the simple, devout person, the quiet spiritual adviser (or what we might call 'the spiritual man'), and the apostle creating a sensation in the world: all these types can be justified and we must simply get used to accepting one another, acknowledging their right to exist, and not insisting that as priests we must all be molded in the same pattern. Each of us must gradually crystallize out of our own situation, our own temperament, and our own life history the priestly image and the type of spirituality that are right for ourselves, naturally being humbly aware of the fact that what we present is a priest, not the priest. All this is obvious, but, if you look into the concrete circumstances of our lives as priests, you will see that it is by no means so simple in practice and that this apparently simple norm is very often infringed.

I would now like to put forward some very general ideas on office and spirituality.

I

We begin with a very simple thesis: priestly spirituality is first of all simply Christian spirituality, Christian life in faith, hope, and love. Priestly spirituality is not (at least, not primarily) a kind of extra to a normal Christian life, but (while, of course, determined by the concrete life task of the priest as distinct from other Christians) the spiritual, Christian life of a Christian purely and simply. Today this is really obvious in the light of the practice and nature of the priesthood. It is obvious in the light of practice, for, exactly like other people, we have to live in a secularized milieu, we are impugned and called in question by a world of secularized values with its rationalism, with its technocracy, with its crowds, etc. One way or another, like other Christians today, we are living in a diaspora; neither for them nor for us are faith and Christian life and the hope of eternity to be taken for granted as something that we could pass over, so to speak, as unimportant for us and then find greater scope to develop a [120] sublime spirituality as our special job or as a kind of hobby. We are poor, tormented, frightened, threatened by the world as a whole, by politics and industry; just like the others, we are caught up into the whirlpool of secularization; faith in God, in an eternal life, the persuasion that our freedom is to be exercised responsibly before God, all these things create exactly as many difficulties for us as they do for other people. If this were not the case, it would not be an advantage, but a sign that we are living out of touch not only with our time, but also with our office and our own life, since we cannot really live this office and this life otherwise than in a genuine confrontation with our time and situation, society, culture, and lack of culture.

Priestly spirituality, then, is first of all Christian spirituality which, as such, is required of every Christian if he wants to be a true Christian and not merely a conventional or folkloristic Christian. But if we say this, the question will inevitably be raised as to what exactly this Christian spirituality is. We can, of course, say that it is life out of faith, hope, and love, it is life from the Holy Spirit; we can say that it is life from the Spirit of Christ, life from the Gospel; we can say that it is life from the following of Christ; we can say that it is life from the hope of eternal life, out of an ultimate responsibility in which we are aware that, whether we want it or not, we are living our life to the very end in freedom for or against God. We can say that Christian spirituality is life oriented to God's judgment, it means coping with sin that cannot be eliminated by referring to social or psychological constraints, etc. We can say all that, it is all true, and here and now there is really nothing more that I can say; to say anything more precise would require at least an eight-day retreat.

Simply to provide a spur, a question that is meant to be disturbing, I would like to add the following in regard to this Christian spirituality which is basically identical with priestly spirituality. When we speak of 'spirituality' (whether the term is a good one, very understandable, or pastorally useful is another question) we mean 'life from the Spirit'. But then the question arises as to just what this is supposed to mean. And the crucial point for us personally and in our pastoral work today is whether we not only succeed in getting this 'pneumatic', spiritual dimension of our existence into our own heads or the heads of other people by an abstract, conceptual indoctrination (which today will be more or less ineffective), but whether we can discover this Spirit as what we really experience in ourselves. [121] And this is extraordinarily difficult today in the age of sociological criticism of ideologies, in the age of natural science, in the age of Freud, in the age of depth psychology and of the psychological corruption of human beings. Is there in fact anything of this kind? Have you ever really experienced the Spirit of God? Suppose you say: 'Yes, I was once touched, or I was at one time devout, or I had the impression that there is some sort of God who is good, who quite likes me, although he allows children in Vietnam to be killed by napalm bombs'. In that case you ought to unleash on this claim of yours to have discovered the Spirit in yourself all the corrupting elements of psychology, of sociological criticism of ideologies, of rational psychology, technology, etc., and then ask if anything remains or if all that is left are merely words like 'God of love, grace, Holy Spirit, God's indwelling', etc., to which we cling because of some sort of feeling that in the long run we cannot do without this sort of thing. Are these words not all mere husks, long ago deprived of meaning in a long historical process from the time of the Enlightenment?

I said earlier that I cannot answer this question now. The reason why I raise it at all is in order to make clear what are the innermost structures that a Christian, and consequently a priestly, spirituality must have in order really to cope with these problems.

At most I can add only a few words which seem to be even more abstract and merely refer to the matter under discussion without getting to the root of it. In the last resort spirituality is man's absolute transcendence, beyond any categorial reality in him or outside him, into the absolute mystery that we call God; it is ultimately a transcendentality dying, crucified, becoming torn apart with Christ, not as a theory but as what happens in us in our concrete existence when we confront this life with its ultimate dependence on the incomprehensible mystery of God and achieve the acceptance, the endurance, of this life concretely with Christ through all categorial breakdowns, through all death, through all disappointment. Of course, such an experience of our own absolute transcendentality, crucified with Jesus into the absolute mystery, has a history in us. This is something that comes into existence slowly, we reach these things only gradually; perhaps there will be some people who never notice it or do not consider and cannot express in words what has taken place in them. At the present time, I think, at least the priest [122] (we shall come to practical matters later) should slowly come to see that something of this kind exists.

For the moment that must suffice to mark out the problems involved in the first statement that I wanted to make, to the effect that priestly spirituality today more than ever is simply Christian spirituality and not an addition to the Christian life. In this sense spirituality is understood as truly Christian life emerging from the innermost centre of our own existence and not merely as a fulfillment of religious conventions prevailing in Christianity and in the Church. Spirituality, Christian spirituality, is the active participation in the death of Jesus and, since he is risen, in that death as successful and as assumed into that ineffable, incomprehensible, not controllable, not manoeuvrable ultimate mystery quod omnes (as Aquinas would say) vocant Deum.

II

Coming now from the first part of our reflections to the question of priestly office. It is obvious that our priestly office must also determine the character of our spirituality and even provide its essential foundation. Not, properly speaking, as an external addition to our Christian life, but as the radicalness of that life which is required from us as official representatives of Christianity and the Church. From that standpoint we must ask what we actually understand by this priestly office. For you know just as well as I do that in the last decades there has been a tremendous amount of writing and discussion about the nature of the ministerial priesthood and some very diverse opinions have been expressed. Clearly, I cannot explain and work out all these things again here. I would like to say from the outset that what I am putting forward here by way of commentary on these themes is not to be understood and interpreted as the sole possible, more or less official theory. In Catholic theology today there is a great deal that is obscure, that is being discussed and giving rise to very varied opinions. This is because very many questions in the history of dogma confront us today as a result of our attempt to gain a more exact and impartial understanding of these things: questions, for instance, of the relationship and connection between Jesus and the Church, of the existence of seven sacraments, [123] of the relationship of the sacraments to the Church, of the possibility of a further development, and of the possibilities and limits of changes in the sacramental life of the Church.

If you read Hans Küng to the effect that Jesus did not institute a Church, or if theologians like him are saying that (whatever Trent may have defined) the sacraments are, of course, not instituted by Jesus Christ, however little I share these views and however much I have opposed them, I do not advise you to raise an outcry against them in the name of orthodoxy, but quite impartially to ask first of all how these views came to be expressed. We must note, for example, that it was about a thousand years before it was known that there are seven sacraments. Or if you really take seriously the most modern exegesis on what is known as Jesus' 'imminent expectation', if you take seriously the historical, concrete, theological relativity of the human consciousness of Jesus (a consciousness that could be developed, gain new experiences, produce new formulations), then, of course, questions like those on the understanding of the Church and the priestly office are not actually as simple to answer as Catholic theology assumed even as recently as thirty years ago. So much by way of preliminary remarks.

In regard to the priestly office I want firstly to issue a warning against a misunderstanding. To express it very cautiously, as this office is conceived today in concrete practice and in the Church's official teaching, normally (not allowing for emergency situations, but leaving these aside for the moment) only the legitimately ordained priest in virtue of his sacramental ordination can preside over and lead a legitimate eucharistic celebration. This we can certainly assume as a fixed point of theology on the nature of the priestly office, notwithstanding all the problems it implies. But we need not deduce from this that the priest must necessarily see his actual nature in the light of that fixed point or give expression to it in his spirituality. Not that anyone is forbidden to do so. But to say, because this power of consecration as part of his priestly existence is reserved (at least in the ordinary way and in the normal case) exclusively to him, that this is also necessarily the proper, most fundamental, and most decisive point from which he gains his own total understanding of his nature is something that is not (at any rate, not logically) demonstrated by this priestly reservation.

For we can also see an extraordinarily great historical variability [124] in the official nature of the priesthood. No one denies, for example, that Ignatius of Loyola wanted to found an order of priests, and Pope Paul firmly restrained us Jesuits from imperiling or dissolving the priestly character of the order. If we look at the life of Ignatius of Loyola, it is clear that he certainly wanted to be ordained. I would say, however, that this was simply because, for him, it was concretely the most practical way and the condition of the possibility of getting on with what he really wanted to do. In his own spirituality he was not at all terribly insistent about saying mass; if I remember rightly, he waited for a whole year after his ordination before he got as far as that, but then he said mass very gladly and with immense devotion. But with his first companions he went into prisons and ministered to the sick. For him it was enormously important to be in the closest possible contact with the poor and the socially underprivileged of his time in the prisons and to go into the hideous hospitals of that period, to convert prostitutes in Rome, perhaps also to run a school to inspire pious princesses, etc. In a word, what he in fact did seems open to the inane verdict or objection that it could all have been achieved by people who were not priests. Against this, it must be pointed out that precisely in view of historical variability and of theology it is impossible to describe anything as properly and solely priestly, as what only the priest can do. That is to say: preaching the Gospel, ministering to the poor, defending the underprivileged, following Jesus in this sense, prayer, a mystical sphere of one's own existence, are just as much part of the priestly office as – and I do not mean it in a pejorative sense – 'being able to say mass'.

How can this thesis be substantiated merely with an appeal to actual images of the priest in history, in which the function of presiding (in the strict sense) at the eucharist was by no means always and necessarily the central feature? How can such a thesis or such an image of the priest be demonstrated more precisely in terms of dogmatic theology? Here I am touching on opinions and theses which I really do not want to pass off as the Church's official teaching, views about which we can think what we like. In a question like this, where there is no really clear and binding official teaching of the Church, the theologian has no choice except to follow his own opinion.

Dogmatically and 'ontologically', from the nature of the case, the [125] absolutely primary datum is not the pope, not the bishops, and not the priests, but Jesus Christ, crucified and risen, who simply would not be the Risen One, would not be, as Vatican II says, the indefectible, irreversible sign of the salvation of the whole world, who would not be the sacrament of salvation for all times, if he had not with him by the invincible power of his grace the Church of the believers, of those who love him, of those who follow him. Such a Church which, as one and whole, is primarily the permanent sign of salvation, the permanent sacrament, which is God's presence permanently established in the world, such a Church as a sociological reality has an office, a power of government, which must be seen in the first place as one and whole.

Such a power of government can and must be split up into definite individual functions. The Church has always a function of government – not just of any kind like that of the state or of some other society, but one which is part of this indefectible nature of the Church which maintains to the end of time the presence of Jesus Christ as the irreversible sign of salvation. This one office is first and foremost one and whole. We cannot go on for ten hours or so here about dogmatics or ecclesiology and consequently cannot worry about how this ultimately one office is split up, articulated, and shared, and where in all of this divine law ends and merely ecclesiastical law begins; this is true even if we say that the papacy and the episcopate (and perhaps also a presbyterate split off from the episcopate) are of divine law – all of which is by no means obvious.

I would venture to say that, abstractly and in principle, I could imagine the whole Church as consisting of pope and bishops (in the sense that every priest is also a bishop). I would not want this. But what articulations of the ultimately one office are present unchangeably in the Church itself by its very nature (or, we might say, by the will of Christ), and what further articulations of office are left to the Church's free decision, is an extraordinarily difficult and obscure question. All through the Middle Ages there were minor orders and St. Thomas was sure that all minor orders were also sacraments, that, consequently, the conferring of these orders was also sacramental; the subdiaconate, too, was obviously regarded as a sacrament. In addition, of course – and this again is a difficult and obscure question which I cannot examine closely here – even when people speak of a divine right of papacy, episcopate, and presbyterate, it must be [126] remembered that these factors as expositions and articulations of the one office nevertheless have had a history in the Church. How am I to answer a Protestant exegete when he says that the primitive Church, as described in Paul's Letters (or elsewhere before Ignatius of Antioch), had a presbyteral constitution, since the apostles were still alive and were the true bishops, and so on? I can get out of the problem by admitting absolutely that even divine law has had a historical development in the Church and yet remains divine law, even though there was a long struggle before this development itself came to be recognized in the later Church in its own irreversibility and validity. Such a development toward irreversibility can certainly involve also an element of decision and of free institution by the Church, and yet the result of the development can be described as of divine law.

Why am I talking about all these odd things? It is from this standpoint that we can understand the great variability of the image of the presbyter in the Church, in other words, how functions expressly portrayed there can later fall into the background or even drop out completely, while other elements which were present at most in a rudimentary or potential way stand out more clearly than formerly. Consequently, even among such a large number of factors involved in a concrete priestly mandate, one or another may become more relevant to priestly spirituality and later cease to be so. Father Zulehner has drawn attention to some of these factors: representative of God, the person leading the community, etc. These are features which were wholly legitimate in a former priestly image, since they could also have a positive meaning even in their ambivalence; they could even have predominated in the image of the priest in former times, but that is no reason why they should have the same importance for all times. Nor can this plurality of features in the priestly image be regarded as a basis for the question of whether there are certain things that can be done by someone who is not a priest. Even if there are, it is wrong to conclude that these things are not fundamental for priestly existence and priestly spirituality. A priest might say: 'My priestly self-understanding and my priestly spirituality have their living roots in the fact that, welcome or unwelcome, I proclaim the unique message of the kingdom of God, of the crucified and risen Christ, to rich and poor, to privileged and underprivileged, that I commit my life to this task which I regard constantly as the [127] centre of my life, that I do not regard it as any kind of casual occupation, but as something in which I am investing my whole life'. Such a person has a concept of the priesthood that excludes as irrelevant the question as to whether another person, a pastoral assistant, a layman, can do anything of this kind. This is not to deny that priestly existence can also be seen in the perspective of the altar.

It might be said that the actual core of a priestly existence and spirituality, in the light of which the latter can be understood, may also be grasped and lived by someone who is by no means a priest. I would answer that such a person obviously ought to be ordained a priest. I would also say that if there are or must be pastoral assistants today who are permanent official leaders of a parish which is without a priest, then in God's name let them be ordained. Why? Because it would mean no more than giving them the sacramental ratification and palpability of what they really are. The same is true of someone who in practice does what is essentially the task of the deacon. By ordination nothing is really added that he did not already possess, but what he had is sacramentally palpably secured in the dimension of office in the Church. If someone were to tell me that this is an outrageous idea, I would ask him how he would cope with another situation. Suppose a person comes to the priest and tells him: 'I am really living as a Christian in imitation of the crucified Christ, I believe, I hope, I love, I sacrifice my life for my neighbour, I live my life more or less after the fashion of Mother Teresa in Calcutta, but now, Father, I have discovered that I was never baptized'. Is the answer: 'For God's sake, whatever you did up to now was of no account; it was certainly not Christianity, it was not life coming from the Holy Spirit'? No, here was a Christian, here is a Christian. Baptize him. Why? So that the life he is already living can be seen expressly in the dimension of the sociological and historical palpability of the Church.

We find the same thing in Aquinas. In his theology it was taken for granted that anyone who came into the confessional had in reality (in virtue of his repentance) already been forgiven by God. The whole late scholastic and post-Tridentine controversy about attrition and contrition and the like would have had no real meaning for Aquinas. In other words, for St. Thomas, the penitent received the sacrament because he was the sinner once more justified, which does not [128] mean, however, that the efficacy or the causality of the sacrament is denied. This is something I cannot explain here and now. In other words, the conception of a human and official task which in a sense precedes its sacramental ratification is certainly one that is involved in other comparable cases of the Church's sacramental life. What I wanted to say ought, of course, to be developed in a more exact theology of the relationship between word and sacrament, but this is not possible here. All I want to say now is that the priest can certainly regard himself today as the officially commissioned mystagogue of the faith of the parish and as its leader, as minister in all dimensions of its life, including the eucharist as the culmination of the sacramental word in the Church, and, therefore, I think, could by all means consider his priestly spirituality as the radicalness of his Christian existence and not as something added to it.

It would be possible, of course, to ask more closely what is 'official', to raise the question of whether it is necessarily identical (in the light of the Church's dogma, not that of its present legal practice) with 'lifelong'. But all that must be left aside here.

Before attempting to pass on to some more concrete images resulting from this way of understanding the priestly office (today both dogmatically justifiable and appropriate to our time), I would like to call attention only to one more assumption: that is, that with priestly spirituality, office absorbs a person's own life and life absorbs office. Here we find a difference from all other forms of work in society. Of course, a master shoemaker or a businessman, a diplomat or a politician, will develop out of his specific calling (if he pursues it in the right way) quite definite attitudes also for his personal life, his ethic, etc. But, from the nature of the case, since the officeholder here attests the whole of human and (by God's self-communication) deified life as such, and works for and must concern himself with the formation of the Church as the historico-sociological presence of this vast, gracious endowment of the world as a whole, this is something that cannot be understood as a particular calling in addition to which it is possible to have an independent private life in the strict sense. And, conversely, if the priest is someone who wants to be radically Christian and surrenders power over his whole life to this Spirit of God whom he can experience at the heart of his existence, then priestly existence is not a supplementary task, obligation, and burden of Christian life, as it might perhaps otherwise seem to be. Of [129] course, just like members of religious orders in their own way, the priest is thus up to a point authorized and condemned to be (if I may use the ugly word) something of a religious 'pro'. All this involves problems: the danger of overexertion, the danger of a mere legalistic ritualism, the danger of attempting to reserve for oneself a private sphere which cannot absorb one's personality. I did not want to do more than allude to these things.

III

In the first part of my comments I could do no more than mark out the questions of office and understanding of office on the one hand and that of spirituality on the other. I am well aware of the aphoristic and very vaguely selective character of what I have said up to now. I want to attempt now to become a little more concrete and to point to aspects of the image of the priest today which belong to it possibly from the dogmatic nature of this office and necessarily in our present situation.

When I was considering these things, I did not pay much attention to the very cleverly and correctly designed chart of such aspects by Father Zulehner. I approve of it and find it very good, but I shall permit myself to allude to these aspects in a slightly different way.

The first thing to be said perhaps is that the priest of today must be someone who can pray in a personal way. This does not mean, of course, that someone else, a lay person, who is not a priest in the Catholic Church, could not manage, cultivate, and do the same thing just as well. And it certainly does not mean that this capacity for personal prayer for a priest (since he is the official representative and the commissioned mystagogue of the faith of the parish and its leader) is something that is merely presupposed to his priestly existence as such. No, the priest as such ought to be someone who is able to pray personally and not only as officially carrying out the liturgy or reading his breviary, but by his very nature and going far beyond these duties. This ability to pray ought not to be seen as a sectoral occupation in his life, but as a basic structure of his existence, since he is the very man who ought always to accept, as dependent on it, the presence of the absolute mystery facing every man and truly to live it in freedom.

[130] I have, of course, a very bad conscience and almost an aversion, in face of my own inadequacy, to saying anything of this kind. But how can a priest today, confronted by man's rational scepticism, proclaim something of the faith if he has not a genuine, original, religious, and spiritual experience in a sense entirely absorbing him, from which he simply cannot escape? How can he do this unless in his concrete experience of life, in his disappointments and in his fundamental joys, in his love, in fidelity, in his dependence on other people, in his responsibility, in his grief, in his confrontation with death, he is always someone for whom all this means the approach, the closeness of God himself? At a time when there is not a homogeneous Christian public opinion to support our proclamation of the faith and to make it almost inescapable for the normal human being, at a time when none of this exists any longer, we cannot simply say in the light of Scripture: 'That's how it is, there is a loving God and there are grace and eternity, etc.' I must discover in myself and also in others and make increasingly clear such a religious, original experience of existence (which can be freely rejected but is inescapable) open to the mystery of God, and then speak from this centre. How precisely this is done and how it 'comes off', and how an actual failure in this respect can be given a religious interpretation, are additional questions which cannot be discussed here, since that would take us too far. But we ought to be able to start out from an original, religious experience in this sense, which is prior, not in time, but by its nature, to verbalized, objectified Christianity as officially taught and institutionalized; otherwise we shall get nowhere today. How many people we then reach or do not reach is another question and not one that is really of the greatest importance.

Anyone, I might say, who has taken up music seriously will not allow his attitude to music to be affected by the fact that there are musical philistines for whom it is no more than complicated noise. It is more or less similar in the sphere of religion. The priest under any circumstances ought to be a man of personal prayer, a mystic. I do not want to presuppose or to develop any theology of mysticism. In the classical understanding of mysticism it has been seen too much as a higher sphere of religious experience, accessible only to a very few chosen individuals. I do not deny that such a conception has a certain importance and contains some truth. But in the last resort, [131] measured against the extraordinary psychological states of mystics like John of the Cross and others, faith, hope, and love are not something lying beneath these states, something merely ordinary, but that which permeates these extraordinary phenomena of submergence and the like and is wholly accessible as properly religious experience also to the normal Christian and particularly to the priest – in fact, to anyone who faces in freedom the radical incomprehensibility, depth, and absoluteness of his existence toward God.

A second thing that might be said is that the priest of today and tomorrow is the poor priest who willingly admits this poverty into his actual existence and gives it a positive emphasis there. There can be no doubt that the Church, measured against social conditions elsewhere, is increasingly becoming a poor Church; the only question is whether or not we accept this poverty as the occurrence, the jump-off base, for man's ultimate crucified transcendentality (radicalized by grace) into the incomprehensible mystery of God. In this sense poverty has of course, not only an economic, but also a cultural dimension. Certainly the priest today (like yesterday and tomorrow) should not be a philistine, an uncouth person, or anything of that kind. But the fact remains that if a professional ventures to carry his whole existence into a very special dimension of possible human existence, he must in some sense be the poorer, must be prepared for renunciation in regard to other dimensions. This holds quite generally. Could you imagine a musician practising at the piano for eight hours every day and then having an equal interest in other hobbies and occupations which are possible without any reservations for other people? He renounces one thing or another and we priests, who, in a sense, invest our whole life with all its resources, tasks, and possibilities in this religious existence, can nevertheless enjoy a glass of wine, do a little photography, or get away for a holiday, etc. The priest should certainly not use his piety as an excuse for cultural, intellectual, scientific philistinism, but he should see clearly that he must have the courage to be poor even from a cultural standpoint, not to have his finger in every pie everywhere, not to be keeping up with everything, not even to be tempted to do this sort of thing, and not to think he has to use a thousand secular privileges to win support for his task.

In this sense there is also a kind of cultural poverty of the priest that is part of his nature and his life. It is by no means our task or our [132] duty to want to be in the top class in all the dimensions of the very differentiated cultural, intellectual, scientific, and artistic life of the present time. We should not renounce these things out of philistinism, uncouthness, laziness, or lack of interest, but in this respect we should want (occasionally to a very considerable extent) to be poor, if only because no one, with his time, with the finiteness of his resources, and even with the finiteness of his heart, can do everything at once and because this kind of renunciation, this crucifixion of the inward person, a renunciation of quite legitimate dimensions of human existence, is in fact the way in which we constantly break through into the mystery of God himself.

The fact that there is then also something like a spiritual poverty is really obvious to someone who provides himself with a few key words from the theology of mysticism. I get worried and uncomfortable sometimes when I hear my fellow Christians and preachers of the Gospel proclaiming that the meaning and fulfillment of life can be found only with and through and in God. Of course, in the last resort, this is true. But at the same time do we not often forget that God is the meaning of our life as the God of incomprehensible judgments, as the God whom we simply cannot take into account as a fixed and definite factor in our life, as the God of freedom, as the God of incomprehensibility? In mystical experience there is something that is described as 'night': in other words, as poverty, as an ultimate innermost threat to our existence, to which the only response is to summon up the last resources of faith, hope, and love for this incomprehensible God. Of course, we Christians should be cheerful, serene, uninhibited, showing people that it is possible and desirable even at the present time to find space in our lives for something like joy in the senses, for festivity, celebration, serenity, for laughter, lightheartedness, and frankness.

All this is true and enormously important, but we need not act as if we did not also break free from ourselves to fall into God's incomprehensibility where we know nothing more. In face of this world of horrors, of inevitabilities, of dead ends, of terrors, of 'Auschwitzes', how can I offer today a theodicy, a justification of God? How can I put forward credibly such a theodicy, if I am not sure that there is in the last resort nothing left but man's capitulation, also in spiritual poverty, before God. If someone today can go to his death serene and composed, confidently and happily, there can certainly be no [133] objection to this. But neither can there be any objection if, in an ultimate tribulation, in an ultimate poverty, torn away from ourselves, we have to die into the darkness of what is called God. In brief, there is a kind of spiritual poverty that we by no means want to deny or suppose. The troubled Christian who feels that too much is asked of him, the Christian who prays with Jesus 'My God, my God, why have you deserted me?', who consequently does not by any means die with Socratic serenity, is not perhaps the only possible and conceivable Christian, but he is also a genuine Christian who attains the peak of his perfection precisely in the abyss of his spiritual emptiness and poverty.

This threefold poverty – economic, cultural, and spiritual – is part of Christianity, of Christian existence, and of Christian spirituality in general, but nevertheless for that very reason is something required particularly from the priest and particularly today.

In the third place it must be said that the priest today is primarily the servant of the faith of others. Father Zulehner has rightly made the extraordinarily important statement that we cannot assume today the existence of Christians as baptized, as already indoctrinated and structured by a universal, homogeneous, Christian public opinion, but must be mystagogues of faith for them. Consequently we have no reason for not accepting without prejudice this necessity of ours to be continually learning the faith afresh. We need not behave as if we were not threatened in our faith and could take it for granted. We should not trifle with temptations of faith on the ground that they are not doubts of faith in the strictly moral theological sense; we do not need to make blunders like this. There is certainly also a religious experience that embraces all these possibilities of a Christian existence in struggling with temptation, in poverty, in darkness, in a sense in joy and peace, and that can really give a person the feeling or, better, the existential experience, a final awareness, of actually not being able at all to escape or lose God, since God's apparent remoteness itself attests and makes present God precisely as God. But this again does not exclude the fact that we ourselves have also a history of faith, that we must be lifelong adventurers of God in ever new situations.

Formerly, Christian spirituality was conceived as an ascent to a height of what was called 'Christian perfection', with the ways and stages of this ascent in a sense outlined and marked out in advance [134] by the theology of the spiritual life. Today the older priest is less likely to have the impression that he has become more perfect than he was at the beginning; he will see himself as someone who is led by God's providence in his life history through continually new and surprising situations, in which he can never say from the outset what will happen and how he must cope with it. When St. Teresa of Lisieux was apparently tempted most of all in the final stages of her life (as compared with earlier stages), for that very reason she had reached the summit of her perfection. The courage to recognize from the outset that we are involved in a lifelong adventure which cannot be calculated in advance is part of our priestly existence today if we want to be the servants of the faith of others.

There is a further point. And now I really am getting onto thin ice. I am absolutely convinced that, apart from a special vocation from God (which may certainly exist), a priest like myself should and must devote his life – all his time and all his strength – to normal priestly functions, and that the present shortage of priests makes it impossible for the Church to do without this kind of commitment. Nevertheless, as a result of a number of experiences, I think that a certain spirituality associated with true worker-priests (if not the concrete calling itself) might be a critical, generative factor for our priestly life. The courage to be and to remain sociologically inferior, to live a life in which one belongs in some way to the underprivileged, to the plebes; the courage to lead a life in which one is no longer the village pope, in which one does not simply belong to the educated classes and where academic status counts for nothing; the courage to live shoulder to shoulder with the poor where life is bitter, monotonous, dull: all these things are characteristic of the mentality of genuine worker-priests (and I know some of them) who do not want to be worker-priests in order to abandon (like certain types) their priestly self-understanding. This is a mentality which could have a critical sting, an evocative power for us.

I must say that for me these people represent something of a threat to a well-provided bourgeois existence and may frighten us out of assuming that this existence is normal and to be taken for granted. A number of conclusions may be drawn. Although what I said earlier remains important, I think that the priest today must be something of a nonconformist. That is not to say that he should be an inveterate grumbler, forever complaining, continually at odds [135] with his bishop and with Rome: all these infantilisms are ruled out from the beginning. But if the Church is permanently a Church also of sinners and if this sinfulness has its effect on the exercise of office, if, in this way, office by its nature necessarily leads to the temptation to institutional harshness, crudeness, reactionary attitudes, it cannot be said that a certain critical dissociation from what is actually practised in the name of office in the Church is something that is incompatible with a present-day priestly image. This should be sufficient on this topic.

The priest of today will necessarily always be overtaxed: overtaxed between what he is and what (as he himself knows) he ought to be, overtaxed by people, overtaxed by the Gospel, overtaxed by his office, overtaxed by his time. It should be noticed that this is itself the concreteness of his existential transcendence, not his speculation about transcendence. Consequently it is possible to face this continually excessive pressure with a certain composure. It acquires a positive meaning. It can be admitted that it would be terrible if I no longer had to distinguish between what ought to be and what in fact I am and what I achieve. To be able and to have to entrust our own finiteness, wretchedness, even sinfulness, completely and utterly to God and his grace: all this is part of Christian and priestly existence. As priests, we are not and need not be the sort of people who can imagine that they have done everything well and as the great experts and men of achievement ought to make a triumphant entry with flying colours into God's eternity. With Teresa of Lisieux we shall have to admit that we come at the end of our life as wretched sinners to God and it would be a terrible self-deception to think that we had 'made it'; we have the right (if I may put it in that way) to feel in a blessed defiance that we are the people from whom too much is expected. The fewer priests there are, the more we shall be in this sense the ones who are overtaxed.

It is impossible to do much more here than to suggest the headings under which some other points might be considered. In his present day priestly existence the priest must be familiar with theology. I am not saying this simply because I have been teaching this strange science all my life. Anyone who has to proclaim the Gospel responsibly today – not merely to a few schoolchildren eager to learn and young enough to accept everything without reserve, but to the present-day despisers of Christianity – is in a difficult situation. He [136] cannot preach that kind of neo-Protestantism which is prepared to sell off cheaply the true, Christian, completely Catholic faith, he may not offer people no more than what their superficial humanism prepares them to accept from the outset; but neither may he use expressions or adopt attitudes in regard to the faith he offers which create unnecessary difficulties for others. I think it must also be said that Rome, feeling bound to address the whole world at once, is in a desperately difficult situation. And it seems to me that Rome has not yet come round to saying the things that have to be said in a way that avoids sufficiently the difficulties and abrasions which could and ought to be avoided. Rome, too, ought to do more theology. But this is true also for us. Despite all 'mystical existential experience' coming from this innermost centre, we are the ones who have to present a verbalized doctrine which itself comes from the Church and requires, not only personal religious experience, but also a continually fresh recourse to the Church's teaching and to the work that is and must be accomplished by theology for the understanding of the Church's teaching.

There is a further point that I can indicate also only as a problem, without answering it. In the Church's practice there was a period of sacramental enthusiasm when it was tacitly assumed, if not explicitly taught, that grace is conveyed primarily and actually more or less solely in the sacraments as such and exclusively there. This is wrong and contrary also to present-day mystical, religious experience. It remains an open question also for our spirituality whether we are really drawn in an ultimate existential radicalness into our destiny precisely in the sacramental celebration of the death and resurrection of Jesus, or at the point where we see our life as a failure, or where we die, or where we go on living in an ultimate incomprehensibility of an unselfish love or freely exercising a responsibility that is not radically accepted or recognized by anyone else. Obviously a priest should attempt to direct his religious life so patiently, so impartially, so lovingly that he has always a positive relationship (one that stimulates his religious existence) to sacramental events in the Church. But a religious life of grace, experience of the Spirit, and sacramental life are not simply identical, and the priest, although he is the functionary of the sacramental aspect of the Church, need not act as if they were. If for any reasons at all, connected with his individual lot in life, someone cannot honestly [137] claim that carrying out the eucharistic cult or administering the sacraments is even existentially the high point of his life, he has no need to lie, no need to talk or act as if it were. He can always do this sort of thing with sufficient involvement, if he goes about it in a reasonable way; he can also, of course, celebrate the eucharist simply when he wants to do so, like Ignatius of Loyola or Philip Neri, the latter having his full, consecrated chalice in front of him for hours, sipping from it every quarter of an hour and for the rest living immersed in God. All I wanted to do was to point out that experience of grace and sacramental celebration are not simply the same thing and that the two are often separated even in priestly life and a person's individual organization of his life and lot can be readily and naturally accepted in this respect.

I had wanted finally in a nonpolitical sense to refer at least briefly to the political dimension of priestly spirituality. What I mean by this will be understood by anyone who reads without prejudice and with good will the paper produced by the joint synod of the dioceses of the German Federal Republic in 1978: 'Our Hope: A Profession of Faith in Our Time'.[3] I do not think that we must or should practise politics in a banal, commonplace sense. But I think that the unity of love of God and love of neighbour, the knowledge that where we stand by the poor, persecuted, underprivileged there is or can be an intimate experience of grace, and that an ultimate transcendentality of man radicalized by grace into the mystery of God and a self-renunciation in love of neighbour represent the two aspects of the one Christian life, the unity of love of God and love of neighbour – in the last resort, that is what I understand here as the political dimension of priestly spirituality; and that is something quite important.

In so far as we experience this transcendentality of grace in the following of Christ, we cannot say as a result of an abstract reflection that we are equally indifferent to poverty and riches, higher status and lower status. Jesus fought (but not as a political revolutionary) unequivocally on the side of the poor, the persecuted, the plebs, and did not rise above them in glorious neutrality. The synodal paper says more or less that we can put up with the opposition of the educated and the clever, but that the Church cannot dissociate [138] itself from the disappointment of the poor, of the disappointed, of the persecuted; nevertheless, the Church has been and remains today too much a Church of the middle classes. This does not mean breaking out at once in wild revolution against it. But it does mean that we ought to feel a sting and an unease in regard to the image of our Church and that the priest ought to feel these things in his spirituality since he, too, experiences God's grace only where he becomes poor with the poor and counts them among his friends. In that sense there is something like a political dimension to our own spirituality.

PART THREE

Life in the Church

ON THE THEOLOGY OF WORSHIP

It is obvious that in an essay of a few pages only one or two somewhat arbitrarily chosen remarks can be made on the theology of worship. From the outset there is no intention of having recourse explicitly to the teaching of Scripture or the Church's magisterium. If the starting point of these reflections consists mainly in general questions of sacramental theology as a whole and of the Church's actual worship as such, as distinct from other sacramental happenings that thus remain somewhat in the background, this may be admitted from the outset. Anyone who understands and can accept what is said here can easily draw for himself further conclusions with references to worship in the strict sense.[1]

It seems to me that in the Church's consciousness there are two different conceptual models for God's grace as it operates in human history. I use the expression 'conceptual models' because the question of whether the ways envisaged here of considering grace are in reality mutually contradictory will not be raised at all, still less decided. Nor will it be claimed that they are regarded in the Church's actual sense of faith as strictly isolated and wholly disconnected from one another and mutually contradictory; it is not denied that the two models exist together in the Church's concrete awareness, even though the emphasis on one or the other is considerably different. Nevertheless, they are different. And this diversity itself arises from a still more universal and fundamental difference in the ways in [142] which God's relationship to the world is seen. But this, too, is something that cannot be discussed here.

The first way of seeing the operation of divine grace in the world considers that operation first of all and primarily as an intervention of God in the world at a definite point in space and time. The world is regarded in the first place as secular, both because of what we call 'nature' and because of the inherited sinful state of this history of the world and humanity. If, then, forgiving and deifying salutary grace (as God's self-communication) is supposed nevertheless to be present in the world, this presence is conceived as an intervention of God at a certain point in space and time, as (we might say) 'actual grace'. This conceptual model of grace is based on the implicit assumption that grace can be an unmerited gift of God only if it becomes present and only where it becomes present in a secular and sinful world to which it is mostly denied. From this initial position it is easy to understand the sacraments. They are then seen as events at certain points in space and time (with a quite definite modality which need not be examined more closely here) where grace comes to be in a world otherwise deprived of it. It is easy then to understand the causality of the sacraments: they produce something not otherwise available. From this standpoint also it can be understood why in a theology of the sacraments dominated by this conceptual model the baptism of infants (who are assumed to be previously lacking grace) is regarded as the ideal type for sacraments as such, even though with particular sacraments (of the 'living', etc.) qualifications and reservations have to be made. But even in cases in which a sacramental event presupposes a 'state of grace', this state is regarded merely as an objective and moral precondition and not a something which itself acts as a cause and is manifested in this sacramental event (as such always coming freshly 'from outside'). Even with the sacraments of the 'living', which presuppose the presence of justifying grace, the model of infant baptism remains predominant: grace is effected in the sacraments, not as being brought there to historical and ecclesial manifestation, but as produced purely as the effect of the sacraments.

The second way of considering the operation of grace starts out from the assumption that the secular world from the outset is always encompassed and permeated with the grace of the divine self-communication. This grace is always and everywhere present in the [143] world. It is, of course, present either in the form of a pure offer to freedom (not yet decisively possessed) with 'infants', or in the form of acceptance with the 'justified' person or of rejection with the sinner (a rejection which does not mean that it ceases to be the sinner's demanding and orienting existential); but it is, always and everywhere. Its unmeritedness does not prevent it from being the existential always and everywhere present at the very heart of human existence. In the last resort, world as 'nature' is not plain and obvious reality, totally involved with itself, to which grace is added (so to speak) subsequently as the result of a kind of secondary decision of God; from the outset God is lovingly seeking in freedom to bestow himself and, because he so wills in freedom, because he wills grace, he must create a 'nature' to which he can impart himself as free love. Nature is, because grace has to be. From the outset, as ground of nature, grace is the innermost centre of this nature. Consequently, nature is never actually purely and simply secular; it is always nature graciously endowed with God himself. When and where it finds expression in personal freedom, this freedom means the acceptance of this innermost centre of reality, acceptance of God and thus of salvation history.

This salvation history is not made up of successive spatio-temporal interventions of God in an otherwise secular world, but is the history of freedom (of God and man) which accepts this innermost and enduring deification of the world, gives it historical expression and thus itself constitutes the history of this deification of the world. In this way grace is understood, not primarily as 'actual', but as 'habitual' grace. There is a salvation history as history of divine and human freedom, but the latter is precisely the history of the ever present deification of the world by God's self-communication, through which alone salvation history can be conceived at all and hence the history of the world must be understood even in a true and radical sense as history of God. The sacraments accordingly are not really to be understood as successive individual incursions of God into a secular world, but as 'outbursts' (if we can express it in this Way) of the innermost, ever present gracious endowment of the World with God himself into history.

This manifestation of the ever present deification of the world in historical events is, of course, involved not only in the sacraments, but wherever man accepts himself as such in freedom. Properly [144] speaking, this is something taken for granted in Catholic theology. For this theology teaches that every 'salutary act' sustained by divine grace is a realization of this grace and consequently its 'augmentation' implies a more radical acceptance by man's freedom and the establishment of deeper roots in man's existence. Grace, then, occurs, not only and not even primarily in the sacraments, but wherever a person accepts and realizes in freedom his existence as it is, as radically and immediately dependent on God. If this Catholic teaching on the deification of our free acts by grace (by the 'theological virtues') is correct and taken seriously, then there is actually no merely secular sphere (in the dimension of truly existential freedom) lying alongside the sacral sphere, the latter being made up of sacramental and ecclesial occurrences. In ordinary language what is known as the sacral sphere (comprising sacraments, liturgy, worship) is better understood simply as a definite individual materialization (fundamentally necessary and binding on man) within that sacral sphere which is brought into existence by the grace that is everywhere present and effective and which coincides concretely with the sphere of existential freedom as a whole as a reflex self-awareness of the grace everywhere present and effective, finding expression in the sphere of the explicit word and the ecclesial community.

As we said earlier, we wanted first of all only to put forward two conceptual models of grace, without opting absolutely for one or the other. The first conceptual model will certainly not be simply rejected here: it elucidates the unmeritedness of grace, the unpredictable historicity of grace in its realization, the sacraments as causes of grace (a doctrine which must be maintained in accordance with the Council of Trent), although this does not imply that these truths can be maintained and expressed only in the light of this conceptual model. This, it seems to me, is not the case. If grace is understood (as in the second model) as universal ground of salvation history, it does not for that reason cease to have an actual history, for it must be realized concretely in the history of man's freedom. As man's 'nature' is realized in history and nevertheless is the universal ground of this history, the same is true of grace. It is the ground of salvation history, which is itself realized in that history. Without simply rejecting the first conceptual model, then, it is possible to maintain that the second is at least more intelligible and easier [145] to reconstruct for people today. In particular it gets away from the idea that salvific grace necessarily takes the form of an intervention by God from outside at a definite point in space and time: an idea which for people today somehow savours of the miraculous and mythological. In a more extensive substantiation of the legitimacy and sufficiency of the second conceptual model, it would, of course, have to be shown more precisely that here, too, there is a place for a rightly understood theory of sacramental causality, that there is a difference between a baptized and an unbaptized infant, that infant baptism, even if not absolutely necessary, is at least meaningful and something for which parents must accept responsibility in an ecclesial community. It is impossible to explain all this more closely here; but it can be done and has been done elsewhere. All we are looking for here is a further elucidation of the nature of Christian worship in the light of this second conceptual model.

Admittedly there are many aspects of the nature of Christian worship which are left out of consideration here. We are not considering really explicitly the communal and sociological character of Christian worship, which is derived from the nature of the Church and ultimately from the unity of humanity in its salvation history. We are not considering the differentiations of the Church's worship as they arise out of the diversity and the unity of word and sacrament. We are not asking here when we have liturgy in the proper sense of the term or how it is distinguished from private prayer and private gatherings for prayer. The idea of 'feast', or 'celebration', which finds expression preeminently in worship, is not under consideration here. We are not speaking about the political or eschatological character of worship. We are not asking whether or how the sociological and hierarchical character of the Church must be brought out in worship. The general anthropological presuppositions of worship are left aside. Many other things which ought to be considered in a theology of Christian worship remain unmentioned. As we said, all we are attempting here is to consider a little more concretely the conclusions in regard to worship that can be drawn from the second conceptual model of grace. If all aspects of grace itself could be explicitly described or assumed as clear and apparent, it would also be possible to deduce from this second conceptual model of grace an entire theology of worship in all its aspects. The possibility is all the more obvious since grace by its very nature has a communal, sociological [146] character, orienting man in every respect, and consequently also as a social being, to God. But, since it is impossible here either to elucidate or simply to presuppose these aspects of grace, our reflections must remain fragmentary.

In the light of this second conceptual model the Church's worship is not the installation of a primarily sacramental sphere in a profane, secular world, it is not an event otherwise without roots in reality, but the explicit and reflex, symbolic presentation of the salvation event which is occurring always and everywhere in the world; the liturgy of the Church is the symbolic presentation of the liturgy of the world. This does not diminish its significance. For its significance consists in the very fact that it presents the liturgy of the world spatio-temporally and in sociological explicitness and thus conveys to man an explicit and reflex enactment of this liturgy of the world, of salvation history. The liturgy of the world, in which anyway we are always involved and which reaches its culmination in the cross of the Son, is seen by man in his dreary existence only through a haze, obscured by the banal ordinariness of life. It has to be reflected and elevated to the explicitness of the word and its sociological presence. It is true that something of the explicitness and reflection of this liturgy, which is identical with the whole history of humanity, is necessarily always part of man and his history, and consequently there are religions always and everywhere. But this reflex explicitness of the world liturgy as it comes to be has its own history and it is not left to our discretion what point we want to occupy in the history of this process, of becoming explicit. As history of the world's freedom, this liturgy attains its irreversibility in Jesus Christ, his cross and resurrection; and if and insofar as we have come in the history of our individual freedom to know this culmination of the universal history of salvation, of the world liturgy, it is no longer left to our discretion whether or not we want to allow this historical achievement of the explicit irreversibility of salvation history in Jesus Christ to be reflected and made explicit also in our life, whether or not we take part in bringing out the reflex explicitness of the culmination of the liturgy of the world in the liturgy of the Church.

As existences incarnate in space and time, we Christians are subject not only to the 'must' of allowing man's transcendental essential realities and his existentials (of which grace, too, is always and [147] everywhere a part) to find explicitness in some conceivable way in space and time, but also to the 'must' of giving to the actually attained culmination of this history of spatio-temporal explicitness of grace in Jesus Christ space and time in our own life: of celebrating (which is the same thing) the Church's worship. When we say that we celebrate the death of the Lord until he returns, we are saying that we are giving space and time explicitly in our own life to the culmination of the history of the world liturgy which is present in the cross of Jesus (the culmination of both this history itself and also its spatio-temporal reflex explicitness). Consequently what happens in worship of this kind is not something that does not occur or has not permanently occurred elsewhere in the world, but something that occurs always and everywhere or has occurred for all time and for everywhere in the world, and is explicitly celebrated, stated, and appropriated. This ecclesial worship is important and significant, not because something happens in it that does not happen elsewhere, but because there is present and explicit in it that which makes the world important, since it is everywhere blessed by grace, by faith, hope, and love, and in it there occurred the cross of Christ, which is the culmination of its engraced history and the culmination of the historical explicitness of this history of grace. To anyone who has (or might have had) absolutely no experience in his own life of this history of grace of the world, no experience of the cosmic liturgy, the Church's liturgy could only seem like a strange ritualism, as strange as the sacrificial action of a Vedic priest who feeds the gods and thinks that by his action he is keeping the world on its tracks.

As we said earlier, at this point the essential qualities of Christian grace, as they find expression in the Church's worship, ought to be explained more precisely. It ought to be shown how this grace is the ground of an ultimate unity of mankind in itself and with God; its eschatological character as pledge of the final consummation stressed, it ought to be made clear how in the history of freedom of the world this grace has already found its irreversible victory in the cross of Christ. It ought to be shown (and this is of decisive importance) how this grace has its history in man's day-to-day existence with its splendours and failures and is actually experienced there. Only then could it be really shown and made clear how these aspects and characteristics of this grace are given a new, reflex manifestation and presence in the celebration of the act of worship. It is [148] impossible to explain all this in greater detail here. But perhaps enough has been said to indicate in what the real ground of the Church's worship and the right understanding of it consists.

The pastoral situation for gaining a genuine understanding of the Church's worship is very complex today and consequently obscure. Certainly there are many people even today who come to learn through worship itself, through its outward shape and through the natural way in which it is carried out, that God's grace becomes an event here in the midst of a world which they experience only as profane and godless. There are certainly people like this. It is certainly right to use every possible means to shape the act of worship in such a way that it operates on its own account as an event of grace in a secular world. Where there are (still) people like this (for a great variety of historical and sociological reasons) and where the attempt to leave the Church's worship to make its own impact and its own appeal is largely successful, it will be possible still to bring home the idea of worship from the standpoint of the first conceptual model of grace. But the fact cannot be concealed that to very many people today worship is at first seen as a kind of magical procedure and as an old-fashioned ritual now devoid of meaning, while they have the impression that a true encounter with God (if it is possible at all) must take place in the dull bitterness of ordinary life with its experiences of hope, responsibility, love, and death.

These are people who find themselves and God in 'life' (as they say) and not in ecclesial-liturgical ceremonial. If a way of access to the Church's liturgy is to be opened up for them (and they seem to be the great majority today), it can only be from the standpoint of the second conceptual model of grace. It must be admitted readily and without hesitation to such people that grace, encounter with God, can occur and does actually occur in the ordinary routine of secular life. Prior to any kind of defence of the Church's liturgy, for these people in the first place there must be produced a clear way of access to the depths of their own existence, where God has communicated himself from the very beginning and where he offers himself to man's freedom. In the first place a mystagogy (if we may use the term) of the mysticism of ordinary life is necessary; it must be shown that he whom we call God is always present from the very outset and even already accepted, as infinite offer, as silent love, as absolute future, wherever a person is faithful to his conscience [149] and breaks out of the prison walls of his selfishness. With these people such a mystagogy is a necessary presupposition for an understanding of the Church's worship. If this understanding is to be awakened, they must be shown that worship is the explicit celebration of the divine depth of their ordinary life, that what clearly appears in it and consequently can be more decisively accepted in freedom is what occurs always and everywhere in the ordinary course of life. These people must be helped to understand that the very fact that God is worshiped in spirit everywhere (and not only in Jerusalem) is itself made explicit and celebrated in the worship of the Church.

It is perhaps an exaggeration to describe (as I once did) the transition from the first to the second conceptual model of grace as a 'Copernican turning point.' It is an exaggeration, since the first conceptual model never entirely alone and on its own account determined the sense of faith of people in the Church; an exaggeration also because care must certainly be taken in preaching not to overlook for the practice of the Christian life those aspects and characteristics of grace which are less explicit in the second conceptual model. The transition cannot be regarded as so sharp, since the second conceptual model does not exclude the fact that the acceptance of grace offered universally is always a free act of the human person and thus makes the salvation event into an historical happening and since this free acceptance of universal grace itself depends again on God's free decision, which can neither be theoretically explained nor worked out in advance. But these aspects of grace, which are more clearly and more immediately evident in the first conceptual model, may also not be overlooked or passed over in silence in a theology of worship. On the other hand, it also remains true that the second conceptual scheme offers people today a better way of access to the understanding of grace and thus also of worship. Consequently priests ought to make sure that this model is really present in their concrete preaching. Then worship will be seen, not as a strange, reserved, special region in secular life, not as divine liturgy in the world, but as the divine liturgy of the world, as manifestation of the divine liturgy which is identical with salvation history.

THE SUNDAY PRECEPT IN AN INDUSTRIAL SOCIETY

MEMORIAL OF SALVATION

In order to say something intelligent about Sunday and to cover somehow all the problems involved, we ought first to ask about the exact meaning in the Old Testament of the Sabbath precept, of sanctifying the Sabbath. Undoubtedly there were religious and social reasons for it. The precept was meant for all in Israel: slaves, as far as there were any, normal and ordinary people, the better off, and even the beasts. But I do not want to say more here about this Sabbath precept.

Second, something ought to be said about the historical and theological aspects of the adoption of this precept in the Church of Jesus Christ. Here of course (and this has primarily and directly nothing to do with Israel) should be mentioned the peculiarity that the Church continually celebrates afresh in the weekly liturgical sequence the resurrection of Jesus as a unique historical and fundamental salvation event. A theological content is thus available which was not present in the Old Testament celebration of the Sabbath, even though behind all these celebrations there is a basic human datum: the fact that man can celebrate and should celebrate in a temporal sequence the anamnesis (memory) of events that occurred once and for all in salvation history. Admittedly, this is a theological problem for its own sake and extends to these solemnities as a whole. I do not know exactly what the situation was in the Old Testament or in later Jewish times, if and in what sense the Sabbath observance had anything to do with the exodus from Egypt. It might be said anyway [151] that the Sabbath precept in Israel, too, had an anamnestic (commemorative) dimension in terms of salvation history and was related at least to God's rest on the seventh day of creation. In a word and in any case, in the Christian celebration of Sunday there is a reference to a quite definite event of salvation history, so that the question arises as to how, why, and for what existential-ontological reasons man is the being that can celebrate historical events which are apparently simply past. And what is the meaning of such an anamnesis? Is it merely historicist reflection, inspired by a certain historical curiosity, on a past event which nevertheless cannot in this way really be brought up again out of the depths of the past? Is it possible with the aid of this kind of recollection to make something like this present in the proper sense of the term or, so to speak, continually to repeat it? But in regard to this second point also I should not discuss here the Christian acceptance of the Sabbath precept as a way of recalling the death and resurrection of Jesus.

PRECEPT OF THE CHURCH

Third, however, I want to say something quite different. Although somewhat disguised in the ordinary course of preaching, according to the Church's universal teaching, there is no Old Testament precept which, as such, is still binding on Christians. And among these abrogated precepts is that of the Sabbath observance. If a Christian preacher insists on the Church's Sunday precept by recalling the thunder and lightning of God's holy covenant on Sinai, he is telling lies, he is asserting something that simply does not make sense. We must say, then, that the Sunday precept properly speaking is not a divine precept, either in the light of man's permanent nature (as preternaturally or supernaturally elevated) or in the light of the Old Testament: it is and remains a precept of the Church. That the Church has a right to issue a precept of this kind and that this right and the fulfillment of the precept by the individual Christian have also deeper, more universal foundations and grounds, this again is a different question. That a human person is a worshiping being, that the Christian in his religious existence must necessarily relate again and again to the death and resurrection of Jesus, that, consequently, he must (to express it somewhat prosaically in terms of moral theology) [152] from time to time take part in the eucharistic memorial celebration of this death and resurrection of Jesus, all these are deeper reasons justifying the Church's Sunday precept; but the requirement of attending mass on Sundays and, as we used to say, abstaining from servile work is a precept of the Church and basically no more than that. That the concrete form of this precept, its interpretation, the strictness or elasticity of the interpretation, are conditioned historically is something we have certainly experienced in recent decades.

BINDING UNDER PAIN OF GRAVE SIN?

Fourth, if we recognize soberly, honestly, and without dissimulation, that it is a question here of a positive precept of the Church, then (independently now of the question of a conceivable or not conceivable, a desirable or not desirable, further development of the concrete shape of this precept) it is in any case clear that the precept is open to all the restrictions and interpretations appropriate to a human precept, which simply does not directly involve man's eternal nature nor, consequently, his permanent supernatural determination by grace as such. Obviously, a positive precept of the Church is open to many more possible interpretations and can more easily cease to bind in the concrete individual case as a result of excusing causes or other reasons than a properly divine precept of natural law or a divine precept of the supernatural order as such. It can really be taken for granted also today that an individual can consider himself dispensed in the concrete from the Sunday precept of participation at mass, not only because of sickness, but for other sound reasons. There is no need here to go into the casuistry of how there can be reasons for dispensation from the obligation of Sunday mass, or what these are. That is a different question, with which other people can amuse themselves. In any case, on the one hand we should take this Sunday precept seriously (even though it is no more than a precept of the Church) and, on the other hand, we have the Christian's liberty to interpret and apply these human statutes and precepts with a certain magnanimity and inner freedom. I do not know if this could be a practical rule of thumb (that is something for the moralists to consider), but I would say that whenever and in whatever cases the [153] inner existential and supernatural justification of the Sunday precept is not conclusive for the individual case, the Church's precept as such is not to be regarded in that individual case as binding under pain of grave sin.

We might presumably attempt to justify this proposition from various aspects. It might even be said that the Church can by no means impose an obligation, as we say, under pain of grave sin, unless it is also required for deeper reasons by natural law or supernaturally by law or morality. But we may also perhaps leave aside a universal justification of this kind and face the situation at the present time. There now exists in fact in the Church a mentality (which is not opposed by the institutional Church) which regards the Church's precept (even though it amounts to more than this in its formal implications and authority) as not really binding under pain of grave sin, unless participation in the eucharistic sacrifice is seriously required as a result of an existential and mental-spiritual necessity. What exactly do I mean by this?

ANALOGY WITH OTHER PRECEPTS

From the very nature of the case and in the light of his faith, a normal Christian is obviously aware that he must frequently take part in the celebration of the eucharist, whether there is a precept of the Church to that effect or not. An obligation of this kind, which arises, so to speak, from the nature of things and which already or again exists as an institutional arrangement quite independently of the properly official precept of the Church, can certainly not be proved to be binding in the concrete every Sunday. But a Christian should have the good sense to admit that he would certainly be basically, if not perhaps also expressly, denying his inner, fundamental, essential relatedness (conferred by baptism) to the incarnational structure of the death of the Lord (that is, to his sacramental presence in the eucharist) if he simply did not bother about mass over a long period. This is an obligation that can, of course, become concrete, even if it is impossible to demonstrate mathematically exactly when and where. It is like living in the same house with my mother: Who is to say when I have to talk to her? And if she lives elsewhere, it is impossible to demonstrate on what day I must visit [154] her or for how long. Nevertheless, as a human being and as her child, I have a serious moral obligation toward this woman to realize my personal relatedness to her in the concrete by visiting her. How often that should be cannot be calculated mathematically. Attendance at mass likewise may depend on all kinds of circumstances: on the state of my religious development, on my opportunities or difficulties of being present, on my entire subjective, particular character, etc. One person will perhaps commit a serious offence against love for his mother if he is living in the same town and does not visit her for months. For another, a quarterly visit may be quite sufficient.

EXISTENTIAL OBLIGATION

It is rather similar with the mass. I would say that a Christian ought to know (precept of the Church or not) that he has an obligatory relationship to the Church's eucharistic celebration as the memorial of Jesus' death and resurrection by which he is redeemed. And where an obligation of this kind seems in the light of a reasonable, serious, and scarcely disputable human judgment to find concrete expression, so to speak, and to be concentrated in an actual celebration of mass on a particular Sunday, the Church's precept becomes one that we normally describe as a morally grave obligation. It becomes binding under pain of grave sin.

Where this is not the case, the Christian ought to take part in the eucharistic celebration at least every Sunday, if only because he really should occasionally do something Christian, the omission of which does not bring him at once into serious conflict with God. But apart from that radical obligation, I would claim that the Church's precept is not concretely binding here and now under pain of grave sin. Like the speed limit on the motorway, it is a standard which we must observe in a spirit of both Christian freedom and seriousness. At the same time, the question remains completely open as to when and where in a normal human life there can be an absolute dilemma between the fulfillment of a precept and grave sin (which would lead to eternal perdition). This is not to be tried out in regard to the Sunday precept in particular, since this is not an appropriate test case.

[155] Fifth, we must have regard for a number of consequences of the development of modern industrial society. These include the five-day work week, the varying work periods, the fact that it is very difficult to impose the Sunday precept and participation in the eucharist as binding on people in certain occupations (bus conductors, for example, and the service sector as a whole); the fact that in some places the obligation can be fulfilled by attendance at Saturday evening mass, which, despite biblical analogies, really amounts to a departure from the Sunday precept; the present-day opportunity of other evening masses which in a religious sense and existentially may be more appropriate and convenient for modern people on a weekday than a Sunday mass in particular; the fact that the weekend of Saturday to Sunday or even merely Sunday is rightly seized on by people in the large industrial centres as an opportunity to escape from the concrete cage of the metropolis, to enjoy a longer period of recreation, etc. These and similar facts raise for the Church the question of the situation in principle and generally today in regard to what is known as the Sunday precept.

Briefly, it might be said that this Sunday precept as such, being a positive precept of the Church and not directly a commandment of God, is subject to the Church's discretionary decision and consequently could be abolished. That is not to say that the Church could dispense itself from the task of continually reminding Christians of their relatedness, to be concretely realized, to the sacramental celebration of mass and not merely to the death of the Lord as such. Nevertheless, the Church could abolish the Sunday precept properly so-called and, for example, leave it to individual Christians to decide how to realize this essential relatedness to the eucharistic celebration in their concrete life, likewise how often they would do this and on what days, etc. This is a real possibility.

REASONS FOR MAINTAINING THE TRADITION

At the same time, however, it must be pointed out that it is difficult to say whether the Church ought to make its pastoral decision (which cannot be simply arbitrary) on these lines, or could even be permitted concretely from a pastoral and human standpoint to do so. In the first place, even at the present time in our modern industrial [156] society, the individual days are not absolutely reduced to a secular level. Monday to Friday amounts in fact to something different from Saturday and Sunday. It might even be said that the two days of the weekend have acquired, as a result of secular cultural and civilisatory developments, more clearly and firmly a special position in regard to the other days. They are freer than they could be formerly. If the farmer's wife nowadays gets her milking machine working comparatively quickly on Sunday, she has in any case more leisure than she had even twenty or thirty years ago, when each cow had to be milked separately. And there is ample evidence that the weekend in secular terms possesses more clearly that civilisatory and cultural status which makes it suitable for a special and even religious demarcation of Saturday and Sunday, or simply of Sunday. Allowing for the greatest magnanimity in detail and in regard to particular groups of people, these and similar reasons could quite appropriately move the Church to keep to the joint celebration of the eucharist and the death of the Lord on a particular day.

Of course, many other reasons could be mentioned. Even in a modern society of people supposed to have come of age, the stability of a general practice is something wholly appropriate and useful. It might be said that, even in regard to religious matters, it is unreasonable to leave people too much to their own initiative as isolated individuals. We might point to the fact that even at the present time there are also secular celebrations of important historical events, commemorated in a joint service on a particular day. Whether these are national feast days or youth initiations is immaterial. In any case, while admitting the Church's freedom in principle, as emphasized above, to abolish the Sunday precept (if it seemed better to do so), it might nevertheless be asked if the Church today could and should uphold the precept if it is rightly understood. For whatever cannot be proved conclusively to be necessary in the light of man's nature must not be regarded on that account as superfluous.

It must be remembered that man lives and can live not only from those things whose metaphysical and transcendental necessity can be proved. It must be remembered that a person cannot expect whatever he does or ought to do or what is perhaps even required of him to be proved to be irrevocably necessary. It is impossible to prove transcendentally that we ought to shake hands when we meet or part from someone. Nevertheless, it is reasonable to do so and [157] anyone who denies this in principle, maintaining that theoretically we might just as well rub noses, is an idiot who is determined from the very outset not to admit the undemonstrable and yet factual and meaningful realities of human life which must be respected if life is to go on. Of course, the Church can appropriately keep to the Sunday precept, as we said, justifying this by a reasonable explanation, interpretation and eventually the application of casuistry to the precept. In my opinion, if the Sunday precept is maintained and interpreted with Christian freedom, it will not involve any unsurmountable pastoral difficulties, not even in the present-day society.

INFLUENCE ON SECULAR SOCIETY

There is a further consideration. It is basically true that the cultural and civilisatory development of modern society, with its faceless masses, its flexible working hours, etc., has brought with it a situation which is not particularly favourable to the Church's Sunday precept. But we can at least raise the question of whether the Church must look on, so to speak, indifferently or passively at these secular developments and then introduce slight changes in present arrangements in order to give effect to the pastoral conclusions from secular reality as it is and otherwise to do nothing. We could certainly ask why the Church (for good reasons and without claiming a predominance over the secularized, profane society) should not intervene to influence directly the trend of development in that society. After the Russians, at the beginning of the Bolshevist regime, had introduced an absolutely flexible working week which inevitably made no distinction between Sunday and any other day, they apparently gradually came to see that their plan humanly and reasonably was not particularly wonderful or glorious and, if I am correctly informed, returned to a common rest day. The opportunity could arise for the Church to contribute, perhaps even with merely secular and human arguments, to the further development of secular society in a direction more favourable to the Sunday rest, the Sunday precept, the Sunday celebration, more than the trend seems to have been up to now. It would indeed be a good thing if on one day the noise in the streets were to cease more or less entirely, if there were one day no lorries were traveling, etc. All these and similar things [158] are quite possible. It is not by chance that, in West Germany at least, league football matches are played on Saturdays.

All I wanted to do here was to suggest briefly that there are circumstances in which the Church has not only the abstract right but also the concrete opportunity, without offending non-Christians, positively to steer the development of secular society to a point at which the Sunday precept and the Sunday celebration would fit more conveniently into the total framework of civil life. Perhaps we could find more suitable times for the celebration on Sunday. Perhaps a number of things which at present appear merely as reluctantly granted concessions might one day become normal and obvious, while some other things, now maintained as part of the tradition from former times, may be dropped. If, as J. A. Jungmann always insisted, the Sunday celebration is to be seen in the first place as a responsibility of the parish as such and not, properly speaking, the individual's wholly personal responsibility, we might eventually come to the conclusion that masses at six or seven o'clock on Sunday mornings impose unnecessary torment on the clergy. We might perhaps arrange a splendid and beautiful common celebration only in the evening of Sunday, or even on Saturday. We could then say that any particular individual (a bus conductor, for instance, who has to work at this time) has no need at all to attend mass on that Sunday, since this is not primarily his own private and personal religious obligation, but, if he has any obligation at all, it is as a member of this parish, which can in fact choose to have a joint celebration and at a time which, from the nature of the case, cannot be convenient to every individual.

BASIC COMMUNITIES

Action 365[1] forms and gives life to something that can be described as, or aspires to be, a basic community. On such a sociological and theological theme it is possible, of course, only to put forward a few aphorisms, and even then only very vaguely and without substantiation. Only with these reservations can I venture to consider the theme. I want first to consider Christian basic communities as they exist in the different churches and secondly to say something about ecumenical basic communities.

BASIC COMMUNITIES IN THE CHURCH

Basic communities are necessary for the churches today. The churches of the future will be built up from below by basic communities formed by free initiative and association. Everything should be done, not to suppress, but to promote this development (which has already begun) and to keep it on the right lines. In order to understand what this means, we must consider the situation of the churches as it is to a large extent today and as it may come to be on an even larger scale.

Concretely and sociologically regarded, the churches will not exist as formerly simply in virtue of their ministry, their sociologically [160] firm structures and in virtue of an awareness of being taken for granted by public opinion, nor will they recruit new members on this basis simply because children adopt and continue the life-style of their parents and are baptized and indoctrinated by the Church. The Church will exist actually and not merely theoretically only by being renewed again and again by the free decision of faith and the formation of conscience on the part of individuals in the midst of a secular society which does not from the outset bear a Christian imprint. The fact that this is one description (more sociological than theological, at least under certain aspects) of the Church's continual self-renewal and that this renewal must always adopt and recognize in historical fidelity the traditional message of the Gospel and the ministry derived from Jesus does not alter anything in the new form (as distinct from the old) in which the Church comes to be today and will come to be in the future.

Faith in Jesus Christ, which is always necessary if someone is really to be a Christian in virtue of his free decision, was formed at one time in a situation which, even from the secular sociological standpoint, was more or less homogeneously Christian; today this faith must itself form and sustain its own sociological sphere. If in this way several or many individuals become Christians and join together, despite the pressure of a secularized society, they form basic communities, set up a community Church, as distinct from the people's Church of past centuries (that is, a Church which was sustained and in which the individual was sustained by a consensus of the people as a whole, institutionalized in all its sociological dimensions and thus not living in a diaspora).

Such basic communities must not be seen as contrasting with or opposed to the traditional

[1] Action 365 consists in ecumenically constituted basic communities seeking to undertake practical responsibility for the world (action) in the light of daily Scripture reading (365 days a year). The main fields of activity are ecumenism in practice, Christian publicity work, fraternal service, and third-world work. In this way a renewal of the churches is meant to be brought about. The address of Action 365 is Kennedyallee 111a, D-6000 Frankfurt 70. Tel. 0611/632063.

Church and its institutions. Basic communities, if they are Christian, do not merely adopt the Gospel, the faith of the Church. They do not merely respect authority in the Church and, despite all conceivable individual conflicts (which, of course, can always occur again and again), seek to live in peace and as far as possible positively recognized by ecclesiastical authority, expecting from the latter at least a benevolent toleration, even if authority by right (real or assumed) feels that it is not yet in a position to approve or recognize a particular basic community. Genuinely Christian basic communities also remain positively open to the whole wealth of tradition of spiritual experience, of theological [161] reflection, of liturgical practice, of socio-political theory and practice which the history of the Church offers to us.

A genuine basic community is not to be understood as the opposite of the parish. But not every genuine basic community needs to be identical with a parish; in this respect it can also be sociologically disparate from a parish or it may belong to the latter's substructures, since no one can maintain that everything Christian on the plane of local sociability must or even can be organized only in parishes properly so-called. The churches have always recognized in principle that there can be free associations from below which pursue specifically Christian aims and yet do not spring from the direct initiative of authority in the Church and are not subject to the control of this authority. But, on the other hand, none of this excludes the possibility that a parish institutionalized in the first place from above could and should also be at the same time a living basic community from below. The more this happens, the better it is for the Church. For in this way as much as possible may be transferred into the Church of the future from the older Church with its wealth of history, experience, and rootedness in broad strata of the people. This is something to be attempted, since even the Church of the future (which is actually built up from the communities which are most alive) must not try to become a Church of elitist groups, a Church of a holy remnant without any secular sociological significance. Even if it patiently accepts its actual future from God's decree in history, of itself it always has the task of becoming the Church of as many as possible, the Church rooted as widely as possible in secular society, to be and (again) to become a Church of the people.

None of this means that even in an ideal situation parish and basic community are in all circumstances identical with each other. Even a parish as official institution, which is or is becoming a basic community, can have under itself and alongside itself differently structured, living basic communities which in the light of their origin, their objective, and their charism are not simply merged in a parish, however much the latter is sustained from below by the living faith and love of Christians. This, of course, is not the place to discuss the legally and practically feasible forms of a deliberately planned coexistence of living basic communities with a particular objective, on the one hand, and of parishes, on the other hand, which are themselves [162] basic communities. In this connection we may say only that where such a basic community with its own particular objective is so developed that it integrates into itself alone more or less the whole Christian life of its members in worship, prayer, love, responsibility for society, proclamation of the Gospel, and so on, it must be understood either as a parish already recognized or seeking recognition by the greater Church or as a development which cannot be recognized ecclesiologically as legitimate, since it would then have become a cancerous structure in the total organism of the Church. In practice this means that basic communities in the ordinary sense of the term should not seek to suppress parishes, unless they are themselves recognized as parishes (in the old style, as 'personal parishes') by the greater Church.

Basic communities, as they are actually formed today, are an experiment. This statement has a number of implications. First of all, very diverse forms of basic communities are conceivable in principle. Such forms in their legitimacy and variety cannot simply be deduced from a theoretical ecclesiology. In the last resort these forms are based on the underivability of history in general and of the history of secular society in particular, which is the presupposition for these basic communities and their concrete forms.

Hence it is also implied that these basic communities are an experiment in the strict sense of the term. That is to say, in the last resort they are not authorized or refuted by a priori ecclesiological theory, but only (despite the legitimacy of theoretical ecclesiology and despite all fidelity to the history of the Church) by experience and the future. This means that concrete basic communities (now understood as distinct from officially institutionalized communities) are always a venture of hope. But this again means that such living basic communities may not be accepted or at least tolerated by the institutional Church only if it is certain that the venture has actually been successful.[2]

These basic communities obviously have a duty to maintain unity with the diocesan greater Church; for this reason they must also be established as members of the greater Church, even if this requires [163] certain 'sacrifices' and some renunciation on their part alone; they have to observe the laws (which are legitimate and can be concretely fulfilled) of the Church as a whole; despite their (even theological) singularity, they may not develop a sectarian and heretical theology of their own; they must remain open in a spirit of self-criticism to the life of the Church as a whole in truth and love and also make a concrete contribution to this beyond their own frontiers; their singularity must not go to such extremes that certain necessary functions, the fulfillment of which is under the supervision of the diocesan Church, simply collapse or wither away. But none of this prevents a basic community from having its own marked peculiarity, from giving itself a certain structure and what we might call a constitution, from really demanding from members who have freely joined it something that goes completely beyond what a parishioner is expected to do today for his own parish. The 'constitutions' of such basic communities can be considerably different in individual cases. In it the sustaining function and 'right of co-determination' of lay people may be considerably greater than that to which we have hitherto been generally accustomed, although, of course, in the past also, behind apparently very 'authoritarian' official structures, lay people very often had a much greater share in decision making in the parish. Hence there is no reason for not recognizing legally what often exists in fact.

ECUMENICAL BASIC COMMUNITIES

I propose to add a few remarks on ecumenical basic communities, since Action 365 is concerned with these.

First of all it must be said that such ecumenical groups of Christians are legitimate and necessary. All Christians and all churches have a mandate and an obligation to work for the unity of Christians and of the churches. This mandate is more urgent today than ever. But it cannot be fulfilled if the authorities alone in the churches are working from above for unity or if this work merely takes the form of academic discussions by theologians on points of controversy and ecumenism. It is at the base of the churches that people must get to know one another, must come more closely together; it is here that strangeness and mutual misunderstanding must be broken down, [164] here people must pray together, exchange spiritual experience, and jointly undertake responsibility for the world, for secular society.

When, therefore, the groups of Christians of Action 365 are formed, aware of their socio-political responsibility in the light of their basic Christian attitude, it is possible and appropriate for them to cross denominational frontiers and come together to form ecumenical basic communities. This is particularly appropriate and even indispensable when it is a question of undertaking social responsibility for justice, love, and freedom, when there is not merely talk of this responsibility, but action in the light of it in concrete everyday life, so that the liberating power of the Gospel is attested in deed and truth before the world. In this field of social responsibility to the world on the part of Christians, however, a common task is possible for Christians of different denominations and must be undertaken jointly, because it is likely to be better and more successfully achieved in this way. Ecumenical groups with an objective, as in Action 365, are legitimate and necessary today. Otherwise, Christians do not fulfill effectively enough their common task in regard to the secular world, and the ecumenical task remains pure theory which adjourns the actual unification of Christians to the Last Day.

The special task of a socio-political character which Action 365 undertakes for its own (admittedly modest) part does not exclude but in fact includes the meeting of such groups together, even for religious and for Christian activities, for prayer. For these groups want to undertake their specific task, not in a merely secular, humanitarian spirit, but in the spirit of Christ, in the power of his death and his resurrection, in the Holy Spirit. Hence it is justified and necessary for such groups themselves to guard and continually secure afresh the innermost centre of their motivation by which their real task is sustained.

In this connection it would take us too far to enter into the problem of actual and mutual intercommunion. We can only say that in principle there can be and are legitimate wishes and attempts at the base and that, on the other hand, such intercommunion cannot be put in practice impatiently and hastily in a form which dismisses the still existing separation of the churches as simply negligible in religious and Christian terms. The exact and concrete conclusion from the dialectic of these two principles cannot be further considered at the moment.

[165] Nevertheless, there is one thing more I would like to say in this connection. It is that ecumenical basic communities like those of Action 365 must beware of the danger of becoming a kind of third denomination. I do not, of course, assume or presume that Action 365 has even a remote intention of doing anything of this kind. But there are also unforeseen dangers. A third denomination, even if it results from the intention of overcoming denominational limits, will not in fact overcome but only intensify the divisions in Christendom. Ecumenical basic communities like those of Action 365 cannot have any hope merely from their own resources, independently of the authority and the historically and sociologically existing institutions of the Church. If such basic communities were to cut themselves off in an elitist and ghettolike form from the actual churches and attempt to integrate autarchically the whole of Christian life in themselves, they would in practice form a third denomination and would therefore only increase the misery of a divided Christendom.

In such ecumenical groups, Christians belonging to particular denominations, if they are not to compromise the very thing about which they are most intimately concerned, must remain in vital contact with their own churches, must help to sustain the life of these churches (and not merely their own as communities), in patience, inward participation, and unselfish love; they must be a leaven in the churches, not seeking to remain in isolation, but intermingled with the whole mass of the Christian people. Even if it is difficult, ecumenical basic communities must share the historical burden of the old churches, maintain and cherish a living union of integration and trust with the authorities in the churches; at once humble and proud, they may perhaps regard themselves as the vanguard of the Church on pilgrimage through history, but not as an army that can be seen more closely to be fighting only for its own victories.

With all the freedom that rightly belongs to a community from below, ecumenical basic communities must always regard themselves as incorporated in the churches to which their members actively belong and want to belong, not merely accepting this situation as

ETERNITY FROM TIME

SCEPTICISM IN REGARD TO ETERNAL LIFE

There can be no doubt that belief in eternal life as a consequence of survival after death has grown weaker in the consciousness of modern people. This fundamental doctrine of Christianity, scarcely affected at first by the Enlightenment from the eighteenth century onward, is now questioned, or at any rate has lost its place among those things which mainly interest people today. It is true that at all times there have been some who thought (as they put it) that death is the end of everything; but the conviction that man lives on into a definitive permanent existence was generally taken for granted and firmly established in the public mind, at least among Christian nations, but also far beyond these, even though the ideas of this life after death were and are very diverse. Today, even among Christians, what was once a basic Christian conviction is largely threatened. There are Christians who are sure of the existence of God and who lead lives according to the tenets of their religion, but who do not think it necessary to show any great interest in the question of an eternal life that is not simply identical with life here and now.

Of course, the fact that this scepticism in regard to eternal life exists in modern society does not mean that it is justified. Faced by the essential and ultimate questions of human existence, we cannot hide behind the prestige and allure of popular opinion at the present time. The lofty and sublime persuasion of a few can be the truth that holds for all, even though there are not many who acknowledge it. The ultimate truths are not found in the popular press, nor are they established by thoughtless chatter in a public house.

[170] Of course, it can readily be admitted by a Christian that the ways of presenting the idea of the perennially valid truth of eternal life are more inadequate than is necessary or avoidable, obscuring rather than elucidating the real meaning. Among these unsatisfactory ideas of eternity is that of a never ending time running on into infinity. Up to very recently preachers have too often made indiscriminate use of this idea with reference to the eternity of hell. But even modern physics knows that in order to express certain facts or realities of the physical world without getting lost in mathematical abstractness (which is also incapable by itself of bringing out what is really meant) we must work with very inadequate ideas, perhaps even with several apparently mutually contradictory ideas, which, however, can bring home to us only up to a point the meaning of the reality under discussion. If this sort of thing happens even in physics, people today ought really not to be put off (as they so readily are) by the fact that in the sphere of religion, also, more or less apt terms and ideas (for example, in regard to eternal life) can be worked out only imperfectly and arduously.

Within our present scope it is, of course, not possible even to a slight degree to make clear the existence and nature of the eternal life awaiting us. Here and now we are attempting to draw attention only to one point from this immense theme: that is, that we experience eternity in the present time in a way that constantly eludes reflection and can learn from this that the eternity which emerges through death out of the present time and becomes definitive cannot be conceived as a continuation of time into eternity.

THE TYRANNY OF OUR CONCEPT OF TIME

By way of preparation for our main reflections, it must again be made more clear what are the difficulties that arise if we understand eternity 'after' death as the unlimited continuation of time. If we understand eternity (which is the definitiveness of our life, emerging in time) as the running on of time with one section coming after another, each to be filled out in a new way and each different from the others, then, of course, all the semiclever and semistupid questions arise that tempt today's semiclever person to regard belief in eternal life as incredible, if not downright ridiculous. For then he can [171] ask what is to be used to fill up these ever new periods of time. Will it not gradually become boring if, as devout people think, this never stopping conveyor belt of time has its individual parts stacked again and again with the same thing, with the eternal glorification of the infinite God by his creature's praise? Why then is there no opportunity in this ever continuing time for the damned to be converted, change their outlook, repent, and thus turn their hell into heaven? Are they prevented by a God who, in a final act of despotism, refuses to accept a change of mind on the part of the lost, although there would be place for such a change and it could happen at some point in these ever continuing times ('aeons', as they are called in Scripture)?

If eternity is conceived, then, as time open to infinity, have not the world, man and his history always ahead of them that which is not yet (in other words, that which can find its place only in a future space of time), and is not heaven the very thing that may not enter into this scheme of ever continuing, continual succession in time? But if it is to go on forever, if everything that exists is no more than the starting point for attaining what is to come, and so on and so on, is not the eternity of this kind of time the damnation of Ahasuerus, the wandering Jew, doomed always to roam, without ever finally arriving anywhere? Under the tyranny of this concept of time, is not the eternal heaven dissolved into an eternal hell, and vice versa? It is easy to see how dangerous and pernicious is the idea of eternity as an endless running on of time.

In order to get out of this difficulty we can, of course, in the first place say quite appropriately that a notion of eternity can be formed with the aid of a negation; excluding from the notion of the real, the permanent, and the definitive the element of sequence, of succession, of one thing after another. This method of forming a new concept by the negation of certain aspects of the present concept is not always illegitimate in principle. It is a method that is often unavoidable. With its aid a blind person, for example, can form an idea, if not a visualization, of colour and consequently gain the assurance that there are colours, even though he has never seen them; he can also hope, although blind from birth, that perhaps one day he will see. But it is a method that also has its problems. How are we to know in the concrete case whether what is conceptually grasped can really exist, even when a particular element of what is [172] experienced is excluded by a negation of this kind? In our case can there really be something permanent, if we exclude from its notion the succession that exists in all the enduring things that we directly experience?

HINTS OF AN ETERNAL REALITY

In order to gain further confidence that there can also be something permanent and eternal which is not subject to the domination of endless succession, let us take a closer look at our experience of time and (so I think) discover there something ‘eternal’: that is, at least something that is not simply in the ‘now’, in the mere moment of time, perishing and giving way to something else that is different from what went before, replacing this, only to be itself replaced and thrust into nothingness. We are considering the paradox of time itself which lives in secret from an eternity.

A kind of permanency in time appears at three levels. There is the necessary permanency of any reality (what we used to describe as ‘substance’) which persists while sustaining the alternation of qualities, phenomena, and occurrences. There is mental experience which combines past, present, and future in a unity. There is free personal decision which, by its very nature, does not permit what it has posited purely and simply to disappear into the void of nothingness. Let us look again a little more closely at these three hints of something eternal in the world of our experience.

THE TOTALITY OF A HISTORY

Time appears to us in the first place as a chain of individual occurrences stretching forward and backward into infinity, with each occurrence replacing the one before it and itself disappearing to make way for what follows. But at the same time, even though we are much less attentive to the fact, we are sure that these changing phenomena replacing one another are nevertheless manifestations of something permanent which (at least for a longer or shorter period) persists as the same reality, sustaining the changing appearances, bringing them together into a totality, into a history, which is in fact [173] one and does not disintegrate or crumble into a dust of pure individual moments. Something of this can be seen, for instance, in the history of a flower, continuing in varying stages from the seed until it finally withers. Or we may consider our own life history from beginning to end, in which every moment is different from the one before it and yet each is a determination of one and the same reality, which persists as the same throughout this changing history, and, as one and the same, claims for itself all these alternating moments. These identities, lying behind the alternation and contents of the moments of time and thus holding together the infinitesimally tiny elements of time, shaping out of the dust of these elements a greater, structured history, cannot as such share the quality of time itself as it divides and passes away, if they are to fulfill their task of sustaining and unifying time. If time is to make sense as a greater unity and more definite shape, as history, there must be something that we always take for granted in ordinary life and that is not simply the succession of moments of time flashing out and then fading again. There is in time something that is not identical with time itself. This something may perhaps need to expand over time if it is to be itself, but it is not identical with this extension in moments of time. Even what is properly temporal contains more than time: at least something that persists and gives a unity to time in historical temporal shapes.

MENTAL EXPERIENCE

This supra-temporal element in time becomes still more clear when we reflect on the way in which time is unified and shaped in the mental process of experiencing it. Time is not simply there; it is experienced by us, not by merely submitting to its sequence, but by confronting it, gathering together past, present, and future and mentally binding them into a unity and shape which is more than the pure succession of time where the next moment triumphs over the last by annihilating it. Someone observing this mental unifying of time, this interruption of time’s course, might retort sceptically that this time so unified, in which bare succession is eliminated, this time that 'stands still', ceases to run on, and consequently does not run out, is nothing but an idea of time, and the subject reflecting on time in this [174] way is hopelessly borne along and passes away in real time. But, if time as such is nothing but the flow of time atoms, each of which extinguishes its predecessor and is then extinguished by its successor, how can it be unified meaningfully and truly (even if merely 'in thought') into such instant time-configurations, into a history of meaning and structure, unless there is more to time itself than mere passing away?

And, even more importantly, how is the thinking subject, conferring unity and shape in time as it runs on, to be understood as capable of doing this? How can a thinking subject of this kind create a time that stands still, even merely in thought, if it is completely dependent on flowing time for its own true being, when thinking itself is also a reality, and thinking and what is thought are mutually dependent? No, if and insofar as there is a thought of time, something happens which does in fact occur in time's course, but as an event which has a peculiar superiority over time, an event intimating eternity, since the thought that thinks time is not simply time's subject.

FREE DECISIONS

Eternity is experienced in time itself most clearly when the intellectual subject in man makes a free decision which concerns and involves the one and entire person. We cannot analyze decisions of this kind in all their dimensions here. That would take too long. All that we can say is that there are free decisions in man, involving the person's total self-disposal, for which he bears an ultimate, inescapable responsibility, a responsibility which he cannot shift off to anyone or anything else, neither by a psychology seeking to break down the ultimate character of man as subject nor by social sciences seeking to reduce man to a pure effect of social conditions. But (and this in the long run is unavoidable and inexorably occurs at certain points, whether there is any very explicit and theoretical reflection on it or not) if someone says as he proceeds to act, 'I am inexorably and inescapably responsible for this, there is nothing in the last resort to which I can appeal to relieve me of responsibility', he can simultaneously think and say, 'Not that all this is so important or so bad. For when the end really comes I can always take refuge in the [175] empty void where no one can reach me any longer, neither the voice of conscience nor world history nor any God.' No, ultimate personal decisions, at least when they involve a life in its totality, are irrevocable, they are truly eternity coming to be in time. Of course, if we had time to do so, we would have to ask here about the possibility of repentance and conversion within the continuing course of the time and history of man, we would have to bear in mind the essentially dialogic character of human freedom, to which God assigns a decisive role in this history of freedom. But none of these things would remove the basic fact, rooted in the nature of this freedom and its inextricable responsibility, that freedom in the last resort (and, indeed, freedom alone) wills and posits finality and unrevisability, that this implies the finality, the eternity of the existence of this freedom and consequently does not permit this freedom any flight from responsibility into the void. Here time really creates eternity and eternity is experienced in time.

ACCEPTING INCOMPREHENSIBILITY

There may perhaps be some doubt as to whether our suggestions provide adequate illumination for the understanding of that eternity which we as Christians hope to reach as our definitive life after death. But I think that these suggestions at least show that it cannot be said that each and every thing within the range of our experience is so exclusively and solely temporal that we can think meaningfully of something as real only by thinking of it either as existing simply here and now and then disappearing into the void or as a reality consisting merely of an unlimited number of moments of time continuing always without end and incapable in principle of offering any scope for a decision of freedom that posits a real finality. Both these ideas (that is, of time as ending in the void or of time as never ceasing) are equally incompatible with the Christian belief in eternal life. And neither of these ideas can appeal to the actual experience we have of time if we unhesitatingly permit the whole experience to speak for itself.

These merely tentatively outlined considerations must, however, allow us to draw a few conclusions for concrete life. First of all, even in this way, it becomes evident that we cannot positively imagine [176] here the concreteness of our eternal life. We know, it is true, that it will be an existence and life that has God himself in himself as its content, a life that implies love, limitless knowledge, supreme happiness, and so on. But how all this can be experienced in the concreteness of a state beyond time, what is the meaning of transfigured corporality, eternal fellowship with the redeemed, and so on: this is something we cannot concretely imagine or picture to ourselves here and now. We Christians need not be disturbed today if we can scarcely summon up the courage to see it all as depicted from Scripture up to Dante, and even subsequently. For we are actually going into the unknown, the unimaginable, and, properly speaking, know only that it is filled with the incomprehensibility of God and his love and that it is final. It is sufficient to accept for ourselves now the incomprehensibility of our eternal life and nevertheless to go on hoping and trusting. Our experience of time (which is always a mysterious experience of something more than time) certainly gives us the right not to hold suspect as empty speculation our ‘no’ to time in the concept of eternity; but it certainly does not relieve us of the decision to say this ‘no’ to time in our ‘yes’ to eternity. Thus it leaves our life one of faith and hope that must still wait for the definitive end and has no power triumphantly to exhibit it before the fact.

VICTORY OF GOD’S LOVE

In the third case of eternity in time, which we considered briefly, it becomes clear, if we look closely enough, that our eternal life, however much it will then be filled with God himself, will he the definitiveness of that moral and free act of our life in which (beyond all the dividedness of time) as one and whole, we made ourselves the persons we wanted finally to be. But if our eternity is thus nothing but the now definitive history which we ourselves freely made, then we can see with both horror and supreme delight the immense grandeur, depth, and density of those acts in which our whole life is involved. Of course, in our life there is a great deal of routine and superficiality that is unavoidable, in which freedom occurs without bearing any trace of finality or eternity. If, however, there is such a thing as eternal life at all, if it is not merely something different added to our [177] temporal life and likewise stretching out over time, if it is truly the finality of this present life of freedom which fittingly comes to a final and definitive consummation, only then can be seen the unfathomable depths and the richness of our existence, of that existence which often gives the impression of consisting of nothing but banalities. Where an ultimate responsibility is assumed in obedience to a person’s own conscience, where ultimate selfless love and fidelity are given, where an ultimate selfless obedience to truth regardless of self is lived out, and so on, at this point there is really in our life something that is infinitely precious, that of itself has the right and reality not to perish, that is able to fill out an eternity, that actually deserves not merely to be rewarded (a misleading expression, savouring of selfishness) by perpetual eternity but to claim this as its most authentic right, as its most intimate nature.

This is the dignity and potentiality with which we human beings are endowed – all of us, not merely the great geniuses of mankind, not merely a Buddha or a Socrates, but all of us, even though there are far too many who seem to be terribly mediocre, mayflies, as it were. But the truth proclaimed by Christianity is that in this time (apparently stretching out endlessly, in order to reproduce in an eternal recurrence always the same thing and always that which perishes in the eternal cycle of coming and going), whenever life is lived in faith, hope, and love, eternity truly occurs: eternity which does not come only to depart, which persists and (this is what matters) is such that its persistence means supreme happiness and not hell, since it has received God himself and thus is really worthy of being definitive and forever. Of course, in principle, it must be firmly maintained that man's history of freedom can also produce a person's similarly timeless definitive perdition. But what Christianity really proclaims as essential is not the equal possibility of these two ways of passing from time to eternity, but the victory of the love of God who bestows himself in and through our freedom: it points to the cross and resurrection of Jesus as to the event of this now manifest victory of God's love. This love is the cause and guarantee that our brief time, which passes away, creates an eternity which is not made up out of time. If it seems that we perish in death, since the dead do not become perceptible again anywhere where time goes on, this is merely a sign that eternity, born from time, is something other than what can readily be seen here and now.

PURGATORY

When people belonging to the same profession are talking together about their professional concerns they naturally use a highly specialized language not easily understood by outsiders. Not only has this language its own peculiar terminology but it is often spoken in a very casual and offhand manner. It is the same with theologians.

A short time ago one theologian said to another, 'The pope insisted again yesterday on the traditional doctrine of purgatory.' The other replied, 'I've nothing against that. But if I only knew what exactly I am supposed to believe in this respect! Do you know? Can you look into the pope's mind to see what he was thinking? I can't. Anyway, if you could, it would presumably still be doubtful whether what the pope precisely understood by purgatory in this declaration would as such be absolutely binding on me as a matter of faith.' 'But', the first theologian then said, 'You and the pope know the other doctrinal declarations of the Church to which this new exhortation refers, and, without looking into the pope's mind, you can see precisely what purgatory means by reading these older and lengthy declarations.'

'O Lord,' said the second theologian, 'if only it was as simple as you think. These older definitions in Denzinger – or am I to consult also as many theologians as possible? – must first of all be scrutinized to see to what extent they are regarded as binding by the teaching authority. This, in fact, varies. It can vary considerably. Think, for instance, of the ideas of purgatory formerly implied in declarations about the extent of "temporal punishment" remitted by indulgences: the kind of declarations which the Church today somewhat [182] shamefacedly almost completely avoids. And if I examine critically and sift through these official teachings of the Church on purgatory (which is not only my right but also my duty as a theologian), am I then bound to believe in what Paul VI still described as "expiation in the fire" of purgatory, or can I be content with the Tridentine profession of faith, which states that there is a place of purification and that the souls detained there are helped by the intercession of the faithful? And if I do not feel particularly tied to the idea of fire and torment (St. Catherine of Genoa also had a different idea of purgatory) and consequently need not rack my brain to find a way of imagining this fire, without having to resort to mythology, what is the meaning in other parts of this teaching on purgatory of "souls" (if the term is not to be taken in a mainly Platonic sense)? How are they "detained"? By what means are they "purified"? Why is this purification a "penalty"? Can we say that what is apparently to be removed by this purification is an internal state produced in these "souls" by sins committed during life and not yet completely eradicated by turning to God and being forgiven? Or is it a question of penalties imposed as it were from outside by God's justice, penalties which quite simply have to be paid? But how are these penalties conceivable if it is assumed that they bear no relation to the internal moral quality of the "poor souls"? Must we regard purgatory as a process which goes on in a temporal succession which is more or less the same as the time we experience here in our history?

'These and similar questions cannot simply be thrust aside. If we are to believe the Church's teaching on purgatory, we must believe something that can be given formal expression. Or are we simply not to pursue these questions further? Can we answer them without going back to the complicated and obscure history of this doctrine? But how are we to do that if it only means that everything will become more obscure and more difficult than before and if the normal believer cannot by any means investigate these things for himself? There is not much to be got out of Scripture, whether of the Old or the New Testament, particularly if we may hold the opinion that prayers for the dead do not necessarily imply a doctrine of purgatory. If we turn to the Fathers of the Church, there are certainly not a few whom we could name as upholding some kind of doctrine of purgatory. But does this mean ipso facto that such an idea is part of revealed doctrine and binding as such or might it not be merely an [183] ideal type which in the last resort remains without binding force and which enables us to satisfy our curiosity by finding answers to questions which we ought to leave unanswered in the presence of the silent majesty of death?

'Of course, people can always insist that the Church's sense of faith at least from the Middle Ages onward has clung stubbornly to the existence of purgatory, even though the emergence of this decision of faith came after an obscure earlier history, and, consequently, the essential question has in fact already been decided. But even if we leave aside the question of how precisely the nature of divine revelation is to be understood and how from that standpoint a material criterion can be established to settle the question of what can belong a priori to the real substance of revelation and what from the very outset cannot (a question which might lead to considerable difficulties when applied to the doctrine of purgatory), this kind of dogmatic positivism does not take us very much farther. For (as I have said frequently enough already) the question remains of what is the binding content of this official teaching of the Church on purgatory.'

The other theologian broke in impatiently, 'Can we not formulate this teaching in a way that, on the one hand, completely accords with the Church's older doctrinal statements and with Rome's exhortations at the present time and yet, on the other hand, permits us to see in this formulation something that seems "realizable", intelligible, credible, and compatible with the rest of our anthropology?'

'How, then?' asked the other.

'I shall try to do so as well as I can', was the answer. 'Of course, I assume here (without attempting to justify this belief) the permanency of the person in death. I say "permanency" because I think it will be a good thing to refrain from the outset from more precise suggestions as to how this permanency might be more concretely imagined, how it might be given more tangible form, if it were associated with the permanency that is realized in a sequence of events in time. For it seems to me that things cannot simply go on after death in temporal extension, since that would mean that the finality of judgment at death (at least for someone who has come to a radical personal decision in his earthly life) is no longer credible. Over and above this, the problems raised in regard to time in a modern metaphysics or even physics of cognition certainly permit me to think [184] that what we know and take for granted as time is far from being a determination of reality that is always and everywhere valid. I have no intention of forgetting what I have just said in what I am about to say. I assume that the one human being, despite the unity of his origin and goal, is also an inwardly plural being, about whom, from the very nature of the case, diverse statements can rightly be made which are really true of him and yet determine him in different ways and refer to different realities in him.

'I am expressing myself in this roundabout way because I want to avoid the term "part", which is constantly liable to lead to the mistaken assumption that unity (even in man) must subsequently be regarded as made up of "parts", or (conversely) that we can quite naturally and simply discover and say something about one part of the one reality without qualifying the whole at the same time. But let us leave aside the difficult problems and paradoxes associated with an existent that is really one and yet plural in the sense that a determination does not affect everything about it in the same way, that opposites can be predicated of it, even though these contradictory statements cannot be made about it simply (as we usually say) in the same respect. This singular state of affairs can, of course, be "visualized" simply by regarding the contradictory statements as true of different "pieces" or "parts", but this is to forget that these "parts" are really those of an existent that is absolutely truly one. But again let us leave aside the metaphysics and epistemology of a plural "one" in which plurality and unity are really true in the same way.

'We assume that a human being has a history in which not everything happens at one and the same time, that something "about" him can be completed, without this completedness having to be or being able to be predicated immediately of each and every thing "about" him. In his normal self-understanding everyone makes this (abstractly formulated) assumption, not merely with reference to his body (in which a person's pain "in" his leg is not actually a pain "in" his arm, although in both instances it is "his" pain), but also in much more "existential" events and situations. He is perhaps sure that he loves God and yet does not venture to assert that he loves God with all his heart, that his whole existence is integrated into this love: he admits that in him are abysmal depths, a mass of instincts, a subconscious, an "id", etc., as realities of which it certainly cannot [185] be said that they are all completely integrated into the personal decision of the subject that has decided or can decide finally for or against God. At this point, however, it must be noted that a Christian anthropology which upholds the fundamental unity of the one human being and takes this seriously cannot assume that these unintegrated realities of the person simply cease with death as the "separation of body and soul" and thus become irrelevant to the permanent existence of the personal subject, or that they are abolished by what can be regarded as a purely juridical decree of God. Under these circumstances death presumably opens up several possibilities. Perhaps the unintegrated elements in man are incorporated into the final personal decision, now become definitive in death, in a lengthy "process" which (while still maintaining what I said earlier about the release of the deceased person from our time) might nevertheless be seen as analogous to the present time in a way that by and large corresponds to the traditional idea of purgatory. With the aid of an idea of this kind it might be possible to see that death as a task to be accomplished within quite definite spatio-temporal limits does not necessarily mean a pure and simple departure from this material world as a whole, so that the subject now become definitive in principle in its personal decision can and must still continue in its own way to participate in the fundamental temporality and historicity of the world, even if it has reached its consummation in the immediate vision of God. It could also be pointed out that the idea of the lot of a "dead" person as a kind of process is so widespread in the history of religion that these convictions should not be too quickly laid aside in a spirit of modern rationalistic scepticism, particularly since (for the Christian) such convictions and ideas have also exercised an influence on Christian doctrine and its development and presumably had a good deal to do with the ready acceptance of Christian teaching on purgatory in former times.

'There is another way of looking at the question. Perhaps what happens is not, properly speaking, a process; but, nevertheless, this total integration in and through death, which comes to prevail in the whole length and breadth of the person's existence as the result of a final basic decision, can be seen at least analogously as taking place in time. Under these circumstances the notions of time used univocally or analogously in the traditional doctrine of purgatory would not refer directly to the properties of what is understood as real in [186] the doctrine of purgatory, but would serve as vivid illustrations of the fact that a person is really a plural being, the total existence of which is not actually realized at one stroke from the very outset, and, consequently, that the actual realization of the totality of its existence is dependent in the most varied and indeterminable ways on preconditions which are not simply implicit in the "good will" of the basic decision. It is difficult to say whether I am not getting lost in this web of ideas that I have spun, whether I am not getting involved in contradictions or theological impossibilities. But are we simply to remain silent from the very outset in face of the majestic darkness of death, content with the assumption that the Christian sustained by hope falls through death into the incomprehensibility of God, to regard this as "beatifying", and thus to refrain from all further differentiations in regard to life "after" death? If, however, we want to take seriously the traditional teaching on purgatory, with its bold differentiation, and yet not to picture the hereafter to ourselves as if we had already been there and were quite familiar with it (an impression only too obviously created by the doctrine of purgatory as traditionally formulated), then we are faced by the question of whether, without contradicting the official teaching on purgatory, we may take it to mean that everything happens in death itself, that the "purification" in purgatory is an aspect of death itself and can be made intelligible in the light of the different characteristics of death itself. Can we then say that the doctrine of purgatory is in fact a kind of thanatology presented with a different imagery and under different aspects, but uncurtailed and not oversimplified? Even if we attempt to eliminate all temporal elements in this imagery, we must still give some explanation of how the elements of the traditional imagery can be understood as realized in the very event of death.

'Why should that be absolutely impossible? Why could not the "duration" of the event of purification be identified with the (diverse) depth and intensity of the pain that man experiences in death itself, since there is a terrible difference between what he actually is and what he ought to be? Why should this pain (which is concretely identical with the individual character of dying proper to each person in accordance with his state) not itself be the purifying event which is supposed to constitute the essence of purgatory? Why could suffrages for the deceased in "purgatory" not be related to the occurrence of death? If we do not know even in the light of the [187] traditional idea of purgatory whether the deceased for whom we pray are "still" in purgatory and if we nevertheless regard these suffrages as appropriate in any case, then it cannot be unreasonable to relate our intercessions to that death, no matter when precisely in our earthly time these prayers were said. (Jesus' prayer on the cross was certainly meaningful even for those people who had lived long before him.) It is not indeed particularly easy to see how it is possible on account of God's retributive justice to detain in purgatory someone who has already completed his true inward development (including, of course, the integration of his whole being into the love of God) and has still to suffer only outwardly through God's retributive justice, even though this suffering does not bring him to a greater maturity. But if we reject such an idea, there is really no longer any reason to deny that purgatory takes place in death itself. If someone were to introduce an element of time into the very occurrence of death (in the withdrawal from the present world), which need not be regarded as a priori unreasonable, then it would still be possible to avoid the idea of a time in "purgatory" "after" death and there would be no need subsequently to qualify this idea with the statement that time in purgatory is only "analogous" to the time with which we are familiar.

'But now', said the theologian, 'I have been talking far too long and not made the matter any clearer. To be honest', he said, 'it must be admitted that the doctrine of purgatory does not seem particularly important today even to the devout Christian. The latter (as he hopes) submits willingly to death and thinks that he falls then into the hands of an infinite, loving God who brings everything to perfection, even though (as far as our experience goes) we surrender ourselves to him as imperfect beings. We think, moreover, that we can pray with the Church for the deceased, that we ourselves can thus entrust those with whom we are united to eternal light and unending peace. Is that not sufficient? Does the traditional doctrine of purgatory really amount to more in existential faith? I don't know. But when I recall the modest statements of Scripture I am inclined to answer this question in the negative. This does not at all mean that I would blame for this reason the people who can see more clearly in the traditional doctrine of purgatory what we all certainly maintain and who therefore cling to this traditional statement.'

The other theologian had listened patiently to these lengthy explanations, [188] without interrupting. But now he suggested that the whole problem should be considered again from a completely different aspect. 'All you have said up to now', he declared, 'is true enough. But you really ought not to take this doctrine of purgatory straight from Denzinger and then try to interpret it "speculatively" in isolation. This traditional teaching was not simply telephoned down from heaven just as it stands; it was not inscribed by heaven on our minds as on a tabula rasa, but has also at least historical roots in human thought and speculation which can be traced back long before the time of Christian revelation properly so-called. But if this doctrine has emerged out of a context and milieu of this kind, then we ought also today to reflect again more explicitly on this context. At the same time, what interests me here is not precisely the concrete form in which belief in a life after death was actually portrayed in the course of the history of religion. But the conviction that the human person survives beyond death and leads a life of a very definite kind is immensely widespread in the whole breadth and depth of the history of mankind and of religion. Has all this nothing to do with the doctrine of purgatory?

'Of the many questions into which this question could be split up, there is one that particularly interests me. I shall attempt to state and explain it. Christian eschatology tends basically to assume that the death of the individual directly and immediately involves the "particular judgment", that this person's history is definitively completed and (leaving aside the possibility of definitive perdition in "hell") that the beatific vision unites him to the primal ground of all reality radically anticipating everything in itself and thus any further development of personal history is superseded. But can we really admit that this description of the human condition after death tells the whole story? We can think also of a plurality of acts on the part of the blessed in heaven, we can portray the "communion of saints" as one in which individuals are involved with one another, etc. By and large we have few speculative misgivings as to why the most radical act of existence in the immediate vicinity of the one and absolute being of God should not have superseded from the very outset the development of any plurality of existence on man's part; nor does it matter very much or at all if we console ourselves with the thought that unity with the deepest source of all reality brings a person into immediate contact with all that emerges in continuous [189] creation from this source. Christianity regards man's consummation as so radical that it leaves no scope for a pluralistic self-realization. In the beatific vision the variety of connections to the pluralistic world is already grasped in its originally single ground. It may then be thought that as we descend with this plural world set up by God in his generous love, we share in a way in its consummation. But if we express it in this way, in order to safeguard the closeness of the blessed to the world unfolded in its plurality, we are really saying that the relationship of the deceased person to the world is quite different from what it was before death.

'The doctrine of purgatory brings a peculiar qualification to this eschatological idea of Christianity, which sees survival as from God in the beatific vision and not as emerging from history. It places between death and radical eschatology understood in the light of God a (brief) intermediate state in which, on the one hand, man's radical consummation is not yet supposed to exist (whether this "not yet" is imagined or contrasted with our normal categories of time) and in which, on the other hand, things do not simply go on as before. What happens, then, in this intermediate state? The answer found in the traditional doctrine of purgatory is that through suffering, expiation for sin is made here and the soul is purified. But it cannot be denied that an answer of this kind is, first, terribly formal and abstract and, second, really has no connection with what such a "soul" inevitably is, what it has and does, since we cannot really imagine that its life and activity is nothing but "suffering".

'Here, I think, it might be helpful to recall the religious tradition of mankind on life beyond the grave. Complex, confusing, and in many ways contradictory as this tradition may be and however much our reservations in regard to ideas of time in this connection must be maintained, nevertheless in these traditions of mankind there are ideas of a further development of those who have died, partly even of wholly welcome further developments, of an enduring and active relationship with the world, the environment, and the milieu to which they formerly belonged. If and insofar as these ideas could be based on experience (and from a theological standpoint this ought not to be denied outright from the very outset, since it is a question of realities coming before a person's radical withdrawal from the world by the beatific vision), the question might be asked whether humanly speaking (even if not properly in the light of faith) we have [190] not the opportunity and the right to introduce into the traditional doctrine of purgatory such ideas where they are appropriate and not mythological portrayals of the hereafter (which are completely useless today). The traditional doctrine of purgatory, reduced to what is really binding as a matter of faith, leaves ample abstractly formal scope for the use perhaps of some of the material derived from these traditions of mankind. In this way we might make a little progress. These traditions of humanity, in which there is in fact no trace of the absolutely radical doctrine of the immediate vision of God, would then not be opposed to this properly Christian eschatology, but would refer to the human dimension and the human consummation which are asserted in principle, even though very abstractly, by the doctrine of purgatory and distinguished from the beatific vision.

'What has just been said, merely by way of suggestion, may not seem particularly exciting to an average Christian. But perhaps what has been said might be grasped somewhat more "existentially" in the light of further questions. Are the eschatological statements of Christianity really binding as a matter of faith insofar as they refer absolutely to all human beings, to all who were human biologically and in their mental capacity? Or are they statements of faith only with reference to people who have fulfilled themselves and reached finality in a free decision? The traditional teaching assumes that the first of these alternatives is obviously true, as, for instance, the teaching of the Fifth Lateran Council on the immortality of the soul as true of any soul that ever existed, whatever its state may have been immediately before death. But is that certainly true? To put it more cautiously, is this doctrine of the final permanency of human spirit-persons and of their final destiny in the immediate possession of God or in eternal perdition true and binding as a matter of faith with regard to those who never reached finality as a result of self-fulfillment in freedom?

'If we accept this, we ought to admit (at least with further assumptions, which however are taken for granted in traditional eschatology) that the majority of heaven's inhabitants (at least if we include today, as opposed to the Augustinian tradition, children who die unbaptized) consists of people who never came to a personal decision, that eternal bliss must be regarded partly as the fruit of a free act (under the influence of grace, of course) and partly as the fruit of a merely natural happening. (But, despite Romano Guardini, it cannot [191] be said that the eternal happiness of baptized infants demonstrates the free unmeritedness of divine grace, for freedom gained by salvation is itself supreme grace, since freedom and grace are not in competition.) It can, of course, be said that in the last resort we know nothing about all these things. But the traditional doctrine of limbo in particular and of the salvation of the baptized who died in infancy crosses this frontier, at which people would be glad to come to a stop, by regarding statements about the hereafter as absolutely binding only with reference to the person who has reached his consummation in the realization of his radical freedom. Would a mid-way solution (in the light of the doctrine of purgatory) be conceivable here, by seeing an opportunity of free personal decision as open to these others within the confines of "purgatory"?

'At this point, I think, we should not apply too hastily or too summarily the principle that with the death of a person his history of freedom is always and inevitably at an end, that he is definitively judged according to his works in this life. The principle is correct. But in the cases to be considered here this history of freedom has not even begun and the death to be considered here is not by any means death in the full theological sense as freedom made definitive, the freedom with which a person radically disposes of himself for finality. If there is such a state as purgatory which does not come into existence merely by an external decree and intervention of God, but is a connatural consequence of the nature of the plural human being, then I could imagine that it might offer opportunities and scope for a postmortal history of freedom to someone who had been denied such a history in his earthly life. To be honest, the thought of something like this seems to me more probable than the idea that there are people who continue to exist and to whom God has refused for all eternity to permit this eternity of theirs to be also the finality of their act of freedom. These "blessed ones" would be people who had never freely loved God for all eternity, whose eternal love had never passed into finality through the gate of their freedom. I find an idea of this kind dreadful.

'It may, of course, be asked if there is not some way of avoiding this conclusion other than the one we have suggested. But how? I cannot see any other distinct possibility. The theory put forward by Ladislaus Boros (that such a decision occurs "in" death, and even with "infants"), examined more closely, seems to be merely another [192] way of expressing what was meant here. For this theory allows for an opportunity which is opened up through the medical exitus and does not precede the latter: that is, it comes "after" death, particularly since there is no solid empirical basis for the assumption that the people considered here have the opportunity of a decision of this kind before death. On the other hand, the intention in our reflections was to bring purgatory (if we may express it in this way) into the closest proximity to death.

'For my own part I really have little time for the theory of a "migration of souls", or similar ideas. But, if we consider how widespread is this idea in space and time, not to be found today only in some narrower cultural group, if we do not assume far too hastily and as a matter of course that our Western attitude alone is the correct one, then we may wonder whether there may not be some truth in this theory of the migration of souls. Then, however we may want to modify this theory from the standpoint of a metaphysical and realistic anthropology, we might raise the question as to whether there could not be a place in the light of the doctrine of purgatory for such a modified theory of the transmigration of souls even within the scheme of Christian dogmatics. I say "modified", since the doctrine of purgatory could be understood as providing an opportunity for those who did not reach a final personal decision in this earthly (or, first) life and, of course, not for others. Christianity, it is true, rightly presumes that such a definitive personal decision is certainly made in the normal case of one human life, even though it is a life that has to be lived in a very primitive way, and, conversely, a tolerable theory of the migration of souls also assumes that the eternal cycle of a person's birth and death can be brought to a halt: in other words, there is that decision which Christianity assumes as normally happening in every life.

'The traditional teaching on the lot of infants, however, also assumes without hesitation that these children, if baptized, enter into their eternal happiness without a personal decision in freedom, since it has no doubt about a happy lot of such baptized infants. Even according to traditional Christian teaching then, there are cases in which a personal decision in freedom does not take place: in other words, the question cannot be avoided as to whether and how something can still happen that was not possible in a particular life. If someone does not, in the light of a Western mentality, for metaphysical [193] or existential-ontological reasons regard the migration of souls as a priori absurd, he might, I think, raise the question of whether an Eastern person could find it possible to tolerate a modified theory of the migration of souls without contradicting Christian dogma.

'Once more, this theory would have to be modified for a Christian, since the latter in any case has the opportunity (and indeed the presumption) of a definitive decision for or against God and consequently may not raise doubts about the end of temporal history, and, of course, must also reject a reincarnation in subhuman creatures. At the same time, after all, it must be remembered that in any case the Christian (despite the presumption just mentioned) and the advocate of a theory of migration of souls know nothing that is absolutely certain about how many cases there are of human beings for whom there is not an absolute decision for or against God in a particular life. The former cannot deny that there are such cases, according to traditional doctrine; the latter cannot know if such a case is normal in relation to the totality of human beings.'

'It seems to me', said the first theologian, now more or less exhausted, 'that we have terribly little exact knowledge when it comes to eschatology. Whenever we reflect more closely on what is really meant by the traditional formularies, we get involved in obscurities and uncertainties.'

'What do you mean, obscure and uncertain?' retorted the other. 'If, when I pray, I say that I hope and believe in eternal life, I know what I am saying and all the obscurities and uncertainties surrounding this statement amount for me only to the assumption that I am surrendering myself unreservedly but in hope to the eternal mystery which is called God and says yes to myself.'

WHY DOES GOD ALLOW US TO SUFFER?

Why does God allow us to suffer? is the question with which we now propose to deal. It can scarcely be denied that this is one of the most fundamental questions of human existence. Here and there perhaps there may be a fortunate few who do not appreciate its importance. But most people are not so fortunate and it is certain that those who are will sooner or later be faced with suffering and then they, too, will be unable to avoid this question which is universal, universally oppressive, and touches our existence at its very roots. At the beginning, then, we need say only that this is not an easy question, prompted like many others by idle curiosity, but we are not going to approach it from the outset in a spirit of world-weariness or to talk about its terrible import in terms of sentimental lyricism.

PERMISSIVE SUFFERING

Why does God allow us to suffer? This does not seem to me a bad way of formulating our question. If, for the moment, we understand the term ‘God’ as referring to the one and primal reality which sustains everything and which, as such, can authenticate the question of the unity and meaning of all realities experienced or open to experience by us (so that we are not forbidden from the very outset to raise the question of the unity, meaning, and goal of all realities, as if it were pointless), then it is clear from the outset not only that we can and must ask whether there is suffering, what it is, and where it comes from, but that we also may and must immediately ask why [195] God allows us to suffer in this way. Although this is an absolutely fundamental question, it is not by any means settled in advance from the very outset that we are bringing an absolutely firm notion of God to our question of suffering; the possibility remains entirely open that we shall gain a more or less correct idea of God only when we attempt to answer this question of ours and that the idea would not be accessible to us at all apart from our question.

Why does God allow us to suffer? This, too, seems to me an appropriate way of formulating the question, since it embraces deliberately in summary form without discrimination the different real or conceivable possibilities of God’s relationship to our suffering: in other words, in this connection it does not make the traditional distinctions, for instance, between permitting and causing. And rightly so.

Obviously, the legitimacy, or in other words, the objective justification of such a distinction (especially that between causing and permitting), is not to be questioned, since respect for God’s absolute holiness and goodness forbids us to attribute to him the sin of the free creature and the resultant suffering simply in the same way as we attribute that suffering which does not arise in the first and last place from a creaturely sin and nevertheless is present in the world. But, even if the legitimacy of this traditional and inevitable distinction remains unaffected, it can and must be said at once here that in the last resort the distinction is of secondary importance and does not forbid us to ask in one and the same question and at the same time about God’s relationship to all suffering in every form. For what does ‘permitting’ mean when we are talking about a God who is purely and simply the ground and cause of all reality, who, moreover, in the absolute sovereignty of his freedom and power, in no way restricted by anyone or anything, encompasses all creaturely freedom and does not come up against any limit there? All this (perhaps regarded as more obvious than it really is) was stated in particular by all classical schools of Christian theology from Augustine onward more radically than would be assumed by popular thought on the relationship between God and the world. What does 'permitting' mean, if according to the theology (particularly of the classical schools) on the relationship between divine and human freedom there can be no doubt that God, without in any way infringing or diminishing the freedom of the creature, in his predestination [196] could so forestall creaturely freedom that in practice sin as 'no' to his holy will did not occur in the world; if in the last resort it is contrary to classical theological metaphysics to assert (as a widespread popular apologetics asserts) that God must 'permit' sin in his world if, as is his right, he wants to have creaturely freedom in his world?

On this point it is irrelevant in the last resort whether this classical theological metaphysics has grasped the situation accurately enough or in fact has overlooked something. Particularly from this standpoint, it cannot be said that there is an indissoluble connection between this freedom willed by God in the world and the actual sin of the creature. If there is not this connection, the distinction between God's permitting and his causing something may still be meaningful. But the distinction does not itself provide an answer to the question of how and why God can permit sin and consequently the suffering that sin incurs. Having regard to God's omnipotent freedom, which knows no bounds, causing and permitting seem to us to come so closely together that we can ask quite simply why God allows us to suffer, without having to distinguish a priori in this 'allowing' by God between permitting and causing. We are still only at the preliminary stage of scrutinizing our question as such.

It must be asked whether the question makes sense if everything that can be described as suffering is reduced to one concept or covered by a single word. If this happens, utterly different realities are subsumed under one notion: a procedure that is always extremely dangerous. Without denying the interconnection of the most diverse realities in the world, we must certainly make a clear distinction between the suffering, on the one hand, that is involved with and in man's free act of sin or arises directly out of it and, on the other hand, all the incidents that involve suffering but cannot be ascribed on the basis of our ordinary experience to man's freely committed sin and nevertheless constitute the greater part of the suffering in the world, particularly since they are largely very obviously partial causes and preconditions of that moral evil in the world which is itself suffering and produces suffering. Since, then, sin arising from creaturely freedom (which is never absolute) is itself by its very nature interwoven in an indissoluble and undelimitable way with other suffering; since, in other words, it is not by any means self-explanatory on its own account; since (and this will have to be [197] stated more precisely later) it points to the mystery of God and the mystery of other innocent suffering and since for this reason, of course, an appeal to other creaturely freedom (for instance, of the 'angels' or of the 'devils') in the last resort does not get us any further, even though it might be justified in itself, our basic question is then justified if it concentrates on suffering in its entirety without for that reason denying the distinctions involved: How can God let us suffer?

ATTEMPTS AT A THEISTIC ANSWER

If we want to consider how this question might be answered, we must first of all scrutinize the answers usually given. In accordance with the question as stated here, we are, of course, at the moment scrutinizing only answers that come within the scope of a theistic world vision. We are therefore not interested in what a convinced atheist or a sceptical positivist would say, in what would be the attitude of a thinker for whom the world from the outset and also in its ultimate roots exists in an absolute dualism of good and evil or for whom the co-existence of light and darkness, day and night, good and evil, is something simply to be taken for granted and requires no elucidation or justification; for these, what we call 'evil' – as a necessary dialectic to the good – could not by any means arouse that protest which the theist in particular raises against suffering in the name of an infinitely good God. Within the scope of a theistic basic conviction there are always several possible answers to our basic question. None of them, it should be stressed, need be pointless or absolutely exclude a different answer. The only question is whether these traditional answers are sufficient in the last resort or whether they simply do not provide any solution to the basic question. Let us see.

Suffering as a Natural Side Effect in an Evolving World

A first attempt to answer our question, more or less distinctly articulated, tends to see suffering as a practically unavoidable side effect [198] in a pluralistic and evolving world. If we look more closely (it is claimed) the world is not a particularly bad place; it consists in fact of many complex realities which do not a priori fit in smoothly with one another. The struggle for existence is part of biological development: it is unavoidable and there is no reason to sing sad dirges because the pike swallows the young whitefish or because the female insect sometimes devours the male after copulation. To interpret biological activity as suffering is merely stupid: it is a simple fact and in no way open to an interpretation of this kind. What we call pain and death in this sphere are no more than a ruse of nature, an artifice, to gain more life.

According to this theory, in the last resort moral evil and the suffering that it involves must also be understood in the same way. These, too, are frictional phenomena which necessarily accompany mind, freedom, and moral development. Evil is no more than the good that is not yet perfect or the inescapable tribute which the finite mind must pay to its material foundations on which it rests and which it has to use. In the last resort, evil is to be ascribed merely to what is otherwise known as suffering in the material world, to be explained entirely as a consequence of heredity, social conditions, psychological misdirections, bad education, etc. An adequate elucidation might well lead to an understanding and explanation of physical and moral suffering of such a kind as to show up a serious protest against it as a foolish exaggeration of the demands which a materially conditioned mind can properly make on reality. We must see without illusions the limits of the possible and not to be too demanding. Then it becomes immediately clear that God created a really good world and the question of whether it is the best of all possible worlds can be left aside.

What is to be said about this first attempt to interpret suffering in the world and at the same time to provide a justification of God the Creator? As outlined here it is certainly not to be regarded as superficial or stupid. It is also an answer to be considered more seriously by some of those who indulge in self-torment with their protests against this dark world and their own terrible existence; they might perhaps wonder whether their protest is not permeated by an exaggerated self-esteem which only creates further suffering by its implicit complaint about an injury done to itself. But in the last resort this answer is in fact unsatisfactory and superficial. In view of the [199] limited scope of the question as formulated here, let us leave aside the problem of how pain and death are to be viewed within the dimension of purely biological existence as such. Strictly within this dimension many a protest against suffering may well be inappropriate. We shall refrain from any judgment about this here, even though the groaning of the nonhuman creature, of which Paul speaks, can provide food for thought and suggest a degree of caution. But this first answer breaks down as soon as we see how these physico-biological contradictions are projected into the dimension of spiritual personality and freedom.

Of course, there is a great deal in the realm of freedom and personal history that is determined or co-determined by material or biological conditions and, in fact, to an extent that can scarcely be exaggerated. But the observation of the fact that the realization of the spirit, of freedom and personal decision, is thus materially conditioned does not as such solve the problem of this conditioning. There ought to be freedom, self-determination, unrepeatable uniqueness. When the attempt is made to realize these things, it can only be by coming up against the anonymous constraint of biological necessity and universal law; what is meant to be spirit in unique freedom becomes matter under universal compulsion. Under these circumstances pain could be eliminated and explained only if it were possible to regard spirit as a secondary manifestation of matter. But that is impossible. Moreover the history of freedom does not permit suffering to be played down. It is not sufficient to ascribe suffering to the hardships arising from the material world as such. Freedom as such itself produces suffering and pain and death.

It is possible to imagine freedom and its dignity existing without suffering in paradisiacal harmony. But in practice, freedom as such has produced immense and indescribable suffering that cannot be blamed on material and biological conditions. Responsibility for the march into the gas chambers of Auschwitz cannot be spread over the phenomena leading to the plunge of a swarm of migratory ants into an abyss. Evil is not merely a complicated case of what is biologically unpleasant or of death prevailing everywhere. The vast protest rising up from world history is not simply an intensification of the noise that always and everywhere accompanies a life and death that can basically be taken for granted; to play down in this way the pain in world history is a betrayal of personal dignity, of [200] freedom, and of the absolute imperative of morality, and it is possible to cope on these cheap terms with suffering and death in the history of humanity only as long as this suffering touches a person merely from a distance. There are certainly stoics who uphold a theory that minimizes the importance of suffering and death and yet go calmly and with dignity into death. But, whether they reflect on it or not, they are then living in the light of a deeper understanding of existence than is implied in this theory.

Suffering as Effect of Creaturely, Sinful Freedom

There is a second interpretation of suffering in the world that is not adequate in itself. This seeks to derive suffering exclusively from creaturely freedom and to explain it in this light. Suffering, pain, and death are said to be always and everywhere and in every respect the effect and manifestation of the evil decision of creaturely freedom and nothing else. A bold theory. It is then not a priori absurd to take into account a creaturely freedom which is not identical with human freedom and which has created a history prior to the history of the biological nature of this earth, thus co-determining a priori the peculiar character of this history of nature and the history of humanity and marking it with suffering. Without this hypothesis, which has often been adopted in different variations in the history of Christian thought, an adequate derivation of all suffering from creaturely freedom alone would not be possible. Admittedly an attempt has also been made to deduce at least all human suffering from human freedom alone, without recourse to a supra- and pre-human history, in the sense of the traditional claim that, prior to a human free decision at the dawn of history, man did not have to die and existed in a paradisiacal immunity from suffering. In this way it is possible to maintain the theory that, in the last resort, all our human suffering arises entirely from freedom (that is, from man's freedom).

If, in the first place, we leave aside the problems created by the assumptions behind these two varieties of the basic theory, the latter seems to have something very seductive about it. Facing, as it were, God's glory and goodness, it tells man (or the free creature as such): You alone, you entirely alone, are responsible for all the horror of creaturely history. You, through your freedom, are to blame: [201] through the freedom with which you made a decision that by its very nature could not be shifted off to anyone else and least of all to God. Creaturely freedom is thus set up as somehow purely and simply absolute and underivable in its decision. Then it is clear that the blessed radiance of God's holy grace is not imperiled by the cry of despair that inevitably follows the evil decision of creaturely freedom.

But (we touched briefly on this problem at the very beginning) for a really Christian understanding, the creature's freedom is not so absolute and underivable as is assumed in this arrogant conception, which refuses to admit that in the last resort there cannot be something in the world that is independent of God, that even this free decision of the creature cannot be made by the latter entirely alone and with an absolutely undivided responsibility. According to Christian understanding, freedom of this kind simply does not exist. The freedom of men and angels is a created freedom, sustained in its existence and nature always and everywhere by God's supreme providence, in its power and action, in its capacity and concrete decision. We may not be able to see how true creaturely freedom can so exist with the inalienability of its decision and at the same time with the inescapability from God's sovereignty, in which God sustains this creaturely freedom and places it in its freedom, but for that very reason does not share his sovereignty with the creature's freedom; this in no way alters the fact that our freedom is completely embraced in God's supreme providence.

Distinctions can rightly be introduced into the permanent origination of our free decisions in the light of the way in which these decisions on each occasion turn out to be good or bad; within the scope of Catholic theology it is possible to work out the most diverse theories of the way in which this attribution of our free decisions to God's disposition is to be conceptualized and interpreted. Or it might be decided a priori and in principle to refrain from all attempts of this kind and to assume that it is fundamentally impossible for us here and now to get any nearer to a solution of this problem. None of this in any way changes the basic conviction of all Christian theology that to regard our freedom in this way as absolute and autonomous is contrary to the Christian understanding of God.

We are free, we cannot shift on to God the responsibility for our free decisions, but these very decisions of ours are in fact completely [202] embraced solely by God's disposition, which has its ground in him alone and in nothing else. As is evident from all attempts of the different permissible Catholic systems of grace, it is impossible to reconcile into a higher synthesis the statement that we cannot shift on to God our freedom decisions as our own and the statement that these also come within the scope of God's disposition (whether this disposition is to be understood as causing or permitting). But this in no way alters the fact that even our free decision as such is nevertheless in every respect and in its whole reality dependent on God.

If, however, this is the situation in the light of the Christian idea of God, the statement that suffering arises from freedom is not a final and definitive conclusion, but a hint that, important as it may be, again disappears into the mystery of the sovereign freedom of God himself. And if in truth we have to admit that we are responsible and may not escape from this responsibility, it also remains true that this permanent responsibility of ours must be and will be assumed by God himself, even though we do not know how that is possible. If, then, we point to our freedom as an answer to the question of why God allows us to suffer, this answer is largely true and is not to be dismissed, but it is not final. We are not permitted to be content with this answer, but neither are we permitted to assume that there is an answer going beyond this which would be completely comprehensible to us.

In these circumstances, how far suffering in the world is to be ascribed to man's creaturely freedom and eventually to that of the angels and the devils, and how far suffering exists that is truly man's suffering and yet does not spring from an evil use of freedom, is more or less merely a question of theoretical curiosity, the answer to which in no way alters our existential situation. Whatever form the answer takes, it remains in any case provisional and in the end is lost in God's incomprehensibility and in his freedom. Consequently there is no need to discuss at greater length here all the questions with which we were faced at the beginning. As far as our question is concerned, it is irrelevant in the last resort whether our cosmos bears the traces of a disaster occurring in the course of the angels' history of freedom, whether and how humanity lived in paradise before its sin, in what sense death can be understood as the price of sin, etc. These are questions which may be imposed on us by a [203] Christian self-understanding. Here, however, they can be left aside, since they certainly cannot yield the final answer to our essential question.

Suffering as a Situation of Trial and Maturing

A third traditional answer to our question suggests that God allows us to suffer in order to test us and bring us to maturity. Suffering, it is claimed, is the necessary situation in which alone a mature person can grow in patience, hope, and wisdom, and in the pattern of Christ.

We need not examine the implications of this third answer more closely here. It contains an important truth which is certainly not to be minimized or obscured here and, taking for granted the fact that suffering comes to everyone and occurs in every milieu, this third answer can and must be seen as a true imperative, binding on each individual: Live in such a way that the suffering affecting you and your milieu does not in the last resort turn your attitude to God into one of despair, but perfects you, even though the process of maturing leads through all the abysses of dying and death with Jesus. Nevertheless, this third suggestion still does not provide an answer to our real question. And this is not only because there is such a terrible amount of suffering in the world, to which only a fraudulent and unrealistic piety could ascribe such a humane effect.

The children burned to death by napalm bombs were not going through a process of human maturing. Elsewhere, too, in innumerable cases there is suffering which is destructive in its effects, despite all good will to endure it in a human and Christian way, which simply demands too much from a person, warps and damages his character, leaves him preoccupied solely with satisfying the most primitive needs of existence, makes him stupid or wicked. In desperation it might almost be said that suffering as a means of human and Christian maturing is something that can be endured only by a noble mind untouched by any real distress, practising spiritual massage in an ivory tower.

This again is a one-sided and unfair way of expressing it and fails to appreciate the range of opportunities of coping with a terrible existence in faith, hope, and love. But all this in no way alters the [204] fact that there is infinitely diverse, terrible suffering in the history of humanity (including the uncertain lot of children dying in infancy and old people in senile decline) which cannot be integrated into a process of maturing and personal probation, so that this third attempt at an explanation also remains inadequate. The question might also be raised quite plainly and sincerely whether humanity might be better enabled to reach moral maturity in a situation less fraught with suffering. How could it be proved that really genuine happiness must necessarily soften and corrupt man?

In principle, a situation free from suffering would seem to be as such morally better. On this point Christian ascetics are not always completely consistent. They say that suffering springs from sin and extol emphatically (and somewhat theoretically) this situation of suffering as the authentic climate in which the Christian virtues can flourish. Of course, accepting the fact that suffering exists, such Christian imperatives are wholly appropriate and salutary and rightly call for the imitation of the crucified Christ. But this does not answer the question of why God allows us to endure sufferings which simply cannot have this humane educative function (and there are innumerable examples of these). The most appalling sufferings have no such function at all; they are cruelties of nature which far transcend our moral resources.

Suffering as a Pointer to Another, Eternal life

A fourth attempt to answer our basic question consists in referring to eternal life after death and after our history of suffering. This suggestion should certainly not be dismissed with the stupid claim that it contains only a dubious analgesic, opium of the people and for the people. As Christians we certainly cherish a courageous hope, which only God's grace can give us, looking for eternal life without death, pain, and tears. But this suggestion is not an answer to our basic question. For no one can prove that this suffering is the absolutely necessary means for attaining eternal life, that death under any circumstances is the sole gateway to eternal life. In fact, Christian tradition tells us that death did not have to be. But neither can it be said that sin, which is supposed to be the cause of death, is itself [205] unavoidable or that it does not in the last resort represent an unanswered question to God himself.

If, moreover, eternal life cannot simply be used as a way of brushing aside the history of cruelty, then a crudely understood future state of happiness does not justify the horrors that preceded it. And how is eternal life to be conceived, if we can be happy there looking back to the torment of history? This question, at least, still remains open. How are we to avoid the temptation to return the admission ticket to eternal life, if this eternal life cannot consist in forgetting history to such an extent that the identity of the person now in bliss with his existence in history is canceled? In brief, since it is possible to think of an eternal life achieved without suffering, it can indeed be seen as a conquest of suffering but not as an authorization of the latter.

The Incomprehensibility of Suffering as Part of the Incomprehensibility of God

What then are we to say? Is no justification to be found of suffering in man's history? Must we simply leave our basic question unanswered? Let us begin our reflections once more from a quite different starting point. Christian faith declares that God is the incomprehensible mystery. This he is now and for all eternity, this he will be even when we see him face to face. Even then, the terrible radiance of the incomprehensible God will remain, unveiled and eternal. It will be, we might say, endurable only if we love God and exist unconditionally and selflessly in this love that affirms God as he is; the never comprehensible and never transparent mystery of the infinite God can be our eternal bliss only in the act in which we selflessly affirm him. Apart from a love of this kind, in which man forsakes himself, never really to return to himself, the sole appropriate basic act of our existence would only be the act of a radical protest that we are not ourselves God and also that we cannot cope with him: the act which constitutes hell. This love, dispossessing man until he is absorbed selflessly into the mystery of God, has no justification outside itself any more than the mystery of God to which it surrenders man.

[206] This mystery of God's incomprehensibility, however, is not merely the mystery of a being to be understood as static, but is also the mystery of God's freedom, of his underivable disposition, which has not to be justified before any other authority. It is to this that man surrenders himself even when he loves God face to face in eternal life and abandons himself unconditionally to God's incomprehensibility. God is loved in his freedom, God himself and not only what we have grasped of him in what must remain eternally no more than a fleeting glance. Only the knowledge which is itself dissolved and transfigured in love, which, in the last resort, is not acquired as knowledge is otherwise acquired, but which is surrendered, lovingly lost in God's incomprehensibility and sees there (and not elsewhere) its fulfillment, its true nature: this alone is the knowledge that saves us and makes us free by the very fact that it is turned into unselfish love, the incomprehensible miracle demanded from man who seems to be the subject that by its very nature is egoistic and wholly self-centered. When we consider all this, our basic question can be seen from quite different aspects. What was hitherto regarded as its unanswerability is then no longer the scandal in our existence, to be removed as quickly as possible, which must be elucidated as clearly as possible, but an element in the incomprehensibility that penetrates, challenges, and lays claim to our whole life.

The incomprehensibility of suffering is part of the incomprehensibility of God. Not in the sense that we could deduce it as necessary and thus inevitably as clarified from something else that we already know of God. If this were so it would not be at all incomprehensible. But the very fact that it is really and eternally incomprehensible means that suffering is truly a manifestation of God's incomprehensibility in his nature and in his freedom. In his nature because, despite what might be described as the terrible amorality of suffering (at least on the part of children and innocent people), we have to acknowledge the pure goodness of God, which needs no acquittal before our tribunal. In his freedom, because this, too, if it wills the suffering of the creature, is incomprehensible, since it could achieve without suffering the sacred aims of the freedom that wills suffering. Suffering, then, is the form (as such, again, underivable) in which the incomprehensibility of God himself appears.

Without wanting to introduce a logical system of assumptions and conclusions, it might be said at most that, concretely, within our [207] existence which can be realized only historically in freedom, suffering is unavoidable insofar as its absence would mean that God would not be taken seriously as the incomprehensible mystery with which we have to cope here and now, but would remain an abstract theorem giving us no further trouble in the concreteness of our life. In the actual course of our existence the fact is that the acceptance of God as the intractable mystery and the silent acceptance of the inexplicability and unanswerability of suffering are one and the same event. Theoretically it might perhaps be said that the impossibility of tracing back a free disposition of God, which is understandable only in itself and in its loving acceptance by us, without being ascribed to something else, understandable in love and not in theory, is itself an exercise of absolute surrender to the mystery of God, even if this free disposition of God does not really involve suffering. But it might just as well be said that the very fact of such a capitulation to freedom, without expecting it to be justified by anything other than itself, involves pain in a sublime sense, compared to which suffering in a more physico-biological sense must ultimately seem insignificant, particularly since for us, at least at the present time, subjective assessment of a pain and its real depth, superficiality, or radicalness are not identical. Thus, the ecstatic outburst of the creaturely subject from itself, in order to surrender unconditionally to God's freedom, in truth might also involve pain in a sublime sense: pain with which in any case the bliss of escaping from oneself has to be paid for, so that what we otherwise regard as suffering is no more than its counterpart on a lower plane of being. However that may be, in our present concrete state, the acceptance of suffering without an answer other than the incomprehensibility of God and his freedom is the concrete form in which we accept God himself and allow him to be God. If there is not directly or indirectly this absolute acceptance of the incomprehensibility of suffering, all that can really happen is the affirmation of our own idea of God and not the affirmation of God himself.

Walter Dirks tells of a visit to Romano Guardini, when the latter already bore the marks of his fatal illness:

> To hear what the old man confided on his sick bed was an unforgettable experience. At the Last Judgment he would not only allow himself to be questioned, but would also in his turn ask questions. [208] He firmly hoped that the angel would not deny him the true answer to the question which no book, not even the Bible, no dogma and no teaching authority, no 'theodicy' or theology, not even his own theology, had been able to answer for him: Why, God, these fearful detours on the way to salvation, the suffering of the innocent, why sin?[1]

All that we want to say here and now is that Guardini rightly could not discover any answer to this question, that the question can certainly be answered only by the angel at the judgment, and even then the true answer must still be only the incomprehensible God in his freedom and nothing else. In other words, this answer can be heard only if we surrender ourselves in unconditionally adoring love as answer to God. If we do not achieve this love, forgetting itself for God, or, better, if we do not accept it as given to us, there is nothing left but naked despair at the absurdity of our suffering, a despair which is really the only form of atheism that must be taken seriously. There is no blessed light to illumine the dark abyss of suffering other than God himself. And we find him only when we lovingly assent to the incomprehensibility of God[2] himself, without which he would not be God.

PART SIX

Mary and Woman

MARY AND THE CHRISTIAN IMAGE OF WOMAN

The Church from the beginning never regarded Mary merely as a person who inevitably appears, like many others, in a biography of Jesus. Mary has her proper and unique function in salvation history as such and the Church accordingly in its liturgy and piety pays special reverence to the Blessed Virgin, whom it acknowledges as Mother of God. The Church sees in Mary its own image in pure perfection, the image of the nature of the Christian in its purity and fullness and therefore also the perfect image of woman.

This image of woman must not be lost sight of today. It is this image that has enabled the Church in past centuries, perhaps without any very close reflection, to prevent society (with which it often enough too uncritically identified itself) from setting up a purely male domination. The Church itself had also to learn slowly and painfully, amid the changes in secular society, to give woman what is due to her by nature and by right: an historical process which is still far from complete. But in its understanding of faith the Church has a starting point of its own and a dynamism of its own for this process. And what is its own is in fact present as an archetype in its image of Mary.

Like the Christian faith as a whole, the image of Mary has obviously a history in the Church. Consequently, the image of woman, as available to the Church in Mary, also has its history which is not told and elucidated simply by presenting the history of the Marian dogmas from the Council of Ephesus (431) to Pius XII and up to chapter 8 of the constitution Lumen Gentium or to the Apostolic [212] Exhortation of Paul VI on Marian devotion (1974). This is right particularly since it was only at the Second Vatican Council and in the teaching of Paul VI that the process began explicitly of seeing in the image of Mary the image of woman as such, even though, of course, Christendom had at all times (perhaps occasionally not very discreetly) stamped its knowledge of woman on to the image of Mary. The image of woman in the image of Mary has a history which still continues today and is as unfinished, incomplete, and unforeseeable as anything that belongs to history.

CHANGES IN THE IMAGE OF MARY

While we talk of changes in the image of the Blessed Virgin as image of woman, the fact must not be overlooked that there is something permanent about this image. For the faith also of the Church of the future, Mary will remain the believer who, with and in her existence, in her faith, and in her person, received the eternal Word of the Father as God’s irrevocable promise to the world, Jesus, the blessed fruit of her womb. She will always be recognized as the person whose existence from the beginning – despite the sin of the world, which she also had to endure – was encompassed by the victorious grace of God which preserved her and her freedom by its unobtrusive power as ‘immaculate’. The Church will always confess that Mary with her whole existence ('body and soul') has 'already' reached her consummation, whether or not this is regarded as a 'temporal' privilege for her alone. The Church will always see in Mary the one who had a unique function in salvation history, who reached her eschatological goal in Jesus Christ, crucified and risen, however this unique function is described more precisely in its different aspects ('first of the redeemed', 'co-redemptrix', 'mediatrix of grace'). At the same time, the Church will neither obscure the nature of Jesus and his function as mediator of salvation nor give way to a pseudo-democratic resentment, unwilling to accept a situation in which everyone does not have the same task in history. It will confess that man receives from others and has himself the whole fullness of being human (by nature and grace) only because in unselfish love he sees it as present in all others together.

If we ask about possible and conceivable changes in the image of [213] the Blessed Virgin today or in future, some basic considerations must first be put forward. In the first place, Christian dogma also has its history. Its truth is always present only in an historical form and particularly when we are not reflecting on such an historical form of truth. Perhaps we cannot do so adequately because this form is that of our own time and, consequently, there is lacking the distance at which we recall in historical reflection forms of truth other than our own. This is true also of Marian dogmas. Historically there has been an historical development up to the definition of the assumption of Mary with body and soul into her consummation (1950) in which individual Marian dogmas (divine maturity, immaculate conception, assumption into heaven) were added to one another, so to speak, to form the Mariology that we acknowledge today as part of our faith. These individual Marian dogmas have grown out of a single Mariological basic principle.

I do not think that Mariology will develop further in this 'quantitative' way (as not a few Mariologists hoped, even as recently as twenty years ago) so that in the foreseeable future there might, for example, be definitions of Mary as 'co-redemptrix' or 'mediatrix of grace'. After the events at the Second Vatican Council, linked with the controversial formulation of Mariology, this seems to me improbable. That is not to say that Catholic Mariology will have no history in the future. But presumably this will not consist (to put it crudely) in a 'quantitative' augmentation of Marian dogma. What is more likely to happen is that the old dogma will be both reconsidered and theologically assimilated under new aspects and against new backgrounds of understanding, which formerly were not so explicitly present. In what follows we shall reflect a little on these things.

Here is a second consideration. If we legitimately disregard sublime speculations on Mary's dignity in the light of her divine maternity which points directly to the incomprehensibility of the infinite God, Mariological statements refer to a particular individual, an historical and finite human being, who has a definite (albeit unique) place in mankind as a whole and in its history. This person's unique function in history does not permit us to see her in the light of what is ultimately a mistaken Platonism and to ascribe to her alone the whole fullness of human reality which can be realized only in mankind as a whole and in its whole history.

[214] This is really obvious. But it seems to me that Mariology in the past did not always 'subcutaneously' take this obviousness seriously enough and was exposed to the danger of attributing to Mary, even as an individual human being, all those privileges (at least eminenter) which are at all possible in a human being, but in fact realizable only in the whole of mankind taken together. The individual Christian was thus bound to regard himself only as a defective repetition of what had been realized perfectly in Mary as an individual person. But this is not true. Just as (in Augustine's terminology) the whole Christ is present only in head and body (of the Church) together, and the body (of the Church) also helps the head to reach its whole fullness, so it is analogously with Mary. It is only the Church as a whole that gives reality to Mary and in its loving unity gives to this individual person her whole fullness, which she does not have when considered independently. This is true particularly when we consider Mary as the perfect woman in her relationship to all women in the human race. Only the whole – with Mary – is Mary.

NEW VIEW OF JESUS CHRIST

A first alteration of the horizons of understanding for Mary results from the change in modern Christology. Traditional Christology (despite the treatise De legato divino in fundamental theology) was a pure descendence Christology, a Christology from above, a doctrine of the descent of the preexistent Logos into flesh, into history. There was indeed always a fundamental theology of the encounter with the historical, concrete Jesus, but as a purely fundamental theological formulation of the question and as a presupposition to dogmatics it remained outside dogmatic Christology in the form in which the latter appeared as early as Paul's Letters to the Philippians and Colossians and more especially in the prologue to John's Gospel.

A dogmatic Christology today (notwithstanding the rights of an independent fundamental theology) must itself start with the historical Jesus and show that the self-understanding of the historical Jesus (at least when his resurrection is taken into account) justifies this descendence Christology which, as we said, is present even in the New Testament but needs a separate justification. Fundamental theology [215] and dogmatic Christology must find a clearer internal unity. This, too, is attempted in recent Christologies, which are dogmatic Christologies and yet incorporate the questions of fundamental theology. We may recall, for instance, the works of Walter Kasper, Edward Schillebeeckx and, although to be read with reserve and critically, Hans Kung. They all practise an 'ascendence Christology', a Christology 'from below', not to suppress the older Christology, but to take it in and authenticate it before the historical conscience of modern man.

It is time for something similar to happen in Mariology today. Here, too, there must be something like an 'ascendence Mariology', a Mariology 'from below'. This means in the first place that the formulations of the questions, the methods of answering them, and the answers themselves, which refer to Mary and are usual in modern exegesis working historically, are taken into account by dogmatic Mariology. It must be asked, for example, what is really the precise literary genre of the narratives referring to Mary in Matthew, Luke, and John; other statements of Scripture which make Mary's role in the life of Jesus seem restricted must be evaluated more impartially than has hitherto been the case generally in Mariology. If the 'historical' element in these Marian narratives is cautiously and critically estimated as more slight than was hitherto thought, this need not turn out to the disadvantage of a dogmatic Mariology. Such narratives are not only reportage, but also theology, which as inspired scriptural statements are binding on us and set us the task of showing how these statements emerge from the experience which early Christendom had of Mary in connection with Jesus.

Under these assumptions of modern exegesis, a Mariology from below can be developed which, of course, must take in classical Mariology, but which sees it from new aspects and can purify it from pious exaggerations. The questions involved in the doctrine of the 'virgin birth' must be thought out afresh. Mary must be seen also as the woman of the people, as poor, as a learner, who lives in the light of the historical, social, and religious situation of her time and her people. She is to be seen, not as a heavenly being, but as a human person, as active and suffering for herself and others, as learning in the midst of many uncertainties, as accepting her function in salvation history in faith, hope, and love, and by this very fact, as model and mother of believers.

MARY AS IMAGE OF WOMAN

Mariology can be set in motion today from another aspect. Mary should be and remain for the Christian the pure image of woman, not merely a model for believers in general. Nor is an orthodox Christology subcutaneously monophysite or monothelite, but takes absolutely seriously the true and undiminished reality of Jesus as the one who confronts God in creaturely freedom. If at the same time it is remembered that he was a man, then, notwithstanding the unique importance of Jesus for both sexes, it can certainly be said that Mary represents the pure image of woman in her relationship to God in the same way that Jesus as man presents that image for man as such.

If we ask what exactly this means for Mary as model for woman, serious questions emerge which have not yet been adequately recognized. The various anthropological sciences of the present time (for all their fundamental equality, from which the Church's theory and practice have something to learn) say a great deal and much that is important about the distinction of the sexes and, thus, also about the peculiar nature of woman which determines all dimensions of her existence. In principle, therefore, there can be no doubt that woman even in her grace-given relationship to God is a woman and not a sexless being. But if we begin to describe concretely the religious character of woman, anthropologically and theologically (from human experience, from the Old and the New Testament), we are at once involved (not to speak too poetically) in great embarrassment.

Such concrete descriptions of woman's religious existence are based often and hastily on characteristics which really do not belong to the external, authentic nature of woman, but are historically, culturally, and sociologically conditioned. The charge might be made today that these descriptions purporting to be a theologically guaranteed understanding of her nature are really opposed to woman's emancipation. The danger then arises that Mary's image will be drawn with the aid of such an historically and culturally conditioned image of woman and then used theologically to sanction and perpetuate this older and today in many respects dubious image.

On the other hand, on closer inspection it becomes clear that many features (authentic in themselves) introduced into the image of Mary as woman in her relationship to God are by no means specifically and exclusively feminine. Is it not true that a man also in his [217] approach to God must be able to be silent, be wholly receptive, commit himself, listen in humility and faith, serve and not dominate? In describing the religious existence we seize only too easily and too often on characteristics which are really generally human and can and must be predicated of both sexes.

If we add that such attributes of woman are present in a specifically feminine and not masculine form, the question arises of what exactly and concretely is meant by this. It does not seem very easy to give a clear answer to this question by attempting to characterize this specifically feminine way of religious existence with the aid of modalities which are sociologically and culturally conditioned and do not belong simply to woman's nature always and everywhere.

Mariology today and in future still has a great deal to do if it wants to have an image of Mary that will really be true also for the religious existence of woman as such. It is an image that can perhaps be produced authentically today only by women, by women theologians. But this means that Mariology, despite its autonomy as a dogmatic treatise, is caught up in that mental and spiritual history in which woman even today looks for the nature she always had and which nevertheless is continually freshly assigned to her. Mariology is not at an end. Even today it has a history stretching into the future, which has still to be found. In this

MARY'S VIRGINITY

The following reflections are concerned simply with Mary's virginity as a single theme. Apart from possible exceptions, which we reserve to ourselves, this is a legitimate procedure in the light both of the material and of the apologetic and kerygmatic intention behind the reflections, since on the whole the questions of the origin, meaning, and binding force in faith and of the possibility of conveying these doctrines to modern man's sense of faith involve more or less the same difficulties in regard to virginitas ante partum (VAP), in partu (VIP), and post partum (VPP), and since Rudolph Pesch,[1] too, questions only the VPP, but by that very fact also raises the question of the VAP.

The reflections presented here are not directly concerned with the question of the meaning and the limits to the meaning of the doctrine of the virginity of Mary and the binding force of this doctrine in faith. In this connection nothing will be directly settled here, since an adequate treatment of these questions would require much more space than is available here and since the trend of these reflections does not seem to me to call for so broad a theme. In these reflections all that is to be asked is what group of questions would have to be kept in mind, considered, and possibly discussed if any representatives of the Church's magisterium wanted to comment on the questions raised again by Pesch. For only when we are clear about these preliminary questions can we decide properly the question of whether the Church's magisterium at the present moment should or [219] can comment on the problems raised again by Pesch, whether this is possible and opportune. What is to be said from the exegetical standpoint on the question as formulated here is explained elsewhere and cannot and need not be repeated here. This involves a further limitation of the task to be undertaken here. But the formulation of the theme as so restricted includes two things: it must not only be asked what preliminary theological reflections (in terms of systematic theology and history of dogma) are necessary today if we want to give an appropriate answer that is 'as such' correct and binding in faith in regard to the doctrine of Mary's virginity; it must also be asked what preliminary reflections of this kind are necessary if an authoritative teaching of the Church on this virginity is really to have any prospect of actually 'getting through' to the understanding of faith of those members of the Church whom the authoritative declaration is meant to reach. The Church has the duty, not only of saying the right thing, but also of saying this right thing 'rightly': that is, so that there is the greatest possible prospect that its right teaching will also actually be believed. These two aspects of our theme will be given equal consideration here, although they do not need always to be expressly distinguished.

PRELIMINARY METHODOLOGICAL CONSIDERATIONS

(1) If the essential problem (particularly as including VAP) is to be treated correctly today dogmatically and kerygmatically, the question of an objectively and apologetically correct understanding of a 'miracle' cannot be excluded, since VAP, at least in the traditional and 'biological' sense, includes such a miracle. Both from the nature of the case (that is, in the light of a correct and clear idea of God and of his relationship to the world) and from the standpoint of a modern mentality (which is not in itself a criterion of truth, but cannot be disregarded if proclamation of the faith is to be effective) the idea of miracle (in itself and with reference to its credibility) as a breach of suspension of the 'laws of nature' has become highly problematic, quite apart from the question of whether miracles in this sense can be proved empirically to be facts. (The resurrection of Jesus as a miracle cannot and may not be brought into the present discussion, [220] since this miracle as eschatological event is a priori sui generis.[2]) But in any case, an appropriate and apologetically and kerygmatically effective teaching on VAP cannot be established on the basis of a procedure that ignores the general problems in regard to a 'miracle' arising from the nature of the case and for the modern mentality prior to the question of VAP.

(2) If the doctrine of Mary's virginity is to be really effectively conveyed to the Christian (particularly the educated Christian) today, the conclusions of recent studies on the development of dogma cannot be disregarded; here, too, what has been learned at other points of the history of dogma and even from the New Testament itself must be kept in mind. But, among other things (which cannot be explicitly considered here), this means at least the following:

(a) With reference to its individual statements and expressions the Church's dogma cannot be set out today as merely the sum total of a number of individual propositions, each of which is presented simply as based on individual statements of Scripture, or of former declarations of the magisterium. Each individual statement must be made in its coherence both with the one totality of faith and with the original and unifying centre of the reality of faith. Otherwise, the teaching of Vatican II on the hierarchy of truths amounts to no more than empty talk and a feeble excuse. The original one and unifying event of the final revelation in Christianity is not a sum total of individual propositions to be simply accepted, arbitrarily communicated by God in their individual form, but the event of God's most intimate self-communication which finds its full historical tangibility and its eschatological irreversibility in Jesus Christ, crucified and risen. The Church's teaching on Mary, too, must be seen and made intelligible from this standpoint, even though this does not necessarily mean a simply logically deductive argument. This is true in particular of VAP, VIP, and VPP. If there is not a clear and explicit recourse to that event, the proclamation of this doctrine remains ineffective and the magisterium does not achieve what is unconditionally required of it today. We are speaking of no more than a [221] postulate, and how it can be fulfilled remains obscure. But the realization of this postulate is obviously not possible here.

(b) An appropriate and effective proclamation of the doctrine of Mary's virginity (including VAP) must see without prejudice that the content of this doctrine (as correct and therefore to be more precisely defined) is not in itself alone a single primary datum, based on purely empirical observations, but a factor deduced from a previous conviction in regard to Mary and her function in salvation history. Even if and insofar as such empirical observations were possible and can or could be assumed to be established, they would not ipso facto yield the real content of the theological teaching. In the first place it is perceptible from the history of dogma that VIP is not based on such empirical (physiological) observations or on information given by Mary, but is a theological 'conclusion' (in the widest sense of the term and as such needing to be more precisely defined), which has become established only in the course of time in the Church's consciousness. But the same is true mutatis mutandis of VAP. The mere fact that, for example, the intervention of a male person is not perceptible in Jesus' coming into existence or that there might be historical information as given by Mary available in this connection could not on its own account authenticate VAP in the sense intended here, either in itself or as an object of a theological belief as such. Nor would an empirical observation of VPP, in the sense that Mary in fact had no more children, alone and independently authenticate the content of VPP as understood in the traditional sense. The fact remains, then, that this whole doctrine, insofar as and in the sense in which it can be an object of faith and binding in faith, must be a factor deduced from a more fundamental global understanding of Mary and her function in salvation history and can be justified only in this way in terms of the history of faith and the history of dogma. But how is this to come about? This is the question which the one Mariology of today cannot evade.

(c) If this question is really objectively and convincingly answered, then undoubtedly for our question, too, the result will be the same as that which can be observed in the history of dogma in regard to very many other doctrines and in these cases is impartially noted by the Church's magisterium today when it appears in the work of theologians. It can rightly be said that the development of dogma (that is, the explication of the original global experience of [222] revelation in individual propositions) is a 'one way' course: that is, if and when such an explication leads on the part of the Church to an absolute assent to a particular individual proposition, it is no longer retrospectively revisable in the sense that such a proposition could later be declared erroneous. Nor is this the case even if this explication of faith, which has in fact taken place at an earlier stage, cannot be achieved conclusively in a purely logical argument. But this understanding of the development of dogma does not exclude, but positively includes, a recourse to the original understanding of faith. (Otherwise we would need, for example, to practise only Denzinger theology and could do without a biblical theology or see the latter as merely historical curiosity.)

Despite the 'one way' character of the history of dogma, recourse to the original understanding of faith, from which the later teaching developed, can be a criterion for the right understanding of the later dogma. It could, in fact, be shown from very many examples (accepted or even confirmed by the Church's magisterium) that recourse to the earlier understanding of faith as source of later teaching can be a criterion for the right and really binding understanding of faith. We ask, for example, what is 'really' meant when we speak of original sin, what is 'really' meant when we say that Jesus founded the Church, instituted seven sacraments, etc.; and we are then asking not only what people generally make of the answers of traditional theology, but also at the same time about the sources of these answers, whether they lead unambiguously to these answers or whether in such traditional answers, despite their genuine origin as a whole from these sources, there have been amalgamated indiscriminately also ideas and interpretations which are not part of the binding content of the article of faith as so established, but have not hitherto been eliminated from it in traditional theology or in the Church's dogmatic pronouncements and for historical reasons could not hitherto have been eliminated.

Not everything that was actually and implicitly assumed at a particular time to be necessary for the clarification of the meaning of an article of faith is really and in principle an inseparable part of this article of faith itself. If, for instance, it is shown historically that the Fathers of Trent in practice had something in mind that they took for granted and did not eliminate from their understanding of the term 'substance', this is far from saying that their notion of substance is [223] binding for the present-day interpretation of transubstantiation. Or if Augustine thought that libido is the necessary means of transmitting original sin and in this way explained original sin as Catholic dogma, this is far from saying that we must or even can regard this understanding of original sin today as dogma. If Pius XII still thought that monogenism was an indispensable and unrenounceable element of the Catholic doctrine of original sin, we may nevertheless hold a different opinion today and, while maintaining the doctrine of original sin and its essential meaning, eliminate a monogenistic interpretation of this doctrine as an historically conditioned amalgam, even though theology hitherto and the magisterium never thought and could not have thought of such a possibility. Pius XII declared that it was part of Catholic faith (DC 3896) that the human soul is directly created by God. But as can easily be proved historically, in making this statement (correct in itself) he had in mind a conceptual model of the immediacy of this act of creation that is no longer shared by many theologians today,[3] without thinking of the possibility of distinguishing between what was really meant and the conceptual model that could be eliminated.

Perhaps the most important and almost startling example in the history of faith and the history of ideas lies in the unity and distinction between the imminent expectation of the historical pre-Easter Jesus, on the one hand, and what the Church today believes to be really meant by this imminent expectation. Here is a process beginning as early as the New Testament and not really closed even today, and which is nevertheless legitimate. Because of the historically changing horizons of understanding of people and the Church, this critical recourse to the ultimate origin of particular theological propositions is constantly necessary in order to cope with new queries about the really binding sense of these theological propositions; but it then provides the opportunity of preserving what is really binding in faith, even though amalgams have to be eliminated or distinguished from its previous formulation as no longer possible or as not binding in faith. At the same time, as we said, such opportunities of distinguishing need not have been explicitly grasped as possible in earlier theology. The claim that these distinctions are or can be legitimate is then reinforced particularly today by the proof that [224] the original understanding of faith did not explicitly contain these amalgams, nor can the latter be conclusively deduced from that understanding. It is not an argument against the partial theory indicated here of the development of the history of dogma that practical difficulties and conflicts arise in the concrete history of the Church's faith as a result of such processes of distinguishing between what was really meant in a later proposition in the history of dogma in the light of the earlier global sense of faith and the concrete conceptual model with the aid of which the later proposition hitherto presented what had really been meant. This is clear precisely from this history of faith. Once such an individual process is closed, it usually does not create any great emotional or existential difficulty for the believer or the theologian. We may recall, for instance, the teaching of the Council of Florence (DS 1551) that all those who are not Catholics at the time of their death are lost and then compare this teaching with that of Vatican II and the mentality corresponding to it in the Church today. But as long as such a process of fresh interpretation of theological teaching goes on (even while preserving what is really meant by it and what is binding), conflicts and differences of opinion are simply unavoidable and must be endured with patience and tolerance.

In the present reflection the question is not whether a new insight and of what kind might emerge in regard to the doctrine of Mary's virginity if it were thought out afresh from the standpoint of the history of dogma and of systematic theology, while keeping in mind the above-mentioned conclusions from the history of dogma and the development of the Church's sense of faith. Possibly nothing 'new' would 'come out' with the use of such a method. But it is also possible that very important new conclusions might emerge on the sense in which this doctrine is binding in faith. None of this is material for discussion here. The important thing here is to stress urgently the absolute necessity of a confrontation of the doctrine of Mary's virginity with present-day ideas of the possibilities of development of dogma. In principle this dogma, too, is open to further development. It cannot be said that the Mariology of the last centuries has allowed precisely and impartially enough for this fundamental possibility.

(d) The systematic theologian in his Mariology needs to ask the exegete and biblical theologian what the latter's investigations have [225] shown to be the exact literary genre of the infancy stories in the New Testament, especially those in Matthew and Luke. If this question is to be answered according to the principles of modern exegesis, very many distinctions will certainly be required. The alternative of historical account or legend is certainly too simple. If we allow for midrash-like narratives and do so in principle even when the theological tradition in Mariology did not hitherto allow for this, the question raised here is still far from adequately answered. The intention of the statement and the mode of the statement in the account of the infancy of Jesus must be more closely defined and distinguished from each other. It can be asked if and when an evangelist transmits narrative traditions (since in any case they have a theological meaning and point) without ipso facto ascribing to such a narrative an absolute binding force in faith. Something of this kind is possible in principle. When, for example, Luke makes Jesus eat after his resurrection, it may be asked whether something of this kind belongs simply and without interpretation to the dimension of historical reality. It is only when questions of this kind have been answered by the exegete that the systematic theologian can consider what conclusions to draw for his Mariology. This is a difficult question.

It is then possible that the subsequent history of faith on Mary will state more than New Testament Mariology alone suggests, if it is considered merely in the light of the hermeneutic of the definition of such a literary genre. (If and why this 'more' is conceivable is something that cannot be further discussed here.) But in principle the opposite is possible. Tradition transmits the account of the Gospels, referring purely and simply to their authority, without itself considering separately in a strict sense the meaning and limits of what the Gospels report, and without considering independently the exact literary genre and thus the hermeneutic in the light of which the Gospel accounts must be read today; it must be defined quite precisely what they are meant to convey to us as binding in faith and what is not so binding. This second possibility, too, exists in principle. When, for example, Paul, according to Luke (Acts 17:26), says in regard to the narrative in Genesis that all mankind stems from one man, or when Paul spontaneously assumes the same thing in Romans 5, this does not mean that we are forbidden ourselves to define more precisely the literary genre of the narrative in Genesis and from that standpoint to appreciate the fact that monogenism in the [226] biological sense is not a principle that is binding in faith. Collaboration of this kind between exegesis and systematic theology in a relationship of mutual dependence and reciprocal questioning is necessary today. We may get the impression that this collaboration has not yet gone far enough in the field of Mariology and could bring further results, if it is impartially and seriously attempted.

(e) What has been said or suggested up to now could perhaps be recapitulated and at the same time generalized by saying that Christianity has been engaged from the Enlightenment onward in a vast process of fresh interpretation of its dogma: that is, of the transposition of this dogma from the horizons of understanding of antiquity and the Middle Ages into those of the present time. Such a transposition contains, of course, a lot of individual dogmatic questions, even though this transposition also amounts to a single and entire task which aims at the innermost and real core of the nature of Christianity. The particular tasks involved in this transposition vary greatly with the content of the individual dogma, are undertaken sooner or later with a certain historical fortuitousness, are accomplished quickly or slowly, unobtrusively or with obvious conflicts. But it would a priori be wrong to see and to interpret this transposition process as a kind of demolition or reduction (described as 'demythologizing' etc.). Even when it is achieved courageously and impartially, step by step, considering the detail and the whole, the process can in fact convey to the believer and the theologian the experience which, as such, seen purely historically, is by no means obvious, but is part of the believer's hope in faith: that is, this transposition process does not cancel the identity of the Christian faith and the Church throughout all the radically changing epochs of the history of ideas, but confirms the fact that the new faith is the old and the old faith is continually becoming new.

Certainly it cannot be maintained a priori that Mariology is not also involved in this transposition process. Until the middle of the twentieth century, among theologians and devout Catholics there was a certain feeling of pride and gratification in the way that Mariology was explicated into materially continually freshly articulated propositions (a process that now seems to have been brought to a halt), while today a new task must be historically assigned to Mariology if it is not to become sterile, to be a museum piece, kept in storage as part of the Church's official teaching but with no role to [227] play in the present-day Christian's life of faith. Mariology, too, must be seen today as part of this transposition process in which the old becomes new in order to endure. What all this means concretely has, of course, not by any means been sufficiently considered and here we cannot even give a hint of it. But these connections between a history of Mariological doctrine and the present rapidly moving history of faith of the Church as a whole must be seen and made relevant: what has been learned from the history of dogma in general, the modern conclusions of a hermeneutics of statements of faith, of a theology (and philosophy) of religious language, and the results of historically critical exegesis must be brought to bear on and made relevant to Mariology, if the latter is to remain as a theological discipline and retain a religious significance for life.

(3) If a position established by a purely exegetical and historical effort is perhaps assigned a merely 'greater probability' than its opposite, the systematic theologian must be careful to avoid exploiting such a situation too quickly and thoughtlessly by declaring as a result of a purely formal logical reasoning that the exegetically slighter probability in virtue of his own premises and reflections has turned out to be the truth, even though historically there is a greater probability (but no more than that) opposed to it. In terms of formal logic this is correct. But such an argument must be handled (if at all) with the utmost caution. In the first place the question must be asked quite strictly and straightforwardly whether the systematic theologian in the light of his own principles can really be so unambiguously and exclusively certain of his position that he can declare the historically more probable to be false and the historically less probable to be true. In such cases it must also be remembered that in many questions of fundamental theology it is possible only to reach historical probabilities and yet to regard these as an existentially adequate fundamental-theological basis for an assent of faith directed to the same object, to assign, that is, to greater probabilities in existential decisions a considerable weight that cannot simply be dismissed by the above-mentioned operation in formal logic. In the end however, as far as it is possible, we must try to the best of our ability to avoid a kind of schizophrenia in which a person gives an assent of faith precisely to what he regards as historically less probable.

(4) Finally, what follows may be put in the form of a question. Is it really necessary, after all, always to give an unambiguous answer [228] immediately to all questions which arise in faith and in theology? Even in the dimension of faith a space may be left open for what is uncertain and unanswered, if this space is devoutly respected by all sides and no one side attempts immediately and decidedly to fill it with an answer with which the other side is not satisfied in the light of faith or intellectually. In all fields of theology there are in fact open questions, different schools, theological controversies. History teaches us that questions of this kind are by no means always and a priori regarded by theologians and believers as such, that is, recognized as open. In the famous controversy on grace, the great majority of the papal commission was decidedly of the opinion that Molinism should be condemned as heretical; in other words, that the alternative between the two systems was certainly not an open question. Nevertheless, it has remained so for centuries, although Paul V acted as if the pope would decide the issue before long. The question of Humanae Vitae likewise is still open, although Paul VI did not expressly admit this.

There are then open questions in theology, even though this openness often creates difficulties of conscience for the faith of believers and theologians; people call impatiently for a settlement of these questions and there are those who declare that a decision is of considerable importance for their faith and its clarity and can and must be made quickly and unambiguously in a definite form. Where this is possible it may or should be done. But we should not be too impatient and as a result of weakness of faith be too ready to think that a decision is always and everywhere possible and required. In regard to our question of Mary's virginity, we are all certainly convinced in faith that Mary was incorporated with her whole body-soul existence into the historical salvific mission of Jesus. Have we not then jointly a basic understanding of what her 'virginity' means for all of us, even though we do not think that we all know with equal certainty and clarity what exactly this integratedness means 'biologically', particularly since we are all sure that this absolute integratedness must also include Mary's participation in the ordinariness and lowliness of Jesus' human existence?

CONCLUSIONS

What follows then from these reflections in regard to the concrete purpose for the sake of which this expert report was requested?

[229] (1) In the first place it seems wholly inopportune for the episcopal magisterium in Germany to comment expressly, directly, and solely on the positions taken up by Rudolf Pesch in regard to the question of the 'brothers of Jesus' in his commentary on Mark. His theme is not expressly virginitas ante partum, but virginitas post partum, and even then only to the extent that this question is to be answered solely by the methods of exegesis as such and at the same time without any attempt to do more than establish a greater or lesser probability. What then is the magisterium to say about these positions of Pesch as such, if it seeks to restrict itself to these? If it were to say that other theological sources and studies in other fields of theology would establish as certain and as an object of faith the position opposed to that adopted by Pesch as exegetically probable, then in order to teach, not only correctly, but also effectively, the magisterium would have no alternative but to expound and justify at length its teaching on the virginity of Mary, taking into account the aspects of the question to which we referred in the first part of these reflections. But we would then be faced with the difficulties of such a declaration (which are to be discussed below). Obviously, too, it is not the business of the magisterium to judge the greater or lesser exegetical and historical probability of Pesch's position as such.

It is also to be remembered that the magisterium today must make clear in its procedure that it allows adequate scope and maintains respect for the freedom of theological studies. There will, of course, be Christians (conservative members of the clergy, for example) who demand an unambiguous reaction to our question as quickly as possible on the part of the magisterium, since these theological controversies make them feel insecure in their faith. But a brief comment by the magisterium on traditional lines, on the one hand, in practice would not clear up this insecurity and, on the other hand, would plunge more and other Christians into the opposite kind of insecurity and would be too brief to provide the latter with any real aid to their faith. In particular the German magisterium which is involved here, from the nature of the case, does not possess an authority such that its declaration could add any considerable weight to the traditional teaching. Such a brief declaration, issued directly against Pesch alone, as a matter of what we might call 'intellectual policy', therefore would not be of much help against 'insecurity' on whatever side this is mainly to be found. This situation in regard to intellectual policy is such that it cannot be [230] substantially changed by brief declarations of the magisterium, but must certainly continue to be endured for a considerable time in patience and hope, since a really effective clarification in the Church's sense of faith would also require time.

(2) Could the German Bishops' Conference perhaps regard Pesch's study as providing, not indeed the essential and comprehensive theme, but an occasion for issuing a lengthy instruction on the question raised here? From a practical standpoint this suggestion, too, must be rejected. However desirable it may be in itself, who is to compose this instruction? Where are the theologians who want and are able to take on this task? It would mean taking into account all those aspects (and more) which were mentioned in our first part. Definite positions would have to be adopted in regard to too many individual theological questions. Could both these things be achieved so that the instruction, composed in this way, would reproduce the joint and binding teaching of the episcopate and would thus be more than a theological treatise the importance of which depends entirely on the force of its arguments? In the light of these and similar considerations it has to be said that an official instruction of this kind, if it is to be both correct and effective, is not possible at the present time. This negative answer does not mean, of course, that the episcopate has no task and no possibility of exercising an influence in regard to this question as a whole. It can encourage theologians to apply themselves more urgently than in the last decades to this group of questions, it can perhaps supply technical and material aids, it can help to make sure that such theological work is carried out in a climate of seriousness, of mutual respect, and with due regard to the mentality in matters of faith also of the average Christian, and so on.

(3) If, however, the German episcopate's commission on faith or the episcopate itself felt that a declaration on the outstanding question could not be neglected, then in order to be effective it would not only have to consider the aspects indicated in our first part (and many others). It would seem expedient to go beyond this and for the instruction regarded as unavoidable to choose from the outset a more general theme as a continuation and amplification of the former instruction of the German episcopate on the Church's magisterium and incorporate into this the question raised here and similar current questions of a concrete character (as raised recently by [231] Hans Küng, for instance) which might then serve as examples and illustrations of the more general theme. In such an instruction of a more general and fundamental character it would be possible to discuss a great deal of what is disturbing, explicitly or implicitly, the sense of faith of the (educated) Christian today: the permanent identity of the Christian teaching on faith despite and in its historicity, the problems of development of dogma, the change of horizons of understanding in the history of faith, the consequences of the doctrine of the hierarchy of truths, the diversity of degrees of binding force of official doctrinal pronouncements of the Church, the meaning and limitations of the magisterium, the latter's real existential location in the individual's sense of faith, etc. – all themes that can only be indicated here and not exhaustively enumerated. Within this larger framework questions raised by Pesch, Küng, or others can be mentioned as examples of a concrete character which can both elucidate the general theme and conversely be correctly answered in the light of this theme itself. Since Pesch's question can certainly be answered appropriately and effectively (in a form that can be assimilated) only in the light of this more general theme, it seems that the latter must also be the theme of an instruction, if such an instruction is regarded as objectively necessary and opportune in the situation. Of course, the objection can be raised that it is much more difficult to cope with the comprehensive theme than with the more restricted theme (although doubts were expressed above about the possibility of coping with the latter). But again it must be said on the contrary that the narrower problem of Mary's virginity today compels us to face the more general problem and that this general problem (particularly in the light of experiences of the past history of dogma) can lead to fundamental solutions, which can then be helpful to the still continuing process of the history of Mariology.

ON ANGELS

After the existence of the devil and of demons had been taken for granted in the teaching and practice of Christianity as a whole in all denominations for almost two thousand years, it has today become an acute problem. For obvious reasons, interest centres on the devil and on demons, but the essential question is inevitably about the existence of nonhuman, created, personal beings: that is, a question about the existence of 'angels', whether these are understood as good and finally perfected, or as bad and lost. It is to this general question that we shall devote some reflections here. Our reflections will not be related to all the questions that as such are involved in the problem of the existence of 'angels'. While presupposing the present state of the question in Catholic theology, we are attempting only to put forward some considerations which perhaps have not been very explicitly examined in the course of the controversy up to now.

The present state of the controversy can be briefly and simply indicated. Angels and demons appear in the later parts of the Old Testament and in the New Testament (these include the devil, who is seen in some sense as representative and head of the demonic realm, although there is a difference in origin and nature between Satan and the demons which may not simply be overlooked). In the light of the history of religion this teaching in the later part of the Old Testament and in the New Testament is not the original teaching of these inspired Scriptures of Christianity, but has entered into it from the religious milieu of late Judaism and early Christianity, although this observation does not in principle imply anything decisive about the exact meaning and the binding force in faith of this teaching, [236] since it is not a priori impossible for a doctrine accepted 'from outside' to be binding in faith. This teaching of the New Testament assumes as a matter of course the existence of angels and demons and for that very reason the real purpose of the New Testament statements is not to insist on this existence, but to show that these 'principalities and powers' will finally be deprived of power by Jesus Christ and his Spirit; the familiar teaching on angelology and demonology is merely reproduced in a more developed form and its practical consequences indicated (devotion to guardian angels, exorcism, possession).

This traditional teaching amounts to an attempt to contribute to the understanding of evil in the world: the latter is not merely the effect and consequence of man's freedom, but has a previous, more general causal ground in the sinister domination of evil powers and agencies, even though these do not eliminate man's free responsibility. The speculative angelology of Christian theology has, of course, been enriched (especially in the Middle Ages) by many philosophical ideas and theories which are certainly not binding in faith. The doctrine of demons has certainly led in practice in Christian life to terrible abnormalities, including the horrors of the witch trials. The most important statement of the traditional teaching by the magisterium is found in the profession of faith of the Fourth Lateran Council of 1215, where it is said that God > by his almighty power from the beginning of time created from nothing both the spiritual and the corporeal creature, the angelic and the earthly; then the human creature as belonging to both orders, being composed of spirit and body. For the devil and the other demons were created by God as good by nature, but became evil from themselves. Man, however, sinned at the prompting of the devil.

This teaching, which can also be found in many other documents of the magisterium, was repeated by Paul VI in an address on 15 November 1972.

In the present controversy within Catholic theology (which is all that we shall consider), three positions can be distinguished.

The first view is that the doctrine of created (definitively) good and (definitively) evil personal spiritual beings, alongside and above man (including their influence on the calamitous history of the human [237] world), is a strictly binding truth of faith which must be unconditionally upheld even today. At the same time in the last resort it is irrelevant whether this teaching (which, however, is clearly present in the New Testament, in Paul's writings and also in the words and practice of Jesus himself) can be deduced with purely exegetical methods from Scripture as a real statement of faith, or whether this 'literal' interpretation of Scripture becomes the object of binding faith only by the Church's dogmatic definition which is not open to doubt. But, even admitting the correctness of this first position, there can be no doubt that it has had to be curtailed in the course of history and has in fact been curtailed without protest. No one today will maintain that the space between the earth and the moon is the real and essential locality of the demons. Even the defenders of this first position will be more cautious today in the interpretation of certain illnesses as demonic possession and will be glad that there are no witches or witch trials today, which were formerly regarded as obvious conclusions from the traditional teaching. The defenders of the first position will also refrain from producing bulky theological treatises on demonology, such as those formerly composed, especially in post-Tridentine theology up to the present century (the two volumes by von Petersdorff appeared as recently as 1956). It can be said even at this point that the defenders of the first position will have to proceed cautiously and modestly, since the tradition they invoke is not entirely credible in each and every aspect that it presents.

The defenders of a second position today deny forthrightly and unequivocally the existence of the devil and the demons. They insist that the doctrine of the devil has entered into Scripture from outside, that an exact historico-critical exegesis shows that Scripture does not teach but only assumes the existence of the devil and demons (and angels), and in the light of this hypothesis makes statements the real content of which persists if the hypothesis is dropped. If and insofar as the permanent binding force of definitions of the magisterium is maintained, these declarations, in the sense that they are supposed to remain binding, are interpreted in this second position like the statements of Scripture: the existence of demons (and angels) is not defined, but all that is said is that, if and insofar as they exist (which is spontaneously assumed, but not really taught), they are created good by God and are evil only through their own fault, [238] they do not represent any absolute and original power of evil, but remain subject to the greater power of good, to God's salvific will and to his grace. This second position does not make use merely of historico-critical exegesis in an attempt to relativize the statements of Scripture (together with those of tradition drawn from Scripture and those of the magisterium), but tries with the aid of psychology, parapsychology, and sociology to show how it was possible to reach a theory of the devil which of its nature is no more than a projection and personification of evil in the world, experienced by man as overwhelmingly powerful and ineradicable. These personifying projections are meant to help man to understand the existence of evil everywhere present in the world and at the same time to relieve him of responsibility for it. When evil appears in a particularly terrifying form, it is said to be due not really to man, but to the activity of the devil; when a human being in the midst of conflicting impulses feels almost schizophrenically the tendency to evil, it is a question of a diabolic whispered temptation. In defence of this second position attention is also drawn to the harmful effects of belief in the devil on the life of the individual and on society.

At this point, however, the defenders of the second position need to be reminded that it is very difficult epistemologically to prove the nonexistence of an entity by showing the inconclusiveness of the arguments hitherto adduced to establish its existence. They need to be warned against an innate temptation to trivialize the evil in the world and to interpret it as an inevitable and ultimately innocuous irritating phenomenon and as an unavoidable drawback in a changing world, evolving from the very outset toward its consummation and unable actually to plunge into final perdition. In regard to this second position (which is easily linked with a denial of 'original sin'), the question needs constantly to be asked whether it upholds the seriousness of sin and guilt as revealed on the cross of the Son of God; the question must constantly be asked what the evil and the demonic, permeating all dimensions of existence and the world and not to be eliminated in a spirit of naive bourgeois optimism, really is, if we are not to elucidate it with the aid of the traditional teaching on demons.

A third position admits that there is something that is still not clear about this question: it is not unequivocally certain that the traditional teaching of Scripture and the Church asserts absolutely and [239] not merely hypothetically the existence of nonhuman, created, good and evil personal beings, that it upholds absolutely (over and above the doctrine of the createdness of all things other than the one God, of the creaturely finiteness of evil, of the rejection of a manicheistic dualism) the existence of these angels and demons. This third position, therefore, represents a certain neutrality between the other two positions and entrusts the problem to the future history of faith and theology. Those who hold it cannot admit to being clearly convinced by the arguments of either the first or second position. In the light of what has been learned from the history of dogma, a position of this kind is not surprising. In the course of this history views and doctrines have continually been put forward (not as definitions in the strict sense, or only as definitions open to a variety of interpretations) by the magisterium in its ordinary or extraordinary teaching (also with an appeal to Scripture) which later turned out to be mistaken and which the magisterium eventually tacitly or expressly withdrew. Cases like this (which do not need to be presented here) have constantly occurred, in which a considerable time had to elapse between the appearance of a new problem and its settlement in one way or another, a period of time that could be of varying length depending on the peculiar nature of the particular problem and the preconditions of its solution. Those who hold this position cannot therefore be blamed for cowardice or laziness in seeking an easy way out by simply refusing to express a clear view on this question, particularly since what is involved here is not merely the expression of a personal opinion, but a decision as to how the two first positions are judged by the sense of faith of the whole Church – a question that can be answered only with difficulty, since this sense of faith is difficult to grasp and is continually developing in the course of history.

It is to be hoped that the present status quaestionis in regard to this problem has now been defined up to a point, although, of course, the essential objective arguments supporting the three positions were not developed in detail. In what follows the theological problem of the existence of angels and devils will not be investigated further from all the aspects hitherto mentioned in this controversy. There will not be any exegetical investigations or studies in the history of religion here, nor will the declarations of the Church's magisterium be examined in regard to their content and their binding [240] force, although all these inquiries are obviously indispensable for an answer to the actual problem. Instead of this, we want to point to a few questions which have not hitherto been discussed or at most only marginally discussed in this controversy. These questions, selected from the total complex of problems, cannot individually decide the problem as a whole, since even a clear answer to any one of them leaves the main problem unsettled and since they raise further problems which are perhaps more obscure and have been less considered hitherto than their own immediate object. With the reservation that the reader may endure patiently the somewhat high-sounding nomenclature, we would like to distinguish three questions which will occupy us here: an epistemological question, an existential-ontological question, and a question of the theology of the cosmos. What is meant by these questions will become clear without more ado in the course of the discussion.

1. THE EPISTEMOLOGICAL QUESTION

We come to the first, the epistemological question, which is seen here as a specifically theological and not a universally philosophical question. We are asking what can fall in principle and a priori in any way into the sphere of an actual supernatural revelation, and (if this general question can be and has been answered) whether the existence of the angels can in any way be among the objects belonging to this sphere. The general epistemological question – in the light of which the question is to be decided whether the existence of the angels is or is not (can be or cannot be) a revealed truth of faith – is a very obscure question and one which perhaps has never hitherto been sufficiently clearly formulated. This general epistemological question of the possibility of defining in principle and a priori the field of reality which comes into question at all for a supernatural divine revelation obviously therefore cannot be thematicized and answered here with the detail and the theological precision with which the question of the existence of the angels as object of revelation could be clearly answered. (It will in fact become clear, even assuming that the general epistemological question has been answered and assuming the existence of angels, that there are still two possibilities on which the answer to the general epistemological [241] question alone cannot throw much light.) It is, however, possible to raise this general epistemological problem, and it undoubtedly has an importance for the question of the existence of the angels. And, consequently, some suggestions at least should be put forward in regard to this general problem of theological knowledge.

Is it possible to answer the question of whether there is a formal principle permitting a priori a distinction between objects that from the very outset simply cannot be regarded as an object of revelation and those which can be the object of a supernatural revelation? Is it possible perhaps to say of certain propositions on the existence and nature of particular realities that they could never be revealed because their content from the very outset could never be the object of revelation? Unless we are completely mistaken, this is the sort of question that is scarcely or never raised in Catholic theology. (This assertion may be due to my own ignorance; apart from touching on the question elsewhere in my own reflections, I have come across it in Catholic theology only in P. Knauer's fundamental theology;[1] without my knowing it, of course, the question may have been dealt with elsewhere, from different aspects and with a different terminology.)

The absence of this formulation of the question is easy to understand. We start out tacitly and as a matter of course from the assumption that God is omniscient, can communicate himself 'externally', is free in this communication; thus any truth, if God wills it, can also be the object of his supernatural verbal revelation. It seems therefore from the very outset that there cannot be an axiom that excludes a priori and in principle certain propositions from the area of possible divine revelation. In addition to this consideration, assumed tacitly and as a matter of course, the fact is that Catholic theology (clearly, for example, at Vatican I) assumes that there are propositions within the scope of revelation which are really part of revelation (for example, on the existence of God, of a natural law, etc.), but which can also in principle be established by 'natural' reason without the aid of supernatural revelation, so that the revelation of such propositions only gives them a greater clarity and certainty for man in working out his salvation. In textbook theology [242] there has scarcely been any consideration (over and above what has been indicated) of how revelation of facts and truths, as such accessible to natural reason alone, is related to the revelation of mysteries of faith properly so-called, which in principle can be known only by personal supernatural revelation: for this very reason (it seems to me) it was assumed quite generally and without further reflection as a matter of course that God, if he only wants to do so and regards it as appropriate (as important for salvation) in particular situations, can reveal any conceivable truth. This belief was confirmed by the impression commonly gained from the history of revelation: since all bearers of revelation (from Moses and the prophets up to Jesus and his final revelation) were regarded tacitly as formally equal in status, distinguished only in the content of their revelation and not in the event itself of revelation (although this did not exclude the use of 'revelation' as a merely analogous common generic term), and since the most diverse contents (from the political maxims of a prophet to the eschatologically victorious communication of the Spirit to the world) were observed in the history of revelation regarded in this way as formally leveled down, it was really quite impossible to think of the question of whether the content of one proposition or another could be a priori excluded from the field of revelation properly so-called. In practice the only question recognized was that of whether one thing or another (for example, the existence of angels) had actually been revealed (not the question of whether one proposition or another in the light of its content measured against the nature of divine revelation could be revealed at all or must from the very outset be excluded from this field).

Here the view will be maintained that there is such an a priori axiom to determine the possibility of such a revelation. The axiom runs (with the reservation that further qualifications will be introduced at a later stage): in a supernatural revelation (in its unity, here assumed as necessary, of communication of the Spirit and word, by which alone a verbal revelation can in any way be God's word and not merely a word about God) properly and primarily only God himself (in his self-communication) can reveal himself. Everything else (that is, everything as created distinct from God) can as such by no means be the original object of an actual, supernatural revelation and thus an original object of faith. (At a later stage special consideration must be given to the question of whether and how there can be [243] secondary objects of revelation, dependent in event and content on revelation properly so-called as God's self-communication, which are not God himself.) This basic axiom ought really to be self-evident and immediately comprehensible. If we do not think anthropomorphically of the relationship between God and the world, if we admit that God is the free cause of the world and not a particular part of reality, any special intervention of God inside the world, which is both distinction from world realities and yet in some way belongs to them, must be rejected as a merely mythological idea or this 'particularity' must consist in the fact that God himself as such communicates himself by himself directly to the world and that the history of salvation and revelation in one consists in this. The fact that God cannot really become a particular element of a partial character in the world and its history does not amount to a limitation of God, but is precisely identical with a rightly understood and radically seriously accepted divinity of God. What is meant here can also be seen from the opposite standpoint. If God, revealing and communicating himself, were to communicate himself through something else, created by him and distinct from him, because this other created thing would carry with it a reference to him, if then God's revelation were established by something 'creaturely', this created reality would in principle be accessible to man's reason, since the formal object of this reason cannot exclude anything finite from its range, since reason as unlimited transcendentality can in principle comprehend all that is finite, and consequently nothing finite can in principle be an absolute mystery. Revelation properly speaking can have as its object only God himself as such.

Of course, this basic axiom is bound at first to rouse bewilderment and protest. It is indeed easy to see that the three fundamental mysteries of Christianity – Trinity, incarnation, and imparting of the Spirit – are covered and summed up in their formal solidarity by this axiom. It is also possible to see comparatively quickly that the mystery of the Church as such can be traced back to the mystery of God's self-communication established by God irreversibly in Christ. But it cannot be denied that there are apparently other articles of faith which, on the one hand, are understood as mysteries properly so-called and are accessible only by God's revelation, and which, on the other hand, since they at least give the impression of expressing a finite reality, seem to contradict the basic axiom as formulated (we [244] may recall, for example, the dogma of transubstantiation). This difficulty, of course, cannot be cleared up here, if only because the task would presuppose that we are clear about which and how many real mysteries of faith exist and are to be distinguished. We simply assume here that our basic axiom can be compatible with the Church's conviction in regard to articles which it regards as real mysteries of faith, while admittedly also assuming that these other mysteries of faith are themselves correctly interpreted in regard to their character as mysteries, which is by no means so simple in individual cases. But with all this the real difficulty which must occupy us here in regard to this basic axiom is not even envisaged. It seems, that is, to be simply obvious that the Church's sense of faith is aware of propositions which are understood as real revelation, although they express a finite object and by no means raise any claim to be mysteries properly so-called. There seems to be a whole lot of such truths of faith, although it seems that no effort has been made hitherto to distinguish these truths of faith in their diversity and to arrange them formally in a lucid system.

It is impossible here, of course, to undertake a systematization of such propositions which on the one hand are supposed to be revealed and on the other hand do not contain any real mysteries and thus create much greater difficulties in regard to our basic axiom than do those possible mysteries which are not a priori compatible with this axiom. On this problem a few hints must suffice. In the first place there are certainly propositions the content of which amounts to a precondition, immediately perceptible and understandable as absolutely necessary, on man's part for the possibility of revelation properly so-called as God's self-communication. That man is a being who really can have something to do with God is a proposition that directly expresses a finite reality and one in fact that can be known 'naturally' (or can be regarded as so knowable), but which on the other hand is guaranteed by the event of actual revelation as its precondition. Such propositions can certainly be regarded in a secondary and derived sense as revealed statements, since and insofar as their content is inevitably perceived as God's self-communication in the event of revelation. Rightly understood and interpreted, these propositions do not conflict with our basic axiom but confirm it. We may well take the view that the majority of revealed statements, which do not contain any absolute mysteries, can be interpreted in [245] this way and thus do not contradict our basic axiom. But can this be said of all propositions that the Church's sense of faith sees as revealed?

This question is difficult to answer, if only because there is no complete register of propositions likely to emerge clearly set out and immediately understandable. If, for example, a prophet in the Old Testament proclaims a political axiom for a particular historical situation as the 'word of Yahweh', as a word of revelation, even if his claim is recognized it is still by no means clear what exactly is the sense in which this word is revelation. (As compared with the medieval theology of prophecy, it is in fact striking how little attention is paid by modern fundamental theology to the concrete happening in the prophet's consciousness, to the claim made that his word, which is primarily a datum of his own consciousness, is God's word. In modern fundamental theology attention is fixed too hastily on the external authentication of the words of the bearer of revelation, on the miracle as distinct from the event of revelation itself, without closer reflection 'psychologically' on the very event of revelation in its bearer, even though the latter has no recourse at all to miracle to support his conviction that he has received inwardly a divine revelation.) In any event such propositions ought to be more closely examined and more clearly distinguished in their content and in their psychological and sociological origins, so that even the assertion that they are divine revelation might and should take very diverse forms. Although it is impossible to go into all this here, the embarrassment arising with regard to this basic axiom cannot simply be concealed; therefore a basic solution of the problem facing us may be briefly outlined, so that it can perhaps be made clear that we can insist on our basic axiom, without on that account simply denying that there are propositions which on the one hand directly express a finite truth and yet on the other hand claim to be revealed.

With regard to this suggestion we assume that revelation can always be approached only in faith and that such a faith always and at all times, even though completely unthematically and without verbal objectivation, must be sustained by God's self-communication (by what we are accustomed to call 'uncreated grace') and that (even though implicitly and unthematically) it always affirms the actual self-communication and self-revelation of God in the sense of our basic axiom. On this assumption, it can certainly be said that a finite [246] reality and the proposition related to it can be affirmed as revealed when and insofar as their being sustained by faith properly so-called as immediacy to the absolute God and their synthesis are thus directly and conclusively experienced. When (to put it somewhat boldly) the mysticism of the transcendental experience of grace is encountered in an indissoluble synthesis (not distorting the openness of this mysticism) with a categorial experience, this, too, may be understood as willed by God, as the will and sign of God, as revealed. But this is always in the light of the actual experience of grace, in which a person submits in faith to the absolute mystery of God, to the latter's actual revelation in the sense of our basic axiom, even though this experience of grace as such may itself remain merely implicit in many instances and depending on the particular situation in the history of revelation, while the attention of the recipient of revelation is fixed on the categorial content of his experience.

It seems to me that a Catholic theology cannot really reject the theory above outlined if it admits that revelation, if it is to be understood as revelation no matter what its particular content, must be accepted in faith, and that in the last resort faith always and everywhere has the same nature and cannot be defined solely in the light of its individual object where there occurs God's self-communication as such in the Holy Spirit. This theory might be elucidated and supported by a theology of mysticism and private revelations, although the distinction between public and private revelation would have to be made clear, while admitting that in the last resort they have the same fundamental nature There are certainly instances in the Church's ordinary theology and practice when we cannot do without the theory outlined. The obligation of an assent of faith, which a Catholic admits in regard to an ex cathedra decision of the pope, is in fact dependent on the legitimacy of the election of this pope and on the certain knowledge of the promulgation of that decision. These things and the knowledge of them seem to be purely natural, historical, and contingent, not in themselves amounting to an object of faith, nor belonging to the group of those truths and facts of which we spoke above and which must necessarily also be involved in the acceptance of revelation properly so-called, and which nevertheless are supposed to be the foundation of a decision of faith.

Although in textbook theology in the analysis fidei an attempt is [247] generally made in a somewhat different way to provide help in regard to this problem, the solution offered here still seems to be the most intelligible, even for these cases. The Catholic's experience in the Holy Spirit of faith directed toward the immediacy of God authenticates and confirms for him also the categorial starting point and mediation of his own actual faith, in this case the actual legitimacy of the election of the pope, etc. In the last resort, however, it seems unimportant whether we describe a proposition about an historically contingent reality as a revealed article of faith or as a proposition that is affirmed absolutely only in a decision of faith, whether it is regarded as the content of a fides divina or of a mere fides ecclesiastica (if the latter exists at all), particularly since today this traditional distinction between divine and purely ecclesiastical faith seems to have little support. If we understand and interpret in this way truths of revelation, whose content seems to be finite and historically contingent, without necessarily having been implicitly affirmed in the former sense in the act of faith, then we are compelled to adopt a differentiated view of revealed truth as it normally exists, but we must not deny a rightly understood revealedness of such truths and need not see them as contradicting our basic axiom in this question.

After these circumstantial and yet far too brief preliminary reflections, we can now return to our proper question. Can the existence of angels (and demons) be revealed at all? If our basic axiom and the qualifications subsequently added are correct, then the answer to this question must be: Since the existence of angels (if it is a fact) involves at most a finite and creaturely reality which can in no way be a mystery of faith properly speaking, this existence of angels cannot be understood as more than a content of revelation of a secondary and derived character, if it can be proved that this reality as such is known naturally and at the same time has such a religious significance that we can seriously assume that this existence can enter into a synthesis with the proper reality of faith and its expression, such as we demanded for a secondary and derived object of faith of this kind. Before we can inquire whether this condition is fulfilled, we must draw attention also to the fact that not every reality of a finite and knowable character about which a statement of faith can be made or which might be known by faith can ipso facto be regarded as such a secondary and derived object of faith. If a [248] person enjoys a glass of wine, for instance, and regards it with gratitude as part of God's creation, he is not making the creation of wine an object of faith by making a statement (perhaps of considerable importance) in the light of faith about what remains a secular object of natural knowledge. If, then, we assume that the existence of angels as such is the object of natural knowledge, we can and must make theological statements about this fact (that they are created and finite, that as such they are created good, that they can have become evil only through their own freedom, while remaining subject to God's supreme decrees).

Such a statement can be of great religious importance; but it does not for that reason necessarily turn its object into an object of faith, in the sense that the denial of the existence of this object would be an offense against faith itself; the statement can certainly be made hypothetically, that is, its object as such can be left to a purely natural appraisal. But this does not mean on the other hand that such a finite object, which in itself is accessible to natural knowledge, can never and under no circumstances become an object of faith, even though of a secondary and derived character. Whether the one or the other alternative applies is decided by the question of whether this object enters into a synthesis with the actual realization of faith and its original content in such a way that the Church's sense of faith as a whole sees that in practice the original realization of faith can be concretely achieved only while affirming this secondary object. (What is meant by these admittedly not very clear or familiar propositions may be illustrated by an example. The legitimacy of Vatican I was dependent on the legitimacy of the election of Pope Pius IX, a legitimacy which is certainly a finite, contingent fact accessible to natural knowledge and not derivable from the nature of the Church; and yet the concrete act of faith of the Church as a whole, in which it accepts its concrete nature together with its historical continuity throughout the ages, must assume as absolute this legitimacy of Pius IX, that is, as a secondary object of faith and not merely as a hypothetical presupposition for a judgment of faith. Of course, from the very nature of the case more ought to be said and in more exact detail about this synthesis; perhaps the peculiar character and even the distinction of various syntheses of this kind ought to be worked out. But this is not possible here.)

What we are asking is: When the existence of angels is mentioned [249] in Scripture and tradition, when at the same time, according to our basic axiom about possible objects of revelation, there can be no question of a primary and original object of faith, is this existence merely assumed hypothetically as the object of natural knowledge, about which the statement of faith (that they are created, etc.) is made while allowing for the permanently hypothetical character of its object (if there are angels – of which we are convinced naturally, but not as a matter of faith – then they are created, etc.), or does the natural knowledge of the existence of angels enter into a synthesis with faith (in the createdness of everything outside God) in such a way that this existence (although in itself of a natural and hypothetical character) becomes a secondary and derived object of faith? After all that has been said up to now, this statement of the question forbids us to work purely and simply with the straightforward dilemma that the existence of the angels is either an object of revelation (of a primary, undifferentiated character) or a mere assertion of natural knowledge which in itself can be mistaken, the origin of which can be explained psychologically, sociologically, and so on, and in regard to which faith makes a purely hypothetical statement. It is not as simple as that. The claim that something is 'revealed' must be distinguished, and in regard to the term 'natural knowledge' it cannot simply be assumed that its object can never and under no circumstances enter into the sphere of derived and secondary objects of faith.

If, however, these distinctions are introduced into the formulation of the question, it must be said that it cannot be answered unambiguously here and now at the present stage of the controversy. Certainly it can be said that, if angels exist, they are as such and primarily the object of a natural knowledge, while the term 'natural' can leave entirely open the question of whether such a 'natural' knowledge would be possible on the assumption of the existence of a 'nature' existing purely as such as understood in the scholastic distinction between nature and grace. All that 'natural knowledge' need mean here is that it has emerged outside and independently of the history of revelation of the Old and the New Covenant and remains valid, but as such it does not have the guarantee of being divinely revealed. That the existence of angels is the object of natural knowledge in this sense (while the question of whether this is true or false remains, of course, completely open) can certainly be disputed. For [250] not only must the supporters of the first position admit that the doctrine of angels came into the Old and New Testament from outside and did not originate there, but the supporters of the second position also affirm such a natural knowledge, which, however, they regard as false and are thus able to deny the revealed character of this doctrine.

Two questions thus arise for us. First, can the origin of such a natural knowledge of the existence of angels not only be made intelligible in the light of psychology, sociology, and the history of ideas, but also be proved to be objectively true and still valid today (or at least shown to be probable and meaningful), or is this not the case, and is therefore the existence of the angels for us an absolute mythological notion? Second, if the existence of the angels can be proved to be the object of a natural knowledge which remains correct even today, is it then an object of faith in Scripture and tradition or merely an object of natural knowledge about which faith makes a hypothetical statement, without raising it to the level of an object of faith and thus without forbidding its denial? The first of these two questions must be considered further in the third section of our reflections. But if we assume a positive answer (that is, the opinion that the existence of angels can be affirmed and shown to be probable even today), the second question mentioned above still remains open; it would still be necessary to ask whether this existence of angels remains hypothetical or is made into a secondary object of faith in statements about it. But this question must obviously remain open. For on the assumptions made with our basic axiom it would have to be proved that in Scripture and tradition faith really finds inescapable that synthesis which must exist between the original faith oriented to God himself alone and a finite object which is not an original object of faith, if such a finite reality is supposed to be a secondary object of faith. It will not be asserted apodictically here that such a synthesis (of a kind that needs to be more closely described) certainly does not exist in our case. But it can be proved only with difficulty or not at all convincingly that such a synthesis, conceivable in itself and necessary for a statement of faith in this connection, certainly does exist.

In an intellectual and historical milieu in which belief in superhuman spirits was taken for granted (which is evident in any case from the arguments for the second position), Christian faith naturally [251] entered into a close and obvious symbiosis (which has remained a matter of course for many people, even up to the present time) with belief in the existence of such spiritual beings, a symbiosis which can certainly give the impression that it is identical with that peculiar synthesis which sets up a reality of natural experience as a secondary and derived object of faith. This is all the more likely since, for reasons arising from the sociology of ideas, such a symbiosis is liable to persist in the consciousness of official representatives of the Church's mind when it has begun to break down elsewhere. But it is still far from being clearly established that this symbiosis really amounts to the synthesis we are seeking. Parallels are not hard to find. The existence of witches was still affirmed unambiguously and without embarrassment in the churches in the seventeenth century and this affirmation was certainly regarded as a consequence or as an undoubted concrete expression of Christian belief in demons. Up to the present century the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch was regarded in Catholic circles as an obvious concrete expression of belief in the inspiration of Scripture. It would be possible to cite many more of such and similar examples of the breakdown of a unity at first accepted unreservedly between real faith and transitory human opinion. Of course, these examples do not prove that whenever and wherever there is such a connection it is a question merely of a transitory symbiosis and not of a synthesis in which the Church's sense of faith seizes on an essentially natural truth as a secondary and derived object of faith. Whether there is a mere symbiosis or a genuine synthesis in our case is not to be decided at the present moment; it will have to be seen whether in the near or more distant future the Church's sense of faith will abandon a transitory symbiosis of this kind, or even explicitly affirm a synthesis in which the existence of angels is accepted as a secondary object of faith.

At this point in our reflections, the view may perhaps be tentatively expressed that we now seem to have reached a stage in the history of the reflective awareness of faith in regard to our question at which an explicit intervention of the magisterium scarcely appears to be opportune. Not that the justification in principle of such an intervention need be disputed. But what is the use of it at this point? In practice and concretely it cannot take the form of an ex cathedra decision on the part of pope or council, since the preconditions for such a decision are lacking. This is evident from the fact [252] that Vatican II nowhere pronounced new definitions, and after the council Paul VI, even in questions where he considered a new declaration of his magisterium appropriate, did not put forward any ex cathedra decisions. But if nondefining albeit authentic declarations of the magisterium are issued, they do not, as the experience of recent decades shows, bring the discussion to an end. The discussion and, consequently, the history of the Church's sense of faith continue. In regard to our question it is possible, of course, to appeal to former definitions and to explain that the question now facing us was definitively settled there. But even if we have no wish to deny to the Fourth Lateran Council the character of a general council of the Church, there is still a question about what was really defined there and what was not. This remains a matter for serious argument. The appeal to the Church's universal sense of faith and to the ordinary magisterium certainly does not bring a clear ending to the discussion. For the history of dogma shows that even defined truths of faith were amalgamated in the minds of the Church's members with opinions that were only later clearly and explicitly seen to be different from the dogmatic statement as originally understood and only then could this amalgam be eliminated.

These lengthy reflections do not seem to have taken us very far, for we are still discussing the third position as described at the beginning. But, with the reservation that many reflections of an exegetical character and on the history of dogma would need to be added, it can nevertheless be said that the path to be trodden in order to get back from this third position to the first has now been more clearly indicated. We may then (and this is the result of the previous reflections) not merely attempt to assert and to prove that the existence of angels and demons is an object of faith; we ought also to attempt to define the peculiar character of this object of faith as now understood and from that standpoint perceive how exactly an object of faith of this kind can be proved.

2. THE EXISTENTIAL-ONTOLOGICAL QUESTION

In our reflections we have now reached the second of the themes announced above. Even if it is assumed that angels and demons exist and that this existence is asserted by revelation (direct or indirect, [253] as original or derived and secondary object of faith), there remains the great question of what appropriately is to be understood today by these angels and demons. The question could, of course, be answered satisfactorily only by a complete angelology and demonology and this is something that cannot be developed here. But neither can the question be settled by referring to a few Scripture texts. For even in regard to these texts it must be asked what in them is a time-conditioned conceptual model and what is the content really asserted and intended to be binding. But this question requires a criterion for distinguishing between the conceptual model and the actual content of the statement, which is scarcely or never provided by Scripture itself. Nor is it easy to expect a clear answer from tradition to this question of the nature of the angels. For traditional angelology and demonology is itself a very odd conglomerate of biblical passages, philosophical assumptions and views, and popular ideas laboriously worked up into a system. The controversy about the existence of angels and demons ought not be conducted as if it were clear what angels and demons are and as if the controversy were only about their existence. The popular indignation of many, especially of devout, Christians at any questioning of the existence of angels and demons is undoubtedly often and to a very considerable extent based on primitive ideas about these beings which are urgently in need of a 'demythologization', even if we want to maintain the existence of angels and demons as an object of faith.

In this second section of our reflections we propose to offer one or two modest suggestions for a demythologizing of a folkloristic, primitive belief in angels and demons. These critical reflections will not by any means start out from ideas that are particularly new and controversial. We shall appeal instead to principles that really cannot be questioned in Catholic theology or at any rate must not be questioned from the standpoint of positions clearly established in the light of faith. Even if the existence of angels and demons is admitted, these suggestions for a necessary demythologization of angelology and demonology are perhaps somewhat arbitrarily selected without any intention of a comprehensive and uniform replacement of these fragments of traditional theology.

In the first place, we may be allowed to register a protest against the generally accepted view in angelology and demonology that these created 'spirits' must be seen as 'pure' spirits without necessarily [254] possessing an essential relationship to matter. These beings may be 'pure' spirits insofar as they neither are merely material realities nor possess that materiality which belongs to man in virtue of his bodily nature. But to go beyond this in describing the angels and demons as 'pure' spirits may be Neoplatonic philosophy; it is neither the Church's teaching as binding in faith nor logically implied in the fact that these beings have no body in the form that we ourselves know it as human beings. An assumption of this kind is completely unproved and arbitrary. Here, of course, it is impossible to argue in detail and with philosophical exactitude for the opposite view: that is, for an essential relatedness to matter on the part of personal subjectivities such as angels and demons (if they exist and if we are able to say anything at all about them). For then we would have to go into the question of what matter is in a philosophical sense; it would have to be shown that, particularly in a Thomistic understanding, matter as such cannot really be split in itself into many pieces of matter, but is the original albeit precisely the differentiating unity, the one 'field' of the cosmos, the condition of the possibility of the separatedness and the interaction of the individual concrete realities. It would also have to be shown (perhaps in a critique of the traditional textbook philosophy in the Church) that the internal dualism in a finite entity necessary for the understanding of its createdness is reflected twice in that philosophy: in the dualism of essence and existence and in the dualism of matter and form, two dualisms which are understandable and cogent in their duality only if it is assumed as a matter of course, as in Neoplatonism or in the philosophy of Aquinas (contrary to the intrinsic tendency of his system), that there are immaterial beings, formae separatae. But even if we leave aside such metaphysical reflections as impossible to pursue here, it can be said that the idea of good and bad angels as purely immaterial beings is contrary to the basic trend of the biblical teaching on angels. For traditional angelology contains in itself an odd contradiction which can only be scantily concealed in words. In the first place, in traditional angelology the angels are set up as Leibnizian monads which can draw the content of their existence (apart from its relationship to God) purely from their own internal resources, since as formae separatae they are always aware of themselves from the outset without the mediation of another being; and yet these monads (according to Scripture) are then suddenly [255] supposed to be powers and authorities of this material world of ours, are supposed to have something to do with winds, fire, and water, are localized in this earthly world, in the last resort form together with human beings one and the same history of salvation, can be angels of individual nations, and are understood as effectively helpful and seductive in this world and its history.

It is possible to cope with these internal tensions and contradictions of traditional angelology only by resolutely discarding Neoplatonic ideas and assigning a priori to the angels (if they exist) an essential intrinsic relationship to that matter which is the sustaining ground of the finiteness of the world, of the unity of the cosmos and its history of personal beings. It is, of course, difficult to say how exactly this 'materiality' of the angels is to be understood as distinct from the materiality of that personal consciousness which is man. Nevertheless, it can be imagined that the kind of mastery and formation of space-time reality which comes about through the human body and the personal entelechy corresponding to it is not unique, that there can be greater and more differentiated unities of space-time reality than that of a human body and its synthesis and interiorization of materiality. The idea of a form related to matter producing a greater material unity and configuration than that of the human body is not more difficult to conceive than the idea of a forma separata, to which traditional angelology has become accustomed and thus finds understandable, without perceiving the tensions and (to be honest) the contradictions in it. In any case, the idea of such a superhuman principle establishing unity and interiority is more capable of being grasped by natural knowledge than are the monadic angels of a traditional angelology. But as was shown in the first section of our reflections, we cannot give up the possibility of a natural knowledge of angels, if these are not to be suspected a priori of being merely mythological figures. These reflections, however, must be continued in our third section.

Even if the existence of demons is assumed and upheld as a fact, the concrete ideas of them in popular theology and more especially in the ordinary piety of Catholics need a decisive demythologization. This is something that must be considered for a while here. As such, this demythologizing has no need of any particularly modern insights. It is sufficient to apply to the ideas of the demons those fundamental and universal insights on evil which were long ago [256] developed by a Christian metaphysic of finite freedom, of the nature of the good and of culpable evil. There is no absolute evil. All evil is finite; it is not a positive reality in itself, but a want of good in an entity that remains good in its substance as coming from God and indestructable. In its origin, in its possibility of becoming definitive, in its co-existence with an absolute God and his unrestrictedly good freedom and power, freely posed wickedness is certainly a mystery which resists a rationalistic solution and cannot simply be understood as merely the unavoidable reverse side of the good, as an irritating phenomenon in the coming to be of the good. But this need not prevent us from seeing the wickedness of the wicked, the guilt of the guilty, even in its possible finality, as deficiency (although freely posited) of the good in a good entity, as something that would not and never could be evil if it were not and did not still remain good in very many respects and dimensions of reality. We can be evil and do evil only if we remain good and behave well (even though in a defective way). Even in an evil action of freedom of the most radical kind the good is affirmed as condition of the possibility of freedom and goodness and realized in a positive sense, although not to the extent and in the radicalness possible and required in the particular concrete situation. If we do not want to be Manichees and if we do not want to see evil and good as consisting in an absolute dualism of two equal powers, we must always and everywhere keep in mind the fact that even evil lives by the good and always continues to realize the good, that evil as absolute and forthright corruption would utterly destroy as an entity this entity that had become evil.

All this, however, is true of the devils and demons, if they exist. They have a nature that is good and created by God, that is not removed, but, again, posited, even by their free and definitive decision against God. Not that the finalized decision by these demons against God can be seen as a superficial patina clinging only externally to a reality created by God, so that the question might be asked why this patina is not swept away and the reality created good by God preserved. Wickedness freely chosen is certainly a determination reaching to the very heart of the personal reality created by God. But it is a determination of this reality created by God and therefore good and remaining good in its substance and self-realization. A popular idea of devils, however, is that they are beings consisting of nothing but opposition to God, of hatred and negation. [257] This popular idea confuses evil with what has become evil, malitia as such with actual malum; it identifies evil beings with the pure essence of evil, with what is nothing but wickedness. But there are not and cannot be any such evil beings. If the demons reject God, their rejection is a defective mode of their always positive nature and its realization, which always has a positive meaning and positively contributes only to the goodness of the world. Even more mythological would be an idea of demons as impish, malignant spirits whose action and behavior really contain in their substance nothing but a destruction of positive realities, although that action can be understood only as a realization of what is positively good. It is a mythological idea to suppose that in order to realize their nature in the world, with the good necessarily involved in it and with the negative present in and about this good through their decision, these evil spirits need a 'permission', understood up to a point juridically and legally, from God who permits them in one place and forbids them in another to inflict damage, without this having anything really to do with the nature and the cosmic function they possess, whether good or bad. If and insofar as events in the cosmos and its history are also conditioned by the existence and self-realization of such powers and authorities, these events are not properly to be understood as effects of new initiatives on the part of these demons, oriented only to evil as such, but as consequences of their nature and their cosmic function, which are always the expression of an essentially good nature and determined also by the evil decision. When the effects produced by these demonic cosmic powers are regarded merely as purely destructive, we are involved in principle (whether we notice it or not) in a kind of Manicheism, or we adopt a childish attitude and ascribe to the demons behaviour like that of small boys throwing stones at the windows of their school. Mythological, too, is the idea of a conflict and opposition between God and the demons, with God and the devil struggling against each other as more or less equally matched partners, engaged in an absolute antagonism. The demons (if they exist) are radically dependent on God, sustained entirely in their activity by a positive collaboration of God, planned from the outset in their activity together with the evil involved in it by God's providence totally independently of any other influence; in a properly metaphysical sense there cannot be a struggle between God and the devil, since the latter from the very [258] outset, always and at every moment, in all his powers and in all his activity, is completely dependent on God.

The difference between the demons and God and their dependence on him are, in any case, as great as the difference and dependence on our part: that is, infinite. Compared with one another, they and we may display considerable differences in knowledge and power. But the difference does not place the demons in the role of an anti-God. And if, in particular with traditional textbook theology, we ascribe to them a superhuman measure of intelligence and power, we should certainly not regard them as present in almost childishly trivial manifestations which are of little importance either to world history or to salvation history. And if with traditional textbook theology we take seriously into account the intelligence and power of these agencies, we shall not suspect that they are involved when a saint falls down the stairs or some poor girl shows symptoms of schizophrenia or epilepsy which in other cases are certainly due to natural causes and are not interpreted there in terms of demonology. If we recognize the existence of such nonhuman spirit-persons, particularly if we regard them as belonging to a higher order despite their relationship to the world, we simply cannot conceive their activity as a sporadic interference intended only to do harm in the chain of causes and effects otherwise perceptible to us, but must see it as the effect of this higher order as such, which does not cancel the essential achievement and connection of the lesser orders, but takes up the latter intact into the higher order.

We no longer assume today that the biosphere can establish its power and its own internal laws only by partially abolishing and disturbing the normal course of the sphere of the physical and chemical. Higher systems do not remove the lower ones, but incorporate the latter while preserving them in their own existence. If there are superhuman created-and-personal realities, they form within the unity of the one cosmos a higher order in the world as a whole. Nor is this structural system, produced from the unity of all created realities in the one cosmos, removed by the sin of personal realities within this system of the one cosmos as a whole; for whole 'evil spirits' by their decision can give a false direction to other individual realities (or, if the latter are personal in character, at least can attempt to do this), and they can realize these evil intentions of theirs only in a positive affirmation of their nature and function. If we [259] wanted to continue with such speculations within the scope of a traditional Catholic angelology and demonology, we could point to the vast intelligence and great freedom of these beings which mean that their radical and definitive culpability makes sense only as a result of wanting to be like God in the sense of rejecting such a deification through grace. But if this is assumed, it becomes even more clear that the natural cosmic function of the demons (like that of the other angels) must not be seen as canceled, but only as determined also by their refusal of God's offer of himself out of free, gracious love. Then the really demonic element in the world would be that fainthearted despondency in which the creature fears for itself and will not venture freely to entrust itself to the absoluteness of the love in which God seeks to bestow, not something befitting the creature, but himself. In brief: if we want to pursue angelology and demonology at all, we must remain on the level of the first initiative for such a theory and not degrade these cosmic powers and authorities to goblinlike, ghostly, malicious spirits who are more stupid and more wretched than feeble human beings.

3. THE QUESTION OF THE THEOLOGY OF THE COSMOS

We come to our third section. In the first section we came to the conclusion that if the existence of good and bad angels must be affirmed in theological terms, this proposition as revealed assumes both a natural knowledge of angels and also that synthesis between a natural knowledge and the original act of faith which not only makes this object of natural knowledge as such into one about which a theological statement can be made, but also elevates it to be a secondary and derived object of faith itself. In the first question, then, the question remained completely open whether the angels can be an object of natural knowledge, particularly since the supporters of both the first and the second positions outlined at the beginning start out today more or less from the assumption that the existence of the angels is either directly and solely an object of revelation or is not demonstrable at all. In the second section of our reflections we worked simply on the still-unverified assumption that there are angels, and the only question was how, if they exist, they are to be understood in the light of a Christian monotheism. In this third [260] section, then, we have to ask if it makes sense to allow for the existence of angels as coming within the scope of natural knowledge. The new question is formulated cautiously, since we do not want to venture here on our own account and at our own risk to assert more than that the acceptance of the existence of angels is not inconsistent with natural reason. It cannot be denied that a statement of this kind does not mean that we have clearly reached the point which must be reached if we want to elevate this natural perception to a properly theological level. And even if it were claimed that the existence of the angels had been established with adequate natural certainty, the question would still be completely open as to whether faith makes a statement merely about this object of natural knowledge or synthesizes it as a secondary object of faith. The third section, therefore, does not aim at a conclusion which would amount to a decision between the first two positions outlined at the beginning. After these reflections, the third position still does not seem to have been eliminated. But perhaps our reflections in this third section may serve to upset somewhat the self-assurance of the supporters of the second position and thus to elucidate a little the justification of the third position as against the second.

In our reflections we are starting out from the assumption that if there are angels, they are to be understood, not a priori as Leibnizian monads, but as cosmic powers and authorities for which, with all their subjectivity and personality, a cosmic function (that is, one related to the world) is an essential constituent. If we could not make this assumption, then obviously there could be no talk of a primarily natural knowledge of the existence of angels.

It may certainly be claimed, particularly at the present time, that a theology of the cosmos is very undeveloped. Of course, elements of such a theology of the cosmos are to be found scattered in a traditional textbook theology. The createdness and temporal nature of the world as a whole are mentioned there; an angelology of the traditional kind can scarcely fail to include some cosmic aspects; a defence of the unity of the human race must include some consideration of the biosphere, particularly if there is no longer any attempt to defend traditional monogenism; in anthropology a substantial unity of mind and matter is maintained with reference to man, even though the older metaphysic of materia prima scarcely appears in textbook theology and consequently little can be seen of the unity of [261] mind and matter as a cosmic unity; in eschatology there is usually a brief mention of the new heaven and the new earth, but it really does not become very clear whether, why, and how the definitive consummation of created spirit-persons and of their history carries with it also the consummation of the material cosmos or has little to do with this material cosmos. Perhaps all the questions that ought to be raised in a theology of the cosmos are so obscure in themselves that it is easy to understand the ineffectiveness of such a theology. The fact remains that in theology man and his relationship to God are at the centre of attention and it is in this light that all theological statements must be understood in their meaning and validity. This corresponds to the nature of revelation and theology and to an absolutely fundamentally legitimate development of the philosophical understanding of man, in which the latter gradually came to be seen, not so much as part of a cosmos, but as a transcendental subject with a world of his own which he projects in thought and action. But this development of the history of ideas in modern times was also coexistent with a contrary tendency: the earth moved away from the centre of the cosmos and became an insignificant particle in an immense cosmos which continually became, and is still becoming, greater for human knowledge; but man himself became increasingly clearly perceptible as the product (intentionally or accidentally) of a history of nature of the material cosmos. From this standpoint, too, a theology of the cosmos is required, particularly since the doctrine of the substantial unity of mind and matter in man (with all its consequences: salvific importance of history as such, incarnation of the Logos, resurrection of the body, etc.) simply forbids us to pursue an absolutely acosmic theology and anthropology.

Such a theology of the cosmos would have to work out the theological significance of the interpretation of the cosmos as a world continually coming to be. The older premodern world on the whole understood world and earth as static factors created by God once and for all, offering for all time a fixed stage on which man and man alone could carry on his history. Today we rightly speak of a history of nature, we are aware of a world that is always and everywhere coming to be and we understand the history of humanity also as a part of this history or at least as conditioned by it, even though a serious and cautious metaphysic of grades and orders of being (taking really seriously the differentiatedness of the world) recognizes [262] essential differences between entities in the cosmos and is consequently aware of qualitative leaps, of real self-transcendence of one grade of being into a higher grade, which is possible only as a result of God's creative dynamism in the world. The recognition of essentially different grades of being (from real subjectivity, personality, and transcendentality to being as a whole) does not, however, imply a denial of the one material cosmos and its evolution taking place in a continually new self-transcendence of an inferior grade.

In the light of such a basic conception of the world (in which man is no longer seen without more ado as the centre of a world constructed statically around him, as the one who is absolutely and in every respect underivable, but in which he represents a peak and an effect of a world evolution), the question can no longer be avoided as to whether that subjectivity rooted in materiality which we know as man is the only one toward which this world evolution of the material cosmos has developed in continually new self-transcendence. This question must be raised in view of the vast immensity of the material cosmos as a world coming to be. If we imagine the cosmos as a world coming to be, and as oriented in its becoming to subjectivity, then it is really not to be taken for granted that this aim has been successful only at the tiny point we know as our earth. At this stage in our reflections, admittedly we should not forget what has been learned from this history of man's subjectivity. A personal and free subjectivity oriented in unlimited transcendentality to being purely and simply (and, consequently, to the ground of being which is God) is the centre of the cosmos, even though this human subjectivity rests on a materiality which as such cannot be regarded as the centre of all that is material, even if it made sense at all to speak of a material centre of this material cosmos. But even if we do not forget this human subjectivity, through which everything is the world of man, the world he has, however great it may be and however great it may still come to be, the question in fact remains open as to whether the immense growth of the material cosmos has served only for the emergence in particular of human subjectivity. Traditional theology especially, with its conviction of the existence of angels (of angels who have a common salvation history together with human beings), cannot start out from the axiom that in regard to God there can really only be human subjectivities. The question, then, can seriously [263] be raised even if we have not or would not have any opportunity of answering it unequivocally.

If this question is raised, it does not mean (although this perhaps is possible and justifiable) that we are asking here about beings existing on other 'stars' as subjects with more or less the same biological corporality as that which we know as our own. It is true that the latter question could also be raised, because it cannot be regarded simply and absolutely as improbable that somewhere else in such an immeasurable cosmos there are the same chemical and physical preconditions as with us for the 'chance' of the emergence of life and that this life then develops according to the strict laws of evolution (with and in qualitative leaps) toward something essentially like ourselves. This question about 'human beings on other planets' is one that has recently been raised afresh and more urgently because it inevitably also brings up theological problems. But it is a question that will not be pursued further here, since at the present time it is not only unanswerable, but refers to living beings which at least up to now have not been incorporated in our own existential and theological sphere of life and thus existentially and theologically have no more relevance for us than any sort of 'dead' star anywhere in the universe.

The question will, however, be raised here as to whether this general starting point of a world coming to be, oriented to subjectivity, might not lead to some conclusions about the conceivability and probability of angels. If we speak of 'angels', it is assumed from the outset that (1) they have an essential connection with the world and (2) they have for us an existential relevance that we denied to possible 'human beings on other planets', since the existential sphere of life of the latter (at least up to now) does not overlap with ours. If there are such 'angels' who fulfill this second precondition, their relationship to matter, essential as it must be, is to be understood as different from ours and from that of the hypothetically assumed 'human beings on other planets'. Such an essential relationship of subjectivity and matter must by its very notion be understood always as a limited regionality of matter, which is interiorized and (if desired) organized and subjectivized by this finite subjectivity. But this limited regionality of a subjectivity need not be understood as like that of a human corporality. This material regionality can be [264] understood as much more plural and more differentiated, more complex, and as embracing more material individual realities than is the case with human corporality, and this greater and more comprehensive, subjectively interiorized regionality ought also to be able to incorporate into itself as partial elements those individual realities that we know as human beings. It would be wrong to regard such an idea a priori as too abstruse. A free subjectivity of man, open to the whole of reality, which at the same time is the ultimate organizing principle of a peristalsis of the digestive organs, is not a priori more probable than the idea envisaged here.

As already pointed out, such a higher principle of unity and order of a material regionality, greater and more differentiated than the human body, does not mean that the individual realities incorporated into this more comprehensive system are in any sense suppressed by this principle and no longer realizable in accordance with their proper nature. A higher principle of order respects the essential nature of the individual realities it organizes and gives them a further determination only in the directions in which they are ambivalent and open. Nor is it inconceivable from this standpoint that such a higher principle of unity and order of a material regionality should incorporate into this unity and order also realities which are themselves already subjectively polarized and interiorized. In other words, even a human reality which itself represents a corporeally limited system of matter and subjectivity can be conceived as integrated into such a higher system, if and insofar as this corporality itself has a potentiality for a higher and more comprehensive order. If two subjectivities are thus understood as graded principles of unity and order, with one above the other, then, of course, such a gradation and sub- and super-ordination is originally present in connection with this organizing function in regard to matter as such only insofar as these two principles extend to a smaller (‘body’) or greater material area (‘angelic region’), but not (as is obvious) insofar as both principles as intellectual subjects of freedom have an infinite openness to being as a whole and to God: that is, they are distinguished in the light of the range of their starting point within materiality and not in the light of their goal (God).

It can readily be admitted that we seem at first sight to have become involved in our reflections in a consideration of the nature of the ‘angels’ and have apparently moved away from the question of [265] their existence, returning to points already touched on in the second section. But in the last resort this apparent deviation is justified. For the question can now be more clearly stated: If angels are understood in this way, can they be thought of as existing in the light of the conception of an essentially material world, moving progressively toward increasingly higher subjectivity and a genuine unity of plural material realities? We might think in the first place that a continually advancing subjectivizing and interiorizing of the material cosmos is also man’s task, going beyond the area of his biological corporality in his knowledge and activity into the world as such (and not merely set in his environment as fixed by his corporality), thus subjectivizing and interiorizing the cosmos in possibilities and ways which he is only now beginning slowly to discover (astronautics, for example). The question, of course, might also be asked whether the time of the world must now be regarded as having lasted so long and being so far advanced that those more comprehensive subjectivities to which the evolution of the world is tending must already exist, or whether they belong to a future still to come. (By analogy with some other theological problems it might then be said that the angels are perhaps not protological, but eschatological beings.) But man’s destiny of activating in deed and thought a greater subjectivizing and interiorizing of the cosmos does not exclude the possibility that this goal of the cosmos can and should be attained in other and higher ways, particularly since man’s somatic starting point imposes on the fulfillment of this task limits which (as can easily be understood) cannot in fact be surmounted, although they are prior to the absolute fulfillment of this task.

The question of time seems more difficult to us. It might be asked whether the evolution of the world has ‘already’ arrived at ‘angels’. Our conception of angels seems to see them mainly as the end product of an evolution of the world, while traditional theology regards them as (also cosmic) principles at the beginning of the world. Here there are certainly difficulties and obscurities which are not to be denied or minimized, but it can admittedly be asked whether that finite physical time which begins according to currently accepted ideas of modern physics with the ‘big bang’ (which can certainly not itself be simply identified with the beginning of the world in a theological sense) is the very time in which the material cosmos evolves under the necessary and already present principles [266] of order which we call 'angels'. Whatever we think exactly of the way in which such angels come to be, they have in any case an essential relationship to matter, and, consequently, the history of the latter is also their own history, so that they do not become acosmic if we place them as principles of unity and order at the beginning of the history of the material cosmos, the history that we know as that of our material cosmos. In this history, then, angels, too, would reach the fulfillment of their nature as organizing and unifying regional principles of the material cosmos. It might then be asked if they could not (without any inconsistency) be both at the beginning and at the end of a material history, in a way similar to that in which the human intellectual subject is at the beginning and end of a history of the body, without implying that the 'soul' (which must be seen as present at the beginning of this corporeal history) had no history itself. Over and above all this, in principle, the possibility cannot be a priori excluded that the history of nature in regard to matter may develop toward such more widely ranging regional and interiorizing principles more rapidly than it did toward the emergence of man. It could certainly be assumed that subjectivity on the narrow basis of our biological corporality is attainable only with greater difficulty and more slowly (and also more 'casually') than on the basis of a more comprehensive materiality, that nature's feat of subjectivity within a small corporality (known as man) needed a longer start (called the biosphere) than would be required for cosmic subjectivity as a whole. It cannot then simply be claimed that 'angels' in this sense must be no more than goals still to be reached in a cosmic evolution. Nor can it be claimed, in the light of their nature and existence, that world evolution (with qualitative leaps) has already reached those subjectivities with a greater material regionality which we can call angels.

All our reflections hitherto in this third section seem to have made the existence and nature of 'angels' conceivable, but no more than that. Are there in fact in the world of our experience any indications that this thing, whose nature and existence can be conceived and expected, actually exists and makes itself known? With our conception of these 'angels' in particular we certainly do not expect the existence of such 'angels' to be made known by their effects, suddenly and unexpectedly interposed in isolation at certain individual points in the natural and normal course of material events. A priori [267] we do not count on this sort of miraculous intervention of angels at purely individual points in space and time to make known their existence. But, we might ask, can the existence of such principles of the cosmos become known only in this way or is there a possibility of such an experience which does not necessitate the interruption of the material course of things and which is described and investigated by physics and chemistry? A possibility of this kind seems conceivable if the negative criterion just mentioned is kept in mind and in the light of the nature of angels as understood here. If man becomes aware of unities and orders of a greater, but particular, kind, which, on the one hand, are conceivable in the light of the individual elements of such a unity and order and are sustained by these elements without detriment to their own immanent laws, and which, on the other hand, exist without being required or necessitated by these structural elements themselves, so that in order to 'explain' them we would need to have recourse to mere 'chance' or even directly (which is unlikely) to a creative institution by God alone, then man has the right to think of organizing and unifying principles of these unities and orders, whose existence is not adequately explained by that of their elements.

Man seems to have always had and to be able to have today such experiences of unities and orders in the world of nature and the history of humanity, to be interpreted and explained in this way; in fact, it seems that in the course of the history of humanity such experiences have been the real although less obvious reason for belief in angels, and not only those dubious 'spiritistic' experiences with which supporters and opponents of the existence of angels are usually occupied. Both in nature and also in human history, and, moreover, in the interconnection and unity of nature and history, there are experiences of unity and order, experiences which seem to be adequately interpreted only if such principles of unity and order are presupposed and if it is understood that the materialities out of which these unities and orders are constructed do not themselves provide an explanation of these orders. Non enim plura secundum se uniuntur, as Aquinas rightly says.

At this stage of course, even before we catch sight concretely of these particular orders and unities, the old problems emerge from the debate between hylomorphism, holism, reduction of the biological to cybernetically interpreted chemical systems. For all these and [268] similar theories are meant to provide the right answer to the question of exactly how complex unities are to be understood, when they seek to prevail against their 'environment' and thus to make their unity clear. But, although it might seem appropriate, we cannot, of course, go into all these difficult problems here. The problems are particularly difficult in the field of theology, since theology of itself cannot defend the principle of a fundamental essential difference between the purely material and the biological, but must remain neutral on this point and leave it entirely to the free discussion of the philosophy of nature. For theology as such, this kind of essential difference (despite all the unity of evolution and self-transcendence) is certainly present only when it is a question of man's intellectual subjectivity in unlimited transcendentality toward being as a whole and so toward God. Which of these systems of the philosophy of nature (apart from anthropology) is right is a question on which theology cannot have an independent opinion in the light of its own principles. But since the interpretation, of those greater unities and orders (which are more comprehensive than any of the particular, material, living, individual human realities taken in isolation) is supposed to be a matter of natural knowledge, this incompetence of theology in regard to the theories mentioned is not simply irrelevant for our question.

It can, however, be said that if and insofar as a theological anthropology accepts as a fact the existence of material systems (at least in man) whose unity and order is at least partially determined by a unifying substantial principle, it cannot appeal to interpretations available in the philosophy of nature of the order and unity of individual biological realities, excluding holistically or cybernetically any higher principle for this order and unity, and then assert a priori that there cannot be higher and more complex unities within the material cosmos established by higher substantial principles. This should be obvious particularly because we must certainly distinguish in principle between the structure of a complex entity on the one hand and the unifying ground of this structure on the other and cannot assume a priori that the elements of such a structure alone in their diversity themselves contain the ground of the unity of this structure.

Of course, it is impossible, particularly here, to deal terminologically and objectively with the complex of questions coming ontologically [269] under the heading of substance and structure. These two terms may offer an immense field for debate; but if the term 'structure' is understood in its traditional sense (that is, as the result of a unification, and not as the principle of this unification and unity), if, moreover, we at least leave open the question of whether a synthesizing 'from below' is not for us a concretely tangible process of a self-transcendence (in the sense indicated, of creating something qualitatively new), then we cannot regard structure at any rate as an unequivocal alternative to substance, substantial form, etc., and claim the right to go back from the structure to the real principle of this structure.

Where then, we ask finally, is it possible to discover concretely such unities and orders of a particular but greater kind, for which a proper principle of unity, order, and structure can be postulated: a principle which, since the unity and order it establishes are more comprehensive than those of the human body, possesses at least that subjectivity and transcendentality which is proper to the intellectual principle of man? It is, of course, possible here to do no more than hint at an answer to this question, since more concrete and better substantiated answers would lead us into the whole length and breadth of the particular sciences, and since, in view of the technically rationalistic mentality of modern man and the mathematically-quantitatively operating sciences involved in this, a mystagogy would be required for the genuine experience of such orders and unities – a mystagogy correcting the modern mentality and thus making effective the experience of these unities and orders. Nevertheless, both within the history of nature as such and also in the history of mankind, as well as in the interconnection of the history of nature and human history, embracing a variety of material realities in space of time, there are unities distinguishable from one another and containing in themselves a unity and order which at least gives the impression that it is not explicable purely and simply by the casual assemblage of its formative elements and preconditions, although, of course, quite definite circumstances and conditions must be present in these elements for such an ordered unity to be able to emerge in a particular form within the cosmos as a whole. The necessity of such conditions 'from below' may not, of course, be disputed or obscured. But it would not really contradict the explanation of this ordered unity envisaged here if it were clearly proved [270] that such an ordered unity always and necessarily emerges if these conditions are fulfilled from below. (The theologian, for instance, will not deny that, if the biological preconditions and factualities are present for human procreation, a human being will necessarily emerge, although the 'human soul' thus emerging qualitatively transcends the event of such a biological procreation as much as the intellectual subjectivity of man always surpasses his biological reality as such, although the latter is incorporated into the former as an intrinsic constituent.)

In the history of the evolution of life, it seems that there are such ordered unities, complexes of plural meanings, which go beyond the biological individual realities. At the particular stages of evolution of flora and fauna, together with their mutual interdependence, unities delimitable from one another can be distinguished; a particular period of evolution is characterized by a uniform style which is common also to those individualities in such a period which are not directly derived from one another; by and large in an individual period everything is coherent, although this common physiognomy of an epoch cannot be interpreted merely as our own subjective impression. Many causes can be suggested, of course, for the rise and decline of such an epoch in the history of the evolution of life, just as the most diverse individual causes can be assigned for the death of a human being; but the impression is given (despite all these possible external causes) that in the last resort such a period dies from within itself, outgrows itself and wants to die, just as with the individual human being (despite his external breakdown) death is his own death coming from within, and what we call 'chance' is the executor of an internal necessity. If someone considers such a period in the history of nature with its unity, its common style, and its one destiny and does not think that he has understood the one totality as such when he has grasped its elements and their 'accidental' coordination, despite all the positivism of the sciences at the present time, he can have the courage to perceive a unifying principle in such a unity.

The same can certainly be said (and more emphatically) in regard to the periods of the history of mankind and in regard to the histories of individual nations and other historical unities that can be observed. Here, too, things do not go in utter shapelessness; here in particular there are unities clearly distinguishable from one another, [271] each with a particular style of its own; here, too, each period of universal history, of the history of a nation, or of a particular civilisation has its internal drama and dialectic, its beginning and its end, has a common physiognomy, although this entire unity and peculiarity cannot be made intelligible solely by human beings, who directly carry on this history and realize throughout time unities of meaning that they themselves had by no means foreseen. These historical structures of meaning, extending in time over several generations, have, of course, their preconditions from below in all the individual empirical causes (geographical, biological, meteorological, sociological, etc.). But the very fact that these causes from below are really plural in character and mutually independent may lead us to wonder whether their blind, casual concurrence alone can explain the historical structures of meaning emerging from that concurrence. If the Christian in face of such a question is inclined to find an answer promptly and directly in an appeal to God's providence ruling over and in history, this answer is not wrong but raises the further question of how this providence of God is to be understood as concretely carried out, whether it does not itself come to prevail through real principles, created by God, establishing order and unity, principles described in the Book of Daniel as angels of the nations. When we observe that such unities of meaning of a greater even though particular spatio-temporality emerge in history, when we learn that they are not wholly and ultimately due solely to shortsighted historical planning by human beings or still less have their ground in 'chance', in the unplanned coincidence of subhuman causes, but when at the same time in seeking for the sufficient reason of such unities today particularly it is impossible to appeal to a 'direct' intervention of God's providence, the presumption at least of such 'angels of the nations' is justified.

Man in history need not regard such an assumption as degrading him as a historical being in freedom. For, within the framework of such a principle of unity, he still remains free in his history of freedom even in its earthly character, his relationship to God is not threatened; and, without these principles of unity and order, man's scope for freedom would not be wider, but more disorganized and diminished in meaning. At the same time it should not be forgotten that the meaning and function of such principles of unity and order are not intended properly and primarily to influence man's freedom, [272] but to establish a unity and order (within a particular region) in the material world, although they can take the form of a temptation for man, if and insofar as such orders may in their principles imply a rejection of God's gracious self-communication, carrying in themselves a tendency to be closed up, to become absolute.

Another kind of such a unity and order and of the principles lying behind it may be seen in a singular unity (obvious, however, to a contemplative gaze) of nature and culture in certain areas developed by man in which the peculiar character of nature and the peculiar character of a culture created by man converge in an odd way, while this convergence is not entirely explained by an accidental concurrence of its elements of a natural and cultural character, particularly since there are natural areas for human habitation in which such a synthesis of nature and culture has evidently not been achieved and where man remains without roots and nature remains inhuman.

The existence of these cosmic powers can be experienced from another aspect: in the antagonism in which greater ordered unities encounter one another, as, for instance, in the conflict between the angels of the nations in Daniel. By the very diversity of their individual elements, the individual cosmic realities in the different spheres of this cosmos are in opposition to and in conflict with one another; but it looks as if greater, more differentiated unities, containing within themselves many individual elements of the most diverse character, each for their own part have a tendency to unity and permanence (like an individual living being), and nevertheless are in opposition to and in conflict with one another, presenting a threat to one another. It does not look as if all antagonism in the cosmos could be reduced to the mere diversity and mutual interaction of the ultimate rudimentary particles which form the cosmos. The world does not seem to be merely the regular drift and thrust of these rudimentary particles; there seem to be greater unities and orders which, on the one hand, are not the result of the fortuitous concurrence of these individual rudimentary realities, but which, on the other hand, by their diversity are in an opposition and antagonism toward one another that is more fundamental than the opposition between the rudimentary details. This at least is true from the biosphere onward and continuing into the human sphere, in the history of which there are antagonisms and struggles for existence that are prior to any properly moral decision and that establish between the greater human unities a state of real war or of real peace.

[273] The question, then, is whether such antagonisms can be ascribed solely and directly to their institution by the Creator, in the sense that he sets up in their own nature the realities through which the antagonisms arise. It can be said, of course, that if we ascribe such cosmic antagonisms (in the biosphere and the history of humanity) to 'angelic powers and authorities' in order in a sense to take away the responsibility from God (who seems in his unity and inner concord not to be sufficiently effective in the world), we are merely shifting the problem, since in the last resort God must have created these antagonistic powers and authorities. But, when we experience such terrible antagonisms as struggles of life and death in the cosmos, we are led to postulate the principles necessary as preconditions for these things. Not in order to take away the responsibility from the God of eternal peace and of infinite concord in himself, but simply in order to give a name to the causes of such conflict in the cosmos which would not be present or visible if we were to think only of those rudimentary basic structures of the cosmos, even though these by their very diversity (which, admittedly, is itself an object of metaphysical astonishment and terror) contribute to these cosmic antagonisms. It is certainly a part of the nature and freedom of the infinite God, in whom all conceivable reality is always from the outset rooted in harmony as in its ground, that he can institute a cosmos of conflict and discord. But this very creative power of instituting conflict and discord in a cosmos coming to be (even prior to possible conflict and possible discord brought about freely by the creature's own fault) must be given an object, must create antagonistic realities. But the assumption that these consist first and last in the diversity and fortuitous concurrence of the rudimentary structures of the cosmos, or were introduced into the cosmos only by the deliberate fault of creatures, is an idea that does not seem to do justice to the greatness and radicalness of such antagonisms, of such cosmic conflicts, which still have to be settled. The higher 'powers and authorities' seem to exist and (prior to any possible fault which, if it exists, intensifies such antagonism) to be placed by God himself in a state of bellicose opposition to one another.

What has been said, of course, has not produced either conclusive evidence of the existence of angelic powers or a differentiated mystagogy into the experience of them. All that has been done is to indicate regions of possible experience in which man's natural knowledge might encounter (if it is possible at all) something like [274] angels, without giving to these experiences an incredible or mythical interpretation as experiences of realities interposed between the experiences with which modern empirical sciences in accordance with their own method are occupied. Insofar as this evidence and the mystagogy to be presupposed for it cannot really be offered here, the third position (which we defended at the beginning of these reflections) has not yet been eliminated in favour of the first position. If we have achieved anything at all, it can consist in the last resort only in a number of warnings: in the warning not to adopt a biblicistic fundamentalism and too quickly and too naively be persuaded of the existence of good and bad angels; in the warning to take seriously the hermeneutic principles arising from the actual nature of a divine revelation, which must be observed if we attempt to prove theologically the existence of angels, although the latter cannot be part of the primary and original object of revelation; in the warning not to adopt a primitive rationalism and to think that a priori no creaturely subjectivity can be conceived in addition to and 'above' man, or that such a subjectivity is purely and simply outside the field of possible experience or must be imagined in the way in which it frequently occurs in popular opinion.

COURAGE FOR AN ECCLESIAL CHRISTIANITY

The question as to why I am a Christian is radically different from, say, that of a preference to live in one country rather than in another. The second question refers to a particular aspect of life which must be linked with other, quite different aspects: it must find its place within a co-ordinated system. But a really living Christianity involves the totality of human existence. A Christian life therefore cannot be justified by establishing its place within a greater and more comprehensive co-ordinated system, the latter being already accepted as legitimate. How then is it possible to answer this question at all? This is particularly difficult today when – as distinct from former times – scarcely anything is generally accepted that can also be assumed to be approved by the person who raises the question in a critical spirit. Anyone who tries to extort an answer to a question like this, about a totality of existence and reality must – to be fair – really allow for the fact that the answer will be very fragmentary and perhaps fail to deal with the very point about which the questioner, rightly from his own standpoint, is inquiring.

For me the self and the world create a question to which there can never be a complete answer. It is obvious to me that even in the most distant future of the history of human experience and – secondarily – of science there will never be a point at which all questions will be answered, all problems cleared up and finally settled. I am really surprised how and on what grounds probably most of my contemporaries share this conviction of mine, even those who deny that what or whom I call God exists. These people really ought to think it possible in principle to get behind each and every thing, behind the particular reality that I am [4] myself; that ultimately everything – since it is merely the sum-total of such particularities – can be seen through and then allowed to drop back into its banality, in the last resort into nothingness. That very nothingness, to which questions of this kind would bring us, need not raise any problems nor does it require any explanation, if it really is nothingness and if the term ‘nothingness’ is not at all mysterious and as such does not mean something entirely different.

But what encompasses and permeates me is the eternal mystery, the infinite mystery, which is anything but the sum-total of the scraps left over of what is not currently known or has not yet been experienced: the mystery which in its infinity and density is both farthest from and most deeply rooted in the thousand fragmented realities which we describe as our world of experience. This mystery is present and finds expression by remaining silent; it is unperturbed when people claim that talking about it is nothing but idle chatter. I can understand the indignation and irritability of those who make this claim. As soon as a person fails to come with loving adoration to this mystery, which silently encompasses everything, it becomes an irritant. It is present and cannot be brought into a system. It seems only to be silent and to dissolve all our own clarities and certainties. If we do not lovingly yield to it, we can only spend our time in indignantly denying it; or we suppress it, taking refuge in everyday affairs and attaching to these more importance than their fleeting and fading existence can yield.

This mystery, which provides the ground of all individual reality and scope and background for all knowledge and freedom, I call God. It does not have to be proved circumstantially, even though those who try to prove it may well reflect on the fact that we always tacitly assume it and give it a name whenever we begin to speak about a thousand and one things in ordinary conversation or in the lecture halls of universities. If I pause and remain silent, allowing all the many individual realities of my life to subside into their one ground and all individual questions to be reduced to that question which cannot be answered through all the individual questions taken together but itself permits the infinite mystery to stand out, then the mystery is present and I am in the last resort no longer disturbed by whatever sceptical opinions a rationalistic science may choose to express on the subject. I do not think then that I am lost in irrational 'feelings', but that I have reached the point of the mind, of reason and understanding, at which all rationality arises in the very first place.

[5] I do not despise the traditional proofs of God; I read them as meaningful and necessary, but also secondary interpretations and verbalizations of that experience in which I come silently before the infinite mystery. The tremendous, earth-shattering experience is that I can approach this all-encompassing, all-sustaining and permeating mystery, setting all things at a distance and yet regaining all things; I can address it, I can pray. I know that the occurrence of such a prayerful approach is itself the act of this mystery; but by this very fact I am in the presence of this mystery, distinct from it, placed there in my own reality, so that, if I approach it, I do not cease to be but I come to share precisely in this infinite mystery. In what Christians know as grace, I learn that this mystery, in order to be itself, does not need merely to place me at an infinite distance, but gives itself as our fulfilment.

The Christian is forbidden (a unique prohibition, which must be taken quite seriously) to be content with less than the infinite fullness of God; forbidden to make himself at home definitively in the finite or to become absorbed in its limitations, to assume with false modesty that God cannot really take seriously the finite creature in all its relativity. The world did not only begin to become aware of itself in man (and elsewhere, for all I know), but God himself began to come to man and man to come to God. There may in future be still thousands of evolutional peaks, qualitative leaps and so on, which do not yet exist but are still to come. But the infinite, unsurpassable self-promise of God to man is here, penetrates everything, is the innermost entelechy and dynamic force of the world. In this business of course God does not cease to be the ultimate dynamic force and entelechy of the world and its history; we might say that the 'Big Bang' proclaimed, not the birth of God himself, but our own beginning. Otherwise God would simply not be himself.

It is part of the mystery that we can 'need' it only when it does not 'need' us. Only in the act of love on both sides can we say that God could not live without us. For it is only in this act that we receive in such a way that what is received is absolutely released. This is the mystery of love and this love is the mystery that has promised itself to us. When this self-promise of God makes its impact on the personal spirit of man, directs the latter's dynamic force on God's immediacy itself and makes God in himself (even though as the incomprehensible mystery) the goal and also the dynamic force of the human mind and its history, then what we properly call Christian revelation is already present, albeit still in an implicit and non-verbalized sense. This (as a disclosure of an infinite [6] horizon, as a movement toward the infinite mystery as such, as a freedom transcending all particularities) has existed as a secret force in the whole history of human freedom wherever man has accepted in thousands of forms the incomprehensible mystery of God. It has been particularly effective in the whole length and breadth of the history of religion. Although in this history which makes objective, verbalizes and institutionalizes God's revelation in the sense just indicated, although in this objectification what is really meant fails to find adequate expression or is debased, the Christian has nevertheless the right and duty to look reverently toward the history of religion in its breadth and length, since the Spirit of God in the divine self-communication is always active there and continually fills man with an ultimate reverence and an unconditional devotion to the infinite mystery of his life. Because I consider the history of religion under this aspect and am aware of an ultimate unity in it, despite all its diversity and disintegration into contradictions, it does not infect me with that sceptical relativism of many contemporaries who can see religion only as a concoction of primitive states of consciousness, which is slowly dying out. Many one-sided and inadequate objectifications of this fundamental immediacy of the mind to God may be allowed to die out. The threat here is only to the corruption, not to the essence of religion.

I look confidently to the future of religion. If – this of course is an absurd idea – man were to evolve, evolve backwards as it were, to become a being without any yearning for the absolute, without 'metaphysics', to become merely a clever animal or the subject of his own computer, then this would only mean that the end of humanity had come, albeit in a hitherto unexpected fashion: an end which, as such, the believer had always regarded as part of his creed to expect. This end would not amount to a negative judgement on the previous history of religion as the history of an infinite hope. It would be a deliberately planned suicide of humanity, proving those to be right who had lived and believed previously. A suicide is not a judgement pronounced by a higher authority against life. The future history of religion and thus also the history of the Church may produce hitherto completely inconceivable forms of religion; it is difficult to say what the place will look like which a verbalized and institutionalized relationship of man to the eternal mystery will occupy. But as long as man is the man of God's infinite mystery, there will also be religion, which in some way will be attested in the ordinary course of life. Whether the number of those who live their [7] religion in a socially institutionalized form will be greater or less as compared with the total number of human beings is a question to which I have no answer, but which has no fundamental significance for the person whose conscience obliges him to accept such a social expression of his religion. That Christianity as such will survive is a question which must be discussed in what follows.

My Christianity however means not only radical frankness in adoration, devotion and love for the ineffable mystery of God; it has not only what we might call a transcendental, 'pneumatological' character. My Christianity has also and essentially an historical dimension. For it acknowledges that this self-offering of the infinite mystery as fulfilment of man is not only the God-given uttermost and most radical opportunity of man for the history of his freedom, but (at least as seen in relation to the totality of the history of mankind) is also in virtue of this offering victoriously established in the world and has already been manifested in its irreversibility and in its victory in history. This historical event, in which God's offer to mankind became irreversible and is also historically palpable in this victory, is what Christian faith finds in Jesus Christ. It was this One, crucified and risen, who also proclaimed this irreversible promise by God of himself by proclaiming the immediate advent of God's Kingdom; it was he who in his unity with God and in his unconditional solidarity with all men was also aware of himself as the event of this now irremovable closeness of God to the world, who upheld the reality of this advent even when plunged into the emptiness and impotence of death and was encountered as the one who in this death as the one and complete surrender to the mystery really came with his whole existence to be with God, vindicated, encountered as the 'Risen One'. For me Jesus is the promise – no longer to be deferred or revoked – by God of himself to me in history: the ultimate unsurpassable, irrevocable Word of God, the WORD. It is in this light that I gain access to the meaning and credibility of classical Christology, of an incarnational and descendence Christology such as can be found already in the New Testament. In this light the classical Christology of Ephesus and Chalcedon has no mythological implications, even though I must admit that the Christology of many devout fellow-Christians and sometimes that of the Church's official representatives, despite their verbal orthodoxy, do not seem to me to be entirely free from mythological overtones.

To be honest, I have the impression that a proposition like 'Jesus is God' can be ineffably true and productive of salvation but that it can also [8] be terribly misunderstood as a result of over-simplification. In the first sense it is a proposition about a unique unity, in the second it suggests an identity and can be understood only in a heterodox fashion as a shibboleth of orthodoxy, although there are some who feel they must sacrifice reason in order to assert this identity. In Christology also (with the Council of Chalcedon) it is possible to be much more rational than many people think. The ultimate and most authentic mystery of Christology is implied anyway in what we expect, what we may and must expect for all of us: that God as himself can impart himself to man without having to be represented by a creaturely reality and without man himself being dissolved into nothingness in this communication. Consequently my faith in my own fulfilment in God himself and faith in God's 'becoming man' in Jesus are closely linked for me; they belong to the one fundamental persuasion that God, without ceasing to be the infinite mystery, willed to be a God of ineffable closeness and does not revoke this will. Christology and pneumatology are linked indissolubly together in Christian faith. The fact that the historical manifestation of the irrevocable union of God and the world took place precisely in Jesus Christ is something that cannot of course be deduced speculatively but is part of the indissoluble facticity and singularity of history. Nevertheless I can understand that the real encounter with the Absolute, if it is not merely conceived but accepted and realized, occurs in the facticity of history and not solely in the abstract dimension of ideas.

We can love ideas and speculation, we can regard these things as part of authentic human existence, we must not depreciate them as superfluous luxuries and pastimes. But even if such an ascent to the heights of the spirit were to lead to full 'illumination', in which all veils of illusory perishability seem to fall away, this illumination as the high point of the spirit would still have to go through the night of death in order to become definitive and credible. And into that night a person would have to take everything – even though it is changed – that he is and has, his whole history with body and soul. The way of transcendence and mysticism is at an end only when the way of history ends at death. And that is why I look to him who in history has died with and for me and in whom, with an immense number of my Christian brethren, I have the courage to trust (a trust that no one elsewhere in history dares to demand from me) that this death has passed into the life of God himself. I am never merely an idea; I cannot leave history out of my idea. Consequently I know that I cannot get away from the history of Jesus, although it is inevitably [9] burdened with all the relativity of historical reality and all the obscurity of historical knowledge.

Since I am a human being and a Christian, in the last resort it is obvious to me that I am a Christian in the Church, an ecclesial Christian. I do not want to 'socialize' thinking and free decision, to surrender understanding and freedom in a collective. But I cannot consider myself so important that my own conviction would be as radically important to me as faith must be when it involves a total life's decision which is a priori meant to be mine alone. If religion involves what is most real in man and man in his wholeness, then it cannot a priori be merely what is individual and the innermost reality of the individual person alone. Religion must be my own proper and free conviction, must be capable of being experienced at the very heart of existence. But this existence is itself found only in a community and society, being revealed in giving and receiving. Moreover Christianity is a historical religion bound up with the one Jesus Christ. I heard of him only through the Church and not otherwise. Hence I cannot be content with a purely private Christianity which would repudiate its origins. Attachment to the Church is the price I pay for this historical origin. We have still not by any means explained all or even the most important reasons for a Christian's attachment to the Church. But these must suffice.

An ecclesial Christian of this kind must of course be aware of the historicity of the Church. He knows therefore about all the far-too-human and inhuman aspects of what has happened in the Church 'in head and members', in the past and in the present. A Christian who believes that the Church truly comes from Jesus Christ and consequently that it is the basic sacrament of salvation for the whole world, in face of this only too often very human history of the Church, cannot simply ingenuously point to other historical structures and appeal to the fact that it is a history of feeble human beings who behave atrociously everywhere on the stage of world history; what he ought to do is to hope and expect the victory of grace, which the Church even in its visible manifestation is meant to promise to the world, to be revealed in radiant splendour in its own history. Here is the revelation which only the gloomy despiser of mankind can overlook as a matter of principle. But the Christian could wish for a considerably brighter radiance.

The Christian will accept this humbling experience realistically as a matter of fact, even if he cannot entirely explain it and still less justify it in terms of cheap triumphalism (as it was called at the last general [10] council). But, because a sincere Christian who acknowledges himself to be a poor sinner makes his own contribution to reducing the clarity of the Church's manifestation, he will certainly not pharisaically deduce from this lack of clarity a right to dissociate himself from this Church of sinners. Of course he always has a right to criticize. An ultimate identification with the fundamental nature of the Church – which it has not lost and never will lose – does not imply agreement with each and everything that is done in the Church. Not even with all that the hierarchy or the Pope does, nor with each and every item that is put forward as official teaching in the Church. For me the real dogma of the Church is an absolutely binding factor and as a Christian and as a theologian I have not infrequently had to make an effort to discover what was really meant by a particular statement put forward as a dogma by the Church's magisterium, in order to give my assent honestly and confidently. But I have never known an instance in the course of my life where it became impossible to give this assent; at least not when I had seen clearly that even these dogmas could all be understood rightly only as far as their meaning was related to the mystery of God himself, that they always appear in a form that is historically conditioned, are always and unavoidably blended with certain elements which do not properly belong to the content of what is said and can render the latter misleading, that these dogmas as formulated are partly linguistic rules which need not always take precisely this form to express the essential meaning.

It is however different in regard to the odd item of more or less secondary importance in the field of exegesis, systematic theology, moral theology, which has been or is put forward by the Roman magisterium as official and binding teaching, even though no definition is involved. To mention only recent examples, I do not see either in the arguments used or in the formal teaching authority of the Church as actually asserted a convincing or conclusive reason for assenting to the controversial teaching in Paul VI's Humanae Vitae or to the Declaration of the Congregation for the Doctrine of Faith which seems to exclude the ordination of women in principle and for all time. But the Church does not require from me such an identification with each and every declaration of the magisterium – apart from dogma properly so-called – either in practice or according to the principles related to this question as laid down in the normal course of its theology.

In this situation a Christian and a theologian need not feel that his attitude in dissociating himself from such teaching places him on the [11] fringe of the Church. Things may not then always be too easy for him as a theologian. Even today objectively unjustified administrative measures are adopted which unduly restrict the theologian's legitimate freedom of opinion and research. But it is impossible to guard against such narrow-minded procedures from the outset in the Church as it actually exists, by facing the magisterium with the dilemma of proclaiming and protecting pure dogma alone or of remaining completely silent. All that is left to the theologian is to go as far as he can to ensure that blunders of this kind on the part of the official teaching authorities occur as rarely as possible, even though there is no a priori recipe for avoiding them all together; for the rest, he must patiently allow for such mistakes among the defects and sins that will never be lacking in the history of the Church of sinners. But in the last resort none of this disturbs the ecclesial allegiance of a Christian theologian in his actual existential relationship to the Church. I can understand that there are Christians who feel authorized or even bound in conscience to leave the Church exactly as I can recognize that many people can act with a clear conscience in the moral field in a way which my conscience would compel me to reject absolutely in practice and in principle. That is why I can still take for granted the ecclesial character of my being a Christian and of my theology.

This opportunity for a legitimate compromise arises of course most obviously in regard to participation in the life of the Church. If we examine them more closely, we can observe that the official norms for life in the Church, even in the Catholic Church, allow extraordinarily wide scope for diversities of organization. The house of the Church is much larger and for a long time has not merely consisted of tiny and stifling rooms. That is not to say that we should underestimate the importance, the religious strength and even a certain theological normative character of popular devotion, which is often much more noble, and understands more about God than anaemic rationalism or bourgeois respectability. But in 'our Father's house' there are many rooms among which we can and indeed must choose, if we want to justify out own life before God. At the same time we might wish that the Church's proclamation and its approved practice as expressed in the average sermon and in church newspapers would permit a little more of the spaciousness of the Church and the freedom of the Christian to be perceived. We cannot have a fatherland unless we are prepared to live with its philistines and slackers. It is the same with the Church. We must not simply identify [12] the 'Catholicism' of a particular country with the Church as a whole and blame the latter for the narrowness and hard-heartedness of a particular regional Catholicism. But, even in a local church where this narrow-minded Catholicism prevails, the word of God and his grace is proclaimed, his forgiveness granted and the death and resurrection of Jesus celebrated until he returns.

It seems to me that those who suffer far too much through the Church have not properly understood its true nature and their ultimate relationship to it. If I live my Christianity quite naturally and without inhibitions, even somewhat casually as a result of habit, if I live it also within the Church, there can of course be moments when I am stirred into asking: 'What am I really doing here?' Then I tell myself (in regard to what is present even though inexpressible): 'You cannot flee to a greater clarity than what you have and you have no right to allow yourself, by attempting to take a more radical decision for your life, to fall into a greater darkness, simply because you could wish for a more radiant and compelling clarity than what you now possess.' I also tell myself: 'Accept the incomprehensible mystery with equanimity and serene hope; what then could go wrong?' What other choice could I make that was not long ago encompassed by this mystery? I tell myself: 'You will die and your death will strike at your whole existence and even the theory you have constructed about it; is it not pointless to do anything but die with Jesus into his death (and, consequently, to live now with him)?' I then tell myself: 'Is not this the sum-total of Christianity? Can we not simply accept everything else about Christianity, however difficult it is to understand and to bear, since it can only be had in its wholeness?' If I put these questions to myself and answer in this way, then it seems to me permissible to take my Christianity for granted, to think and to live the Incomprehensible very comprehensibly.[1]

ON THE SITUATION OF FAITH

Our theme in the following reflections is faith: faith, that is, as understood by the magisterium of the Catholic Church and by traditional theology. Hence the author will not be disturbed by the objection that he is creating a lot of trouble and work for himself by discussing theologically a concept of faith that no longer corresponds to what people today and many modern theologians understand by the term.

What must be considered first of all in theological terms is the impossibility, only now becoming evident, of a positive integration of faith with the rest of what is known (at least by educated people and at least in the West). What do we mean in the first place by this impossibility of (reciprocal) integration? Because of the contingency of his history and because of the plurality of the sources of knowledge (beginning with the multiplicity of his senses), the diverse contents of a person's consciousness are not reciprocally integrated from the outset. Harmony does not prevail everywhere from the beginning. One of the main tasks of human knowledge as of one subject, despite the multiplicity of realities making up a human being, is to synthesize the many and at first sight very disparate experiences. Man strives for a completely structured world-view in which every object of his individual experiences has its definite place and in which all details are reciprocally explained and rendered intelligible, in which no contradictions appear. Because of the unity of consciousness and from the nature of the case it is necessary and understandable that the realities of his secular experience and those of the Christian faith should be integrated together into such a homogeneous world-vision.

The reality of faith is not simply a world to itself alone, separate from [14] the world of secular experience, if only because this faith raises quite concrete claims and demands which must be fulfilled in the concrete world of secular experience and activity, in moral life and in the ecclesial society, which is a very concrete reality of everyday existence. For this very reason the desire for a synthesis, for the integration of the reality of faith and of secular reality, must be recognized as legitimate in principle. The Christian rightly demands a homogeneous, completely structured 'world-view' in which his Christian faith properly so-called and the rest of his experience, the rest of his knowledge (including academic knowledge), are integrated. This 'world-view' is not simply present from the outset, otherwise the revelation of faith as such would have to supply also as its own content the totality of man's possible knowledge. But it does nothing of the kind, for revelation and Christian faith by their very nature exclude the possibility of such a homogeneous world-view present from the outset, arising out of the unity of the sources of knowledge.

Although man cannot live by faith alone (this essential limitation of revelation and faith is by no means obvious, but it is a fact), but can in fact live this faith only with the aid of the rest of his experience, a clearly and palpably completely structured world-view cannot exist from the outset: it must be sought and established, a task which for a Christian is a duty arising from his faith. Of course the task was accomplished at all times only as an asymptotic convergence toward the goal and, from the standpoint of the individual and his life-task, to be completed only in death. Nor of course was this task ever fully achieved even in a society. There were always elements of secular experience (in nature and history) not clearly synthesized with Christian faith or combined with the latter into a world-view, even though they had a certain relevance from the standpoint of faith. But in former times such relics of an experience subjectively already existing but not yet positively integrated into a homogeneous

Christian world-view were comparatively slight, if only because people knew nothing at all about many secular facts relevant to faith but difficult to integrate. In Francis Suarez' world-vision, for instance, his faith with his theology and his secular knowledge of nature and history did not form an original unity from the outset, but they were easily and clearly visibly integrated into a unity. Everything fitted together and this harmony was not merely a fundamental postulate of his faith and of the original unity of his consciousness, but a perceptible fact.

Despite these elements of unresolved problems, in earlier Christian times there existed an assured, homogeneous world-vision, a completely [15] structured world-view, which was not only that of the individual and the solitary isolated person on his own account and at his own risk, but that of a society where, despite individual heretics and dissidents, it was more or less taken for granted and undisputed, at least in its basic features. And, in so far as the fact was known existentially and taken seriously that there were and are also other religions and ideologies outside the Christian cultural complex, it was easily integrated into the Christian world-view by being explained in the light of data understood in Christian terms (original sin, culpable error, etc.) or by simply regarding supporters of these other religions and ideologies as enemies with whom from the outset there could be no dialogue, since the latter would constitute a threat to one's own world-view. At a still earlier stage these other ideologies were not regarded as unintegrated facts, threatening one's own world-view, but more or less as I might today regard a Tibetan medicine as irrelevant to my needs and leave it aside without trying to find out more about it. Of course, even in former times there were brief periods when a world-vision lost its clarity or disintegrated, periods also of struggle between several world-views. But such critical phases (for instance, the transition from the ancient 'pagan' world-vision to the Christian world-vision of the West) were comparatively brief, because a geographically restricted society, content through all the changes with its self-understanding, maintained a world-view which had its own unity and consistency.

It is different today, nor can it be foreseen how and when this new situation might change in the future, even though no one can say that this is simply impossible. There are two reasons why man today finds it impossible positively to integrate all the data of his consciousness with his faith. These are the extent of his secular knowledge and the necessity and real possibility of an existentially genuine dialogue with all existing forms of faith and ideologies.

First of all the present range of secular knowledge, as it exists or is in principle easily attainable for the individual, is so great that for him at least a positive synthesis with the Christian faith is concretely and practically impossible.

The abundance of knowledge yielded by the natural and historical sciences is so vast and increases so quickly that, even apart from faith, it can no longer be really synthesized in the head of any single individual. For the individual a system of knowledge into which new insights were slowly and cautiously integrated has now become an exploded chaos [16] with which he cannot cope. Not only is there an endless number of things supposed to be 'known' today that he does not know, but as a matter of real and concrete experience he knows that he does not know all this. (This comes home to him particularly in the presence of a modern computer.) This is a quite different and new form of ignorance and it is accompanied by a feeling of helplessness and powerlessness which in former times would arise in face only of nature as a whole and not of human works.

This present and still unsurmounted mass of knowledge (always prior to any confrontation with faith) places man in a new and unique situation in regard to knowledge. Formerly there was an immense number of things that he did not know, but he was not aware or at the most only slightly aware of this ignorance existentially at the margin of consciousness. What was known was also known on the whole securely and without feeling threatened. Hence a person expressed his knowledge mainly in the form of a firm and more or less absolute statement of what he knew. Today the individual knows that a vast number of things of which he is ignorant is present all around him and that this number is speedily and enormously increasing, raising questions about the knowledge he already possesses as provisional and subject to revision. Consequently the individual today does not normally express his knowledge in the form of a firm statement, meant to be permanently certain and more or less absolute, but as provisional, open to question, hypothetical, valid for the time being; if further knowledge is acquired, this is seen only as superseding a hitherto accepted hypothesis. What results from all this is a diffuse but everywhere prevailing sceptical relativism. We no longer live in solid houses of absolutely sound convictions, accepted by society at large and everywhere taken for granted, but in tents hastily pitched for a journey into the unforeseeable, simply because we know so much and discover new things so quickly and each individual by himself becomes increasingly stupid in face of the range of what as such is immediately knowable or can be 'looked up', although technical inventions enable him to live continually with what he does not understand.

In his present state of knowledge the attitude of the individual to the Christian faith cannot simply be the same as formerly. A positive, uniform and clearly visible synthesis of this modern knowledge with faith to form a homogeneous world-view is not possible either objectively or subjectively. Christian faith can no longer be experienced so simply and obviously as formerly as the ultimate structural principle of knowledge [17] as a whole. In principle at least, there does not seem to be any absolutely clear and as such certainly palpable contradiction between faith and modern knowledge, although psychologically and existentially it is not so simple to keep to the somewhat vague midway between the non-perceptibility of an absolute contradiction and the impossibility of seeing a positive reconciliation and synthesis between the two. But even if an absolute contradiction cannot be proved and if modern Christian apologetics is frequently content to restrict itself to this negatively protective defence, it must be clearly seen and carefully noted that for the individual such a positive synthesis between modern knowledge and ancient faith is largely impossible.

This needs to be elucidated in the light of individual, concrete examples. We might be expected to produce examples of the impossibility of such a positive reconciliation between modern knowledge and Christian faith in the fields of both the natural sciences and the historical and social sciences. We might ask, for example, what an individual modern physicist is supposed to make of transubstantiation in the Tridentine teaching on the Eucharist. We might ask whether an individual historian of religion for his own part would also regard as certain the self-understanding of Jesus presented by traditional Catholic fundamental theology as historically certainly demonstrable. We might ask whether the historian or social scientist today can be so completely certain that Christianity (especially in the historical form of the Church) is palpably beyond comparison with other religions, as Vatican I declared it to be, claiming that this incomparability in terms of fundamental theology (that is, in historical empiricism) amounted to a comprehensible and conclusive argument for the supernatural origin of the Christian revelation, valid for all times and adapted to the intelligence of all. It might be asked what such present-day thinkers would make of the statements about miracles and even prophecies (tacitly passed over today, by contrast with Vatican I). It might be asked whether today they could without more ado regard the spread of the Church as miraculous, its moral state as one of outstanding holiness, its activity as inexhaustibly fruitful in all that is good, and thus see the Church itself – as Vatican I claimed – as an invincible testimony to its own divine mission.

We could go on at length in this way. It should not be maintained that there can be no appropriate suggestions or answers in regard to all these and many, many other questions. All that can be said here is that such answers, even if they are or can be assumed to be correct 'in themselves', [18] do not make it any easier for the individual to integrate modern knowledge and Christian faith into a positively grasped unity of a world-view. No remedy has been found for this situation, no way of rendering such an integration possible. We must simply put up with this state of affairs, while showing that its real burden would not be removed from modern man even if he abandoned his faith and with that the possibility of the coexistence of Christian faith and modern knowledge. For the coexistence of convictions held as absolute and the immense number of opinions accepted only hypothetically and provisionally simply cannot be removed.

It is necessary now to consider more precisely the consequences for Christian faith as concretely lived, if it has to be lived in this atmosphere of sceptical relativism, of knowledge assumed to be provisional. The observations to be made here in response to the question are very unsystematic and are not meant to create an impression of being exhaustive.

First of all, the Church's teaching authority in practice and existentially takes a very secondary place in a person's 'system of faith' today. Of course it is part of the Catholic understanding of Christian faith to accept a magisterium which teaches with binding force. If this is forthrightly rejected, there can be no question of a truly Catholic understanding of faith. The authority of the Church and its magisterium however is certainly not the first and last foundation of the faith of a person today, but deduced as a very secondary factor, even though the latter – if and in so far as it is grasped by faith – helps to determine the faith of the individual Catholic in its totality. The teaching authority of the Church is certainly part of the substance of the Catholic faith, but, from the standpoint of fundamental theology, not its beginning nor its ultimate ground. Theoretically this had always been the position of Catholic fundamental theology, since it explained and justified its doctrine of the existence of God, of the possibility and reality of revelation, its doctrine of Jesus Christ as divine legate, before putting forward an ecclesiology, a doctrine of the Church's magisterium, of Scripture as inspired source of revelation. But in practice and kerygmatically, at an earlier stage, at least subliminally, a different mentality had existed. This was in line with Augustine's statement that he would not believe the gospel if he had not been moved to do so by the authority of the Church. In this view the Church, its authority, the stubborn absoluteness of its teaching, were regarded as the proper and sole refuge where people could be secure against their own scepticism and the breakdown of all certainties. From [19] this standpoint they had an immediate and more or less natural understanding of the fact stressed (somewhat triumphalistically) by the Church that it was itself by its life and history an invincible motive of faith as a whole and not only a particular object of this faith with a relatively secondary place in its total structure and total justification.

Obviously there are many people even today who feel like this, because of their psychological make-up and sociological background. Here we shall not indulge in any prognosis as to whether this experience of the Church might not perhaps once again become generally the more or less obvious way of access to Christian faith as a whole. For it cannot at all be taken for granted that people must regard and will in future regard the sociological relativity of their convictions always as a reason for their uncertainty and not as a reason for their accuracy. But, granted all this and making allowance for it, it remains a fact that faith in the Church and particularly in its binding teaching authority is a conviction which today generally appears late and as a secondary element in the genesis and total structure of the Catholic faith. Man today is too well aware of the difficulty of deriving conclusions with logical necessity from the Church's history of dogma, as an explanation clearly emerging from the sense of faith of the primitive Church or even from the teaching of the historical Jesus. Even though this might be possible in theory, modern man as an individual cannot manage it; nor can he get very far by having recourse to the Church's authority in its present-day understanding of itself, since this very self-understanding appears as the result of a history the legitimacy of which he himself cannot clearly grasp. Man today has a different, prosaic and more or less demythologized attitude to authorities in general and to those who possess authority, since their history with its upheavals and mistakes is more obvious to him than it was to people in earlier times, and hence he knows also about the mistakes and wrong decisions in the history of the Church's magisterium.

The explanation that these mistakes – which cannot be denied – on the part of the Church's magisterium are involved in authentic doctrinal statements and not in definitions is of course objectively correct, but not easy for the individual to accept in practice today. For even statements that do not involve a definition can occasionally have very concrete and solid effects in the life of the Church and affect the individual very closely (we may recall, for example, Humanae Vitae or the Declaration on Women and the Priesthood). Moreover, in concrete cases, the Roman magisterium itself tends more to obscure than to clarify the difference [20] between merely authentic statements and those involving a definition, thus creating the impression that it regards all doctrinal statements concretely and in practice as irreformable. But for this very reason the individual today is inclined to suspect that there is nothing to choose between statements involving a definition and merely authentic declarations of the magisterium. This impression is all the more widespread since the more simple Christian – not a professional theologian, but perhaps well-educated and even an 'intellectual' – often feels that modern theology puts forward interpretations even with reference to many dogmas that are so remote from the previous (popular) understanding that it is difficult for him to see how this new interpretation can be identified with the old dogma. In principle these interpretations can be necessary and legitimate today without posing a threat to the permanence of the old dogma. But the new interpretations make it more difficult for the individual Christian to adopt an unprejudiced attitude toward the Church's magisterium.

We shall not attempt here to deal further with the problems involved, still less to solve them. What should be noted here is that even existentially the Church's magisterium today is no longer the obvious starting point of faith, the obvious court of appeal which does not create any problems of its own, to which the preacher can have recourse; it is a comparatively secondary factor in the continually freshly realized genesis of faith, an object of proclamation and not the latter's essential foundation. Consequently, in proclaiming the Church's teaching on faith, the appeal to the authority of the magisterium must be handled very cautiously, particularly since it has also to be observed in this proclamation that the appeal to the sense of faith of the whole Church irrevocably upholding a particular doctrine (an appeal which even today still has an apologetic importance) and the appeal to the formal authority of the Roman magisterium are not precisely the same thing. Today this authority is in fact and in practice a permanent object of proclamation which must itself continually be made intelligible and credible in terms of fundamental theology and apologetics; it is not simply to be taken for granted everywhere and always as the ground of proclamation.

The further conclusion follows however that, if a particular dogma of the Church is to be made understandable and credible, the effort of proclamation cannot every time simply end with an appeal to the formal authority of the Church's magisterium: the dogma involved must be substantiated in terms of fundamental theology and apologetics in itself [21] or in the light of more fundamental articles of Christian faith. This statement of course is a truism even for traditional fundamental theology. Hitherto however sermons generally started out too readily from the assumption that they took place within the dimension of the Church, the latter being regarded as an obvious and indisputable factor so that the sermon had only to be oriented to its teaching. Today even in the mystagogical sermon within the Church the person to be addressed is someone whose attitude to the magisterium and even to the sense of faith of the whole Church is not so ingenuous and naive as it was formerly. Proclamation within the Church must take the same form as outside it: in principle the dogmatic sermon must have an apologetic aspect; dogmatics and fundamental theology must mutually interpenetrate. Today no fundamental theology can exist or be presupposed in sermons which is assumed to have proved once and for all in a formal way the existence of a binding revelation, so that it can and must be asked only subsequently what in fact has been communicated by God in this revelation. Today it is the credibility (that is, the meaningfulness and existential assimilability and human unrenounceability) of the fundamental dogmas of Christianity that makes credible the existence of a supernatural revelation (rightly understood) and not vice versa.

The existence of the Church's magisterium and also its concrete importance as norm of faith for the individual may not be given up even today, but at the present time it has a different rank and a different place in the structure and in the 'system' of faith of a person today. The Church today – this may (and must, if the preacher is to be credible) be said without prejudice – is a burden: a burden which may not be thrown off, since that would be fatal in the long run to Christian faith (and recourse to the authority of Scripture alone also creates the same problems and difficulties in view of our present awareness of the historical relativity even of Scripture). But this burden must not be concealed, a person ought to feel the whole weight of the often terrifying history of the Church when the latter's authority is invoked; and it is only when the scandal of the cross – which is part of Christian faith – is honestly accepted without any triumphalism – and preached in the same spirit that this burden can be turned into a blessing and the Church, despite everything, can be experienced as the obvious centre of faith, at which God's pledge of himself with irrevocable force in Jesus Christ is accepted.

We have to remember moreover a very different question with reference to the Christian faith which arises when we see this faith in the [22] concrete human being in a situation which no longer permits a positive integration of faith and modern knowledge (in its own specific character). This situation poses a threat to that absolute assent which is part of the essence of Christian faith. The assent should be absolute, unconditional, firmer than anything else. As J. Beumer expresses it, the act of faith is 'by its nature a total surrender of man to God. But, in so far as this surrender is the free act of his knowledge precisely as response to God's word in revelation, it means certainty of faith. This implies (over and above the question of the relative certainty of the praeambula fidei)* an absoluteness (firmness) of the 'decision for' (also as norm of knowledge) the object (certitudo adhaesionis) and of the (free) apprehension of the formal object of assent as such, absolutely and objectively guaranteeing the truth of the true and truthful testimony of God (certitudo infallibilitatis), so that the believer makes what is attested also epistemologically the absolute fixed point and the norma non normata of his knowledge' (LThK vol. iv, col. 942). According to traditional teaching, then, faith is supposed to be absolutely and unconditionally the unambiguous first fixed point of all human convictions which (since God's truth has itself become its ground and formal object) is under no higher human authority, in the light of which it could be subjected to criticism and called in question. The problems involved in this doctrine of the certainty of faith, as they have always existed and for a long time been considered in traditional theology, and the diverse answers given in the traditional analysis fidei,[†] cannot directly concern us here but are presupposed as known.

* In traditional fundamental theology or apologetics the praeambula fidei included those truths, such as the existence of God, the possibility and historical fact of revelation, which could be shown to be accessible to reason, and the preliminary conditions – not the cause – of the assent of supernatural faith. Today these 'preliminaries' are seen to be more complex and less accessible to rational investigation, including psychological dispositions and openness to the workings of grace. Cf. Karl Rahner/Herbert Vorgrimler, 'Praeambula Fidei', in Concise Theological Dictionary (Freiburg/London 1965), pp. 368-70. – Translator.

The basic problem in this connection consists in the fact that this divine truth, which is supposed to guarantee the absolute certainty and firmness of faith, is always conveyed through human knowledge; the [23] question therefore arises why this human mediation with its dubiousness and uncertainty does not also affect the individual person's concrete faith, so that the latter cannot by any means have that certainty which the Church's teaching claims for it. Even though, as we said, we do not want to deal with this old and ever-new problem, it is obvious that the problem will take a different form and become more acute if the concrete situation in which God's absolute revelation to man must be conveyed in a human way is itself changed and becomes more critical.

In fact, in a mental climate in which in other matters the firm and indisputable statement (in any form and to any, albeit varied, extent) was the normal expression of human knowledge, the absolute assent of faith itself was not a particularly striking or unusual phenomenon in a person's consciousness as a whole. It appeared as a climax – not surprisingly – in a total system of securely, firmly and unchangeably maintained statements of a secular character. But, in a consciousness where a sceptical relativism normally prevails and all secular knowledge is regarded as merely provisional, to be superseded in the light of later experience, such an absolute assent of faith is bound to be seen as an alien element, as a demand which simply cannot be taken seriously by man today and which also shares in the changing, provisional and unforeseeable condition of all knowledge. In this situation the old problems of the analysis fidei acquire a wholly new importance and have consequences quite different from those of the past. Metaphorically speaking, when the king was an obvious, indisputable factor whose necessity in principle no critique would venture to question (at least not within the individual's sphere of existence), it was also easy to believe in the Pope; now that there are no more kings, belief in the Pope can no longer be taken for granted as it was formerly. Speaking without metaphors, formerly in the historical and sociological situation it was easier to perceive the certainty of the praeambula fidei and they posed no threat to faith itself, although of course it was even then clear that their certainty and the firmness of assent given to them were less than the certainty and firmness claimed by faith for itself. But today the concrete individual without a professional knowledge of theology, faced also with an abundance of historical and metaphysical problems beyond his control, unable to integrate modern knowledge and faith into a homogeneous world-vision, cannot be so certain as formerly of the praeambula fidei and this fact must also affect his faith. He feels insecure; he can no longer see clearly how to maintain the absoluteness and unconditional firmness of his faith.

[24] Formerly, in the course of the analysis of the act of faith, it was easy to say that knowledge of the praeambula fidei was merely an external precondition of faith and, with its merely relative certainty, did not enter inwardly into faith and into its very structure, so that faith itself was determined only by its own internal formal object and was not affected by the relatively slight certainty of the praeambula fidei (the situation was said to be analogous to that of someone who gives absolute love and loyalty to a couple of human beings as his parents, although the certainty that these two really are his parents is not as absolute as his actual turning to them). But at that time the individual felt so certain about the praeambula fidei and took them so much for granted that he was easily satisfied with the explanation (in itself certainly theoretically correct) that the praeambula fidei (likewise certain and regarded as certain) did not enter at all into the inner nature of faith and were not themselves necessary to substantiate and justify the absoluteness of the assent of faith. But it is really not so simple today when the average person rightly or wrongly feels that his grasp of the praeambula fidei is much less secure or even non-existent. In practice and concretely this feeling is bound to be detrimental to the certainty of the assent of faith, whether this effect is logically necessary or not. For it is a question, not merely of the abstract nature of faith, but of its concrete existence in the consciousness of a person today, and this existence is undoubtedly also dependent on the existence and the specific character of the praeambula fidei at the present time in man's consciousness. He has the impression that for the time being he can believe to the best of his knowledge and in all conscience (in its actual state) in the same way as he finds it possible at the moment rationally to defend an opinion; he must however at the same time adopt the reservation, as with all other human knowledge, that he might later be better informed and then revise his previous view of faith; but there can be no talk of an absolute assent, excluding from the outset and in principle any later revision. We may well think that what has just been said expresses more or less accurately the present mentality in the western world, although of course the degree of explicit reflection on this epistemological situation of faith may vary considerably.

What however must be said of this imperilled state of faith in the light of faith's own understanding of itself? Can it exist also today with that absolute assent and that indisputable certainty which it formerly claimed for itself? Can the spiritual man judge everything while refusing to be judged himself, without making the hopeless attempt to escape from the [25] mental climate of his time? What is to be said if we do not start out from the assumption that the traditional distinction between the rational grounds of assent to the praeambula fidei and the intrinsic formal object and motive of faith is a sufficient answer to our contemporary problem? If we attempt to give an answer to the question raised in this form, this does not mean that we regard the answer as exhaustive or that we might not bring in quite different considerations in order to find a comprehensive answer to our question.

In this connection it seems to me worth considering first of all that faith as fides quae[*] is a many-sided factor. However much in itself and especially in the present mental climate it seems advisable and necessary to make clear the unity of faith, the internal connection of its individual statements, nevertheless the content of faith – particularly in the Church's official proclamation – is a many-sided and complex factor. Hence it can come about that a particular reality can actually be believed with a genuine theological faith, even though another part of the content of this same faith is simultaneously rejected as false. It can perhaps be said that someone who explicitly and publicly rejects a single dogma of the Catholic Church is a heretic and no longer belongs to that Church; but it cannot be said that the inculpable rejection of a certain dogma cannot coexist with a theological faith (as infused virtue and as act). For the Second Vatican Council declares that even a 'pagan' or an atheist, as long as he is true to his own conscience, can have a theological faith of the quality necessary for salvation.

If this is the situation, it is also conceivable that a Catholic Christian might not bring to certain dogmas of the Church that absolute assent which is part of the essence of faith and yet could be a believer in the theological sense of the term and also a Catholic, at least as long as he does not explicitly and publicly deny a particular dogma and as long as he remains in good faith. This is the position of many Catholics today. In the light of their mental attitude and psychological make-up, as these exist in the present age of sceptical relativism, despite their good will, they will not in fact succeed in bringing an absolute assent of faith to one dogma or another and yet it cannot be said on that account that they do not possess the faith necessary for salvation. The objection cannot be raised that such people are Catholics only if they affirm the Church and [26] its magisterium with an absolute assent of faith; if they do this, their absolute assent extends implicitly and necessarily to everything that the Church teaches with ultimate binding force; hence the situation described here simply could not arise for people who are Catholic and in practice lead a Christian life in the Church. This objection is not valid, since the statement that the Church is necessary for salvation and possesses an infallible magisterium, as a particular article of faith which entered comparatively late into the structure of faith, can itself be one of those articles to which a person inculpably fails to give an absolute assent of faith. It can be said then that, if there are very many people in the Church today who cannot manage a 'complete identification with the Church' (a favourite expression at the present time), if they give even to dogmas only that provisional and conditional assent which they give to statements of purely secular knowledge, if they live and 'practise' in this way in the Church, it cannot be simply claimed without more ado that they have no theological faith or do not belong to the Church.

Even a faith like this, still coming to be, not yet articulating certain elements of the one and entire faith with an absolute assent, can be an ecclesial faith leading to salvation. All that is required is that it does not imply an absolute rejection of a dogma of the Church. For the most part this will not happen today, since this modern man with his universal sceptical relativism (even in regard to his own opinions) will not be able or willing – even in regard to the Church's dogmas of faith – absolutely to reject a binding teaching of the Church merely because he cannot positively cope with it at the moment. If all this is true, then we can see quite dispassionately and in its concrete reality the faith of very many Catholics today and yet be optimistic about the salvation of this large number of Catholic Christians and about their attachment to the Church. Admittedly, they do not have the faith entirely as it is (rightly) described in the theological text-books; they do not say: 'I believe firmly and forever, with an irrevocable assent, everything that the Church teaches.' Or, if formularies of this kind are used at all, in practice these declarations are coloured by that sceptical relativism which affects all areas of consciousness today. Nevertheless, these people are Christians and Catholics.

This however is still far from being a sufficient answer to the question we raised. Is it possible to speak of a theological faith when there is nothing at all in the content of this 'faith' which is affirmed with an absolute assent of faith, when virtually everything that is 'believed' is [27] accepted and lived only with that relativity and provisional character which are typical of the present time? Or in such a faith must there not be somewhere and somehow an absolute assent at least to certain articles without which the traditional teaching cannot conceive faith? Certainly justice is not done to the Church's teaching, the absolute importance of faith for a person who determines himself for his eternal destiny only by an absolute disposal of his freedom is not understood, if we purely and simply drop the whole idea of an absolute assent of faith. But where and how can a phenomenological description of faith today discover such an absolute assent among average human beings or even among ordinary Catholics? We could of course say that, because of the multiplicity of possible matters of faith, because of the plurality of human consciousness and the impossibility of adequate reflection, there is no difficulty in assuming that a Catholic who wants in principle to be a believer will somewhere and somehow come to a matter of faith which he grasps with an absolute assent, even though it is impossible to say precisely what is this matter of faith. This statement is certainly not simply false, but in itself it is an over-simplification. It is certainly possible to say something about this question without merely appealing to the fact that in the consciousness of a Christian attached to the Church there must inevitably be one thing or another that he apprehends with an absolute assent.

To get any further here, it must be remembered that man's freedom, in so far as it is not merely freedom of choice of a particular categorial object within the unrestricted range of consciousness, but the possibility of an inalienable disposal by the subject of itself as a whole in a basic decision, always exists absolutely in one way or another in the adult human being. In other words, man does not exist as a permanently neutral subject, doing one thing after another freely in a temporal succession, but as a subject which has decided about itself in a fundamental option (which of course does not mean that such a basic decision once made can never be changed). While it can always be revised, such an existential-personal decision is by its very nature an absolute decision in freedom and consequently the gnoseological element is also absolutely affirmed in it and yet this affirmation is free. Hence it cannot be said that for someone who has reached the use of reason and freedom absolutely everything in his consciousness is apprehended only conditionally and provisionally in knowledge and freedom. Even if this were so in the objectifying and verbalizing representational consciousness, even if a particular individual in his reflection were not able to apprehend something [28] in his representational consciousness that he affirms as absolutely valid, if then in his reflective consciousness he were to mark every single objective reality of an external or internal character with the sign of sceptical relativism, none of this would prove that the free fundamental option in which the subject posits and understands himself is not an absolute assent in knowledge and freedom. At least the original protest of the subject against an absolute positing, the basic option for a universal sceptical relativism, would itself be an absolute positing. The necessity of an absolute decision is imposed on freedom, because the attempt at a universal abstention from such a decision in the concreteness of reality would itself be an absolute decision.

In the concrete order of reality however such a decision is always either belief or unbelief in the theological sense of the term. The freedom with which a person disposes of himself in a fundamental decision is the freedom of a subject with a 'supernatural existential', with an enduring actual offer of God, an offer presented to freedom as the innermost subjective principle of the orientation of men to the immediacy of God. The radicalizing of human transcendentality to the immediacy of God, which is involved in this continuous offering of supernatural grace, has the character of a revelation in the strictly theological sense of the term. If a person in his free, absolute self-understanding does not withdraw in culpable fear into his own finiteness but trustfully yields to the transcendentality of his mind oriented as it is to the incomprehensibility of God, he accepts himself in the transcendentality radicalized by grace to the immediacy of God: he believes and does so with an absolute assent. Even if someone tries to subject his representational and reflexive consciousness to a universal sceptical relativism, in the original, unreflecting realization of his freedom he is a believer or unbeliever with an absolute assent. Perhaps his inadequate means of reflection make it impossible for him to represent objectively the absoluteness of his fundamental option for belief or unbelief, but he does in fact believe or not believe, since a forthright existential abstention from a decision is impossible for the subject, placed as he is in his transcendental openness inescapably before God's gracious self-offering which he accepts or rejects.

Against this theory, which attempts to explain that even in face of a modern sceptical relativism an absolute assent of faith must be possible and does in fact occur, the objection might be raised that an absolute assent to a specific matter (or a particular aspect) of faith is not thereby made intelligible. This, it is claimed, is the kind of assent required by [29] traditional theology when the latter speaks of an absolute assent of faith: it must be an assent to this or that in particular, 'something' must be believed and Christian faith must not (as it seems to be with Bultmann) be reduced to a formal fides qua without an assignable fides quae. But, according to this theory, the absolute assent remains restricted to the assumption of the subject's own objectless transcendentality, even though the latter is understood as radicalized by grace to the immediacy of God. What must be said with regard to this objection which creates the impression that the theory put forward dissolves Christian faith in a sublime existential ontology, since – according to this theory – what is in fact believed cannot be understood at all as coming from an historical revelation?

There is a great deal to be said in response to this objection. In the first place the assent of faith envisaged in this theory is clearly established by God's free self-communication to man's transcendentality. But where God's free action is involved, history in a sense – but in a true sense – exists, even though this free act of God does not take place at a definite point in place and time as part of the course of history, but is always and everywhere the condition – freely posited, but perceived as such – of the possibility of salvation history. The dilemma that something either fits into history at a definite and particular place and is therefore historical or is part of an 'essence' which as such is unhistorical, is false. Moreover, it must be said that the free acceptance of man's reference to God's immediacy, established by grace, normally takes place, not in an isolated mystical interiority, but – like everything pertaining to man's transcendentality – is brought about by the encounter with an a posteriori 'objective reality' in other persons or in the environment. By his concrete encounter with his historical world a person becomes aware of himself and thus also of his transcendentality to God in himself radicalized by grace. This mediating historical reality as such does not itself necessarily have the character of being revealed in the strictly theological sense; in itself it can be secular and worldly, as long as it is assumed that it can mediate an act in which the subject really disposes of himself in freedom and accepts himself as he is: that is, also (implicitly) with its reference by grace to God.

Expressed in scholastic terminology: in the present order of salvation, in which by God's offer of himself man is ultimately referred always and everywhere to God's immediacy, it follows that every actus honestus is also in practice an actus salutaris, even if this act is not expressly concerned [30] with a revealed reality and motivation of an objective and verbalized nature (to deny this would be to contradict Vatican II, according to which even an atheist or a 'pagan' can posit a salutary act of faith). Such an objective reality, which has a moral significance and (at least implicitly) is in any case covered by the 'authority' of God (which indeed is an essential aspect of an actus honestus), can however be regarded in an adequate sense as a categorial object of revelation, even though it is not 'revealed' as such for its own sake nor (to express it better and more precisely) presented in this sense for our reflection. For it is certainly possible to deny at once that there is a moral object for an actus honestus which is not also revealed as such (however theology may explain more precisely the revealed character of matters that are already part of the natural moral law). But if the object of an actus honestus does not lie purely and simply outside the dimension of revelation and (this must not be overlooked) is grasped in the subject's mental activity as a whole, radicalized by grace and consequently no longer simply 'natural', then it can confidently be maintained that such a mediation to itself of the subject elevated by grace is to an adequate degree an object of revelation: that is, not only the fides qua but also the fides quae belonging to the sphere of revelation. These problems could perhaps be given a better and clearer treatment than has been attempted here. But they are problems not only arising from the thesis that an absolute assent is possible for every human being who is not culpably an unbeliever and that it exists even in today's mental climate of sceptical relativism, but also imposed on every theologian who does not reject Vatican II's optimism in regard to salvation, who does not deny the possibility of a really salvific faith even on the part of someone who in his reflection inculpably regards himself as a 'pagan' or atheist.

It may be said then that there will be many Christians and Catholics today who include at least in their reflective consciousness many individual dogmas of Christianity to which they do not give an absolute assent or which they even reject 'conjecturally' – reacting, that is, in a spirit of sceptical relativism – and thus very often finding themselves facing the question of whether they are still Christians and Catholics. From what has been said up to now it is possible to answer this last question in the affirmative, since even with such people there is or can be an absolute assent, since the 'rejection' of particular dogmas does not take the form of absolute unbelief in a theological sense: it is not really a public repudiation in the sight of the Church.

[31] It is from this standpoint that the question should be considered more closely in practical theology as to how such Christians and Catholics are to be treated in the course of concrete pastoral activity. They are often called 'marginal Catholics' as if theirs was a perfectly simple albeit very unstable relationship to the Church. From what has been said it should really be clear that this view is not as unproblematical as it is often assumed to be in the pastoral care of these people. The essential theological problem for practical theology does not lie in the simple fact that this is the state of the faith of some Catholics and is tacitly accepted and tolerated (which is what largely happens), but in the fact that they may be told to stay like that for the time being, so that they do not simply and completely turn their backs on the Church. An educated Catholic might be addressed, for instance, in this way: 'If you think you don't understand some particular dogma, that you can't grasp it inwardly, that you can't believe it, you should not say that the dogma is false, absurd and must simply be rejected; this does not fit in with your general mental attitude, your fundamental sceptical relativism. Don't get on your high horse as if you were a professional theologian making a final, academic decision about a particular question of theology. You would not deal with other metaphysical questions in that way. If on the other hand you affirm the ultimate basic substance of Christianity, the existence of God, a prayerful relationship to him, an ultimate trust in Jesus as the unsurpassable self-promise of God to you, if you practise also a religious life in the Church so far as this is declared by the Church to be really indispensable – and, if we look at it more closely, not very much is required – then you need not hesitate to regard yourself as a Catholic and you can confidently leave to the future the further development of your religious life, for which you want to remain open; you have no reason to think that intellectual honesty requires you to leave the Church.'

There is no doubt that some people are inclined as representatives of the Church to speak in this way to 'educated' Catholics at the present time. It should be clear from our reflections that it is permissible to speak in this way (with discretion of course and in a form adapted to the concrete case). At the same time (this must be stated explicitly once more) the dogma of the Church's teaching authority is not a special case for which an exception should be made. For precisely this absolute teaching authority of the Church is one of the dogmas which, despite its truth, a person today will find difficult to accept with an absolute assent of faith. And what has been said of the Church's dogma in general is true [32] also of this particular dogma. If such a dogma is not (yet) accepted with an absolute assent of faith, there can nevertheless be a faith in the form of an absolute assent (under given circumstances) in the theological and ecclesial sense. This is a thesis which may lead to the frontier between ecclesial and non-ecclesial Christians becoming somewhat less clear than had hitherto been the case. But for the Church's pastoral practice this frontier – although rarely considered as such – was always very vague and fluid. The thesis put forward here really does not change anything of this. All it does (and this is important) is to make possible an approach with a clear and secure theological conscience to very many modern Christians as they really are, to justify an attitude of frankness and sympathy towards such people. It is an attitude often adopted in practice, but it should also be based on a clear conscience.

WOMEN AND THE PRIESTHOOD

On 15 October 1976 the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith published with the approval of Pope Paul VI a 'Declaration on the Question of the Admission of Women to the Ministerial Priesthood'. In what follows we shall put forward some theological reflections on this declaration. These – if only because of the limits of space on the one hand and the vast range of the theme on the other – will be restricted to the properly theological aspect of the question involved and in fact to the theological aspect of this declaration, not to all the theological problems raised by the question of the possibility or non-possibility of the ordination of women as such. This restriction must be noted from the very outset. Consequently a number of questions are excluded which could be and perhaps ought to be raised in connection with our theme: questions emerging from a secular anthropology of the sexes, from the history of civilization, from an analysis of modern society with its demand for equality of the sexes, and so on. Neither are we dealing with all the present-day problems of pastoral theology which make the question of the admission of women to the priestly ministry relevant in quite a new way. If then we limit our reflections to the strictly theological aspect – that is, to the question as to whether it is certain that the Christian revelation in its unchangeable substance excludes women from the priestly ministry in the Catholic Church – we shall be able to avoid those emotions which so much affect the public debate on one side or another.

THE DECLARATION OF THE CONGREGATION FOR THE DOCTRINE OF THE FAITH OF 15 OCTOBER 1976

The Declaration of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, which takes up fifteen pages in the official translation,[*] begins within an introduction on the role of women in modern society and in the Church and is then divided into six parts. The first part refers to the 'constant tradition' which always and everywhere in the whole course of Church history (apart from some heretical sects) indisputably and uniformly excluded women from the priestly ministry, so that the magisterium never needed to intervene to reinforce a principle and a law which had never been questioned. In the second part the attitude of Christ is examined and it is pointed out that he did not call any woman 'to become part of the Twelve', although his attitude to women otherwise was quite different from that of his milieu and represents a deliberate and courageous break with it. The conclusion is drawn that Jesus intended in principle to exclude women from the 'priestly ministry for all times and under all sociological conditions, although it is admitted that a purely historical exegesis of the texts of Scripture does not 'make the matter immediately obvious'.

In a third section the Declaration refers to the practice of the Apostles who had a higher appreciation of women than Jewish customs suggested and were aware of emancipatory trends in the Hellenistic world. Yet they never thought of conferring ordination on women, since they were convinced of their duty of fidelity to the Lord on this point. In a fourth section of the Declaration the permanent value of the attitude of Jesus and the Apostles is stressed. It is said that their attitude cannot be shown to have been inspired solely by social and cultural motives, since in fact they disregarded these when they rose above the discriminations practised against women at the time. It is then also pointed out that the Church certainly has power over the sacraments with reference to the exact shaping of the outward sign and the details of their administration, but has no power over the substance of the sacraments. At the end of a none too lucid argument the conclusion is then drawn that the Church's practice of excluding women from the priesthood has a normative character. In any case therefore the Church's power over the sacraments [37] cannot be used as an argument for admitting women to the priesthood.

In the fifth and sixth parts the priesthood is considered in the light of the mystery of Christ and the Church in order to clarify with the aid of the 'analogy of faith' the conclusions reached in the first four parts. Since at the same time it is expressly observed that these reflections do not present a conclusive argument, but since their conclusions are apparent only to someone already convinced by the reasons actually invoked while making a very speculative impression on others, even though these sections occupy a comparatively large part of the Declaration, there is no need to refer to them at length in the present article. For reasons of space, therefore, we shall leave them aside in the course of our further reflections, while admitting of course that they very often provoke counter-questions and opposition.

THE THEOLOGICAL QUALIFICATION OF THE ROMAN DECLARATION

If a theologian seeking a strictly theological statement of the question does not approach the basic content of the Declaration from the outset with an unambiguously preconceived opinion or with strong but understandable feeling, if he is ready to respect in principle the teaching authority of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, he will first of all raise the question of the theological qualification of the Declaration. The answer must be given straightforwardly and without prejudice that it is an authentic declaration of the Roman authorities on faith. Such a declaration obviously carries a certain weight merely in virtue of the formal authority of the Roman magisterium, independently of the arguments put forward by that authority; it cannot be judged by a theologian simply as a statement by some other theologian, the importance of which would be no more than the importance of the arguments put forward. Nevertheless, despite papal approval, the Declaration is not a definitive decision; it is in principle reformable and it can (that is not to say a priori that it must) be erroneous.

If the Declaration appeals to an uninterrupted tradition, this appeal is not necessarily and justifiably an appeal to an absolutely and definitively binding tradition, an appeal to a tradition which simply presents and transmits a 'divine' revelation in the strict sense, since there is obviously a purely human tradition in the Church which offers no guarantee of [38] truth even if it has long been undisputed and taken for granted. With this Declaration, which has an authentic but not defining character, the fundamental question is whether the appeal is to a 'divine' or a merely human tradition. The decision itself of course seems to imply the former, but does not make this absolutely clear, particularly since it is admitted that hitherto the undisputed practice did not call for any more precise and closer reflection: that is, there has been scarcely any reflection on the precise nature of this tradition in actual practice.

We are then, dealing here, with an authentic but in principle reformable declaration from which error is not certainly a priori excluded and not with a simple reference to an absolutely certain doctrine of faith which is clearly and irreformably binding for other reasons. What should be the attitude of the theologian and believer to such an authentic but in principle reformable declaration of the Roman magisterium is perhaps expressed most clearly in the letter of the German bishops on 22 September 1967 to all those charged by the Church with the proclamation of the faith, which need not be quoted at length here.[1] This instruction speaks unashamedly of the fact that 'errors can occur and have occurred in the exercise of the Church's teaching authority', that the Church has always been aware of this possibility, says so in its theology and has worked out rules for dealing with the situation.

The situation of the theologian with regard to the theological qualification of the Roman Declaration in question is not a simple one. He must bring to such a decree the respect it deserves; nevertheless he has not only the right but also the duty of examining it critically and under certain circumstances of contradicting it. The theologian respects this decree by attempting to appreciate as impartially as possible the reasons it puts forward, by respecting as a matter of course the consequent practice of the Church as binding for him (at least for the present), by seeing as reinforced by the decree the conclusion that the general awareness of the Church in regard to the legitimate opportunities of women in the Church as a whole has not yet reached the point at which we could speak of a general change of awareness.

The theologian however has also the right and duty of critically examining this Roman Declaration, even to the point of regarding it as objectively erroneous in its basic thesis. In the nineteenth and twentieth [39] centuries (to say nothing at all about earlier times) there is a whole series of declarations of the Roman authorities on faith which have meanwhile been shown to be erroneous or at least largely obsolete. Such progress in knowledge is absolutely necessary for the effectiveness of the Church's proclamation and simply cannot be conceived in practice without this sort of critical co-operation on the part of the theologians. It might indeed be said that such processes of revision have frequently taken too slow a course during the past hundred and fifty years, to the detriment of the Church, because theologians exercised their indispensable function too nervously and under the threat of the Church's disciplinary measures. With the increasingly rapid development and change of awareness in secular society today, these processes of revision can sometimes become more urgent and require more than formerly the honest and sincere work of theologians, even if this is wearisome and can at first expect little gratitude or recognition on the part of the Roman magisterium.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE ARGUMENTATION

In these circumstances the theologian has the right and duty to examine the arguments contained in the decree and to assume that, if this examination produces a negative result, the basic thesis of the Roman Declaration can itself be questioned and even be impugned as erroneous. What then is the value of the arguments put forward in the second to the fourth section of the Roman Declaration? (As we said earlier, we are leaving aside the fifth and sixth sections of the Declaration, since this argument from the 'analogy of faith' is admitted there to be convincing only to someone who has accepted the basic thesis in virtue of the arguments in the second to the fourth section.) The essential argument of the Declaration takes the lint that the practice of Jesus and the Apostles, which makes no suggestion of the ordination of women to the priesthood, cannot be explained in the light of the sociological and cultural situation at the time and therefore assumes an intention on the part of Jesus which is not historically and sociologically conditioned: that is, it holds for all times and must be respected faithfully by the Church at all times. This argument is clarified by a reference to the fact that Jesus (and, up to a point, also Paul) in his sociological and religious appraisal of women took up a position completely opposed to the depreciation of women at [40] the time and thus could have spoken out against the exclusion of women from positions of leadership in a secular or religious community, if he too had regarded this exclusion as caused merely by the sociological situation at the time. What must be said about these arguments?

Before reaching the crucial point of our own opinion after a proper critique of this argumentation, here are some brief preliminary observations. In the entire course of the argumentation it is never made sufficiently clear on whom the burden of proof really lies in the whole controversy. If the Declaration says, for example, that the opposite thesis is not and cannot be proved, it shifts the real burden of proof to its opponents. But is this really justified as long as the basic thesis of the Declaration has not been established as certain or (in other words) when at least the possibility must be envisaged of explaining the practice of Jesus and the Apostles simply by the sociological and cultural conditions of their time, particularly since the Declaration admits that some of Paul's ordinances on the behaviour of women are influenced by 'the customs of the period' and therefore 'no longer have a normative value'?

The argumentation of the Declaration is defective also in other ways. Thus the transition from the concept of the apostle and the Twelve to the concept of the priest (and bishop) in the Declaration is too simple to fit in with our present-day knowledge of the origins, structure and organization of the primitive Church. If we appreciate the difficulties created by these discoveries, which cannot be ignored, we may wonder whether it is possible to deduce from Jesus' choice of men for the college of the Twelve any definite and unambiguous conclusions with regard to the question of an ordinary, simple leader of the community and president of the eucharistic celebration in a particular congregation of a later period. The Declaration leaves out all the difficult questions about the concrete emergence of the Church and its origin from Jesus, although they are of the greatest importance for its theme.

It might also be asked whether, in view of the cultural and sociological situation at the time on the one hand and the 'immediate expectation' (generally admitted today as a fact) on the other, it is possible to look at all to Jesus and the Apostles for a plan in regard to the structure of the communities which (over and above what might be deduced for the Church from the event of salvation in Jesus' death and resurrection) could really be related to later times unambiguously and for ever.

Nor does the Declaration make use of a clear and comprehensive concept of the priestly ministry. In the fifth and sixth sections especially [41] the proper function of the priest seems to be restricted more or less to the sacramental power of consecration, so that we almost get the impression that the Declaration would be prepared to concede to women practically all ecclesiastical functions except this one (and 'the official and public proclamation of the message', which hardly seems consistent with Jesus' commission to the women – mentioned in the second section – 'to take the first paschal message to the Apostles themselves'). But there can be no doubt that such a narrowing down of the concept of 'priest' must rouse very serious dogmatic and particularly pastoral misgivings.

The Declaration admits that its arguments 'do not make the matter immediately obvious'. If it has been established that a particular statement is indeed part of the content of revelation, we certainly cannot expect the arguments to make this 'immediately obvious'. But what is the situation if such a statement has not been proved to be certainly contained in revelation, if in particular the question persists as to whether a long and undisputed practice of the Church (and the teaching implied in it) rests on a truly divine revelation or represents merely a human tradition, which can also exist for a long time and be undisputed in the Church and yet need not be revealed and can even be erroneous or possess no permanent normative value? In such cases it cannot simply be maintained that a theological argument does not need to be immediately obvious from the historical exegesis of the texts, even if it is admitted that the term 'obvious' is very ambiguous and that there are many varieties and degrees of 'obviousness'.

WAS THE ATTITUDE OF JESUS AND THE APOSTLES CULTURALLY AND SOCIOLOGICALLY CONDITIONED?

We come finally to the crucial point in the argumentation of the Roman Declaration. Once more a preliminary observation must be made. A practical rule of action can be culturally and sociologically conditioned and be open to change and actually changed as a result of a changed cultural and sociological situation and yet at an earlier stage may not only have existed and been sociologically recognized, but may even have been morally binding. Such a situation and the rules derived from it may have been 'objectively' opposed to more general and more fundamental moral principles also recognized and affirmed at the time, but not then seen or only slowly seen clearly as opposed in the consciousness of a [42] society. As a result the more general principle only slowly changed the situation in that society and made it aware of a new and more concrete rule of action, although previously a contrary concrete rule not only existed in fact but was at the time morally permitted or even binding, since it was impossible or only possible by immoral violence to change the sociological situation from which it had emerged.

This fundamental consideration certainly does not need to be supported by examples or substantiated in principle. If someone wants examples, he has only to recall the institution of slavery during the first Christian centuries, polygamy in the Old Testament, the laws of war in the Old Testament, or the Church's prohibition of usury until well into the eighteenth century. In all these cases it is decisively important to observe that a concrete rule of action coexisted with more general moral principles, while being really 'in the abstract' opposed to the latter, although this basic contradiction could not in practice be perceived in the earlier sociological situation. Hence this particular rule of action could be permitted, rebus sic stantibus, and even be required, thus slowing down change in the situation on which it depended.

If we keep in mind these assumptions – obvious enough in themselves – then we can say confidently and with adequately certain historical knowledge that in the cultural and sociological situation at the time Jesus and the early Church could not in practice have considered and still less set up any female congregational leaders or presidents of the eucharistic celebration; their procedure could even have been morally required in the light of the existing concrete situation; in their concrete situation they simply did not need to observe and could not have observed a contradiction 'as such' and in the abstract between their general appreciation of woman (in which they dissociated themselves from the mentality of their time) and their concrete practice with the concrete rules that this implied, any more than Jesus or Paul could have been expected to notice explicitly the contradiction between their fundamental appreciation of human dignity and the acceptance of slavery as it existed at the time and still less to attempt expressly to oppose and to abolish this slavery.

The practical existence of a situation causing and explaining all this is not disproved by pointing to the fact that even under these conditions there were marginal phenomena which were really opposed to the cultural and sociological situation as a whole, since such unnoticed and in the last resort unnoticeable contradictions are an essential part of human existence and of the continual change in the course of history. But [43] Judaism in Jesus' time (as is clearly noticeable still in Paul's writings) was based on a male domination so much taken for granted that it is quite impossible to think that Jesus and his Apostles (and with them their Hellenistic congregations under the influence of Judaism) could have abolished or even have been permitted to abolish this male preponderance in their congregations, despite the more fundamental and more general recognition of the equal dignity and equal rights of women which they themselves were bringing about in the religious sphere and – up to a point – even within the dimension of secular society.

At the same time the fact should not be overlooked that, if its basic thesis is not assumed as a priori certain, the burden of proof evidently lies with the Declaration and not with its opponents. In any case the cultural and sociological situation with regard to the position of women at the time of Jesus was such that there would have been considerable resistance (if nothing more) to the appointment of women as leaders in the congregations. At the same time the question must be considered from the standpoint of leadership in the congregation and not from that of strictly sacramental powers, if we are not a priori to interpret the primitive Church quite unhistorically while overlooking the fact that there is no immediate evidence of a special power over the Eucharist anywhere in the New Testament. If then in any case there are cultural and sociological reasons for not making a woman leader of the congregation, it ought to be clearly proved that these reasons are not of themselves sufficient to explain the attitude of Jesus and the Apostles. But the Declaration makes no attempt to provide such a proof.

Moreover, if it is assumed that Jesus and the Apostles had different and more substantial reasons for their action than the existing cultural and sociological situation, then it should be explained more precisely and in detail in what these other reasons consist; otherwise their attitude would appear to be based on an arbitrary decision. But in this respect too the Declaration is completely silent. The mere fact that Jesus was of the male sex is no answer here, since it is not clear that a person acting with Christ's mandate and in that sense (but not otherwise) in persona Christi must at the same time represent Christ precisely in his maleness. But if we were to appeal to the 'divine order of creation' in order to find and try to develop such reasons, then it would certainly be difficult (as is evident from the mistaken arguments of the Fathers of the Church and the medieval theologians) to avoid appealing to an anthropology which [44] would again threaten what the Declaration recognizes as the equal dignity and equal rights of woman.

It is not possible at this point to set out in detail the historical material explaining why Jesus and the Apostles in their concrete cultural and sociological milieu could not (without attempting what was impossible at the time) have thought of appointing women to be properly speaking leaders of the congregation or to preside at the Eucharist or even why nothing of this kind could have emerged in that situation as a serious possibility; why the assumption of such an outlook on their part would be like expecting them expressly to oppose the institution of slavery at the time or at least to abolish it among Christians, merely because they were convinced of the fundamental equality and dignity of all men. For the historical material in general the reader must be referred to the specialist works of reference. For the non-specialist the material (including additional literature) presented and evaluated by Haye van der Meer in his book Priestertum der Frau?[2] is still adequate.

If in scrutinizing and evaluating this historical material we must differentiate between the Jewish and the Hellenistic milieu (on which the Declaration insists), this distinction in the last resort is of little importance for our question, since the structure of a Hellenistic Christian community was considerably influenced by primitive Jewish Christianity and since there was serious discrimination against women also in the Hellenistic milieu; the existence of priestesses in some of the cults of pagan deities (cults which were deeply loathed anyway by Christians under the influence of Judaism) made no difference to this. What otherwise is the explanation of the fact that the Fathers of the Church (and also the medieval theologians) under the influence of Hellenistic society and philosophy enormously depreciated woman – as the Declaration itself admits, albeit somewhat tentatively – and that they brought forward largely these (and not other) reasons against the admission of women to the priesthood, if they had other and better reasons based on the gospel? Once again the historical material will not and cannot be set out here.

If however the assumptions stated above and the methodical considerations likewise merely indicated can be recognized, then the conclusion seems inescapable that the attitude of Jesus and his Apostles is sufficiently [45] explained by the cultural and sociological milieu in which they acted and had to act as they did, while their behaviour did not need to have a normative significance for all times – that is, for the time when this cultural and social milieu had been substantially changed. It does not seem to be proved that the actual behaviour of Jesus and the Apostles implies a norm of divine revelation in the strict sense of the term. This practice (even if it existed for a long time and without being questioned) can certainly be understood as 'human' tradition like other traditions in the Church which were once unquestioned, had existed for a long time and nevertheless became obsolete as a result of a sociological and cultural change.

THE DISCUSSION MUST CONTINUE

The theologian is now faced with a Declaration of the Roman magisterium, authentic but open to revision and reform, which he must treat with respect while having the right and duty to consider it critically. To some theologians at least and perhaps to many such a critical examination seems to show that the arguments of the Declaration are not adequate. Hence all that we can say is that the discussion may and must continue on the problem at issue even after this Declaration; the discussion is not yet at an end and it cannot consist merely in a defence of the basic thesis and arguments of the Declaration. If this is the state of affairs, then the discussion must no longer be centred merely on the dogmatic question in the strict sense, whether in the attitude of Jesus and the Apostles there is or is not implied a doctrine of revelation properly so called.

The discussion must and can be extended again to all the aspects and questions which have been more explicitly or freshly involved in the theological discussion of the last decades. These include questions about the sociological emancipation of woman in theory and practice, questions about the consequences of woman's sociological emancipation in the life of the Church (questions which are there anyway), questions about overcoming discrimination against women in the Church (a discrimination which is still far from being eliminated, even if we disregard our main theme); questions about the authentic and integral essential image of the priest, which cannot be restricted to his purely sacramental power; questions about present-day requirements for the structure of a Christian congregation and about the function of women in the Church [46] as determined by that structure; questions about the concrete methods and measures by which the discrimination against women in Church and society persisting before and after merely theoretical ideals can be effectively overcome in life and in society and about the different requirements in different cultural groups; questions about ways and means of educating and changing the consciousness of the Church as a whole, where the causes of such a change of consciousness are to be found and what are the factors preventing it, how and in what form due consideration can and must be given – in accordance with Paul's teaching – to the 'weakness' of this consciousness in many members and parts of the Church (a matter which is of great importance also for our main question); questions of principle finally about methods, how in fact the essential problem that occupies us here must be realistically tackled and surmounted (questions which are still far from finding a clear and generally accepted solution in detail, since we really have no clear answer, for example, to the problem of how to distinguish in principle between a 'divine' tradition and a generally and long-enduring 'human' tradition).

Our main problem ought to be set against the background of all the questions and of the answers to them, if we are to hope for an answer to it in the foreseeable future: an answer on which believers in the Church and the magisterium in Rome can be in complete agreement in theory and practice. Despite its argumentation, theology also is always and simply cannot fail to be historically conditioned and dependent on the pre-scientific milieu, on cultural and sociological preconceptions, attitudes and experiences of life, on the ethos of a society and its life-style. These assumptions can sometimes be very variable, but cannot be changed merely by theoretical scientific reflection, but in the last resort only by life and history in freedom, action and decision.

If in this way the total situation of woman in the society and also in the Church of the immediate future is everywhere further changed, if defenders and opponents of the Declaration work for it, since such a common effort is possible and necessary and since the still persisting discriminations against women in the Church are admitted by both sides, then the common effort can bring about that cultural and religious situation in which the problem of the Declaration still remaining but at present insoluble in practice in the Church can be left to await a solution acceptable to all sides. In other words, when woman has acquired practically and institutionally in the Church that importance which as such she ought to have, which this Declaration also concedes to her in practice [47] but which in fact she does not yet possess, then only are the vital presuppositions present for a solution satisfying to all sides of the main problem which occupied us here. Then we can and must wait patiently to see how the solution turns out.

This of course is not to say that until then a moratorium must be declared in theology. Theology ought even now to continue its reflections, since this effort too can and must help to bring about that mental and religious outlook which is a necessary presupposition of a generally accepted solution of the problem. The opponents of the Roman Declaration will of course even now think and hope that a development will lead to a clarification of the Church's sense of faith which will prove them right; they will regard such a development as analogous to that which led from Gregory XVI and from Pius IX's Syllabus to the Pastoral Constitution Gaudium et Spes and the Declaration on Religious Freedom at the last council. But, as we said, we can wait for all this with patience and confidence. Nevertheless, too many demands must not be imposed on this patience, for time presses and we cannot wait again for a hundred years for an analogous development without detriment to the Church.

The Roman Declaration says that in this question the Church must remain faithful to Jesus Christ. This is of course true in principle. But what fidelity means in connection with this problem remains an open question. Consequently the discussion must continue. Cautiously, with mutual respect, critical of bad arguments on both sides, critical of irrelevant emotionalism expressly or tacitly influencing both sides, but also with that courage for historical change which is part of the fidelity which the Church owes to its Lord.

THE CHURCH'S RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE FREEDOM OF THE INDIVIDUAL

So many obscure questions are implicit in this theme, its scope as such is so wide, that I must from the outset issue a warning and offer an apology for the fact that my treatment of it is very fragmentary and my selection of the points it offers for reflection and discussion very arbitrary. For what is freedom? Does anything like this exist at all? Is freedom not a lovely mirage hovering behind genetic, psychological and sociological determinisms and constraints? How are we to define philosophically the concept of freedom? How are we to make clear the transcendental necessity compelling man, despite the sheer factuality of his existence, to see himself as a subject of freedom, even though his reflection never enables him adequately to distinguish in his concrete action between the consequences of the factors determining his existence and the inescapable and inalienable consequences of his freedom. What are we supposed to be talking about when we use this term 'freedom'? About freedom and the scope for freedom in a society, despite and as opposed to its power-structures, freedom of the subject as such against internal constraints and overpowering forces in his own nature with all its strata, the unity and distinction between these two freedoms? What is meant by that freedom in Paul's sense which is the essence and peculiarity of redemption, justification and grace? What is the relationship of this freedom as eschatological possession of salvation to man's freedoms from internal and external constraints and from alienations? What is the relationship between the will and hope for eschatological freedom, which is ultimately God's gift, and the will and hope for a greater socio-political freedom?

What has the Church to do with all this? Is it the mediator of that [52] eschatological freedom which comes from God in the liberation by grace from all 'authorities and powers' enslaving man externally and, even more, internally? Has the Church – which of course is also a society – from its very nature a mandate to promote greater freedom within itself?[1] Is it not itself also continually in danger of becoming enslaved to that very thing which it is its proper mandate to oppose. Why in its proclamation and theology is there so comparatively little talk of that freedom which is notably at the heart of Pauline teaching on salvation? Why is the proclamation of the law so far from being clearly the proclamation of the freedom of the Christian, aware in his immediacy to God of only one 'law': that is, the law of freedom in the Spirit of God himself who is love? What is the Church's task in regard to all the aspirations and struggles of nations, of groups and individuals, for more freedom, emancipation, the abolition of illegitimate power-structures in the world? Has it any such task? How did it fulfil its task in the past? Did it betray this? What is the position today? The theme contains thousands of questions and those mentioned are certainly not all.

The first thing I want to say about this endless theme – and, however paradoxical it may sound, it amounts to a contribution of the Church to the freedom of the individual – is that Christian teaching as upheld by the Church holds, not that man is simply free but that real, true, total and definitive freedom consists in the eschatological possession of salvation itself which, although secretly effective in history, is the sheer gift of God bringing history to its end.

The normal adult human being has of course up to a point a psychological freedom of choice which in the last resort is not merely oriented to particular objects in his life but is identified with himself as one and whole and – through the transcendentality of this freedom of decision – places him beyond the particular deed and its individual objects in a free relationship to the ground of all reality and freedom, to God. However obscure in many respects the enigmas connected with this psychological freedom of choice may be, Christianity (at least Catholic Christianity) maintains firmly that it is the precondition of the salvation-event and of [53] man's final destiny: that is, it invites the individual always to allow for the fact that in the concrete course of his life he performs acts for which he can never entirely escape responsibility, even though reflection does not show him with absolute certainty what in his individual action is the result of his free decision and what is the result of the influence on him of already existing predetermining factors. But this freedom of choice – which can be realized at least by accepting or by protesting against the plain facts of his existence – does not itself simply make man free in the sense and in every respect in which he wants ultimately to be free or in the way freedom is promised him as definitive possession of salvation.

Creaturely freedom always starts out from internal (psychological) and external (historical and sociological) existing facts, always operates with existing material from which no further selection is made, and in this sense is always finite, limited and self-alienated. Subjectively infinite freedom is always restricted by the material on which it has to work. The individual (by what is in the last resort an act of self-deception) can regard his freedom as so much in harmony with the existing internal and external facts that he acquires a kind of philistine self-satisfaction and simply does not notice the hiatus between the subjectively infinite claim of freedom and the opportunities actually offered by the available material. For Christian anthropology however the repression of this unresolved hiatus in the last resort is not a laudable act of sober and unpretentious realism but the sin of a truly commonplace person renouncing his freedom's supreme claim to be infinite (explicitly or by repressing it), because he does not find any fulfilment immediately in himself or in the palpable and usable opportunities among the persons and things surrounding him.

The forthright realism of Christianity assures us that our freedom is finite, that the restrictedness and stubborn facts of the psychological, historical and sociological material of our freedom can never be abolished in the course of history, not even as a result of the greatest psychological and sociological changes for the better in our state of freedom; as long as our earthly history endures, we are always faced with the unresolved contradiction between the claim of our freedom and its actual opportunities; in this sense we are not free, our freedom can be liberated only by the act of God giving himself. This hard basic statement of Christian anthropology has a dual significance.

It disenchants man, who is always in danger of succumbing to the divine intoxication of his freedom's infinite claim, of thinking that it [54] needs only one or another of the practicable changes in his internal or sociological situation for him to be infinitely free. Christianity deprives man of his illusion that infinite freedom can be attained in the course of history itself, shows him that man's impiety and self-destructiveness in the truest and most immediate sense of these terms lead him to look for such Utopias; that, by the very fact of struggling, albeit legitimately, for greater scope for psychological and sociological freedom, man continually produces new limitations of his own or another's freedom; that no possible genetic, psychological or sociological manipulation can produce the absolutely free human being, since this very manipulation must inevitably start out from certain limited, existing facts and then in turn produce the actual conditions for the other person's freedom and which are rightly regarded by the latter as restrictions of his freedom.

This kind of disenchantment has a truly positive significance in man's struggle for more freedom, for greater scope for freedom for the individual, for more and better material to be placed at the disposal of the individual for his free self-realization. It cannot of course be denied that this disenchantment carries with it the danger and the temptation – realized often enough in the history of Christianity – of abandoning the struggle for greater freedom, since everything might be changed but not improved, since every struggle for greater freedom only leads again and again to new constraints and self-alienations. If this terrible danger to Christian teaching on the freedom which in history always remains finite and on the permanent hiatus between the infinite claim of the subject of freedom and the historically always merely finite opportunities for the realization of freedom must always be seen clearly and continually brought to mind afresh in face of the guilt of historical Christianity, then this sober realism will have at bottom a positive significance precisely for the struggle for greater freedom.

The person thus disenchanted is better protected against Utopias in the bad sense: that is, against those which are the result of an outrageous monomania and assert the impossible claim to construct concrete reality in the light of a single principle, thus ultimately having a destructive influence on man. This realistic outlook prevents us from simply sacrificing man today to man tomorrow, from seeing the present merely and monotonously as that which must be outdated as quickly as possible by a future. Such sobriety can prevent a person from 'enjoying' the good opportunities of the present time with what is really a bad conscience, too readily open to suggestion: a bad conscience, since the present opportunities [55] of freedom, being finite, derive their legitimacy solely from the fact that they can be surpassed and thus lead into a greater future. This Christian realism in estimating the actual opportunities of freedom has a further significance.

When a person does not succumb to an absolute banality of carpe diem in face of the finite scope of his freedom, he will not endure the unresolved hiatus between the absolute claim of freedom and its finite opportunities of realization within history unless he believes and hopes in what Christianity calls the eternal Kingdom of God: the realization of absolute freedom for the immediate 'possession' of God, which is approached throughout the course of history but actually attained only by the consummation and dissolution of history. But if someone does believe and hope, he is free here and now in a unique way in regard to the finite goods of freedom which are presented to him to possess and enjoy. Hoping for an absolute fulfilment, he can place himself at a distance from his finite present; he does not need to make this absolute. But, as a result of this very realism, he can approach more frankly and courageously even a future that is possible in this world; he can take the risk of giving up his experience and enjoyment of the present for the sake of a merely creatively surmised, almost utopian future more easily and unhesitatingly than if he were faced with the dilemma either of having to defend unconditionally a present that is finite or of simply failing in the end to seize on a future that is not attained or is again unmasked as nothing more than a different form of internal or external constraints and self-alienations. A hopeful faith in a consummation of freedom by God is also a risk, and indeed the supreme risk of which man is capable; but it is only this faith which frees man from the necessity of clinging to the illusion that the future which can be realized in this world will one day be the realm of absolute freedom.

Christian realism in face of the opportunities of freedom within history, rightly understood, does not paralyse man, forcing him to a passive acceptance of the present, to sterile conservatism, but gives him as a human being and a Christian the right to take a risk without the assurance of certain success, since success and failure are embraced together by the one promise of a definitive liberation of freedom for its immeasurable consummation. If Christianity and the Church thus proclaim realistically the impossibility of a consummation of freedom within history, this does not mean that they have set up any concrete programmes and directives as to how even in the present world man can always struggle [56] afresh to gain more scope for freedom in his interior and exterior existence while his history continues – which is certainly his duty – but they have given to man's freedom an infinite promise; this they give even to someone who perishes as a victim in this struggle within history; in an evenly balanced dialectic between present and future they protect the person who is rightly hungry for the future from what might be merely self-destructive Utopias. None of this of course means removing or minimizing the torment of individual historical decisions, the conflicts between concrete projects of an internal and external future of individuals and sociological groups, the harsh necessity of these conflicts and antagonisms; but for the individual all this struggle and all the risk is for a future which is always finite and uncertain, threatened by failure, but nevertheless enveloped by an ultimately ineffable peace, a future possessed by the person who knows that fidelity to conscience and unselfish service to others lead in the end to a fall into God's blessed freedom, whether this fall appears in the world to be victory or defeat. The Church's gospel of Christian realism is and remains the primary service that Christianity performs for the freedom of the individual and society.

II

Since this primary service belongs purely and simply to the nature of the gospel and the Church, I think that the Church has always provided it for man up to a point and in a variety of ways, often enough anonymously. That is not to deny of course that in its ministry and its people the Church has failed frequently and terribly to fulfil this task of promoting the freedom of the individual. Only too often, naively or culpably, it has certainly been associated with the powerful, presented its message as opium of the people, glorified in a conservative spirit the existing state of affairs which was not good and where freedom was lacking, and issued warnings against projects for the future which could have brought and often – contrary to its wishes and prognoses – did bring greater freedom. It is certainly therefore also the task of the Church honestly to admit the guilt it has incurred and in a spirit of self-criticism to ask how it might now and in the future better serve the individual's intramundane and sociological freedom. If raised here and now the question would have to be broken down into many individual questions and separate answers given to each of these.

[57] Conscious of the fact that we are making a very arbitrary selection, we shall attempt to provide two answers in particular. Without giving a more detailed or precise explanation, we start out from the assumption that the Catholic Church, despite the permanence of its ultimate nature and its ultimate sociological structure, is open in principle to very far-reaching changes in its concrete structures. In the light of this assumption, if the Church would cautiously and courageously carry out such structural changes, we think that these changes in its own structure could be useful for the freedom of the individual in his secular life and promote the individual's freedom in secular society.

The fact that people in the Church believe in the living Lord of all history and in what he has promised to be the blessed outcome of this history; that people in the Church hope against all the hopelessness which is repeatedly justified by history; that there is prayer in the Church; that the Church regards itself as responsible for the poor and oppressed, for those who have had a raw deal in history and for the dead; that it prevents history (as J. B. Metz puts it) from being merely a history of the victors and those who have got off lightly; that the Church always maintains a position in the world from which both the assured tradition and the enticing future can be realistically and critically questioned and which does not permit any tangible reality in history to pretend, either in theory or in practice, to be God: these and many other things in the Church's faith and life can also be of the greatest importance for secular society in the future as they were in the past, more important than we here can explain. But, since we are asking about the importance of structural change in the Church for secular society and for the freedom of the individual and not about the importance of the Church as such for the world, the limitation imposed on our reflections here is legitimate and necessary.

Two possible consequences of structural change in the Church will now be considered. They can only be very vaguely indicated. And the question largely remains obscure and uncertain whether the peculiarities of this structural change in the Church can really have consequences for secular society: that is, whether and how such changes can be transferred into the secular sphere and can instigate analogous structures in secular society. If something of this kind were possible, if these new structures – which as such should be produced in the Church in the light of the latter's minority status – could be reproduced analogously in secular society, if the minority status of the Church were to force it – in view of [58] its own needs – to form such structures more rapidly than is possible in secular society, then, despite the Church's minority status in a pluralist society, there might perhaps again come a time when the Church would not be trying to catch up with secular historical change but would be setting an example by going ahead of this. We certainly do not need to make our Christian faith and our membership of the Church dependent on such a hope, but neither should we a priori forbid this hope, as if it was certain that the Church's power to make history to a considerable extent in the present world had been clearly exhausted.

COMMON CONVICTIONS IN CHURCH AND SOCIETY

In order to come to the primary contribution of the Church envisaged here, we may start at a point which at first sight seems to have little to do with our problem. I venture to suggest that a secular society together with its institutions, even though it regards itself as liberal and pluralistic, cannot manage or exist without a certain foundation of common convictions respected by all who belong to that society. I do not think that this basis of common convictions – which cannot either consist in the very obvious usefulness of certain rules of life and institutionalisms or be replaced by the sheer brute force of the state – can simply consist in an absolutely inexhaustible heritage of tradition from the past or be continually regenerated simply and solely from man's nature, without society itself having the task, duty and necessity of deliberately working with its own means on the maintenance, necessary regeneration and transformation of this foundation. In the light of the dignity of every human being, I am also sure that in principle all have the power and opportunity to undertake the task of preserving and bringing this foundation up to date, but in the concrete it must be undertaken mainly by those who actually exercise power – that is, by the state. At the same time I assume that state and society are never identical in the concrete and that such an identity would not even be desirable. Desirable though it may be to break down power-structures, to eliminate the constraints and self-alienation in which human beings are involved, I also assume – because of the impossibility of considering adequately all processes of decision in the individual and in society and the consequent impossibility for authority (as determining cause of the individual's scope for freedom prior to his consent) to give adequately clear expression in institutional [59] form to these processes of decision – that there will always be some who are more powerful and others less powerful in the state and therefore the task of preserving this foundation will lie with those who exercise power in a state and must be achieved by power.

In my opinion therefore the only question can be how the power of the state attempts concretely to obtain the necessary and continually freshly renewed regeneration of the foundation of common convictions and rules of life necessary to a society, while leaving as much scope as possible for freedom of opinion and freedom to shape one's own life. As can be seen at a glance anywhere in the world, without going into details here, this continually renewed attempt to establish the coexistence of freedom of opinion together with its public manifestation and concrete realization on the one hand and of the positive cultivation on the other of a common sociological basic conviction in the whole world, in communist and western (democratic or more or less authoritarian) societies and states, is a very difficult task and cannot be solved simply by a radical option for one side or the other. And, if we take seriously the historicity of all human truth, it is also obvious that it is impossible to find any formal principles which could simply be applied in order to solve the problem once and for all in a concrete society and to spare the latter the embarrassment of seeking, experimenting and struggling for an historical decision without a visible arbitrator. On the other hand, this does not mean that it is impossible to develop better models than those which previously existed to show how this continually renewed struggle between freedom of opinion and the necessity of a common 'ideology' of society (if the term is understood in a neutral sense) can be conducted with mutual respect and a balance – even though precarious and always merely temporary – be found between the two coexisting factors. It can be stated here without further arguments that such new models are necessary but largely lacking in secular society everywhere in the world.

In this respect the Church with its structures and structural changes might set an example but is not yet in a position to do so adequately, since it has not yet properly developed the models for the balance of authority and freedom in the internal life of the Church which its minority status requires it to provide. In the past the Church undoubtedly developed for the protection of its common beliefs authoritarian forms which are no longer effective today in view of its minority status and the impossibility of appealing to the 'secular arm', when the person against whose opinion the protest of the Church and its magisterium is directed accepts in [60] principle the Church's teaching authority. Even for authentic declarations of the magisterium a comparatively wide consensus in the Church's sense of faith and in the Church's theology is an assumption without which the magisterium cannot act legitimately at all and still less be really effective. With the present pluralism in theology, which can never be completely overcome, with the frequent absence of obviously common horizons of understanding, with historical or historicist reflection on the formerly wholly disregarded horizons of understanding, assumptions and their historical relativity, a statement of the Church's magisterium commonly recognized as binding on all and understood by all is no longer so easy. A statement of this kind, which the Church's magisterium finds it easy to make in an authentic but not defining declaration, will mostly not be very effectively binding or make a very effective impact on the actual awareness of the Church's members.

New definitions of the magisterium today however, as distinct from those of former times in a different mental climate and in a different climate of belief, presuppose so many conditions that are difficult to fulfil that definitions going beyond an emphatic repetition of older defined statements can be expected only rarely or not at all in the future. The historically considered or unconsidered variety of horizons of understanding which cannot be really synthesized in the concrete awareness of the individual or of the officials of the Church's magisterium, over and above the difficulties which have always existed, today create an increasingly disturbing question as to whether even the officially valid formulations of faith really express the same beliefs as those which are present in the awareness of the individual members of the Church and of the diverse groups in the Church. The doctrine of the hierarchy of truths in the Second Vatican Council and the ecumenical efforts to bring about a union of the Churches which will not involve the abandonment of diversity in their histories of faith also show that the uniformity of the sense of faith as conceived in the measures of the Church's magisterium in the past as its presupposition and task is not so easy to maintain and establish as it was once thought. In addition there are all the peculiarities of the human condition today for which the Church's magisterium must make allowances in a way different from that adopted in former times when the good faith of the individual believer or theologian apparently deviating from the Church's sense of faith was not taken for granted as it must be today in a society that proclaims freedom of conscience.

With what has just been said and much more that really ought to be [61] added, we do not mean of course that we in the Church know already how today as distinct from formerly the authority of the ecclesial community of the same faith and the authority of freedom must be made mutually compatible, what institutionalisms there ought to be in the Church today so that authority and the enduring importance of the magisterium can coexist in a positive (even though perhaps always somewhat strained) fashion with freedom of conscience, the further historical development of the Church's sense of faith – which cannot simply be controlled by the teaching office – with the legitimate freedom of theology and with the diversity of the development of the individual's sense of faith, which is not simply identical with the Church's sense of faith and which may nevertheless be publicly made known. Nor of course does what we have said mean that secular society must adopt the same style as that in which the Church in the future must overcome the difficulties involved in our question. For this, sociological and ecclesial awareness are too diverse in origin, content and goal. But, since the new problems arising here for the Church and for secular society to a large extent have a common cause, by working more quickly on this question and finding more quickly forms of institution to cope with the outstanding problems, the Church could also set an example for secular society as long as it did not relapse into a more or less medieval set-up but were to look for a way in which freedom of thought and the maintenance and further development of a common basic conviction, without which a society must break down, can coexist and exercise a vital influence on one another.

I shall not attempt to put forward any further considerations as to how in the Church a liberal, anti-authoritarian and yet effective function of the Church's magisterium could be conceived today or tomorrow. For this a long haul would be required; and, incidentally, it must also be remembered that the politically constituted secular society on the one hand and the Church within a pluralistic society on the other are distinguished by the fact that it is not possible to get out of the former while it is possible to leave the latter, resulting in a very complicated dialectic of a dual character with reference to strictness and mildness in interpreting the different requirements for membership of the one or the other society. For this question also a new ecclesiology needs to be developed with reference to an ecclesiological marginality – a state which is still mainly considered as that of the 'catechumen', which does not get us much further.

A theology of the coexistence of apparently merely logically inconsistent [62] propositions ought to be developed, so far as these exist on existentially and sociologically different planes and in this light are by no means actually 'incompatible'. So we might continue. But it is not possible now. All that can be said is that the Church ought to develop new ways of acting and new forms of institution for the coexistence in the Church of freedom of belief and a commonly binding profession of faith; since such a development can be more rapid (if we want it to be), the Church could set an example up to a point for the solution of an analogous problem of modern society, which is more or less helpless in face of the dilemma between an ideology of society and the state imposed by authority and an increasingly rapid disappearance of common basic convictions without which society cannot exist except by being turned into anarchy or being placed under the tyranny of an enforced ideology.

THE CHURCH AS MINORITY IN SOCIETY

In a minority situation in which neither the Church itself nor its ministry is supported by the power of the secular society, it is clear that the groups freely emerging at the base must and will acquire quite a new importance for the Church as such and also for its ministry and for the effectiveness of the latter. Of course we ought now to explain more precisely what this means, how initiatives for such free activity from the base were developed at Vatican II, what trends exist for a further development of these initiatives, how greatly such efforts have been frustrated since the council, whether and under what conditions and assumptions these more personal basic communities can be regarded as basic cells of the Church today, how they are related to traditional parishes, what new image of the priest and his function can and must be derived from them. And so on. We cannot go into all these things here. But, in this minority situation in which the Church is no longer propped up by secular sociological powers, it is obvious that it can be seen increasingly only as a Church from below and no longer (from the sociological standpoint) as a Church facing its people, that relations between base and ministry will and must be given a form very different from that to which we have been accustomed. Similarly structures and institutions must be changed.

It seems to me however that an analogous problem exists in secular society. Whether it is a question of western democracies with their very diverse interpretations of the term ‘democracy’ or of socialist countries [63] with their very diverse forms of party-oligarchies, everywhere in the world the relationship between the mass, the base, the people, on the one hand, and the elitist controlling bodies on the other seems to be disturbed. The distance between the two sides seems to be too great; parliamentary representative democracy is losing respect and not infrequently gives the impression that it is merely a façade behind which other forces and agencies exercise uncontrolled power, the identity of these small and mostly anonymous groups holding power being in the last resort irrelevant. And if in socialist countries the people is supposed to be the active carrier of the economy and the state itself, here too – as a result of the various attempts to find really genuinely practicable models – it can be seen that the basic problem remains the same: how – that is, on what principles and with what technical means – the enormous mass of a people, educated up to a point and consequently not to be kept in a state of tutelage, can be brought into closer contact with the indispensable machinery of the higher functionaries so that a decision by the people itself becomes possible. In this matter also situation, task and means are quite certainly very different in the Church and in secular society. But the active participation from below on the part of the base in the decisions of the controlling powers represents a problem common to Church and society. There is a search for new forms and structures for this participation; even in the West we cannot assume that everything is clear in regard to this question and that we must merely be loyal to the democratic constitution or shape one in a purer form.

Might not the Church in its own sphere develop a model solution to this problem which could then be helpful to those trying to cope with the same problem in the secular sphere? Long ago it was said: ‘See how these Christians love one another.’ Could we hope that one day people might say: ‘See how they really live with one another in freedom and with as few constraints as possible'? All this is of course very vague and the hope just expressed is consequently very utopian, particularly since there is still scarcely any understanding or desire in the Church for such far-reaching structural changes and since such an attitude will presumably become more obvious and inescapable only when the Church and its ministry are made more generally aware of the minority status of the Church and its inexorable consequences. But might not the Church's sense of responsibility for secular society, proclaimed afresh at Vatican II, permit it to become more clearly aware of its duty and more determined so to shape its own structures for the relationship between base [64] and ministry that they will provide a valuable example also for secular society and for the realization of the freedom of the individual; that the old models will not continue to be the basis of human life together in the Church long after they have been abandoned as obsolete in secular society?

THEOLOGICAL JUSTIFICATION OF THE CHURCH'S DEVELOPMENT WORK

On the theme here presented for our reflections, as it is expressed in the title, from the very nature of the case, more could and really should be said and said more precisely than is possible in these few pages. With the reservation, then, that much that is important and perhaps more fundamental is being disregarded, we may put forward here some reflections on the question why even apparently secular development aid is one of the tasks which the Church by its very nature must undertake, although of course development aid is never a task and obligation for the Church (for its authority and its people) alone. But at this very point the question arises: why must the Church also be concerned with development aid if other sociological agencies and authorities are mainly bound to do the same thing? The question becomes even more difficult when we recall the fact that the Church can have and will have an ultimate – its own specific – motivation for such a task, but evidently may not regard the latter merely as a means to an end (openly or tacitly), as a means to those tasks and ends at which it aims by its very nature: that is, it must not see and utilize development aid as publicity material and as a way of entry for the evangelization and Christianization of the peoples, as a superficial reading, for instance, of the Decree of Vatican II on missionary activity might suggest.[1] In its radical form therefore the question is obviously: How can a task be that of the Church as such and at the same time remain within what seems to be essentially a wholly secular sphere?

Although it seems to hold also for other activities which the Church [66] still undertakes today, this idea seems to contradict a priori that distinction, which has become increasingly clear in recent centuries and has been increasingly accepted unreservedly by the Church, between the religious sphere properly so called, for which the Church is responsible, and the secular sphere, for which secular society has a more or less independent responsibility. In raising this question we assume that development aid is really a genuine task for the Church and not merely undertaken in a subsidiary fashion when those who are properly called to the work do not sufficiently match up to their task and responsibility. In answering this question we assume moreover that a task which is that of churchgoing Christians is also that of the Church as such (to some extent and in some way), even though this assumption leaves many questions still open and many distinctions disregarded which should be considered if we regard the task of Christians as that of the Church. Despite the many problems it involves, this assumption can presumably be made here, since Misereor[*] – of its nature and despite its more or less official ecclesiastical character – is based, at least for its effectiveness, on the free will of individual Christians in the Church.

We shall try to answer the question from two aspects: that of love and that of hope, since the Church must be a community of love and the eschatological hope of the world.

Has there been sufficient and sufficiently radical reflection in the Church's traditional theology[2] on the words of Jesus making Christian existence and salvation consist in a duality – not in itself bad – of love of God and love of neighbour which can be raised up to a higher unity, a duality in which, as a unity, the two commandments are equal to one another? Has this theology been sufficiently influenced and challenged to radical reflection by Paul's saying that whoever loves his neighbour has fulfilled the law? Has the theology of the unity of love of God and love of neighbour, which is put forward in a rudimentary form in the first letter of John, really become a theme which is squarely faced in traditional theology? Has there been sufficient reflection on the fact that, according [67] to Jesus' speech on the judgement in Matthew 25, men are judged – it might almost be said 'atheistically' – solely in the light of their attitude to their neighbour?

Imagine that these (and similar) texts, to which we have just referred, were not in sacred Scripture but had been formulated by a modern theologian. What would 'normal' theology then say? It would certainly say that love of neighbour is indeed a commandment of the infinite, holy God, the observance of which is binding on anyone who wants to love God with his whole heart and must therefore fulfil his commandments; the two precepts however cannot be placed alongside one another as of equal importance, but the second must be subsumed under the first as a simple and somewhat remote conclusion from it. This theology would say that love of neighbour is far from being the fulfilment of the whole law. It would say that it is possible to know for certain by reason and faith the existence of a personal God, although we cannot see him, and hence we can have a personal relationship with him that is not brought about by loving our neighbour whom we do see, even though this love of neighbour is a commandment of the same God and must be fulfilled. This theology would say that it is an unpardonable curtailment of the idea of the last judgement to suggest that man is not judged there according to the first tablet of the Law.

Of course it cannot be our task here to give an adequate answer exegetically, systematically and existentially-ontologically to the problems indicated. But evidently such an answer must bring out a greater unity and a clearer mutual integration of love of God and love of neighbour than is suggested in the theory of run-of-the-mill-theology as outlined above. Love of neighbour (we are only indicating a possible way towards a solution), when it reaches its full nature and its ultimate depths, must itself be explicitly or perhaps only unthematically and implicitly but nevertheless truly love of God; real love of God, which enables us to love and is productive of salvation, cannot be attained in a purely theoretical reflection (however important this may be), but only at the point where and when a person achieves that total self-realization and that radical self-transcendence which in fact is brought about only in love for our neighbour and there knows, at least unthematically, what is meant by God as condition of the possibility of such personal self-transcendence. If what we have just suggested is correct (as the presupposition of a full understanding of the words of Scripture to which we referred and whose importance must not be minimized), then we must [68] conclude that in the last resort (despite the distinction between love of God and love of neighbour and despite a categorial pluralism of the concrete realizations of love of neighbour in individual cases and in the different requirements of life and society) love of neighbour is not an individual task to be fulfilled within a particular area of human life, but a universal determinant of human existence as one and whole, a determinant which must expressly or tacitly affect and make its mark on all that is good and salvational in human life.

In the whole extent of categorial, historical and sociological life there are of course many realities and achievements which are different, do not mean the same, among which one can be present while the other is absent. But, as distinct from individual tasks and achievements in this historical and sociological spatiotemporality, that which really can and must be called love of neighbour in its basic nature is more deeply rooted in human existence and thus brings the totality of this existence and not merely one area of it to its true and full nature and in fact to God. From this standpoint (if what has been said were developed at greater length and more precisely substantiated) it could be made clear that in principle in human life there must always be a thematicized, explicitly religious attitude and worship of God, but that this does not mean that love of neighbour is merely a particular area of this human life, lying outside the field of man's relationship to God and thus linked with that relationship at most by a formally conceived precept of this God. When it reaches its real and full nature and is really selfless (not merely a reasonable compromise between egoisms), love of neighbour is itself a religious attitude, love of God, whether it explicitly thematizes this nature of its own or not.

From all this we may conclude on the other hand that explicitly denominational religion expressed in specific forms of worship (in the purity and radicalness in which it comes to us from revelation and grace) cannot be indifferent to its own self-realization precisely in love of neighbour, discovers itself in its full nature only if it abandons itself and loses itself up to a point to those dimensions of an apparently secular, worldly character in which the 'secular' and 'worldly' realizations of love of neighbour take place. To some extent love of God must forget itself in love of neighbour in order to reach its own full nature and simultaneously its ever freshly productive source. What at first sight is the secularity of love of neighbour is the source and sphere of realization of the love of God itself as such. The secular world exists where it is the sphere of [69] man's total self-realization (which it can and ultimately must be, since love of neighbour must be concretely realized in the 'world'), established as such by love of neighbour – which is love of God – since the latter needs this space in which love really seeks and finds the other person, without returning to itself or being absorbed in itself.

At this point two things must be remembered. Firstly, the Church as one and not merely as the external sum-total of individuals, and also as an historical and sociological factor, is the subject of love of God and neighbour. As one it must realize and attest love of neighbour in historical and sociological tangibility. It must do so always out of love of God, but truly out of self-forgetting love of neighbour, reaching and remaining with the other person and precisely in this way finding its own ground and its own potential, which is love of God: thus love of God and love of neighbour justify one another mutually in their distinction and unity. The secularity, the very worldliness of the world is consequently the field also of the self-realization of the Church as one, in so far as the latter is the sociologically constituted community of love. Secondly, love of neighbour – at least today in the present state of the world in which sociological structures are not merely simple facts, but also the object of man's freedom to plan – is not merely a private relationship between individuals within the static, existing structures of society. Love of neighbour has as its concrete object the changing of these sociological conditions under which love of neighbour as a private activity has to be practised. Changing society in order to provide more opportunities of love of neighbour, man's sociopolitical and socio-critical task, the struggle for greater freedom and justice: all these are requirements and tasks of love of neighbour, if the latter is understood rightly, in this rapidly changing but planned society. And thus – at least today – the love which the Church is expected to live and attest by its action has also this task. It shares the task, as we said at the very beginning, with other sociological groups and authorities, even though its relationship in the task with these other groups and authorities cannot be more precisely defined. But it cannot simply leave this task merely to other groups and authorities alone, since it would otherwise betray the love of neighbour which in fact it must itself practise and attest and which it cannot simply leave to others.

Misereor must be seen against this background of understanding (here of course merely indicated and needing more profound and precise expression in a variety of ways). At the same time – important as this [70] question is in itself – we are not concerned here with the constitution and the exact legal status of Misereor. Whether Misereor (although inaugurated and promoted by authority from above) is to be seen more as an institution formed and sustained from the base of the Church or as a really official ecclesiastical agency or as a mixture of the two possibilities, of which there are many examples in the Church, need not be considered here. For both authority and the people of the Church (also as such) are charged with the task of active love: a love that goes out to the other person in the 'world' and is not understood as a means to something else, however sublime; a love that carries with it a will to justice and, today at least, has also sociopolitical tasks; a love that carries with it as its condition and ultimate ground God's love for us as it became eschatologically irreversible and victorious in Jesus Christ and our love for God in Jesus Christ. But this is a love that can become so 'worldly' precisely because it has to be given to our neighbour purely and simply, and not only to those who belong to the household of the faith, because it must be extended as widely as God's love for man is itself extended. In a word, it is love seen from the Christian standpoint: not merely an inward disposition, but something that must be realized in action in which alone a person really gets away from himself. The peculiarity of Misereor is that it is a task – and one which is particularly urgent in the present world-situation – of that love which constitutes the Church and which in the last resort is the only total and comprehensive way of access to the knowledge of God and to his love.

We must consider Misereor from yet another aspect, in order to make clear up to a point at least its theological location. In the Dogmatic Constitution, Lumen Gentium, of Vatican II, in n35, we read that lay-people ought to show themselves to be 'children of the promise, . . . strong in faith and hope', awaiting the glory to come. This hope (says the Council) they must not conceal in the depths of their hearts, but must express it in turning to God and in struggle 'even in the framework of secular life'. Christian hope of definitive freedom, reconciliation and glory, being an eschatological gift of God and not the autonomous work of man realizable in history, is often under suspicion as 'opium of the people', as destructive of the courage and action needed in the historical struggle in the present world for greater freedom and justice. There should really be no dispute about the fact that in practice Christian eschatological hope has often exercised an influence in this wrong direction. In this connection it would be possible to produce plenty of factual [71] evidence and even passages from the declarations of the magisterium. But in principle this is not and cannot be the situation, even though the ultimate proof of the opposite cannot be established by theoretical considerations or by referring back to the past history of the Church with its contributions to greater freedom and justice and emancipation, but only by the action of Christians today for a better world and its society. In principle it must be clear that the eschatological hope of Christians for a final reconciliation does not discourage or weaken the struggle for a better world here and now, but even endows that struggle with a final absoluteness, despite the relativity and provisional character of all that it can achieve in the course of history.

The eschatological hope of Christians awaits the consummation dissolving history as sovereign deed and gift of God himself, since this consummation in God's self-communication (called grace and glory) consists in an immediacy which alone can reconcile and dissolve the contradictions of this world. But this eschatological gift of God is addressed to man's act of freedom and can reach the latter only by producing this very act by its own power. This act of freedom, which accepts the gift of God, is realized however, not only in a dimension of interiority, of spirituality, of mysticism, of a quietist and pietist attitude, but in all the breadth and depth of human existence which (as indicated above) is essentially also love of neighbour. The other person, who is loved, is the sacrament in which we receive God. But this also means essentially that Christian hope is brought to its own nature and its own fullness by an intramundane hope. If this were not so, how could the Council say that the eschatological hope of Christians must also find expression 'in the framework of secular life', through the vitae saecularis structurae? If God's eternal life is to 'be hoped for in truth and action, this cannot come about by making absolute in practice the goods of this world as they exist in the concrete, while getting a kind of reassurance from the fact that eternal life is granted at the moment when the goods of this world and this life, once held absolutely firmly, are snatched away from us.

Christian hope can be what it must be as a genuine and total act of life only if it relativizes the goods we possess and is thus in truth and not merely in an optimal pious ideology a profession of faith in God's eternal life. This relativization however is not merely negative. It makes us free for other possibilities in the present world. It relativizes the here and now existing (sometimes positive) realities of life and society; it makes us free and open for future possibilities of history and society; it makes us free [72] for an unprejudiced approach to a still open, uncontrollable and even dangerous future; it is a critique and rejection of a false, merely static conservatism, defending only things as they exist, without courage for risk or for any experiment which cannot be adequately calculated at every turn. Anyone who really has a genuine eschatological hope and wants to realize it can do so only by acquiring a real receptivity for an open future in the present world. The Christian should really be the last person to cling absolutely to what remains of his present happiness, while explaining merely ideologically that in his pietist interiority he also has his mind on eternity. In order to hope for what is not yet possessed, it is necessary also to let go of what we possess here and now. This holds for the Christian in his hope also for the sociological dimensions in which his love and his hope must (also) be realized and brought home to themselves. Only someone who is prepared here for change and experiment – which, despite all necessary planning, can never be adequately calculated in advance – can be a hoping Christian, whose hope also decides his eternal salvation. In his hope the Christian rises above all attempts to establish autonomously as a secular Utopia the definitive kingdom of reconciliation and above a hardened conservatism clinging absolutely to present possessions, since he does not know (beyond what can clearly be calculated) whether something better is coming in the future.

Misereor then is an action and institution of Christian hope. Misereor demands aid which makes the helper poorer without promising him that in the long term (which he perhaps will not experience himself) his assistance will turn out to be clearly and certainly advantageous and useful to him. In the last resort Misereor does not appeal to a well-understood self-interest, but to the hope of eternal life which implies courage and power to give up intramundane values already possessed in an act of faith which by this very fact realizes and simultaneously attests hope in God himself. Development aid, regarded as a purely secular effort to provide economic assistance, might be no more than a desperate attempt to balance off a number of egoisms (perhaps justified in themselves) against each other. To this secular enterprise Misereor brings a surplus of courage for unselfish, self-risking adventure, without denying that the same kind of loving hope might also exist outside the Church as a sociological institution, among 'anonymous' Christians.

We have attempted to make clear the fact that, in the present-day unity of the world and in its sociological and economic situation, development [73] aid is required as task and duty also and particularly from the Church if the latter is really to be seen as the community of Christian love and hope. If it has such a task, then its activity enters into the secular field of the world. This must not be merely the disposition and action of individual Christians, but also the action of the Church as such, whether represented by its authority or by groups which expressly belong to it. We have thus touched on the problem why and how – despite the actual autonomy of the world with its own spheres of action – the Church as such can and must make its impact on this field and be made relevant within this dimension, without setting out the implications of the problem and still less producing a solution of it. But it seems that the theological problem qua theological must not necessarily be considered here. For if we do not adopt a totalitarian theory of the state, assigning to the latter alone all sociopolitical questions and tasks, but concede to other sociological groups their autonomous right to undertake such tasks in a free pluralist and democratic society, then we cannot deny the same right to the Church also in our society when it claims this in the light of its own self-understanding.

Future of the Church

BASIC THEOLOGICAL INTERPRETATION OF THE SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL

If we are to discuss here a basic theological interpretation of the Second Vatican Council, it is certainly appropriate to make a few preliminary remarks about the treatment of the essential theme. If we speak of a basic interpretation, we mean one which is not imposed on the Council from outside, but suggested by the Council itself, so that here basic nature and basic interpretation amount to the same thing. The assumption of this basic interpretation is of course the fact and the assurance that this Council, despite the historical contingencies involved in such an event, was not merely an arbitrary accumulation of individual events and decisions, but an internal essential coherence of incidents which was not produced merely by its formal juridical character. At the same time and in the last resort it is irrelevant how far, how clearly and how urgently the organizers of the Council had this basic conception explicitly in mind. If the meaning and nature of existentially important events in the life of an individual human being encompass more than this individual explicitly objectifies and aims at in his consciousness, this is even more true of important events in the history of the Church which to a specifically unique extent are under the direction of the Spirit of the Church. If we are able to say about John XXIII's explicit intentions in regard to the Council not much more than that this Pope regarded a council as appropriate and opportune even after Vatican I with its 'papalism' and that he wanted a 'pastoral' council, this does not mean that a basic theological conception of a deeper and more comprehensive kind was not possible.

We are looking for a basic theological interpretation, because – without being able here to enter more precisely into the problem of the [78] relationship between theology and church history – we think that church history is specifically distinct from secular history and in the last resort has to describe particularly the history of the nature of the Church, a nature which both supplies the hermeneutic principle of church history and is itself – as nature in history – revealed from this history in a mutual relationship of dependence.

Difficult as it may be to understand and although it can be expressed only in a rudimentary way, we must attempt to formulate in advance the basic idea with which the question raised is concerned, so that we do not lose sight of the coherence of the many individual observations and individual considerations. What we are saying is that the Second Vatican Council is the beginning of a tentative approach by the Church to the discovery and official realization of itself as world-Church. This thesis may seem exaggerated and it certainly needs to be explained much more precisely before it can be made to sound acceptable. It is of course also misleading if only because the Church was always in potentia world-Church and because the actualizing of this potentiality itself involved a long historical process of coming-to-be, the origins of which coincide with the beginning of European colonialism and of the modern world-mission of the Church from the sixteenth century, an actualizing which is not completely finished even today. But if we look at the macroscopic and official action of the Church and at the same time become more clearly aware that the concrete, real activity of the Church – despite the contradiction to its own nature involved in its attitude to the world outside Europe – was what we might venture to describe as that of an export firm, exporting to the whole world a European religion along with other elements of this supposedly superior culture and civilization, and not really attempting to change the commodity, then it seems appropriate and justified to regard Vatican II as the first great official event in which the Church came to be realized as world-Church.

There were of course precedents for this event: for example, the consecration of native bishops (but for the most part only in the present century), the discontinuance in missionary practice of Europeanisms which had been consolidated by Rome in the Eastern Rites controversy, and so on. The significance of these precedents is not to be concealed or minimized, but it must also be observed that they had no repercussions on the European – North American church until their influence began to be felt at Vatican II. At that point they could be seen simply as precedents for what we observed – albeit only rudimentarily and tentatively, [79] often overlaid by the former style of the European church – at Vatican II, when a world-Church began to act as such with all its parts exercising a reciprocal influence on one another.

In this general thesis on the basic conception of Vatican II, as already mentioned, it cannot be denied that the actualization of the Church's nature as world-Church was manifested at the Council only in a very rudimentary way and hesitatingly. Nor can it be concealed that there are movements in the opposite direction. Can we be certain, for instance, that the danger will be avoided in the coming years of the new canon law, now being prepared in Rome, emerging as a western canon law but being imposed on the world-Church in Latin America, Asia and Africa? Have not the Roman Congregations always had the mentality of a centralized bureaucracy, claiming to know what is best everywhere in the world for the service of the Kingdom of God and the salvation of souls and do not their decisions appear to be shockingly naive, based as they are on the assumption that the Roman or Italian mentality is the obvious standard of judgement? It must of course be admitted that the theoretical problems arising from the Europeanization of the Church are anything but clear. Must the marital morality of the Masai in East Africa be substantially no more than a repetition of the morality of European Christianity or would it not be possible for an African chief, even if he is a Christian, to live in the style of the Patriarch Abraham? Must the Eucharist be celebrated even in Alaska with wine from the grape? These and similar questions perhaps not infrequently present theoretical impediments to the actualization of the world-Church as such. Together with many other reasons they explain why the great official actualization of the world-Church as such was manifested only more or less rudimentarily and hesitantly at Vatican II. At the Mass before the individual sessions, in which the different rites of the Church were represented, there was still no African dancing to be seen.

Finally, in regard to the manifestation of the world-Church as such at the Council and afterwards, the fact cannot be overlooked that the individual cultures in the world, to which the Church must be culturally adapted in order to be a world-Church, are themselves involved today in change to an extent and at a speed hitherto unknown, so that it is not easy to say what really valuable material for the future the individual cultures might offer to enable this Church really to become a world-Church. Whatever may be the answer to this question, it cannot be denied that the Church was officially manifested at the highest level at [80] Vatican II for the first time as world-Church. In what follows this statement will be more concretely substantiated, considered and questioned in regard to future consequences.

In the first place the Council was for the first time in a formal way a Council of the world-Church as such. We need only compare it with Vatican I to see its uniqueness in the formal juridical sense. It is true that there were representatives of episcopal sees in Asia or Africa present at Vatican I. But these were missionary bishops of European or American origin. At that time there was not yet a native episcopate anywhere in the Church. But one appeared at Vatican II. Perhaps this was far from being proportionate to the representation from European episcopates. But it was there. These bishops did not come as individual, simple visitors, ad limina to give an account of their dioceses and to take home missionary alms; Vatican II really was a first assembly of the world-episcopate, not acting as an advisory body to the Pope, but with him and under him as itself the supreme teaching and decision-making authority in the Church. There really was a world-council with a world-episcopate such as had not hitherto existed and with its own autonomous function. The actual significance of the non-European part of this total episcopate may have been comparatively slight; the consequences of this conciliar event for the post-conciliar life of the Church may still be very limited, as the Roman synods of bishops have shown since then; none of this alters the essential fact that the Council made manifest and brought into activity a Church which was no longer the European church with its American areas of dissemination and its exports to Asia and Africa. Here, under the guise of a natural and gradual development, something like a qualitative leap took place, even though this new nature of a world-Church that is not only in potentia but also in actu is still largely obscured by the particular characteristics of the older European church.

The meaning of this leap to the world-Church can be seen more clearly in a glance at the decrees of this council. The Constitution on the Liturgy – as far as the use of the vernacular is concerned – may already be essentially obsolete; without it and without the Council the victory of the vernacular would not have been conceivable. Latin had its origins in secular life and there became the common standard language of educated people. It was for this reason and not really for any other that it became the language of the liturgy in the western Church and remained so long after it had lost its importance elsewhere. But, as the language of a small and particular cultural sphere, Latin could not be the language of a [81] world-Church. The victory of the vernacular languages in the Church's liturgy is a clear and urgent signal of the coming-to-be of a world-Church, with its particular churches each existing autarchically in its own cultural group, rooted in that culture and no longer exported from Europe. It is of course also the signal of all the new problems of a world-Church whose non-European particular churches – despite their bonds with Rome – can no longer be governed by Europe and the European mentality.

In Gaudium et Spes, in an act of the whole Church as such, the Church as a whole became expressly aware of its responsibility for the future history of mankind. Although in detail it is largely the expression of a European mentality, the fact remains that this Constitution reveals the presence of the Third World as part of the Church and as the object of the latter's responsibility. Although it is only with great difficulty and terribly slowly that European churchgoers are becoming aware of the Church's world-responsibility, this responsibility, political theology, can no longer be excluded from the consciousness of a world-Church.

As far as the dogmatic decrees of the Council – on the Church and on Divine Revelation – are concerned, much that is said there emerges from a specifically European mentality and the problems considered are mainly or solely relevant to a European theology. But it can be said that an effort has been made in these decrees to produce statements that are not much affected by the linguistic style of a neoscholastic theology and can be more easily made intelligible in the whole world. This becomes more obvious if we compare these texts with the corresponding late neoscholastic schemata which had been prepared in Rome before the Council. It is possible also to point to the fact that in the teaching on the episcopate as a whole and its function in the Church and on the importance of regional particular churches doctrinal assumptions were set up or elucidated which are fundamental to the Church's understanding of itself as world-Church. We may well think that the Constitution on revelation – which assumes that revelation begins in the Old Testament, with Abraham – does not exactly present a concept of 'revelation' which is easily accessible to African and Asian cultures, particularly since the millennia between 'primitive revelation' and Abraham remain unfilled.

We can however show that the Council in its teaching did two things which are of fundamental importance for a world-wide missionary activity. In the Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions, for the first time in the history of the Church's [82] teaching, the way was prepared for a positive appraisal of the great world-religions. Moreover, in the Constitution on the Church, in the Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity and in Gaudium et Spes, a salvific will of God – even after the Fall – is proclaimed as so universal and effective that it can be restricted only by a person's decision made with a bad conscience and at no other point; an opportunity of really salvific faith in revelation is admitted even outside Christian verbal revelation, which is such that – by comparison with earlier theology – basic assumptions for the world-Church's world-mission are created which had not previously existed. It is against this background that we can see the Declaration on Religious Freedom, in which the Church expressly renounces for all situations in the whole world the use of any powers in proclaiming its message that are not implied in the power of the gospel itself. Everyone knows what a great impediment the division of the Churches in Christendom is to the propagation of Christianity in the whole world, in what were known as the 'missionary countries'. That is why all ecumenical activities which the Council itself developed, approved or instigated, must be appreciated as contributions of the Council to Christianity's becoming a world-Church. In a word, at this Council, at least in a rudimentary way, the Church in its teaching began to act as a world-Church. We might say that, under the still largely existing phenotype of a European and North American Church, it made itself apparent as the genotype of a world-Church as such.

Perhaps however we can attempt to grasp this process of the coming-to-be of a world-Church at a somewhat deeper level. Those who are concerned with ecclesiastical historiography rightly struggle continually to find a theologically appropriate division of church history. At least it is clear that the division of European history into antiquity, Middle Ages and modern times is not a theologically satisfying scheme for church history. We are of course leaving aside here the question of a theologically appropriate subdivision of the great epochs of church history. Moreover, in regard to history in general and the history of the Church in particular, we are sure that there is not as much happening nor is it equally important in each individual section of history, measured as a period of time, while a comparatively short period of time can represent a great epoch in history. In the light of these assumptions, from the theological standpoint, we can say that there are three great epochs in church history, the third of which has only just begun and was authoritatively brought to notice at Vatican II:

1. The short period of Judaeo-Christianity;
2. The period of the Church in a particular cultural group, that of Hellenism and European culture and civilization;
3. The period in which the Church's living space is from the very outset the whole world.

These three periods, representing three essential basic situations of Christianity, of its proclamation and of the Church, distinct from each other, can of course for their own part be subdivided in a very far-reaching way: so, for instance, the second period by the caesurae marking the transition from antiquity to the Middle Ages and the transition from medieval civilization at the time of European colonialism and of the Enlightenment; at the same time the causes of these caesurae – which are frequent and nevertheless connected with each other – would have to be made clear.

I think that this tripartite division of church history as such is theologically correct, even though the first period was very brief. This first period of Judaeo-Christianity (together with its own specific repercussions through Jewish proselytism and the phenomenon of the 'God-fearers', the eusebomenoi, known from Philo, the Acts of the Apostles and Jewish propaganda literature) derives its peculiarity and singularity from the fact that its mental climate is that of the fundamental Christian salvation-event as such – the death and resurrection of Jesus himself – and the proclamation of this event within its own historical situation (not in any other situation) is in fact proclamation in Israel and to Israel. Precisely because something like a mission to the Gentiles had become completely conceivable on this basis, it is clear that what Paul inaugurated – the transition from a Judaeo-Christianity to a Christianity of the Gentiles as such – is not something theologically obvious, but introduces a radically new period of church history, a Christianity that was not an export of Judaeo-Christianity to the Diaspora, but – despite its relatedness to the historical Jesus – a Christianity that grew out of the soil of paganism. I know that all this is vague and not very clear. But I think this is due in the last resort to the fact that the theological problems involved in this transition from Judaeo-Christianity to Gentile Christianity are not at all as simple as people think and that the difficulties have never been properly cleared up. Hence it is not by any means completely clear what Paul 'started' when he declared that circumcision and all that it involved was superfluous for non-Jews (and perhaps only for them).

[84] However this may be, if we want a more precise and truly theological division of church history up to now, it seems to me that the suggested tripartite division is the only right one. It means that the transition from one historical and theological situation into an essentially new one happened only once before in the history of Christianity and is now set to occur for the second time in the transition from the Christianity of Europe (with its American appendages) to an actual world-religion. We can risk making an assertion like this of course only if we regard the transition from the ancient Gentile Christianity of the Mediterranean world to the medieval and modern Christianity of Europe as less theologically incisive than the two caesurae with which we are concerned here. But this seems completely justified in view of the unity of the Roman Hellenistic Mediterranean culture and its transmission to the Germanic peoples – a unity that need not be examined more closely here.

If what has just been said is at all correct, two questions arise: firstly, in what precisely does the theological and not merely cultural-historical singularity of such a transition, or such a caesura, consist? and secondly, what follows if we apply the theology of this transition to the transition in which we are living today and for which Vatican II was a kind of official ecclesiastical beginning?

So far as the first question is concerned, we can at least say that it refers to an event that is theologically relevant and part of salvation-history, not merely relevant to the history of civilization. This, it seems to me, is obvious from Paul's writings. The abolition of circumcision for Gentile Christians, which he proclaimed – an abolition which Jesus certainly did not foresee and can certainly scarcely be conclusively deduced from his explicit proclamation and from the importance for salvation of his death and resurrection – is for Paul a principle that belongs to his gospel and in some sense a part of revelation; it is an interruption of a continuity of salvation-history which man cannot bring about on his own authority. In this way there arises the theological question properly so called – which even Paul did not sufficiently consider – of what could and must remain from the salvation-history and the Church of the Old Testament if this reality of circumcision, embracing for every Jew the ultimate substance of his existence as oriented to salvation, is abolished and yet – according to Paul – could and should remain for the Jewish Christians of his own time.[1] For him this transition really involved a caesura [85] in the original sense of the term. It should also be remembered that many other abrogations and interruptions in salvation history were linked with this caesura: the abolition of the Sabbath, the transference of the centre of the Church from Jerusalem to Rome, far-reaching modifications in moral teaching, the emergence of new canonical Scriptures with priority over the old, etc. For us here it is unimportant whether these drastic changes can be shown to have the support of Jesus or explicitly only that of Paul or whether they took place otherwise and elsewhere during the apostolic age. Since, even as distinct from patristic and medieval theology, there is no clear and explicitly considered theology of this caesura, of this new beginning of Christianity with Paul as its inaugurator, and since it will have to be worked out gradually only in a dialogue with the Synagogue of today, no one can blame me for not being able to say anything beyond the suggestions already made. And yet I would like to take the risk of putting forward the thesis that today we are for the first time living again in a period of a caesura like that involved in the transition from Judaeo-Christianity to Gentile Christianity.

Is it possible to put forward this thesis and in the light of it explain that Vatican II derives its importance from the fact that it proclaimed – even though only in a rudimentary and vague sort of fashion – a transition from the western Church to the world-Church similar in character to the transition which occurred for the first and only time when the Church ceased to be the Church of the Jews and became the Church of the Gentiles? Once again, I think that this question can be answered in the affirmative. Obviously this does not mean that these two caesurae and transitions are simply alike in their content. No historical event occurs twice. And if someone insists that the caesura inaugurated by Paul has peculiarities also in a formal-theological sense which are not repeated and that therefore the transition to a world-Church is not in every respect comparable to the transition from the Christianity of the Jewish Jesus to the Christianity of Paul, I shall certainly not contradict him. Neither do I doubt that such transitions occur for the most part without premeditation; they are not first thought out and planned in theological terms and only afterwards put into effect, but are realized more or less spontaneously out of a secret instinct of the Spirit and of grace, although what occurs at the same time by way of reflection is not to be despised or regarded as superfluous. With these reservations I would like to affirm and defend this thesis which I put forward.

First of all, I venture to assert that the difference between the historical [86] situation of Judaeo-Christianity and the situation into which Paul transplanted Christianity as in a radically new creation was not greater than the difference between European culture and the modern cultures of Asia and Africa as a whole to which Christianity has to be adapted, if it is really to become the world-Church it has begun to be. The modern difference may be concealed up to a point by the fact that a stratum of the rational-industrial culture of Europe and the USA lies above these other cultures, reducing them to the same level and so disguising the difference between our culture and the other cultures that it is possible to gain the impression that Christianity continues to reach any point in the whole world in the form of a commodity exported from the West and bringing with it the dubious blessings of the West. But, apart from the fact that there was a parallel to this in antiquity – the Diaspora of the Jews with their proselytism (and the phenomenon of the ‘God-fearers’ which alone made this possible) in the whole world – on the basis of which a Judaeo-Christianity might apparently have sent its exports all over the ancient world, the modern history of the missions shows with comparatively slight exceptions that Christianity as a western export has not in practice made any impact on the advanced civilizations of the East or in the world of Islam. It made no impact because it was western Christianity and sought to establish itself as such in the rest of the world without the risk of a really new beginning, breaking with some of the continuities which had been taken for granted, as was shown in the various rites controversies, in the export of the Latin liturgical language into countries where Latin had never been an historical factor, in the way in which western, Roman law was exported as a matter of course in Canon Law, in the naive way in which it was taken for granted that the bourgeois morality of the West could be imposed in every detail on people of alien cultures, in the rejection of religious experiences of other cultures, etc. This, then, is the situation: either the Church sees and recognizes these essential differences of the other cultures, into which it has to enter as world-Church, and accepts with a Pauline boldness the necessary consequences of this recognition or it remains a western Church and thus in the last resort betrays the meaning of Vatican II.

We come to the second question. What is meant more concretely by making this claim for the significance of Vatican II? It is difficult to say. For one thing, the second caesura – to the world-Church – has or must of course have a material content quite different from that of the first, to the Gentile Church of antiquity and the Middle Ages. For another [87] thing, the question remains open and unclarified as to whether and how far the Church still retained in the post-apostolic age the creative potential and powers which it had in the period of its first coming-to-be, in apostolic times, and claimed in irreversible or apparently irreversible decisions constituting its concrete nature and going beyond what belonged to it as coming to it directly from Jesus the Risen One himself. The question remains open as to whether with such historical caesurae as this second one the Church can legitimately seize opportunities of which it never made use during its second great epoch, since it would have seemed pointless and therefore illegitimate to do so at the time. The third reason why it is difficult to explain more concretely the importance of the claim that Vatican II marks the transition to the world-Church is that, despite all modern futurology, no one can predict the secular future accurately enough to enable the Church to do justice to it in the new interpretation of its faith and its nature as world-Church. In this sense Vatican II of course provides only a very abstract and formal outline of the task facing the Church as world-Church. Nevertheless, the attempt must be made to say something about the image of the Church as world-Church, about the still outstanding task of the Church. This, I think, is part of the theme of our reflections, since a theological interpretation of the basic nature of Vatican II must be undertaken in the light of its causa finalis: that is, of the future of the Church to which this Council was committed.

First of all, we have the Christian proclamation. None of us can say how exactly, with what terminology, under what new aspects, the ancient message of Christianity must be proclaimed in the future in Asia, Africa, the Islamic regions, perhaps also in South America, in order to make this message really present everywhere in the world. The other peoples and cultures must slowly find this out for themselves, although of course we cannot stop at a formal declaration of the necessity of these other proclamations, nor can the latter be deduced from an analysis – itself problematic – of the special characteristics of these peoples. In this task, which is still to be accomplished and which properly speaking is not for us Europeans, it will be necessary to have recourse – while invoking the hierarchy of truths, mentioned by Vatican Il – to the basic substance of the Christian message and from that point in spontaneous creativity corresponding to the particular historical situation to formulate again the Church's faith as a whole.

This reduction of the Christian message to its ultimate basic substance [88] as a first step to a fresh statement of the whole content of faith is not easy; it will be necessary in this connection to take advantage of the efforts made in recent years to find basic formularies of faith; but it will also be necessary to raise the question hitherto scarcely considered as to whether there is a formal criterion in the light of which it can be decided what might and what might not be part originally of a supernatural revelation strictly so-called. If this task were fulfilled, there would then be a pluralism of proclamations or, better, the real pluralism which is much more significant than a pluralism of proclamations and theologies within the western Church. Since in principle all men can talk with all others and can reach agreement with one another, these plural proclamations would not simply be disparate factors. They could mutually criticize and enrich each other, but everyone of them would nevertheless have an historical individuality which in the last resort would be incommensurable with any other. Hence the question emerges as to how a unity of faith can be maintained and established together with a plurality of proclamations, how the Church's supreme authority in Rome could work towards this end, since it is obviously a task quite different from that undertaken hitherto by the Roman authorities on faith against a common European background of understanding.

It has frequently been observed that a similar pluralism of liturgies is required, which cannot consist merely in the use of different vernacular languages. Quite apart from the fact that genuine progress towards unity in the ecumenical question cannot otherwise be expected, it is really quite obvious that a considerable pluralism with reference to Canon Law (and also the rest of the Church's practice) must be developed in the larger particular churches. All these of course are formal, abstract statements which say little about the concrete shape of the future world-Church. But is it possible to say something more?

We have reached the conclusion. All our reflections were meant to deal with the question of how the Second Vatican Council is to be theologically interpreted. We tried to make clear why it was the event in church history in which the world-Church began hesitatingly to act as such. With a few problematical reflections we tried to make clear that the coming-to-be of the world-Church as such does not mean merely a quantitative augmentation of the earlier Church, but contains a theological caesura in church history which has not by any means been clearly considered, which can be compared perhaps only with the transition from Judaeo-Christianity to Gentile Christianity, the caesura which occupied [89] Paul, although we do not need to think that he had given adequate theological consideration to this transition of which he was the protagonist. This is all that really had to be said. Everything else has been examined only vaguely, perhaps developed very unsystematically and without clarity; problems scarcely considered in traditional theology have only been indicated here.

In closing, attention may be drawn to a peculiarity of Vatican II with which I have dealt elsewhere and into which I cannot now enter at greater length. At least in Gaudium et Spes the Council adopted spontaneously a mode of expression which had the character neither of dogmatic teaching valid for all time nor of canonical enactments, but was perhaps to be understood as the expression of 'instructions' or 'appeals' (presupposing a theory about official ecclesiastical statements which is not yet by any means explicit, since in this respect we are familiar only with dogmatic statements and official ecclesiastical enactments and orders). Will this new mode of expression acquire a greater importance in the future? Under what conditions can such instructions be made effective? These too are questions into which we cannot enter more closely here, although their investigation might help us from another angle to answer the question of the specifically theological character of this Council.

Finally there is something that can be expressly stated or repeated. Together with and under the Pope, the Council was the active subject of the supreme powers in the Church in whatever direction these powers are exercised. This is obvious, it was expressly taught, nor was it actually questioned by Paul VI. But how this supreme power, whose holders are the Pope 'alone' and the Council, can exist in and be exercised by two at least partially different subjects, has not become really clear in theory, nor is it clear in practice what is permanently relevant in the fact that the whole college of bishops with and under the Pope – but actually with the Pope – is the supreme collegial governing body of the Church. Up to now the permanent relevance of this principle of the collegial constitution of the Church has not been clear and was thrust into the background after the Council by Paul VI. Will John Paul II change anything in this respect? In a real world-Church something of the kind is necessary, since a world-Church simply cannot be ruled by that Roman centralism which was usual in the time of Pius XII.

THE ABIDING SIGNIFICANCE OF THE SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL

Has the Second Vatican Council a lasting significance? This is a question already being raised today, often with some embarrassment and a kind of resignation, by Christians to whom the Church still means something. Before attempting to answer this question, we may begin with a few preliminary observations.

At the moment when it occurs, every historical event is clouded over, accompanied by contradictory feelings, by a variety of expectations and apprehensions, often arbitrary and fanciful, and is contrary to the interpretation of contemporaries. All this of course fades very quickly, but has nothing to do with the question of the true significance of an historical event. Napoleon's significance is still a factor of our history even today, although explicitly it rouses the curiosity only of specialist historians and scarcely anyone else ever mentions it.

The question of the significance of a council can be raised with reference to the Church as a whole or it can be a question referring to an individual regional church. The two questions are not identical. If the question of the meaning of the Council for a particular regional church is one that frequently necessitates a negative answer, this may be sad for the regional church, but it is in no way prejudicial to the Church as a whole.

The answer to our basic question may be given in the indicative, but in the last resort it is an imperative, addressed to the Church of today and tomorrow. Such an imperative implies prognoses, expectations, apprehensions, which at present can only be somewhat uncertainly conjectured. Behind our basic question lies the conviction that this Council brought to the future Church new tasks and new challenges to which [91] reactions must still be expected. If this is so, then in any case the Council has a great importance, since a task is there which becomes a blessing or a judgement for us and for the future generation, depending on whether we cope with the task or not. If this Council presents us with a task of this kind (and I am sure it does), then the Council has a meaning. It then belongs not merely to the past, but is present now – as the herald of a task for the future. I would like to suggest the following thesis for the theological interpretation of the Council, in order to use it as the starting point for answering the essential question.

COUNCIL OF THE WORLD-CHURCH

Without disputing previous initiatives, the Council seems to me to be the first act in a history in which the world-Church first began to exist as such. In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries the Church moved slowly and tentatively from being a potential to becoming an actual world-Church, from being a European and western Church with European exports to the whole world to becoming a world-Church which is present, albeit in very varied degrees of intensity, in the whole world and no longer merely as a European and North American export. Everywhere it has a native clergy, now aware of their autonomy and responsibility. This world-Church acted in the Council for the first time in historical clarity in the dimension of doctrine and law.

The Council was a council of the world-Church as such, even though it cannot be denied that the European and North American regional churches largely predominated. The simplest proof of this obvious and yet unprecedented and unique fact is that the responsibility for this Council – as distinct from all previous councils, not excepting Vatican I – was in the hands of an episcopate from the whole world and not merely, as at the First Vatican Council, an episcopate of European missionary bishops exported to the whole world.

This thesis is not really to be proved here, nor will its meaning be developed; it is meant only as an aid to answering our own question. That is to say, if we start out from this thesis, we do not need a priori to ask from a narrow intra-European standpoint what is there new that the Council has brought to us (in fact, a great deal), but we have to ask what is the permanent significance of this Council as a council of the world Church. It is then again obvious that this significance by way of repercussion [92] is also a significance for a European regional church and that questions may be raised also in this connection.

We may begin with the fact that the Council was the cause of the abolition of Latin as the common liturgical language. We can safely say that without the Council Latin would still be the liturgical language throughout the world. We need not be prophets to say that this change can never be reversed. Nor is this situation changed at all by the fact that, for the time being, the basic pattern set up in Rome for the regional vernacular liturgies is itself in Latin. In the light of the Church's unity and the theological continuity of Christian worship there will always be an ultimate liturgical unity behind the regional liturgies. But, as a result of the diversity of liturgical languages, there will be a necessary and irreversible process of development of a variety of liturgies, even though it is impossible to predict with certainty and accuracy the relationship between similarity and diversity of the regional liturgies. In the long run the liturgy of the Church as a whole will not simply be the liturgy of the Roman church in translation, but a unity in the variety of regional liturgies, each of which will have its own peculiar character which will not consist merely in its language.

If however the nature of the Church and consequently the nature and peculiar character of a regional church is also derived substantially from the liturgy in which it finds its supreme actualizations, then the result will be the formation of truly autonomous regional churches which are more than administrative districts of a totally and homogeneously organized state; these will emerge from the development of autonomous liturgies which began with the replacement of the Latin liturgical language by the national languages. Of course it will not be possible to think of these slowly emerging liturgies simply in the light of the pattern of the ancient Near East. The new liturgies do not need to deny their historical descent from the Roman liturgy. It cannot yet be predicted how great their differences will be.

RELATIONSHIP TO THE WORLD

In several decrees – among which the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (Gaudium et Spes) and the Declaration on Religious Freedom are especially important – the Church attempted to describe its fundamental relationship to the secular world, which arises [93] from its own nature and is not imposed on it by external circumstances. What was said there about renouncing external means of power in matters of religion, about the respect due even to an erroneous conscience, about the development of a legitimately secular world outside the Church's control, at first came up against a certain amount of stubborn resistance on the part of conservative groups at the Council and could be regarded as exceptional, as a statement forced by a secular world on the Church contrary to the latter's innermost feelings or as objectifications of the outlook of liberal-minded Christians but not as objectifications of Christianity itself.

If however we remember that, even where it has or could have a greater power in the secular sphere, the Church now must observe the restraint of which it spoke at the Council, since this is required by its very nature, although in its history this requirement was only too often disregarded on the plea that to do so was to render a service to God; if we remember also that the temptation may arise again and again, albeit in new forms and shapes, for the Church to abandon this restraint wholly or partially, but that in principle and generally the post-conciliar Church can no longer yield to this temptation, then it can be perceived that something permanent has come to be through the Council. Individual churches, individual bishops and militant laymen in particular may be repeatedly faced with the temptation to use means of power to impose on non-Christians what is really or supposedly true and helpful to salvation in Christianity and the Church, and here and there they will yield to it. But, while the power politicians (in the most sublime sense of the word) in the Church could act with a clear conscience in a clerical-fascist way before the Council, because – as they said – falsehood and evil have no rights and can at most be tactically tolerated, such trends can now be condemned and opposed in the name of Christianity itself. According to the decrees of the Council, it is no longer so easy to give a Christian façade to the restriction of freedom in the name of what is claimed to be alone good and right.

Of course that is not to say that these decrees of the Council can be interpreted only in this way. But the importance of this interpretation can be seen from a glance at the trends in modern Islamic states. There attempts are being made to set up an ecclesiastical polity or a theocracy in which the Koran is the basic law of the state and twenty strokes of the whip is the punishment for not fasting during the month of Ramadan. Are we as Christians merely too sluggish or too cowardly to attempt [94] something of the kind in our own milieu? Would we do it if we could? Or do we refrain from such religious power-politics as a matter of principle, even though it might still be possible, at least in small doses.

In this respect too the Second Vatican Council is still relevant and sets us a task. As the Council says, for the sake of the common weal, it will never be possible to do without force and power; we Christians are under no obligation here to chase after unreal Utopias. But in principle the Church at the Council surrendered a good deal of power that it had formerly assumed, whenever possible, as a matter of course. At this point a frontier has been crossed behind which it will never again be possible to return, even to a slight degree.

THEOLOGY OF THE COUNCIL

Theology at the Council was in a transitional situation that was difficult to define. On the one hand neoscholastic theology was taken for granted. It predominated to an almost alarming extent in the drafts prepared for the Council by the Roman commissions. In these, among other doctrines proposed for definition, were the descent of all human beings from a single couple (monogenism) and ‘limbo’ as the destiny of unbaptized children: theologoumena which today have almost entirely disappeared. At the Council Latin predominated as the language in which this neoscholastic theology was expressed, the New Testament being used as a collection of proof-texts while little or no attempt was made to bring a biblical theology to bear on the problems. This was one aspect of the Council’s theology. It should not however be inferred that this aspect was merely obscure and negative. On the contrary, one could wish that students of theology even today were a little more aware of the conceptual exactitude of neoscholasticism and of its orientation to declarations of the magisterium.

There was however another aspect of the Council’s theology. It was more biblical than neoscholasticism. It had proposed, a little timidly and cautiously, themes which had not been drawn simply from the repertoire of neoscholasticism. It exercised a moderating influence on any sort of theological exuberance (for example, in Mariology). As far as possible, it made an effort to take ecumenical needs into account: something which had not hitherto been taken for granted in Rome, not even under the level-headed and judicious Pius XI. It was convinced that it is possible [95] to say something that is theologically important without solemnly proclaiming it as a dogma. In the field of dogmatic theology properly so-called it brought more clearly to the fore of the Church's awareness a series of doctrines which in themselves were not really new or unprecedented or particularly controversial, but which had not previously been stated clearly enough to make an impact on the practical life of the Church. Among these may be mentioned the sacramentality of episcopal ordination, the doctrine of the episcopate as a whole (with and under the Pope) as the supreme ecclesiastical authority in regard to proclaiming the faith and in matters of law, the doctrine that the human authors of Scripture were not secretaries of the God who inspired them but truly human composers of these Scriptures, the cautious formulation of the inerrancy of Scripture, and many another theme that cannot be listed individually here.

The theology of the Council has two aspects. It is the theology of a transition. The question remains of course whether, how and how rapidly this theology will continue to develop after acquiring a certain official authorization at the Council. The theology acquired and proclaimed after the Council by the Roman Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith may perhaps still show some traces of the influence of conciliar theology, but it is too neoscholastic in its nervous opposition to modern theological experiments, too nervous and too little creative in regard to the questions with which modern theology is occupied. The theology of the Congregation of the Doctrine of the Faith is a defensive theology, warning and prohibiting, but not really succeeding in justifying its prohibitions and warnings (which, as such, are perhaps not always unjustified or superfluous) in the light of a living and broad coherence of faith as a whole, in a way that renders them intelligible to anyone who is prepared to think and live by this totality of faith. But the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith need not remain for ever as it is now and it will not be able to lead back the theology of the Church as a whole behind the frontier crossed at the Council, eyen though the crossing was more or less unpremeditated. Of course only tasks and hopes can be formulated here and no prophecies can be made, particularly since signs of fatigue can be detected in the theology of the last ten years: an escape into pastoral studies and religious educational theory or to a false anthropocentrism which closes man up in himself.

Theology however will go on living, renewing continually its strength and vitality. Corresponding to the Council itself, it will become a world-theology: [96] that is, it will exist in the non-European, non-North American countries, but no longer merely as an export from the West. Latin America has already staked its claim to a theology of its own. 'Theology of Liberation' is not the only title that might be given to such an autonomous Latin American theology. Perhaps Africa also and the Far East will soon develop theologies of a specific character as a result of coming to terms creatively with their own cultures. That however is no reason why we in the West should abandon our own efforts on these lines.

It is not as if the theology of the West no longer had any function, and not only because theology necessarily has a function as long as history continues and as long therefore as new situations continue to emerge and to require a new proclamation of the Christian faith. Even today the theology of the West has a quite incalculable back-log to make up. It has to be a missionary theology; it cannot think and speak merely in the assured, traditional forms, addressing those who still feel at home in Christianity and in the Church; it must direct its thinking to the others to whom, for a variety of reasons, Christianity has become something alien. At every step, then, it must be dogmatic and fundamental theology in one. In the West it could certainly accomplish some preliminary work for the theologies of the rest of the world, even though these are expected to be autonomous, since the West with its enlightenment and technological rationality is becoming increasingly involved in the destiny of the rest of the world.

It cannot be our task here to describe exactly this theology of the future, the demands on it, its novelty, and so on. It may however be said that the Council made a new start possible and legitimate. Because of the Council and after it, theology of itself no longer presents the appearance of a monotonous neoscholasticism intended to be acceptable in the whole world. Neither is it any longer the case that every more intelligent candidate for the priesthood and the episcopal office, coming from what have been known as the missionary countries, must study in Rome and there be initiated with all the others into one and the same neoscholasticism. Theology will be everywhere in the world-Church and it will inevitably have to deal with the more urgent questions in any particular cultural group and which are not now the same everywhere. And the resultant, undeniable diversity will make its mark on the specific character of theology as a whole. It is obvious that the Roman magisterium will consequently have different tasks and have to develop modes of procedure other than those of the times when it had to address as a matter [97] of course a single cultural group. Whether this prospect is sufficiently clearly seen is another question.

ECUMENICAL CHANGE OF MIND

The Council represents a caesura in the history of the relations of the Catholic Church both with other Christian Churches and communities and with non-Christian world-religions. Of course the Church's sense of faith at all times implied convictions which in the last resort and in principle authorized the newly established relationship of the Catholic Church with other Christian Churches and communities and with the non-Christian religions. But formerly these convictions had no effect on this relationship. Non-Christians were regarded simply as living in the darkness of paganism and assured of salvation only through the preaching of the gospel. Non-Catholic Christendom was seen as a whole as a mass of heretics who were to be invited either in a friendly or threatening way to be converted and to return to the one true Catholic Church, without any thought that this return to unity might also carry with it important changes in the Catholic Church itself.

It is not at all easy to create a theological awareness of the caesura resulting from the Council. The theological reasons for the caesura were indeed present at an earlier stage: the assumption of God's universal salvific will in Christ, the doctrine of the opportunity of salvation without sacraments, of the implicit desire of membership of the Church, of the validity of baptism even outside the Catholic Church, and so on. These ever-present theological truisms might give the impression that nothing has really changed in the relationship between the Church and the rest of mankind. On the other hand, the Catholic theologian, as distinct from the disinterested non-theologian, cannot take the new closeness and the positive relationship between the Christian denominations and the relationship of Christianity to the non-Christian religions to mean that there are no serious differences, divisions and tasks in the way of unification, as if the Catholic Church were simply any kind of structure resulting from historical chance, among the many others of more or less equal importance produced by the history of religion or the history of the Church. These two difficulties, to right and left, make it difficult to see the change that began with the Second Vatican Council and is now [98] irreversible. We shall try to throw some light on this change, even though this means perhaps saying too much for some and too little for others.

Christianity has always maintained that there is a true history of revelation and of faith in which what happens is not always the same but includes new, far-reaching changes. With the event of Jesus Christ of course the history of revelation reached an unsurpassable peak and an unparalleled irreversibility, which are not to be disguised or minimized here. But the Church's sense of faith does not cease to be an historical reality following a single track and with far-reaching caesurae, even though this is not made clear in the usual theory of the history of dogma, which has hitherto interpreted the development of dogma as a matter of logical deduction from the original data of revelation. If we ask what the Council has produced that is new in this one-track, irreversible progress, the main answer must be that at this Council, Catholic Christendom adopted expressly a different, a new attitude toward other Christians and their Churches and toward the non-Christian world-religions and ratified it as truly Christian.

The decisive thing about this ecumenical change of mind in the widest sense of the term lies in the fact that the greatness and radicality of this change are concealed and minimized in our ordinary consciousness by a modern, liberal and relativistic mentality which from the very outset regards the new ecumenical openness and readiness to learn as simply to be taken for granted. People like this see what happened in this respect at the Council as nothing really important or as merely obvious; the Council merely noted what had long been a matter of course outside a clerical-ecclesiastical ghetto. Nor can it be denied that, historically speaking, this modern liberalist mentality was in fact the climate in which alone the new ecumenical awareness could grow. Nevertheless, this awareness grew from genuinely Christian roots and is as such Christian. It definitively abandons an older mentality, which prevailed for fifteen hundred years, and remains obligatory for the future of the Church, like other great events in the history of faith.

All in all, without denying that the seeds of the future were already present in the past, it has to be said that, before the Council, the Catholic Church regarded the non-Roman Catholic Churches and communities as organizations of heretics, as societies of human beings differing from the old Church only by their errors and defects and needing to return to it, in order to find there the whole truth and fullness of Christianity. For the old view, the non-Christian religions as a whole were no more [99] than the terrible darkness of paganism, all that man in his sin and without grace could produce from his own resources by way of religion. That in an ecumenical unification the non-Catholic Churches might also bring with them to the one Church of the future a positive heritage from the history of Christianity in a form not known in the old Church; that the non-Christian religions even in their institutional form might exercise a positive salvific function for non-Christian humanity: none of this was actually explicit in the Church's awareness, but is present there now and can never again be excluded, since it is understood, not as a liberal mentality of modern times, but as an element of the Christian outlook as such.

Once again, no one who maintains in principle the radical differences between truth and error, who has recognized a true claim to absoluteness on the part of Christianity and the Church, who grants in principle to certain formulated insights and religious institutions a significance that has a part in deciding man's eternal destiny, can regard the caesura which came in with the Council as something to be taken for granted. He must recognize it as a fundamentally Christian event, as a victory of Christianity and not of liberalism. He must be prepared to put up with and work on all the theological problems involved in such a change – something that is not at all easy and will remain as a task for a long time.

OPTIMISM OF UNIVERSAL SALVATION

The implications of the above brief suggestions may be investigated more deeply and more radically, in order to see – despite the lack of interest of so many Christians – what this Council means for the Church. Even though the enormous variety of his theology means that we may be doing Augustine an injustice by the following description, even though the fact cannot be overlooked that the history of the Church's sense of faith has continued in many small steps from him to us, even though, as we have said, many historical causes have co-operated as catalysts in this change in the Church's sense of faith, nevertheless it can be said that Augustine inaugurated and taught to Christendom a view of world-history according to which – in the incomprehensibility of God's providence – world history remained the history of the massa damnata from which in the last resort, by a rarely granted grace of election, only a few were saved. For him the world was dark and only weakly illuminated by the light [100] of God's grace, a grace that can be seen by its rarity to be unmerited. Even though Augustine from time to time showed that he was aware of the presence in the Church of many who seemed to be outside it and vice-versa, nevertheless for him the group of those who are saved and enter into glory is more or less identical with the community of those who believe explicitly in Christianity and the Church. As a result of an incomprehensibly just judgement of God, the rest remain in the massa damnata of humanity, and on the whole the outcome of world-history is to be found in hell.

This pessimism of Augustine in regard to salvation was reconstructed and slowly transformed in an inexpressibly wearisome process in the Church's theoretical and existential consciousness. From the assumption that unbaptized children are tormented by the fires of hell to the abolition by modern theologians of limbo – although a draft prepared for the Council still tried to maintain this doctrine – was a very long way. But all these insights, acquired bit by bit, leading to an optimistic view of the prospect of salvation, a salvation which could be prevented only by the evil will of the individual and which might still be hoped for in virtue of the power of grace transforming this malice again into a free love of God, these insights the Church had not ratified and taught absolutely firmly before the Council.

The Council however says that even someone who regards himself as an atheist, if only he follows his conscience, is united to the paschal mystery of Christ; that every human being in a way known only to God is in touch with God's revelation and can really believe by an act that is salutary in a theological sense. There too it is said that even those who seek the unknown God in shadows and images are not far from the true God, who wills all men to be saved if they only strive to lead a righteous life. The Council also stressed the fact that the Church is not so much the community only of those who are saved as the sacramental primordial sign and germ-cell of salvation for the whole world.

Of course it could be said that this optimism of the Council in regard to universal salvation also remains hypothetical, that it could break down as a result of an individual's final culpability, that in this hypothetical way it was the normal teaching of the Church even before the Council. It is indeed true that even after the Council the Church has not proclaimed any doctrine of universal reconciliation (apocatastasis) and before it had also taught God's universal salvific will. But this preconciliar teaching was understood in a very abstract way and qualified with not [101] a few ifs and buts, which cannot be maintained after the Council. The Council tacitly buried the doctrine of 'limbo' for children dying before baptism; it boldly postulated a revelation properly so called, and consequently a real opportunity of faith even where the Christian message had not been proclaimed; it did not regard even the profession of atheism as an unambiguous proof that a person could not be saved – which certainly is not in agreement with the traditional teaching before the Council.

There are other points that should also be remembered. It can be said that in theory and also largely in religious practice those were regarded in the first place as culpable (if not absolutely condemned) who were objectively opposed to Christianity and the Church, at least if they could not be counted among religious 'primitives'. This sort of attitude was not so unintelligible then as it seems today. If, according to the teaching of Vatican I, there are clear, unequivocal arguments, adapted to all times and people, for the existence of God, for revelation and for the divine foundation of the Church, then it was not too difficult to conclude that a person could reject these arguments only culpably, and consequently that the culpability of heretics and non-Christians had to be assumed from the start.

Certainly there can be no talk of such an assumption in the decrees of Vatican II and in all that happened in connection with the Council. The Pope embraces non-Catholic church leaders and pagans; a Roman cardinal declared in Tunis that Mohammed had been a true prophet; all ecumenical conversations assume that all the partners to the discussion are living in the grace of God. Although rejecting a theoretical doctrine of universal reconciliation, the Church in the Council and in its practical conduct starts out from the assumption that God's grace is not only offered to man's free decision, but also that it largely prevails universally in this freedom. This attitude of the Church came into existence of course only after a very long period of development. But it became clear and irreversible in the Second Vatican Council; for such a hope can certainly grow, while it can no longer really decline.

Formerly theology asked apprehensively, how many are saved from the massa damnata of world-history. Today we ask whether we may hope that all are saved. This question, this attitude, is more Christian than the former and is the fruit of a more mature Christian awareness that has grown over a long period and is slowly coming to terms more closely with the ultimate basic message of Jesus on the victory of God's Kingdom. It is an attitude which may seem obvious to the liberalistic, [102] bourgeois philistine, since he knows nothing of the incomprehensibility of God's judgements and of his all-consuming holiness and consequently thinks that the message of the victory of God's grace in the world is something that God might perhaps use to justify himself before man's tribunal. But if someone has even a remote idea of who God is, is really aware of the terrible darkness of the history of humanity, he will find the optimism of universal salvation which the Church has struggled to acquire an almost frightening message to which he has to respond with the ultimate resources of his faith.

At the beginning, we put forward the thesis that this Council was the first great official action of a world-Church that had now become relevant. The world-Church as such has appeared on the scene and it now tells the world – inexplicably marvellous and yet taken for granted – that, with all the depths of its history and all the grim possibilities of its future, it is embraced by God and his will, through whose unfathomable love God himself in his self-communication offers himself to the world as ground, power and goal, and of himself makes this offer effective in the freedom of history. The Church became new at this Council, since it had become a world-Church and as such it gives the world a message which, although always the heart of the message of Jesus, is today proclaimed more unconditionally and courageously than formerly and therefore in a new way. In both respects, in the messenger and his message, something new has happened, something irreversible, something that remains. It is another question, whether, in the dull mediocrity of our activity in the Church, we seize and live here and now on this new reality. But this is our task.

THE FUTURE OF THE CHURCH AND THE CHURCH OF THE FUTURE

If we are to speak of the Church's future, the obvious question arises as to which Church is meant. Is it the Catholic Church in our own country? The western Church? Or the world-Church as a whole? It must be made clear from the outset that these three questions are different and that the answer to each of them is not necessarily the same. It might, for example, be necessary to take a very pessimistic view of the future of Christianity in our own country and in Europe, while at the same time seeing the future of the world-Church of South America and Africa in a very different light. At any rate these three questions must be distinguished. Here, in what must be only a brief reflection, we shall look mainly to the world-Church as a whole and its future; in other words, we shall not be concerned, properly speaking and expressly, with prognoses in regard to our own country, our own native land, or to Europe. If then we are dealing with the world-Church and its future as a whole, we must be content with very general considerations and cannot at the same time analyse more exactly the sociopolitical situation of individual countries and continents and its possible effect on the future of the Church. We assume that our interest in the future of the world-Church will not really distract us from our concern and hopes for the Church in our own country but will reveal a horizon within which alone it is possible to understand correctly this concern and these hopes.

We are speaking here of the future of our Church, of the Roman Catholic Church. But this does not mean raising subliminally and tacitly the question of the opportunities open to our Church in competition with other Christian Churches and communities. This is not the meaning of our chosen theme. As long as the Christian Churches have not achieved [104] complete unity, they are inevitably in competition and present contrasts with each other and one Church's opportunities for the future are not necessarily equal to those of another Church in the same country. But this is not what concerns us here. Even though we are talking about the Roman Catholic Church and its future, our interest lies in this Church as a part of Christendom as one and whole, we are really looking to the future of Christianity as a whole in the secularized world of today, in which all Christian Churches have to live: in the world of a rational, technical civilization; in a world where the individual parts are increasingly growing together into a unity and a common destiny; in a world which, as never before, is marked by a militant atheism, not as a private influence, but as a world-wide public power. If then we refer explicitly here to the Catholic Church and its future, in the last resort we are looking in an ecumenical spirit to Christendom in its unity and wholeness and to its future.

If we are to speak of the future of the world-Church, we can do so only in the light of an understanding of its nature that is based on faith and theologically correct. In its ultimate nature the Church is the sociologically and historically tangible and structured community of those who believe in Jesus Christ crucified and risen as the definitive and victoriously prevailing self-promise of the one and living God to the world. Hence this Church is the basic sacrament of the salvation of the world: of the world, and not only of those who belong to the Church itself expressly and in a sociologically tangible way. The Church is the historically perceptible assurance of the victory of God's self-promise as the ultimate meaning and absolute future of the world. To this world the Church promises God's salvation, a salvation that will be realized by God's mysterious grace even where the Church itself has not been established visibly in its word and its sacraments. It is to this very world that the grace of God is offered and attested as victorious by the Church. If the Church is thus the sacrament of salvation for the non-ecclesial world, that is not to say of course that those may remain aloof from the Church who have been offered the grace of belonging to the Church and are expected, as a result of their publicly professed faith in Jesus Christ as God's one and definitive promise of salvation to the world, to take their part in sustaining the Church as basic sacrament: to remain aloof would imperil their eternal salvation.

This essential task of the Church, which has been merely outlined here, is of the utmost importance for a correct understanding of the [105] future of the Church. As a result of the history of the Church over two thousand years, devout churchgoing Christians have been misled into thinking of the future history of the Church as one of ever-increasing numerical growth, not only in an absolute sense, but also relatively to the numbers of the human race as a whole. This feeling about the future of the Church, originating in its past history, was highly problematic even formerly, if only because the size, historical weight and future of non-Christian humanity outside Europe at that time had not really seriously been taken into account. However that may be, as Christians today, we must certainly allow for the fact that the Church will increase numerically in an absolute sense in the future, but will decrease and become smaller by comparison with the numbers of the human race as a whole. This will come about simply because of the more rapid growth of non-Christian peoples, quite apart from the progressive de-Christianization of formerly Christian nations and the consequences of a state-supported militant atheism. But this probably correct prognosis does not do away with the fact that the Church in the last hundred and fifty years, from being a Church of the West, of the purely European civilization and its colonial exports, has gradually become really a world-Church which is present to a varying extent in all parts of the world and everywhere becoming a genuine element of all cultures and nations. The decline relatively to the total population of the Church and Christianity as a whole, now beginning, does not eliminate the coming-to-be and the being of the world-Church as such. Today more than ever it is present everywhere as the basic sacrament of the salvation of the world, a fact however that must not lead us to forget or to assume that we can leave unanswered, for instance, the obscure question of the situation of China as representing a quarter of mankind as a whole.

If we clearly realize the essentially theological nature of the Church as the basic sacrament of salvation, promising salvation to the world and not merely to itself, if in our modern ecclesiology we prefer the metaphor of the basic sacrament to the older metaphor of the Church as the sole ark of salvation on the sea of a perishing world, then we can look more impartially to the future. The Church is everywhere: in the last resort its nature and its function remain independent of the question of its numerical relationship to the total world-population.

This reminder to take a realistic and not a triumphalist view of the Church's future – based on theological grounds and not merely the expression of a momentary defeatism – must not lead us to assume that the [106] prospects are dim for the Church historically and in the mental climate of the world of the future. If in 1973 695 million Catholics formed 18.3 percent of the population of the world, if in this Church alone in some 230 thousand parishes in more than two thousand dioceses about 420 thousand priests were proclaiming the gospel, if, for example, in Africa even now there are 44 million Catholics, in Central and South America about 270 million and in Asia 56 million Catholics (even though only 2.5 percent of these are Asians), if we remember the 320 million Catholics in Europe and North America, if in addition we accept the many hundreds of millions of non-Catholic Christians as parts of the one Christendom, then it can and must be said that the Catholic Church and still more Christendom as a whole represent a world-wide historically and sociologically powerful reality which cannot be left out of account even for a purely worldly and secular prognosis for later centuries. Nor is this secular prognosis invalidated by the fact that enormous numbers of these Catholics and Christians are only nominally such and are only very loosely attached to the Church and Christianity. It is the sort of thing that is found, not only in the Churches, but with all historical and sociological forces which claim to have a mission to mankind and to a more distant future. Even in the 'Churches' of materialism and militant atheism a large number are uninterested fellow-travellers or count as members merely sociologically and statistically. And yet these numbers have some importance for the future in all historical and sociological groups. In the light merely of the numerical size of the Church and of Christianity as a whole, it can still be said that the latter will remain – even in a secular estimate of future possibilities – significant factors in mankind for an unforeseeable period.

For the real Christian, however, such reflections are essentially provisional and external. The real Christian judges the future opportunities of the Church and Christianity from quite a different standpoint, that of faith in the proper sense of the term and of hope that is given by God. For the churchgoing Christian, faith and hope are constitutive elements of his relationship to the Church itself. He does not come to the Church from outside with the question of the future, as to a factor distinct from himself, in order to ask in a neutral spirit about its future possibilities. In fact, with an absolute decision of his free existence, he believes in God as his own eternal life and in Jesus Christ as the historical seal by his victorious power of God's self-promise to the world. And if the Christian believes and hopes in this way and does so together with others through [107] whose mediation he receives the message of God and of Jesus Christ, be is setting up the Church by this very faith and hope in God's victory. The Christian thus affirms the Church with that absolute, unconditional decision with which in faith and hope he reaches out for God in Jesus Christ. The Church itself is the object of Christian faith. And, just as in the last resort the content of faith as a whole is not affirmed by individual human considerations, devious or straightforward, but by the comprehensive basic act of existence in which this whole existence is trustfully surrendered in the light of Jesus' victorious death to the incomprehensible mystery of God, so hope in the future of the Church in the last resort is exalted in this faith above everything and independently of secular futurological considerations and calculations.

Since the Christian sets up and grasps unconditionally and unreservedly the hope of his own salvation (hoping against hope, as Paul says) and since this hope includes the affirmation of the Church, since he has the same absolute hope for the Church's future, it does not matter for him whether the prognoses for the future of the Church, from a purely human standpoint, are favourable or unfavourable. Since the Christian may not, will not and does not despair of his own salvation, neither can he despair of the Church, since this salvific faith itself – if it is rightly understood and is revealed in its whole nature – continually renews the Church about whose future he might have been tempted to doubt. From this standpoint the Christian can also look into the history of faith and perceive there, in what is truly the history of the Church itself, the continual recurrence of phases and moments at which, humanly speaking, there was a strong temptation to predict the decline of the Church and after which again and again everything went on as before. A similar scrutiny of the history of faith might begin with ancient Israel which, considered in the light of secular history, ought long ago to have vanished from the historical scene and yet continues to live by its invincible faith. Likewise, a glance at the history of faith could reveal over and over again in the two thousand years of the Church's history situations in which, humanly speaking, it seemed impossible that everything would continue as before, when it seemed that the end had really come.

Again, however, over and above such empirical assurances, drawn from the history of faith and of the Church, the Christian believes by an ultimate decision of faith, rooted in the depths of his existence, that the Church will exist also in the future. For he believes in God, who grants to man's existence an infinite dignity and an eternal life through his [108] radical fall into death; he believes in Jesus Christ who, by his death, reaches this eternal life as the Risen One and thus definitively seals our hope. But when the Christian believes in this way, it is always an event of the Church; if he so believes and hopes for himself and his salvation, he simply cannot fail to be hoping also for the coming generations: that is, be is sure that these too, believing and hoping, by the power of God's grace, will seize on their salvation and so form the Church, the community of those who with Jesus place their hope in God himself. In the last resort, the future of the Church is not a theme for secular futurology, but an object of the faith that relies unconditionally on God himself.

If we are to talk about the future of the Church, we must not say simply that it has a future; we must also ask whether and how, even at the present time, we can know something about the content and the essential character of this future.

First of all, with reference to this new question, it must be said that, if we are thinking of longer periods of time, we know little or nothing about the character of this future. Even the prediction of the future course of secular world history by philosophers of history, sociologists and futurologists, is a highly problematic business. Today we can certainly say quite a lot about how technical civilization can be expected to develop; we can perhaps estimate more or less accurately the size of the population of the world in the year 2000. But, even from the viewpoint of secular history, at bottom we know nothing about what the Church will look like really concretely in a few decades. In the history of nature and particularly of freedom there are too many unknowns, with all the unforeseeable feed-back effects even of the known factors, for us to be able really to know what the world will be like concretely in fifty years' time. This unforeseeability of future history is particularly relevant to the Church. We cannot form any concrete picture of its future. For, in the first place, we know too little and nothing at all concrete about the secular future. But it is on this as the situation of the Church and its history that the Church's future largely depends. If the course of secular history runs into a future that cannot be clarified in advance, this is even more true of the Church's future. Moreover, the future history of the Church as history of faith and salvation is always governed also by God's freedom and man's freedom, effecting salvation or disaster, whether we think of this freedom of God and man in the history of salvation and consequently of the Church as effective through secular causes or in addition to these.

[109] This unforeseeability of the Church's concrete future may not however be understood properly as an unfortunate impediment for someone who wants to move into a future calculated in advance as accurately as possible. The unforeseeability of future history is in fact a condition of the possibility of true freedom which produces what is original and underivable – since this is unique – and brings to the light the future by itself and not by an advance calculation; it is in particular a condition of the possibility of faith properly so called, which surrenders itself regardless of detailed calculations and unconditionally to God's incomprehensibility and his freedom. The incalculability of the Church's future is part of its nature and that of faith. Anyone who really believes regards this situation in the last resort, not as menacing or intimidating, but as natural and obvious. Faith can make its way into the unfathomable, since all individual unfathomabilities of history are surpassed from the outset by the unfathomable incomprehensibility of God and his freedom itself, which faith as such seeks to grasp.

Even though we cannot know anything about the substance of the Church's concrete future, two statements at least may be made about this future, since on the one hand it is history and on the other the history of one and the same enduring Church. That is to say: the Church's future will be different in many respects from the present, in which we ourselves live and which we therefore know. Nevertheless, the future is that of the one and enduring Church in which we believe and live. Change and endurance belong equally to the nature of the Church, while it is obvious that we cannot distinguish so completely in human reflection the changeable from the permanent in this historical factor as to know in advance of its concrete history precisely and conceptually where the dividing line lies between the perishing and the permanent: we must always experience in history the unforeseeable miracle that the Church changes to a quite unforeseeable extent and yet discover that it has remained the same.

Assuming all this, we can safely say that the Church of the future will look very different from that of today. In this respect we must remember that, for the most varied reasons, the tempo of history has enormously increased and consequently that a human being in his very brief life-time now experiences with joy and even more with pain, and with increasing insecurity, more changes in history than could possibly have been known to anyone in former times. We have all – even now – experienced the joy and pain of such changes in the Church, which today occur unavoidably [110] at a greater speed than formerly, simply because secular history also runs its course very much more rapidly.

Such unavoidable changes occurring more rapidly than formerly should not make us feel insecure, should not lead to indignation and protests, as if the old, to which we were accustomed, had always been better. If then it is asked what changes may be expected in the immediate future, over and above those experienced in recent decades, we may be a little embarrassed, if we are not clairvoyants or prophets. There is however something we can say. In a secularized world, in which nothing Christian can anywhere be simply taken for granted, the Church must be sustained even in its institutions and in its ministry much more than it is now by a readiness to believe freely on the part of its members at the base, on the part of basic communities; the latter will not be content simply to be cared for by an institutional Church, but will themselves on their own responsibility take an active part in forming the Church and will have a right to be taken seriously in their activity and responsibility by the authorities. At the same time, not a few things which are taken for granted in our own country as distinct from many other Churches in other countries will not continue to be so regarded, but will either disappear or demand for their maintenance a new and resolute sociopolitical commitment and also readiness for sacrifice on the part of Catholics. In many details of the symbiosis of the politically organized society and the Church – for example, with reference to the church-tax, religious instruction in state schools, theological faculties in state universities, state assistance for the Church's social institutions, the special sociological status of the Church, etc. – we cannot assume that everything in the future will go on as hitherto, peacefully and without question.

As far as the Church as a whole is concerned, it will turn to an increasing extent and increasingly rapidly from a European church with Christian exports to all the world into a world-Church, in which the churches of Africa, South America and even Asia, will be really autonomous elements with their own specific character and their own importance in the whole Church, justifying independently their existence and mission. We have already seen that, geographically speaking, Europe and Rome are by no means any longer at the centre of the Church. Such a world-Church as it exists outside Europe cannot simply import and imitate the life-style, law, liturgy and theology of the European church. In all these respects the churches outside Europe must be really independent [111] and culturally firmly rooted in their own countries and – while maintaining the unity of faith and the link with the Pope – develop a new life of their own which we simply cannot imagine today and which at first sight might seem as alien to us as if we were attending today a Mass in the Syro-Malabar rite in South India. Of course, such a future prospect of the differentiation of the world-Church assumes that, despite the rational-technical world-civilization, the diversity of national and continental cultures will be maintained and even acquire a new vitality. In this world-Church, according to our Catholic faith, there will always be a Petrine ministry with its permanent and perhaps in some respects increasingly important tasks. Nevertheless, in the concrete way in which this ministry is exercised, a great deal will be changed, can be changed and must be changed.

It might perhaps be said briefly that the Pope for many centuries exercised his Petrine ministry to the whole Church in the style of a Patriarch of the West, that he tried to spread over the whole world the Latin Church of the West. Now however the churches that began as exports from Europe have become independent and force us clearly to distinguish between the dogmatically assured, authentic Petrine ministry to the whole Church and the Pope's function as Patriarch of the West, which remains a respectable but less important part of the Church as a whole and which in its concrete shape will no longer be oriented from Rome towards the whole Church. The Second Vatican Council marks a fresh start in the dialogue of Christianity and especially the Catholic Church with the present historical situation. But the beginning of this dialogue is not its end. From the very outset, correctly understood, this dialogue does not mean a faint-hearted compromise with any sort of spirit of the age. It can and must take place in the form of a critical and absolute opposition to a godless and greedy consumer mentality, largely drained of all authentic human feeling. It remains true however that the dialogue between the Church and the world must continue and that it demands also from the Church changes in its life-style, in the style of proclamation of the Christian faith, in the treatment of people who have come of age, in respect for freedom of conscience, in making apparent the workings of its official machinery, etc.

These changes in the Church as a whole necessarily have consequences for the church of our immediate neighbourhood, the church of our own country, of our homeland. As a result of the Council itself we have experienced such consequences in the last decade and we shall experience [112] similar changes in the future. If we regard them as inevitable consequences of changes in the Church as a whole, they will seem less surprising and less depressing. Of course the opposite is also true. The changes arising in our own immediate neighbourhood, in our own country and in Europe, because of the shortage of priests, changes in the mental climate, changes in the concrete relations between Church and state, etc., will also have consequences for the Church as a whole.

In this unavoidably changing Church however something will endure. And this is also the unwavering answer of Christian faith to the question about the future of the Church. When we say that the Church will remain in the future, since its real message cannot perish, we are not merely setting out a prognosis of permanence on the grounds that there are constants even in history in the light of the true and lasting nature of man, but our prognosis of the future is based on the real message of Christianity itself, rightly understood. This message is not subject to time and time's changes, since it is itself the proclamation of the end of all time, since in the last resort and properly speaking it does not say that something remains of what we have now, that we are not deprived of our possessions: what it does say is that the absolute future – which is the eternal God himself, beyond all limits of time – will reach us as the fulfilment of time and history, whether the course of the changing times is long or short, whether it is filled with victories or with defeats. Since Christianity proclaims this end of history as the victory of God, its message can never be superseded by the announcement of something that always remains part of history as an interim goal. Within the course of time and a history that remains open, there may be much still to come, to be hoped for or feared, to be done or suffered: much that is always new, of which as yet we know nothing. But whatever is to come in the present world, however much and however surprising, is already encompassed by the message of Christianity which tells, not of this or that, but of all in one, of God as beginning and end and as such as our own consummation. This message – not only issued in words, but present and sealed in the event of Jesus Christ, who died into the incomprehensibility of God and was thus vindicated – can never again be lost to humanity as a whole. For it is the supreme and unsurpassable hope, nourished by humanity's victories and defeats, since the brief moments of light in history and the times of great darkness alike bear witness to the eternal light, the light announced in Jesus Christ as forever victorious.

How could the message of Christianity be superseded, when it proclaims, [113] not just one thing or another, but the pure infinity of God as the absolute future of humanity? How could this message be unmasked as an unreal Utopia when it arises from the very event which unmasks all illusions, from death itself, from the death of Jesus, in face of which humanity did not despair but learned to hope absolutely? The message of Christianity for a future does not proclaim the replacement of what exists here and now by something else that is likewise under the law of coming to be and perishing, but the salvation of all by that infinite, incomprehensible reality, exalted above all coming to be and perishing, which we call God. If this message does not perish and cannot perish, since it is the answer to humanity's infinite hope, then neither does the Church perish, being the fellowship of those who in faith and hope make this message the centre of their existence.

As we pointed out at the beginning, this message and the community of those who carry it are ultimately independent of the proportion between the number of these believers and the total number of human beings. The message is the promise for mankind as a whole, even though it is expressly supported only by a few. It is a message that has in fact been implicitly accepted and taken to heart by those who hope absolutely, even though they do not venture to express the immensity of their hopes in words and phrases. But, if this infinite message of Christianity is brought quite clearly to an individual and in a way that demands his faith, it is not for him alone as an individual to decide whether he will accept it or not. If the message reaches him in this way, he must take his place in the company of those who form the Church and thus proclaim the message to the world and keep it alive in the world's-history. That is the way in which the message was brought to us; it reached us in such a way that we must be its heralds and not merely its recipients and hearers. The Christian and the communities of Christians, as present or as represented here, are the Church which has to bear the burden of its own past, which must face its present with the courage to profess Christianity in word and life, with courage for the changes required by the existing situation, in loyalty in faith to the Christian message and in unshakeable hope for the future of the Church, since it is the profession of eternal hope which will not perish.

The future of the Church of our European nations can be predicted only with difficulty or not at all. It is the object, not of futurological calculation, but of each individual's eternal responsibility; and it grows, not out of futurology, but out of the unconditional loyalty of faith on the [114] part of each individual. But we know that, if the European nations, if we, let fall the torch of faith, hope and love, then other peoples will carry it through history to its end. The future of the Church is God and consequently eternal life for us.

STRUCTURAL CHANGE IN THE CHURCH OF THE FUTURE

The theme presented to the author here is so broad and complex that only a few remarks of an aphoristic character are possible within the space at his disposal; the reader then cannot expect a really systematic and comprehensive treatment. These limitations arise also from the fact that the author is not a church historian, nor a futurologist, nor a canonist, and consequently cannot claim any special competence in these fields of study which as such are relevant to the subject. He is merely a systematic, dogmatic theologian, for whom what is important and must be important is the permanent and perennially valid element of ecclesiology in the light of revelation. For the dogmatic theologian therefore the essential question is that of the possibilities of a structural change of the Church in a future secular society, in the light of the Catholic Church's existing and permanent self-understanding based on revelation. But, even if the question is raised in this way from the outset, the author is sure that such opportunities for structural change in the Church are extraordinarily great, although they are often not seen clearly enough even as mere opportunities and the institutional Church here in Germany and also in Rome (the author would not claim to be able to say anything significant about other regional churches, which are parts of the one Church) looks too hesitatingly and too nervously at these possible changes of the Church's structures.[1]

Leaving aside any subtle politological and juridical definitions of terms, by 'structures' here is meant simply everything that exists in fact [116] in the Church (as a whole or in a regional church) permanently and universally as a reality determining the action and decisions of the officeholders and church-members or as a norm for this action and these decisions. In this respect it is in the last resort a matter of indifference whether these determinants of action are simply factual conditions or legally constituted norms, whether they affect that action as the result of an explicit, considered decision or simply exercise their influence in practice, whether in themselves they are really ecclesial in character or (in the light of the Church's theological understanding of its nature) purely secular, as factors belonging to secular society.

I

During the 'Pian epoch' of the Church (if we may so describe the period of restoration in society and the Church after the French Revolution of 1789 up to the Second Vatican Council), in the Church's self-understanding the stress was laid on its 'unchangeability'. The Church was regarded as the stronghold and sign of what was eternally valid in an increasingly rapidly changing course of history, moving towards an indeterminate future in which nothing would any longer be secure and permanent. The Church insisted on its constitution jure divino as unchangeable, given to it from the outset by God himself in Jesus Christ (at the same time the fact that this knowledge of its divine foundation became explicit only in the course of history had little effect in practice on the Church's actual self-awareness). The Church insisted that its papal and episcopal constitutional structure was of divine law, coming from 'above', from Jesus Christ, and had not been set up 'democratically' from below. The First Vatican Council sanctioned as part of the immutable content of faith and of the Church's divinely established constitutional structure the Bishop of Rome's universal primacy of jurisdiction and supreme teaching authority – independently of the consent of the Church – over the Church as a whole and over all its particular churches.

There was a similar insistence during this period on an immutable natural law, from which concrete conclusions were drawn in regard to the most diverse fields of men's moral and social life. At least tacitly and in practice the impression prevailed that the institutional Church's life and action, even in their concrete expression, by and large, were the quite straightforward and immediately obvious, indisputable consequences of [117] the Church's perennially valid constitutional law and of the natural law: the institutional Church's concrete action was regarded as the almost self-evident manifestation of what is permanently valid in the Church.

Even during this Pian epoch there were of course some not inconsiderable changes in the structures (in the sense explained above) of the Church. With the secularized states concordats of various kinds were concluded, also with important consequences for the internal life of the Church. The liturgy continued to develop towards the far-reaching changes at the Second Vatican Council. There were quite significant changes in the Church's marriage laws. The college of cardinals as an elective body was slowly internationalized. If, on the whole, the 'new' Canon Law under Benedict XV was no more than an adjustment of the Church's existing law and practice, it really was 'new' in some respects and brought about a degree of change in the Church. In addition to these and similar changes in the structures of the Church at this time, there were certainly many others that could be mentioned. But on the whole the stress and the feeling of the self-understanding of the Church were concentrated during this period on unchangeability. And even for those who were aware of the great and lively history of the dogma and constitution of the Church in this self-understanding from the primitive Church to the Pian epoch, the impression prevailed that the Church had reached in its development a point from which there could be no return and beyond which not much really new or surprising was likely to happen. All this was worked out in terms of neoscholastic theology.

There were certainly two reasons why the stress (itself historically conditioned and changeable) in this self-understanding of the Church was laid on its 'unchangeability'. On the one hand, in face of a world which had been increasingly rapidly secularized from the time of the Enlightenment onwards, the Church was bound to feel threatened and had to find its means of existence in itself and no longer in a homogeneous Christian society; the forms of the intellectual life of secular society seemed alien to its own traditional shape; from the time of the Enlightenment also, it felt itself increasingly confronted by a militant anticlericalism. Not surprisingly in this situation, the Church became much more clearly aware of its own nature as distinct from the world and unchangeable. The other reason, closely linked with the first, lay in the fact that medieval and baroque theology (as preserved and revived in neoscholasticism) was and remains oriented a priori more or less unhistorically to the eternal essences of things, to what is permanently valid, and did not [118] and does not sufficiently allow for the fact that history itself is precisely the history of essences and of man's transcendence to God, not merely the sphere of the contingent, surrounded externally by the realm of eternal essences. In brief, during this epoch culminating in the First Vatican Council, the stress of the Church's self-understanding lay on its unchangeability, on the permanent validity of its nature and those constitutional structures which must be seriously taken into account, as well as elements admittedly changeable in themselves but regarded as participating to a certain extent in this permanent validity. (In a scholastic Denzinger-theology, for example, authentic statements of the magisterium were treated in practice as if they had the binding force of dogma and measures passed by curial officials regarded almost as straightforward decisions of the Pope using his supreme power of jurisdiction.)

There is no doubt that the feeling has grown and become more distinct since the Second Vatican Council that the Church is changeable in all its structures to a far greater extent than people thought during the Pian epoch. The reasons for this change in the Church's concrete self-understanding will not be set out here, particularly since they are obviously many and varied. In exegesis and history of dogma, theology has gradually roused an awareness generally in the Church of the historicity even of dogma and of the dogmatically formulated structures of the Church. It has now become clearer, and the view was sanctioned to a certain extent by Vatican II (despite reactionary trends after the Council in recent years), that the Church, now become a world-Church, must live in a secularized and pluralistic world and yet be engaged in missionary activity and present in quite new cultural fields beyond that of an older Europe; that it cannot simply live on the defensive, in a traditional and merely reactionary way; that – while remaining faithful to its message and to its own nature arising from that message – it needs an aggiornamento, an adaptation, to the world in which it must live and grow; that it must become involved in new, unforeseen situations, not brought about by itself but by which it is itself necessarily changed, since today in the age of scientific planning and futurology such changes (which have always existed) cannot take place tacitly and unobtrusively, without premeditation, but must also be considered and planned in advance. But – as we said – we are not going to consider here the reasons for this change of feeling and its necessity. All that can be done is to point to a number of somewhat arbitrarily chosen and unsystematically presented particular examples that show, even to the Catholic who completely [119] accepts the defined dogma of the nature of the Church, that the possibilities of such structural changes in the Church are much greater than they were thought to be in the Pian epoch. Whether the realization of particular individual possibilities is opportune or appropriate to the present and future external situation of the Church is another question.

First of all we have the Roman See, the task and function of the Pope, as these were defined by Vatican I and acknowledged as continuing to be valid by Vatican II. It is becoming increasingly clear and more apparent in the Church's self-understanding that this supreme and permanent power of jurisdiction of the Pope for the whole Church is not simply identical with the whole gigantic administrative machinery which has developed historically and continues to exist and operate up to the present time in Rome. The demarcation between what the Pope admits and up to a point must admit to belong to the autonomous competence of the particular churches and what he reserves to himself for the most part is not a matter of divine law, but has come to existence historically and is therefore changeable. For it cannot be claimed that the concrete and changeable settlement of this demarcation is simply dependent on a decision of the Pope, not rationally to be justified and not open to appeal, solely because the Pope is not subject to any higher earthly decision-making authority in the Church to which an appeal might legally be made. This demarcation, which is constantly in need of revision, can certainly be decided by objective arguments, even if the latter also take into account the Pope's understanding of the issue; with reference to the relationship between the universal government of the whole Church in Rome and the individual particular churches and their life, all general norms of Christian morality and of a system of law understood in a truly Christian sense (norms for exceptional cases, epikeia, tacit excuse, etc.) are genuinely valid and should be applied without hesitation.

The creation of concrete individual norms, which are to be valid for the Church as a whole, should be brought about with an institutionalized and obvious collaboration of the regional churches. In the light of the Church's constitution as based on divine law, all this is certainly feasible and could be urgently necessary to prevent wrong decisions or norms imposing too many restrictions on individual particular churches; but in practice this collaboration has not yet been institutionalized and made obvious to a sufficiently large extent and where progress has been made it has been dependent on the good will of the Roman authorities in regard [120] to a particular case. The internationalization of the Roman Curia has certainly made considerable progress since Vatican II, but it has not come about with the obvious collaboration of the authorities of the particular churches, the result being that the Curia has been internationalized more or less only in regard to the birthplace of its members: the latter cannot really be regarded as representatives of the churches from which they come, although this is really supposed to be the point of internationalization. (This is not to say that these internationally qualified curial officials ought to be representatives of their countries of origin in a strictly legal sense. But, on the other hand, it is noticeable that members of the Curia become quickly 'romanized', lose any real contacts with their countries of origin and become more Roman than the Romans.)

If what follows has a wider reference than merely to the relationship between Rome and the particular churches, it should be observed in the present context that it is quite compatible with the Pope's universal jurisdiction defined at Vatican I as in a certain sense 'unlimited' (and thus allowing for possibilities of changing the concrete structures of the Church) that this primatial power of the Pope is also restricted and by human law can impose on itself limits required by a particular historical situation. It is limited in the first place (apart from the limits imposed by Christian morality, which even the Pope may infringe under certain circumstances by a concrete act in such a way that the latter not only offends morality, but perhaps also is legally invalid) by divine law, in so far as the Pope – according to the teaching of Vatican Il – cannot abolish the episcopate, cannot replace it by office-holders who would be merely his officials; in so far also as the individual bishop governs his church, not only in the name of the Pope, but immediately in the name of Christ himself. This principle of Vatican II sounds innocuous, particularly since, according to current legislation (which of course is not unchangeable, even though the individual bishop, if he wants to govern legitimately, must live in unity and peace with the Roman See), the Pope appoints the individual bishop. But this principle, if taken seriously and given concrete expression, could also have far-reaching effects on the concrete structures of the Church. For it means that an individual bishop is not merely a regional executive official of Rome, carrying out on the spot what is decreed by Rome for the whole Church. On the contrary, he can take spiritual and administrative initiatives; these need not be seen from the very outset and always purely as applications of Roman norms and [121] authorized for that reason; in teaching also (for example, in concrete questions of morality) the bishop as such has his own initiative from the spirit of the gospel and need not always – for example, in concrete questions of Christian morality and of real life – be positively supported by Roman approval, merely because these questions have their importance everywhere in the Church. We might get the impression that our own bishops do not sufficiently appreciate the scope which this principle accords them or the possibilities of structural change it implies, that they act too frequently as if they were merely carrying out orders from Rome and wanting in every case to be positively 'covered' from there.

There are however limits to the Roman primatial power which that authority itself can and under certain circumstances must lay down in human law and which in the concrete involve changes in the actual historical form of papal constitutional law. In the first place no one will dispute the fact that the Holy See has made and can legitimately make concordats with states. And in such concordats (however they are to be interpreted in the light of the different theories on the subject), not infrequently, the Roman See restricts by a legal agreement the rights and the authority belonging to it 'as such'. For example, it may concede to a state a considerable degree of collaboration in the selection of candidates for the episcopate, it may grant to other authorities jure humano real and permanent rights that belong as such jure divino to itself alone. If this sort of thing is possible in relations between Church and state, it can be possible also in relations between the Roman See and other authorities and groups within the Church. There are in fact situations in which it would be not only possible, but also opportune and even morally necessary. Rights in regard to the appointment of bishops, to the organization of the liturgy, to sacramental practice, the laws of marriage, etc., which the Holy See claims in virtue of its authority jure divino, can be restricted by itself in favour of the particular churches and their independent existence appropriate to their own situation. (At the same time the original claim to these rights need not be simply unambiguous, even though for the sake of unity and peace in the Church the Pope must be granted the competence to decide his own competence and consequently not all Canon Law in the concrete is simply deduced from first principles, nor can it be established by a strictly rational argument.) Consequently, something of this kind can be wholly opportune and even concretely necessary.

It is not as if the appointment of bishops, the norms for selecting [122] priests (e.g., the law of celibacy, exclusion of women from the priesthood, definition of the grades of the sacramental ministry), etc., had necessarily to be laid down by Rome for the whole Church. In these and similar matters Rome could leave a great deal to the particular churches and should not from the very outset invoke the Pope's universal power of jurisdiction or the necessary unity of the Church in order to block such possibilities (it is not a question of more than this). Greater rights could be conceded to the particular churches, even if this concession meant or could at least be interpreted as an act of the supreme authority in the Church. (Not that every such concession necessarily has to be interpreted as a free act of favour on the part of Rome. Even Rome will not claim that the greater autonomy of the Eastern Uniate Churches – which it recognizes – is due simply to a free act of favour on the part of Rome which it could withdraw without more ado. The attitude which Rome adopts towards these autonomies of the Eastern Church, arising from the past, could also become at least a moral obligation in regard to autonomies of the particular churches to be acknowledged by Rome in view of the requirements of the future.) In brief, the right (which can also be a duty) of the supreme universal authority of Rome to decide its own limits in the Church permits in principle considerable flexibility in the concrete expression of this jus divinum: despite and even in its permanent validity, the latter is a historical factor open to change and continually permitting new forms of expression of its own nature and practice, even though these cannot directly be foreseen and will depend on future historical conditions. The great centralistic machinery of Rome, the multiplicity and allocation of offices, the range of tasks which Rome reserves to itself, the form of papal elections, the universal Canon Law covering the smallest details, the frequency of Rome's reactions to particular questions arising in all parts of the world, etc., are certainly not matters of divine law; they are changeable and always open to the critical question as to whether such concrete forms of the exercise of the universal papal authority are really appropriate to the concrete historical situation. (For the moment, it may be noticed incidentally that this is a question of great ecumenical importance.)

As far as the possibilities of structural change in the greater regional, particular churches are concerned, the question today is concretely that of the possibility and opportuneness of fitting 'more democratic' structures into these individual churches (dioceses, national churches). What is important in this connection is certainly not the term 'democracy'; it [123] is obvious that these churches neither can nor should simply copy the decision-making 'democratic' structures in the secular field in their own countries, but they must take into account realistically the problems of 'democracy' even in that field (we need only recall, apart from other things, the threat to such 'democracy' from 'democratic centralism' in what are known as the 'socialist' countries). What is important in the concrete is the necessity (particularly today and always involved in the very nature of the Church) for the collaboration of churchpeople in the life of the Church and the decisions of authority. In the light of the Church's nature churchpeople are not merely recipients of what is done by the institutional Church but are themselves the Church. And today (later we must speak of this at greater length) the real efficacy of the Church's ministries (proclamation, administration of the sacraments, government, etc.) depends largely on the free collaboration of churchgoers themselves. This however is not to be expected, unless the people are obviously involved to the greatest possible extent in the decision-making of the institutional Church. Nor is this necessary participation to be expected in practice if it is to be merely informal; it needs juridical and visible structures which themselves are not in every case necessarily dependent on the good will of the office-holders strictly so called.

The duties of such collaboration by the churchpeople, stressed as they are on all sides, can be concretely fulfilled only if they correspond to real and perceptible rights. Certainly, since the Second Vatican Council, people have been engaged everywhere in creating such new juridically constituted structures for the collaboration of churchgoers in the Church's life and decision-making, beginning perhaps with parish councils. Nor should the fact be overlooked that, by the very nature of the Church, this collaboration and the legal structures on which it depends can and must take very different forms in the light of the concrete issues to be settled. (Collaboration in regard to the Church's finances can and must certainly take a different form from that of organizing the innermost centre of the liturgy or dealing with a question relating to the faith of the Church as a whole.) The particular opportunities for such new structures of the collaboration of the churchpeople in the Church's life and decision-making cannot of course be considered here.

All that we can do is to point to a fundamental principle that can be put into effect without more ado in the formation of such new structures. In principle even the jure divino episcopal constitution of the Church does not mean that the collaboration of churchgoers can and must [124] always and in every case be merely informative and advisory, merely of a consultative character. If in the early Church the people and the ordinary clergy had the right to an essential part in the deliberations leading to the appointment of a new bishop, this was certainly not an infringement of the perennially valid episcopal constitution any more than the proprietary Church (Eigenkirche) of the early Middle Ages (where ecclesiastical appointments were under the control of the secular ruler), even though such juridical conditions cannot be copied without more ado for present or future times. Certainly there are matters to be decided even today and in the future in which the collaboration of the people, not only in a consultative but also in a deliberative form, would be possible and appropriate.

There are certainly many issues where the churchpeople could and even should share in decision-making and in which the individual bishop or a bishops' conference could not be bound by the decision only if that authority could declare conscientiously that it was clearly contrary to the substance of the Church's faith or to the jure divino constitution of the Church: that is, in a situation analogous to that of a state where the supreme constitutional court (like the episcopate in the Church) declares that a law passed by Parliament is unconstitutional. In no other case should the episcopate (or an individual bishop in his own diocese) invoke episcopal authority in a decision contrary to the will of the majority of the people, if only because such decisions today are likely to remain ineffective in practice. That in fact was the situation at the Würzburg Synod in 1971, when in not a few cases – even those in which no conscientious reservation could be made – the German bishops actually decided in a way contrary to that of the existing or foreseeable majority of the people attending there. This sort of thing is not necessary in virtue of the Church's constitutional law and not appropriate today, since it creates the impression that the bishops eventually decide solely according to their own discretion (even after listening to the representatives of the laity and the clergy) and in questions in which it is not at all necessary to reserve such a competence to themselves.

If the principle of a possible deliberative and not merely consultative collaboration of the people in the decisions of the institutional Church were seen more clearly and institutionalized more courageously, this would do something to rouse the laity from mere acquiescence and indifference. And in particular, regional churches the opportunities of structural change in the Church are still far from being exhausted, even [125] though there remain very many unanswered questions as to how this sort of thing could and should be brought about in an appropriate way and in the light of a realistic appraisal of the concrete situation.

II

To be honest, it must be admitted that what has been said up to now – properly speaking – does not really even touch on this theme or at best touches on it only remotely. For all that has hitherto been said, and in a very abstract way, is that structural change is possible in the Church, despite the latter's enduring nature. What possible changes of the Church's structures are opportune and desirable for the Church's endurance and life cannot be settled merely by such theoretical reflections. In order to answer the question which was really supposed to be the theme of these reflections, we would have to know what is likely to be the shape of the secular society in which the Church will have to live and in which it must develop its concrete structures in dialogue and confrontation, in order to secure as well as possible its endurance, its life and its missionary activity in that future society.

But what will this future society look like? Can anyone say? It is possible to maintain – and, up to a point, rightly – that the present structures of the Church are not sufficiently adapted even to society today and that in this respect also there is still a good deal of leeway to be made up. It can be said that much in the present-day structures of the Church has not yet been brought into line adequately (naturally, with the aid of dialogue) with the conditions of a secularized and pluralistic society; that the Church in many respects relies too much on sociological conditions (what remains of the symbiosis of state, society and Church, peculiarities of a rural or middle-class society, relics of Christian values even in the secularized society, etc.) which still exist up to a point, but meet with increasing resistance and are now being rapidly eliminated. Certainly it can also be said that even today the actual effectiveness of the institutional Church in regard to individuals is no longer backed by a consensus on a Christian weltanschauung that is taken for granted in civic society, but needs to be sustained by living basic communities built up from below, formed by a free decision of faith on the part of individuals against [126] public trends in society; that the institutional structures of the Church no longer sustain the faith of individuals as in former times, but (so far as their actual efficacy is concerned) are themselves sustained by this faith.

In face of this simple observation of the Church's present situation, it is certainly possible to set up very diverse postulates for a change in the Church's structures, while upholding the permanence of its ultimate nature: for a greater 'democratization' (rightly understood) of the Church, not restricting the collaborations of the 'laity' to purely consultative functions but giving it a form appropriate to each particular issue; for greater openness in decision-making in the Church's life, even for the non-clerical members of the Church; for greater autonomy of the major, particular, regional churches within the one Church; for the opportuneness or necessity today of those things which we have already suggested as possible in principle in the light of the Church's nature. If we could bring them under the heading of structural change in the widest sense of the term, it would be possible in such reflections even today to speak of a declericalized, serving, caring Church, preaching morality without moralizing, being open to secular society, boldly giving concrete directives for public life without always declaring these to be permanently valid dogma or part of the unchanging content of natural law, socially critical without seeking to dictate to secular society or restrict its autonomy. But we shall not go into further detail here about these postulates of structural change perceptible from the very situation of present-day society, however much reflections of this kind in terms of practical (and political) theology are still required today.

In speaking about these things however, have we or could we have really said anything about structural change of the Church in the society of the future? Is it possible at the present time to say anything about this or can we speak about it only when the future society actually exists? Or are we to say, we must talk about it now, since the Church must approach its future looking forward to it and equipped for it? Or are we to say that it is impossible to talk about it yet, since secular futurology predicts much about the world of the future but says scarcely anything that is at present obviously relevant to a structural change by which the Church can and must be prepared for a future society? What special features of a future epoch could perhaps be foreseen which might be important for a structural change in the Church to be prepared even now? (For example, is it not even now time to begin a theological [127] reflection about whether the seat of the primacy in the Church will have to remain in Rome in the future, when the real centres of power and authority will no longer lie in the older Europe?) These are hard questions. The Church must always be aware of the fact that questions like this are not irrelevant and are not to be suppressed merely because there is no obvious answer to them, acceptable to all sides. For even open, unsolved questions – if they are not suppressed – keep alive the willingness to bring about such structural changes promptly when they become necessary: they have then a very concrete significance.

For the time being however, one thing at least can be said. In a future society, in a secularized world, all the elements of which are everywhere interdependent, Christendom will be able adequately to fulfil its function as sacrament of the salvation of the world only by itself becoming more of a unity than it has been hitherto. Everything that is sought by the ecumenical movement is also a task imposed on Christendom by and for a future society. But this also necessarily means that the Catholic Church even now must boldly set to work on all those structural changes which on the one hand are possible in the light of its nature and on the other hand can help the separated Christian Churches more easily to appreciate their solidarity and more easily to unite with one another until a real unity of the one Church of Christ is reached. Ecumenism is a task which is certainly imposed also by a future society and must carry with it considerable structural changes in the Catholic Church, particularly since in the future even more than now this Catholic Church cannot remain the Church of the West, sending small exports to the rest of the world, but must really be a world-Church where the different cultures and spheres of history enjoy equal rights.

When ecumenism is becoming an urgent task of the Catholic Church, acquiring quite new dimensions, because of the future society, must not the great, particular churches (for example, in Africa, Asia and Latin America) be granted quite new fields for the actualizations of their own natures? Can those theological questions which once divided the churches in the world of the Mediterranean and of Europe retain their importance in the world of today? Can the law of the world-Church remain as ‘Roman’ as it was formerly? Must not the question of mutual recognition of ministries be tackled with much more theological energy and confidence, while aiming at a generous (and possible) solution, than it has been hitherto when there was too much fear and (if we may so express it) too little theological imagination? When this sort of thing and so much [128] else is appreciated and its realization facilitated, does it not necessitate in the Catholic Church very considerable structural changes, which must be seen to be possible and must be prepared for the sake of the future society, so that as far as possible a united Christendom can exist and fulfil its task in this future society?

It is very difficult and may well be impossible to predict anything about the future situation of the Church (as starting point for postulates of structural change), since it is difficult to foresee anything about the future society that is also relevant to the Church. When we say that the life of the future society will be that of a rational and technical world-civilization, in which all the formerly separate cultural and historical fields will be intensely concentrated, in an urban culture, in a society which will have developed higher sociological structures than existed or were necessary formerly, we are saying something which is true on the whole but from which anything about a necessary structural change in the Church can be deduced only with difficulty. One thing however should be clear: nowhere in the world will the Church of the future live in a society homogeneously Christian by nature and, as a secular society, taking for granted and supporting the Church's activity. That much can be said, even if the question remains open as to what economic systems (themselves understood as ideologically binding) will prevail or be alone dominant in this one world-civilization. Everywhere in the world the Church will be a Diaspora-Church, no longer existing within the homogeneous ambience of a Christian Europe, even though the numerical relationship between Christians (who are actually such) and non-Christians (who never were Christians or who have again become non-Christians) may remain very different in the different individual cultural and sociological areas of the one world-civilization.

If the Church in a future society will everywhere be a Diaspora-Church, its mission and message in the world will no longer be favoured and supported from the very outset by a homogeneous public opinion, by laws it has itself inspired, by a general acceptance of the position of its leaders. The Church will be an individual sociological group in a pluralist society and then only if the rest of society is tolerantly pluralistic in a liberal sense – something also which cannot be predicted with certainty. Consequently the real effectiveness of such a Church and of its authorities will depend – and in fact much more decisively than in Europe in the past – on the assent of faith freely given by individuals and the commitment of its members 'from below'. What has hitherto been [129] regarded more or less as an 'established' Church will become a community-Church; parishes (as administrative districts set up by ecclesiastical authority and evenly spread over a certain territory) will have to become living communities from below, not from the outset directly bordering territorially on one another, sharing much more clearly than formerly in the determination of their ecclesial life-style, in the selection of their 'officials', and deciding the mode of life of the latter (allowing always for the permanent necessity of common ecclesial structures and the unity – maintained by bishops – of the individual congregations with one another), maintaining unity of faith with a diversity of emphasis on the various aspects of their Christian and ecclesial life, etc.

The community Church is not in opposition to the Church as made up of territorial parishes, even though the latter as locally constituted will exist in future alongside personally constituted parishes with a different basis, in greater numbers and having greater significance. Parishes in the traditional sense will themselves have to become living community parishes more clearly than hitherto and can no longer remain (more or less) institutions by which the official Church provides for the individual religious needs of isolated individuals.

In the light of this Diaspora situation of the future Church, then, considerable structural changes in the Church must be expected and are clearly beginning to take shape even now, although in our own country we might get the impression that the institutional Church is giving way to pressure in regard to these changes or merely tolerating them, not anticipating or leading. The future Church consisting of communities in Diaspora situations will of course always be in danger of becoming a 'sect' in a negative sense in terms of the sociology of religion. This danger of becoming a 'little flock' in the wrong sense of the term, with an elitist self-consciousness and an ideologically justified incapsulation of the community and its members from the general cultural and sociological life to windward of history, must be recognized and opposed. Difficult as this may be in detail, the structures of the future community-churches must be shaped so as to face as squarely as possible the danger that the community might become the refuge of people whom life has treated badly, who have suffered at the hands of society and its members; the community must be open to all and aware of its continuing function toward the 'world'. If we thus anticipate future and necessary structural changes on a large scale in the Church, if a timid conservatism does not blind us to the necessity and depth of these future changes, although of [130] course the continuity beneath the change from today to tomorrow cannot be denied, then there emerges as a postulate of the Church's strategy what has been called a tutiorism of change.

What is required now is not timid conservatism, uncreatively yielding when it seems that nothing more can be done, least of all at the present time. In the long run, the safest course and the one that will do least harm is to muster the courage now to attempt what in all probability will be demanded of the institutional Church tomorrow. Why is it so timid and hesitant about the question of the rights that can be granted to lay-people in the Church without detriment to its papal and episcopal structure, even though it knows that tomorrow it will presumably have as members only those who acknowledge it as a result of a deeply felt Christian decision and not as liberal-minded traditional Christians? Why are people so fearful and concerned about a Roman centralism that is always in danger of imposing an undue uniformity on the living structures and forces in individual major particular churches, thus rendering the latter ineffective? Why does not Rome have the courage to attempt a new language in declarations and decisions which might then have some prospect of 'getting across' to the world? These and many other similar questions could be raised. A mentality regarding risk and experiment – the outcome of which is not yet certain – perhaps as the safest and necessary course for today and tomorrow, without immediately holding back in fear of disorder and diverging trends in the particular churches, certainly could and should creatively and courageously inaugurate many structural changes in the Church.

III

As in every society, so too in the Church, there will always be conservative and progressive trends, both of which in principle are necessary and useful when change must be combined with continuity. If then we are talking about structural change in the Church and if our endeavours are to find concrete expression, there will always be people, including office-holders, in the Church who are for and against these changes, particularly since the latter cannot simply be deduced from the very nature of the Church or from an analysis of the situation at the time – an analysis which can never be really complete – but remain matters of discretion, so that the antagonism between conservative and progressive forces in [131] the Church can never be wholly eliminated. It might even be said that, despite the enduring unity of the Church and the love that must prevail in it, this antagonism in some respects is more acute than it is in any other, secular society. It is really easy to see the reason for this and the clear awareness of the reason could help to a certain extent to defuse the antagonism. In secular societies decisions for or against structural change (unless they are radically revolutionary decisions in face of radically revolutionary situations) are mostly matters of discretion and refer to objects which can easily be seen to be of merely relative importance.

Within the Church also structural changes as such are concerned with similarly relative realities which are part of the present world and the sphere of the human. But churchgoing believers regard these things (rightly, in principle) as related in some sense 'sacramentally' to the properly divine sphere, to man's eternal destiny and salvation. That is why, despite their essential relativity, these things have a significance and importance for the believer going substantially beyond that of purely secular realities. These things (the word of Scripture, the properly sacramental signs and a great deal more of what is involved in the concrete structures of the Church) secure the relationship of the believer to the eternal. If he then gets the impression that these familiar realities in the Church establish authentically and vitally his relationship to God and his salvation or if he begins to feel that they are making this relationship difficult or even obstructing it, he will be inclined to apply himself with a passion for the eternal to defend the permanence of these realities or to insist on changing them. That is why dogmatic conflicts, even though they appear at first sight to be merely about 'forms', are carried on so passionately and stubbornly in the Church; that is why wars of religion have been carried on so relentlessly; that is why, over and over again in the Church, there have been passionate and stubborn conflicts about what might seem to outsiders or to those living at a later time to be almost ludicrously unimportant (from the date of Easter in the early Church to the modern reform of the Mass liturgy).

The struggle about earthly things in the Church is often carried on with a passion usually devoted to the eternal, since the two cannot very easily be clearly distinguished either objectively or emotionally. But if the distinction is seen and made clear in regard to the controversies on true or false structural changes in the Church it could help to defuse the struggles up to a point. The 'progressives' should not assume that their wishes are absolute (new proclamation of the gospel, new shaping of the [132] liturgy, more 'democratic' structures of the internal life of the Church, better and bolder fulfilment of the Church's mission to the world, etc.). They must see that it is possible to work for salvation, to love God and neighbour, even in the 'old' Church; that in this Church too, despite all justified desires for reform, it is possible to be a Christian; that in the traditional Church also (even if it ought to be different and better and if we must work and struggle to make it so) there is nothing in principle to deny the Christian a true and radical Christianity, particularly since a critical approach to the traditional structures of the Church is itself not only a natural right of man but a Christian right and a specific task of the Christian as such in the Church as such. On the other hand, the 'conservatives' must learn that in individual cases they may well judge rightly on matters of discretion, but that what they want is likewise only of relative importance. (For instance, the controversy about Latin or the vernacular in the liturgy: both are of relative importance, both are purely matters of discretion, it is possible to pray in both languages, it is possible to fight for either side, everyone can and must accept in patience and the love of unity a decision which always remains provisional, on whatever lines it is made by one authority or another.) Conservatives and progressives can prematurely and by over-simplification associate or even identify what is relative and historically conditioned with what is eternal and perennially valid. Then the conflict between the opportuneness or inopportuneness of structural changes in the Church becomes radicalized and poisoned; then the necessary tolerance, with which such a conflict and the decisions in such a conflict must take place, no longer exists and the conflict becomes profoundly un-Christian, because – on one side or the other or even on both sides – God, his salvation and his grace, are identified with things that simply are not God, but are subject to the changes of history, which demands change in continuity and continuity through change.

DREAM OF THE CHURCH

NOT TOO FANTASTIC

I have a dream to relate. This is difficult. For, as far as I can discover subsequently, I rarely dream. Moreover, this dream that I have to relate has to do with the Church. And in this respect it is easy to have nightmares. But this is to be a fine, hopeful dream. All of which creates further difficulties. Nor, on the whole, is the Church a particularly attractive object for a dream. But if I am to dream of something vividly concrete, being a Catholic theologian, what occurs to me almost inevitably is Rome with the Pope; and, since it is to be linked with the future, the dream must create hope for the future unity of Christendom. Since however a good dream should not be too fantastic, this dream was in fact as I shall relate it.

With a former student of mine I was going up one of the fine staircases in the Vatican. Oddly enough this student had been employed as a theologian in the Vatican itself. This was not something that might have been taken for granted. For my students are more likely to be regarded there with suspicion. But sometimes things turn out well. Perhaps the reason for this lucky chance was that it was spring 1985 when we were going up this staircase, although there had been lifts even in the Vatican for a long time.

'I am taking you with me', said the student, 'to one of the sessions which are taking place here at the present time, at which about a dozen of the leading representatives of the Christian Churches from all over the world come to meet the Pope for a friendly conversation about the possibility at last of the ecumenical movement going beyond non-committal expressions of friendship by church leaders and profound discussions [134] by theologians, after it has been stagnating for ten years. The churchmen sit at a round table, so that it is not obvious who is above and who is below. The Pope permits one or two theologians to listen to the debates, a little to one side, particularly since they were engaged in preparing the documents for these discussions. It is not the first session, everything has been going well for some time, supervision at the door is a mere formality; I can easily take you with me without being noticed.'

Soon the session started. The people really had come from all parts of the world. You could see it in their faces. The whites were very numerous, but no longer a majority. The actual participants at first stood around talking in a relaxed way, then the Pope also came. Mutual greetings took place without ceremony, as between old friends. An African Protestant clergyman said a prayer. I did not get the impression that this was a mere ritual, of the kind usual before official church business is transacted. The Pope gave an impression of frankness and cheerfulness, reminding me by his lack of solemn dignity agreeably of John XXIII. He spoke English. What else could he have done? What he said was more or less as follows.

THE POPE'S SUGGESTION

'Gentlemen, dear brothers! We have certainly made good progress in our common efforts, even though we are still involved in the first – the dogmatic – section of our discussions and have not yet got down at all to any of the canonical, liturgical, pastoral questions. Today we come to what is certainly the most difficult of these dogmatic questions – that of the papal primacy in the Church – and in this first part of our negotiations to the question of the papal primacy of teaching, as this is understood in the Roman Catholic Church. What I have to say on this question is explained at greater length in the papers you have already received and – I assume – submitted to a critical examination. Consequently I will only indicate briefly once again the decisive points of this written report.

First of all, this report assumes that the question before us cannot be solved by drawing a practical conclusion from exegetical and historical investigations, important as these may be. This is what the Churches have been trying to do for four hundred years, but without result. We must at last accept the consequences and try a different method. I think we should start out from those convictions in the Churches which are [135] regarded in a given Church as essential to the Christian faith. With convictions of this kind, regarded as absolute (not that all opinions in the Churches are so regarded), it should be assumed in principle that they are true and consequently compatible with one another, although hitherto no one could or would see this compatibility. We should also start out from the assumption that in the Churches to be united not every proposition which one Church expressly affirms with an absolute commitment of faith is bound to have the same weight also in every other Church and must likewise be taught – even here and now – as an indisputable article of faith. All that needs to be assumed is that it is not absolutely rejected in this other Church, but that the possibility of a positive appropriation is left confidently to the history of faith as it will work out in the future. If there is – and none of us doubts this – a real history of faith, a history of dogma and not merely a history of theology, we cannot expect this history to take precisely the same form at exactly the same time in all the Churches, but can only assume that this lack of simultaneity is accepted by all the Churches.

I am quite sure that the Roman See in our time cannot merely rest secure in the possession of its traditional self-understanding, as it has done on the whole hitherto, until the other Churches come to recognize what we believe to be the legitimate authority of the Bishop of Rome, but must itself-even though apparently at great sacrifice – do something actively to bring about an agreement on this question. Certainly no Roman theologian has hitherto supposed that every individual power and every concrete style adopted by the popes over many centuries in fulfilling their task and exercising their authority pertained unambiguously and necessarily to the dogmatic nature of the Petrine ministry. But the Holy See itself has not hitherto made much effort to bring out clearly in practice the distinction between what must be absolutely firmly held as a matter of faith by the Catholic conscience and those matters of doctrine and practice relating to the Roman primacy which are time-conditioned and can be given up if a particular situation requires this. The paper I have handed to you attempts to make this distinction with reference to the teaching primacy. On this theme here are one or two further remarks.

Gentlemen, dear brothers in Christ! I think I can appreciate the difficulties you feel in regard to the teaching authority of the Pope as accorded to him at the First Vatican Council and left unchanged at the Second. At the moment we may leave aside the two Marian dogmas proclaimed [136] by Pius IX and Pius XII, since it has been made clear to us on other occasions that the objective content of these two Catholic dogmas are not necessarily to be rejected by non-Catholic Christians as absolutely incompatible with their faith. As we already said, there can be mutual agreement on the fact that purely exegetical investigations or historical investigations carried out by methods of purely secular history do not lead to a joint conclusion. For – I would like to say – the real difficulty of non-Catholic Christians is in regard to future possibilities, to conceivable future ex cathedra decisions by the Pope. In this connection, even though they are prepared in principle to recognize a Petrine ministry, such Christians think that they are not in a position to make out a kind of blank cheque for the Pope in regard to the future. It does not seem to them to be clear and unequivocal that divine providence, which keeps the Church in the truth of Christ, is necessarily bound to be victorious in its effects when the Pope defines something and not at another point and in a different way. To the non-Catholic Christian it seems that the Catholic concentration of the victorious grace of truth promised to the Church precisely on a particular and juridically determinable act of the Pope is a human materialization of the grace of truth. This legalization seems incredible to these Christians also because, according to the evidence of history, on the one hand the ordinary magisterium of the Pope in authentic doctrinal decisions at least in the past and up to very recent times was often involved in error and on the other hand Rome was accustomed to put forward and insist on such decisions as if there could be no doubt about their ultimate correctness and as if any further discussion of them was unbecoming for a Catholic theologian.

I wanted to say this once and for all without prejudice and explicitly, since even the Second Vatican Council did not speak clearly enough about such authentic but reformable Roman doctrinal decisions and since Roman procedure after the Council left something to be desired by way of straightforward clarity and modesty. Purely theoretical arguments on our side have little prospect of success in practice in face of these inhibitions on the non-Catholic side. But – and this is my firm intention – here in Rome we can attempt to show more clearly and in a more mandatory fashion than hitherto that the concrete mode of procedure before and for an eventual papal ex cathedra decision in future will certainly be of such a kind that a non-Catholic Christian will not need to fear in practice and concretely that his blank cheque will be filled in with a papal teaching that is bound to be opposed to his conscience in [137] regard to matters of faith. I am determined to codify a precise and transparent procedure defining exactly how the course of decision-making must run in Roman doctrinal decisions, if and as far as these decisions can still be expected in the future. Obviously I am prepared to accept suggestions as concrete as possible in regard to the content of such norms of procedure. At the moment however I want only to explain to you again briefly why such a procedure, although it does not yet exist, is compatible with the self-understanding of the Roman teaching primacy in the form binding on Catholics.

First of all it is a clear and conciliar teaching that a Pope even in ex cathedra decisions does not receive any new revelation from heaven. Consequently, when preparing for a doctrinal decision, the Pope must make use of all the human means at his disposal in this particular situation. But the moral norms implicit in this principle can be more clearly articulated and codified today in view of the present situation and the opportunities it offers. I would like to suggest what these norms could and should contain in at least one respect. When we learn from the First and Second Vatican Council that the Pope is infallible in an ex cathedra decision and that such decisions are irreformable of themselves and not in virtue of the consent of the Church, this merely means that these definitions do not acquire their definitive validity only by the subsequent juridical verification of their correctness by a higher legal authority in the Church, distinct from the Pope. But nothing of this implies anything more precise about the way in which such a papal decision itself comes to be.

The First Vatican Council also shows that papal infallibility is not independent of the irreversibly victorious promise of God to the Church as a whole. In an ex cathedra decision the Pope acts as head of the Church and of the whole episcopate as an authority that is restricted by the Church as a whole and its infallible faith. Consequently, in preparing ex cathedra decisions, the Pope must necessarily have recourse to the sense of faith of the whole Church, not in the form of a public opinion poll, but by looking to what is truly the Church's sense of faith. If such a recourse were not necessary, the Pope would need to appeal to a new revelation. But the Pope does not possess or receive any such revelation. He is the authentic spokesman of the Church's sense of faith and for this he has the assistance of the Spirit, an assistance which must not be understood as psychological inspiration, but which must mean the success, actually coming in the last resort from God, of his appeal to the [138] infallible sense of faith of the Church as a whole. This reference to the whole Church's sense of faith of course takes different forms at the different stages of the Church's history in the light of the opportunities available at any particular time. Today certainly an explicit recourse to the episcopate as a whole is absolutely morally necessary from the nature of the case. Today also this recourse is possible in the most varied ways. But it is not now merely a laudable practice, maintained also by my predecessors Pius IX and Pius XII (perhaps in ways that were not satisfactory in every respect), but an absolute requirement. Such an explicit appeal is technically quite feasible today, even apart from a general council. But in that case it is also a moral obligation. For how could the Pope today say honestly that he had done what was humanly possible and morally required to acquire a human certainty that his teaching was a part of the Church's assured sense of faith if he had wanted to dispense with this inquiry which is quite feasible at the present time?

It is obvious that such a consultation today would have to take place in certain forms now possible of explicitness, transparency, facilitating dialogue, discussion with theologians, investigation of the believers' sense of faith, and so on – in a word, in straightforward sincerity and making use of the publicity now taken for granted – even though I must admit that even up to recent times these procedures have not been considered clearly enough or practised in Rome, as is evident from a glance at very recent dogmatic declarations by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. If such procedures were clearly articulated, expressly laid down as binding and applied in practice, if moreover in addition to the consultation of the episcopate as a whole there were included a consultation of the more important church leaders whose Churches had entered into a union with Rome respecting their independence, the papal decision emerging from all this would be both a decision of faith of the Church as a whole and also a papal ex cathedra decision in the sense of Vatican I. With such procedures even non-Catholic Christians would no longer need to fear an arbitrary manipulation of the papal teaching authority opposed to the Spirit of Jesus and of the Church.

My dear brothers, I must ask your patience for a second consideration. The Roman Catholic faith in the existence of a papal teaching authority, which in principle is always involved in the permanent nature of the Church, even though it has not always been clearly explained, does not [139] imply that the actual exercise of this authority is the same at all times – even in the past this was not so – nor does it imply that it is independent of any historical and consequently varying preconditions. Because of the way in which the history of dogma of the first two millennia of the Church has usually been interpreted, we Catholics are accustomed to regard it as an increasingly progressive unfolding and articulation of the ultimate substance of faith in an increasing number of fresh individual explicit articles and consequently involuntarily to see the papal teaching primacy as actively involved in the emergence of these new and differentiating articles. Hitherto we have involuntarily assumed that the exercise of the Pope's teaching primacy, when he spoke ex cathedra, took the form of an explanation and laying down of articles which, although in the last resort implicit in the tradition of faith, nevertheless appeared to be somehow materially new and as previously scarcely explicitly palpable, as – for example – the two Marian dogmas of 1854 and 1950. But it seems to me that it is completely unproven and not at all probable that the papal teaching authority will continue to be exercised in this way in the future. The future history of doctrine of Christianity and the Church does not seem to be tending towards a further material differentiation of the substance of the Christian faith, but towards a new expression of the ultimate basic substance of Christianity, corresponding to the mental climate and sociopolitical situation of today and tomorrow. Consequently, it would be necessary to consider also how the papal teaching authority should be exercised in its diverse grades up to the highest if it is to endure into the future.

history of dogma or, consequently, of the concrete way in which the papal teaching authority will be exercised. I would otherwise have to provide a more precise analysis of the mental climate of the world, of the present-day irreversible pluralism in a world that is nevertheless one, and thus clarify the assumptions drawn from secular history which affect the experience of faith of the world-Church today. Of course, this is not possible here. I appeal simply to your experience, brothers. In fulfilling your task, you all find that the message of the gospel offers a real hope for the future only when its innermost redeeming and liberating basic truth emerges from a direct, vital contact with men and the world as they are today and will be tomorrow. From that standpoint, I think, the future concrete exercise of the papal teaching primacy cannot be and cannot seek to be anything but a defence and [140] up-to-date new statement of the basic substance of Christianity, that is, of the faith which is as obvious to you as it is to us Catholics.

I do not want to pursue further this perspective of the future with reference to the material content of the papal teaching primacy. But if this perspective is on the whole correct and if the formal way of exercising this teaching authority is clearly and juridically assured also by the Roman See, then, I think, for non-Catholic Christians there is no longer any reason in this respect to refuse to enter into a union even with the Roman Church, leaving entirely open the question as to whether these other great, particular Churches, living in unity and peace with the Roman Church, also have to proclaim explicitly the doctrine of the papacy precisely in the form presented to us in Vatican I. If a concrete and practical agreement on the papal teaching primacy, on the lines I have just indicated, could be attained among the Christian Churches, it would not alone remove all difficulties felt by non-Catholic Christians in regard to the Pope.

What has been said does not of course answer the whole question of the concrete exercise of the power of leadership in regard to the whole Church as this is claimed by the papacy. But we have made progress on this question in the past twenty years, since even according to explicit declarations the Apostolic See is convinced that the future unity of the Church will not mean reducing all the Churches to a uniformity modelled on the present-day Roman Church of the West, but that the particular Churches in uniting with Peter may and should retain to the greatest possible extent their own laws, their fidelity to their own tradition and history, that even in regard to the mutual recognition of ministries such an agreement has been or can be attained in a form which the Apostolic See thought it could not accept even a short time ago. This however is no part of the theme at the present moment.

My dear brothers, I am leaving you alone for today. For it may be a good thing, without regard for me, for you to discuss with each other the questions which the memorandum I presented to you and the remarks I have just made attempted to answer.'

SPONTANEOUS REACTIONS

The Pope took leave of the others with very little ceremony. The whole team had got to work so well, each one knowing everyone else, that no [141] one thought it odd that all the former court ceremonial had disappeared. The other churchmen present stayed on, formed themselves into different groups and went on talking to each other. From our observation point in the background we could see that the conversation continued frankly and honestly, without bothering about subtle theological assurances. Admittedly I was able to catch only fragments of the conversation and I cannot now recall exactly who said the things that I managed to hear. To repeat: it was clear from their tone that none of them wanted to proclaim eternal truths or issue solemn decrees, but only to give their first impressions and explain their spontaneous reactions. Then one of them (I think it was an African) said: 'O God, I really can't understand why the whole thing should be such a terrible problem. Although we want to retain the autonomy of our Churches, we do really want one Church. And, while we co-operate in a "parliamentary" spirit, it is obvious to us that a concrete, living person must be the bearer and representative of this unity and must naturally have something to say about it. It would really seem ridiculous to me if we were to set out afresh to discover a representative of this kind, when we know from the history of the Church that one is already available.' He laughed and said: 'Perhaps that does not sound like very profound theology; there is really nothing in it about the nature of the Petrine ministry in the light of faith; we can leave it to others to think that one out. But why should not this simple consideration impose on me an obligation of coming to a realistic, concrete arrangement with the Roman See, so long as the latter requires from me no more than I can honestly give?'

Another person, who gave the impression of being a subtle theologian of the European style, began what almost amounted to a theological lecture. It could be seen that he was still under the influence of anti-Roman feelings from former times. This is more or less what he said: 'We have been listening to an account of a shrewd strategic retreat on the part of modern Roman theology, but that is not to say that this retreat is not acceptable or cannot be taken seriously. But what did we hear exactly? The Roman See hitherto and even at the Second Vatican Council insisted that an ex cathedra decision is infallible "of itself" and not in virtue of the consent of the Church. Now the Pope has simply placed this consent of the whole Church – which he had rejected – before instead of after the ex cathedra decision. Verbally he has not given up anything that he formerly claimed and yet he has admitted that we are right. He has got himself out of the noose. And who are we to object to this?'

[142] A third, evidently from the West, but looking a little more 'spiritual' than the second speaker, disagreed with this. 'I do not think', he said, 'that we can regard the Pope's declaration today in this way. After all, he justified his new attitude entirely with arguments drawn from his own tradition and always recognized as the starting point in Roman theology, even though no one had hitherto drawn from them the conclusions which the Pope put forward today and which he is prepared to put into practice. This sort of thing should not be suspected as a Roman trick. What in fact is happening is that progress is being made towards a unification by which it will become clear that it is possible to remain faithful to our own decision of faith without having to reject that of the others. As a result of this progress, after centuries-old obscurities, we can now see clearly that many more truths, the real meaning of which need not be abandoned, can enter into the one truth of Christ, more at any rate than we had hitherto thought, when we assumed that we had to interpret these many truths as contradicting each other. If the Pope really clearly, transparently and – for, all men of good will – palpably refers the decision he has reached back to the faith of the Church as a whole, we ought not to pronounce a decided "No" to the teaching primacy of the Pope.'

In my dream the churchmen's conversation continued in this way for a long time after the Pope's departure. It roused hopes because the impression evidently prevailed that a more concrete offer had to be made in response to the Pope's suggestion.

My dream had come to an end. When I told a friend about it, he suggested drily that it was the sort of dream that could be expected of a teacher of theology. For only someone who was forever teaching could make people go on talking so long in a dream: it was not a real dream pointing to a glorious future, but the continuation into the night of theological reflections begun during the day. But I maintained that it was better to dream of something that could be realized and realized soon than to dream in a general way of a future of the Church that no one could foresee. My friend said: 'Let us hope that you have dreamed of something that will really come about in a few years; at present, unfortunately, it does not seem likely.' But we may dream and hope.

THE SPIRITUALITY OF THE CHURCH OF THE FUTURE

Our theme is ‘spirituality’, not an easy topic for discussion. The term itself is not by any means clear, but ‘piety’ or ‘devotion’ is even less apt to express the reality. Spirituality is a mysterious and tender thing, about which we can speak only with difficulty. As intense self-realization of the Christian reality in the individual person as individual, it is inevitably very different in every Christian, according the natural disposition, age, life-history, cultural and sociological milieu, the ultimate free and never wholly comprehensible uniqueness of the individual. For that very reason our theme is an exacting one and difficult to cope with. Moreover we are to consider the factors characterizing the spirituality of the Church of the future as such. But what do we know of the future of our history? What do we know of the future of the Church? Despite all modern futurology, how little, can we predict the secular future? How far is the future of the Church also beyond the scope of the planning and calculation of its people and ministers? Because of their formal authority and the unchangeability of their proper message, the latter are of course always liable to think that they are the masters of the Church’s history and can make unambiguous plans and issue clear directives; or, on the other hand, they might think that in the last resort nothing really important or surprising could happen, because in the ocean of history the Church is built on the rock of God’s eternity.

What far-reaching changes however of the most surprising kind do in fact take place in the Church! How little did we older people and ministers of the Church, who grew up in the Pian epoch of the Church with its monolithism, how little did we expect a Church of the kind we have [144] today? Those who brought Vatican II to a close wanted to break with the triumphalism of the Pian epoch and at the same time in a singularly ingenuous way and almost joyously proclaimed an aggiornamento of the Church in the world of today and tomorrow. How little did they reckon with what is going on in the Church today, something the Council did not cause but for which it acted almost as a catalyst? It is therefore almost impossible to speak of a future spirituality in the Church, since this spirituality is in fact also related to the unforeseeable destiny of the Church in its individual parts and in its totality. All this must be kept in mind from the beginning if we want to try to cope with this theme.

Nevertheless, we may venture to approach this theme directly if somewhat boldly. We are speaking – it must be made clear – of spirituality only in the Roman Catholic Church. From the outset, therefore, we are leaving aside the spirituality which obviously exists also in other Christian Churches as well as in the non-Christian religions, even though a good deal of what we have to say about this Catholic spirituality of the future may be true also of course of these other spiritualities and vice versa. We are leaving aside also the question – important enough for its own sake – about the changes Catholic spirituality may expect to undergo in the future as a result of the fact that the Christian Churches are coming closer together by their ecumenical efforts and that a more intensive interchange between the religious history of the Christian Churches and their future spiritual experiences is becoming possible. In dealing with our question we are also assuming without prejudice the faith as and in so far as it is proclaimed with ultimate binding force by the Church and its magisterium and as and in so far as we interpret appropriately this faith and the obligation it imposes, and grasp it as the firm basis of the spirituality of which we have to speak. In view of the impossibility of clearly predicting the future of the Church in the concrete and its future secular historical and sociological situation, we must not and may not be too worried as to whether we are talking of a spirituality existing or able to exist even now or of one that is coming into existence only tomorrow; whether and how far we are speaking of something that exists or will exist or only of something that ought to be today or tomorrow, whether we are proclaiming realities or unrealized ideals.

For a Catholic the first thing to be said about a future spirituality is quite obviously that, despite all change coming or to come, it is and will remain, albeit in a mysterious identity, the old spirituality of the [145] Church's history up to the present time. Consequently the spirituality of the future will be one related to the living God, who has revealed himself in the history of humanity, who has established himself in his most intimate reality – even as basic ground, as innermost dynamism and final end – at the very heart of the world and the humanity created by him.

Christian spirituality of the future also will be about the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, the God and Father of Jesus Christ. This spirituality can never and may never degenerate into a mere humanism of a horizontal type. It will always be a spirituality of adoration of the incomprehensible God in spirit and in truth. This spirituality will always be related to Jesus Christ, the Crucified and Risen, as to the ultimate, victorious and irreversible self-promise of God, historically manifested to the world; it will be a discipleship of Jesus and will receive from him and from the concreteness of his life a norm, an internal structural principle, that can no longer disintegrate into a theoretical morality; it will always be an acceptance of the death of Jesus who, without any reassurance and yet absolutely openly, allowed himself in his death to fall into the abyss of God's incomprehensibility and incalculable decrees, in faith, hope and love, so that in this way and no other we attain to the infinite truth, freedom and salvation of God.

The spirituality of the future will also always be one living in the Church, receiving from it, giving itself to the Church, founded in it and sustaining it, even though it is as yet perhaps very uncertain what this implies exactly and concretely in the future. Such a spirituality of the future will also always be one that finds concrete expression and an ecclesial manifestation historically and sociologically in the sacraments of the Church, even though the concreteness of the relationship between the existentiality and the sacramentality of the self-realization of the Christian as such is in principle very variable even now and consequently can change considerably in the course of history. The Church's spirituality in the future – for the Church must always have a spirituality – will also have a sociological, political dimension facing on to the world, bearing a responsibility for this merely apparently secular world; and it may be said at once that this very dimension – which also pertains to spirituality as such – will in future presumably be more clearly possessed and filled up by the latter.

The spirituality of the future will be a spirituality of the Sermon on the Mount and of the evangelical counsels, continually involved in renewing its protest against the idols of wealth, pleasure and power. The [146] spirituality of the future will be a spirituality of hope, awaiting an absolute future, enabling man to be grimly realistic and continually to break down the illusion that he could himself, by his own power and shrewdness, produce in this world and in its continuing history the eternal kingdom of truth and freedom. The spirituality of the future will always preserve the memory of the past history of piety, will regard as stupid, inhuman and unchristian the view that man's piety is continually making a fresh start – unhistorically – at zero and consists in nothing but wild revolutions.

This future spirituality therefore will learn over and over again positively and negatively from the Church's past. On the one hand therefore it will always, as in the past, be open for new pentecostal beginnings emerging from the base, not organized and regulated from the outset by authority from above, but bursting out charismatically where the Spirit breathes as he wills, even though such new charismatic departures prove in the discernment of spirits to be truly produced by the Spirit, since, apparently hoping desperately and almost self-destructively, they also establish themselves humbly in the institutional Church without having first negotiated legalistically principles to ensure that they do not perish in this Church of institutions. The spirituality of the future will always be lovingly and familiarly immersed in the documents of the history of the piety of past times, since this is its own history. It will never leave aside as of no interest to itself the history of the saints, of the liturgy, of mysticism; in the future it will perhaps also develop quite new forms of evangelical fellowship and yet have love and sympathy for the spirit and concrete form of older religious orders which are still alive. The spirituality of the future will preserve the history of the Church's piety and will continually discover afresh that what is apparently old and past can offer the true future to our present time. That was the first thing to be said about the spirituality of the future. This first statement of course does not exclude but includes the possibility that many individual forms and shapes of the piety of the past in their concreteness are no more than what has been and the Church must have the sober courage forthrightly to abandon them.

A second thing can certainly be predicted of the spirituality of the future: compared to the spirituality of former times, it will certainly have to concentrate very clearly on what is most essential to Christian piety. Since what is essential and decisive in the Christian faith was more or less taken for granted and undisputed in our cultural group of the western [147] Church, during the past 1500 years, in public opinion and in society even in its secular fields, that faith was of course living and found expression in spirituality, but, really became interesting and attractive only when it ceased to be merely obvious and took concrete shape in the most varied individual types of piety, often in competition with one another. Devout people were deeply interested in the most diverse forms of devotion, particular religious practices, greatly varying styles of the religious life, each clearly distinguished from the others. For example (and all this is merely by way of example), succeeding one another and alongside one another, there were devotion to the Precious Blood, devotion to the Child Jesus and to Mary's Seven Dolours, a thoroughly organized intercession for the Holy Souls, an intensively cultivated practice of indulgences, etc.; clearly distinguished from one another were the very diverse spiritualities of the individual religious orders, the varying trends and tendencies in mysticism and their theological interpretation, a widespread practice of pilgrimage, the veneration of certain sanctuaries and miraculous pictures, and interest – sometimes scarcely intelligible today – in particular dogmas and theological opinions reflected in the piety of the time, etc.

All this will certainly not simply disappear from the consciousness and the life of the Church as such. For it can be observed that Rome even today is trying to keep alive some of these concrete individual forms of devotion. It would also be deplorable if everything were to disappear in a grey homogeneous spirituality and no one can say whether new and surprising concrete forms and practices of spirituality may not take shape in the future. But, in a bleak age of world-wide secularism and atheism, it may be presumed that far fewer individual flowers of Christian spirituality will be able to bloom. In this situation, even in the field of spirituality, concentration on the essential Christian beliefs is unavoidable and indispensable. There will certainly be Marian devotion and the veneration of saints in the future. And we can certainly only wish – and indeed in the light of the ultimate grounds of faith – that something of this kind will exist and even take on a new life. But we shall speak of Jesus and not of the Infant of Prague. We shall speak of Mary but have less to do with Lourdes and Fatima. In the future also there will be a eucharistic piety, including (we may hope) adoration of our Lord under the sacramental species. But this does not mean that the eucharistic cult with all its developments will retain in a living spirituality of the future the same position as in the past. I do not think that the piety of the future [148] will have the same interest in new dogmas as was the case – for example, in the field of Mariology – up to our own time.

The spirituality of the future will be concentrated on the ultimate data of revelation: that God is, that we can speak to him, that his ineffable incomprehensibility is itself the very heart of our existence and consequently of our spirituality; that we can live and die with Jesus and properly with him alone in an ultimate freedom from all powers and authorities; that his incomprehensible cross is set up above our life and that this scandal reveals the true, liberating and beatifying significance of our life. These and similar things were not lacking of course even in the spirituality of former times, but they will make their impact more clearly, more forcefully and with a certain exclusiveness on the future spirituality of a bleaker age. Why should not this be so, if man and the Church actively realize that they are not masters of their history, but must so shape their spirituality that it is adapted to the historical situation imposed on us and not made by us and consequently should be credible even for non-Christians. Even this statement is of course burdened with all the reservations that are involved in the unforeseeability of the future.

There is a third point to be made. The spirituality of the future will not be supported or at any rate will be much less supported by a sociologically Christian homogeneity of its situation; it will have to live much more clearly than hitherto out of a solitary, immediate experience of God and his Spirit in the individual. Of course as such and in principle fides qua, which stamps all spirituality, has always been understood as an event involving personal responsibility, the decision and freedom of the individual. For this decision of faith in particular is less than anything else in a person's existence something for which he can shift responsibility to others, to other causes or to other causes preceding it. But formerly this act of faith on the part of the individual took place within a homogeneously Christian milieu, even though of the secular and bourgeois society; it was possible to believe what was believed by more or less everyone at least in the public sphere and in verbal communication, so that it almost seemed as if a person was relieved – particularly in the dimension of faith – from the supposedly untransferable burden of responsibility, of the decision of faith against unbelief, of hope against all hope, of unrewarded love; and in the area of spirituality it was a question only of the intensity by which we ourselves choose on a particular occasion what is taken for granted by everyone. Today it is different. [149] Christian faith today (and consequently spirituality) must be continually freshly realized: in the dimension of a secularized world, in the dimension of atheism, in the sphere of a technical rationality, declaring from the very outset that all statements which cannot be justified in the light of this rationality are meaningless or amount (in Wittgenstein's words) to 'mysticism' about which we can only be silent if we want to retain our integrity and sobriety.

In such a situation the lonely responsibility of the individual in his decision of faith is necessary and required in a way much more radical than it was in former times. That is why the modern spirituality of the Christian involves courage for solitary decision contrary to public opinion, the lonely courage analogous to that of the martyrs of the first century of Christianity, the courage for a spiritual decision of faith, drawing its strength from itself and not needing to be supported by public agreement, particularly since even the Church's public opinion does not so much sustain the individual in his decision of faith, but is itself sustained by the latter. Such a solitary courage however can exist only if it lives out of a wholly personal experience of God and his Spirit.

It has already been pointed out that the Christian of the future will be a mystic or he will not exist at all. If by mysticism we mean, not singular parapsychological phenomena, but a genuine experience of God emerging from the very heart of our existence, this statement is very true and its truth and importance will become still clearer in the spirituality of the future. For, according to Scripture and the Church's teaching, rightly understood, the ultimate conviction and decision of faith comes in the last resort, not from a pedagogic indoctrination from 'outside, supported by public opinion in secular society or in the Church, nor from a merely rational argumentation of fundamental theology, but from the experience of God, of his Spirit, of his freedom, bursting out of the very heart of human existence and able to be really experienced there, even though this experience cannot be wholly a matter, for reflection or be verbally objectified. Possession of the Spirit is not something of which we are made factually aware merely by pedagogic indoctrination as a reality beyond our existential awareness (as great theological schools, especially of post-Tridentine theology asserted), but is experienced inwardly. This cannot be explained here in detail and at length. But the facts are there: the solitary Christian makes the experience of God and his liberating grace in silent prayer, in the final decision of conscience, unrewarded by anyone, in the unlimited hope which can no longer cling [150] to any particular calculable assurance, in the radical disappointment of life and in the powerlessness of death – if these things are only voluntarily borne and accepted in hope, in the night of the senses and the spirit (without, as the mystics say, being able in this respect to claim a special privilege), etc. All this however assumes that he accepts the experiences merely indicated here and does not run away from them in what is in the last resort a culpable fear; under these circumstances he really has the experience, even though he cannot attempt to interpret it or give it a theological label.' It is only in the light of this experience of God, which is the real basic phenomenon of spirituality, that theological indoctrination by Scripture and the Church's teaching acquires its ultimate credibility and existential enforceability.

As we said, this personal experience of God,[1] cannot be more precisely explained, described or – better – invoked. In so far, on the one hand, as it is the very heart of all spirituality, while we on the other hand are asking here about the peculiarities of the spirituality of the future, we shall examine some typical characteristics of this original human experience of God in both transcendence and grace which will belong (or belong even now) to this spirituality of the future.

We may now attempt to describe a fourth characteristic of the spirituality of the future which is part of a singular dialectical unity with the third, the solitary experience of God on the part of the individual. What we mean is the fraternal fellowship in which the same all-sustaining experience of the Spirit becomes possible: fraternal community as a real and essential element of the spirituality of tomorrow. By this is meant a phenomenon perhaps only slowly becoming clear, something of which we older people can speak only hesitantly and cautiously while still awaiting its future. I think that we older people did not formerly perceive what is meant by this phenomenon or at best perceived only traces of it, even though in looking back over the whole course of the history of spirituality it is possible frequently to discover something of the kind. By origin and education we older people were spiritually individualists, even though we gladly carried out the communal liturgy as our obvious, objective duty. Even though the phenomenon we mean, apparently being revived occasionally today, might also be discovered as existing in former times, on the whole the experience of the Spirit properly so called, [151] spirituality in its true sense, 'mysticism', was understood and lived as obviously a purely individual occurrence for one person and for himself alone occasionally in solitary meditation, in the individual experience of conversion, in the course of a retreat, in the monastic cell, etc.

Where was there a communal experience of the Spirit, clearly conceived, desired and experienced, in a general way – as it evidently was at the Church's first Pentecost – that was not presumably an accidental local gathering of a number of individualistic mystics, but an experience of the Spirit on the part of a community as such? Such a 'collective experience' cannot and of course is not meant to take away from the individual Christian his radical decision for faith coming from his solitary experience of God nor to spare him this, since human individuality and solidarity are not factors to be balanced against each other nor can they replace each other. But this is not to say that an experience of the Spirit in a small community is as such a priori inconceivable, even though we older clerics at least never or scarcely ever experienced anything of this kind and still less attempted to practice it. Why should it not happen? Why should not younger people and clergy now and even more in the future have easier access to such a communal experience of the Spirit? Why should not – as part of the spirituality of the future – phenomena like joint consultation among Christians, genuinely human communication in truly human and not merely external technical dimensions, events in group dynamics, etc., be embraced, exalted and sanctified by a communal experience of the Spirit of God and thus become a truly fraternal fellowship in the Holy Spirit? For this kind of thing in the last resort does not need to take place under extravagant accompanying circumstances apparently almost of a parapsychological character, such as are seen occasionally in American enthusiastic groups of the Pentecostal movements. There is no need to speak in tongues, no need to attempt to produce any phenomenon of healing by laying on of hands. In tomorrow's spirituality also sound psychology with all its critical conclusions must remain valid. But even if this factor is not naively ignored, even if not every kind of singular eruption from consciousness or sub-consciousness, not every transmission of insights and feelings from one person to another, is immediately interpreted as an inspiration of the Holy Spirit, this is far from saying that there cannot be anything like a communitarian experience of the Spirit at all.

Why could there not also be jointly a really spiritual discernment of spirits? Is the prayer to the Holy Spirit at the beginning of a consultation [152] between Christians concretely and practically merely a pious opening ceremony, after which everything goes on as otherwise at a secular board meeting with the management making use of purely rational arguments? In the spirituality of the future can there not be a kind of guru, a spiritual father giving to another person an instruction filled with the Spirit, which cannot be completely broken down into psychology, theoretical, dogmatic and moral theology? In the spirituality of the future as such, I suspect anyway that the element of a fraternal, spiritual fellowship, of a communally lived spirituality, can play a greater part and be slowly but courageously acquired and developed. I have no recipes to offer as to how exactly all this might happen. But this certainly does not mean that there are no starting points and ways of access for such a spirituality in fellowship as such, even though a critical transposition of group-dynamics and similar occurrences into a truly spiritual happening is still to be sought, even though communal prayer as an external rite and communal Scripture reading as the study of exegesis by several people together and an instructive sermon in the traditional sense do not constitute that communal spiritual event which is here envisaged as an important element of future spirituality.

In conclusion, a fifth element of the spirituality of the future may be mentioned here: it will have a new ecclesial aspect. Regarded abstractly and in principle, this ecclesial character of Catholic spirituality is in itself something that must be taken for granted at all times, since we are talking about a spirituality rooted in a common faith and always to be sacramentally realized. But there is no need to deny or conceal the fact that this ecclesial aspect of a Catholic spirituality in the future will take a form somewhat different from that to which we were accustomed, especially in the last century and a half of the Pian epoch of the Church. At least once in this period the Church was the object of an almost fanatical love, regarded as our natural home, sustaining and sheltering us in our spirituality, where whatever we needed was available as a matter of course and had only to be willingly and joyfully appropriated. The Church supported us, it did not need to be supported by us.

Today all this is different. We do not see the Church so much as the signum elevatum in nationes, as it was acclaimed at the First Vatican Council. What we now see is the poor Church of sinners, the tent of the pilgrim people of God, pitched in the desert and shaken by all the storms of history, the Church laboriously seeking its way into the future, groping and suffering many internal afflictions, striving over and over again [153] to make sure of its faith; we are aware of a Church of internal tensions and conflicts, we feel burdened in the Church both by the reactionary callousness of the institutional factor and by the reckless modernism that threatens to squander the sacred heritage of faith and to destroy the memory of its historical experience. The Church can be an oppressive burden for the individual's spirituality by doctrinalism, legalism and ritualism, to which true spirituality, if it really is authentic and genuine, can have no positive relationship. But none of this can dispense the spirituality of the individual from having an ecclesial character, least of all at a time when solidarity and sociability in the secular field are obviously bound in the future to increase and cannot decline. Why then could not the spirituality of the future take the form of a superior, duplicate naivety, marked by wisdom and patience, which has an ecclesial character because of the fact and in the very fact that it bears and endures as a matter of course the misery and inadequacy of the Church? Even Origen in his day knew that the Pneumatomachians could not be allowed to leave the Church, but, in patience, humility, bringing about the descent of God into the flesh of the world and the Church, and in love, would have to establish their possession of the Spirit in the concrete Church just as it is and as, in spite of all necessary and due reforms, it will remain.[2]

This kind of attachment to the Church must be part also of the spirituality of the future. Otherwise it is elitist arrogance and a form of unbelief, failing to grasp the fact that the holy Word of God has come into the flesh of the world and sanctifies this world by taking on himself the sin of the world and also of the Church. The ecclesial aspect of the spirituality of the future will be less triumphalist than formerly. But attachment to the Church will also in the future be an absolutely necessary criterion for genuine spirituality: patience with the Church's form of a servant in the future also is an indispensable way into God's freedom, since, by not following this way, we shall eventually get no further than our own arbitrary opinions and the uncertainties of our own life selfishly caught up in itself.

Allowing for all reservations about the unforeseeability of the concrete shape of future Catholic spirituality, have I succeeded in naming some few perhaps arbitrarily selected particular characteristics of this spirituality? I can't be certain, but may I hope so?

UNITY OF THE CHURCH – UNITY OF MANKIND

I. UNITY

1. The Concept 'Unity'

Before dealing with the essential theme, I would like first of all to put forward some more or less general reflections, enabling us to make a preliminary examination of a number of concepts that will be useful later when we come to the theme itself. In the scholastic philosophy and theology of the Middle Ages there are quite detailed and penetrating reflections to be found on the four transcendental notions: ens, unum, verum, bonum (being, one, true, good). For this philosophy, 'one' or 'unity' is a transcendental notion, transcendentality – that is, super-categoriality, super-regionality – being understood in the light of both the knowing subject and its object. For Aquinas the transcendentality of the notion of unum also directly implies the profound, obvious and simultaneously unmanageable axiom: Non enim plura secundum se uniuntur – plurality as such is not a ground of unity. That is to say: what is absolutely disparate, that which has nothing common in any respect, in any way, is impossible and inconceivable. And, conversely, everything that is, that is possible and conceivable, rests on an ultimate solidarity which both embraces the difference of existents from one another and the difference between existentiality and knowability, between subject and object, and means in the last resort what we understand by God: the unity that exists in itself, preceding all plurality and sustaining all diversity. (It should also be noted that the metaphysical [155] monotheism, briefly indicated above, respected by all the great metaphysical systems, is of course not the same thing as the religious and theological monotheism which Christianity together with the Old Testament and Islam professes. But for the moment there is no need to discuss this.) In the light of this ultimate primal unity, every individual existent – whose true and not merely apparent difference from other things is presupposed here as a primal datum – necessarily possesses both an internal unity of essential elements that are nevertheless distinguishable from one another and also a real and untransferable relationship to whatever else is real.

2. Unity as Existing and as Task

If, together with the above assumption, we also assume that everything other than the divine primal unity itself is not simply present as wholly static but is part of a world of becoming, then, within this world distinct from God, we must necessarily distinguish several concepts of unity. In the individual existent there is a unity already present which implies both the positivity of the sensible unitedness of the plural essential constitutive elements together with the unity of quiddity and actuality and also the negativity of being different and thus delimited and distinguished from other realities. Without such a unity already present in the existent with its positivity and negativity, any meaningful individual statement as also subjectivity and responsible freedom would in the last resort be inconceivable. An integrating and delimiting unity thus present from the beginning does not exclude the relatedness of each individual existent to reality as a whole, nor does it ever deny a world of becoming in which every existent is dependent on all the rest, in which under the dynamism of absolute being evolution proceeds with qualitative leaps.

If and in so far as each individual existent with its initial unity belongs to a world of becoming and unity is a transcendental determination of every existent as such – that is, must also belong to the goal of this becoming itself – then to every existent there belongs also a unity imposed on it as a task, a unity still to be realized as telos (goal) of its becoming. In its becoming every existent is oriented to a unity to be acquired, to unity as a goal of this becoming, even though the concrete content of the unity to be attained cannot be deduced from the formal and somewhat empty concept of unity, even though – where it is a question [156] of the existing reality of the subject – the unity to be acquired is an act of freedom and of history, the content of which cannot simply be deduced from the unity already present, but must be realized and only in this way reaches an understanding of itself.

3. Unifying Unity

If and in so far as coming to be can never be understood as originating from empty nothingness, both the unity already present in the individual existent and also the unity imposed as a task must be understood as sustained by the unifying unity of the absolute being that we call 'God', so that the already present unity of the individual existent and the unity to be acquired of the existent coming to be presuppose an ultimate unifying unity. At the same time, as participating in the divine unity, partial unifying unities are wholly conceivable and even demonstrable in the world distinct from God.

Unity as the task of an individual existent can be related both to the greater internal unity of an existent and to a greater unity of such an existent with the rest of the world's reality. This duality of the unity to be acquired is not in principle self-contradictory; growing, reconciliatory unity of the internal, constitutive elements of an individual existent and reconciliatory incorporations of the realities outside the particular existent – in principle, at least – are mutually dependent. The unity to be achieved of an increasing interiorization and the increasingly far-ranging quest to include a wider environment are correlative. But this implies that the increasingly close approach to the unity to be achieved carries with it also a continual growth of the internal and external elements of that unity. In this way unity as task remains within the world of becoming and of history as such always as a goal approached merely asymptotically, never finally attained, since advancing unity is always producing new material that has still to be integrated into unity. The realization (even though asymptotically) of unity as a task, as distinct from the unity present from the beginning, is not an external, additional reality, but the completion of the initial unity itself; the history of the realization of unity as a task is the history of the unity present from the beginning, the latter being found again in the former.

4. Unity through Love

Corresponding to the transcendentality of the concept of unity, initial unity, unity as task and unifying unity, are analogical concepts which are realized or to be achieved in essentially different ways, depending on whether it is a question of the dimension of nature or that of the history of free subjects. In so far as the history of free subjects – although it cannot be reduced to the pure history of nature – carries with it the history of nature as an intrinsic element of itself and as environment, with the question of the initial unity and the realization of the unity to be achieved of the personal history of mankind, the counter-question of the history of nature cannot be left out of consideration.

Since however in the dimension of the free history of personal subjects unity as a task can never consist of a homogenization of the subjects that are its elements but only in a reconciliation of innumerable subjects, each different from the others and simultaneously (as subjects of unlimited transcendentality) possessing the whole in each individual and each in a unique way, the asymptotic realization of the unity to be achieved in the dimension of personal history can be produced only by what cannot be described except as love, not in the sense of mere sentimentality or as merely personal feeling but understood in a real and ontological sense. For love understood in this way is wholly the consummation of unity in accepting the absolute otherness of everyone else (in accepting this other as one's very own) and thus the reconciliation between universal unity and enduring plurality, which itself is accepted as good, as its own, by the loving subject.

5. Absolute Unifying Unity – God

Within a world coming to be and continually producing new plurality – plurality to be again unified and reconciled – in the dimension of free subjects and of history, unity as a task always remains a goal attainable only asymptotically. Consequently, without a fatal levelling out of the plurality and diversity of personal subjects, an absolute reconciliation and unity is conceivable only if the absolute unifying unity that we call God imparts himself to, reconciling and unifying, this plurality, and in this offer of himself by his own power is accepted also in the love of the plural realities of the world for one another and for this absolute unifying [158] unity. This absolute reconciliation is not merely abstractly conceivable, but the innermost dynamism of reality and a goal to be victoriously attained: such is the faith of Christianity, for which unity is not merely always a still awaited Utopia but a real hope, since the unifying unity that we call God is not only the sustaining ground of the world's continually renewed will for unity, but has established itself in this world as the ultimate determination of the world itself.

In view of the transcendentality of the concept of unity it is obvious that everything said hitherto remains in an abstract vacuum. Indeed, in so far as all man's transcendentality and consequently his concepts are necessarily lost, yielding and being reduced to silence, in the absolute mystery of God and his incomprehensibility, this obscurity of all transcendental notions belongs necessarily also to the notion of unity, without the intellectual subject being permitted – overtaxed and frustrated – to dissociate himself from such concepts.

II. UNITY OF MANKIND

Under what we may hope is not an entirely false assumption, that the concepts just discussed and their correlations might be useful for our main reflections, let us turn, somewhat abruptly, to our more precise theme.

1. A Theological Theme

We shall look first of all at the unity of mankind, regarding this theme, not as merely philosophical or anthropological, historical or socio-political, but as theological. A theological statement about the unity of mankind is meant on the one hand to be understood as properly theological – that is, one made in the light of revelation – but on the other hand is concerned with a reality or task which at first sight we are accustomed to regard as secular, on which in theory and practice there are others besides preachers of the Christian faith and theologians who consider themselves competent. The theoretical question arising from this may not be very clear, but cannot be explicitly discussed at this point. If and in so far as Christian faith makes statements about what first appears to be a secular unity of mankind, while the authorization [159] for such statements remains at present far from clear, we can be content at this point in our reflections with the fact that the statements are made as an offer to man's secular self-understanding so that it can be asked whether the latter is in agreement with them. If the offer is accepted, it could strengthen in a very radical way man's secular understanding of the unity of mankind, as long as it is assumed that the Christian message of this unity still retains considerable historical force at the present time and for the future.

The conviction of the unity of mankind is part of the Christian message. Perhaps today we take this belief very much for granted and perhaps also have the impression that we can manage without the agreement of the Christian faith in this respect, even though we are not at all sure what this unity of mankind implies and what not. If this is our impression, we ought at least to wonder, apart from anything else, whether its obviousness is not a secularized heritage from Christianity, a heritage which would be fatally threatened if once the sun of Christianity were really to sink entirely behind the horizon of history.

2. Biological Unity

Christianity however in any case declares its belief in the unity of mankind, regardless of whether this belief is to be understood as a proper and immediate object of Christian revelation or as an assumption with which – even though in itself secular – the essential content of Christian faith cannot dispense and which it consequently also affirms. This unity of mankind is first of all understood as a datum. Whether it reflects on this or not, whether it wants to be or not, mankind is one. The traditional statement about this original unity of mankind interpreted it in terms of what was known as monogenism – the doctrine that the human race as a whole descends from a numerically single human couple – which was strongly emphasized in Pius XII's encyclical Humani generis, then even prepared as a definition in a preconciliar scheme of Vatican II and later sank without trace at the Council itself.

If today we regard this biological monogenism as a model to represent the permanently valid unity of mankind and not as the actual content of the theological statement about this unity, we do not mean that the unity of mankind is no longer part of the content of faith. All that needs to be done is to interpret and substantiate it in a different way. We cannot [160] explain it more closely here, but the fact is that this unity extends throughout all man's dimensions, finding appropriate expression at each point. Despite their biological descent from the animal kingdom, all human beings share a biological solidarity such that it clearly separates them from all – even higher – animals. They are all capable of reproducing their species with one another and only with one another. Their biological existence is not merely the basis of their authentic humanness and culture, but, conversely – unlike any other animals – it is in turn affected by these things. All human beings are able to enter reciprocally into a specifically human intercommunication and association in all man's dimensions. Actual barriers between geographically settled areas, between races and languages, in principle, can always and everywhere be surmounted. The differences of racially, geographically, historically conditioned mentalities do not constitute an absolute impediment to mutual understanding and cultural exchange in which individual nations each in its specific history can communicate and have always communicated with one another. By and large, whenever and wherever human beings recognize themselves as intellectually personal subjects with an ultimately unlimited transcendentality and thus as subjects of a free history, which always has also a religious dimension, and so too as moral beings with an absolute reciprocal moral claim; if then they cannot detect this particular kind of reciprocal relationship among other living beings in this world, they become aware of an exclusive unity on the part of mankind which is unknown among other – even biological – earthly realities.

3. One Salvation for All

Christianity radicalizes this existing and known unity of mankind with its teaching that all human beings, despite differences of race and history, diversity of cultures, are not only called into existence by one and the same God, but also have one and the same final destiny, which consists in attaining God's self-communication in itself. Christian faith is aware of a universal history of salvation, common to all mankind, existing from the very outset, always effective, universally present as the most radical element of the unity of mankind, not first slowly spreading out from a particular and regional history of salvation, but ultimately preceding the latter, which is no more than its particular and tangible [161] manifestation. The universalism of the one salvific will of God in regard to all mankind, which establishes the final unity of mankind, is the sustaining ground of all particular history of salvation and religion.

Even at this point of our reflections more concrete questions could of course be raised, but we cannot enter into these now. Thus the question might be raised about a human, moral and Christian justification of racial intermarriage: a question which has not always been answered in the same way in Christendom, although it has not merely a secular human but also a religious and Christian aspect.

4. Sin

Christian teaching about the already existing unity of mankind involves further distinctions. It was pointed out earlier that this initial unity within the dimension of personal, free subjects and history is not simply static, but, as a task for mankind's historical freedom, has itself a history and thus can also be damaged and destroyed. The Christian doctrine of original sin, the full implications of which cannot of course be developed here, seems to me to involve the conviction that sin as selfishness, opposed to the unifying force of love, always and everywhere – not merely in the dimension of a personal interiority, but also in social life – affects the history of mankind and that this tragic situation will remain a permanent existential of mankind's history to the very end. But this means that the present unity of mankind is not merely not yet completed with the realization of mankind's unity as task, but is also damaged and disturbed, even though not simply destroyed, and will remain so – albeit in continually changing shapes and forms – to the end of history. Striving to realize the unity of mankind as task, an effort that always grows out of the sinful primal ground of history, will also continue in fact to produce new shapes and sociological objectivations of the disturbed state of mankind's unity.

From that standpoint the achievement of the unity of mankind as a task does indeed remain the goal always set before mankind in its history of freedom in the light of its initially present unity, but always retains at the same time the character of a Utopia never entirely to be realized within the course of history. Awareness of the permanent sinfulness of humanity – and thus of the always utopian and unattained pure realization of its unity – does not imply any authorization for adopting a static [162] conservative mentality and renouncing both evolutionary and revolutionary attempts to realize a greater unity of mankind; but it forbids us to regard any concretely attained unity of mankind as pure, as absolute, as alone legitimate, and for that very reason really to lapse into a static conservatism.

5. Finite Unifying Unity

In the first part of these reflections we attempted, at least by way of suggestion, to gain some idea of a unifying unity. In an absolute sense of course God, and he alone, is the initially existing unifying unity, the dynamism of that unity which arises as a task, growing out of a unity already existing in mankind's history of freedom. But at least in the history of humanity there are also finite, particular and regional unifying unities. Over and over again in the history of mankind there emerge personal or sociological factors which, rightly or wrongly, claim not only to attain their own unity in themselves and in peace with their environment and with the people around them, but also to be for other sociological groups the bearers and protagonists of unity as a task. The claim to exercise such an unselfish function of a unifying unity towards others has often been made in the course of mankind's history. Those responsible include groups, nations, concrete supporters of a particular ideology, individuals.

Ancient Rome claimed such a function for its Orbis; Byzantium and, up to the nineteenth century, the Holy Roman Empire ascribed to themselves such a task for the peace and unity of human beings; in the ideologies of modern Spanish and Anglo-Saxon colonialism the idea of an active agent, a bearer of such unifying unity lived on. And today, when ideas of this kind of supremacy in the unselfish realization of a peaceful unity of mankind seem taboo, they continue to be secretly at work. In the sense of mission for freedom and order in the world continually revived by the U.S.A., in Moscow's claim to be the centre of orientation of the socialist world as a kind of 'third Rome', even today the ideas of the bearer of a unifying unity really live on.

If and in so far as Christianity, despite its proclamation of a universal salvation already present and effective everywhere, is also aware of a geographically and nationally particular bearer of this mission (ancient Israel, the primitive Church, Rome, etc.), it evidently regards the idea [163] of such bearers of unifying unity as legitimate in principle and not merely as one that inevitably arises from time to time. The question might be raised at this point as to whether the older Europe did not give up too quickly and in too cowardly a fashion its claim to exercise such a function in regard to the rest of the world, whether it now sees its mission as consisting merely in defending itself as a consumer society, at the same time of course making excuses in a few well-chosen words for its abandonment of its former mission to the world.

Is unity – we must ask more precisely – even today still a task for mankind? And, at least as a goal to be approached asymptotically, in what is it supposed to consist? It cannot be disputed and need not be explained at length that, despite all disunity, all dissension and all increasingly menacing conflicts, there is in practice in contemporary history a trend towards a greater unity. Histories of nations, formerly largely separated by a no man's land, are moving more closely to one another today; individual cultural groups, profoundly different among themselves, even today under the influence of a rapid development, are overlaid by a rational-technical world-civilization. Every political or cultural event anywhere in the world has a significance for all nations and regions of the world. Everywhere there are militant ideologies in the most diverse forms expecting and working to gain their victory everywhere in the world. There are the United Nations and industrial organizations that are supranational. There is cultural exchange to an extent formerly impossible, networks of news communication becoming increasingly closely interwoven, continually growing tourism, scientific organizations which are international by their very nature, and so on. There is no doubt that the unity of mankind is in fact growing.

6. Unifying Atheism?

It might be said that this fact, being concrete and inexorable, must also have its justification as a real task of mankind. We might therefore try also to justify at a deeper level as a truly human and moral task the pursuit of the unity of mankind: a unity which is being increasingly clearly realized. In accordance with what we said at an earlier stage, we could point to the fact that the differentiation of mankind, its cultures and mentalities – that is, the creation of a greater amount of material not yet united and still to be reconciled in unity – is increasing to the same [164] extent and consequently that every success in achieving the unity of mankind in its turn creates new tasks. We could point to the fact that the unity of mankind as a task to be realized in history is always veiled by the unpredictability of history, where there is apparently no really palpable and absolutely effective individual authority planning in advance and effectively carrying out its plan for the whole course of history. We cannot deal at greater length here with this and many other matters connected with the unity of mankind as a task. All that we shall do is to point to some, mainly theological aspects of the problem as a preparation for the theological reflections on the unity of the Church that we still have to work out.

Wherever and in so far as it is realized, the formally and fundamentally legitimate unity of mankind as a task of its history is marked concretely by the stigma of sin. Since good and evil can never be clearly separated within the course of history, any unity that is achieved will always have something of the character of an enforced, oppressive unity; never and nowhere will it be purely the expression of conciliatory love and justice. It is from this standpoint, I think, that the permanent theological significance of the saga of the Tower of Babel becomes intelligible. The separation of peoples and languages, rendering impossible any attempt to unify the histories of individual nations, can be seen as a barrier set up by God's salvific providence against a collective revolt by a humanity united against God. Is it surprising then that, at the same time and to the same extent as mankind becomes united and as collective representatives of unifying unity again make their appearance in order to achieve this unity, a militant atheism comes to the fore, hoping and aspiring to become the one 'world-religion' of united humanity? The representatives of such an atheism and the incentives to it are very varied even today; its prospects may be very diversely estimated; a theological interpretation that discovers in it a positive function for salvation-history need not be excluded. But this world-wide and militant atheism as an obvious sociological phenomenon is nevertheless something radically new in the history of humanity, even though the believer is sure that the very person who claims to be an atheist cannot from the very outset be entirely deaf to the silent call of God. At any rate for the theologian of the history of humanity, at the point where the unity of mankind as a task is beginning to be realized, atheism is a phenomenon that he cannot lightly dismiss on the plea that there have always been atheists and now there are a few more of them. The unity of mankind and atheism as a sociological [165] phenomenon have something to do with each other and theology must think hard about this, if on the one hand it explains the growing unity of mankind as a positive task for mankind but is aware at the same time that it is thus inevitably forcing faith into a situation which has never hitherto existed.

The unity of mankind, increasingly prevailing today, started out in fact from what was once Christian Europe. Rational and technical civilization, with its sociological and political power-potential, is of European origin; the West was the bearer of the unifying unity which inaugurated the realization of the task of uniting mankind. None of this is altered by the fact that this bearer did not merely or primarily regard itself as the representative of a Christian mission, but as the bearer of a technical and rational civilization which it thrust peacefully or forcefully on mankind as a whole, particularly since this secular civilization had itself essentially Christian origins, even though its distortions and consequences cannot simply be blamed solely on Christianity as such with its desacralization of the world. But the question then is: What is the theological meaning – that is, what is the meaning for salvation-history – of this fact, which certainly no one will simply and forthrightly dispute? Despite the necessity of making careful distinctions in answering this question, it can certainly be said that Christianity – whose active missionary bearer was in fact Europe as set between the great spatial blocks of Asia, Africa and America – through this united civilization for the whole world proceeding from it, but becoming itself depraved, actually even though largely unintentionally created the concrete conditions to enable Christianity to become a world-religion.

None of this can be regarded as a matter of course, since even a group of nations without a Christian history could be conceived in principle and abstractly as active bearer of the unification of mankind. But on the other hand it is actually and concretely scarcely conceivable that Christianity should acquire a real presence (which is not necessarily the same thing as a majority) in the world as a whole by a purely verbal mission without the substructure of a historical, cultural and civilizatory intercommunication between Christian and non-Christian nations. The global mission of Christianity may not strive (as it often has done) for a [166] homogenization of the nations, following the European pattern, and by and large did not in fact achieve anything of this kind. But this in no way alters the fact that Christian missionary work not only made its own contribution to the unification of mankind, but itself needed concretely and practically a greater historical and cultural unity of mankind of a secular character and that this greater unity itself in fact started out from the Christian nations, whatever very secular, selfish and power-political motives may have inspired them. This is something that can certainly be given a theological interpretation. If it is to be realized, the universal mission of Christianity must presuppose a unity of mankind such as we are coming to know today: this unity the Christian nations created, even though always as sinful, selfish nations and while building this sinfulness of theirs also into it, a unity however which on its own account has a positive importance for salvation.

III. UNITY OF THE CHURCH – AND UNITY OF MANKIND

1. Church as Basic Sacrament

Now is the time, in accordance with our basic theme, to say something about the unity of the Church. We assume first of all that what is meant by ‘Church’ is not simply and solely the interior conviction of many of its members that God has offered himself as absolute salvation and absolute future in Jesus Christ, crucified and risen, and proclaimed this offer as historically victorious in word and sacrament. In fact, the Church has regarded itself always and everywhere as a real community and an institutional society, seeing this institutionality not merely as something humanly unavoidable but as its indispensable essential element, even though this essential ‘visibility’ of the Church has been diversely interpreted and put into practice in the different Christian denominations. It is only as such an historical factor in the word as proclaimed, in the sacramental word and the sociological character implied in all this, that it can be what it has to be: the permanent historical presence of God's victorious self-promise in Jesus Christ, the sacrament of the world's salvation, as Vatican II described it.

In order to be this basic sacrament, the Church must have an historical presence in the world to the end of time and do its utmost to carry out [167] this mission to establish its presence everywhere in the world, even though of course nothing is yet decided in advance about the numerical extent of this world-Church and about its socio-political power, all this being left to the course of history itself which is not predictable even by the Church. The more mankind acquires a concrete unity, the clearer is the Church's character as basic sacrament manifested to the whole world, even when the sociological significance and the number of its members are very different in the different parts of the world. The particular question however with which we are obviously faced here is that of the Church's unity in face of its division and disintegration into many Churches and Christian communities which are not in communion with each other.

2. Scandal of Separation – Existing Unity

It must be admitted that the actual present-day divisions of the Christian Churches vary greatly in their theological and sociological character and it is also true that there are differences of opinion in both theory and practice about the exact nature and extent of the unity binding on all Christians. Nevertheless, for the Christian, according to the will of God, in the light of Jesus Christ and of the nature of the Church, the state of affairs is one that simply should not be. The sociological separateness of the Churches as Churches is a scandal that amounts to a terrible accusation against Christians in general and their office-holders in particular. On this there exists a theoretical unanimity in Christendom as a whole, since only a few Christian groups properly so-called are opposed in principle to ecumenical efforts to achieve unity; that is, Christendom as a whole acknowledges that its present state is an offence against the necessary unity of the Church.

This terrible scandal, a continual contradiction of the Church's mission, must not however blind us to the fact that, despite this sinful state of affairs, an initial unity has been maintained and remains effective to a very fundamental extent through God in Jesus Christ in the separated Churches. At least the Churches belonging to the World Council of Churches profess their faith in the triune God, in Jesus Christ as Lord and Saviour, practise one and the same baptism for the forgiveness of sins, acknowledge the same holy Scriptures as norm of their faith and life. However much – over and above all this – the reciprocal recognition [168] of their ministries in the individual Churches remains theoretically a matter of dispute, my opinion is that the really dogmatic question remains open, even on the Catholic side.

Unlike the situation formerly, the unity of the Churches actually existing today means that they are not only co-operating in many tasks and at least up to a point join in united services, but also try in principle to distribute the blame for the divisions fairly among all the Churches and – over and above this – recognize in the separated and separately institutionalized Christian communities as such a positive salvific significance for their present members. All these things are constitutive elements of the actually existing unity of the Churches and are of fundamental importance. If then we evaluate all this according to the criterion proclaimed by Vatican II of the 'hierarchy of truths' and (we may add) realities, remembering at the same time (especially on the Roman side) that the unity of the Church set before us and still to be realized is not (as Rome thought during the hundred and fifty years of the 'Pian epoch') a uniformity of the whole Church, suppressing the peculiar character of the historically emerging and regional particular churches, then we may say without hesitation that the already existing unity of the Church is not as far from the unity which it is still the Churches' task to realize as we are perhaps tempted to think as a result of our certainly justified and impatient indignation at the scandal of divided Christendom.

This does not mean however that the scandal of divided Christendom has been eliminated. The existing unity of Christendom is not a static factor which cowardice and hopelessness might lead us to accept as final, but a factor which seeks and is bound to develop towards its full realization: that is, towards a unity set before us as a task to be fulfilled. What more can be said briefly here?

Christians, theologians and ecclesiastical office-holders should not assume that the divisions of the Churches have the same character today as they had at their beginning. Even ecclesial realities are essentially dependent for their concrete expression on the secular aspect of the historical and sociological situation in which they exist. Neither in regard to the expression of Christian truths of faith nor in regard to their sociological problems can any of the Christian Churches act as if they were still living at the time of the Reformation or even of the First Vatican Council.

3. Unity in the Profession of Faith

As far as the unity to be achieved in the question of truth and agreement in faith is concerned, the situation at the present time is substantially different from that of the past as a result of the work of the theologians in explicitly controversial theology and ecumenicism. If for the time being we exclude the question of the papacy, regarding this as part of the question of true or complete institutionality, then we can really raise today the question whether there are differences in matters of faith between the separated Churches which strictly require those who belong to the individual Churches to reject in conscience any unification between these Churches. My impression is that this is not the case. Of course, as against this impression, it is very difficult to say on the one side – the Protestant – what can be regarded as dividing the Church, as articulus stantis et cadentis ecclesiae, as 'an article by which the Church stands and falls', and by whom this can be decided; this is a deep problem, particularly since it is difficult here to identify anybody who can speak with final authority on the question. On the other hand, it must be seen that the Roman Catholic Church on the whole has never or only rarely interpreted in its official teaching (and not merely privately by the work of its theologians) dogma which it regards as indispensable from the time of Trent to that of the Second Vatican Council in such a way as to make this more understandable for Protestants and easier to assimilate in a positive reappraisal of its theology. Here, it seems to me, is a challenge to the authorities in the Churches on both sides; they cannot continue merely to invite the theologians to go on with their ecumenical work, while they themselves do little or nothing. It seems to me that the decisive initiatives and actions also in the dimension of truth, in the light of the present state of things, are required from the authorities in the Churches.

It also seems to me however that a piece of work for the theologians themselves, and especially on the Roman Catholic side, has not yet been done. To put it briefly and, unfortunately, not too clearly, what I mean is this: how, within this Church, a binding unity of faith and a new way of functioning to be developed by its magisterium on the one hand and on the other a pluralism of theology and interpretations of the one and binding faith, which simply cannot be avoided and cannot be adequately synthesized in the present mental climate, are compatible in theory and particularly in practice. Here, especially on the Catholic side, there [170] remain deep questions that have not yet been answered, particularly in connection with the practical functioning of the Roman magisterium in the concrete, which – in my humble opinion – continues even today to make quite considerable mistakes: these are questions whose solution is of the greatest importance for a possible recognition of such a magisterium by Protestant Christendom. On this too however Catholic theologians must continue to work, but it really is time also for the Roman magisterium to be concerned boldly to explain and, especially in practice, to present itself in such a way that Protestants can have no justifiable excuse for not professing together with the Catholic Church the true basic substance of the Christian faith.

4. Unity and Institution

As far as the achievement of the unity of Christendom is concerned with institutions, the authorities in all Churches might be expected and required to embark in Christian hope on bolder plans, since in this respect also more seems possible than is actually being done in the present state of tacit acquiescence and stagnation in ecumenism. Here rank and file Christians in all the Churches should and could boldly seek from their authorities an opportunity to make their voice felt. Certainly they should avoid irresponsible actions which might lead in practice to a kind of third denomination: something that would not remove, but only intensify the divisions of the Churches. But if even an institutional unity is not merely an innocuous Utopia of the future but a binding obligation which is becoming increasingly urgent in the present historical situation of the world, then the authorities in all Churches – we might say, with the courage of despair and with keen theological imagination – should take action, even if only gradually, to establish an institutional unity of the Churches. In Rome the papacy should not be content to repeat the very general statements of Vatican II to the effect that, within the one Church, there is ample scope for a multiplicity of particular Churches differing by reason of locality or of historical origins. Rome ought courageously and unselfishly to prove by concrete deeds that it is determined to renounce an ecclesiological monoculture in the Roman Catholic Church of the type attempted and largely realized especially during the Pian epoch of the Church of the last hundred and fifty years: a situation in which, in practice as opposed to official theory, individual bishops acted as petty [171] administrative officials of the Pope of Rome and, for the sake of a supposed, but by no means necessary unity, were given no scope for any really important decision-making.

In this respect, as I said, the question of a reciprocal recognition of ministries seems to be more open than is usually admitted on the Catholic side. Of course, analogous questions and demands might be raised also before the Protestant authorities. But this is something that Protestants themselves must do. It seems to me that all that needs saying on this point can be stated as follows: Let the Roman Curia show bold resolution and dare to hope to achieve something of which the end-result cannot be calculated in advance, thus displaying itself in its ministries of teaching and leadership in a way demanded by the whole historical situation today; let it eliminate many features of a centralist and bureaucratically administered state, seeking to decree from above more or less everything that is at all important; let the limits of the universal primacy as they arise from dogma or can be restricted by the papacy itself be more clearly defined. If these things were done, I would hope that on the one hand the real substance of the dogma of the First Vatican Council could be fully preserved and yet that Protestants could see clearly that their evangelical freedom remains assured even within a united Church with a Petrine ministry.

5. Unity of the Church and Unity of Mankind

We must break off at this point. Our reflections should really be directed to the question of the relationship between a unity of the world still to be achieved on the one hand, and on the other a unity of the Church as already existing and as still to be realized. But perhaps we have said too little about this relationship, about this 'and'. At least however we may have touched on the essential point. The achievement of a greater unity of mankind is an urgent task for people today, if mankind is to survive and exist in a human way, even though this unity itself represents a mysterious and complex task, the precise meaning and content of which become clear only slowly in the historical process itself, and which is repeatedly debased by the sin of human beings and yet remains also their religious and moral task. The achievement of this unity of mankind is consequently also a task for Christians: not a mere side-interest for them, [172] but a task for which all Christians and especially the authorities in the Churches have to answer before God's judgement.

What then might seem to be a purely secular task for Christians and their Churches – working to achieve the unity of mankind – has for them also a Christian aspect. By this work they create conditions to enable Christianity to become concretely a true world-religion or increasingly so, for the Church to become increasingly a true world-Church, for the Church to become increasingly clearly one everywhere in the world and thus more clearly the basic sacrament of salvation for the whole world. And, conversely, if Christians resolutely work and pray in an ecumenical spirit for the unity of their Churches, they will also make a very considerable contribution to the unity of human beings. The one dual mandate of the Christian for the unity of mankind and for that of the Church is not nullified by the fact that both unities continually and always in new ways carry with them conflicts and constraints detrimental to their true meaning, as long as the Kingdom of God is not present and God with the unity belonging to him alone is not yet all in all.

THE INEXHAUSTIBLE TRANSCENDENCE OF GOD AND OUR CONCERN FOR THE FUTURE

'Hope in the crisis of survival' was the theme of the ninth conference of humanists at Salzburg. Could a theologian be permitted to say something on this subject? The theme of the conference, after all, was about the future of our world with its history, which, according to Christian principles, is entrusted to man himself, to his freedom and responsibility, so that he may himself subjugate this world. Has the theologian anything to say in this respect that is not either a repetition of general humanistic principles and claims, which do not require a theologian to state them, or the proclamation of the God distinct from the world as a whole and of eternal life, which seems to make little or no contribution to the surmounting of our earthly crisis? On the other hand, in the notification of this conference as a whole and in many of its particular themes so much was said about religion and Christianity that we can almost take it for granted that the participants regarded these things as being implied in the theme of the whole conference on 'hope in the crisis of survival'; we can assume that this crisis represents a challenge to the Christian religion, that it alters this religion and at the same time provokes the latter's potential for hope, if it is to be overcome. If then it can be assumed that the theologian can and should seek an opportunity to contribute to the discussion, it is still not clear what he is to speak about. He has an almost inexhaustible number of themes from which to choose, as was clear from the theological implications of many of the papers delivered at this conference.

While recognizing that so many of these themes provide suitable material for a theologian, I would like to attempt – almost in a kind of [174] burlesque sermon – to say only one thing. The Christian message of God, who offers himself as himself in grace as our eternal life, is offered and brought to us as a message beyond earthly hopes and fears, beyond optimism and pessimism, but only on the absolutely indispensable condition that from first to last we do not make this God the instrument of our concern for the future and the amalgam of our neurotic fear of life, but succeed by God's grace in leaving God's transcendence (if we may put it this way) unexhausted. This (perhaps with a brief glance at the consequences for our own concern for the future) is all that I want to say and what I am trying to make a little more intelligible.

In the light of the average sermon in our churches we Christians are inclined to assume that human life in the long run and in society and history as a whole is impossible without God. World-wide atheism, whether of militant communism or of bourgeois indifferentism, takes a different view. But we Christians stick to our thesis and perhaps even cherish a secret hope that the world-crisis, which is becoming increasingly obvious, may provide many people with a new appreciation of this thesis. Of course, this conviction of the necessity and irreplaceability of God in our individual and social life is correct in the very last resort, if there is a God at all and if moreover this God is not, will not and cannot be, simply (and this is not immediately obvious) one who can make himself superfluous to the reality he sets up. But, even if we assume all this, the necessity of God and his usefulness for our own existence – particularly according to Christian principles – are much more mysterious and more difficult than the proclamation of a popularized, minimal Christianity would have us believe.

If all the questions coming into our mind find their ultimate answer only in the knowledge of God, while this God remains for all eternity the incomprehensible mystery, even when we come to see him face to face in the light of glory, what prospect is there of obtaining this ultimate answer? If God is supposed to be the ultimate target of all our deeds and ways, at which all our plans and calculations are aimed, while he is himself the mystery of an absolute freedom that cannot be fitted into a co-ordinate system in such a way that an understanding of the system would render this freedom also intelligible, how are clarity and palpable meaning to enter into these plans and calculations of ours? It is evidently not so easy to look to the true God of Christianity – who simply is not himself world-reason and this world's glory – in order to cope with our own existence and our concern for our future.

[175] This God might equally appear to us to be the fundamental impossibility of 'solving' our own vital questions, whether individual or collective. All the more so since in the Christian message he has not offered himself as guarantor that all will always go well throughout our history, but as the finisher of this history – not only of the individual, but (as it seems, at least) of mankind as a whole – while the end of this universal history is represented in this revelation in its perspectives of the future in terms of catastrophe. The assumption is reinforced quite drastically by the fact that Christians are forbidden to hold the theoretical opinion that the future of mankind at the end of and beyond its history is on the whole and for everyone certainly a blessed consummation and that hell is a priori theoretically inconceivable. Seen in this way, does the word 'God', its acknowledgment of him, relieve us of any concern for the future, does it really brighten up our existence? Can we really invoke him by pronouncing this word, when confronted with the terrible existential fear which arises today in minds and hearts? If the God of Christianity is the incomprehensible God of unfathomable judgements, in our present distress, is it not better to leave him completely out of our calculations and instead to console ourselves with the thought that it will not be so bad without him and that we shall get along somehow?

In this darkness it is necessary to consider the true relationship between us and God, as acknowledged by authentic Christianity.

In order to see this relationship more clearly, we may begin with a preliminary general reflection on a particular kind of relationship which can exist between two realities, especially personal realities. It is easy to think that relationships or connections between two realities, being mutual, are of the same character or the same value on either side. But this is not always the case. The assumption of a particular relationship to another reality, if it is to succeed, may depend precisely on the fact that it does not intrinsically need to find a response of exactly the same kind from the other side. Without mentioning other examples of the most varied kinds, in order to understand what is meant here, we need only reflect on interpersonal love. If this is not to be selfishness in twos, love on the part of one must really be meant for the other, really for that person as such and in himself, and not for his importance to the one who loves him, not for the happiness he gives to the lover, not for the security he assures, but actually for himself, as he is meaningful, good and lovely for himself in his uniqueness, impregnability and unexploitability. That is not to say that it could not be expected, would not be hoped, that this [176] other person, who is loved, would impart himself to someone who would respond to the love he received, would grant understanding, security and everything else that blooms in mutual love. But if in love in the last resort and tacitly what is sought is one's own happiness and the loved one is not loved for his own sake, if that loved one's gratitude is not accepted by the other partner as a wholly gratuitous miracle but was the very thing sought tacitly and without admitting it by one's outgoing love, then this love has already lost its true nature and been turned into selfishness, no matter how gratifying it now seems to be. True love is self-abandoning, never returning to itself.

The irreversibility of this movement of love is in no way changed by the fact that a person can be and must be the essence of such love and thus discovers his own true nature only by loving, is truly aware of himself only when he forgets himself in loving, gets at his real nature only when he succeeds in the miracle of getting away from it without any prospect of returning. This paradox is man's true nature. He takes in by letting go, he acquires stability by not seeking to avoid a fall; his happiness is attained only by seeking and finding something else; selflessness is the only way the self can come to be; man's most sinister temptation lies in the fact that he tries tacitly to turn unselfish love into an instrument solely of his own being. There is a genuine existential fear in the question which we ask ourselves and to which no amount of reflection can provide an answer: whether in the last resort we entrust ourselves in real love without any safeguards to the other person or make that person the means of our own happiness, which is the sole really definitive fixed point of our own existence.

We gave only one example of what was meant here, but it was not arbitrarily chosen and a more general description is not really very important: I know of no generally and immediately intelligible expression of it. Let us call it something like this: principle of the irreversibility of a relationship, of the non-congruence of reciprocal relationships, or (if the relationships as understood here involve something in the nature of a transcendence toward another) principle of the inexhaustibility of transcendence.

What has all this to do with the question that occupies us here? Normal, authentic Christianity proclaims that man's final salvation for all eternity can be gained only in the one love for God and men, love of God and love of neighbour being mutually dependent in a unique fashion on each occasion. What is meant in this teaching of normal and authentic [177] Christianity is real love of God and neighbour for their own sake, which, if it is to be truly love and productive of salvation, must be directed to God and neighbour in an irreversible and inexhaustible transcendence, not returning to itself and not being debased as an instrument for one's own self-realization.

How vast are the implications of this hackneyed catechism statement! Here are the benefactors of mankind, together with the futurologists and all the scientists, and the theologians intermingle discreetly and somewhat intimidated; all are asking, among other things, if God must still remain as an item in the world's accounts if these are to balance, whether we need God or not if we are to hope for a bearable future and avoid an apocalyptic disaster. Then, over this whole conference, where the completely understandable and legitimate egoisms of all people of the present time are accumulated, there appears the message of Christianity:

> All your cares, all your fears, all your exertions, your futurological optimism and pessimism, your heights and your depths, your triumphs and your defeats, are ultimately pointless and doomed to destruction, unless in this whole history there occurs that one love in which we forget ourselves for. God, love him for his own sake, adore him; unless we succeed in living in an irreversible and inexhaustible transcendence to God, with no prospect of a return. Christianity stubbornly proclaims that happiness, quality of life, a better or a sound future for the world, for mankind, are not the ultimate, obvious standard values governing our actions; and, if they are made such, will lead us into eternal ruin. Christianity knows that to will one's own reality, to be intent on self-development and to seek happiness, are legitimate enterprises and that this determination, even if it has not yet been transformed into a radical love of God for his own sake, is not for that reason alone sinful and hostile to God. But Christianity stubbornly insists that only love of God for his own sake will save us in the end. Christianity is aware of the apparently excessive and even absurd demands it makes on man and in the course of its history there have been enough attempts – deliberate or not deliberate – to reinterpret the inexorability of that love for God which tears man away from himself and thrusts him into God's incomprehensibility as into an unfathomable, dark abyss: new interpretations which turn all this into a sublime form of self-assertion in which a holy egoism can also be put – fortunately – at the service of God and thus be able to assert itself forever. Christianity knows and expressly states that this love for God, in which man must lose himself, is possible only by God's love approaching man and being itself offered from its innermost centre as the power of that love in which man has the courage to get away from himself, [178] to abandon himself, as the only obvious thing to do: to allow himself to fall, to regard mystery as the true light illuminating everything, to know that death is the gate to life and that the love which seeks, not itself, but the God who is loved as such, means true life and eternity.

All this of course appears to demand too much of man. It is true that we can make sense of it in abstract, metaphysical terms by saying that man by his very nature is a priori that being which is related to the other, needing to get away from himself in order to discover himself, to forget himself in order to become truly aware of himself. But what kind of assurance does this metaphysical consolation provide in face of the all-too-obvious solid egoism, hardening hearts and apparently taken for granted in a struggle for existence in which victory is only for the strong and all ethics of selflessness and love apparently serve merely to conceal this selfishness at the roots of existence or to permit compromises between these egoisms, so that they become more bearable and offer more individuals a chance of survival? In face of the radical demand of Christianity for real love – without which there is no salvation – on the one hand and the monotonous routine of our earthly lives on the other, what is the use of this metaphysical consolation? Christianity cannot and will not relieve us of our deadly terror at this demand involving life or death; it offers no facile optimism, no magic by which from the very outset, as if it could not be otherwise, good people and criminals, murderers and their victims, are brought together into heaven.

In the course of its history however Christianity has rightly come to understand better than it did at the beginning that this incomprehensible love – the only love that is salvific – making apparently excessive demands on man can grow up mysteriously and as it were invisibly in many different shapes and on apparently completely unfertile soil. This love can be fidelity to one's own conscience, can be an ultimate, solitary unrewarded responsibility for others, can perhaps mean that composure by which a person, calmly and unconditionally hoping to the very end, submits in death to the inscrutable decree of providence and finds there shelter and protection. The mystery of salvific love, which draws us away into the sheltering mystery of God and liberates us from ourselves in order to make us free, can take on unexpected shapes and thus lead us to hope that there is more love at work in the world than our own experience might suggest, particularly since this experience can be clouded and distorted by our own selfishness isolating us from any encounter [179] with real love. The fact remains that this love alone produces salvation and redeems man, the love that seems radically to overtax us. That is why, in the last resort, Christianity alone knows the answer to the terrible question of how man can escape from his prison of selfishness into redeeming freedom: the answer that God is greater than our hearts, that his promise of the victorious advent of his kingdom means that his love in its incomprehensible externalization can also accomplish the miracle of our love for him.

What then is the significance of this message of Christianity for the question of 'Hope in the crisis of survival'? First of all, the Christian message cuts right across the tasks and concerns of the kind of humanism seeking expression at this conference. It might be said – and of course quite rightly – that this conference is sustained and filled with that humanity which Christianity itself proclaims under the heading of true love of neighbour. Humanism and the love of neighbour it requires is understandably merely the rational harmonization of many egoisms, while love of neighbour only too readily makes use of the arguments of egoism, seeking to demonstrate (and this is very illuminating) that it is itself, egoism properly understood and that love of neighbour properly understood will quite certainly never do any harm to one's own interests; a rational compromise between merely apparently mutually contradictory interests (it is claimed) is completely feasible. Yet, if we leave all this aside, it remains true that the Christian message offers and requires a real and unselfish love for God which is quite beyond comparison with the humanitarian device of the balance of interests. No, while recognizing a mutual dependence between love of God and love of neighbour, the ultimate message of Christianity cuts right across an intramundane humanism, since it involves a love for God in himself and for himself in which man simply does not pursue his own interests and the mutual balance of these interests, but in the last resort forgets his own assertion of himself above God, his glory and his honour; only in this way is God himself loved in himself and the 'advantage' of this love is for us merely the objective presupposition and practical consequence, but can never be what is sought in this love, can never be its motive.

The message of Christianity imposes on us at the very heart of our existence something utterly different from a humanism – however wise and however considerate of man's dignity – that tries to strike a balance between any conceivable primitive or sublime interests of men. This absolutely incomparable, disparate demand of Christianity on man is not [180] for some sort of optional commitment; it is for something that a person must put at the very heart of his whole existence, knowing that, if God's kingdom is first sought, all the rest – as Jesus said – will be added anyway; and, if it does not seem to be added, this does not mean that he has attached too much importance to the love of God. Must not the Churches today make sure that their concrete proclamation in its emphasis and intonation does not blur what they have to preach as the first and last precept: 'Listen, Israel, the Lord our God is the one Lord, and you must love the Lord your God with all your heart, with all your soul, with all your mind and with all your strength' (Mark 12:29)? There can be no objection to world-responsibility, to intervention for justice in the world, for the Third World, for responsibility for the environment; no objection to protests against all violations of human rights and human dignity, no objection to involvement for the poor and oppressed. Declarations like Gaudium et spes are a good thing and even an obligation. There may be revolutions in which even the harsh exercise of power can be given a Christian justification. Theology may work out increasingly clearly and relentlessly the closeness of the link between love of God and love of men, may show ever more radically that the first commandment is implied in the second. But if Christianity is not to be stifled in the finite, God and the world must not be made to coincide simply in a dead sameness. And consequently there is a love of God that is not simply identical with love of men. We cannot behave as if only the death of God could bring man really to life. That is why we have the message of the absolute love of God from our whole heart and for God's sake alone, a love that is not simply summed up in the precept: 'Save the world!' This is the love that must be proclaimed in the first place by Christianity and its Churches.

Christianity would cease to exist if it no longer had the courage to speak of the blessed uselessness of love for God: absolutely useless, since it would not be itself if man were to seek in it his own advantage, his self-assertion, his own fulfilment. This divine uselessness of love for God, its inexhaustibility, the impossibility of turning back from the radicality of our transcendence to God, made possible by God in his Spirit: these things Christianity and its Churches must proclaim, aiming directly at the proud and despairing dialogue carried on by people about their certainly desperate worries and fears of the future. Where today are the prophets who cry aloud: 'Seek first the kingdom of God'? Prophets who do not confuse this kingdom of God himself with a more sublime plane of happiness and well-being in this world, prophets who do not make this [181] proclamation merely because – one way or the other – they find this world quite bearable, but who raise their voice in the midst of apocalyptic fears?

However much the ultimate possibility and indisputable task of the Christian – and indeed of every human being – lies right across or even beyond his own concern for the future and his own fears for the future, within man's unity that task and these concerns have something to do with each other. This is what we have to speak about now. At the same time it is of decisive importance for the Christian interpretation of existence that man's inexhaustible transcendence to the incomprehensible mystery of God, his love of God for God's sake and not for the sake of man himself, should not again be tacitly reinterpreted as a useful, perhaps unrenounceable and necessary help for man himself in the problems of life. It is absolutely true that man needs God. But this need simply is not a justification of God. Indeed, if God were understood merely as a means and a guarantor of man's concern for himself, God himself would become unintelligible, for this very reason would cease to be the authentication and guarantor of man's humanity, could rightly be fatally struck by Feuerbach's opinion that he is only the projection of human needs and consequently would not exist at all. If then we ask what is the meaning for man of his inexhaustible transcendence to God in loving God for his own sake, it is a meaning that exists only when it is not sought for its own sake, when it does not put God at man's disposal, when God is loved not for the sake of this meaning but for his own sake, when the miracle of genuine love is realized, when its movement towards God does not spring back on man and does not again find its endpoint in man himself. Only on this assumption can all that is said about the meaning for man of his transcendence towards God be true and salutary. This at any rate is the way in which we can and must talk about this meaning. For – since God is a God of the living and not of the dead and despite the irreversibility of its orientation to God – love of God is not a love in which finite man is burned up and consumed, but a love that brings him to life, upholding and saving the person who loves unselfishly – precisely and only such a one.

This love of God for his own sake – which of course always includes belief in God's self-revealing self-communication and hope in the fulfilment of this self-communication of God, the inexhaustible transcendence of man to God without return – means freedom and what Scripture generally calls 'consolation'. Freedom: 'I am certain of this', says Paul [182] (Rom. 8:38-39), 'neither death nor life, no angel, no prince, nothing that exists, nothing still to come, not any power, or height or depth, nor any created thing, can ever come between us and the love of God made visible in Christ Jesus our Lord.' If this love is present, then the Apostle's statement is really self-evident. We are torn apart in this love by the immense variety and vitality of the powers that sustain, determine and threaten our life. None of these uncontrollable and incalculable powers and forces threatening our existence any longer takes first and last place in our lives; in this love we are ourselves grasped sheltered in the infinite God of eternal fullness and security, infinity without a name, which is not the sum-total of the realities immediately encountering us. We are free, since there is nothing more that we set up as absolute, since there can be neither an absolute optimism nor an absolute pessimism in regard to the future.

The question is not whether in this love, which liberates us from everything, even from a precarious self-possession, we have infinite freedom in God, but only whether we actually manage to love God in this way. But this very love for God exists only when love's concern for itself is surpassed and relativized by love for God himself, when this love loves God and is not concerned with itself. And, since at the very heart of our existence God has revealed to us in the Holy Spirit and in the word of revelation in Jesus Christ that he is always prepared to bring about this love for him through his own Spirit, we can resolutely believe and hope that we love God, even though our impoverished hearts are scarcely aware of it and the miracle of this love is forever incomprehensible, if it is credible only to someone who – when the awful question arises – tries to take refuge in God's love itself and has the courage in the last resort to leave the question unanswered. But at that point there is freedom and peace. Nevertheless, this freedom in peace could never become in the present life a state of solid firmness on which we could rely as fixed and existing for all time. The situation is more like that of a swimmer whose head keeps appearing above the surface of the water that is threatening to engulf him.

In this continually fresh realization of love for God for his own sake, however, in which in the last resort we forget ourselves and the vulnerability of this love, freedom over all powers and authorities comes again and again as a sheer gift, and in this way alone comes also the one, silent consolation of which the New Testament speaks. Man today is tempted to make disintegration, unhappiness and despair the very essence of his [183] life-style. But this is impossible when disintegration and unhappiness are really dominant and not merely an incidental phenomenon in an otherwise easy-going, contented life. Someone who is continually struggling to entrust himself in love, unconditionally, to the incomprehensibility that we call God cannot take up a triumphalist attitude – claiming freedom, peace and consolation as his indisputable possession – towards another person who does nothing of this kind and does not pretend to do so; nevertheless, he has these things because he has found God by losing himself in him.

Has this inexhaustible transcendence of man to God any impact on concrete life in space and time, in society and in history as it is experienced? This is our final question and we shall attempt a brief comment on it. Once again this comment must be preceded by a reminder that a positive answer to the question cannot be expected to provide a justification of this inexhaustible transcendence of man to God. Any attempt to justify man's transcendence to God in terms of its positive consequences in the world and in history and to make it a part of the present course of events would simply destroy it. Truth is useful; but if someone wanted to make utility the criterion of truth, he would miss the very truth that is most useful. Love creates happiness; but only if it does not seek its own happiness. God is our ultimate meaning, but only when this meaning is sought for its own sake and not as a means for our fulfilment. Only under this condition can what is still to be said be rightly done and consequently rightly understood.

Before agreeing to the 'usefulness' of this inexhaustible transcendence of man to God, however, a further preliminary observation must be made. I do not know whether world-history will continue as it obviously ought to continue, if mankind as a whole expressly and absolutely radically throughout all its dimensions is to realize fully that love of God, that radical self-commitment to the infinite mystery, which as such is required of it in principle. Perhaps if something like this were to be realized, we should have what Christians call the consummated kingdom of God, bringing this history to its end into the glory of God. It is therefore conceivable that the apparent or obvious lack or even decline of a transcendence towards God in this world has a positive meaning for the continuation of an earthly history and of the further development of mankind and its potentialities, even though it would remain or does remain true (as already indicated) that in this apparently godless world love for God is actually realized in a thousand forms and it is still possible [184] to hope for the transcendent salvation of mankind as a whole. It remains true of course that anyone who is called and enabled to realize an intensive love for God cannot refuse the call merely because elsewhere world-history is perhaps continuing meaningfully even without such an explicit and intensive love. If then there is to be a positive answer to the significance of an inexhaustible transcendence to God even for the world and its history here and now, this does not mean that the course of this history will certainly be good up to a point or bearable only as long as this love for God occurs precisely in those forms and shapes which we have in mind when we speak of love for God and which are required from us in our own special situation.

We do not say once and for all, with regard to particular instances and possibilities, that the actual realizations of this transcendent love for God as such are under no circumstances detrimental to the realization of intramundane possibilities. If Pascal had not only remained healthy, but had also renounced his mysticism and his Jansenist theology, he would certainly have achieved results in mathematics and other secular sciences which he might be said now to owe to mankind. Moreover, it should not be claimed – however much it appears to be becoming again necessary, particularly today, for this earthly history – that man's inexhaustible transcendence to God itself alone could render superfluous all those intramundane objectives which must be jointly and freshly discovered, the absence of which we lament in the present great historical turning point brought about by technological developments. All this can be realistically and honestly admitted and must be respected, since otherwise all attempts to maintain the necessity of a religious significance of human existence would be dishonest.

Nevertheless, it can and must be said that if someone lives out his inexhaustible transcendence towards God, without expecting a reward, he is in fact 'rewarded' even in this life, even though he is not spared the bitter tragedy of individual and collective history which must be endured equally by both just and sinners. It is only through love for God that the norms for appropriate action in the world acquire practically and effectively the dignity of a commandment expressing the divine will and only in this way does it really become clear that respect for such commandments must be justified before the judgement seat of the God of absolute holiness. The intramundane relevance and the consequent requirement of ethical action may certainly not be neglected or bypassed. Nor is it very easy to explain why and how such a requirement of finite and [185] relative values can emerge with the majesty and inexorability of an expression of the divine will imposing an absolute obligation. But, since there are such finite and relative values which come upon man as a divine requirement, moral action in the present world on the part of someone who loves God acquires for him a dignity and inexorability which undoubtedly determine in a specifically new way his intramundane action in accordance with these values and a motivation and an obligation that can only be beneficial to that action.

In addition to what has just been indicated, man's transcendence towards God confers a further significance on his action in the world: it relativizes and deprives his immediate goals and tasks of their idolatrous character. If we look dispassionately and without prejudice into contemporary history, we find in theory and in practice a shocking absolutizing of particular realities and possibilities, although this cannot be explained here in detail. This terrible trend to set up individual finite realities and values as absolute, to deify, to idolize, in order to have some absolute reality in the vacuum of lost meanings – not an absolute to which we surrender, but which we seek to control in order to exercise power – results in fanaticism of ideologies, the awful intolerance of social systems, the raging blast of propaganda, the arrogant and terribly stupid habit in politics of painting everything in either black or white. When man has no God into whose incomprehensibility he is willing to fall, he comes under the domination of particular idols, setting up monomaniacally rational calculation, technology, pride in being able to do everything, the perfect functioning of a system, sex, power, etc., absolutely as the only starting point and making them the sole criterion of action and life on each occasion, If someone does not and will not manage to love God for his own sake, apparently with nothing to show for it, he must necessarily absolutize a particular reality in its individuality and make it the final criterion; he must construct a pantheon with a supreme god, since otherwise he would become disoriented and be lost in the multiplicity of realities and possibilities seeking to become God. But such an individual god, even declared to be supreme god, remains an individual and the conflict between these gods would continue restlessly until the final doom of all. We may not set up anything individual, even ourselves, as absolute; we should attach absolute importance to everything and yet not attach absolute importance to anything; we should not think we know everything and can dominate everything; we must be able to set ourselves free without any guarantee, tested in advance, of getting anywhere [186] and yet hope to do so (we might almost say) with childish simplicity; we must venture out into pathless incomprehensibility without fear of losing the way; we must really get away from ourselves.

If we do this, keep on trying, keep on believing that what we demand – with such an incomprehensibly excessive demand – from ourselves will be granted us, then we love God: only then do we understand anything of what is meant by this word; then the idolatrous images on our life's way are broken, even the idols we made of legitimate future planning and of only-too-understandable fear of the future. We know then that in our own existence and in the destiny of mankind, whether by life or death, we fall into the hands of the God whom we must leave nameless and of whom it can nevertheless be said that for us he is eternal light, eternal life, ineffable glory, peace without end, since he has enabled us to forget ourselves and to be for him.

PREFACE

This new volume of Theological investigations brings the series up to twenty-one volumes (fifteen in the German). it is similar to the preceding volumes and therefore requires no lengthy introduction. Like the previous volumes, it, too, has been provided with a title: Science and Christian Faith. This volume is also a collection of individual essays, composed separately for various occasions and to meet different demands, and so the title is meant to serve only as a focal point for the entire book. In the lectures requested of me as a dogmatic theologian topics frequently presented themselves that I had already treated earlier, and so a certain overlapping is unavoidable in my renewed treatment of them here. Still, I hope that I am not merely repeating what I have already said.

In the preface to German volume 14 (English volumes 19 and 20) I announced that that volume would be the last in the series. I must explain why contrary to this announcement, several further volumes are now appearing. The reason for this is quite simple. When we unexpectedly discover in our old age that we are still capable of working and so feel obliged to continue, we may still publish the results of our work, which we ourselves look upon as a gift.

Starting with the thirteenth volume of the series (English volumes 17 and 18) my fellow Jesuit, Father Paul Imhof, has been my faithful and selfless assistant. He has also taken care of this volume. To him my cordial thanks for this.

PROFANE HISTORY AND SALVATION HISTORY

LIMITATIONS AND PRESUPPOSITIONS OF THE INQUIRY FROM THE VIEWPOINT OF CHRISTIAN FAITH

Pure historians discern in history a coherence of individual elements for which they are able to find an explanation. Without doubt they also discern individual experiences invested with a meaning which is not only of practical import but which is also "perfectly" beautiful, good, and true (even though these experiences are constantly destined to perish). However, when they contemplate the whole of history from the perspectives of their science and with the tools available to it, they must capitulate. They are not able to discover the meaning of the whole, nor do they know why the ascent of meaningful individual phenomena in history also involves the decline of others that are just as valid. Does Christian faith go beyond this melancholic end result of all historical enterprise?

If something is to be said about this question, then it naturally cannot be a demonstration of the justification and credibility of Christian faith in the face of a sincerely truthful conscience. One can only say what Christian faith says about the question that has just been raised. And on this question only a few remarks will be made here without making any claim to presenting an actual theology of history with all the historical and systematic topics that would have to be dealt with in such a theology. This is quite impossible here because, among other reasons, such a comprehensive theology of history in the ordinary Christian sense cannot be constructed at all [4] in view of the diversity and contradictions contained in the theological history of Christian dogma.

We presume, then, the Christian confession of faith in "life everlasting." With this the rejection of historical materialism is already presupposed. A history of the conflicts of classes does indeed exist, but within, below, and above these sociopolitical struggles there takes place as well a history of freedom, faith, hope, and love before God, a history which tends toward his eternal life. And this history is not to be found in the place occupied by the conquerors in history, but in the history of the "oppressed" and of the "failures," whose history can really be the true history of freedom. The Christian confession of eternal life will not ultimately come to grips with the history of the suffering of the world by considering this eternal life to be an all-enlightening consolation for this history of suffering. This eternal life will only be attained when human beings unconditionally and without question abandon themselves to a God of love who could have spared his world this history of suffering, but who, instead, has willed it to be in his freedom beyond which there is no appeal. If one understands the attainment of eternal life in this way and speaks about it in this manner, then one certainly has the right to say that past injustice is not yet a closed matter and that those slain in this injustice still live. Nor can the remarks which follow have anything to do with the philosophy of history which likewise is unable pragmatically and analytically to discover any partial meaningful phenomena and which maintains that it is the human being alone who invests history with meaning, and that in a universal history as such no mention of God is possible. With the awareness of these presuppositions and limitations the following are some comments, then, on the meaning of history which are offered from the position of a presumed basic Christian conviction.

THE HISTORY OF HUMANITY AS THE HISTORY OF FREEDOM BEFORE GOD

Christian theology will hold fast to the idea that the history of humanity, despite all the conditions indicated by the natural sciences today and the anthropologies which are oriented toward the natural sciences, is a history of freedom. To say what freedom is and how far [5] it extends is, of course, difficult. Not only from the standpoint of psychological experience but also for theological reasons it is impossible in the concrete reality of the history of humanity to make a pure and simple distinction between the constraints at work in history and the freedom of the individual which is operative in this history. But since it is the Christian conviction that there are such things as freedoms in history and that these freedoms are not something absolutely transempirical, but occur in our concrete experience of history, then everything which the Christian understanding of faith asserts about freedom takes place in history.

Now it is not our purpose here to describe all the characteristics and dimensions of freedom, even though all of these are operating in concrete history. It is sufficient to say that the Christian idea of freedom is so radical that it looks upon freedom not merely as an immanent phenomenon but also as apart of the concrete relationship of the human being to God himself. At the same time Christian theology is aware that this human freedom, which tends toward God, is also dependent on the free and sovereign disposition of God without its being thereby abrogated. The Christian teaching about heaven and “hell” also implies that this human freedom in its ultimate sense does not contain the possibility of acting differently again and again. This freedom is, rather, a freedom which tends toward finality; it is the capacity to commit an act of one’s own that is ultimately irreversible (even though this capacity, as has already been said, is, for its part, dependent on the free disposition of God, which is known as predestination).

The teaching of human freedom understood in this way and the teaching of an absolute sovereignty of God’s freedom over human freedom cannot be resolved for us here and now into a higher synthesis. All the attempts to do this in Christian theology (in Augustine, Thomas, Calvin, Bañez, Molina) have been doomed to failure. One can only say that both teachings must be true and ultimately in their coexistence are nothing other than the highest way of expressing that an absolute God and a world distinct from him, yet real, can coexist because they actually do coexist. In any case, the essence of freedom as act tending toward finality leads us to the following conclusion. History is temporal history with a final result, even if we do not know how long this history will last, nor even if it will be resolved into a true finality before God. If (as Christianity [6] teaches) this finality as it applies to the personal core of freedom of spiritual beings in their most immediate unity of life with God (seeing God face to face) can be understood, in an extrapolatory sense, to some extent as the completion of the present relationship of the human being to God, then it is, of course, difficult for us to form even the slightest concrete notion of what the completion of the physical world might be. This problem remains even though one, perhaps, cannot simply exclude the completion of the physical world when one poses the question about the meaning of nature (“resurrection of the body”) and thinks about the continuing unity of the human being with nature. However, it may be that an end to physical time is not implicit in Christian eschatology at all. In any event, however, the history of personal freedom yields a final return which is no longer subject to an infinitely continuing development in time and space.

This finality in which the terrestrial history of freedom is transformed and at the same time acquires its definitive character by its coming into immediacy with God must be considered by the Christian as a twofold possibility: as a blessed completion in which God in his inmost essence communicates himself to the human being, and as an eternal loss in which the human being speaks a definitive no to God's offer of himself. Human beings as Christians have the right and the sacred obligation to hope that for themselves and for all others (or better still, for others and therefore for themselves) there will be a blessed conclusion to the history of freedom, even though guilt, darkness, and futility in this history do not exactly recommend such hope and hardly make it easy. However, since Christians believe in the infinite goodness and the true salvific will of God and lay hold on the promise of Jesus of the victorious coming of the kingdom of God through the act of God and not merely through the human being's own goodwill, they hope for a universal redemption, a blessed completion of the whole of history. This hope, however, gives them no justification for a theoretical doctrine of apokatastasis, even though such a doctrine has constantly recurred in the doctrinal history of Christianity since Origen. The authentic Christian attitude regarding the end of the history of the individual and of humankind as a whole remains one of hope, despite all (empirical) experience to the contrary, and silent surrender before the unfathomable disposition of the Lord of history. From that position one might say that for Christian faith history (by the power of God's grace) brings forth a definitive [7] meaning. But on the basis of our empirical evidence and the impossibility of making a definitive judgment (God alone is judge and the history of the world is not the judgment of the world, even if this judgment properly understood occurs in this world) the history of the world is open and no one can say (except within the hopeful repetition of the promise of Jesus) whether history will end in a divine meaning or in absolute meaninglessness. (According to Thomas and Calvin only God could bring meaning for himself alone out of such meaninglessness: the manifestation of his holy justice.)

One might also state the case in this way: history has to have an eternal meaning and with the ultimate confidence of the hoping heart one may expect that history as a whole and not merely in a few chosen ones will truly attain this meaning. The traditional "world view" – at least in its conceptual paradigms, even if probably not in its actual definitive statements – expected just about down to our present day that history even in its definitive result would forever leave behind a disgusting rubbish heap of guilt and depravity. If one does not subscribe to the opinion that rogues and villains might be able in the end to slip unpunished through the scenery of world history and step out of it into nothingness, then present-day historical experience does not exactly stimulate the hope that at the end the whole of history will resolve itself into the pure harmony of a blissful playing before God. Christians, however, may entertain this hope. And even if they must hope for such a completion for themselves while faced with the threat of the loss of salvation elsewhere – and this is radical optimism – then how can they dispense themselves from entertaining the same hope for everybody? The character of hope which determines and (if you will) restricts the ultimate attitude of the Christian now affects not only the thing we hope for, but it also affects the very hope itself. I hope that I hope. For the Christian nothing more than this is possible and nothing more is necessary. This is also valid in respect to the meaning of history insofar as it is considered to be ours.

THE DEFINITIVE MEANING OF HISTORY HIDDEN IN GOD

When Christians talk about the meaning of history they give the impression by and large of being convinced that this meaning of their individual history as well as of the history of the whole of humanity [8] will be resolved in luminous brightness and transparency, if not just at present, then, at the end – at least in eternity. There is of course a good deal of truth to this idea. After all, why shouldn't we eventually understand the sense of "accidents" in this history which at the present moment appears to us as pure arbitrariness? If we are convinced that God, the Lord of history, is a God of eternal meaning and of love, then history must ultimately be something more than a chaotic confusion compounded of senselessness, absurdities, and meanness It cannot really be that only a few fragments of finite meaning are being tossed about in the churning sea of meaninglessness which are sufficient to satisfy us in the banality of our everyday life without our really knowing where they are coming from or why this sea does not in the end swallow them up. The bravely hopeful song of praise to the meaning of history must not pass this over in silence either. The actual completion of the personal history of freedom takes place only in the unconditional, loving acceptance of God as he is. Only through this does the ultimate meaning of history arise. According to the teaching of Christianity, however, this God is the eternal God who cannot be encompassed, the one who is incomprehensible in his essence and in his freedom, and this incomprehensibility will only yield itself to knowledge when knowledge is dissolved in love. The ultimate meaning of history will only be brought about and attained when God in his grace grants it to free, finite subjects to abandon themselves in love in the incomprehensibility of God without the will to return once again to the false autonomy of themselves. One can only bring about and come into possession of the meaning of one's own existence when the quest for an autonomous meaning to be possessed and enjoyed for oneself is forgotten in one's love for God who is loved for himself even in his incomprehensibility.

If Christians possess a hopeful universal optimism that history will reach a meaningful completion and if at the same time they know that this will only be possible when all in this completion abandon themselves in love, then the question necessarily arises in their mind, when they see on all sides the frightful pervasiveness of human egoism, as to how this is going to be possible. One might apply here a variation of a saying of Jesus that it is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a human being to enter the kingdom of heaven. But with Jesus one can also say that what is impossible for human beings is possible for God. (Lk. 18:24ff.) Here [9] of course the theologian can reflect on how this possibility on God's part can be realized through the freedom of human beings, on how somewhere, despite all empirical evidence to the contrary, the evil human heart can attain the one good of the love of God. Still, the definitive meaning of history is hidden in God and the loving recognition of this incomprehensibility is the supreme act of history, which can and must come forth in it if history is to find its consummation.

ON THE DIALECTIC CHARACTER OF THE MEANING OF HISTORY

Thus the meaning of history lies in a peculiarly dialectic way beyond history, yet at the same time in history. It lies beyond history inasmuch as God is not only the Lord of history, guiding it with his own freedom, but is himself the goal of history as well, communicating himself to this world in its spiritual apex, yet at the same time abiding in absolute reality which is independent of this world. Yet God is also present in history or in its definitive result since, despite his infinite eminence above the world, he is nonetheless by virtue of creation, grace, and direct regard its inmost core without which the world would not come to its completion. Whether this consummating end of history is a finite end when also surveyed from the standpoint of history itself, whether history as a whole, and not just from the beginning, represents a finite time which will also be completed in time and which, to a certain extent, will proceed no further – this is an obscure question which theologians seem to have reached no agreement upon. In any case, history is transformed into a finality before God, even if in a linear sense of time we would not have to foresee any definitive end, but rather the "Last Judgment" would occur parallel to the history of the world instead of at a finite point of time at the end of the world. On the other hand, precisely today, more than ever before, an actual temporal end of history could be expected, since it is clear that the biological presuppositions of human existence will probably not last forever.

ON THE PROBLEM OF THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE HISTORY OF REVELATION AND THE PROFANE HISTORY OF HUMANKIND

When Christian faith proclaims the transcendence of the final and total meaning of the history of the world, a meaning which will be [10] grasped through faith and not be a purely immanent empiricism, it by no means denies the possibility of grasping a partial coherence of meaning. Love, truth, beauty have a "meaning" in themselves and can be found to some extent in history. And this is true not only in the history experienced by any individual but to a certain degree as well in the history of societies. The emancipation of the slaves in America had a rightful, truly palpable meaning with a moral justification which could not be claimed by its opposite, no matter how many "human elements" and even how much immorality were actually involved in it, and no matter how much a concrete general historical situation demanded it, in order for it to be seen and made reality. It is these partial complexes of meaning which Christianity must recognize most of all if the actual history of salvation is not to transpire in a purely transempirical way outside of real history (while the cup of water given to the thirsty person will not be without significance before the tribunal of God). This raises the question of whether these complexes of meaning can be ordered and connected to one another in the objective and temporal order. Evil and culpability can of themselves yield no principle of order regardless of how much they may be inextricably interwoven with what is good and meaningful in concrete history

This question seems to be the objectively and properly posed question of the division and arrangement of materials in the writing of history. For its part, this linking of individual complexes of meaning in an objective and especially in a temporal way does not seem to succeed at all for the most part, or if it does, then at best in an imperfect way or only in respect to brief periods of time. Nevertheless, Christianity has in itself an interest in such a question. Christianity, after all, proclaims not merely a protology and an eschatology but it speaks as well of a "fullness of time," of Jesus Christ as the central point of history. Furthermore, it is a Christian conviction that in this Jesus Christ the history of salvation as a whole has entered into a new phase which was heretofore not present and that in this phase it is salvation and not its opposite that has become irreversible as the end of history, no matter how long the clock of history may continue to tick. In addition to this, in an evolutionary view of the world we have come to recognize an enormously long history of humankind which but a few decades ago was not even known. Therefore theology must ask itself how it can interpret this long [11] history as history of salvation, as history of faith and grace, and for theology this history can no longer begin with the historical Abraham who now appears as one of the last pages of the history of humankind up to the present.

If the history of salvation, when viewed in this way, requires an entirely new ordering in its structural principles and individual phases, then the question certainly arises as to the relationship of such a conception of the history of salvation and revelation to an ordering, at least in broad strokes, of the profane history of humanity. These questions must of course be addressed to the universal history of religion because in this history it is, perhaps, easiest to determine points of demarcation which are also of import for the universal history of humanity and the way of structuring it. This is not to deny, of course, that this history of religion, for its part, is conditioned by many causes belonging to the universal cultural history of humanity. In any case, it would be desirable today to replace the divisions of the history of revelation customary up to now (the primeval revelation of paradise, Abraham, Moses, the history of Israel, etc.) with a contemporarily more convincing way of structuring the history of revelation or to incorporate them into a structure in which the great religions of the world could also be accorded a significant place in a Christian sense. A similar list of requests must be presented to church history, the history of Christianity in the narrower sense.

THE REALIZATION OF TRANSCENDENCE IN HISTORY ACCORDING TO THE CHRISTIAN UNDERSTANDING

When historians describe structures of meaning in the past with sensitive interpretation, when they try to "understand," that is, when they do not limit themselves to pure reports of what is "factual" (which is, in the last analysis, impossible – a report of what simply "has been" would be quite uninteresting and would mark the end of historical writing), then they are presuming that in the history being described something true and abidingly valid presents itself to us despite the historical contingency which no longer obligates us, and that this can be for us a challenge and a binding model. That this kind of historical writing can come upon norms (naturally in quite [12] varying degrees of importance) is a basic presupposition accepted and defended by Christianity. For in contrast to an overt or tacit opinion current since the Enlightenment, Christian faith is convinced that the Christ-event has significance, has "meaning" for the whole of history and that it is a constituent part of the history of salvation for all time. In the Christian theologies there may be considerable differences of opinion as to how such a universal meaning within history can be apprehended. This, however, alters nothing in the common Christian conviction which is at the root of the ultimate dignity of historical science, and which maintains that in history itself the final meaning of history, the irrevocable promise of a blessed meaning of history to be revealed at the end, has appeared, and ever since that time this meaning can in principle be apprehended in faith.

Due to the influence of this Christ-event the theology of history can no longer be seen in accordance with the pattern of an ascending development. Rather will history present ever new but ultimately equivalent ways for the realization of human development and for the relationship to God. Of course there is in many respects something that may be described as an ascending development of humanity and this belongs to the meaning of history. It is not necessary to confine this development to the dimensions of the human being's dominion over nature through natural science or to the social structures which are becoming increasingly complex. But even in history the human being remains – a human being. One cannot imagine possible evolutionary tendencies in which a creative leap of development would one day transform the human being into a being which could no longer be called human, similar to the way in which one imagines the biological development in the origin of new species. Future history will also be the history of human beings who are of "one race" with one another and with the God-man. To speak in this way does not restrict the meaning of history to the confines of a narrow-minded philistinism. Even now the meaning of history lies in a unity with God which by definition cannot be surpassed. Within this realm of human possibilities thus described there may be numerous possibilities which we presently cannot even conceive, even though in many areas earthly limits to human development are beginning to appear. But even the idea that human beings could bring about considerable changes in themselves through gene manipulation does not mean that the boundary of their essential humanness would be [13] overstepped, because human beings are already creatures of unlimited transcendence.

In future history human beings may attempt to fill out to some degree this unlimited transcendence in knowing and willing by individual achievements which we cannot even conceive. Yet even now in their knowledge and in their freedom they are through Christian faith directly confronted with the total fulfillment of their unlimited transcendence. True, they reach this fulfillment in a definitive way only through their death. Over history stands the cross. Even in this world every ascent is always paid for with a decline. Without this, a continuation of history cannot be conceived. Therefore it comes as no surprise that social and historical utopias which see history as being played out on this our stage of time and space have precious little to tell us about what will happen in history when the conditions which they are aiming for are finally achieved. Because Christians expect their fulfillment only from that God whom they themselves cannot create, they remain skeptical of all utopias which they are supposed to bring about themselves and which always lie beyond their capacity. Because they know that they must answer in their lives before the judgment seat of the eternal and holy God and that the question of their love of their neighbor will be put to them (according to the words of Jesus, Mt. 25, this will be the only question), they are still permitted to be least of all the persons within history who defend their own property selfishly. Christians refuse to let themselves and their Christianity be cornered in the either-or position, whether it be conservative or revolutionary. The gospel requires them to undertake special efforts for the poor. This is understandable. The neighbor who is poor is loved by God, and only by loving their neighbor selflessly can they find the way to break out of their egoism and open themselves to the love of God. This may all sound somewhat individualistic, but in the objective order the poor neighbor whom we are supposed to serve can just as well be an oppressed class or the people of the Third World.

ON THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE COLLECTIVE AND THE INDIVIDUAL HISTORY OF SALVATION

The foregoing considerations might give rise to the question whether we want to apprehend the meaning of history by letting individuals [14] with their own history of freedom and in their salvation as individuals enter into the incomprehensibility of God. As far as the question of the meaning of history goes we seem to be pure individualists. Quite candidly and without any apology to the spirit of the times it must first of all be said that there are in the world histories of freedom for which individuals as such are responsible and these cannot be transferred or sloughed off. As far as the meaning of history is concerned, no one is dissolved in a collective mass, be it secular or ecclesiastical. But there is more to the problem than just that, even when one grants that both aspects of reality as well as of the meaning of history cannot really be resolved into a higher synthesis.

We have already said that the historian certainly has the right and possibility of apprehending supraindividual complexes of meaning in history even when these are still only partial segments. If this is correct (and if the history of salvation takes place not parallel to but within ordinary history), then one must also grant that these good, supraindividual segments of history achieve their finality in and with God in the same way as individual persons as such achieve theirs. Holy Scripture itself, after all, does recognize “peoples” as the subjects of salvation history The gospel is preached to them, their angels are spoken of,

God's name is invoked over them, and he is the God of all peoples, and so on. It is no more possible to dissolve the salvation history of these "peoples" into the history of individual persons belonging to these peoples than it is to dissolve profane history into the chaotic confusion of individual histories. Both are conditioned by one another, but beyond that they do not yield a single and entire structure of meaning. We Christians talk about an eternal "kingdom" of God, about the communion of the saints with God. If we do not just want to imagine a hierarchy of individual beings in this finality of history with God, who are ordered according to a mere formal moral criterion, then in this eternal kingdom of the finality of freedom we must recognize and allow for the individuality of specific supraindividual collective histories of peoples. How, exactly, the diversity of history is supposed to be able to enter concretely into the definitive kingdom of freedom is something that goes quite beyond our present power of imagining. It must, however, be possible, if history itself, in all its diversity, is to arrive at the finality of God, instead of vaporizing into nothing more than a colorless extract consisting of moral actions performed by individuals.

THE "GREATS OF HISTORY" AND THE "GREATEST IN THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN"

Perhaps we should state more explicitly than we have done up to now that the definitive harvest of the meaning of history brought in before God is not identical with what the heroic figures of history and culture have contributed to this harvest. According to Christian faith, which on this point is radically antielitist, it is the blessed of the Father who are going to possess the Kingdom, the poor and the little ones, the anonymous "masses" who for the writers of history have served as not much more than the compost out of which they saw the great deeds springing up which alone they deem worthy of historical note.

It is true that in the Christian view there is also found in the eternal kingdom of God a sort of structure and hierarchy, because Catholic teaching maintains something like a differentiation of merits on the part of the saints, and Jesus in his human perfection and Mary occupy the highest places in this hierarchy of "merits" and thus the highest places in the definitive balance of history. Now while this idea cannot simply be ignored, since we cannot consider everything in history to be of equal value and importance, history being in its ultimate meaning not just a homogeneous mass, still history in the Christian view is made by individuals each of whom is unique and irreplaceable, who do form a community, who manifest the "kingdom of God," but these individuals do not recur, rather they are always unique. God alone knows who of these are the "greatest in the kingdom of heaven." No one knows for sure whether these persons (prescinding from Jesus and Mary) are identical with the great figures of history to whom historical writing devotes its attention. Among them can also be the poor, the little ones, the despised, and the failures. But this problem as well will not simply resolve itself into a rightful hierarchy of individuals which will be revealed in history's definitive outcome. Rather, it will find its resolution by being elevated into that timeless love in which every individual will participate in the totality of the entire history of all who have loved unselfishly.

NATURAL SCIENCE AND REASONABLE FAITH

THEOLOGICAL PERSPECTIVES FOR DIALOGUE WITH THE NATURAL SCIENCES

Any observations that theology is to contribute here to the expositions of the natural sciences must necessarily be very brief and hence fragmentary. It is clear that in recent decades theology has not occupied itself very intensively with borderline questions between the natural sciences and itself. So what is presented here cannot be a compendium of lucid conclusions which enjoy the blessing of Christian theology in the sense of being its common property.

PRELIMINARY QUESTIONS ON THEOLOGICAL EPISTEMOLOGY AND THE PHILOSOPHY OF SCIENCE

Theologians would certainly consider it desirable in such an interdisciplinary undertaking for both sides (theology and the natural sciences), first of all, to treat in general some epistemological questions and some questions of the philosophy of science regarding the essence, autonomy, points of tangency, lines of demarcation, and possible areas of conflict in these sciences. Today's serious natural scientists pay homage to epistemological realism, and they are not accustomed to spending any great length of time puzzling over [17] ultimate questions of the theory and metaphysics of knowledge, not even when, as persons schooled in the history of the modern natural sciences, they themselves subject their own science to objective criticism as they see it over and over again drawing them to falsifications, and not even when a kind of skepticism nowadays, more than in the past, makes them hesitate to extrapolate in an all too facile way a total world view based on the conclusions of natural science.

Given the peculiar nature of their discipline, theologians, on the other hand, evince more spontaneous interest in general questions of epistemology, since theology is almost always conducted in dialogue with philosophy. Moreover, fundamental theology cannot do without ongoing dialogue with traditional epistemology, with the analogous efforts of existential philosophy in this area, and with the present-day philosophy of science, logic, and linguistic philosophy, especially of Anglo-Saxon origin. This, however, does not alleviate the extreme difficulty of dialogue between the natural sciences and theology starting right from the general problems of epistemology. Even apart from the fact that natural scientists today are themselves obviously puzzling over the methodological problems of their own science without really coming to any consensus within the different branches of their science, one side of the dialogue being sought for is that of the natural scientists, who evince less interest in the more general questions of epistemology. Then there is the other side, which is that of the theologians. While it is true that theologians deal with more general questions such as these, they themselves cannot appeal to a consensus among one another in this area.

In a dialogue of this kind (and this is what makes it even more difficult) a distinction has to be made between the actual material question regarding the fundamental possibilities and real results of such a dialogue, and the more psychological and cultural-historical question regarding the difficulties that have to be taken into account in such a dialogue, given the psychological and cultural-historical background peculiar to the dialogue partners. In a dialogue of this kind perhaps, "in itself" it might often be relatively easy to come by a result in the objective order. The actual given peculiarities of the dialogue partners (the limits of their knowledge, the bias toward which their professions have inclined them, the actual difference of importance that they attach to their interests, the respective "blind spots" in their capacity for understanding, the sociologically diverse [18] backgrounds of the dialogue partners, the psychological influence of their respective milieu with its prejudices, etc.) can, in fact, prevent an outcome of the dialogue, even if it were in itself possible in the objective order.

POSSIBLE COEXISTENCE OF CONVICTIONS AND ELEMENTS OF KNOWLEDGE NOT YET SYNTHESIZED

At this point it is time to draw attention to the question of an existentiell epistemology (if one may put it that way), the question of a basic justification (in the order of insight) for a permissible and sustained coexistence of simultaneous convictions in the same subject, wherein a positive and intelligible synthesis has not, or, at least, has not yet been achieved. The legitimacy of such a coexistence of convictions or opinions which have not yet been positively reconciled with one another can be understood and is of great importance for a peaceful relationship between theology (faith) and natural science.

For example, why shouldn't a natural scientist as such feel inclined toward a kind of pantheism, without turning this into an absolute system, and, at the same time, as a religious person, turn in prayer to a personal God, without having to reconcile in a fully positive way this existentiell pluralism? The possibility of such convictions or tendencies not yet positively reconciled, which are induced in the same subject by the multiplicity of the sciences, should be frankly admitted. After all, this does not amount to an affirmation of a fundamental and absolute irreconcilability, not even if such a positive reconciliation in the intellectual history of an individual and of the history of science remains on the whole a goal toward which one strives only in an asymptotic way. Between positive synthesization of elements of knowledge from diverse disciplines and the determination of an absolute contradiction positively recognized as such there is a wide area, and this is the place for real, ongoing dialogue.

ON THE FUNDAMENTAL RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THEOLOGY AND NATURAL SCIENCE

A preliminary consideration of the fundamental relationship between theology and natural science, prior to a treatment of individual [19] problems, can lead to the formulation of the following general principle. Theology and natural science cannot in principle contradict one another since both right from the outset are distinct from one another in their area of investigation and in their methodology.

Natural Science: The Investigation of Concrete Individual Phenomena and Their Interrelation in A Posteriori Experience

Natural science investigates in a posteriori experience individual phenomena which human beings (ultimately through the experience of their senses) encounter in their world, and the relationship of these phenomena to one another. Theology has to do with the totality of reality as such, and with the ground of this reality, and its method is ultimately one of a priori questioning. Consequently, there need be no fear of a conflict of competence between natural science and theology, provided that neither acts contrary to its own nature when crossing the other's boundaries, and provided that, when such unintentional violations do occur, they inform one another of them. Such a basic thesis is of course a generalization and requires explanation in respect to the borderline cases. At least in the case of a Catholic theory of faith, in which rationality and affirmations about the world and about history are implicit right from the outset, cases of this kind cannot be absolutely excluded. More of this later.

First of all, there is a clear and simple distinction between theology (as faith) and natural science, so that at least at the outset it is possible in principle to resolve any conflict. The natural sciences investigate concrete individual phenomena which people encounter in their objective experience. They seek to determine these experiences and link them to one another in a meaningful way. The following points need not be investigated here: the question of how, exactly, these phenomena can be related to one another; how such interrelations are verified or falsified; what more precise insights into the essence of natural science and into its methodology result from the answers to these questions; to what extent prognoses based on such interrelations can be made in respect to future experiences not yet existing; and what the relationship is between the theoretical and practical intentions of the natural sciences.

[20] The main point here is this: with the methods of natural science it is not possible at all for human beings to let themselves be confronted all at once with all possible phenomena of reality as such for an a posteriori experience. These sciences as such offer no possibility of doing this. They necessarily proceed from an individual phenomenon within a larger spectrum of realities and experiences which are possible but which have not yet been realized. They thereby tacitly presume as self-evident that this individual experience and this individual reality have an objective link to other realities of previous or future experience and that thereby, in principle, an intelligible network of such interrelations can be progressively set up. Two things flow from this assumption, which, incidentally, the methods of natural science alone cannot prove.

Natural science is making steady progress in the addition of new elements of knowledge. It is able to do this, of course, because it begins with the particular object and so none of these elements of knowledge can, in principle, possess a universal formula which encompasses absolutely everything and on the basis of which all of reality would fall into the possession of natural science.

Furthermore, in this sort of a priori postulate of the interdependence of all reality as envisaged by natural science, there is implicit the fact that every newly acquired particular element of knowledge is always in principle a revision of previous elements, since the previously recognized reality is codetermined by those realities which have not been recognized until afterwards. Whether such a fundamental progressiveness, which is always revising the previous elements of knowledge, actually imports a falsification of these previous elements or whether, in the retrospective revision, the previous truth still has validity as such – this question, and maybe it is only one of terminology, need not concern us here. (Ancient philosophy insists that the abstraction which always takes place in every individual cognition does not import an error. In natural science this ancient axiom is, perhaps, not quite as valid as the philosophers and the natural scientists are accustomed to presume.)

Theology: The A Priori Question about the Totality of Reality and Its Ground

Theology, on the other hand, makes an affirmation about God as the one and absolute ground of all realities. It grounds the multiplicity [21] of all realities which can be experienced as individual realities in an absolute reality, which is not one individual element within this manifold world, but rather its ground, which, although incommensurable with this multiplicity, establishes it and holds it together. There is of course the one tremendous question whether such an original unity preceeding the multiplicity is conceivable; whether this unity exists; whether in its relationship to the world it can be so conceived as being understood to be the foundation of the world without at the same time being dissolved in it as a particular element; and then again, whether a human being can have a real relationship to this original unity as such, which is called God, even though this God is not a part of the world, while the human being is just that. There are of course many other questions such as these.

But because these are questions about the original one and whole as such, and not questions about the result of a subsequent summation of all individual experiences (which summation both from the nature of natural science as well as from the nature of the questioners, who are never able to gain total possession of themselves, can never really be completed), then such questions are, in any case, not questions of natural science. Due to the fact that natural science necessarily proceeds from the particular object, the original one and whole cannot in principle be found in it. So natural science may and should be methodologically atheistic. In explaining one individual phenomenon and linking it to another there is no need to presume that in the course of this undertaking one individual phenomenon as such should suddenly bring God into the picture. One experience is always to be explained by means of a further particular experience within the whole, and not by means of the original one and whole. God is not to be classified as an individual factor in the series of phenomena. (Incidentally, one would do well to give heed to this in the theological interpretation of what are known as miracles.) The whole, when viewed as a sum which has been added up, requires a whole which is originally one single whole. But this step is not the task of the natural sciences, but of metaphysics and theology. To legitimize this step, however, these two need not justify themselves before the natural sciences. They may not demand any theological tribute from the natural sciences, but at the same time they do not depend on the consent of the natural sciences. The question and the method of a metaphysical theology do not occur as a consequence of [22] the natural sciences having reached their utmost limits, nor are they extrapolated from these sciences. Rather, they precede them in the logical order (if not of course in the temporal and psychological order). They occur when the knowing subject, instead of focusing its attention on this or that particular object of the a posteriori experience, asks itself, in a total return to itself, about the conditions of the possibility of subject and of a knowledge and a freedom which have a reflexive knowledge of themselves; when thinking and freedom think themselves. In this transcendental reflection on oneself there is contained a metaphysical anthropology which is not constituted by an empirical anthropology of natural science, however legitimate and important that may be.

Of course in the natural sciences themselves there do arise questions of a transcendent nature, inasmuch as the individuals pursuing this science cannot entirely prescind from them. Natural science is done by natural scientists. True, these scientists as such do not appear in it. But when they ask why they are pursuing the natural sciences; what the direction of their inquiry is as they carry it on to the exclusion of other possible sciences; what ethical norms have to be observed by them in their occupation (presuming that they are not covertly pursuing the business of their own annihilation); how their scientific work fits into the ever-growing complex of their own existence; how they are supposed to be the loving, artistic, political persons that they have to be over and above their natural science; then natural scientists are perforce confronted by questions of life and death for which they can find no answer in their natural science, no matter how strongly they are inclined (rightly or wrongly) to apply knowledge, analogies, terminologies of their own science to this universal question.

Of course (and this must be said right away) the beginning of the autonomy of theology as distinct from natural science in the metaphysical question concerning the original one and whole and our original relationship to this original one, which precedes our particular point of departure into the manifold world, is a starting point which gives rise to the question whether it can really be a point of departure for that faith and that theology which consider themselves to be based upon a historical revelation. There naturally arise at this point extremely difficult questions that cannot be answered here. It is enough for us to assert that such a point of departure, rightly and [23] properly understood in its essence, is likewise sufficient as foundation and point of departure for theology as the science of revelation. Here we need only say: when and to the extent that theology contains, at least as one essential element, the transcendental and a priori relationship to the original one and whole, then it is from its very outset essentially distinct from natural science and is, therefore, not subject to its judgment. Whether theology can justify itself at all in the face of reason is a question. But it is not theology's duty and task to legitimize itself beyond that legitimation which is the obvious duty (but a mutual one!) of human consciousness in all its individual contents.

Of course there is a mentality which can easily develop in natural scientists, given their a posteriori pursuit of science, and – when this tends to become absolute – it is that mentality of positivism, that annoyance with metaphysics, that exclusive confinement to what can be demonstrated by direct experiment, which is liable to produce the arrogance of persons who can present their conclusions as beyond dispute, a mentality which does not have much patience with theology. But even natural scientists might realize, or at least entertain as a hypothesis, that their science of the particular object can induce a partial blindness as an occupational hazard which makes it difficult or impossible for them to see other realities.

If natural scientists put the question to themselves critically whether they seriously believe that they can interpret and determine by their science the totality of their existence, if they critically espouse the position that the things in their lives which defy such a scientific determination are not for that reason unimportant, unessential, and beyond intellectual responsibility, then they must realize that there is an intellectual interpretation of their existence which cannot be disputed by natural science and the measure of which, in point of certainty and commitment, cannot be taken by the criteria of this science. If a natural scientist wanted to persist in a fundamental agnosticism in respect to the whole of his or her existence as though it were the true summation of his or her life experience (something that seems to be rather common among natural scientists), then by this very fact alone he or she would already have opted for a metaphysical system and not a system of natural science, and thereby would have adopted a standpoint which, just as that of the theologian, lies outside of the realm of natural science.

THE POSSIBILITY OF SECONDARY CONFLICTS BETWEEN THEOLOGY AND NATURAL SCIENCE

Even if theology and natural science, from their different starting points, are two entities which do not fundamentally threaten or negate one another, still secondary conflicts are nonetheless possible and such conflicts have occurred over and over again since the Enlightenment. In principle they can be solved and have been solved over and over again. At least in this sense a truce can regularly be achieved as soon as one sees that the affirmations of both sides cannot be shown to be absolutely contradictory.

The basic reason for such conflicts is found of course in the trespassing of boundaries on either or both sides in respect to an objective question of theology or of natural science. It may well be the case that such trespassing will not be easily and immediately noticed, but will only come to light when the other side voices its objection. From the epistemological standpoint this failure to respect the proper domain of the other science is perceived only when the science in question, on the one hand, actually becomes aware of its mistake through the protest of the other science, and, on the other hand, is then forced to recognize the mistake as a violation of its own principles and methodological norms, even if this knowledge is of itself the result of this problematic dialogue. Without this dialogue this awareness would not even occur, given the historicity of human knowledge and its conditioning by the situation.

Theology has often been guilty of overstepping its boundaries in this way. This does not mean to say that the ecclesial teaching office has been guilty of this regarding those dogmas which are actually intended to be definitively binding. (In establishing this, one is not asserting that there have never been opinions and teachings in the Church whose nondefinitive nature has been quite clear even before the objection of natural science. Nor is one asserting that, humanly and historically seen, such an opinion which oversteps the boundary would certainly not have been defined in the event that such a decision would have been forced by other circumstances prior to the [25] entrance of secular science. This kind of historical vulnerability, along with the dangers entailed in it, is part of the nature of divine revelation, which is also a historical reality.) For a long time the Church resisted the heliocentric system of Copernicus. For a long time it tried to hold onto a fixity of the kinds of living beings by appealing to the account of creation in the Book of Genesis. For a long time it rejected the biological emergence of humankind from the animal kingdom and fought against it. In Humani Generis and in a schema prepared for Vatican II it taught the origin of all human beings from a numerically single pair. In reprimanding Teilhard de Chardin and repressing his endeavors it manifested too little understanding for an ontology in which created being is conceived in principle and in the very beginning as being which is in the process of becoming within an entire evolution of the cosmos, which is still in the process of becoming. The Church has often shown too little understanding toward those branches of anthropology in which the material, biological reality of the human being as such is validated. The Church's relationship to genetics, to depth psychology, to the development of the social life and morals of humankind as conditioned by natural science was never especially benevolent, was not sufficiently differentiated. The Church was always quicker to say no than to say yes.

Behind these facts, which could easily be multiplied, a problem is of course concealed which can only be sketched here: the transition from a medieval mentality to the modern mentality of today's world determined by the Enlightenment. This process lasted a long time, and in the different regions and social groups of the Christian West it did not just run its course simultaneously, and even today it is not everywhere simply over and done with. As regards this total process, there is present a more difficult problem than in the case of a concrete individual pronouncement of the Church's teaching office standing in apparent conflict with an individual affirmation of natural science. Even if one can safely say that a great many of the conflicts have been resolved in regard to individual question, if not in regard to the general mentalities of historical epochs, still, on closer inspection, the question nonetheless remains whether all such individual problems have been settled which can exist between what is known by natural science and the traditional teachings of the Church. Right now there is no extraordinary and clearly defined case of conflict, [26] none, anyway, that the ecclesial teaching office has taken notice of. Nowadays the Church pursues a more tolerant and prudently tactful course in its dealings with natural scientists than previously. But there are still some more individual questions that have, it seems, not as yet been sufficiently cleared up, and in the following pages they will be considered. The selection and the sequence are necessarily arbitrary. Furthermore, it is not going to be possible to deal with them in the depth and detail that they deserve.

"Truce" or Peace Treaty? Presuppositions and Possibilities of Dialogue

In view of the vast extent of the sciences today, even with the will to interdisciplinary dialogue, natural scientists do not really have enough understanding of metaphysics, much less theology. Theologians, for their part, are even worse off, since they do not really get much beyond a somewhat dilettantish acquaintance with the conclusions and methods of the natural sciences. So dialogue is extremely laborious and usually breaks down before more precise and clear results are obtained by both sides. Nothing in the following considerations can do much to alter this sad fact. It may very well be that in the long run the very impossibility of mastering this situation is the very theme itself of dialogue between natural scientists and theologians. What right do theologians have to make statements touching upon the natural sciences without really understanding the conclusions of these sciences (modern physics and the biological sciences)? This right exists, but its legitimation cannot be demonstrated by a direct clarification of the objective problems at issue. This is a question that cannot be sidestepped. And how can modern natural scientists honestly be believing Christians when they have scarcely understood how the affirmations of faith can be brought into harmony with their scientific insights? As a matter of principle they cannot just carry these two realms of affirmation around with them in separate compartments of their consciousness.

Along with this problem and the requirement of an indirect solution in the form of a kind of truce rather than a direct solution of the problems, there emerges another broader problem. The question can [27] also be posed whether, to what extent, and according to what future timetable the actual conclusions of the most modern physics and biology (which are characterized by abstractness and a transposition into mathematical terms, etc.) can find their way into the general consciousness of the average person, in which the affirmations of faith actually reside, notwithstanding all subtle philosophy and academic theology.

In the last analysis, the most modern natural science really does remain inaccessible to the consciousness of the average person, even despite the osmosis which takes place through popularization. Yet it is precisely to this normal human consciousness that faith is addressed within and despite the theology which this faith produces. Presumably, then, there are consequences for the dialogue between natural science and theology which have not been adequately thought through and which do point in the direction of a legitimately certified "truce" which, at least in the actual consciousness of the average person, cannot for the most part be superseded by a "peace treaty." This sort of "truce" (and the legitimacy of this arrangement should be recognized) would, in fact, only be a radically unique case of the intellectual situation of people today, who, in comparison to people of earlier times, are becoming more and more ignorant, if one measures their knowledge by the yardstick of the relationship between what they really know and understand and the mass of knowledge which is directly available to them in their time and which is known by others.

With all these presuppositions and restrictions the attempt will still be made in the following pages to say something about the individual themes from the standpoint of theology (or, better still, of one theologian), which themes, while originating in natural science, must still be of concern to the theologian as theologian.

A GENERAL DISCUSSION OF THE BASIC THEMES OF DIALOGUE

First, a few basic themes will at most be touched upon in a very general way because here anything more would be impossible, and [28] one or the other will be taken up again in a later context. There are certainly ultimate basic themes of natural science, or at least of cosmology (philosophical problems of physics and of biology) to which theologians cannot be indifferent. What is matter? What is space? What is time?

Spirit and Matter in Traditional Metaphysics and in Natural Science Today

In dealing with the question of the ultimate essence of matter (physicists might actually or in principle dispense themselves from this question) theologians will inquire especially into the relationship between spirit and matter, between matter and a personal consciousness that realizes an unlimited transcendentality. Spurred on by today's natural science, theologians can no longer be satisfied with their traditional positions on this question. The average manual of theology has had up until now the following contours. God created spirit and matter (spirit in the angels even before matter). The two are essentially distinct from one another and a closer unity of the two as a particular and subsidiary problem emerges in a critical way only in anthropology by virtue of the substantial unity posited by anthropology of a spiritual soul and a biologically material element. (The forma of the living being, the entelechy, integrated in a somewhat obscure way into the material element, belonged to the material element by virtue of its eductio e potentia materiae; it was essentially distinct from the physical matter, and, in any case, it was only a marginal problem of slight importance to the general relationship of spirit and matter.)

Because of the commonly held theory of evolution, it is no longer easy for theologians today to conceive spirit and matter as being more or less disparate realities which originate only in the creator of the two and then continue to encounter one another only in the case of human beings. Moreover, the question of the relationship between these two entities has become more difficult because of the fact that today one can imagine or experience productions of highly complex material realities (computers) formerly considered to be accomplishments specifically of the spirit. Hence the boundaries between spirit [29] and matter can no longer be as easily drawn, not even if one rejects pure materialism. Conversely, however, traditional metaphysics and theology do assuredly contain elements in themselves which could be the starting point for a further development of theology, moving it closer to the tendencies of today's natural sciences, without at the same time capitulating to gross materialism.

Textbook theology does not do much to develop the idea that matter, by virtue of its origin and the end toward which it tends, must, after all, be quite "spiritual," inasmuch as its creator is absolute spirit and can hardly be the cause of something that is purely spiritless. Medieval ontology has said more about the "spirituality" of the material object on the basis of "forms," which are in themselves "ideas," than today's average Christians are conscious of.

If one were to conceive of "angels" (presuming that they "exist") as self-aware principles of organization for large material complexes in space and time and not just as purely nonmaterial monads – and this is quite possible from Holy Scripture – and if one were further to understand the concept of matter on the basis of medieval speculation as the most general indication of finiteness, then an ontology of finite being would also include materiality as an essential constitutive element, and the absolute God would project his creative distinctness and eminence above everything finite in the world by creating material being which goes on to realize itself step by step.

In any case, with all the justified and necessary distinction between the material and the spiritual within finite being, one cannot conclude that what has been created, in its very fire moment, divides into a separate material element and a purely spiritual element, and not that both, albeit in a quite different way, are inner essential constitutive elements of every created being. What is called the purely unconscious and the merely material can, likewise, on the basis of medieval ontology, be understood as something spiritual which only possesses its own spiritual essence alone. The prohibition against considering the spiritual and the material to be continuous essential constitutive elements of every finite being is, in any case, not a proposition of faith, but perhaps rather nothing more than a traditional, albeit somewhat awkward conception, designed to make clear the diversity and gradation of reality. Of course consideration must also be given to how the most general concept of [30] matter, as it appears in modern physics, and the concept of matter, as it has appeared in Western metaphysics, can be brought into closer harmony with one another.

Matter and Individual Singular Substance

To the question about matter in general, insofar as this is of interest to the theologian, there also pertains the question whether the traditional conceptions of an individual singular substance, as also used in theology (e.g., the substance of bread in the Eucharist), can nowadays still be validly applied on the purely inorganic level, or whether on this level a genuine multiplicity of individual singular substances can no longer be accepted in the old sense without thereby being forced to conceive of the entire material world as one single, really uniform individual substance. If particular beings on the organic level also certainly possess a high degree of unity and individuality (although at least the boundaries in this area cannot always be exactly discerned by us), then a problem arises in the organic area in respect to the individual substantiality of the actual difference of essence, at least in view of the thinking of the most recent cosmology, which, for the most part, conceives the evolution of living being in such a way that in this evolution the new appearance of underived entelechies is no longer necessary. Thus the question of the essential differences in the (subhuman) organic area must be reformulated. One may be permitted to say that theology can get along without an actual right of intervention in these questions, although it has, in fact, overstepped its boundaries by using the customary concepts from common experience and from cosmology up to now in its affirmations about the human being and the subhuman stages of reality.

The concept of one individual substance essentially different from anything else finds its legitimation in the experience of the spiritual, personal, and free subject in the human being, and in regard to the human being it must be defended by theologians even against natural scientists who might be tempted to overstep the boundaries of their area of experience by denying the individual substantiality of the human subject. However, the question of what concepts are most [31] suitable for the appropriate description of the subhuman and particularly of the inorganic world in its unity and multiplicity does not lie within the competence of theologians. It is even conceivable that new concepts (e.g., “field,” etc.) can be of use to theologians, both in an analogous application as well as from the fact that the subhuman world cannot be bracketed out of a real anthropology.

CREATEDNESS OF THE FINITE WORLD AS A PROBLEM OF TEMPORALITY

The problems connected with the createdness of the world, with its finite temporality and spatiality, are not simply the same problems, but they are, at least at first glance, interconnected, and they seem to be problems, which come up both in theology and in natural science. Since conflicts in these questions are obviously possible, some attempt must be made here to say something about them. Here, too, great caution is required and the possibility of error cannot be excluded since the positions which theology has taken up on these questions are not as clear as it might at first seem.

That the world has been created is a theological affirmation, not one of natural science. So on this point there can be no quarrel either. Nor is the natural scientist who is a Christian required to hold the created character of the world as a whole, or even that there has been a creation event of a specific kind within the world. Every conclusion from the world as a whole to an absolute cause is, when understood properly, not the application of a general (univocal) principle of causality, but rather the objectivation of the unique relationship, implicit in every statement about an existing object, between the individually existing object and absolute being, which is always implied and affirmed. Beyond this indication about the nature of the knowledge of God nothing more can and need be said here. God, then, is not a factor to be viewed as an individual element within a series of individual phenomena, which are the concern of the natural scientist as such. Creation is not something that happens at the beginning of time, but is rather the continuing relationship of the world to its transcendent ground.

When Christian thinking speaks of the creation at the "beginning" [32] of time, it means precisely that time, as a characteristic of the reality (interior and exterior) directly experienced by us, is itself created, that God from the very outset stands outside of temporality, that his creative act, eternal in itself and identical with God himself, establishes a world which in itself is temporal. When and to the extent that Christian teaching speaks of the finiteness of this created time and declares that this time is not "eternal," that is, when it not only asserts a continuing radical dependence of the world on God but also apparently says that the world's duration is finite (a statement which is obscure for theologians and which requires additional metaphysical consideration), then it is not asserting that the first moment of this temporal series, which is ordered to finiteness, is identical with the "big bang" which is spoken of by natural science today and whose distance from us in time science is trying to determine. It is certainly not necessary for theology to identify this concept with the concept of the beginning in a theological sense. Among other things this would present the difficulty that a temporally determinable distance between us and the big bang would put the big bang into a temporal order, while the beginning in a theological sense posits time as timeless, and the concept of a first moment in a temporal series so posited (even though theology does use this concept too) causes great intellectual difficulties which cannot be further analyzed here.

For the concept of time that it really needs theology will, in any event, appeal to the inner experience of the free subject. In this experience a human being finds a genuine beginning, temporality which has a genuine direction and which cannot be reversed, and genuine finality. How and whether physically external temporality and time can be understood in this light as deficient modes of this actual time of the free subject is a question of interest for theologians, but not one that causes fundamental alarm. If the temporality of the inner experience of the senses is comprehended and thought through with sufficient clarity to the effect that in this experience as such the materiality of the world as such, which is an inner element of this sense experience, is directly experienced, that here too, then, the observer and the reality observed cannot be completely distinguished from one another, then perhaps it can be made clear that even scientific concepts of time with all the problems they raise are not as far removed from the common experience of time as they sometimes seem to be.

THE PROBLEM OF EVOLUTION AS SEEN BY THEOLOGY

Because and to the extent that an evolutionary understanding of the world is one of the basic elements of today's conception of the world and one that does not harmonize completely with the traditional Christian understanding of the world, this problem must be addressed here.

The Methodological Point of Departure in the Theological Formulation of the Question

If one proceeds from the assumption that an evolutionary origination of the biosphere as a whole from the "mere" material world is likewise one of the elements of this evolutionary conception of the world, that "creation" of living being does not actually mean an intervention of God as a factor which can be located on a definite individual point of time in the history of reality, then for the theologian the question of the evolution of living being and the idea of a universal evolutionary development of the cosmos come down ultimately to one and the same question.

If in what follows we do not make a sharp distinction between the question of the development of the world as a whole and the question of evolution within the biosphere, that need not necessarily mean a reproach for the theologian. We are proceeding from the assumption that it is correct that there is a development which determines the entire cosmic reality and continues on through it. Our only question is whether a theologian who is against this has to raise an objection in the name of Christian faith. Whether this assumption is really correct; whether it has to be restricted; for what areas of universal development of this kind natural science can offer solid arguments and for what areas it cannot; what more precise kinds of "mechanisms" must be presumed and can be demonstrated for the individual stages of development: all of these are questions primarily for the natural scientist and, at least at the outset, lie beyond the competence of the theologian.

Methodologically, then, theologians have the right to presume the most extreme positions of evolutionary thinking (provided these make some degree of sense and do not actually constitute manifest [34] metaphysical disregard for the boundaries on the part of the natural sciences). Then they ask themselves whether they can live with these positions. Theologians do not have to defend these positions themselves, since that is the business of natural scientists when espousing these extreme positions (which certainly is not always the case pure and simple). The theologians' position, then, is always a hypothetical one: if the exponents of the natural sciences maintain this or that, then . . .

In answering this question we are going to try to forge a link between theology and the basic concepts of an evolutionary "world view," as daring as this may sound. It is of course obvious that this attempt is being made only because such a world view exists. But this does not alter the fact that theologians with their data and their assumptions can try on their part to pave the way for an understanding of evolution and thereby determine whether evolution is compatible with the positions of theology.

Belief in Creation as the Transcendental Experience of the Origination of All Being from Absolute Being Theologians proceed from the assumption that absolutely everything that is not God is created by one and the same God. This God they recognize as absolute spirit, pure meaning, intelligibility, and love, even though in all these affirmations they know that this God is above everything that exists or can be conceived of outside himself, that he is infinitely sublime and therefore they know that all affirmations about him become lost in his incomprehensibility. Everything that is, therefore, must bear the stamp of origin of this one primordial ground of being; everything must have an ultimate unity and community. The postulate of an ultimate unity of the whole world which cannot be resolved into a definitive, ultimately unthinkable disparity of several worlds, and of an ultimate spiritual nature which manifests itself in intelligibility, and of a being present to itself even though it admits of the highest degrees of differentiation, is implicit in the belief in creation. Materiality must be understood as the lowest stage of this spirit (even when this may perhaps be irrelevant to the pure natural scientist). Otherwise materiality cannot be conceived as originating from an absolute spirit, since this spirit cannot create something [35] that is absolutely disparate from itself. Moreover, this spirit cannot form its creation into a materiality which would in an eternally unrelated way coexist side-by-side with it. Many in antiquity tried to explain the nonspiritual nature of the material world in this way.

If (by way of anticipation) we conceive created reality as manifold and yet one, that is, if we must assume an ultimately intelligible relationship of the individual realities of the world, then this relationship of the individual realities to one another cannot be conceived as anything but final, that is, as an interrelationship that has been ultimately intended and planned. It is not required that this finality of the individual realities of the world can always and in every case be discerned in a clear-cut way in the individual realities themselves with the limited modes of cognition available to natural science. This finality is already implicitly contained in the transcendental experience of the origination of all being from absolute being (and here, without difficulty, we may identify this experience with belief in creation). Elements of finality which come to our attention empirically may by all means be integrated into this transcendental experience of finality, since accident, strictly speaking, is no basis of understanding at all, but only points to the fact that in a limited area of understanding a reason cannot be found why this or that happens in this way and not some other.

Divine Causality: On the Ontology of the Relationship between God and What Is Created

God created finite beings. How can these be conceived in themselves, in their unity among one another, and in their relationship to God? These three questions must be considered in their corresponding unity. First of all, the individual being's relationship of origin from God is not a relationship effected at some time previously "in the beginning," but is, rather, the single creation and the "preservation" (to use the traditional expression) in equal reference to the temporal being and its temporality. This touches upon a difficult point in the traditional doctrine of God. This relationship of a created being to God can on the one hand be identified with the reality of this being; in an idea of creation which rejects every form of pantheism one may [36] not say that God himself is an inner constitutive element of a created being. But in this affirmation theologians must exercise caution for theological reasons which have nothing to do with natural science.

For theologians recognize in the theology of grace and in the beatific vision a relationship of God to a creaturely reality in which reality God's own being is the quasi-formal cause and not merely the external efficient cause of a determination of the finite being. This theological datum already indicates that an efficacy of God through himself and not through a created mediation must be rejected as a pantheistic view only if God at the same time be conceived as an inner essential constitutive element belonging to the essence of the finite being. The distinction between God and creature which rejects pantheism therefore does not exclude a determination of a finite being by God himself as such, a determination which can no longer be adequately subsumed under the category of an "ontic," transient efficient causality. In a more profound ontology concerning the relationship of God's absolute being and finite being, which is being continuously constituted by God, one could show that the example from which we have just proceeded (uncreated grace and the beatific vision) does indeed imply an essentially supernatural relationship to God, accessible only through revelation, but that on the other hand this relationship always and everywhere is nevertheless valid in an analogous way for the relationship between God's absolute being and being which originates from him.

This relationship cannot be grasped solely by just subsuming it under the general category of an efficient causality, such as otherwise exists between two finite beings which are already distinct from one another prior to such a causal relationship of a particular kind. The reason why this is not possible is that divine causality does not presuppose the distinction between God and creature, but itself establishes this distinction and precisely in so doing keeps it with itself in a unique way. Understandably the ontology of the relationship between God and what is created cannot be further developed and established here. It must, however, be emphasized that this singular relationship between absolute being and finite being, which is not really taken into consideration by a superficial theology of creation, is a subject which belongs to a transcendental knowledge of the origination of created being from absolute being, just as metaphysics is something aprioristic to the knowledge of natural [37] science, is not part of this knowledge as such, and cannot be treated thematically in it. The important thing for the question of evolution in what has been indicated here is simply the plain sentence that the determination and events of a finite being are subject to the constant "pressure" (if one may use this term) of the divine being. This "pressure" is not one of the essential constitutive elements of a finite being. It can, however, always make this being into something more than it is "in itself," or, as the case may be, it is that which in the first place makes the finite being what it is. For metaphysical knowledge this "pressure" is a given; for a purely ontically a posteriori knowledge, which is that of the natural scientist, it cannot be discerned.

What is meant by this will become clearer when explicit consideration is devoted to a "being in the process of becoming." Then it must become clear that its character of being capable of becoming, which is no mere passive condition, ultimately in an ontological way can only be made comprehensible by this relationship of God to the finite being, without this relationship being, for its part, an individual ontic phenomenon.

On the Compatibility of the Teachings of Evolution and the Christian Conception of the World

Again we proceed from the a posteriori experience of natural science as it exists or is interpreted in the general and the particular theory of evolution. This theory states that all observable phenomena of the world which are accessible to the natural sciences are interrelated, that the world has undergone a development. Whether this development had a meaningful (final) direction from the outset and whether or not it continues to have one; what, exactly, such statements really mean; what part accident plays in a development of this kind, and what accident means – on these things and many others connected with them the natural sciences themselves are not in agreement. Nor has agreement yet been reached concerning the more precise mechanisms of biological development in particular, for on the question as to what extent a continuous connection in the development of living being can be assumed even over and above the larger spheres of form; whether such transitions are accessible to Observation or whether this cannot be expected from the very outset. [38] All of these questions are and continue to be questions of the natural sciences which do not touch directly upon theology.

Here we are simply presupposing the extreme in evolution as a given or as a hypothetical assumption of the natural scientist, and we are asking only whether something of this sort must be rejected by theology or not. (The emergence of the human being will receive special consideration later.) This, then, is the question: Is a continuous development of the cosmos from its simplest and most original components right up to its present differentiation and complexity, the realm of living being included, acceptable to Christian faith in such a way that it can leave this whole evolution to natural science as a thesis or hypothesis, and then, at most, afterwards include this evolution in a Christian conception of the world?

Our answer is yes. If we at first prescind from the question as to where and to what extent the concept of the fixity of a being, which can be explained only by an act of creation outside of an evolution, is realized in the cosmos; if we put aside the question whether something like this exists beyond the very first and most primordial data of the cosmos, which data modern physics with a certain differentiation simply presupposes (because otherwise the big bang could not be conceived), then this sort of general and continuous development implies only that all respective individual realities in their further development possess in the physical and biological realm the characteristic of the possibility of self-transcendence. Each in its own stage can become something else, can change and become "more" ("higher"), whereby this "more" can of course be quite different, cannot, however, be excluded in the development in favor of simply "being different," regardless of whether such a being different would really contain fewer metaphysical questions than a "being more."

In such a change to more, natural science (if it does not want to abolish itself) will presume on the one hand that at the starting point of such a "development" certain things must necessarily be presupposed without which the result of such a development cannot be achieved. Yet, on the other hand, today's natural science apparently does not wish to understand this development in the sense of a mechanically functioning causality on the basis of which the higher stage could be accounted for in a strictly predictable way (at least in principle), if this were the case, it would actually be questionable whether the starting point of such a development would really have [39] been "less" than its end point, if this starting point would, in fact, have contained in itself the effect in this way as cause. From this it appears that natural science today (when it approaches such borderline questions at all) inclines to the view that in the development more really comes from less, that the old ontological principle is no longer acceptable to it according to which the cause in its reality of being must contain at least as much power of being as its effect in order for it really to be able to be the adequate cause of its effect.

It seems that for faith the actual problem of a continuous and ascending line of development lies here. But faith can still say yes to such a development if the presupposition is granted that, first, divine causality in respect to the finite cosmos is an object of knowledge, and that this knowledge, as knowledge of the transcendental relationship between absolute being and finite being, precedes an application of a general principle of causality, and correspondingly is aprioristic to the knowledge of natural science, second, that with this relationship between absolute being and finite being in the process of becoming there is present (always and everywhere) a determination of self-transcendence coming from absolute being itself, and that this determination is not a particular characteristic which could along with other characteristics be discerned in the finite being with the methods of natural science. The capacity to become more is an ontological determination of every finite being which is necessarily implied in this being, and which includes that more precise relationship of God as continuing creator, which we have indicated above.

So if natural scientists who espouse the idea of a continuous evolution should say that the reality accessible to them with their methods always presents a piece of the cosmos in which more is constantly coming out of less, then an affirmation of this kind pertaining to the empirical area accessible to natural science would not stand in contradiction to the affirmation of faith which declares that this developing cosmos with its stages of constantly recurring self-transcendence presupposes the divine reality and its unique relationship to the world.

It is true that here only the most fundamental problem of evolution as a whole is solved in the most abstract and formal way. The individual elements of self-transcendence which must occur in an entire evolution of this kind are of course, at least at first glance, quite [40] different in kind. Especially the complex systems in the biological realm which replicate themselves seem at first to be quite different in kind from complex systems in the purely physical realm. If, however (still prescinding for the time being from humankind), biology today believes that it can reject a vitalism of ancient or modern origin and sees living systems as developing only "from below," then it does not seem opportune to lodge a protest in the name of faith against such a conception of development toward living being, if one accepts as valid only the theological interpretation of evolution as it has just been explained. It is of course quite true that the emergence of animal consciousness in such a development only from below poses a special difficulty which is not removed by pointing to "thinking" computers which we ourselves construct, and which then surprise us by their achievements.

But it cannot be said with certainty either that the origin of animal consciousness cannot be understood in the framework of the general principle of evolution, since this principle asserts an evolution from the lower to the higher, and theologians do not have to object to this if this development is conceived as standing under that divine influence mentioned before, which does not imply any intervention of God as an individual factor, such as is required by the old vitalism. That the "leap" of development to animal consciousness goes beyond the possibilities of development in general would have to be proved. One must call to mind that even according to the old scholastic ontology of sensory knowledge the material element is an inner constitutive element of such consciousness and not just an external material basis which the animal consciousness merely "rests upon." Finally, we must call to mind that the old ontology recognized an eductio e potentia materiae for living animal being and obviously saw no ontological problem in this kind of emergence of consciousness from below, even granting that the empirical presuppositions of this conception were not correct.

By way of conclusion, perhaps one might point modestly to the previously mentioned idea of scholastic ontology which says that the forma of each and every being is actually something spiritual, the consciousness of which is impeded only by its being imbedded in matter (in the metaphysical sense). The metaphysician of old would have conceded consciousness to this forma, if it were freed from matter; today's theoretician of evolution could concede the same [41] consciousness to this forma, not indeed if it were freed from matter, but if it is present in a sufficiently elevated organization of matter.

THE QUESTION OF THE HUMAN BEING IN THE FRAMEWORK OF A GENERAL THEORY OF EVOLUTION

Some consideration must be given to the question of how a human being can be conceived in this kind of a general theory of evolution without thereby necessarily posing a threat to the anthropology to which the ecclesial teaching office adheres.

Empirical-Biological Anthropology and Fundamental Propositions of Theological Anthropology

Since Pius XII the ecclesial teaching office has declared that it raises no objection to the teaching of the biological origin of the human being in the animal kingdom, provided only that one upholds the immediate creation by God of the spiritual soul. Although it is not really quite so self-evident in theology (further treatment cannot be presented here), the ecclesial teaching office today apparently has no objection to register either against the view which sees Homo sapiens (that is, the theological subject of real salvation history) as existing for an extraordinary length of time, that is, long before those times reflected in the Old Testament writings (paradise excluded). To all appearances the teaching office has also abandoned its opposition to polygenism despite Paul VI's original intention to adhere to monogenism. The consequences here for the interpretation of the dogma of original sin, given the assumption of polygenism, which, incidentally, holds to an emergence of the human being within a period of time and in an area which are limited, cannot be treated here, because theology today offers very many different explanations of original sin, even within Catholic theology.

A universal theological anthropology cannot of course be presented here, even though the question of the compatibility of Christian anthropology with the theorem of a general evolution which also includes the human being can be dealt with only in that framework. A few observations will have to suffice. Even if the previously [42] mentioned boundaries between human beings and animals in the "fluctuating transitions" between the two are in many respects difficult to determine and many of the arguments formerly advanced to support this distinction are no longer convincing, still theological anthropology will inexorably uphold the idea that human beings are spiritual, personal subjects who, essentially distinct from animals, pursue their history of freedom and salvation directed toward God. Of course the question immediately arises as to how these human beings in their original nature are to be circumscribed so that they can distinguish themselves from animals and be the subjects of a history in freedom and dialogue with God. This question can of course have different answers which, while not necessarily contradictory, nonetheless proceed from different formulations of the question and employ different terminologies. In our context the main point in such a determination of human beings is to distinguish them as clearly as possible from animals without at the same time obscuring their bodily and sensory characteristics, which, while not simply identical to those of the animals, nonetheless are comparable to them. In doing this one must take care not to suggest an anthropological dualism in virtue of the traditional distinction between body and soul, which (to put it simply) is repugnant to modern scientific anthropology. But at the same time one cannot grant natural science the right to reduce humankind to the level of the animals, thereby overlooking the fact that human beings are creatures with a language proper to themselves, creatures of culture and of history.

Therefore we say: human beings are bodily creatures who have a fundamentally unlimited transcendentality and unlimited openness to being as such in knowledge and freedom. This "definition" says that in the last analysis it is a matter of indifference whether human beings as distinct from animals, even in the categorical realm with the possibilities of connection present there, possess an absolutely unambiguous and essential superiority to animal "intelligence," even though it naturally cannot be denied either that in this respect they are extraordinarily superior to animals. But it is idle for theologians to quarrel about whether an animals has tools, whether it possesses the beginnings of speech, or has consciousness of what is abstract (just what does that mean?), and so on. These are all questions of an empirical anthropology and in the last analysis they are of no import for theologians. Theologians need only be able to affirm that human [43] consciousness possesses that unlimited transcendentality in which there is present an openness, capable of legitimizing itself, to the absolute reality of God. If this transcendentality is peculiar to human beings, if there is present in it the possibility of a confrontation in freedom with themselves, if they can rethink their own thinking (as the modern expression goes) and if this transcendentality is not present in the animals (has anyone ever tried to demonstrate this in animals?), then theologians have what is required for human beings and their essential difference from animals. To what extent human beings are distinct from animals even in the categorical realm; just bow their transcendentality more precisely operates for the humanness of their categorical realm and then distinguishes this realm to quite a degree from that of the animal; to what extent this realm is the same in animals as in human beings and functions on the psychological and neurological level with the same possibilities – these are all questions which no longer touch directly on theology.

The Transcendentality of the Human Subject and the Conception of a Universal Evolution

In our "definition" we have spoken of the human being's "bodily nature." We thereby mean to indicate that this unlimited transcendentality builds upon and is mediated through an empirically sensory consciousness of individual objects, which consciousness itself consists of an inner material component. The consequences that flow from this for the transcendentality of human beings cannot be considered at greater length here. But in any case there exists in human beings by virtue of this interdependence of sensory characteristics and spirit a unity of spirit and matter, which, on the one hand, in Christian anthropology up to now has been in danger of being weakened in favor of the spirit and which, on the other hand, in the modern anthropology of modern science is often misunderstood in a primitive "materialistic" way. It appears that neither the traditional metaphysical anthropology of Christians nor the anthropology of natural science has really answered these more precise questions with sufficient clarity.

If spirit is absolute openness to being as such, and if humanly embodied spirit is always mediated and sustained by its existence in [44] the world of matter, of body and of sensory experience, then this single nature of the human being can be brought to the level of reflexive clarity only with difficulty, even if it is always present to itself in a nonreflexive way in the unity of its dual nature. The distinction of former times between "matter" and "form" can hardly be found anymore because of the commonplace empiricism of the subhuman sphere. So the use of these categories for stating that in the consciousness and existence of human beings "spirit" as transcendence and "body" as concrete mediation of the spirit are present as "form" and "matter" is no longer as helpful as it once was, despite the fact that the affirmation of unity and distinction contained in this ancient formulation is still valid. But in any case, because of the transcendentality of human beings, they possess an element in their nature which forbids us simply to reduce them to that reality which otherwise appears in natural science and which also limits its area.

Can this nature of the human being, a nature that due to it transcendentality is unlimited in kind and never completely definable, be nevertheless placed within the conception of a universal evolution? According to the view of the ecclesial teaching office common today the answer is: yes, in respect to its corporeality; but its "soul" depends on a creative act of God. If this answer is meant to emphasize that the transcendentality of the human subject cannot be derived simply from its material presuppositions with their material foundations, since one must still make a distinction between body and soul (even if it is now more difficult than before to affirm their unity and diversity ontologically), then this ecclesiastical formulation is right. However, it must be emphasized that the modern theory of evolution does itself recognize a self-transcendence of the lower to the higher, which is more than what has preceded and which always implies an element of the unexpected and the unpredictable. To this extent, then, there need be no contradiction between the present-day teaching of the Church (in Pius XII) and an inclusion of the human being in the general evolution.

The matter becomes more difficult when one reflects that the present-day teaching of the Church seems to understand the "creation of the soul" as an event resulting from an intervention of God which is viewed as an act occurring at a point of time when the human reproductive cells unite. (True, it is clear that in this conception [45] of the ecclesial teaching office there are reasons why a certain caution is called for in the understanding of it. One reason is that an actual intervention of this kind does not exclude the creation of a second soul in the division of the cells which leads to the formation of identical twins. Another reason is that this creation of the soul obviously takes place even when the procreation is morally reprehensible. A third reason is that nowadays this creation can be transferred to a test tube and one must reckon at least with the theoretical possibility that a human being will one day be produced by clones.)

If one is clear about the fact that in such a creation of the human soul the human parents produce a human being and not just the material substratum for one (we cannot think otherwise and this thought is also significant for a theologically genuine view of the incarnation of the Logos); if we further consider that the divine causality which we have postulated above, not as an individual phenomenon of natural science but as the dynamic ground and bearer of all evolution, specifies itself according to the respective goal of a transcendence from below to above, this causality being the ontological ground for this goal, then one can say that the divine causality which bears the evolution in general, in the way that it must be operating here can be identified with the "creation of the soul" in the way in which Pius XII teaches.

One should note, by the way, that in the ancient teaching tradition of the Church the doctrine of the origin of the human soul did not always clearly enunciate an immediate creation of the individual human soul. So this can serve as an indication even today that this dogma may permit a certain latitude in its interpretation. From the scholastic standpoint one must also consider that the creation of a form which, while always subsisting in itself, is still always actually the form of something material, cannot be univocally the same as the creation of a whole substance residing in itself. Thus theology does not have to issue a prohibition to natural science when the latter places the origin of the human being (as humankind and as individual) in the general evolution without at the same time in the question of the distinction between body and soul making different affirmations about these two parts of the human being (which are real, when Properly understood). The only condition for this abstention on the part of theology is that in this stage of human evolution it is conceded [46] that a level has been reached different from the previous stage, on which level the human being is essentially distinct from the animal, and that natural science does not lay sole claim to the description of the nature of the human being as long as natural science and metaphysical anthropology have to be differentiated (and rightly so).

THE PROBLEM OF DEATH: THEOLOGICAL INTERPRETATION AND THE UNDERSTANDING OF NATURAL SCIENCE

In connection with the integration of the human being into the evolution of living being natural scientists will ask theologians how they are supposed to understand the teaching of theology that death, the wages of sin, stands at the beginning of the history of humanity.

Death as Consequence of Sin?

No matter how natural science may explain death more exactly in the biological realm by saying, for example, that biological death was obviously present before the emergence of humankind; that human beings, as part of this life which is subject to death, participate in death too; that there is no place here for a consideration of sin as the cause of death unless one postulates a miraculous intervention of God who has prepared a paradise for humankind, something which, honestly speaking, is not compatible with the findings of paleontology – this is not the place to deal with the theological question of the primeval state in general or the question of the statements of biblical protology. In this problem area we are going to confine ourselves to the question of death as the consequence of sin. This question is obscure and difficult because original sin, which is claimed to be the cause of death, has, despite the fact that it is a dogma of the Council of Trent, again become a difficult subject in present-day theology and it is being subjected to quite different interpretations, at least where it is not denied outright.

There is no doubt that Scripture portrays the primeval state in mythological images and this portrayal extends right up to Pauline [47] theology. And so it is difficult in these protological accounts to make a clear distinction between their real meaning and the mythological images in which this meaning is clothed. (Recourse to statements of the ecclesial teaching office is certainly a help, but it seems that this alone is not sufficient because in these very statements themselves, in a way that is sometimes simple and without reflection, there are echoes of these mythological modes of speaking, or they are simply handed on.)

For this biblical protology, and thus for original sin, one would have to inquire more exactly than has been done heretofore whether these statements are really referring to definite individual human persons in the beginning viewed as a point of time (or to a first population, if one does not insist on monogenism) or whether they are referring to "the human being" at all times and in all places; whether the human fall in paradise might eventually be objectively identified with a profound social and cultural upheaval which inaugurated a whole new "sinful" situation of humanity; whether and how original sin right from the beginning is a no on the part of historical humanity to its "supernatural" relationship to God in grace, which no, if freedom exists at all, can also be conceived of under those conditions such as today's scientific anthropology conceives them to be in the first phases subsequent to the emergence of humankind.

A Distinction on Theological Grounds

All of these questions cannot be answered here. But perhaps the question at issue can be answered in the following, albeit somewhat formal, way. Modern natural science and paleontology aside, theologians certainly cannot maintain that the individual human being's history of freedom in relationship to God would have continued forever. Indeed, they cannot deny that this history would, precisely from the very inmost nature of freedom, be directed toward a final perfection. "Death" as the definitive consummation of the history of freedom would always have necessarily existed. Humankind would not have lived forever in "paradise," as this is traditionally conceived, nor would it have wanted to. Considered in this way death can, on purely theological grounds, be the "wages of sin" only in virtue of a certain mode of dying and not simply by being the end of [48] the history of freedom in its biological termination. Since death has many specifically human and existential aspects which cannot be deduced from its biological nature alone – and we need not go into detail here – it is quite conceivable that one or the other of these aspects is present only in and with the condition of humankind in a state of "original sin" and would not be experienced or suffered without sin.

If a distinction of this sort is unavoidable on theological grounds, then natural scientists may be permitted to say that death, as far as they can observe it empirically, is independent of the sin of humankind and that it is inherited from the biological prehistory of humanity. Thus they would not have to assert that the concrete mode of human death has nothing to do with the sin of humanity and that it can in no way be the wages of sin, as Paul says. How this abstract-formal clarification of our problem can be concretized and its content explained is something that belongs to the more exact determination of "original sin" and is of no further interest to natural scientists as such. They, too, die as human beings in an external and internal condition in which sin is one of the constituent elements, and this condition exercises its influence in all kinds of different directions in their deaths too.

THE SIZE OF THE COSMOS AS AN EXISTENTIELL AND THEOLOGICAL PROBLEM

A further question that must be touched upon in this discussion pertains to the size of the cosmos as understood by natural science today. While it is true that in this question there is not even the semblance of a direct contradiction between the affirmations of natural science and those of traditional theology, since neither of them have put forth statements about the size of the universe, the question does contain, nonetheless, a difficulty of considerable proportions.

Being Lost in the Cosmos as the Expression and Mediation of an Ultimate Experience of Contingency

For at least as long as the geocentric view of the world prevailed, the cosmos was in the naive experience of Christians their dwelling [49] place. Created by God for them and for their history of salvation, they could see its contours. It was built for them and it was there for them. True, the earlier idea of the cosmos as the determining factor of their religious experience was not structured in a unified way. For example, it was not easy to fit angels into it. On the one hand, being pure spirits, they could not quite be accommodated in this edifice and yet, on the other hand, they were supposed to dwell in one of the heavenly spheres. But when Suarez, for example, was still trying to fit the "ascension of Christ" to the caelum empyreum into the ancient cosmos even to the point of asking the question whether the ascended Christ was dwelling in the uppermost sphere of heaven or over it, then we can see how closely the ancient view of the world was amalgamated with Christian dogmas, extending even to the idea of a connection between the fires of hell and known volcanoes.

Nowadays the Christian has to live on a tiny planet in a solar system which in its turn is part of a galaxy of a hundred thousand light years with thirty billion stars and whereby this galaxy is estimated to be only one of a billion such galaxies in the universe. In such a universe it is certainly not easy for human beings to feel that they are the ones for whom this cosmos ultimately exists. In a cosmos of proportions so tremendous that they even defy the power of the imagination, it is quite possible for human beings to feel that they are an accidental, marginal phenomenon, particularly when they know themselves to be the product of an evolution which itself has to work with numerous and improbable accidents. Under this aspect people accustomed to think in the categories of natural science will experience a further feeling of existentiell dizziness if they are then expected to realize that the eternal Logos of God who moves these billion galaxies is supposed to have become man on this tiny planet which, like a grain of sand, exists somewhere or other in this universe.

This feeling of dizziness, repressed of course, because of the narrow horizon of everyday life, cannot be kept away by sublime reflections on time and space on the part of modern physics, which undeniably is becoming more and more abstract. The question remains whether and how ordinary Christians and ordinary people in everyday life can gradually get used to being lost this way in the cosmos. What people believe about themselves, their destiny and their worth will not turn out to be deceptive because of their vulnerability in this vast cosmos (theological reasons are still at least as [50] good as those of modern physics, even if both require different ultimate positions in order to achieve existentiell realization). The question is simply how both views of the world can coexist in the same consciousness without the one or the other to mutual disadvantage consuming people's existentiell strength for itself alone. First of all, one will simply have to accept this situation and live with it, especially since people who perceive things in a scientific way (even outside of Christianity) in the existentiell decisions of their lives also take themselves with a greater seriousness – and this rightly and unavoidably – than would seem to be warranted when they consider their cosmic insignificance.

Today, and more than ever in the future, human beings and Christians are also going to have to realize more clearly and more radically that their very recognition and acceptance of the fact of being lost in the cosmos actually raises them above it and enables them to realize it as an expression and a mediation of that ultimate experience of contingency which they, in virtue of their ancient faith, must perceive and accept before the infinite God as finite creatures. In this light one is justified in saying that the cosmos has become "more theological" for humankind, which is to say that it points more inexorably than before to the experience and acceptance of the fact of being created. In this way the feeling of cosmic dizziness can be understood as an element in the development of people's theological consciousness. If people's scientific consciousness today proceeds from the obvious assumption (although this assumption is not so obvious at all) that the scientific investigation of the cosmos can never come to an end, and if this conviction is a theological datum based on the fundamental incomprehensibility of God, then this experience that the universe is in a way immeasurable is, to a certain extent, nothing other than the spatial counterpart to the theological datum, and it is something that might be expected (after the fact, of course). If people have to give up their feeling of being at home in the universe in exchange for a feeling of not being at home, which reflects the character of their religious experience, then this is at root a legitimate element of humankind's fate. When, in addition, modern physics undertakes at the same time to calculate the finite extent of the actual universe, it is thereby once again documenting the peculiarity of the spirit in contrast to matter, which can reflect upon itself and its world, and then again place its world over against itself. In [51] this way people can perceive the created finiteness of the world, despite its immeasurability.

A History of "Spirit" on Another Star?

In this context we cannot entirely neglect a question which is again laying claim to our attention, although it is not entirely new. Is it conceivable that on other "stars" there are creatures consisting of body and soul equal or similar to human beings? The modern natural sciences will ultimately not be able to give any answer to the question of the fact. As far as the concrete possibility is concerned an answer is hardly to be expected either, since the probability, given the enormous number of stars, and the difficulty of the development of life up to the point where the "human being" emerges can hardly be factored out together. Still it must be said that in contrast to the ancient view of the world the fundamental possibility of a development of life to the point of intelligent consciousness can today no longer be excluded.

This holds true especially because it would be an anthropomorphic idea that God the creator would bring the cosmic development at some other point so far that the direct possibility of conscious life would be present, but that then he would arbitrarily break off this development.

One should also note that traditional angelology points to the fact that theological tradition also reckons with the coexistence of other personal creatures along with human beings. In this context a number of theological problems have emerged even prior to our problem (a common vocation to the same final goal; Christ as head of all creation, etc.).

Should one wish to speculate further on this existentielly rather remote problem, one might say that it would make sense to ascribe to these creatures of body and spirit a supernatural destiny immediately directed to God (notwithstanding the gratuity of grace), but that we, of course, can discern nothing about the presumable history of freedom of these creatures. In view of the immutability of God in himself and the identity of the Logos with God, it cannot be proved that a multiple incarnation in different histories of salvation is absolutely unthinkable.

Our only purpose in bringing all these things up is to show that [52] theology need not put any absolute veto on the idea of history of "spirit" on another star. Theologians will not be able to say anything further on this question. They will point to the fact that the purpose of Christian revelation is the salvation of humankind, not to provide an answer to questions which really have no important bearing on the realization of this salvation in freedom.

THE HISTORY OF HUMAN SALVATION AND THE NATURAL HISTORY OF THE ENTIRE COSMOS

A final word must be said as to whether and how the history of human salvation as conceived by faith and theology can be integrated into the evaluation and natural history of the entire cosmos. We have already touched on some aspects of this problem; many of them cannot be dealt with here in much greater scope. We shall, however, attempt to offer a few ideas.

Within evolution as a whole and history there is also a history of freedom of personal creatures consisting of a bodily and spiritual nature (known as human beings) for whom the entire cosmos is the presupposition and place of their existence and (in different degrees) even the inner element of this existence (because of their corporeality and sensory characteristics). This fact causes no difficulty if matter and spirit are conceived not as absolutely disparate and contradictory, but rather if matter is conceived as ultimately spiritual and oriented toward spirit (consciousness) and furthermore (albeit in essentially different degrees) as an inner constitutive element of the spiritual nature of created beings, all of which Christian faith requires, rather than forbids us to do. The Christian understanding of the history of human salvation as the apex of the history of the cosmos toward which the cosmos is tending in the normal course of its development, even if this apex has a specific quality of its own, presents us with this difficulty: the "result" of this salvation history can today no longer really be located in the cosmos (of the modern natural sciences, or so, at least, it would seem); yet on the other hand, Christian faith, rooted in the dogma of the "resurrection of the body," seems to prohibit a simple shifting of this result of salvation history to a point outside of this material cosmos.

The old theology had it easy. In the cosmos, which was viewed in [53] principle as being accessible to empirical observation, it had a place for the risen Christ, for the angels, for those who had reached beatitude, for the evil spirits and for hell. Places like these are no longer conceivable in the modern cosmos considered in the light of an evolutionary world view: At this point, of course, one can appeal to the principle which has often been mentioned and which states that, given the original multiplicity of the elements of human knowledge, the ability or the obligation to achieve in every case a positive synthesis of our affirmations, which are at first disparate, cannot be expected from the outset; that the absence of such a synthesis is therefore no reason for denying a part of what has not been synthesized; and that consequently legitimate affirmations of an existentiell eschatology may not be rejected just because we do not know how to synthesize them positively with our ideas of history and the cosmos.

But this does not mean that the Christian view from the outset rules out the possibility that these eschatological affirmations about the eternal life of the individual, the glorified body, and so on, might be in some way related to the material cosmos, since, after all, those who have reached beatitude are not different persons from those that they were on earth, and there is a belief in the resurrection of the body and hope for a "new earth." But in affirmations of this kind one cannot "demythologize" in such a way that the ultimate meaning intended by the affirmation is turned into the opposite of what the affirmation really intended to say. Doing this only adds to the difficulties. That much should be said. Eschatological realities which faith affirms cannot be made acceptable to Catholic theology by simply declaring them to be there as something in the future, only at the end of the history of the cosmos or of humanity. At least the risen Christ (and Mary) must be considered as a glorified element in the reality of the world which is present even now. But is it possible and is it permitted to conceive this as separated from the cosmos and its material character here and now? In today's conception of matter in its unity, which is viewed as a field, new questions have certainly arisen for theologians which they must somehow or other face up to, even if they might not really be able to give a positive answer to them, and have to admit this frankly.

But on the other hand, one must say the following. The history of freedom in the free subject's presence to itself, and the world's self-presence [54] that is implicit in this, is an empirical fact. Those who maintain that universal evolution is the basic pattern which underlies the reality of the world and is the key to its understanding must integrate this fact into this conception of the world. They must recognize that the whole of reality has developed toward this history of freedom in an evolutionary process which, despite all the elements of accident, has followed a consistent line of development toward this goal, and that the previous phases of the world's evolution have developed, by virtue of self-transcendence, into this history of freedom (which, at least in many respects, cannot be surpassed). In this light the possibility of defective developments, dead ends, and calamities as conceived by the theological history of salvation no longer comes as a surprise.
