Since it reflects on the really existentially exercised and possible grounds of faith today, such a 'new fundamental theology' ought to be to a great extent 'transcendental', i.e. it ought to reflect on the conditions within the believing subject which make it possible to realise the contents of faith. Modern dogmatic theology frequently retreats too quickly into a dogmatic positivism: this or that proposition is simply revealed and hence it is guaranteed by the authority of God revealing. This then is often taken to mean the same as stating that it is to be found in Denzinger. Often dogmatic theology does not pay sufficient attention to the fact that there is already theology within the sources of revelation, i.e. in the Old and New Testaments. It can be asked (and today it must be asked) whence and how the bearers of revelation (the prophets and scriptural writers) know what they say; it can and must be asked how and why what they say can often be quite simply traced back to a few quite simple basic assertions, while the multiplicity of dogmatic propositions appears as the theological development (even though guaranteed by revelation) and as the articulated interpretation of these basic assertions. If this were asked and one therefore 'reduced' the multiplicity of dogmatic propositions (without impoverishing their content) to a few basic mysteries of [130] revelation, then one could get a much clearer view of the correspondence in these basic mysteries between the formal being of revelation as such and its Christian 'content'. A 'transcendental' proof makes it possible for the 'new fundamental theology', however, to pass over many (even though not all) of the historical proofs with which the usual fundamental theology had to concern itself; furthermore, it would make it possible to develop the central themes of dogmatic theology in one go and thus reflect the total grounds on which a contemporary conviction of faith actually rests.

THE BASIC THEOLOGICAL DISCIPLINE IN THE FRAMEWORK OF THE WHOLE OF THEOLOGY

The position of philosophy

Whenever one thinks seriously about the theological formation of the future pastor of souls, the function and position of philosophy appears as a difficult problem. According to the official instructions of the Church on Catholic theological training, the course of theology proper is supposed to be preceded by a course of pure philosophy. One can agree with this when and where there is time for at least a two or three year course of philosophy. Such a course, however, presents its own problems in view of the difficulty of presenting a philosophy which is really up to date, with all the difficulties involved in this, to students who for the most part do not have any philosophical bent. Things become even more problematic if, as is the case in Germany, one simply presents the theologians with a kind of introduction to philosophy lasting only one or two terms with an hour or so a week, a preparation which at the most can only very vaguely claim to be philosophy. The whole study then either degenerates to a merely formal exercise in a few concepts originally of a philosophical kind which will be needed later on in theology, something quite unattractive and without any hope of kindling any philosophical Eros, or one gives a genuine course of philosophy which most of the students are incapable of following.

In this situation, it would seem, to begin with, to be much better to do philosophy within the initial fundamental-dogmatic course; this is basically what was done in the Middle Ages.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Philosophy is then studied within the reality towards which the student of theology has an authentic personal relationship; more and more basic philosophy can be demanded [131] of him in this basic course than has been the case in our normal practice until now; no philosopher can seriously maintain that one cannot genuinely philosophise in this way (for otherwise a St Augustine or a Pascal would be without any philosophical significance); 'pure' philosophy can then still be taught – and indeed more profitably – in the later years of the course. Through the basic course one could then philosophise first of all in the area in which the real existence of the young theology student is grounded. Does a Christian have to be ashamed, or even merely regard it as unphilosophical or hold it as something not sufficiently 'without presuppositions', if philosophy is for him to begin with the exact, methodically precise reflection on his real and full exercise of human existence, so as – later – to release the 'pure' philosophy from this starting-point out of the whole of Christian existence into its authentic freedom as the presupposition presupposed by theology itself? A philosophy for theologians, which would be taught after this basic theological course of 'fundamental-theological dogmatics' (as we may also call it), would at any rate arouse more interest and would have a greater chance of success than the rather impoverished philosophical introduction which most frequently is given today at the beginning of our theological studies. It would then also be easier to recognise who among our theological students is suited for such a 'pure' philosophy, and the real professors of genuine philosophy would find more joy in such students than is normally the case in the early terms.

'Old' and 'New' fundamental theology

It should be stressed once more that a partial material identity between the traditional fundamental theology and special dogmatic theology, on the one hand, and the here outlined basic course of 'fundamental dogmatic theology', on the other hand, is not only not denied but appears as a quite self-evident fact. This basic course, however, has a really proper 'formal object' and within this a principle of choice and structure by which it is clearly distinguished from the other disciplines referred to. It is the scientifically exact and methodical reflection on the reasons existentially effective today for faith in the real event of Christian revelation and its central contents; this reflection makes the basis a datum by looking simultaneously with it at the reality grounded by it and by thinking about the possibility of its existential realisation.

[132] 'Mystery of Christ'

We read in No. 12 of the Conciliar schema of Vatican II, 'De institutione sacerdotali': Studia vero ecclesiastica inchoentur generali introductione in mysterium Christi, quod totam generis humani historiam afficit, in Ecclesiam iugiter influit et in ministerio sacerdotali imprimis operatur.[4] The author does not wish to maintain that this simple but profound statement simply and directly expresses what he has tried to indicate here as the basic and naturally also central discipline of theological instruction. Yet it will no doubt be possible to say that if this generalis introductio in mysterium Christi, understood as the beginning and basis of the whole of theology, on which, as the text immediately continues, the other disciplines are to be centred, is not to be merely pious talk which simply fishes a few bits and pieces out of the material of the traditional theological disciplines and then at best presents them simply in the manner and with the method of these known disciplines (the well-known

[4] 'Ecclesiastical studies should begin with a general introductory course into the mystery of Christ, a mystery which affects the whole history of the human race, influences the Church continuously and above all becomes effective in the priestly ministry.' Although this text is not yet final, the definitive text will no doubt express materially the same thing. (This it in fact does. – Tr.)

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation danger of the usual 'introductions') – and if this introductio generalis is understood on its own (as it must be) after the original manner of scientific theory and not merely in a pedagogico-didactic way – then nothing else will remain but to understand the introductio generalis demanded here in the sense in which we have understood the basic theological science we are looking for: as the basic and central discipline of theological formation. If attention is paid in this basic course to the fact that it is a question of the possibility of the existential exercise of faith today and therefore concerns precisely those who can attest this faith in the name of the Church, then the mysterium Christi is seen automatically as the mystery operative in the priestly ministry, without this aspect simply degenerating into a small, individual dogmatic or edifying point which would really have little to do with an introductio generalis to the whole of theology. The transcendental reflection on the conditions of the possibility of faith – which must always also reflect on the ultimate reason for this faith, viz. God's self-communication in grace understood as a permanent existential dimension – shows immediately and in an original manner that the mysterium Christi suffuses and finalises the whole history of mankind, so that this supernatural [133] transcendentality appears ever more clearly in history until it finds its highest and unsurpassable manifestation in Christ.

Unity of formation

Every formation, if it is to have that unity which alone can be formative necessarily and in a genuine sense, must have a central discipline towards which the multiplicity of subjects is orientated as to their preparation, articulation and sequence. This is true above all of theology, the highest science of the spirit. It has often and rightly been said today that the study of scripture is the 'soul of theology'. Yet in the concrete and quite unavoidable practice of the contemporary introductory science and exegesis, it will be quite impossible to say in any practical sense that exegesis can be the central discipline of theology. Exegesis carries on its business today, even on the Catholic side, in such a way that the kerygma of today's Church and the teaching of the magisterium are in practice no longer anything more than merely a norma negativa; until the results of exegesis have been translated directly into the kerygma of today and into the personal substance of faith, it requires such a great deal of 'translation' work in view of the distance between scripture and the spiritual situation of the man of today, that this work cannot in practice be done to any sufficient extent by exegesis itself. In those cases in which exegesis and biblical theology do such work of 'translation' in a most praiseworthy and successful manner today, this work (even though it may still be called exegesis) is bound up and shot through with so many philosophico-theological reflections that it is no longer distinguishable in principle from the kind of work dogmatic theology ought to be doing today. This, however, shows clearly that 'pure' (i.e. principally historically and philologically orientated) exegesis is indeed a very important and indispensable discipline in theology, but that it cannot be the central discipline in which the decisive act of theology is achieved, viz. that listening with all one's spiritual powers to the revelation of God, in such a way that this revelation will make a direct impact on the conscience of faith of the man of today.

There is no basic reason in principle, however, why dogmatic theology as such should be denied the dignity of such a central discipline within the sphere of the theological sciences. It may, therefore, quite rightly claim this dignity. Nevertheless, it can be said, on the one hand, that it is so much divided up in its present-day business (and not without reason) into [134] historical inquiries (i.e. exegesis, history of dogma and of the magisterium) that it finds it very difficult to achieve a synthesis which brings revelation to be heard directly and enables it to be accomplished. On the other hand, the envisaged basic discipline of a 'fundamental-theological dogmatics' intends to be truly dogmatic theology; it tends to be this in a way

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation which will bring the unified whole of the message of faith in its basic structure and credibility to the level of scientific reflection, so that one need have no qualms about granting it the dignity of the desired and necessary central discipline. If a genuine 'introductio generalis' is given only when one starts to grasp the whole out of its radical unity, then this 'introductio generalis in mysterium Christi' is also at the same time and necessarily the central discipline of theology, and the individual tracts of special dogmatic theology can then be regarded as its branches (at a second remove). Other theological disciplines have from the very start no claim to be considered as the central and unifying discipline. Granted that there has to be such a central discipline in theology which synthesises everything else, and this in the very nature of things and for didactic and pedagogical reasons, then it would seem that we have such a discipline in this basic course of fundamental dogmatic theology. This – without ceasing to be theology and science by being the systematic reflection of this kerygma –would then also border most immediately on the one salvation-kerygma of the Church.

Further practical considerations

We will now try to round off our considerations. The fundamental-theological dogmatic basic discipline envisaged in its scientifico-theoretical and theological form would be intended as the basic course for all theologians. This would presumably make it superfluous to pose the question as to whether one would have to institute two parallel courses (one 'academic' and one 'seminaristic') in the central subjects according to the difference in levels of intelligence and in view of differences in the eventual work to be done once the theologians have finished their studies. The basic course we have in mind obviously must and can correspond didactically to the average level of intelligence of the students, so that its niveau will have a certain variation in scope. It can, however, be given as the same for all: being a basic course, it addresses itself to listeners who are all beginners, its theme is directly and in practice of the highest importance and urgency for all, and it leads at the same time into questions [135] which are so profound and have to be explained in such a scientifically exact manner that even the more talented students will not find it monotonous. Given the obscurity still remaining with regard to such a new basic discipline even after these explanations, it is of course rather difficult to say what length such a course would have to be in order to achieve what it has in mind. It can be supposed, however, that three to four semesters of four hours per week would be sufficient and necessary, plus seminars arising out of this subject.

Given real co-operation, a common understanding of the nature of this new basic discipline and an objectively common basic conception (especially regarding the general philosophical aspects and contents of this discipline), there shou1d be no basic difficulty about several professors dividing the lectures between them. If it were possible (which it is not within the present context) to give a more exact outline of the content and the course of this basic discipline, then it would presumably become even clearer that it is objectively and technically possible for several lecturers to divide the work between them without any damage being done to the unity of this discipline. In more modest circumstances, of course, even one professor alone must be in a position to present this discipline.

Basic discipline and other subjects

Naturally, even in this conception, other 'subjects' besides this basic discipline would have to be studied from the very beginning, and these would step into the foreground 'optically' and in terms of time. We cannot, treat here of the problem (which is not merely a didactic but also very basically a scientifico-theoretical one) as to what should be the exact objective division of theological subjects and how time and labour should be divided among lectures, seminars and private study. At any rate, the cancer-like growth by which ever more new subjects arise within the framework of theological studies and fight over the time available for lectures, is a great evil which can be overcome only by really keeping in mind the inner unity and structure of the one theology. Still, given that there are these subjects in sensible division and order according to rank and weightiness, they should be grouped meaningfully around the basic discipline. Introductory sciences to the Old and New Testament, exegesis and biblical theology, should accompany the course of the basic discipline from the very beginning. In order that not too many different subjects have to be taught in the first terms, the bible-sciences should be given [136] plenty of room during these terms. It would be conceivable that during the first four semesters there would also be a course in Church history, taken as the other part of historical theology. After completion of the basic course, and in a kind of second phase of studies, the emphasis would shift to special dogmatic theology (together with the history of dogmas) and moral theology. A third phase of studies would be given over to practical theology (canon law, liturgy, pastoral theology, ecclesiastical sociology, etc.) and to 'pure' philosophy in which, if properly carried out, certain essential aspects of the basic course would automatically be repeated but on a deeper level. We have already touched on the question as to how individual themes of the traditional fundamental theology would be treated in so far as they are outside the subject of the basic course. It should be remembered in this connection that many of these themes can perfectly well be incorporated into special dogmatic theology as long as it can be presupposed that this dogmatic theology offers a sufficient ecclesiology.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

As far as existing university regulations and distribution of professorial chairs is concerned, the suggested structure of theological studies need not encounter any insurmountable obstacles. The incumbent of a chair of fundamental theology, without in the least coming into conflict with his teaching commission, could understand and teach his fundamental theology in the sense of this 'new fundamental theology'. We would like to repeat an old wish in this connection: that the theological colleges of the religious orders, which are much freer in law and in organisation than the State or episcopal institutions and hence have the duty and right to be more elastic and open to new experiments than the latter, ought to have the courage to look for new ways of theological formation and not merely to copy often rather pitifully – the theological faculties of the universities. Perhaps they could try out in practice whether the idea proposed here has anything to recommend it.

Theology and the spiritual life

The basic course, with all its soberness and scientific strictness necessarily proper to it, might nevertheless be suited for building a bridge between the science of theology and the spiritual life of the young theology students. The gap between these two sectors of their life is for the most part extremely wide, indeed far too wide. Such an introductio generalis in mysterium Christi could make it clear to the young theology students that [137] it should also help them to reflect on the significance of his spiritual life, so as to foster it, and to remember that this science is acquired personally only if it is supported by a religious exercise of what is reflected on in it. If this basic course is really taught the way it should be, then it should not be necessary, as has been considered in various quarters, to have a longer ascetical preparation before starting theology, a sort of 'novitiate' for the theology students going on for the secular priesthood, intended to make them more suited to reap the benefits of theology and to overcome the danger of the disintegrating process of mere problematising in theology. If something like a 'novitiate' is held to be important, it could perhaps come in rather later (in the actual seminary, in prolonged retreats, etc.), once the theology students have reached a certain theological maturity. A real contact between the 'fundamental theologian' and the 'spiritual director' could be very useful for both of them.

Lay theologians

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

One could now go on to consider whether such a basic discipline as we have tried to outline would not be suited also to act as the basic course of the 'lay students' who are studying at the university in preparation for becoming secondary school teachers later on and who, besides their particular secular subjects, are also taking theology in their course so as to be able later on to teach religion in the schools. It will be impossible to deny that their training for teaching religion in secondary schools is often quite pitiful. In most cases they are of course quite unable, in view of their other studies, to give as much time to the study of theology as a normal theology student who is going on for the priesthood, and yet they will later on be able to teach in a way not permitted to every curate. It would, therefore, be of advantage both for them and for their future pupils if their training could at least show a certain compactness and emphasis on the most decisive questions. It would seem, therefore, that the basic discipline outlined here could be of the greatest benefit to such lay theologians.

No matter how one may judge the value of the reflections expressed here, one thing at least should be recognised: the question of improvements in the study of theology is not merely a pedagogical, didactic and organisational one. It must not be presumed that we already know quite evidently and clearly what 'subjects' make up theology and that it is merely a question of a somewhat greater co-ordination and balancing out [138] of these subjects among themselves. Before any such practical considerations, there is a scientific theoretical question which itself is again merely the formal aspect of the question as to what is the real meaning of theology and what it must be all about. As long as one is busy merely organising, no satisfactory answer will he found to the question about the right structure of theology.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation [139]

PART THREE

Theological Anthropology

[141]

11

THE SECRET OF LIFE

It is really perfectly obvious that in a general discussion about the nature of life, the theologian too should make his contribution. In his realm, too, the word 'life' is a key concept which he cannot do without and towards which his most immediate sources, namely the writings of the Old and New Testaments, draw his attention most forcibly over and over again.

I

Before we turn to the actual theological concept of life, we will attempt to make a few remarks on the question of the possibility of theology taking up a position towards the biological concept of life. Almost everyone in Catholic scholastic philosophy is a supporter of vitalism, i.e. the doctrine which teaches that life is based on a substantial form or entelechy (or whatever else one might call this principle) which is irreducible to the physico-chemical and its inner possibilities. Naturally, one emphasises in this connection also the substantial unity of this principle with matter, its correlative ontological principle. Scholastics have therefore welcomed the revival of this so-called vitalism in biology, as for instance in Driesch, and have appropriated its arguments. In this way one also feels in agreement with a basic conception which endows biology with the dignity of a basic science and thus does not in practice think of biology as merely an extension of biochemistry and hence of 'inorganic' chemistry and physics. Also, it must not be overlooked that this neo-scholastic zeal to defend a certain form of hylemorphic vitalism had a certain element of theological pathos. Below the surface there was no doubt the impression that in vitalism one possessed certain outer defences for the bastion from which one defends the dignity of man against materialism. But, prescinding from the question about the possible meanings and reasons vitalism in all its [142] different forms might have objectively and on its own basis of natural philosophy, it will have to be said that the question of vitalism is in no way directly relevant to a Christian world-view and theology and that Christian dogmatics can therefore remain neutral on this matter. If we prescind for the moment from man as such, the Old Testament makes rather a radical connection between biological life and the 'earth', regarding the former as a product of the latter, even though only under the creative 'breath' of God which, however, must not be confused with a new created substantial principle. Today's basic Christian conception of the world, of its history and its relationship to God, thinks of God in the realm of nature as the creative, dynamic ground of a development which (at least if one is thinking of man) does indeed recognise factors of essential self-transcendence into something radically new under the creative dynamism of God; it does not, however, understand God as the categorial cause which intervenes at certain points in the time and space of natural history without any created causality being operative at all, and which in this way makes natural history progress by something which is in no way any longer also the result of the world-causality itself. The fact

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

that man cannot be reduced to anything merely material and biological is safeguarded, without injury to his real connection with the total biological evolution, by man's knowledge 'from within' about his absolute transcendentality, his spirituality and freedom, even before he has understood anything about the mere biosphere and its relation to the inorganic world. The self-transcendence of the inorganic into life (always supported by the creative but transcendent, uncategorised dynamism of the absolute being of God) may be seen and acknowledged. Whether it implies a hylemorphism in the classical sense or whether it can at this point of transition be interpreted in another quite different sense, is a further question that is very difficult to answer. The vitalism of neo-scholasticism itself has left so many open questions with regard to its more exact interpretation, the nature of what it calls the 'entelechy', its precise relation to matter and its individual origin, that even for this reason alone it cannot have any dogmatic and apologetic significance for theology and Christian anthropology. This does not yet represent any judgement about its truth content. It merely tells us that vitalism is not a theological question as long as it refers merely to the biological sphere as such. The above-mentioned 'outer defences' may in themselves represent an absolutely correct position, but they are unnecessary [143] precisely as the 'outposts' of Christian anthropology against materialism.

In these few words everything that theology as such has to say on the subject treated so far at this congress seems to us to have been said. Hence, the theologian may now turn his attention immediately to the question dealing with the notion of life recognised by theology as applicable within its own field.

II

This theological notion of life is, of course, connected with the ordinary experience of life. It could not possibly be otherwise, since it is quite impossible to have absolutely different and completely new basic concepts in theology if theology is to be in any way capable of making itself understood by man in his existence which is always in the world. This ordinary experience of life, however, is that of the living man as such himself. The Old Testament in particular is indeed aware that animals too are living (it hardly reflects in this connection on plants); often it even regards human-animal life with an almost terrifying naivity from the same point of view, both with regard to the earth which supports this life and also with regard to the sovereignly vivifying or destructive God . . . but when it comes to the question as to what scripture thinks about ordinary 'life', then it casts its regard on man and on him alone.

The most exciting thing about this notion of life from a theological point of view is that it has its own history within the history of revelation. This history starts off from the concrete experience of human life and death and in the end arrives at that 'life' which we still confess today at the end of the Credo as 'eternal life' and which, therefore, has become one of the most decisive key-concepts of the Christian revelation and faith. This does not mean that the original concept of life has at some time been 'transferred' and 'metaphorically' applied to a completely different situation, so that the new reality is simply somewhat similar to and comparable with the original meaning of life. No, what is referred to even in the last stage of this conceptual history is the originally signified thing itself~ the genuinely experienced life. Yet precisely in this conceptual history, which constitutes the progressive self-unfolding of the original thing itself the depth and radical nature of the original experience become [144] ever clearer: the life lived by man in his unity and as a whole is the becoming, the preparatory stage of eternal life, if it is understood not merely as one but as a whole in its complete perfection of being. It can easily be seen that it is not a question here, biblically speaking and in a Christian sense, of the history of a pictorial metaphor or analogy but of the historical unfolding of the always one and same reality. The 'eternal life' we profess is also the 'resurrection of the body', i.e. the perfection of life, which was the starting-point of the history of this concept. The beatific, perfect community-with-God of personal human existence which we profess in hope, is also the perfection of the life which we experience bodily here below and which we must slowly pass through and experience in all its human breadth and depth. This does not mean, of course, that 'life' is the only possible key-concept for the perfection of man and hence for an anthropology. Starting from this concept, the personal, free, responsible and dialogic aspects of this life remain somewhat unexpressed. Hence this concept must always be seen in unity with other central concepts which call upon the whole of the self-understanding of man in accordance with revelation, such as the 'kingdom of God', 'community', 'knowledge face to face', 'love which remains for ever'. Yet it is nevertheless characteristic of the scope of the concept of life that the concept 'ruach', pneuma, spirit, which appears above all in the New Testament as the divine good of salvation, is ordained from the very outset to the concept of life and thus is associated with the history of the latter. 'Ruach' is the divine life-giving force and thus becomes slowly and more profoundly understood as God's power and the content of eternal life, as the holy pneuma of God himself which in this way powerfully fills man with grace right up to the transfiguration of the body (1 Co 15:45; Jn 6:63; 1 P 3:18) as πνευ~μα τη~φ ζωη~φ (Rm 8:2).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This concept of life starting from man and his experience – and understanding what the scriptures say[1] about the unity of the one man which does not permit of any dualistic separation into two independent substances – certainly envisages also the concrete earthly side of (human) life: the man who yearns for 'length of days' (Ps 21:5; 91:16; 119:17, 37, etc.; 143:11), for 'good days' (Ps 34:13), associated with peace, joy, happiness, fruitfulness of the land, health, and abundance of children. [145] Already however this earthly life, accepted and defended in unashamed affirmation of life, has an inner theological depth in scripture; it comes from God who is absolutely alive (Ps 18:47), it is awakened by him who is the 'fountain of life' (Ps 36:10) by his 'ruach' (cf. Ps 104:30; Is 42:5), so that this life is always experienced as dependent on God, and as transient in spite of all the inner vitality and autonomous power of man. Seen in this light, it becomes understandable that the bodily life of man is experienced from the start as incorporated into the personal, dialogic history of salvation and damnation which takes place between God and man. Even the earthly life is not seen as a neutral, profane matter but as the appearance of the salvation of Yahweh and of man's peace with God in obedience to his commandments (Dt 4:1, 40; 5:30; 6:18; 8:1; 11:8 sq.; 30:15-20; 32:46 sq.; Ps 37:9, etc.). It is indeed true that in many places in the Old Testament death is accepted unproblematically and in silent, unquestioning obedience, presupposing merely that one may be permitted to die 'in old age and when tired of life', contemplating the gift of posterity, and not having to experience the end of this life before one's time and violently. If one wants to do justice to the whole expression of the Old Testament and the New Testament, it must be said nevertheless (if we may formulate it in this way) that man cannot ultimately see death except as something that should not be, as something that does not belong to God's original idea of man and which therefore can originate only in the guilty separation of man from the God of life at the beginning of his history. Thus it happens that life and death take on a radically theological meaning, that death becomes the appearance and the judgement of sin, and that the history of salvation and damnation becomes clarified as the battle between life and death. It must always be remembered in this connection that man is such a unified being for scripture as a whole that

[1] Cf. for the Old Testament texts: H. Fries, Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe II (Munich 1962), pp. 25-27.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

scripture cannot limit the absolute claim to life, which constitutes the depth of his existence, to man's 'soul', as if the history of his life and death were merely the history of the relationship of an 'immortal' soul to God. There is always reference to the one, whole man who fulfils his ultimate living nature in corporeality. Hence the motto for the victory of the one life which he experiences bodily but also simultaneously as the personal history with the living God, is not the immortality of the soul but the resurrection of the body where, however, for this very reason the 'body' does not refer merely to the biological dimension of man but to the whole man in his mortal nature and the radical desire for life awakened in him [146] by the pneuma of God; in this resurrection, it is just as much a question of the 'soul' having to be saved out of the destroying separation-from-God of the 'underworld' (scheol) as it is of his corporeality being given back to him. This view of the eschatological saving good of life in the resurrection of the body is therefore a view of the total finality of the one, whole man who perfects himself in free dialogue with God; it is a view which comes through ever more clearly in the history of revelation (having started in the Isaiah-apocalypse [Is 25:8; 26:19 sqq.], it asserts itself in Dn 12:2; 2 M 7:9 sqq.; 12:43 sqq.; 14:46). It is perfectly true, however, that this view accompanied reflection on the fact that this bodily eschatological life must be accomplished by passing through the radical transformation of death, thus does not represent a return to an earthly bodily existence and hence can no longer be 'imagined' (1 Co 15). Wherever the history of the theological concept of human life in its wholeness has reached its climax, this life disappears, transforming itself radically and thus withdrawing into the unspeakable mystery of God. Yet the whole man hides himself into this mystery, 'body' and 'soul'. Precisely in this way man, as it were, returns to his initial experience of 'life'. The last is still the first. He has no longer any right not to take anything about himself seriously; he may not, for example, regard his human 'biosphere' as something merely provisional which he must simply leave behind or could possibly reject when the perfect state dawns. The final 'transformation' of history is the salvation of everything, even of matter, even of the bodily life, but it is of course a salvation into the mystery of God

On the one hand, man knows about God only by experiencing how God acts in him and thus knows of 'God in himself' because God in Himself gives Himself in self-communication by grace. On the other hand, man's experience of himself in the history of salvation offers him 'life' as the beginning and end of his self-experience, as the key-word (darkly and in metaphors, of course) for the whole of his own existence. This being so, it is understandable that he is right in saying of God: He is the living being. He is 'living', not merely because he is 'the fountain of life' for us, as we read in Ps 36:10, and because all living creatures owe their existence to the 'ruach' of God (Ps 104:30; Is 42:5): this must always be seen, even at this stage, to mean that it is not a question here of a mere retracing of our life to its ultimate cause but is also a question of the statement that our life remains continuously subject to the sovereign providence of God, of Him who is, who takes and who gives life (Rm [147] 4:17; 1 Tm 6:13; Jn 5:21; 6:57; Lk 12:20; 2 Co 1:9; Jm 4:14 sq.)[2] He is also not merely the Living Being in contrast to 'dead' idols, i.e. God who works of himself and is experienced as working in distinction from the idols which man creates for himself and in which he wants to experience himself as a 'creative ideologist'. God is living in himself, he is life. He is this, first of all, because the radical affirmation of life, such as man experiences it ever more clearly both as an individual (in the experience of the spirit) and collectively in the history of salvation and revelation, implies a basic indestructibility and absoluteness which, absolutely and quite apart from the dialectic counterpoint with death, can belong only to the eternal God who therefore is alone the absolutely Living One. He is χω~ν (Rm 9:26; Mt 16:16; 26:63; Ac

[2] Cf. for the New Testament texts: TWNT II (Stuttgart 1935) (English Translation: Theological Dictionary of the New Testament II [Michigan 1964] – Tr.)

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

14:5); he has life in himself as its source (Jn 5:26), lives eternally (Rv 4:9 sq.; 10:6; 15:7), he alone has α&θανασι/α of himself (1 Tm 6:16); life itself is so much the property of God as such that God is introduced on oath by his highest property, viz. life (Nb 14:28; Dt 32:40; Rm 14:11) and that even man swears by this highest possible good, viz. by God's life (Jg 8:19; Rt 3:13; 1 S 19:6; Jr 5:2); He has life originally and before his creation of the world and salvation (in him, the divine Logos, 'was' the life, says St John in his prologue 1:4) and hence he can give it to us by the fact that this Logos comes into the world and into the death-destined 'sarx' of our existence and thus this divine life itself appears to us as the 'light' (Jn 1:5), truth (Jn 1:14) and 'love' which he is himself (1 Jn 3:1; 4:7-21 sq.; 2 Co 13:11). This inner aliveness of God unfolds itself for us in α)λη&θεια and α)γα&πη, and these two sides of this life to which no further, equally original sides can be added on the basis of the New Testament, refer back to the mystery of the Trinity of the one God in which the Father (itself a concept in the meaning-range of life) who is life (Jn 5:26), generates a Son as Logos (Jn 1:1) to whom the Father communicates life (Jn 5:26), and from whom proceeds a Holy Spirit (1 Co 2:10 sq.) who knows the depths of God and who is the Spirit of Love (cf. Jn 6:63: πνευ~μα και∴ ζωη& as the one good of salvation in the words of Jesus to the believer).

Seen in this light, the Christological side of the New Testament concept of life also becomes intelligible. In Jesus Christ, God with his whole self-communication becomes historically tangible for us and is rendered [148] present in his irreversible victory. If, however, God is life itself in se and quoad nos, the 'life has appeared' in Christ (1 Jn 1:2); he is the Logos of life (1 Jn 1:1), the life-giving pneuma (1 Co 15:45), the α)ρξηγο_φ τη|=φ ζωη&φ (Ac 3:15).[3] When, therefore – in one of his emphatic, high-priestly I-am-expressions which are the parallels to the 'I-am(there)-who I-am(there)' of God (Ex 3:14 sqq.) – the Johannine Jesus wants to say who he is in himself and for us (both of which coincide), he can say simply: 'I am the Life', 'I am the resurrection and the life' (Jn 11:25; 14:6), just as his absolute 'I am He' (Jn 8:24, 28, 58; Mk 6:50; 13:6; Lk 21:8) can be clarified by 'Truth', 'Way', 'Bread of Life', 'Light of the World'.[4] Thus 'Life' in St John can really be seen as the comprehensive salvation-concept[5], containing everything brought by the Saviour of the world; thus St John speaks thirty-six times of life, of 'eternal life', and emphasises that this 'life' is granted even now to those who believe and love (Jn 3:36; 5:24; 6:53 sq.; 1 Jn 3:15; 5:13; Ep 2:5), even though it is still hidden with Christ in God (Col 3:3). This Christ is not merely life for us; he has himself participated in our history which goes through death into life, so that the statement regarding the resurrected Christ: 'he lives', is the very centre of the Christian proclamation (Mk 16:11; Lk 24:5; Ac 1:3. Rm 6:10; 14:9; 2 Co 13:4).

III

Let us look back once more and in the process translate what we have said into a language which is perhaps more directly the language of today and which draws our contemporary understanding of the world even more clearly into the understanding of what has been said. The contemporary world-picture is characterised by a pre-decision for unity and development; it sees matter, life and spirit as held together in one single history of evolution. Such a concept is not necessarily false as long as it remains discreet and realistic and does not

[3] TWNT II, 866
[4] Cf. on this TWNT II, 866, 871; LTK VI, 855/856.
[5] Cf. especially F. Mussner, ZΩH. Die Anschauung vom 'Leben' im 4. Evangelium unter Berücksichtigung der Johannes-Briefe (Munich 1952). Further bibliography above all in LTK VI, 856. Cf. also H. Schlier, Besinnung auf das Neue Testament (Freiburg 1964), pp. 260 sqq., 278, etc.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

play down essential differences within this unity. Actually, the idea of evolution does not exclude but includes an [149] essential self-transcendence[6] continually going on within it, since otherwise nothing would ever really become new. This self-transcendence has been conserved in some sense even within dialectical materialism under the idea of the 'qualitative leap'. The Christian philosopher and the Christian theologian will always conceive this self-transcendence, by which a being surpasses and 'elevates' itself into something essentially higher, as happening under the dynamism of the divine being and under the continuous divine creative power. Under this presupposition, however, evolution and essential self-transcendence (seen as the manner of the former) is an absolutely possible way of conceiving matter, life and spirit as one connected reality and history and even to regard the divine self-communication to the rational creature by the grace of God's pneuma as the highest, freely given unsurpassable step and phase of this one evolution. In such a pre-decided world-picture, that concept will be most easily suitable for understanding the content of the one evolving history which (a) expresses the reality in which it is given to us most immediately within this whole unity, and which (b) always makes what precedes and what follows this reality still comprehensible by means of this one history. Such a reality is 'life', as we experience it in our own human life. Starting from this life, which is most close to us, is the most likely way of rendering matter and sub-human life intelligible, and this concept is also, as shown by the Bible, the creed and dogmatic theology, suited for expressing the ultimate good of salvation, the perfection of man in God himself. It now becomes clear also that the concept of life actually enables us to have a continuous even though, of course, also gradual and analogous understanding of this one history of created reality.

We should look at life as a form first of all from the point of view of an inner unity and in a heterogeneous (i.e. physico-chemical and spatio-temporal) manifoldness which is not simply co-ordinated but hierarchically subordinated. Add to this the fact that this form has an 'interiority' which governs and preserves, as from a central point, the self-construction, self-preservation and relation to the environment, which at the same time separates and opens itself for the rest of the surroundings in a final and [150] spontaneous relationship, and which conserves itself, incorporates, causes itself to appear in the whole and in all the parts, has the source and end of self-movement within itself and has a living-space and inner time-form all its own. Looking at life in this way, we will get a description of (to begin with, biological) life (without going into the distinction between animals and plants) which can be used as a model for understanding both higher and lower reality: i.e. the one whole being and history of experienced reality.

To begin with then, we can understand inorganic matter as the first elementary step, as a collection of instruments, as a kind of vocabulary of biological life, as a boundary condition and value, and at the same time as a 'deposit' for life. 'Dead' matter is then the asymptotic zero-condition of life in which the interiority and openness-to-the-other of life approaches equally to the lower boundary-value; the individual material thing is apparently quite open to the totality of material reality, since it is a pure function of the whole and is completely tied up in the causal chains external to it. Yet precisely in this way it has no true openness for the whole or reality; it exists merely as a moment of this reality itself since it has not (yet) that interiority and that concentration in itself (at least as 'form') vis-à-vis the whole (at least of an environment) which characterises the living; it is lost in the other and hence in this absolute self-alienation it is also incapable of experiencing the other as such; it is not truly 'open'

[6] On this concept, cf. more closely and in detail the next chapter in this volume which tries to provide a speculative basis for these theses expressed here. Cf. also P. Overhage-K. Rahner, Das Problem der Hominisation (Freiburg ^{2}1963) (English translation of part of this work: K. Rahner, Hominisation: The Evolutionary Origin of Man as a Theological Problem, Quaestiones Disputatae [Freiburg & London 1965] – Tr.)

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

since it is not interior to itself. It has already, nevertheless, at least the passive possibility for such an interiority and openness, a possibility which grows in the same measure as it can be built up into heterogeneous systems which, if the 'miracle' of self-transcendence towards self-possession and self-assertion should happen to them, signify precisely the interiorised form of the organic. Put in a different way, one could say and in this hit on the interconnection and distinction of the inorganic and the living in one blow: when the heterogeneous material system, built with a view to a unified, prescribed effort (at least of self-preservation) appropriates its orientation as such to itself, i.e. interiorises itself then we have something living.

Starting from the concept of life, it is quite possible to understand the spirit and person as the radicalisation and self-surpassing of life. The environment becomes simply the world, interiority becomes existence as a subject, assimilation of the environment by assimilation of nourishment becomes appropriation of culture and the machine, all through harmonisation [151] of the environment beyond the properly biological sphere; interiority of consciousness becomes self-consciousness; finite openness to the environment becomes infinite transcendence towards being as such. It must be remembered in all this that we know of no personal subjectivity in our experience which is not in itself biologically alive and which does not presuppose itself as its own condition; it must be remembered that the fact of having to allow itself to be encountered which belongs to the 'other' of the world, which is essential for commencing finite subjectivity, is precisely the nature of the biological, of the sensibility of the spirit per definitionem. It must be noted that this is not contradicted by the Christian doctrine of the angels, since even they can be perfectly well conceived as mundane and cosmic beings, so that materiality and biosphere are merely different words for the sphere of the necessarily receptive spirituality and for inter-subjectivity.

Seen in this light, the unity of nature of the finite, even though also transcendentally and infinitely open spirit and of matter is once more confirmed. Biological life and spiritual life have something in common in that they both constitute the unity of the one human life which is biological and sensible so as to be capable of being spiritual; even if the biological existed for itself alone, it would therefore remain valid that the openness towards the 'other' grows in the same measure as, and not in inverse proportion to the degree of self-possession and self-direction arising out of an inner unity. Where the openness of such life becomes unbounded and there thus appears the inner unity in the form of self-disposition, proper subjectivity and freedom, there is the real life of the spiritual person. Even this is always still 'life' in the genuine 'biological' sense, a life which man has not simply 'in addition' side by side with his life as a spiritual person but rather as the inner, necessary moment of the life of the spiritual person itself. Hence his spiritual life in his transcendence towards meaning in general, towards the world as such and its secret ground (God), is still always supported by corporeality, by environment, by spatio-temporal encounter, by sense experience, by witness, bodily intercommunication, and sociability. In short, it is true that the spirituality of man is and remains life in the very hard and sober everyday sense, and conversely, that his life is always and everywhere opened towards the breadth of the spirit. In him it is impossible to live the biological life itself without the personal life, nature without culture, and natural history without the history of the spirit. Since, however, this inner unity of life is given in the [152] form of bios and of spirit in that biological life constructs itself in a directly recognisable way into an ever greater and more complex interiority and into an ever wider environment (and both at once), it can be said without hesitation – presupposing any essential self-transcendence to take place under the divine dynamism – that life, transcending itself unfolds itself in the history of nature into spiritual life itself.

According to Christian teaching, this one life finds its highest summit in the self-communication of God. God is not only the ground and innermost dynamism of this one

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

history of nature and the spirit. He is also its goal, not merely as the asymptotic final point towards which this whole movement is orientated but also in the sense that he gives himself in his most personal, absolute reality and infinite fullness of life, to the life of man as its innermost power (called grace) and as its innermost goal which communicates itself in its own proper reality. This is a sovereignly free, unowed self-communication but is as such the final fulfilment of life, because that towards which life is opened now becomes also its innermost ground and most interior possession, since the world of life becomes the life of life itself: vita aeterna. Even here, this life of man does not leave behind or reject the corporeality of the one being of man as if it were something non-essential. Whether one's biological side can still be called 'biological' when man is perfected in God is ultimately an indifferent question. The whole man (and hence also his spirit) will be changed. The whole man (and hence also his corporeality) will be saved. That we cannot imagine the preserved salvation of the bodily man is not surprising: the whole glorified man is withdrawn from us in the absolute mystery of God.

The self-communication of God, however, together with the divine Trinity given with it and with the historical appearance of this self-communication in Jesus Christ, constitute the whole of what Christianity professes and hopes for, and towards which the Christian lives. Because and in so far as the possession of this divine self-communication can be understood as the highest, most absolute stage of life, Christianity can be understood quite correctly as the teaching about life as such, as the profession of God, the Living and of eternal life. For this reason, we always conclude the Credo with the words: et vitam aeternam. Amen.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[153]

12

THE UNITY OF SPIRIT AND MATTER IN THE CHRISTIAN UNDERSTANDING OF FAITH

The subject of the following reflections is: the unity of spirit and matter in the Christian understanding of faith. We say 'in the Christian understanding of faith' so as to emphasise from the very start that this is neither a controversial theological subject disputed among the Christian denominations, nor a properly philosophical investigation and far less still a political controversy. This is true even though it will be shown that it is necessary to think also along theological lines and to employ philosophical concepts if one wants to make it clear what one really believes and what not. Of course, the posing of the question is co-determined by the fact that there is today a world-wide materialism which disputes the foundation of the Christian faith. Christianity must think its positions through anew in the face of such an opponent, an opponent who must not be underrated in so far as the precision of his philosophical argumentation is concerned, an opponent who at least apparently can call up even in us Christians of today an experience of the absence of God, of the necessity and at the same time rational transparency of the evolution of the material world even when taken as the basis of consciousness and of human society. In the face of such an opponent, Christianity has no reason and no right to act as if every question raised by today's materialism has already been completely worked out and answered simply because there has always been materialism. The present reflections are intended to be a very modest contribution to this debate. As has been said, they are based on the conviction that we Christians have an absolute duty and right to face up to certain basic attitudes of the man of today, and quite simply to assimilate them, and that, as long as we do this properly, we become better Christians with a more Christian faith. The ultimate reason for this is that the basic [154] structure of the contemporary understanding of the world is not at all as unchristian as its overhasty and illogical interpretation of itself in materialism, but that in the ultimate analysis it has grown out of Christian roots. It is, of course, quite unavoidable in such an attempt that certain things which are said will appear to the decided Christian as a false or dangerous or superfluous concession to the opponent, and that to such a Christian the simple, solid and bitter contradiction of materialism appears as the only proper attitude that has any hope of success. Such a person should reflect as to whether, even in the judgement of those who believe in God's providence in the history of mankind and in the light of the Logos who enlightens all men, such a world-wide materialistic outlook so widespread in the West as well as in the East can contain only error and guilt. Christianity and its theology must certainly be on their guard against making lazy compromises with false philosophical systems and with the spirit of the age in which also the powers of evil and sinful darkness are always at work. A real theology must not, nevertheless, refuse to learn anew and must not think that it itself in its existing form does not bring with it clouded and one-sided elements, elements which originated in the unchristian spirit of earlier centuries and which have not become Christian simply because we have become accustomed to them and so do not clearly experience their contradiction to basic Christian positions. This short contribution cannot, of course, enter directly into the further question of God's existence and its philosophical knowability. It is simply intended to give an outline, in the first part, of the immediate data of the Christian proclamation which presents us with a unity of spirit and matter. In the second part, then, we will try to communicate a few theological reflections which, arising out of the immediate data of faith, pointed out in the first part, attempt to clarify the meaning and scope of this unity of spirit

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation and matter.

I

The Christian faith recognises a unity of spirit and matter by their very origin, in their history and in their final end.

1. The Christian faith recognises a unity of spirit and matter on the basis of their origin in so far as it professes that this origin is one and the same for both, viz. the infinite, absolute and one reality of Him whom we call God. In making this assertion, we must first of all be quite clear [155] in our minds that when we speak about God, we do not mean something which is already known to us before our experience of the material world and of the spirit; God is not a reality which is already open to us in its existence and nature even independently of the spirit and of matter as if because we already know God, we would also say of him (almost as an afterthought) that he has also created the material world and that reality which we call spirit: it being quite indifferent, to begin with, how we determine its relationship to what we call the material world and it being also indifferent as to what exactly we mean when we speak of matter and the material world. We mean by God rather that absolute mystery which, whether we want to or not, we always associate at least implicitly in our spiritual encounter or the world with the presupposition and ground of objects and subjects. In the assertion of the Christian faith expressed above, God therefore stands as the ground and all-embracing, pre-given unity of the experience of the spirit and the material world in their unity. It is therefore precisely asserted in this proposition that we do not merely postulate God as the creative cause of two completely separate realities but that, because we have already discovered an original reference of both realities to each other as something given in our experience, we call him one and the same cause of matter and spirit. Without such an ultimate affinity of spirit and matter in the unity of a real and meaningful, even though analogous concept of being, and without the experience of the unity of spirit and matter in the very act of human knowledge, man could not come to recognise that these seemingly so opposed and disparate realities have their one origin and source in the one God and that both are upheld by the permanent actual power of that infinite and necessary being whom we call God. As the history of philosophy and of the attack on the Christian dogma of creation shows, this affirmation about God, the Creator of matter and spirit, is not absolutely self-evident, no matter how originally it is not only a dogma of faith but also a basic proposition of human existence as such. Again and again, matter has been experienced as something dark, anti-divine, obscure or chaotic; again and again, it has been seen as something which stands in contradiction and bitter combat against the spirit understood as the true image and representative of God in the world, a combat which constitutes the history of nature and of the world. Again and again, Christianity has protested against these conceptions as incorrect and hasty interpretations of human experience and, even though not everything in this falsely interpreted [156] human experience was wrong, has condemned them as error and heresy. Matter itself together with everything meant and implied by it, has its origin in the same ultimate ground from which arises the created spirit. Matter itself even in its finiteness, temporality and spatio-temporal differentiation and in its history and its distinction (even though not contradiction to) the spirit arises out of God's creative act itself. This act reaches directly to matter itself so that it is equally directly present to God and is not really a kind of more distant, secondary product of an evolution in which merely the becoming of the spirit itself is thought to have been inaugurated by God. Matter is good; it expresses its origin in its own way and, if the gnostic error is to be rejected that there is a tragic inner contradiction within God himself it cannot therefore ultimately be the opponent to the spirit. If it is frequently added to this statement of faith about God, the Creator of spirit and matter, that God the Creator of 'heaven and earth' is himself spirit, then this statement, which of course bears a correct sense, must be understood carefully. God, in the Christian metaphysical understanding, is not a part of this world but rather is its all-embracing ground directly bearing all its differentiated realities; He is not simply the unity of all realities brought about by the parts of the world, but the previous ground of the possibility of this unity, the ground which therefore also exists before this duality of subjectivity and objectivity which we call spirit and matter. God's 'spirituality' is therefore from the very start of a qualitatively different kind from that to be found within the world; the latter is what is different from matter, that which presupposes but does not create materiality, whereas the former is the ground of spirit and matter in the world, the ground which has an equally immediate relationship to both. This ground is called 'spirit' only because the 'spirituality' experienced by us rightly appears as the higher reality within the world. This intramundane spirituality already includes the transcendental and conscious relation to that ultimate ground which bears all being in its own and which we call God. The 'spirit' therefore (by this intentional infinity) does not positively include in its nature the negativity of the simply, absolutely and in every respect, finite and hence can be more readily used to characterise God than the materiality of the individual, and in every respect finite, thing. To what extent, apart from this, materiality – even as such – can also be used for an analogous understanding of God, even though naturally not in exactly the same way as the spirituality of the transcendental subject, can only be ultimately [157] explained more exactly once we have clarified the precise relationship of created, worldly spirituality to matter. If this were to or does result in the conclusion that created spirituality is quite unthinkable without reference to materiality as a condition of its possibility – even though this relationship must be conceived differently for different kinds of spirituality – then it would or will become very clear that (and why) the characterisation of God as a spirit is to be understood only very analogously and can really only be made by always taking one's starting-point for knowledge of God as a spirit simultaneously per viam negationis et eminentiae also from matter. This is, however, something we cannot yet speak about. At any rate, the Christian dogma of the creation of 'good' matter and of spirit and the rejection of any kind of dualism and gnosticism which see matter as something a-divine or anti-divine and anti-spiritual, means also the affirmation of an innermost and ultimate unity and relationship of spirit and matter. As to how more precisely this relationship and unity between spirit and matter are to be conceived, the Christian dogma of creation – purely in itself – does not say very much but the subject does nevertheless represent a decisive challenge to thought about how, even in their history and their goal, these realities belong together.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

2. Spirit and matter have a unity in their history. Regarding this fact, it is not possible here to give more than a few hints. These indications, however, show that the basic Christian conception of the non-divine reality rejects any ultimate, radical dualism of spirit and matter. Indeed, if one wanted to conceive the material world in its physical and biological sphere as a kind of neutral stage on which is enacted the history of spiritual persons, of their culture, salvation and damnation and the process of their eternal perfectioning, one cannot even do justice to the Christian understanding of faith; the conception referred to here means that this 'stage' itself would remain untouched by these spiritual events or that the history of nature itself would be merely accidentally and in addition, as it were, the scene of such a history of the spirit. Such a conception, obviously, will always try to break through again on account of the pluralism of human experience. Naturally, it will always seem to man time and time again as if the process of nature is uninterested in man and his history and as if man is a stranger within a natural history, a stranger who plays a very brief role in this history in order to retreat as quickly as possible out of this world into the realm of the pure spirit, of the beyond

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and of God, while the history of nature, untouched by all [158] this, continues its iron march. Of course, the basic Christian assessment regarding the unity of the history of matter and spirit has not yet been thought through in all its aspects, either with regard to the inclusion of the history of nature in that of the spirit or conversely with regard to the cosmic conditioning and significance of the history of the spirit for the history of nature. The fact that a lot remains still to be done in this respect is not really surprising: man's reflection cannot really run ahead of actual history in its real concreteness.

Nevertheless, the ultimate basic assessment of a true unity of spirit and matter in their history is given quite clearly as a fact of experience. We do not intend, to begin with, to develop it speculatively with a view to presuppositions and consequences which are not, or at least are not yet clearly present, in the explicit consciousness of faith of Christianity; we simply mean to point out here a few indications for this unity of history of spirit and matter which are inevitably tangible in Christian dogma.

In so far as this is possible even within the establishment of these explicit statements of faith, we must first of all remove a difficulty, a difficulty which repeatedly tries to force its way through against a clear and consequential conception of this unity. The Christian faith speaks of the existence of angels; these are characterised in a platonic formula as 'pure spirits'. From both these facts there then arises the impression in the average, ordinary understanding of faith (which must not be simply identified with the dogma) that there is a created kingdom of finite spirits which carries on its own history quite independently from the material world and its history; and that this shows that spirit and matter are only very partially connected with one another even within the realm of created reality. On this basis, it is then almost inevitable, psychologically speaking, that one ends up with the conception of the world as the merely accidental and ultimately superfluous scene of an itself again also matter-less history. It is here unfortunately impossible to say anything sufficiently adequate either about the dogma or the theology of the angels. It is even more impossible here to attempt to show that the dogma of the angels has nothing to do with the almost fairy-tale, mythological and – for contemporary man – unimaginable conception of the angels current among ordinary people. Here it can merely be a question of showing briefly, first of all, that the Christian doctrine of angels contains quite sufficient elements which permit and indeed urge the inclusion of the angels and their history in the history of the cosmos. Theologically [159] speaking, it is an absolutely controverted and open question as to whether or not the creation of the world coincided in time with the creation of the angels. If one justifiably allows the creation of the spiritual world of the angels to coincide with that of the material cosmos (of course, always in the sense in which the positing of the temporal world by a non-temporal cause can be conceived to take place at a 'point in time'), then the space of time of spiritual and material history is the same at least from this point of view. Furthermore, the theological data (into which we need not enter here in detail) show that the history even of the angels and the history of the world are at least interlaced in many respects. The common goal of both is the eternal kingdom of God; the granting of grace to men as citizens of the material world and to the angels is the same; in the Christian teaching the angels, whether they are to be thought of as good or bad, certainly exercise functions in this world; in particular, since they reach down to or into the material world, these functions must ultimately be based in the nature of the angels; the angels can be understood quite correctly, even according to scripture, as cosmic (even though personal) powers of the order of nature and of its history; Christian theology has always seen the object of the personal decision of personal spiritual powers, called angels, to lie in Christ and in his salvific function for the history of mankind and hence of the material world. If one looks at these data, it will be quite legitimate to be of the opinion that, first of all, the doctrine of the angels understood as 'pure spirits', no matter how materially correct, unjustifiably lends too much support to a platonic

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and non-Christian removal of the created spirit from this world. Furthermore, it will have to be said that the angels, in spite of their differences from man, can be conceived in such a way that, in their own way and of their own most proper and original nature, they are powers of the one and hence also material world to whose material nature they are genuinely and essentially related. It may rightly be said, at any rate, that the Christian teaching about the angels does not basically bar the way to a decided and consequential conception of the unity of spirit and matter in their common history. Since ultimately we really know very little that is certain about the angels and demons, we have the perfect right after what has been said to look at the unity of spirit and matter as we experience it directly in the history of man and also as interpreted in a way compatible with revelation, and to look at this unity as paradigmatic in principle for the unity of spirit and matter in the created sphere as such.

[160] Seen in this way, a basic unity of the history of spirit and matter is no problem for Christian theology. Man in the Old Testament writings is very undualistically and unplatonically a unity in his being and history, and the world is seen from the very beginning as an environment intended for man. Man comes quite unashamedly from the earth and is therefore seen even in scripture, without detriment to the fact that he is also known to be the spiritual, responsible partner of God, called directly by God, as (to express it in a more modern idiom) the product of the material cosmos, without scripture thereby allowing this one man in the paradoxical duality of his origin to break up into two quite independent realities called spirit and matter. Consequently, for the Old Testament writings in particular, the whole man is made to suffer by death; the earthly spatio-temporal life is the life of the personal spirit for whom no other life, either before or after this life of material spatio-temporality, is available for the shaping of his freely achieved finality; and the fulfilment, to which man looks hopefully, is not a liberation of the spirit into an existence removed from matter but is The ‘resurrection of the flesh’, i.e. a fulfilment of human existence in which, even though in an unimaginable manner, the one whole man composed of spirit and matter reaches his perfection. Consequently, the whole turning away from God at the beginning of the history of mankind took place within the material of the world and the autonomous mastery over intramundane goods, and not in a corruption of an a-cosmic relationship of man to God. Consequently, the Christian commandments are never concerned with a merely interior ethics of intentions but contain concrete material demands which always are also aimed at the mastering of tasks of the one, bodily and hence also socially-bound man. Accordingly, what we call Christian redemption is achieved in the acceptance and patient bearing of what is also a biological happening in death. Accordingly, the climax of salvation history is not the detachment from the world of man as a spirit in order to come to God, but the descending and irreversible entrance of God into the world, the coming of the divine Logos in the flesh, the taking on of the material so that it itself becomes a permanent reality of God in which God in his Logos expresses himself to us for ever. Accordingly, the salvation history of the individual, however much it means a unique personal decision in every case, always rests in the Christian sense on the will of God for a united humanity, for the covenant, for the social communication and tangibility of salvation both in the spatio-temporal history of the Church [161] and in tangible sacraments and social institutions. Always and everywhere, man is regarded by Christianity, precisely in the history of his relationship to God, as a bodily, material and social being who can always only have this relationship to God in this the material constitution of his existence. By the very fact that he is always the theo-logical and theo-nomous being only by being the cosmic being, it is already implied that his history – understood as the history of a direct relationship to God, the origin of all reality, and as the history of a material being, i.e. of a being which cannot be thought of other than as a factor in the cosmos (even though it signifies a personality and hence the unique totality of this world itself in each individual) – is always also the history of the material world itself and vice versa. The unity of spirit and matter – since each in their own way have a history – is itself a historical reality; it develops, it reaches its decisive stage in man and achieves itself in the fulfilment of man. Spirit and matter have a unity in their history which grows and furthermore (as will have to be explained more in detail in a moment) both historical processes reach their completion in one point.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

3. In consequence of what we have seen, the Christian message also knows of a unity of matter and spirit in its achievement and goal. To begin with, the Christian faith knows nothing about the fact that what we call matter and experience as such belongs to a merely provisional period of the history of the created spirit and freedom, a period which must in the end be definitely surpassed. Matter for the Christian mind is not a watchword for a limited period but a factor in perfection itself. In the main, it is perhaps a merely platonic and not very Christian prejudice that finds it easier in the case of the limited created spirit than in that of matter to conceive of a state of perfection in which history in its spatio-temporal extension into finality is left behind. This perfection for the world as a whole is also not the final point which can be planned and achieved from the side of the world itself, a final point which would he a factor in history itself; rather it is the stopping of this history, foreseen in faith and hope, by God's deed itself by whose power the world surpasses itself and thus enters into its goal. Yet precisely this means that this fulfilment cannot be concretely imagined either for the material world or for the spirit but must for this very reason be simply thought of as the fulfilment of that world which we experience concretely, the world in its unity constituted of matter and spirit in one united – which does not [162] mean 'uniform' – history. Hence Christian eschatology does not know merely, or even first and foremost, the atomised salvation of each individual for himself in the beatitude of his own soul, but rather the kingdom of God, the eternal covenant, the triumphing Church, the new heaven and the new earth. No matter how many figurative elements all these expressions may contain, however much all these propositions of faith must be understood in their merely analogous meaning, they always contain the basic conviction that the material world in its history and the history of the personal spirit in man find their goal in one and the same point and that, because they are borne along by this dynamism to the one goal, they constitute a genuine unity with one another.

II

The facts which we have so far simply collected together from the theology of the faith must now be thought through in the second part of our reflections so as to reach a conclusive and basic understanding of the unity of spirit and matter. Of course, such a philosophising systematisation of these data of faith and the dogma itself are not one and the same thing. The systematisation works necessarily with extrapolations and various auxiliary suppositions which, not even for the believer, are covered by the dogmatic teaching. It is sufficient for such a systematisation if, after having been judiciously unified, it does not come into contradiction with itself or with the actual doctrine of faith.

1. Regarding the difference of spirit and matter. Up till now we have spoken a great deal about the unity of spirit and matter. In all we have said, unity has never meant uniformity, but has simply envisaged the fact that in the realm of the one and yet pluralistic reality of the world, in so far as it is distinct from God its absolutely one ground, what we call spirit and what we call matter are at least in the actual order of reality irreversibly related to one another and that together, in spite of their differences, they constitute the one reality of the world, and that they do not exist merely one beside the other as if enclosed merely by an empty space. Before we try to consider this unity of spirit and matter more systematically and in detail, we must first of all refer explicitly to the difference of spirit and matter. The Church's magisterium emphasises in the general doctrine of creation, in the doctrine of man in general and in view of the question of hominisation, that spirit and matter are not [163] the same, that the spirit is not simply the secondary product of matter as such, something which can be derived from it; it emphasises that man, because he is a spirit, takes up a metaphysically irreducible position in the cosmos and that therefore his origin in his spirituality cannot be simply out of matter as such, but that as a spiritual person, i.e. in view of his 'soul', he is directly referred to God as to his source. The Church's magisterium does not really define the concepts of spirit and matter employed in such statements, but rather presupposes them as known. Even this fact gives rise to tasks of a basic kind for a systematic reflection on the difference and unity of spirit and matter. If these statements are to be understood properly, it will be necessary to know what spirit and matter really signify. Only then can one understand the statement that spirit and matter are not the same; only then can one understand the statement correctly, i.e. without falling into an absolute dualism which would no longer be capable of understanding spirit and matter as a unity in origin, history and goal. Even though it requires a further interpreting reflex articulation, what is meant by spirit is an a priori datum of human knowledge; it is only from this a priori datum that we can determine metaphysically what is really meant by 'material' and 'matter'. It would be an unmetaphysical and, in the bad sense, materialistic prejudice to think that man is occupied first of all with matter, that he knows exactly what it is and must then subsequently, laboriously and most problematically discover 'spirit', and hence that he can never quite know whether what is meant by this cannot be reduced ultimately again to matter, with which he deals primarily and with full questionless knowledge. In reality, the primary thing with which man deals is himself understood as the one who deals with something other than himself, viz. the world, both in knowledge and in action; in other words, man in a unity and distinction from the knowing subject and encountering object, where the unity, distinction and inexchangeability of these elements are equally original. When a materialist says that there is only matter, he has merely to be asked what exactly lie understands by this matter which he maintains is the only reality, in order to recognise that within a materialistic system, in which that which originally and alone gives being and norm lies outside the unity of subject and object, the first and last statement of such a system has no definable meaning at all. Truly scientific expressions are always limited to stating merely functional connections between different factors: if there is A, then B takes place. If everything is matter, then it [164] becomes scientifically inexpressible and indeterminable what this 'everything' is, i.e. what matter is. By definition there cannot be anything by which this 'everything' in its intended sense could be determined as a function of something else. The attempts to define matter as everything could only end up in declaring the pure formalism of the network of functional declarations as the 'essence' of this 'everything', which would be a most idealistic interpretation of the nature of matter. It would at least throw up the question as to whether this nature is simply the a priori structure of the knowledge of the knowing subject and thus has nothing whatsoever to do with 'reality in itself'. Or, the nature of this matter might be said to consist in the purely empirical data of experience as such, data which are said to be ordered by these mathematicised functional relationships without being completely reducible to them. This, however, would be even less of a statement about the matter, since these purely a posteriori and empirical data are precisely as such different from one another, as such do not represent anything 'unified', and hence of themselves do not permit any statement about matter itself, much less permit the thesis that there can only be exactly the same matter as what we have experienced until now. The proposition, therefore, that everything is matter has no positive meaning in the mouth of a purely scientific materialist, since within his system and with his method, it is basically impossible for him to say what he understands by matter.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Hence, if the statement that there is only matter is to have any meaning at all, it could only refer to the pure postulate and heuristic principle that an absolute and completely irreducible plurality of absolutely and, in every respect, disparate realities which cannot be reduced to any common denominator but which at the same time are said to be objects of the one possible knowledge of one and the same man, is from the very outset a logically and objectively impossible conception and metaphysical non-sense. This principle is perfectly correct. If, however, it is formulated in the way just indicated, then 'matter' is objectively identical with the concept of 'being'. It would be possible in itself to adopt such an identification without thereby asserting anything absolutely false, since this principle states nothing further than that there is only being, and that at least a few statements can be validly made in common and for every being about absolutely everything that can be thought. One could even try positively to recommend this initial terminological definition by pointing out that even for a Christian philosophy, in distinction to platonic and idealistic [165] philosophy, what can be expressed by sense experience, and in this sense the material, is what man encounters first in his knowledge, that which he rightly regards, therefore, as the starting-point of his knowledge and as the model of the possible objects of his knowledge. It would nevertheless have to be said against this recommendation that it must first of all confine itself clearly to the postulating and heuristic principle, and that there remains perfectly reconcilable with this principle the possibility of differences within this one 'matter' by which the individual realities within the one 'matter' are differentiated from each other in such a way that they cannot really be reduced to each other; this, of course, still leaves open the question as to whether the unity of these irreducible, essentially distinct realities is a unity in principle or in fact, however this is to be conceived, a merely logical unity. Secondly, one would have to oppose to this recommendation of the principle in question the fact that what is really given first of all in human experience is not the material in and for itself but the unity of relation of one questing subject, within a boundless horizon of questioning, with a self-manifesting, sensible, a posteriori object which is contained within the transcendental horizon but is not deducible from it. This original reality of experience, therefore, is the unity itself. It does indeed already betray and affirm the inner reference, relationship and unity with the subject and object in spite of and indeed within their very difference, and hence gives us also the right to bring the subject and the object under one common concept and word. This original reality in its unity does not, however, permit us – after the manner of a pan-psychism or of a dialectical materialism or of a consequential psychophysical parallelism – to postulate such a unity of relation of a subject-object kind for everything itself individual which is met within this unity, since this would obviously initiate a meaningless regress to infinity or would cancel out again the difference of subject and object to be found in this unity. From the point of view of the first assessment, especially in view of the historically loaded nature of words like 'matter', etc., it is not advisable to subsume the subjectivity which is met with in this unity under the word 'matter', since the equally originally discovered difference in this unity between the subject in its unbounded transcendence and the merely encountered object would at least be obscured. The refusal to use this terminology is, therefore, not a pre-decision in favour of a platonic conception of the spirit as something simply opposed to matter or something completely alien to it. It is also far from being a pre-judgement [166] about whether in the 'world', i.e. within the space of possible experiential individual objects, there can be objects which can be absolutely and in every respect exempt from all the 'material' laws which we discover in our empirically experienced reality of a material kind, or whether this is unthinkable. Even if we postulate a consequential and necessary correlation between spirit and matter within the space of the world, this does not yet make us materialists in the sense of an interpretation rejected by Christianity. We have already said that God, the cause of every reality divided into the distinction of subject and object, i.e. of spirit and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

matter, transcends this intramundane distinction of spirit and matter. We have also pointed out already that the Christian doctrine of the angels does not permit us to conclude necessarily that there are created spiritual realities which have absolutely nothing to do with matter. The exact nature of matter, therefore, is not at all as immediately evident as it might seem at first sight. The spirit, however, is already posited with the question about it and is already experienced in its nature; its meaning can be deduced from the question itself by a transcendental deduction. What matter is in general and on the whole, is not a question for natural science as such but a question of ontology on the basis of an existential metaphysics; such an ontology can answer this question because it already knows what spirit is and thus on the basis of this metaphysical experience of the spirit can state what the material as such is, viz. that which is closed in its individuality to the experience of the transcendence of being as such. On this basis also, it must then be made clear that 'spirit' cannot basically be deduced from any combination of the material, however it might be conceived, i.e. from something cut off from itself and its reference to being as a whole, and that therefore there exists an essential difference in this sense between spirit and matter.

2. The unity of spirit and matter. We have seen that it follows from the origin of human knowledge that spirit is a proper, original reality which cannot be derived from anything else and can be understood and approached only in its own proper experience, and from which alone it can be said what matter in itself really is. We have also seen that for an existential ontology and metaphysical anthropology it is consequently quite clear from the very start that the very question about a possible deduction of the spirit from matter has no meaning, since one would he trying to deduce what is logically and ontologically prior from what is posterior in both these senses and would be of the opinion that what is [167] anterior for the temporal series must by this very fact also be the onto-logical ground of what is later and sparser in the spatio-temporal order. All this, however, does not yet exhaust the question about the relationship of spirit and matter. This relationship must be determined not only negatively but also positively. Now, when treating of the question of the essential distinction between spirit and matter, we have already hinted that such a distinction cannot be conceived nor may even be merely legitimately conceived theologically as simply an absolute metaphysical separation of the two realities. If spirit and matter are said to be found in mutual correlation in one and the same original experience, then they cannot be absolutely separate from one another. This is so not only because they can be apprehended only by being brought together under definite formal principles by this one apprehension, but also because apprehension – properly understood – is not merely the ideal cognisance taken by a knower of an object which stands over against this process of apprehension in a completely external and unconcerned manner; it rather presupposes the real communication between reality and the capacity to apprehend for the possibility of apprehension or is in actual fact, at least in the original form of apprehension, i.e. of knowledge not mediated by any other, such a communication and such a real process of events: the object communicates itself in a real, ontological process and builds itself really and ontologically into knowledge. If this is to be possible, however, then there must be an inner relationship between the knower and the known, even when the known is something 'material'. This reflection is also in no way weakened by saying that something material is not grasped by the spirit but primarily by man's sense perception. If sense perception is to be recognised as a material and yet conscious reality, then this already admits in principle what is at stake here. Moreover, sense perception is to be understood merely as the condition for the possibility of spiritual knowledge which the latter creates for itself by distinguishing it from itself, and thus asserts once more the 'relationship' between spirit and matter. The classical theological and philosophical tradition of Christianity has in fact always recognised this relationship and mutual correlation of spirit and matter and has always (often under heavy struggles of thought) repeated it again and again. In the Christian conception,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

matter is retraced in its whole nature and being to the creative act of God who is called Spirit. The emphasising of the creation of matter also implies of course that the reality of matter does not simply, as in a [168] pantheistic view, flow from the being of God (which, however, is equally denied of the created spirit) and cannot be simply interpreted as an expression or as a part of the reality of God. Nevertheless, the origin and what develops out of it, even taken as something created, cannot be simply and completely separate and dissimilar. This is all the less so since this materiality is created by God from the very start for the sake of and in view of the spirit and thus, even from the point of view of finality, matter cannot rest incommensurable beside the spirit. Christian philosophy and theology rightly dispute that God 'could' create a material world on its own, since this would be quite meaningless. They must then, however, recognise the really 'meaningless' as the ontologically impossible, since the distinction between a physical and a merely moral impossibility is a stupid anthropomorphism when applied to God. Thus matter and the material are thinkable for a Christian theistic philosophy and theology only as a factor connected with and directed towards the (finite) spirit. Hence it will not be permissible to say that Christians are merely interested in bringing out the difference between spirit and matter and that they have overlooked the inner ontological essential relationship and the relation of mutual conditioning. What we call material has always been seen, at least in thomistic philosophy, as a limited and in a sense 'frozen' spirit, as limited being whose being as such, i.e. prescinding from the real negativity and limitation of this being (commonly called materia prima, which of itself does not signify any positive reality), is exactly the same being which outside such a limitation means being-conscious-of-itself, knowledge, freedom and transcendence towards God. This limitation in material being, of course, its not-becoming-conscious-of-itself in transcendence towards absolute being, is of a metaphysical kind that is constitutive of the essence. In other words, it must not be imagined that this inner, real negativity belonging to the nature of a particular material being considered merely as such can be overcome by this being of its own power and that it could thus change itself into spirit by a merely intramundane process of becoming. Since this inner negativity, in so far as this being is merely material, is the activity of the transcendent causality of God and thus belongs to its nature, all its activity is always and from the very start and necessarily imprisoned by this limitation that is imposed by God as the basis of its nature. Its action moves, therefore, on the ground of this negativity, a negativity which consequently can never be overcome effectively by this being itself. There is therefore no independent leap [169] from the material into the 'noosphere' by any means belonging to its essential constitution or by any power inherent in the essence of the material being. This unlimiting of the limited (called matter), however, does happen in the spirit, and this above all where the spirit itself enters so closely into materiality that it differentiates it from itself and keeps it as a factor of its own becoming as a spirit, of its becoming-conscious-of-itself, viz. in man. What is thus lifted out of its negativity in and by the spirit is precisely the spiritual reality and positivity of the material, and not just anything ultimately which would be known in its objectivity as alien to the spiritual; on the contrary, it is a moment of the spirit and of its fullness of being itself. Only in this way is it possible even in a Christian philosophy to explain the Christian dogma which tells us that the spiritual soul (precisely as spiritual) is the form of the body; for thomistic philosophy this ultimately means that every reality in man, including even every positive material reality, is the reality and expression of his spirit. Thus the bodily nature of man is necessarily a factor in man's spiritual becoming; it is not something alien to the spirit, but a limited moment in the achievement of the spirit itself. This is valid then even of the rest of the material world, particularly since this must be conceived from the start as the environment and as the broadened corporeality of the spirit. Ontologically it is quite indifferent in this whether these realities – in this purely external-temporal aspect – present themselves as existing simul-

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

taneously or as following one another in time. This is true especially since it has not yet by any means been established that God could also have created the material world without the inner necessity of simultaneity and unity with those spiritual beings whom we call 'angels'; with regard to the angels, we have already said that it is an absolutely open question whether they too are not of their very nature necessarily related to matter, without their having to be bodily beings on this account in the same way as human beings. It has also been said in the first part of these reflections that the spirit (at least in its finite form) can never be conceived in the Christian sense in such a way that it must move away from anything material in order to become perfected, or that its perfection actually grows in proportion to its distance from matter (which is the eternal temptation of a false platonic interpretation of Christianity); the spirit must only be conceived in the sense that the finite spirit searches for and finds itself through the fulfilment of the material itself. Today, from a Christian interpretation of the present experience of man, we can say [170] perfectly well that this perfect achievement of the spirit takes place in a turning towards the material world, and this not only in a theoretical sense but also by an active transformation of this world, in which man is no longer merely an object but also becomes an active subject in the real history of nature. All this holds water only if – from the point of view of the essence of both – spirit and matter do not simply exist side by side as alien to one another. If, however, matter is interpreted as frozen spirit, i.e. interpreted spiritually, then this also necessarily implies a highly 'material' explanation of the finite spirit. This becomes clearest if we think once more about the incarnation of the divine Logos. A Christian theology and philosophy which does not wish to subject this basic truth of Christianity to the suspicion of mythology, must ask itself today why precisely the Logos who is infinite becomes material when he steps out of himself into the sphere of the finite and when he wishes to make his own being appear in this sphere and its history, and why, even in the consummation of this his finite appearance, he does not strip off this materiality but retains it eternally. A more precise philosophical reflection on this basic dogma cannot stop at the statement that the Logos has 'assumed' this or that finite reality and presuppose in this that the peculiarity of what is thus 'assumed' is already something firmly established in itself and requires no further explanation, something which ontologically precedes the 'assumption' (which in a purely external, temporal sense is of course quite correct). We must remember rather the Augustinian recognition that the creation of what is thus 'assumed' is only a movement in the 'coming-to-appear' of the Logos in his own being, a moment in his self-expression projected into the dimension of the finite. This means, however, that the matter which is 'assumed' and which remains valid even in the appearance of the Logos as such, must be regarded (if and by the fact that the Logos even as such brings himself to appear and shows himself in the otherness of the extra-divine and finite) as the appearance of the Logos, i.e. of the spirit, and as an essential moment in what becomes. Matter is, therefore, the openness and the bringing-itself-to-appear of the personal spirit in the finite world and hence is from its very origin related to the spirit, is a moment in the spirit, and indeed a moment of the eternal Logos as he freely but in fact exists, and this for all eternity. This is not meant in any way to turn matter idealistically into spirit, for by the same statements the spirit is equally originally 'materialised'. It comes to be seen, rather, that spirit [171] and matter cannot, like any two objects of our individual experience, be thought of as existing side by side in alien disparateness from one another. Objects of our experience are dull facts existing side by side in all their difference. Spirit and matter, even though distinct from one another, must rather be thought of – as in the first original experience – as factors of created reality indissolubly referred to one another. Thus the Christian can only really be a materialist and a spiritualist at the same time if these two words are meant to indicate that spirit and matter are not ultimately words referring to particular regions of the total reality, regions which lie side by side, but refer to factors which wherever encountered, though essentially different, are everywhere correlative constitutive moments of the one reality.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

3. Regarding the unity of the history of the spirit and of matter: the two realities we are looking at in their mutual relationship and unity are not static realities but created being in becoming. They have a history and develop. The concept of historicity is a most profoundly Christian concept. That the world has a history in a unique, irreversible and orientated flow is already, at least with a view to the history of mankind, a fundamental assertion in the Old Testament. Furthermore, Christianity knows a divine providence, a community of all men in origin, determination and goal, a fullness of time, a history of God's revelation, the God-man seen as the centre and climax of history, it has hope seen as one of the basic conditions of Christian man, it has the eternal kingdom of God in which, at the end of history, God is all in all; to this extent, history, historicity, time, development (in the widest sense of the word) – even for the New Testament and Christianity as such – belong also to the basic categories of existential understanding. The explicit recognition that nature itself also knows development and hence, in its own way, history, may not yet be clearly tangible in the Old and New Testaments, especially since the work of the six days at the beginning of scripture belongs rather to the means of representation than to the content itself of what is stated. Since, however, scripture and the Christian understanding of faith recognise at the very least that the world was created for the historical existence of man, that it is changed by the activity of man himself and that it enters into the completion of the history of mankind by participating in it, the developmental character of even the extra-human world and nature has at least an inner relationship with the basic convictions and categories of Christianity and, as soon as the natural experience of man has recognised the [172] becoming and development in nature as the environment of man, it can easily be assimilated into a Christian world-view. In accordance with the essential difference between spirit and matter, the developmental character also is naturally different in each case, but this need not be discussed more closely here. In accordance with the mutual reference, relationship and unity of spirit and matter in the one world of creatures, the becoming and development of spirit and matter are also intertwined with and conditioned by one another.

Up to this point, there is no special problem with regard to the developmental nature of spirit and matter in general. The real problem, as it occupies the minds of men today, becomes visible only once we reflect on the fact that the spirit, in the sense of proper self-consciousness and freedom, only appears or at least seems to appear at a very much later point in time in the world of our experience than the material world and the sequence of its development. One could indeed, from a Christian point of view, point to the angels as both personal beings and cosmic potencies and thus raise the question whether there has ever really been, even in a merely temporal sense, a spiritless and merely material world or whether the Christian doctrine of the angels does not imply the spiritual orientation of the whole history of nature. Still, we are going to prescind from this question here, even though – in view of the supra-individual structure of the biosphere inexplicable by purely physico-chemical elementary data – one can perhaps raise the question as to whether such an entelechial formation of nature and its history is an hypothesis which lies absolutely beyond natural human experience. We limit ourselves, therefore, to taking as the starting-point of these reflections the affirmation that the human spirit came into being only at a very late point in time and presumably also at a very limited point in space within the history of nature. Thus there arises the question whether the history of nature and the history of the spirit do not merely form a unity if and in so far as both are already presupposed as given but also form one history, i.e. in a sense still to be determined more exactly, the spirit itself may be regarded as the result of the history of nature when it has arrived at a certain point of its history, or whether this is quite irreconcilable with a Christian understanding of the distinction between spirit and matter and of the creative relationship of God to man being in an absolutely special sense. This is the question with which we must now deal. In answering it, in the framework of a modest lecture like the present, we [173] must of course take certain things as already proved and accepted, matters which in a different context would themselves have to form the object of philosophical and theological reflection. One of these propositions which must be presupposed here is obviously and above all the assertion that all reality experienced by us is grounded in its existence and nature, in its becoming, activity and self-achievement, in an absolute being which we call God and which is the original creative and always active ground which posits everything in its own being and activity. Another of these presuppositions (which we have earlier on tried to clarify at least briefly) is also that concerning the essential difference between spirit and matter.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It seems that, with this assertion of the essential difference between spirit and matter, the newly posed question is already answered in the negative. It is also conceded that the average theological interpretation of the dogmatic statement that God is the direct creator of man's spirit understood as the constitutive element essentially different from the material, also already signifies a negative answer to the newly posed question. Since, on the one hand, the spirit cannot be simply regarded as the immanent product of material development and evolution, it originates from a new creative initiative of God; this is an absolutely indisputable fact for a theist with regard to the world as a whole and hence does not present any special difficulties even as a new and absolutely original initiative.

Yet, for a Christian, the question now posed need not be decided in the negative as quickly as it appears to have been from what we have just said. First of all, it is not at all as straightforward even for the Christian understanding of the relationship between God and the world as already built up by Thomas Aquinas in his teaching that God as creator of the material world is the transcendental ground of everything but not the categorial and spatio-temporally localisable cause for a determined individual thing and indeed is seen to be working rather through 'secondary causes' in this respect. There are difficulties even for this Christian understanding if the coming into existence of the individual spiritual souls at particular points in space and time were in no way the result of the world and of its natural development due to secondary causes and if, as it were, God's creative activity could be grasped 'in vacuo' and in a 'worldless' sense, so that God's causality would be an activity in the world beside other activity of creatures, instead of it being the ground of all the activity of all creatures. Furthermore, the negative answer to this new question [174] corresponds little with the non-dualistic basic outlook of the Old Testament in which the one man is a being of the earth and the result of the creative act of God, without scripture – in order to make this comprehensible – dividing man into a being originating directly from the earth and a soul coming directly from God alone. Furthermore, this division of man into a part which is the product of the evolution of the world and into another which must be kept away from such evolutionary thought, looks too much like a compromise to the feeling of the modern natural scientist, a compromise which seems rather to belong to the bad variety of compromise rather than to the good. Finally, such a negative answer which divides man into two parts only related rather too extrinsically to one another, and an answer which does far too little justice to the real essential unity of the constitutive elements of man, makes it difficult to understand what after all is today an observed fact in paleontology, viz. that man has a long preparatory history which, in ever higher steps of living forms endowed with psychic life, at least leads very closely to him.

In order to make any progress in this question and to reach a positive answer under quite determined presuppositions and with conceptual precision, it will to begin with be necessary to clarify here somewhat abruptly the notion of active self-transcendence.

(a) There is becoming, and this becoming is ultimately not just the merely spatially, temporally and quantitatively transformed combination of basic elements which remain

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

statically the same, but is the becoming of something really new which has an intramundane origin and yet is not simply the same as that from which it originates. Becoming is, therefore, always and of its very nature a self-transcendence of the cause, effected by the lower itself, it is an active surpassing of self. It is unfortunately impossible here to bring out clearly the transcendental source of a genuinely metaphysical concept of cause and becoming; this source lies in the movement of the spirit itself experiencing itself as the most radical case of the surpassing-of-self in its transcendence to being as such.

(b) Thus, real becoming is not just duplication but a surpassing of self in which what becomes really becomes more than it was and yet this 'more' is not simply something added to it from outside (which would cancel out the notion of genuine intramundane becoming). If this is so, and if such becoming in which more comes into being is to have a reason for this 'more', then this effectively becoming self-surpassing can only take place [175] by the fact that the absolute being is the cause and basic reason for this self-movement of what becomes, in such a way that, on the one hand, this self-movement has this basic reason within itself as an inner moment of the movement and thus there is true self-transcendence and not merely a passive 'being-surpassed': yet, on the other hand, it is not for this reason the becoming of the absolute being since this, even as an inner moment of the self-movement of the self-transcending development, exists at the same time feely and untouched above what becomes, moving it without moving itself. It follows precisely from this, however, that movement does not cease to be self-movement when it becomes self-transcendence but that precisely in this case it attains its proper nature. Since every finite causality works in virtue of the absolute being within the finite and this always and essentially, so that the finite being has its own being and activity precisely through the existence of the absolute being within it, we can and must grant causality to the finite being; even causality for what is more than itself and towards which it surpasses itself. Within these metaphysical presuppositions, and given certain precisions, it can be said without qualms that a finite being can bring about more than it is. A denial of such possibilities can only basically make sense as an attempt to emphasise and clarify that such an active self-surpassing by something finite in its active development cannot take place except by the power of the absolute being seen as the absolute act which without thereby becoming a constitutive element of the finite being itself, is interior to the finite being in its becoming and activity.

(c) Thus the nature of each particular being with whose transcendence we are concerned is not the boundary of what can happen in this self-transcendence, but it is an indication that (i) something becomes and must become out of a limited potency, something which is not always realised already, i.e. an indication of something still having to become and that (ii) without prejudice to the real self-transcendence of the point of departure of the movement, i.e. the nature of the being moving itself, always remains also the limiting law of what can directly come out of it. The point of departure, even though it is surpassed, can very well be an indication of the goal towards which the transition is orientated and an indication of how far it can go directly. Presupposing this, however, the ontologically valid concept of becoming understood as really active self-transcendence also implies the basic possibility of going beyond oneself by surpassing one's nature. This can be said already because for a thomistic [176] metaphysics different essences, in spite of their essential difference, are to be conceived as different grades of the limitation of being and not as absolutely disparate magnitudes. A lower being in its positivity is not, therefore, a disparate opposite of a higher being but merely a relatively narrower limitation of being by this lower being in relation to a higher one. Hence, when it surpasses itself in the process of its becoming, in the sense of a self-transcendence beyond its own being, then this does not mean the positing of an absolutely separate and essentially alien existent in the sense of a simple generatio aequivoca. Rather, it is immediately clear from this thomistic starting-point that the new

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

existent can and must preserve within itself as its own proper characteristics, all the positive realities of the nature of the old existent from which it originates. All this does not exclude but, on the contrary, includes the fact – even in such an essential self-transcendence – that the point of departure of this kind of self-transcendence, i.e. the proper nature of what becomes by thus surpassing itself is the a priori limiting law for what can come to be here and now. Becoming, therefore, understood as an essential self-transcendence in virtue of the absolute interior but supra-essential being, does not exclude but rather includes the question about the precise sequence of the stages of this becoming which is unlimited in the forward direction. What and how things in such an evolutionary series can come in direct sequence one after the other, can only be determined in an a posteriori manner and is in the nature of things a difficult question. Precisely in the case of an essential self-transcendence, the notion of surpassing oneself always means a partial non-continuity which cannot and may not be avoided if we are not to deny basically genuine and qualitatively new becoming of being. On the other hand, the limit of what can become, which is given together with the finite nature of what becomes by transcending itself, demands that the non-continuity is not conceived in too wide a sense; indeed, it signifies the heuristic postulate requiring us to keep the 'leaps' as small as possible and the transcendence as fluid as possible, without of course intending thereby to give an 'explanation' of the higher development in which the essentially new would be explained away. Hence, if such an essential self-transcendence cannot be directly observed, it will never no doubt be completely possible to pass beyond a duality in one's methodic position: one will without qualms take into consideration all such 'leaps' and such self-transcendence to a new metaphysical being and hence will not at all demand an absolute continuity (which would be a metaphysical [177] nonsense), while one will still continue to go on looking for new intermediate steps which will create more fluid transitions.

Given the ontological and Christian legitimacy of a self-transcendence, even one which goes beyond nature, and granted that the description of spirit and matter presented so far is held to be correct in its basic outlines, then it can also he said without hesitation that a development of the material in the direction of the spirit and the self-transcendence of the material into the spirit is, both philosophically and in the Christian sense, a legitimate conception. We have seen that becoming is really self-transcendence, and this in certain cases even towards a new nature even though this happens, of course, by the power of the dynamism of the absolute being, all of which, however, in its turn does not deny the fact that this is a question of a genuine, active self-transcendence. We have seen furthermore, that matter and spirit are not simply disparate things but that matter is, as it were, 'frozen' spirit whose only meaning is to render real spirit possible. Finally, we have seen that the spirituality of the creature always remains spirituality in materiality right up to its absolute perfection. Given all this, a development of matter in the direction of the spirit is not an impossible notion, presupposing merely that the notion of development is understood in the sense of that essential self-transcendence under the dynamism of the absolute being which we have briefly tried to outline. If, under the movement by the absolute being, there is any becoming at all in the material world by which the material surpasses itself, then – since this absolute being is spirit, self-possession and freedom – this self-surpassing can take place only in the direction of the spirit. The history of nature and the history of the spirit can be seen as one history without having thereby to deny the essential gradation of the world and of its development, and without having to embed the development of nature and the free personal history in dire opposition to one another. The highest grade of all productive becoming is the human spirit and matter tends towards it as towards its final principle of nature and form, for man is the goal of all generative becoming. This statement is already found in St Thomas Aquinas (ScG III, 22). Matter and spirit have a unity in their starting-point, in their history and in their goal. Both of them remain eternally valid before God and form for ever, now and in the state of perfection, the mutually correlative, non-separable constitutive elements of the one created reality.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[178]

13

THEOLOGY OF FREEDOM

We have been asked to say something here about the theology of freedom. The lack of space available will not permit us to make a survey of the dogmatic and theological history of the doctrine of freedom. For the same reason it will also be impossible to collect together more precisely the theological statements about the nature of freedom as found in the theological sources of the scriptures, tradition and the Church's magisterium. Both of these things are impossible here. We must therefore be satisfied with giving a synthesis of what arises objectively from revelation about the nature of freedom.[1]

Even though man exercises them unsystematically in every one of his acts, he becomes only slowly aware of the systematic and objective nature even of his essential characteristics in the course of his individual and collective history. Hence, the history of salvation and revelation (including the history of Christian theology) is also a history of man's systematic reflection on himself as a free being. Thus it is not as if man always already knows adequately and systematically what human freedom is and uses this concept, always already given, in the expression of revelation and theology without changing and deepening it. The average scholastic theology may often give the impression that this is what man does but in reality it is not true. Obviously we cannot here give even a [179] brief account of the history of the Graeco-Western notion of freedom, but it is worth mentioning that even the real freedom of choice as such – i.e. the freedom which consists not only in the fact that man cannot be forced from without but also in that a free decision about himself is demanded from him which, therefore, is rather a demand and a task than freedom – can alone already be seen quite clearly in Christianity. Only in Christianity is each person completely unique and of eternal value – in God's personal love for man – and hence a personality which must be accomplished through the highest personal responsibility and hence in freedom.

The history of revelation has entered into its final, unsurpassable eschatological phase in Jesus Christ. The intramundane finality of this phase is not merely the actual way things are (because God does not want to reveal anything new any more) but is already given with the newer being of this phase itself, since – basically – it can only be surpassed by the direct vision of God. Given all this then, this characteristic of the history of revelation in Christ must also be applicable to the self-consciousness of man as a being of freedom: freedom as it is continually, creatively granted to man by God is not one of the 'objects', with regard to which a neutral freedom of choice is activated among other things, but the one who in this absolute act of freedom first appears to man and in whom alone the nature of freedom itself attains its full essential achievement.

I. FREEDOM IN THE THEOLOGICAL SENSE IS FREEDOM RECEIVED FROM AND DIRECTED TOWARDS GOD

[1] For a more detailed exposition of what can often be merely indicated here, it may be permitted to refer to the following essays of the author in previous volumes of 'Theological Investigations': 'Freedom in the Church', II, pp. 89-107; 'The Dignity and Freedom of Man', II, pp. 235-263; 'The Theology of Power', IV, pp. 391-409; 'The "Commandment" of Love in relation to the other Commandments', V, pp. 439-459; also (certain thoughts have been taken over from this too) to J. B. Metz, 'Freiheit – theologisch', Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe, ed. by H. Fries (Munich 1962), I, pp. 403-414; 'Freiheit als philosophisch-theologisches Grenzproblem', Gott in Welt I (in honour of K. Rahner) (Freiburg 1964), pp. 287-3 14.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It would be a complete misconception of the nature of freedom to try to understand it as the mere capacity of choice between objects given a posteriori, among which, besides many others, there is also God; so that God would only play a special role in the choice made by this freedom of choice from among these many objects on account of his own objective characteristics but not on account of the nature of freedom itself. Freedom only exists – as was seen explicitly already by St Thomas – because there is spirit understood as transcendence. There is unlimited transcendence towards being as such and hence indifference with regard to any particular, finite object within the horizon of this absolute transcendence only in so far as this transcendence in every individual act concerned with a finite object is directed towards the original unity of being as such. Moreover, [180] this indifference exists only in so far as this act of transcendence (considered as the ground of every category of behaviour towards a finite subject and also towards the infinite represented in finite concepts) is supported by a conditional opening and extending of the horizon of this transcendence starting from itself, and of its goal, which we call God.

Freedom, therefore, has a theological character not only when and where God is represented explicitly and side by side with other objects in the objectivity of categories, but always and everywhere by the nature of freedom itself since God is present unthematically in every act of freedom as its supporting ground and ultimate orientation. When St Thomas says that God is recognised unthematically but really in every object, then this applies equally to freedom: in every act of freedom God is unthematically but really willed and, conversely, one experiences in this way alone what is really meant by God, viz. the cognoscitively and appetitively incomprehensible orientation of the one original transcendence of man unfolding itself in knowledge and love.

The orientation of transcendence cannot be mastered but consists in the infinite, silent mastery over us in that moment and indeed always when, by making a judgement on it, we begin to master something by making it subject to the laws of our a priori reason. It is not given merely as the goal of transcendence itself (which means that, since this goal is not experienced in itself but is only known unobjectively in the experience of subjective transcendence, every thesis of ontologism is already avoided from this point of view alone) – and its presence, furthermore, is the presence of such a transcendence that it is always given only as the condition of the possibility of a knowledge in categories and not by itself alone. One can never go directly towards it. One can never reach out to it directly. It gives itself only in so far as it directs us silently to something else, to something finite as the object of direct vision.

It is decisive for the Christian understanding of freedom, however, that this freedom is not only made possible by God and is not only related to him as the supporting horizon of the freedom of choice in categories, but that it is freedom vis-à-vis God himself. This is the frightening mystery of freedom in its Christian understanding. Where God is understood in categories as merely one reality among others, as one of the many objects of freedom of choice - understood as a neutral capacity which is arbitrarily occupied with this and that the statement that freedom of choice is choice even with, regard to God would present no particular difficulty. [181] That freedom, however, is freedom vis-à-vis its all-supporting ground itself, that in other words it can culpably deny the very condition of its own possibility in an act which necessarily reaffirms this condition, is the extreme statement about the nature of created freedom which in its radicality leaves the usual neutrality of categories far behind. It is decisive for the Christian doctrine of freedom that this freedom implies the possibility of a ‘yes’ or ‘no’ towards its own horizon and indeed it is only really constituted by this. This is true not merely and not even primarily when God is given and represented systematically in concepts and categories but also when he is given unsystematically but

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

originally in our transcendental experience as the condition and moment of every activity directed towards the contemporary world in which we live. It is true in this sense that we meet God everywhere in a most radical way as the most basic question of our freedom, in all things of the world and (in the words of scripture) above all in our neighbour. Why then, more precisely, is the transcendental horizon of freedom not merely the condition of its possibility but also its proper 'object'? Why do we not act in freedom not merely towards ourselves, our surroundings and the people around us either in conformity to reality or in a destructive way within that infinitely wide horizon of transcendence from which we freely confront ourselves and the world in which we live, and why is this horizon itself also the 'object' of this freedom in our yes or no to it in itself? This horizon is once more per definitionem the condition of the possibility of saying no to it. This means that in such a 'no' it is unavoidably negated as the condition of the possibility of freedom and is also at the same time negated as an unthematic 'object' or even (in explicit or practical 'atheism') as a conceptually mediated object. Thus, in the act of the negating freedom there is present a real, absolute contradiction in the fact that God is affirmed and denied at the same time; in it this ultimate monstrosity is both withdrawn from itself and, by the fact that it is necessarily made objective and mediated in the finite material of our life in its temporal extension, made relative by being introduced into temporality. The real possibility, however, of such an absolute contradiction in freedom cannot be denied, though it is indeed disputed and doubted. This happens in ordinary everyday theology whenever it is said that the only thinkable mode of freedom is that the infinite God in his objectivity can only evaluate a little 'bending' of finite reality, the offence against a concrete and merely finite natural structure, for what it is, viz. something [182] finite; he therefore cannot evaluate it by an absolute prohibition and an infinite sanction and cannot characterise it as something directed against his own will as such. The 'will', against which such a sin really offends (such a theology would say), is after all the finite reality really willed by God, and to suppose an offence against God's will over and above this is to falsely turn God's will into a particular category of reality alongside the finite thing which is willed. Yet there is the possibility of a free 'no' towards God. Otherwise freedom would basically have no real orientation to the subject (of which we will have still to speak explicitly), i.e. the fact that freedom is concerned with the subject itself and not just with this or that thing. Let us grant that the act of freedom is really concerned with the subject itself, since this subject is transcendence. Let us grant furthermore that the individual intramundane beings encountered by us within the horizon of transcendence are not events within a space which remains untouched by what is in that space, but are the historical concreteness of the encounter and projection of this source and goal that support our transcendence. In this light freedom towards the encountered individual beings is always also a freedom towards the horizon, the ground and abyss, which allows them to present themselves to us and lets them become the inner moment of our receiving freedom. In so far as and because the horizon cannot be indifferent to the subject understood as a knowing subject but is systematically or unsystematically that with which this knowing transcendence is concerned, particularly if this 'ad quem' is not its explicit object, to that same extent and for the same reason freedom – even though it is always exercised on the concrete individual things of experience and through this becomes what it is – is primarily and unavoidably concerned with God himself. Freedom in its origin is freedom of saying yes or no to God and by this fact is freedom of the subject towards itself. Freedom is either indifferent to this or that, the infinite repetition of the same or of the contrary (which is merely a different kind of the same), a freedom of eternal recurrence, or the same 'wandering Jew', or it is necessarily the freedom of the subject towards itself in its finality and thus is freedom towards God, however unconscious this ground and most proper and original 'object' of freedom may be in the individual act of freedom.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We must add a second reflection to this, a reflection which alone brings to light the ultimate theological reason for freedom as freedom towards God, but one which can only be briefly indicated here. The supernatural [183] and historical concreteness of our transcendence is never given as something merely natural but is always embraced and taken up by a super-natural dynamism of our spiritual being which tends towards the absolute nearness of God. In other words, God in the concrete is not present merely as the horizon of our transcendence, one which always withdraws itself and refuses to give itself; rather, understood as this horizon, he offers himself to be directly possessed in what we call divinising grace. Given all this, the freedom in transcendence and in the yes and no towards the ground of this transcendence is given a directness towards God by which it becomes most radically capable of saying yes and no to God as such. This happens in a way which would, of course, in no way be already given by the abstract formal concept of transcendence directed towards God as the merely distant and repelling horizon of our exercise of existence and it is such that it cannot be derived from this concept alone.

II. FREEDOM AS TOTAL AND FINALISING SELF-MASTERY OF THE SUBJECT

Freedom, as we have said, cannot be viewed in a Christian sense as an in-itself neutral capacity to do this or that in an arbitrary order and in a temporal series which would be broken off from outside even though, from the point of view of freedom, it could go on ad infinitum; freedom is rather the capacity to make oneself once and for all, the capacity which of its nature is directed towards the freely willed finality of the subject as such. This is obviously what is meant by the Christian statement about man and his salvation and damnation when he, the free person, must answer for himself and the totality of his life before the judgement seat of God, and when the eternally valid sentence about his salvation or damnation in accordance with his works is passed by a judge who does not regard merely the appearance of his life, the ‘face’, but the freely governed core of the person, the ‘heart’. It is true that man’s formal freedom of choice and decision is more presupposed in scripture than used as an actual theme. It is true also that the explicit theme in scripture, especially in the New Testament, is for the most part the paradox that man’s freedom, while remaining responsible and without being destroyed, is enslaved by the slavery of the demonic powers of sin and death and to some extent even of the law, and must first of all be liberated to make way for an inner inclination towards the law (we will discuss this later). Yet it cannot be [184] doubted that for scripture both the sinful and the justified man are responsible for the actions of their life and to this extent are also free and that freedom, therefore, is a permanent constitutive of man’s nature. The proper nature of freedom, however, appears precisely in so far as freedom is the basis of absolute salvation and damnation in Christian revelation, and this finally and before God. For a merely profane everyday experience, freedom of choice may appear merely as the characteristic of the individual act of man, which can be attributed to him in so far as it is actively posited by him, without this positing being already causally predetermined and in this sense forced by some inner condition of man or some external situation. Such a concept of freedom of choice atomises freedom in its exercise and thus distributes it exclusively to the individual acts of man, acts which are only held together by a neutral, substantial identity of the subject and of the capacities positing them all, as well as by life’s external space of time. Freedom in this sense is merely freedom of acts, imputability of the individual act to a person who remains neutral in himself and hence (as long as the external conditions are given for this) can always determine himself anew. Once we see in a Christian sense, however, that by his freedom man can determine and dispose himself as a whole and finally, the idea of responsible freedom is changed and deepened immensely. This means that man does not merely perform actions which, though they must be qualified morally, also always pass away again (and which after that are imputed to him merely juridically or morally); man by his free decision really is so good or evil in the very ground of his being itself that his final salvation or damnation are really already given in this, even though perhaps in a still hidden manner. Freedom is first of all 'freedom of being'. It is not merely the quality of an act and capacity exercised at some time, but a transcendental mark of human existence itself. If man is to be really and finally able to be master over himself, if this 'eternity' is to be the act of his freedom itself, if this act is to be really able to make man good or bad in the very ground of his being, and if this goodness or badness is not to be merely an external, accidental event happening to man (so that this act would merely, contrary to its goodness, draw something which remains good into damnation), then freedom must first of all be thought of as freedom of being. This means that man is that being who is concerned in his very being about this being itself, he is always a being who already has a relationship towards himself, a subjectivity and never simply a nature; already a [185] person . . . never just 'something there' but always already 'for himself', 'existing'. Nothing happens to this being which does not affect its relationship to itself in some way, or if it does, it becomes subjectively and salvifically significant only in so far as it is freely 'understood' and subjectively taken over by the free subject as such in a quite definite way; its 'ego' cannot possibly be passed over, it simply cannot be turned into an object and can never be replaced or explained by something else, not even by its own reflex representation of itself, it is genuinely original, never based on something else and hence cannot be derived from or proved by anything else. Its relationship to its divine origin must never be interpreted according to the notion of causal and formal relationships of dependence as operative in the categories of the realm of our experience in which the source keeps and binds and does not set free, and in which therefore independence and dependence grow in inverse and equal proportion. Man, by his freedom of being, is always the incomparable being who cannot be adequately classified into any system and cannot be adequately subsumed under any one concept. He is in an original sense the untouchable, but therefore also the lonely and insecure, a burden to himself, who cannot by any means 'absolve' himself from this once-and-for-all lonely self-being and who can never 'unload' himself on others. Hence, freedom is originally also not primarily concerned with this or that which one can do or not do; freedom is not originally the capacity of choosing any object whatsoever or the ability of adopting an individual attitude towards this or that; it is rather the freedom of self-understanding, the possibility of saying yes or no to oneself, the possibility of deciding for or against oneself, which corresponds to the knowing self-possession, the understanding subject-nature of man. Freedom never happens as a merely objective exercise, as a mere choice 'between' individual objects, but is the self-exercise of the man who chooses objectively; only within this freedom in which man is capable of achieving himself is man also free with regard to the material of his self-achievement. He can do or omit this or that in view of his own self-realisation that is inescapably imposed on him. This self-realisation is a task he cannot avoid and, in spite of all the differences within the concrete material of his self-achievement, it is always either a self-realisation in the direction of God or a radical self-refusal towards God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It must of course be realised that this basic nature of freedom is achieved over a whole period of time and that the total project of human existence, [186] one's own total self-understanding or 'option fondamentale', frequently remains empty and objectively unfulfilled. It must be borne in mind that not every individual act of freedom has the same actual depth and radical nature of self-disposal and that, although each individual act of freedom wants to venture total and final self-disposal, all such acts always enter into the totality of the one, total-act of freedom of the one, whole temporally finite life, precisely because each one of these acts is exercised within, and receives its weight and proportion

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

from, the horizon of the whole of human existence. Correspondingly, the biblical and Augustine concept of the heart, the concept of subjectivity in Kierkegaard, the notion of 'action' in Blondel, etc., shows understanding for the fact that there is such a basic act of freedom which embraces and shapes the whole of human existence. This act is indeed realised and can be exercised only by means of those individual acts of man which can be localised in space and time and which can be objectified with regard to their motives. Yet this basic act cannot be simply identified by an objective reflection with such an individual act; it does not represent either the merely moral sum-total of these individual acts nor can it be simply identified with the moral quality of the last of the free individual acts exercised (before death). The concrete freedom of man by which he decides about himself as a whole by effecting his own finality before God, is the unity in difference of the formal 'option fondamentale' and the free individual acts of man no longer attainable by reflection, a unity which is the concrete being of the subject of freedom having-achieved-itself. In all this, to emphasise this once more and explicitly, freedom – precisely speaking – is not the possibility of always being able to do something else, the possibility of infinite revision, but the capacity to do something uniquely final, some-thing which is finally valid precisely because it is done in freedom. Freedom is the capacity for the eternal. Natural processes can always be revised again and directed along a different path and are therefore for this very reason indifferent. The result of freedom is the true necessity which remains.

III. FREEDOM REGARDED AS A DIALOGIC CAPACITY OF LOVE

This self-perfecting of freedom into the eternal 'moment' is, as we have said, its self-realisation before God. Freely posited salvation or damnation, consisting in the gaining or loss of God, must not be understood as a [187] merely external reaction of a judging or rewarding God but is itself already performed in this freedom. Freedom, if it is to be able to effect salvation or damnation and hence the determination of the whole man, of itself brings into play the whole man with his mutually interactive relations to his origin and future. Freedom is always self-realisation of the objectively choosing man seen in view of his total realisation before God. In this way, considered as the capacity of the 'heart', it is the capacity of love. This answer is not so self-evident if we ask: what is the basic act of man into which quite absolutely he can synthesise his whole nature and life, the act which can embrace everything and incorporate everything within itself, everything which goes under the name of man and the life of man, happiness and despair, everyday life and starlight hours, sin and redemption, past and present. Yet this is really the case: the love of God, and this love alone, is capable of embracing everything. It alone places man completely before the one without whom man would be merely consciousness of radical emptiness and nothingness; it alone is able to unite all man's many-sided and mutually contradictory capabilities because they are all orientated towards that God whose unity and infinity can create the unity in man which, without destroying it, unites the diversity of the finite. Love alone allows man to forget himself (what a hell it would be if we were not able to do this in the end); it alone can still redeem even the darkest hours of the past since it alone finds the courage to believe in the mercy of the holy God. Love alone reserves nothing to itself and therefore can also decide about the future (which man, in the anxiety about his finiteness which must be used sparingly, is otherwise tempted to save up). Because it loves the one who has never regretted the venture of such a world of guilt, malediction, death and fruitlessness, love can also love this earth together with God. Love of God is the only total integration of human existence, and we have only grasped it in its dignity and all-embracing greatness if we have understood it to be this and once we suspect that it must be the content of the moment of eternity in time

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and hence the content of the eternity with God himself which is born out of it.

This love is not a determined, assignable performance which one could define exactly, but rather that which every man becomes in the irreplaceable characteristic of his always unique realisation of nature, something which is known only once it is accomplished. This is not to say that there is in no sense a universal concept of love, as seen in the statement that man is [188] obliged to love God and to say that the whole divine law consists in this. Man is, in spite of all this, obliged to love God with his whole heart . . . and this one heart which man must stake, the innermost centre of his person, is something unique. What it bears within itself in its uniqueness, what is staked and given away in this love is known only once it has been done, at the stage when man has really caught up with himself and thus knows what is in him and who he is in the concrete. In this love, therefore, man enters into the adventure of his own reality, an adventure which to begin with is veiled from him. He cannot survey and evaluate from the very start what is really demanded of him. He is demanded, he himself is ventured, he in the concreteness of his heart and his life which, only when accomplished, reveals what this heart is that had to venture and squander itself in this life. In the case of all other efforts, we may know what is really demanded of us. It is possible to gauge, compare, ask oneself whether the stakes and the gain are worth it. One could justify such a demanded effort by something else, by a result which shows it to make sense, but in the case of love this is impossible. Love itself is what justifies love, but this only in any real sense when with the whole heart and with all one's might it has been carried to the very end.

The Christian ethos does not basically consist in the respecting of objective norms imposed by God on reality. All structures of things are lower than man. He can alter them, bend them as far as possible; he is their master and not their servant. The only ultimate structure of the person which manages to express it completely is the basic capacity of love, and this is without measure. Thus man too is boundless. Every sin is at root merely the refusal to entrust himself to this boundlessness; it is a lesser love which, because it refuses to become the greater, is no longer love at all. Of course, so as to know what this means, man requires objectifications which he encounters in the multiplicity of commandments. This is true but everything which thus appears in this multiplicity of commandments is the objectification or partial accomplishment or preliminary beginning of a love which itself has no norm by which it could be measured. One can speak of the 'commandment' of love as long as one does not forget that this 'law' does not command man to do something but imposes a person as a task on himself, that person who can love only by accepting that love belonging to God in which God does not give something but himself.

God, however, in spite of – no, because of – his absoluteness is no [189] impersonal 'It', no asymptotic stationary take-off point of the transcendence and love of the spiritual person but the 'living God' in whose regard every action of man is essentially a response to his call. This ultimately is the basis of the historicity of the person. The historicity of man can only be taken perfectly seriously once man knows himself to be exposed in something essentially (and not merely de facto and per accidens) indisposable; in other words, when he understands himself as someone existing within the sovereign freedom of God against which there is no appeal. This essential reference of human self-understanding to God's freedom and the thereby given 'essential history together with God' is ultimately nothing else but the anthropological expression of the fact that everything created remains always actually dependent on God. This is so since it means man remains dependent on God in that self-understanding which characterises his human existence, i.e. that he can never build God into this self-understanding as a disposable element. The experience and affirmation of inexhaustibility, of the mystery of God and of his freedom belong to the human self-affirmation as a creature. Man, therefore, accepts that dependence of a creature proper to him by the fact that he does not simply interpret himself in his self-understanding as something which is definitively available of itself (after the manner of 'pure nature', for instance) but rather patiently awaits a historical interpretation by God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In this historical interpretation there becomes concrete what has been said above about the interpretation of the transcendental and categorial exercise of freedom. Human freedom, even in the case when it prepares to be directly and explicitly freedom vis-à-vis God, is always freedom with regard to some category of object and vis-à-vis some intramundane Thou, since even such an act of an explicit yes or no towards God cannot conduct itself directly in relation to the God of original, transcendental experience but only to the God of explicit, conceptual reflection, to God in the concept and not directly and alone to the God of transcendental presence.

God's Word, if it is to take place in intramundane tangibility, can only be spoken by man as a finite word. It is equally true 'in converso', 'in the opposite direction', that the relationship to God in its directness is necessarily mediated by intramundane communication. The transcendental opening out requires a categorial object, a support as it were, so as not to lose itself in empty nothingness; it requires an intramundane Thou. The original relationship to God is . . . love of neighbour. If man becomes [190] himself only by the exercise of love towards God and must achieve this self-mastery by a categorial action, then it holds good – and holds good perfectly in the order of grace – that the act of love of neighbour is the only categorial and original act in which man attains the whole of the concretely given reality and finds the transcendental and supernatural, directly experienced experience of God.

The historicity of dialogic freedom, however, becomes even clearer in this relationship with one's fellow men, by the fact that it is not merely concerned with the sovereign God but also with the uncontrollable decisions relating to one's surroundings, and by the fact that it is determined by them and must in the concrete decide itself in determined situations.

Freedom, then, is not merely the capacity of knowing principles but is also the call to obey 'imperatives', to make decisions, decisions which cannot be derived from universal norms and eternal laws (although they may not contradict them) and yet do not leave man free to choose in any way he likes but rather make a total demand on man . . . out of the situation of his 'hour', of his call.

It is impossible here to develop a logic of the concrete understanding of what should be done at each moment, an ethics which does not simply stop at the rejection of situation ethics but reaches towards a genuine individual ethics. It must suffice simply to mention it . . . and to point out that only such an understanding can preserve the mystery of freedom.

IV. THE MYSTERY OF FREEDOM

Freedom is a mystery first of all because it comes only from God and is directed only towards God, who is essentially the incomprehensible mystery which as such is precisely the source and goal of freedom as such. The ground of freedom is the abyss of the mystery, which can never be conceived as that original datum of our transcendental experience in knowledge and freedom which in its self-evident and permanent incomprehensibility is the reason for the possibility of understanding every individual reality as such which it meets within this horizon.

We must abstain here from going on from this starting-point to pose the epistemological question about the real knowableness of freedom. Freedom is not a datum of any empirical psychology. Such a psychology can merely determine functional interconnections of individual facts within the horizon of experience as a whole, whereas freedom previously [191] to such an experience of objects is always already grasped as the form of transcendental experience as such by the fact that the subject knows itself to be incapable of being turned into an object and thus knows itself to be free.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This radical mysteriousness of the freedom of the subject continues also into the free act of the subject as such. The individual act of freedom participates in the mystery of its origin and goal and in so far as it can never be absolutely objectified in its freedom and hence also never in its ethical quality. This characteristic does indeed already arise directly out of the strictly subjective nature of freedom, but is also emphasised explicitly and objectively in the statements of revelation. These statements contain an ultimate non-objectifiability of freedom and of the free, concrete decision. The total decision by which man decides definitively about the whole of his reality, i.e. posits this totality itself in its freely determined finality (and an individual act can be called really and completely free only in so far as this happens), is a total decision that according to revelation belongs to the judgement of God alone. Man does indeed come ever closer to his finality in freedom and as a conscious subject, but he cannot once more objectify this result of his freedom for himself, i.e. judge himself and even less others in their total quality before God. The Catholic doctrine of faith declares that man cannot, while still a pilgrim on earth, have an absolutely certain judgement about his state of justification or eternal salvation. Even the Protestant doctrine of justification is not ultimately at variance on this point (in spite of all controversies) since, even for the Lutheran doctrine of justification, absolute fiducial faith always remains subject to temptation. This means also, therefore, that man cannot adequately reflect objectively and with absolute certainty on his free decisions. It means that freedom is really subjectivity and that subjectivity is in itself and in its self-presence a more original reality than individually existing objects which can be clearly determined by a previously conceived co-ordinate system of universal ideas. In the deed of his freedom itself man knows who he is and wants to be in freedom but precisely this knowledge is strictly identical with himself and hence he cannot separate this knowledge from himself as something objective and manipulable and so once more say clearly to himself what he declares himself to be in his freedom towards God. This declaration which he is himself disappears for him, as it were, into the mysterium of God. An absolutely certain, propositionally objectified declaration about a man's [192] exercise of freedom in a determined act located in space and time is basically impossible for this man with regard to himself and even more so for others. This does not indeed mean that freedom and responsibility are in no way realities to be found within the space of human experience and reflection and in the realm of inter-subjectivity. Freedom, even as the concrete total self-determination of the free subject about itself in the direction of finality, always takes place by means of a pre-given particular category of material; subjectivity and the person always fulfil themselves in the natural. This shows the created nature of human freedom. It is equally clear that man, without injury to the impossibility of an adequate self-reflection, is always also the reflecting, the self-objectifying being who places himself under the norms of universal validity. It is a Catholic and also, in view of the material ethics of the Bible, a completely biblical doctrine that it is not merely possible to develop formal principles of the subjective exercise of freedom of the subject with regard to its correctness or wrongness but also absolutely material norms of an objective and universally valid kind with regard to the right or wrong exercise of this subjective freedom within the categories of the nature of man and of his world. It then becomes self-evident that man is empowered as well as obliged to make a certain reflex and objectified self-judgement about his moral condition, i.e. to make a judgement with regard to the presence, rightness or wrongness of his exercise of freedom in a particular material act. This understanding of oneself which one can pronounce to oneself and examine critically, and in view of which one can attain a certain valid result, is qualified precisely by the characteristics of the pilgrim existence of man in this life, in which freedom is still at work and hence every trial is itself once more an act of freedom which cannot be adequately examined by reflection. It is a real knowledge which gives that kind of 'certitude'

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which can be given within the space of the historical and of freedom: as a demand to place freedom itself under obligatory moral norms. One has the right and duty to include this knowledge about oneself and ultimately also that about others in the calculations of one's life and of one's active decisions and actions, since otherwise one cannot exist and since absolute abstention from such judgements would not avoid the risk of such judgements but would itself be once more a free decision full of risk. Yet this judging, deciding, risking, objectifying knowledge about freedom does not understand itself as something final, absolutely certain and beyond appeal. In this objectifying knowledge, and in his reflex self-understanding [193] which is once more an act of unreflected freedom, man accepts himself and, precisely as the one who understands himself in this way or that, he makes himself answerable to the mysterious judgement of God that takes place in a hidden way in the unreflected act of his freedom. Freedom is mystery.

V. CREATED FREEDOM IN AN UNAVOIDABLE SITUATION OF GUILT

The freedom of man is indeed free self-realisation into finality. Yet in spite of its peculiarly creative character, it is a created freedom. This can be seen from two facts. In its transcendental nature this freedom experiences itself first of all as borne and empowered by its absolute horizon, an absolute horizon which it does not form but by which it is formed. The transcendentality of the spirit must not be conceived as residing either in the knowledge or in the freedom of love as if the spirit projects and determines its orientation or 'goal' by itself. Its 'goal' itself, in the peculiar manner of something withdrawn, opens itself of itself to the knowing and willing spirit (without – as has already been said – this implying that open realisation maintained by ontologism); the goal is experienced within the realisation of spiritual existence itself as the real moving force; the active self-projection of the spirit towards its goal and its future is experienced as taken up by the goal which opens itself of itself and over which the spirit has no control since he does not grasp it fully but is rather constituted by it as something lying beyond it. The characteristic of the transcendentality of freedom, understood as freedom borne and empowered by its goal, right away indicates the created nature of this freedom of which freedom is directly conscious in its exercise. In so far as this empowering of freedom, towards the absoluteness of being, is experienced as the empowering by grace to the absolute nearness to this goal – in its direct self-communication (called divine grace) – the character of created freedom comes through more strongly and clearly through the empowering self-opening of this goal (even though this experience can be made clearly objective only through its interpretation in the supernatural revelation of the Word and by faith).

The experience of the created nature of freedom is shown secondly by the fact that this freedom, understood as a self-disposing by the subject towards finality, is necessarily mediated by an environment and inter-subjectivity which of themselves are a posteriori, uncontrollable and [194] ultimately unplanned. Man always exercises his original freedom towards himself by merely accepting and passing through the history pre-given and imposed on him. Freedom is the free answer of yes or no to necessity and once more experiences in this its created nature.

According to Christian teaching which is contained above all in the implications of the doctrine of original sin and concupiscence, the fact that created freedom is conditioned by situations and that it only becomes conscious of itself by going out into the world is characterised by the fact that this situation is always and unavoidably co-determined by guilt. The doctrine of sin at the very source of the common history of the world and of humanity and the doctrine of concupiscence signify that there is never a situation and material for

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

man's freedom (if this situation and material are regarded adequately and without any arbitrary abstractions) which is not right away, even before each person's own positive or negative moral decision, co-determined by the guilt in the history of mankind, and that it will never be possible – right to the end of history – to eliminate completely this mortgage of guilt that is objectified in the situation of freedom.

In so far as freedom must always objectify itself in an alien material in order to find itself, it becomes alienated from itself. As has already been shown, it can never look at itself so clearly in what it has done for its own self-realisation in the material of the situation as to be able to recognise in this exactly and with absolute certitude what it is in itself, viz., the yes or no to itself and to God. This can be seen to be true even by the mere fact that there is no objectification of which one could say with absolute certitude that it could only have arisen in its concreteness out of freedom and not by natural necessity. Being created and mediated freedom, this freedom necessarily becomes in an ultimate sense ambiguous in its objectification; it therefore becomes a mystery to itself and as such it must surrender itself to God. This characteristic of ambiguity in the objectifications of freedom is heightened by the circumstance that the material imposed on freedom and entering into its exercise is always already co-determined and formed by guilt from the very beginning of the history of the spirit. The freedom of the individual, of course, can still understand this material co-determined by the guilt of others (which does not remain external to the free act) either in the sense of ratifying the guilty determination of this material as the embodiment of its own 'no' to God, and thus make it the objective manifestation of its own guilt, or by suffering [195] and overcoming it as a participation in the Cross of Christ with its 'yes' to God. Yet precisely this ambiguity of the imposed situation and its material for freedom makes the original free act once more something which cannot be absolutely understood, a mystery for freedom which cannot be solved; it veils within the unsearchable judgement of God the meaning and quality of the individual life as well as of the history of humanity as a whole.

VI. FREEDOM AS LIBERATED FREEDOM

In so far as freedom is always and in every act freedom directed towards the mystery of God himself (that mystery by which it is supported and empowered), the act of freedom is always essentially the act of man's self-surrender to the uncontrollable providence of God and in this sense it is always essentially a trusting venture. How God transmits himself to this freedom which if it does not want to refuse itself to him must entrust itself absolutely to him in its venture into the unpredictable, it can appear only slowly in the history of the self-experience of this freedom. This whole matter becomes even more acute on account of what we have called the guilt-situation of freedom. Even though according to Catholic teaching human freedom was not destroyed by original sin, yet it was profoundly 'wounded' by it; hence, even though God's promise does not need to create it completely anew, it certainly does require his loving assistance. The injured freedom must (freely) accept this help and yet is not capable of this acceptance by its own power. Even for this it must be liberated by the 'prevenient grace' of the unsearchable decision of God who when he 'wants to show mercy does so, and when he wants to harden someone's heart does so' (Rm 9:18) but of whom we are bound to believe at the same time that 'he wants everyone to be saved' (1 Tm 2:4).

God has manifested this final, irrevocable decision to liberate freedom in his Son. Hence the history of the experience of freedom with God is – by his will, against which there is no appeal – salvation- and revelation-history; it is the experience achieved in Jesus Christ that God has given himself to the freedom of man as the absolute nearness and as the ground of the free acceptance of this nearness in what we call divinising grace. God has surrendered himself in his innermost divinity to the freedom which surrenders itself into the unforeseeable ways of God; God is not [196] merely the distant horizon towards which man projects his free self-understanding as to something always distant but He has become in absolute immediacy the space and 'object' of this exercise of freedom. This exercise of freedom made possible and elevated in Christ is that liberated freedom which St Paul proclaims as the 'freedom of the children of God', the real Christian freedom. The love of the Father which has been revealed in the Son (Jn 8:36) become flesh, the aletheia, makes us free (Jn 8:32), because where His pneuma is, there is freedom (2 Co 3:17). This freedom is a freedom from sin (Rm 6:18-23; Jn8:31-36), from the law (Rm 7:3 sq.; 8:2; Ga 2:4; 4:21-31; 5:1, 13) and from death (Rm 6:21 sq.; 8:21): from sin, in so far as sin is in a thousand different ways the free achievement of self-assertion in oneself and in the world without openness towards the love of God; from the law, in so far as the law, although it is the holy will of God, becomes the thorn of his own self-assertion against God or before God for the man without grace (whether this man be wounded or self-gloriously fulfilled in his work); from death, in so far as death is merely the phenomenality of guilt. Man makes this freedom which is and is given by Christ his own by the fact that, obedient to the call of this freedom (Ga 5:13), man subjects himself by faith (and its tangible sign which is baptism) to that happening which breaks open the prison of the world: the incarnation, death and resurrection of the Son.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It has also been revealed in this experience of freedom that man's no to God, as far as the whole history of human freedom is concerned, was permitted by God in His yes to His own self-communication to created freedom and that it remains embraced by this yes of God which remains victorious in the history of salvation as a whole. The freedom of man is liberated into immediacy to God's own freedom of being. It receives the power for its highest possible act, one which is rooted in its formal being but is not demanded by it. The freedom towards God and originating from God as the source and future of freedom, and the freedom that is seen as the dialogic capacity of love, is achieved in the highest imaginable form of these aspects: as the freedom which is taken up by God's self-communication in personal love and which accepts God himself so that the horizon and object of this love liberated for itself are identical.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[197]

14

GUILT - RESPONSIBILITY – PUNISHMENT WITHIN THE VIEW OF CATHOLIC THEOLOGY

The subject of this chain-lecture is 'Guilt – responsibility – punishment'. No one, however, will take umbrage at the theologian if he changes the sequence of these three themes and speaks about responsibility – guilt – punishment, for he unlike the jurist does not look at these themes from the point of view of the penal significance of his knowledge and judgements but from the point of view of the original nature of things. It is obvious, after all, that there can only be guilt in the theological sense where there is freedom and responsibility, no matter how obscure to begin with the notions of freedom and responsibility and hence also of guilt may be. Under these presuppositions, we would like first of all to make a few preliminary remarks on the method to be adopted in the theological treatment of this subject. The Catholic theologian will certainly include responsibility – guilt – punishment within the sphere of his questions and declarations even in the sense in which they enter into the realm of the life of the ordinary citizen, that of jurisprudence, that of ordinary inter-human relationships and that of the humanistic appreciation of man and his deeds. The Catholic theologian is of the opinion that the divine revelation which he tries to follow in his thought in no way merely makes statements about a realm of objects which lie absolutely beyond human experience but that it throws light and passes judgement on the concrete world in which man lives his concrete existence. Hence, Catholic theology basing itself on divine revelation – also claims the right, for instance, to make statements about historical events; it also claims this right with regard to those ultimate essential structures of man which would belong to his competence even [198] if there were no divine revelation and no vocation of man to a direct, 'supernatural' partnership by grace of the individual and God: essential structures from which we derive the so-called natural law which is the unchangeable moral norm for man. From this it is self-evident for Catholic theology that, out of its most proper source of knowledge and with its specific methods of knowledge, it also makes statements about responsibility, guilt and punishment even in the sense in which these notions are understood in the realm of ordinary life, and that it does not simply connect contents with these concepts which from the very start have nothing to do with the ordinary understanding of these particular concepts. Thus it is also understandable that even in every theological statement there is and must be presupposed a pre-theological, profane understanding of these provisional concepts. If we did not know at all by pre-theological knowledge what is meant by freedom, responsibility, guilt and punishment, it would also be completely impossible to have any theological understanding of these concepts. It is not a simple matter of revelation and its theological reflection simply constituting anew the ultimate, basic conceptual elements even of the language of revelation and of theology; rather, the language of revelation always picks up concepts already known in the ordinary sphere even though these concepts can also then be given a more profound, changed or new meaning by the fact that they are put in a new context. From what has been said it follows that, on the one hand, we must here presuppose a pre-theological understanding of the concepts to be dealt with and that, on the other hand, we must show what new and deeper content these concepts attain within the theology and its decisive statements and, finally, how from this starting-point theology clarifies and judges the profane use of these concepts by affirming them positively and also putting them critically into question. This closed circle of a pre-theological and general human understanding of these concepts, of a metamorphosis of these concepts by their being drawn into a theological context, and of a critical theological clarification of their profane use, must (as far as is possible here) determine all our reflections.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

II

We start with a theological reflection on the concept of responsibility. Responsibility, in the sense intended here and in the only sense in which it [199] can be the basis for the theological concept of guilt and punishment, presupposes freedom as the characteristic of acting being in general and as the property of that particular way of acting for which the acting being is supposed to be responsible. Whether a different concept of responsibility is possible in the nature of things or not – such as, for instance, in the administration of justice or under the presupposition of a psychological or theological determinism – need not concern us here. For Catholic theology, at any rate, responsibility and freedom are mutually clarifying concepts (at least terminologically), both of which appeal in the same way to the experience of the human subject in its actions. Hence, if we wish to know what is meant by responsibility in the theological sense, we must always, without having to try anxiously to keep the concept of freedom and responsibility strictly apart, look at the same time at the phenomenon of the experience of freedom and its theological interpretation.

From our introductory remarks it already appears that Catholic theology presupposes quite freely that we always already know what freedom and responsibility are even before theology starts to undertake the task of describing this pre-theological general human and profane knowledge about freedom and responsibility and to investigate the history of man's self interpretation in the history of the more precise understanding of these concepts. The understanding of these concepts in the history of man's self-interpretation has no doubt a long and variable history to which also belongs precisely the history of revelation and of Christian theology. Christian theology nevertheless presupposes a permanent nature in man which is preserved throughout the whole history of mankind even though it only becomes gradually conscious of itself in that history. It therefore presupposes also a permanent common knowledge about responsibility, even though this too has its own history. Otherwise, all men could not really be the subject and object of the one divine salvation on the part of one and the same God in Jesus Christ within one unified history of salvation. For this theological reason and not merely for lack of time it will perhaps be permissible here simply to presuppose this pre-theological knowledge about freedom and responsibility. In this connection it should merely be noted (without going into this more deeply here) that it is quite possible to presuppose in a Catholic theology that an authentic, even though provisional experience of freedom and responsibility which has not yet quite caught up with its true nature, [200] is quite conceivable and something which really occurs; this is an experience in which the reference of freedom and responsibility to God and his law – however much it must be implied – need not yet be the subject of explicit reflection; it is therefore perfectly possible in certain circumstances to have an atheistic ethics of freedom and moral responsibility and that this can, precisely in a Christian understanding, be the source of a genuine and original understanding of what is really meant by God and the divine law.

Thus we simply presuppose this pre-theological, ordinary human understanding of freedom and responsibility, and ask ourselves what new and deeper interpretation these concepts undergo when they are brought into a theological context. We will first of all try to determine very simply the theological locus of the interpretation of these concepts and will then ask ourselves what results from this for the deepened understanding of these concepts. As far as the theological locus – understood as the origin and horizon of the understanding of these concepts and of the reality meant by them – is concerned, we may perhaps put it quite simply

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

as follows: man disposes over the totality of his being and existence before God and this either towards Him or away from Him. Man does this in such a way that his temporal decisions determine the eternal finality of his existence either in absolute salvation or damnation: on account of his freedom, man is responsible for his eternal salvation or damnation. The meaning of this simple statement must now be unfolded so as to show what it involves for the nature of freedom and responsibility. Yet let it be stated in advance on this subject (since we will have to pass this over later on) that the experience of freedom and responsibility illuminated by revelation experiences and knows this freedom precisely as a gift of God's grace both in its basic condition and in its proper exercise. From the outset, therefore, it understands freedom as an autonomous self-possession of man before or even against God, but not in the sense that God's grace and mastery and the responsible exercise of freedom are realities encroaching on each other – in the sense, for instance, of a Pelagian synergism – as if they were realities of which the one could assert itself or grow only at the expense of the other. The divine freedom and mastery are experienced from the outset as the reason for the possibility of the creature's responsibility and freedom, so that both grow in equal and not in inverse proportion. Having stated this in advance, it must now be said what is meant more exactly by freedom considered as the whole [201] subject's capacity and necessity of being responsible itself with regard to final salvation and damnation before God. This is obviously what is meant by the Christian statement about man and his salvation and damnation if he must, and must be able as a free person, to answer for himself and the whole of his life before the divine judgement seat and if the eternally valid sentence concerning his final salvation or damnation is passed according to his works, on the part of a judge who does not regard the mere appearance of life, the 'face', but the freely disposable core of the person, the 'heart'. It is true that man's formal freedom of choice and decision is more presupposed than treated of as a proper subject in scripture. It is true also that the explicit subject of scripture, and especially of the New Testament, is to a great extent the paradox that man's freedom, while remaining responsible and without being destroyed, nevertheless falls under the slavery of the diabolical powers of sin and death and to some extent even of the law, and that freedom must first of all be freed by God's grace for its real task of loving God in an inner inclination towards the law. Yet, although all this is true, it cannot be doubted that for scripture, the sinful and the justified man are both responsible for their life's action before God and hence are also free . . . at least to the extent that the freedom of choice is a permanent constitutive element of human nature. Its true nature, however, is made to appear for the first time precisely in so far as in the view of Christian revelation this freedom of choice is the basis for salvation or damnation, and this finally and before God. For to a merely profane experience this freedom of choice may appear merely as the characteristic of the individual human act which is imputable to man only to the extent in which it is actively posited by man himself, without this being causally determined beforehand and in this sense forced by an inner condition of man or by an external situation preceding the active decision. Such a notion of freedom of choice distributes freedom in its exercise exclusively and in an atomising fashion over the individual acts of man which can thus be held together only by a neutral, substantial sameness of the subject positing them all and by life's external space of time. Freedom in this experience is, therefore, only the freedom of acts, the imputability of the individual act to a person who in principle remains neutral and hence can always determine himself anew (as long as the external conditions for this are still present). Yet, seen from a Christian point of view, the idea of responsible freedom changes greatly and becomes immensely deeper when it is seen that man can determine and decide about [202] himself as a whole by his freedom, and this with finality, and that he therefore posits acts which must not merely be qualified morally and then pass away again (being imputed to him thereafter only juridically or morally), but that he really and truly is so good or evil in the ground of his

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

reality itself that in this way his final salvation or damnation is already given (even though perhaps in a still hidden manner). Freedom is then seen to be first and foremost freedom of being. It is not merely an act which is sometimes posited in its exercise, but a transcendental characteristic of the being of man itself. If man is really to be able to decide finally about himself if therefore eternity is to be the act of his freedom itself, if this act is not to be able to draw something which remains good, contrary to its goodness, into a ruin which simply contradicts this permanently good reality, if therefore freedom is to be able to make man really good or evil in the very depth of his being, and if this being good or evil is not merely to be an external accidental condition of man . . . then freedom must first of all appear as freedom of being.[1] This means that man is that being who is concerned in the depths of his being about this being itself, the being which always has a relationship to itself, which is a subject and never merely a nature, which is always already a person, never simply there but always already personally existent. In this being nothing happens to him which does not touch his relationship to himself. His 'I' can never be jumped over, it can never be turned into a mere object, can never be replaced or explained by something else, not even by its own reflex representation of itself. It is authentically original, not based in its turn on something else, and hence also cannot be derived from something else or be justified in view of something else. Man, by his freedom of being, is always the incomparable who cannot be pigeon-holed in any system or completely subsumed under any idea. He is in an original sense the untouchable, and also the lonely and exposed individual, someone who is his own burden and who cannot 'absolve' himself by any device from this unique, lonely self-being. Freedom also, therefore, is not originally and primarily concerned merely with this or that which it can do or not do. Freedom of choice is not primarily the ability to choose any object whatsoever or to choose any particular attitude towards this or that; it is [203] the freedom of self-understanding, the possibility of saying yes or no to oneself, the possibility of deciding for or against oneself which is parallel to the knowing self-consciousness and the knowing subjectivity of man. Freedom never occurs merely as an objective exercise, as a choice 'between' individual objects, but as the self-achievement of the objectively choosing human being, and only within this freedom in which man is master over himself is he then 'free' also with regard to the material of his own self-realisation that is inescapably imposed on him. This self-realisation is an unavoidable task and, in spite of all the differences in the concrete material of this self-achievement, it is always a self-realisation towards God or a radical self-refusal with regard to God. The salvation or damnation that consists in the gain or loss of God posited in freedom (we will have to return to this more at length later on) must not be understood as a merely external reaction of a condemning or rewarding God but is itself seen to be already achieved in this freedom. Freedom is therefore capacity for wholeness; if it is itself to be able to effect salvation or damnation, i.e. the determination of the whole man, then it must of itself bring into play the whole man in his origin and future and this within the interplay of his relationships to himself the world and God. Freedom is always the self-fulfilment of the objectively choosing man in view of a total achievement, a total disposal of his existence before God. It must certainly be remembered for this that in many cases each envisaged total project of existence, one's own total self-understanding, the 'option fondamentale', remains empty and objectively unfulfilled. It must be remembered that not every individual act of freedom has the same actual depth and radical nature of self-disposition. It must be realised that, although every individual act of freedom intends to venture a total and final disposal of oneself each of them always surrenders itself into the

[1] The author gratefully uses here and in what follows the exposition of his good friend J. B. Metz, as found in: H. Fries, Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe I (Munich 1962), pp. 403-414 (article entitled 'Freiheit, theologisch'). Cf. now also 'Theology of Freedom' in this volume, pp. 178 sqq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

whole of the one and complete act of freedom of the one human, temporally finite life precisely because each of them is accomplished within the horizon of the whole of existence and receives its weight and proportion from this. Accordingly, the notion of the heart as conceived within the biblical and Augustinian mould, the notion of subjectivity in Kierkegaard, the notion of 'action' in Blondel, etc., all show understanding of the fact that there is such a basic act of freedom which embraces and moulds the whole of existence. This act does indeed realise itself and can only be achieved by means of the individual human acts which can be placed in space and time and can be objectified with regard to their motives, yet it cannot be simply identified [204] by objective reflection with such an individual act, nor does it represent the merely moral sum total of these individual acts, nor finally can it be simply identified with the moral quality of the last of these posited free individual acts. The concrete freedom of man in which he decides about himself as a whole before God by the realisation of his own finality before God is the unity in difference – which can no longer be reflected upon – of the 'option fondamentale' and the individual free acts of man, a unity which is the concrete being of the free subject which has fulfilled itself.

The subject of freedom is responsible because in freedom the subject as such, really itself and not just something belonging to it, is responsible to itself. It cannot exculpate itself by throwing the blame on something other than itself and God could be defined precisely as the one who can give freedom in this sense without thereby being the limitation of this freedom, as is the case with anything falling into the category of cause.

There is a still further peculiarity of-this responsible freedom in the theological sense to be brought out. It does indeed already arise directly out of the strict subjectivity of freedom, but it is also explicitly and objectively emphasised in the statements of revelation; we refer here to the impossibility of any ultimate objectification of freedom and of the concrete free decision. The total decision in which man finally disposes of the whole of his reality, i.e. posits this totality itself in its freely determined finality, is according to revelation subject to the sole judgement of God. Man does indeed mature in freedom, i.e. he brings his finality to maturity as a conscious subject, but he cannot once more objectify this result of freedom to himself, i.e. judge himself or others in their total quality before God. In so far as the Catholic dogma of faith declares that man in the state of pilgrimage is denied any absolutely certain judgement about his state of justification or his eternal salvation – and in so far as the Protestant teaching on justification also ultimately and on this point does not contradict this (in spite of all the controversies) since even for the Lutheran teaching on justification fiducial faith always remains subject to temptations – it is also stated by this that man cannot objectively and adequately reflect on his free decisions with absolute certitude. He knows in the act of his freedom who he is and wants to be in freedom but precisely this knowledge is about him himself and hence he cannot detach this knowledge from himself as something objectifiable and manipulable [205] and thus once more tell himself clearly what he declares himself to be in his freedom before God. This declaration which he is himself disappears, as it were, into the mysterium of God.

It must now be remembered, however, that for a Christian understanding this freedom is precisely the proper nature of freedom in general even where it is not seen in this systematic theological form; for there really is no peculiarly civil-profane freedom and, side by side with it, theological freedom before God but the latter signifies the true nature of the former. If this is correct, however, then it follows absolutely necessarily that a completely certain statement about the realisation of a man's freedom in a determined, spatio-temporal act is basically impossible. This does not indeed mean that freedom and responsibility are in no way matters which are found within the space of human experience and reflection and in the field of human inter-subjectivity. After all, we have already indicated that the concrete total self-disposal of the free subject over himself always takes place in a pre-given, particular category

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of material and that subjectivity is achieved in the realm of nature. It is equally clear that man, without prejudice to the impossibility of an adequate self-reflection, is always also the reflecting, self-objectifying being who puts himself under universally valid norms. It is a Catholic doctrine and, in view of the material ethics of the Bible, also a completely biblical doctrine that it is not merely possible to develop formal principles of the subjective exercise of freedom but also material, objective and universally valid norms for the right or wrong exercise of this subjective freedom in the categorised material of the nature of man and of his world. From this standpoint it is then, however, obvious that man not only has the power but also the duty to make a certain reflex and objective judgement about his own moral state, i.e. with regard to the fact and rightness or wrongness of his exercise of freedom, in a particular material act. This self-knowledge which one can communicate to oneself, and which one can examine critically and with regard to which one can come to a certain final conclusion, characterises precisely the property of the pilgrim existence of man in this life in which freedom is always still at work, and hence every examination is itself once more an act of freedom which has not been and cannot be adequately examined consciously. It is a real knowledge, it gives certitude, and one has the right and duty to take account of this self-knowledge, and ultimately also of the knowledge about others, in the calculations of one's life and of one's active decisions [206] and actions, since otherwise one cannot exist at all and the complete abstention from such judgements does not even avoid the risk of judging but would itself be once more a free, risky decision; yet, this judging, deciding, risking knowledge is not to be taken as final, absolutely certain and beyond appeal. In it man accepts himself in his own self-understanding and hands himself over – precisely as the one who understands himself in this or that way – to the mysterious judgement of God.

In this way, man's judgement about the existence and the quality of a free decision in his own case or that of others is, even in ordinary social life, accorded its full character by theology and thus not merely on account of a sceptical or careful psychology. Scripture and tradition presuppose that there is the possibility and necessity of such judgements. Man, if he wishes to live and act in a Christian manner, may not simply take refuge in that scepticism that is so easily aroused today psychologically which maintains that basically one knows nothing about the freedom and responsibility of a particular person in his particular actions. Otherwise, for example, the Church could only lay down general principles about good and evil in her internal ecclesiastical discipline but could not, for instance, put an ecclesiastical ban on the individual action of a particular person or give the individual person material and yet binding precepts for his conduct in the concrete. Yet, on the other hand, man must know in accordance with the same attitude of the Church that these judgements, which he cannot avoid and which have absolutely practical consequences for him, are provisional judgements subject to the final pronouncement by God, that they are risky judgements for the very person who passes them, so that the correct and false judgements of man, the exercise of and abstention from a judgement must once more be submitted to God's pronouncement of judgement. In view of their results one may apply the name of moral certitude, in contrast to metaphysical certitude or some other label, to these reflected and critical judgements. The fact remains that man is basically obliged to reach a reflex and knowing decision with regard to the existence and quality of his exercise of freedom and that nevertheless this decision itself, and not a sceptical abstention, is the expression of one's self-commitment to knowing freedom in God.

Before we apply what has been said about freedom and responsibility to the concept of guilt, we must finally make a further, additional remark [207] about the theological concept of freedom and responsibility. Even, and perhaps especially, the theological concept of freedom and responsibility is subject to an inner variability and gradation in freedom and responsibility. It is not only everyday life, psychology and jurisprudence that know about the different degrees of responsibility and freedom. Theology too knows it, and knows it from her own point of view. This is not self-evident. Such a conception finds its place quite easily, of course, in a purely formal psychological notion of freedom of choice: the sovereignty of the subject in his free decision about opening itself actively towards the motives trying to move him is determined by causes pre-existing the free decision. The number of thus offered possibilities for freedom is always finite, can be very limited and thus can so hem in freedom materially without destroying it formally that it becomes almost or even absolutely nil, since in a concrete case there may no longer be a plurality of motives among which one could choose. The problem of degrees of freedom and responsibility becomes much more difficult from the theological point of view. Freedom in the theological sense has, after all, shown itself precisely in its initial step as that surrender of the subject to itself by which it can decide about itself as a whole definitively for or against God. Given such an initial step, the notion of freedom seems really to be in indivisibili, and it seems to be impossible to have a 'more-or-less' with regard to freedom, since the subject either decides or does not decide about itself as a whole definitively and hence the concept of the totality and radicality of the subject's being affected by his free decision does belong to the nature of freedom. In fact, it will have to be said also in view of this basic theological starting-point (which remains completely unsystematic in Catholic moral theology) that the decision of freedom which takes place in the whole of a life, does not actually admit of degrees, that in it the subject has decided completely about himself and that the possibility of freedom which was imposed on the individual subject is really completely converted into this definitive decision. This does not imply (so as to meet at once a likely dogmatic objection against this thesis) that the manner and degree of perfection of each individual must be the same and equally great if these perfections are compared among themselves. Every man, if the thesis referred to is correct, does indeed use up and exhaust all the possibilities granted to his freedom. Since, however, the freedom of the creature is always the freedom of a subject predetermined in itself in its peculiar nature in view of these predetermined, finite and different realities for [208] different individuals, such a formal equality in the totality and radicality of every fulfilment of life does not signify equality of the result of the finality of the exercise of freedom since after all the predetermined, finite and differentiated material enters as a constitutive element into the finality of this result. Hence it will not be permissible to dispute this thesis of the formal equality of the intensity of everyone's total, free fulfilment of existence from the basic theological starting-point of freedom, especially since otherwise it would be impossible to make it comprehensible how by this freedom in time the whole man could be brought definitively to salvation or damnation if as a result of such a free decision there still remained open and unused possibilities in both directions. Theology does not prevent itself nevertheless by what has been said from gaining the insight into a gradation of freedom and responsibility as we know them from life, psychology and jurisprudence. Indeed, as has been said, it demands such a gradation by its own principles. First of all, there is no need to dispute, on account of the basic theological principle, the fact that the objective material offered to freedom by the inner dispositions of man and the external situation in which the personal decision of freedom, understood as self-mastery over oneself, realises and must realise itself, can be finite, variable and greater or less. This can, however, go so far that, for example, the material offered for a concrete free choice embraces only objects which are completely evil and forbidden according to the standards of objective morality. In such a case, we could at times no longer talk about freedom of choice and imputability according to the a posteriori criteria of everyday life and of psychology, although it could always still remain open whether there could not be a decision for or against God even with reference to such material. Furthermore, it must be noted that the characteristic of the total decision about the whole of life cannot be simply ascribed wholly and without reservation to the individual

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

act within this life, in so far as this act can and must be regarded as merely a part of the whole life and it is ultimately impossible for the subject to make an adequate judgement about its relationship to the one totality of the decision about life. Since, for theological reasons, an adequate and definitive self-estimate remains denied to the subject, it is impossible to unconditionally attribute the radicality and totality belonging to freedom in principle to the individual act taken as a merely partial quantitative factor of the whole of life, and this impossibility is not necessarily merely an external gnoseological moment but is an inner [209] moment of this act itself. It may be merely a partial moment of the whole, total decision about life in the form of a preparation for it or as a merely particular manifestation of the total decision which has already taken place in the depth of the free subject. In contrast to the usual conception in Protestant theology, Catholic theology emphasises that even where freedom is really given in a formal sense, the difference in the radicality and totality of free acts can be not merely gradual but so essential that two acts no longer coincide univocally with regard to their freedom, responsibility and disposal over the subject, but can merely be placed under one common analogous concept of a free act. Catholic theology is aware of the difference between mortal and venial sin. In the former, when it is really subjectively present, there is a real decision of the subject about his salvation before God, and to this extent it realises the proper theological nature of freedom (even though such an act has its finality only in the totality of the decision about life and from the 'option fondamentale'). In the latter, i.e. in venial sin, there is still indeed freedom in the formal sense of an active choice between two possibilities but this in such a way that a real self-disposal of the subject with regard to its goal and hence the totality of its existence does not take place. We cannot enter here into the theological reasons for this difference and into its ontological presuppositions in the nature of the spiritual-corporeal man. We simply wished to point out this distinction so that it will become clear that theology is also conscious of the essential gradation of freedom and responsibility for inner theological reasons.

III

What has been said about freedom and responsibility must now be applied to the concept of guilt.

Before doing this, however, it must at least be noted briefly that precisely for theological reasons and not merely for reasons taken from a metaphysics of freedom, the objectively and subjectively morally right action of freedom and the objectively and subjectively wrong and reprehensible free decision may not be regarded merely as two equal, co-existent species of realisation of simply one and the same nature of free action. The bad act of freedom does not merely fail to attain the object properly associated with it, viz. the good, what is proper to nature and [210] what is willed by the absolute will of God; it also fails to attain the most proper and innermost nature of freedom itself, since the morally evil realisation of freedom is also indeed a free but evil, unsuccessful realisation of freedom itself because God has not created freedom as the possibility of the creative positing by a subject of what is good and evil but as the possibility of creatively positing what is good; hence freedom fails also to attain itself, which indeed it 'can' do, when it is bad freedom. In addition there is the fact that in every space in which God has already freely decided on the victory of love and salvation, then – previous to any created freedom but without cancelling it out – the bad decision of freedom and human evil, in spite of and indeed within its simultaneously heightened radicality and dangerousness, is subject to a peculiar powerlessness which makes it once more impossible to regard the evil decision as an equal realisation of freedom and responsibility on the same plane as the free decision for good.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

With this reservation it must be said, however, that guilt regarded theologically is primarily and in its most proper essential ground the total and definitive decision of man against God, the self-understanding of the subject in the 'no' against his supporting ground and this vis-à-vis the horizon within which it is accomplished inescapably in 'yes' or 'no'; guilt in this sense is theological and metaphysical suicide but one which does not thereby allow the subject to escape from itself into nothingness. The Christian teaching about guilt considered as sin contains the possibility, which always existentially threatens man's existence, of such a radical self-denial in self-closure before God. That this is at all possible brings us to that mysterium iniquitatis which man can indeed experience in the depth of his conscience but from which he always runs away again by all the means of self-deception, displacement, excuses and by utilising the in themselves legitimate means of psychology wherever he does not allow himself to face up to this most impossible possibility of his existence by the testimony of revelation. Of course, this capacity, this possibility of denying sin and guilt understood in this way, has its reason once more in the fact that man simply cannot always and everywhere bring the totality of his existence under the control of freedom in the concrete partial exercise of his spatially and temporally extended existence and that he is thus capable of real sin before God in the full sense. Since he cannot in principle attain an adequate objectifying judgement about his own decision of freedom – since he cannot really judge himself – he also [211] does not even have the last word about his own guilt, and precisely this constitution gives him – from a theological point of view – the last, never surpassable possibility of doubting or denying the realisation of something like guilt in man. In addition, there is the fact that, in the sphere of the eschatologically victorious grace of God in Christ, guilt can only in truth be experienced as an already disarmed guilt even though it must be left an open question as to whether the freedom of the individual does not intend to remain in that empty helplessness of guilt which attaches to it since the time of Christ and which constitutes both its ultimate disorder and its ultimate horror. There can be and there is in fact guilt in the just mentioned theological sense according to the testimony of revelation in history even though we should be permitted to hope that such guilt will be eventually overcome in all men.

This theological nature of sin is realised – if it is realised at all – in those shapes and forms which we usually qualify as guilt even in the ordinary everyday sense. This brings us to the question about the more exact relationship between guilt in the theological sense and guilt in an ordinary sense. First of all, it must be repeated once more that in spite of its all-embracing character and in spite of the impossibility of localising it at any particular point of existence in space and time, the absolute definitive 'no' of the whole of existence towards God takes place for reflex consciousness in perfectly determined, concrete acts of life. Sin takes place in sins. Sin does not take place in a merely transcendental interiority of a noumenal subject but in the works of the flesh which are obvious and tangible: in fornication, indecency, debauchery, idolatry, sorcery, feuds, wrangling, jealousy, bad temper, quarrels, disagreements, factions, envy, drunkenness, orgies (Ga 5:19-21): in actions which, as St Paul says, exclude from the inheritance of the basileia. All this is, at least to begin with, quite understandable: man as spirit is not an abstract subject but an embodied, historical spirit who achieves his transcendence precisely by means of the material of the world, of its bodily corporeality and history, and this in such a way that, as is shown by the Christian doctrine of the eternal value of the 'flesh', this material is not merely (as, for instance, in Hofmannsthal's 'Jedermann') the always external opportunity for proving a formally good will, but itself enters as an intrinsic constitutive factor into the permanent validity of this free act of the subject. If, however, the relationship between guilt in the theological and in the ordinary sense is [212] to be defined exactly, it must not be overlooked that it is not given to man to pass any ultimate judgement about guilt before God in the form of a reflected objective

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

statement either in his own case or in that of others. Hence it is impossible, even from the objective material, the spatio-temporal tangibility and the objective quality of human action, to get any clear idea for such a definitive judgement about such a really existing guilt before God. This means that in principle an action may be objectively bad and yet may not be a realisation of guilt in the theological sense, and that someone may realise his 'no' against God in a form which from the point of view of an objective impersonal ethics gives rather the impression of being the fulfilment of a divine commandment. We cannot avoid this basic and ultimate ambiguity of all concrete actions of a man with regard to the question of the presence or absence of guilt by taking refuge in the classic distinction between intention and external acts (achievement). This distinction certainly exists, as is shown even by ordinary everyday experience in which a good intention is often carried out by objectively wrong means or, vice versa, a bad intention unintentionally achieves something objectively good. The intention, however, in so far as it is said to be identical with the real total being of man before God and hence, when bad, is supposed to signify real guilt, cannot be adequately objectified by objective reflection, and all in it that is really applicable for an objectifying judgement is precisely the 'external' action; this presupposes, of course, that one understands by 'external' (as one must, metaphysically speaking) everything and anything basically accessible to an objectively working reflection or science, so that even the 'inner' but conscious motivation, etc., also belongs to this external action, since even all these elements still lie within that indissoluble unity of the subject and its decision which cannot, be adequately reflected on. To this extent is it possible to speak in an ordinary, expressible and demonstrable sense of guilt but only in that provisional open sense in which man can and should have a reflex objective knowledge of his free decisions and active responsibility. This knowledge about guilt and responsibility in the ordinary sense cannot, on the one hand, bypass an ultimate relation to guilt in the theological sense as something completely irrelevant for its own understanding, since even freedom and responsibility in an ordinary (and in any designable genuine sense) is impossible without some reference to transcendence, real subjectivity and hence reference to God (no matter what one may call this transcendence and its final point of reference). On the other hand, [213] however, this ordinary knowledge about guilt is naturally dependent on criteria which are not of a directly theological kind and it is interested in factors of this freedom, responsibility and guilt which are of an intramundane character; in the case of judging the free action of someone else, this ordinary knowledge about guilt is even more difficult and problematical with regard to the certitude and clarity of such a judgement than where a subject reflects on his own freedom, responsibility and guilt, and hence one requires also much stricter standards than for judgements about oneself if one is to draw any practical conclusions for such a judgement about others.

It cannot be the task of a theologian here to develop the principles according to which practical life, e.g. juridical practice, judges the question of imputability or non-imputability. It can and must be said, however, from a properly theological standpoint, that even for theological reasons (since man could not otherwise be a subject who decides about his salvation at all) the existence of a formal freedom must basically be presumed until the contrary is proved, even though such a presumption must be employed most carefully as soon as it is a question of seeing this basically existing freedom of being of a subject realised in a particular individual act and thus of also recognising guilt in an individual act, even if this is only in the merely provisional sense and does not anticipate God's judgement which alone makes such a judgement even possible. Even for psychological, 'internal' reasons, the concrete act may be in no sense or only in an essentially diminished sense a realisation of basic freedom and it may be that the imposed choice of material possibilities for freedom was already so limited that the act which must be qualified as objectively bad is no free act at all

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in an ordinary sense because this objectivity which alone is of ordinary interest and which in the particular case was an offence against the intramundane and civil order was in the concrete the only possibility of acting open to the subject. On the other hand, theology will always have to remind the person, who necessarily and rightly judges in the ordinary sense, that it is true even in the secular sphere that no matter how conscientiously a sentence may be passed, it will necessarily bear that ultimate uncertainty which necessarily attaches, and this for theological reasons, to the theological sentence of guilt imposed on man, since ultimately the material presupposition for guilt is the same in both sentences; after all, proper freedom even in the secular sphere is freedom precisely by reason of the transcendence by which man disposes over [214] himself as a whole before God for salvation or damnation. No matter how much ordinary life must judge, the words of the Sermon on the Mount are paradoxically addressed to it also: 'Judge not, that you may not be judged.'

For lack of time, we simply refer the reader back to the more general descriptions of freedom and responsibility for what should be said further about guilt from a theological point of view.

IV

We now come to the notion of punishment. This notion is, of course, very important even in theology, a theology which cannot give up the idea of God as the founder and guardian of the moral order, the sanction of the moral order, forgiveness, damnation, etc., and hence also the concept of punishment for the freely culpable offence against the divine law. Yet it must also be admitted that the concept of punishment in theology has still to be thought through very much more exactly. For when it comes to the theological concept, the model of punishment in its secular and juridical uses always pushes itself too quickly and automatically into the foreground; God's punishment is understood too hastily and univocally in the sense of the punishment imposed on offenders against the civil order by civil, secular society. Once this happens, ironically, the content and validity of the secular concept of punishment is – quite unintentionally – given inversely that sovereignty and religious absoluteness which basically pertain only to punishment in the theological sense. To see what is really meant by this methodological difficulty, we need only reflect on a factor which necessarily belongs to punishment in the civil and secular sense, and to ask ourselves whether this factor also pertains to punishment in the properly theological sense, to the divine punitive sanction for the definitive 'no' of man against God. It is characteristic of punishment in the secular sphere that it does not result directly from the nature of human guilt itself but is imposed from without on the lawbreaker by a new and proper act and decision of the other, i.e. the civil society of the State, and that therefore guilt and punishment are not merely formally but also materially and really distinct from each other. Yet it can now at least be asked seriously on the theological plane whether what is meant theologically by divine punishment, damnation, etc., must really [215] necessarily be conceived of as an external, additional punishment or whether this can be doubted without injury to the Christian dogma. We think that the latter is quite possible.

Three points must be remembered in this connection. Firstly, personal freedom of its own nature means to be and under certain presuppositions also is a definitive decision of an irrevocable kind – that, in other words, the obduracy of the sinner must be conceived, with Thomas Aquinas, as an inner moment of the reprobate's own free decision and not properly speaking as the moment of his punishment as such. Secondly, a man's free decision takes effect, and must take effect, in dimensions and strata which, on the one hand, really belong to man and yet, on the other hand, are not simply identical with the subject of freedom in its

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

subjective origin and thus can still assert themselves as consequences of true guilt in the whole man even when the free decision as such has been revised. Thirdly, on account of the continuing mundaneness and corporeality of man, the subjective decision which enters into the whole reality of man always and necessarily encounters the obstacle of the objective structure of these media of personal decision and hence necessarily creates suffering for itself. If we keep these three points in mind, then there will no longer theologically speaking be any insurmountable obstacles to the thesis maintaining that all divine punishment is a connatural consequence of guilt flowing from the proper nature of guilt and need not be specially added by God: and that therefore God is the punisher of sin by having created the objective structures of man and of the world. It is impossible for us here either to describe this thesis more in detail or to defend each part of it or to prove its reconcilability with certain particular propositions of the traditional and binding Christian dogmatics. The thesis itself, however, had to be stated here because, if it is correct, it will be seen that the characteristic of human punishment in the civil field precisely must not and cannot appeal to the parallel of divine punishment but that its justification – which ought to be absolutely indisputable – must be made theologically credible from some other source. One cannot, to put it in ordinary words, tacitly or explicitly think that prisons and death sentences must be justified simply because a hell or other divine judgements exist. The characteristic of human punishments consists precisely in the fact that the evil, which punishment is and must be if it is to be true punishment at all, does not flow connaturally and simply of itself from the evil of guilt but that the person who punishes adds the evil of punishment [216] to the evil of guilt and that one can therefore ask how one can overcome one evil by creating another. It will be seen, therefore, that the moral justification and the moral boundaries of civil punishment must be derived from elsewhere. This means also that from a Christian and theological point of view one must take care not to ascribe a properly retributive character to human punishment simply because this is certainly one of the characteristics of divine punishment. The vindictive character of divine punishment is simply objectified and given in the indestructibility of the concrete nature of man and of the world, in their absolute validity (at least in the spiritual subject), so that what we intend here is already given when we say that the dignity and sovereignty of the moral law in itself and as such already demands punishment for the one who dares to offend against this law. Human punishment, however, precisely has not got this vindictive character arising out of the nature of the clash between reality and guilt. If it is to be attributed to it, nevertheless, then this would at least have to be proved on its own and based on objectively different reasons. In the concrete, the Christian will therefore also be quite justified in saying that the meaning, purpose and limits of punishment in civil society are derived from the right and duty of civil society to maintain the objective order of society: in other words, that the moral fault of a man is to be punished only when and in the measure that it is a question of the defence of the common good. At least in practice, punishment in the civil order must be regarded – even from the viewpoint of these theological reflections – as a self-defence of society against the encroachments of the individual and thus can and ought to confine itself to this self-defence even though such self-defence against someone in whose case subjective guilt can be presupposed with sufficient moral certitude takes other forms and has wider limits than merely that of self – defence against someone who without subjective guilt offends against the objective goods of society. This also makes it comprehensible why we cannot demand too absolute a certitude in the case of civil punishment with regard to the presence of guilt. For if an, as it were, collective scrupulosity were to bring it about that the safeguarding purpose of punishment which is always and even of its very nature prophylactic were no longer attained, then this would destroy the very meaning and purpose of punishment in the civil order. A certain sober calculation of they risk involved with regard to the ‘justice’ of the punishment is perfectly

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

permissible since without it the secular purpose of punishment cannot [217] be attained at all and since an absolute certitude about the subjective guilt in the proper, which means also theological, sense is unattainable for man. The time available is too short to treat of the question as to what conclusions might be drawn from these general reflections regarding the problem of the death penalty.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[218]

15

JUSTIFIED AND SINNER AT THE SAME TIME

In the Church, and indeed in Christianity, everyone must learn from everyone else; everyone testifies to the gift of grace which has been granted to him, to the Christian experience which he has, so that the spirit and heart of others may be enlarged in order to experience the riches of grace more deeply and fully. There is, therefore, not merely an ecumenical dialogue in the field of dogmatic theology, of the constitutional life and practical activity, but also in the field of the spiritual life. Indeed, it should be there above all. In this field, in the original Christian experience, there seems to be – beyond all merely external critical positions which have given and still give occasion for division – the vital point for the separation and also the possibility of an encounter which would prepare for the unification of Christendom. Only if we understand one another in the direct exercise of Christian existence itself is there any hope that the reflex expressions of this exercise, i.e. the dogmatic theologies, may be brought to coincide in unity.

One of the basic religious experiences is undoubtedly the experience that we are sinners but that we may also at the same time console ourselves about being justified before God in Christ. Whether we Catholic and Protestant Christians understand one another on this point is a question on which depends the richness of the Christian experience of grace in our mutual communication and learning as well as the possibility of our ecumenical dialogue. It must indeed be admitted and this has been expressed in sober honesty most recently, especially on the Protestant side, that man today is no longer terribly bothered about the question as to how from being a sinner – which he does not think he is in the first place – he becomes someone justified before God and finds a merciful God. Yet if the man of today suffers rather from the agony of existence, its darkness and worthlessness than from guilt, and if he tends to ask how [219] God justifies this situation in the face of agonised man rather than to ask how he can go on existing before God, this sums up precisely what is a common concern of all Christian denominations: for all Christians have to confess that man is a sinner and is justified by God's grace alone. All Christians have therefore the task of asking themselves how they can fulfil this fundamental task vis-à-vis the spirit of this age. The old inter-Christian controversy about the nature of justification and of the state of being justified before God is indeed given a new angle through this, viz. the angle of the search for the right way of proclaiming this in the present age (which is no longer that of the Reformation and Counter-Reformation); yet it is not thereby outdated or without importance. Also there are still sufficient Catholic and Protestant Christians for whom the question about the nature of justification is absolutely central, even prescinding from how the answer to this question can be proclaimed in a way which will do justice to the present age. There seems to be a mutual dependence between both these points of view from which this question can be looked at, so that one must perhaps say: only if the separated Christians can make the 'pagans' of today understand that the problem is not how God can exist before man but how man can exist before God and through God alone, will Christians then also understand each other in this question of justification. And, vice versa: only if Christians agree on this question, will they also find the right way to give a convincing witness of their experience of justification in the face of the spirit of their age.

What the Reformation formula about the experience of justification can tell us Catholic Christians is a genuine question for our spiritual life and not only for our theology.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

I. THE REFORMATION FORMULA

Reformed Christianity was, in the deepest and most radical sense, a Christianity of the frightened conscience of the sinner before God. It believed – quite rightly – that one can become and be a Christian only if one capitulates radically before God. When man begins to realise the infinite sanctity and justice of God, then he becomes most profoundly the frightened sinner. He cannot be saved of himself and by his own power. Grace, justification and salvation arise from God's mercy alone. Man is always and everywhere dependent on this justifying mercy of God. This [220] is the correct starting-point for the Protestant formula: 'simul justus et peccator'. This man of the Reformation always stands and continues to stand as a sinner vis-à-vis God. If he looks at himself, his dispositions and works, then always lie can only tremble before the infinite judging holiness of God, since he falls infinitely short of God's total demand and always experiences himself again as a sinner. He does indeed hear of God's grace in the message of the gospel: in the doctrine of baptism and justification by faith. He has been justified by God in spite of his sinful condition, he has been saved by Christ's redemption and has been made a sanctified and well beloved child of God. Yet when man looks at himself again, he recognises himself always and permanently as a sinner. When he hears the absolving word of God and believes in it, when he accepts justification by grace, he knows himself to be justified, although not by his own deed but by the unfathomable and unmeritable grace of God. Thus he reaches the conviction that the ultimate and most basic Christian experience consists precisely in this fact that he is at the same time a sinner and justified before God. He does not baulk at this paradox. He thinks that only this twofold statement about man can really express the true Christian understanding of man. The sinner who remains a sinner before God down to the last fibre of his conscience, stands startled before God because he does not consider himself to be of any worth at all, does not place any trust in himself and finds nothing good in himself which he could maintain before God and by which he could protect himself before God. Yet, in an immense venture of faith and hope, and in an unlimited trust in the message of God, he knows that he is justified.

Reformation Christianity says that treason is committed against the real Christian understanding of man whenever any attempt is made to soften this paradox. Man always comes from himself as a sinner to God. If he looks at what he is of himself, then he will see himself as a sinner completely at the mercy of God's judgement. Of himself he cannot bring any claim before God on the basis of which he could be saved by God. Out of this abyss of an almost hellish despair and in pure faith in the grace of God, trusting in nothing else, man knows that he has been saved.

In the course of the history of Reformed Christianity, the elemental power of this experience was able to weaken. The radical consciousness of being a sinner over and over again fell into the danger of disappearing. Man in his humanistic mollification felt himself to be a being who takes [221] it for granted that he lives under the sky of a loving Father. Again and again, however, Reformed Christianity awakened to the consciousness that the essence of Christianity and of Christian existence consists in the paradox of this formula: 'Justified and sinner at the same time'. Only where the radical experience of permanent sinfulness is combined with the consciousness given by faith of being nevertheless someone justified by the saving deed of God, is one a Christian, in the faith in this alone, i.e. in an ever new leap away from oneself, in an ever new capitulating admission of being a sinner.

It should be noted that we have intentionally taken some trouble to understand the Reformation formula and have tried to avoid simply registering a formal logical and very easy Catholic protest against this formula. We have intentionally avoided characterising

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

justification by God as something merely extrinsic, 'forensic', as a pure 'as if'. This we have done because all these subsequent theological interpretations, both on the Catholic and on the Protestant side, can only obscure the original starting-point of this formula.

II. THE CATHOLIC REJECTION OF THE REFORMATION FORMULA 'Simul justus et peccator'

In what then does the Catholic 'no' to this formula consist?

(a) Justification as an event of salvation-history creates something new which cannot exist 'simultaneously' with the old state. Salvation-history is a really genuine history, not only as total history in the order of objective salvation but also as the individual history of salvation. This means: something happens and takes place here which is now but was not before. Since this history is an action of God on man, it knows real caesuras, revolutions, genuine new creations. It becomes something by the power of God which once did not exist in this man. 'See, I make all things new'; 'See, a new creation'; 'The old is past, the new has come to pass'; 'You were dead and are now created anew in Jesus Christ.' Even in the history of the individual it is therefore a question of genuine saving events and not only of an ever growing consciousness of something always remaining the same and always true, even though it remains true that this becoming conscious, made possible and supported by God's grace, is a moment in this history and not just a moment of coming to know which remains external to it. Hence Catholic theology must emphasise that [222] everything does not always exist in its fullness at the same time but rather that something new enters in which may not be placed under a permanent 'at the same time'; a simultaneity in which a permanent dialectical relationship between equally necessary existentials of human existence would be revealed.

(b) Since justification is decisive1y God's deed, the reality of justification and the experience of justification do not necessarily coincide. According to Catholic teaching, God's deed is the decisive factor in justification and not the deed, the experience or the faith of man. The question, therefore, about the sense in which man is justified before God, cannot be judged solely from the point of view as to how and to what extent the divine deed is experienced by man. Experience of faith in the everyday sense of the word 'experience' (if we prescind, therefore, from an 'experience' – which may exist – in which man experiences precisely his inclusion in the unreflectable depths of the mystery of God) and reality of faith do not coincide and this precisely because God's own power alone is the really effective and decisive factor in the justification of man. For Catholic theology and the Church's magisterium, therefore, the declaration as to what actually happens in justification cannot be made simply from the experience of justification alone. The experience of justification and of faith, in so far as it is given in propositions for the experienced man himself and for others, can never catch up with the whole depth and radicality of the divine saving deed exercised in man, once we presuppose that God's deed effects the reality of justification. So as to give God's grace and power the glory, the Catholic doctrine of justification will always emphasise that we become and are God's children through God's grace, that in justification the Holy Spirit is given to us, that we are the temple of God, sons, anointed and beloved of God through God's grace. This reality is not merely an ideological fiction, not merely an 'as if', but the true reality of man himself. Justification, understood as God's deed, transforms man down to the deepest roots of his being; it transfigures and divinises him. For this very reason the justified man is not 'at the same time justified and a sinner'. He is not simply, in a merely paradoxical and dialectical suspense, sinner and justified at the same time. By justification, from being the sinner he was, he becomes in truth a justified man which he was not before. He ceases in a true sense to be a sinner. The Catholic doctrine of justification believes that only in this way does it do justice to the real historicity of the event of salvation, [223] to the real primacy of God's deed in man, to the difference between the experience of salvation and the reality of salvation, and to the intrinsic veracity and validity of God's action on and assurance to man which grasps man interiorly and changes him. On this basis, the Catholic and anti-reformation attitude and teaching at the Council of Trent rejected the formula 'simul justus et peccator' because this formula with its simultaneity of justification and sinfulness fails to understand the real nature of Christian justification. At the very least, the real becoming, the becoming new, the inner justification by God's act on man does not become sufficiently clear in this formula. This is one aspect of the Catholic position with regard to this formula.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Catholic theology, therefore, rejects the formula 'just and sinner at the same time' because it does not render the state of man in an objectively correct and adequate manner. The ultimate, basic formula of human existence is not a suspended dialectic between sinfulness and holiness. Man has really crossed the boundary of death. In the ultimate view, in view of God's action which has become effective in him, man is no longer sinful and justified at the same time, but justified and nothing else.

III. THE PROPERLY UNDERSTOOD CATHOLIC 'YES' TO THE FORMULA 'Simul justus et peccator'

The rejection of the Reformation formula is a basic one in so far as it has to describe that 'in itself' and that 'objectivity' which is effected by God himself and on which we must and may rely more than on our own 'subjectivity'. Even our true 'subjectivity', when it achieves its ultimate being, is the letting-oneself-go towards a reality which we can no longer survey or administer and which we do not appropriate to ourselves but to which we become appropriated as to the mystery of God himself. If justification has really taken place, then this man is no longer a sinner but the justified and sanctified man.

(a) Uncertainty of salvation

Can the individual, however, maintain with absolute certainty about himself that he is really someone justified and that, precisely because he is this, he is no longer a sinner? According to the teaching of the Council of Trent there is no absolute individual certitude about salvation. Let us [224] not misunderstand this teaching of the Council of Trent. It does not say that man must live in a trembling, cowardly fear about his salvation, a fear which mistrusts God himself. Rather it means that man must look away from himself towards God's unspeakable grace. He should trust that, in the midst of the experience of his inner weakness and poverty, he always is nevertheless in all truth the much loved child of God borne by the grace and mercy of God. He must possess the joy, the confidence and the all-conquering hope of the saved. It is a great sacred duty to leap over his own continuously experienced wretchedness by the virtue which we call Christian hope and to trust in God's unfathomable mercy. Man cannot indeed qualify, in any objectified way such as is possible for dogmatic faith, the reality expressed in the statement: I am clearly and certainly justified. He must not take up the attitude of someone who takes possession of himself absolutely, who examines himself through and through, who draws up the complete account of his own existence and is perfectly sure of himself. He must not have this attitude, but this does not mean that he should and indeed may be cowardly, restless, fearful and distrustful towards God. On the contrary, he must really deliver himself up to God with a firm hope, and this by passing over everything he experiences about himself and of himself, precisely because, in spite of the experience of his own uncertainty about salvation, he must trust in God with complete

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

generosity and as a foregone conclusion. This courageous and unconditional hope imposed on him demands precisely that he must not twist the attitude of complete confidence in God's grace into a theoretically reflected certitude of salvation. This precisely would make him again independent of God, and, on account of the certitude of its expression, would dispense him again from this complete confidence in God. Since, however, man cannot attain absolute certitude about his own salvation of a believable, theoretical and objective kind in the act of hope, it follows that even for this reason he always knows himself to be a sinner. It follows from the impossibility of an absolute, radical self-assurance that he always experiences himself again as a sinner, as someone threatened and unsure, and that he may not push this experience to one side as something of no account and theologically irrelevant, but merely in the hope in which he takes the leap away from himself towards God must he overcome it and by this very fact always accept it again. Even though Catholic theology cannot accept the abstract ontological and objective formula of 'simul justus et peccator', this formula [225] is nevertheless justifiable if it is understood as the expression of the experience of the individual person. Even though he must and may hope with all firmness that he is personally justified before God, he must at the same time fear, in spite of and within this hope, that he is a sinner.

(b) The sinfulness of man through 'venial' sins.

Since the time and in the words of St Augustine, the Church emphasises 'not merely humbly', 'but in all truth', that man is and remains a sinner. This teaching also has not been cancelled out by the Council of Trent's declaration that in a certain sense the formula 'simul justus et peccator' is not right. Yet how can the justified be and remain a sinner if he remains at the same time in the state and attitude of the justified? Every Catholic will answer this by saying that, even while remaining someone justified, he keeps on committing 'venial sins' and hence must always fly again as a sinner to the forgiving grace of God.

The Catechism and theology state that the justified who commits sins remains in the state of sanctifying grace as long as he does not sin mortally in an objective and subjective sense. Although this statement is perfectly correct, it must be understood very discreetly. It is in fact much less simple than would appear to the average Catholic consciousness. Certainly, many think, one is always still a sinner to some extent. One commits one's daily faults, omissions, the small offences against God's law and will. For this reason one must acknowledge oneself to be a poor sinner. Yet such an understanding of the doctrine of the distinction between mortal and venial sin and the reconcilability of the state of grace with venial sins and venially sinful attitudes surely essentially underestimates the real depth, threatened condition and darkness of Christian existence.

According to Catholic teaching, there is really a both objectively and subjectively radical difference between mortal and venial sin. In biblical terms, there are sins in the existence of the justified, the beloved child of God, which do not destroy this child relationship; there are also, however, sins which – if they are really committed with the necessary clear knowledge, consent and responsibility – exclude from the kingdom of God, as St Paul says, and from the inheritance of heaven and make man a child of the wrath of God, as long as lie obstinately remains in this state of sin. Yet, however justified this doctrine of the objective distinction between mortal and venial is, we must not abuse it to turn Christian existence into something completely harmless. We say far too easily that venial sin does not [226] destroy grace, that it does not annul justification and does not condemn and damn man. After all, these are only moral weaknesses, little shadows over our relationship to God, small imperfections which do not change the real basic attitude of man to God. In so far as it is really only a question of venial sins, it is possible to say this, even though only with very serious reservations. But do we know exactly that our supposedly merely venial sins are really just venial sins? Naturally one can say that certain happenings in our life, regarded simply in themselves and measured by objective norms, are really only venial sins, as for instance some unfriendliness towards our neighbour, a lack of devotion in our prayers, a little impatience; these are undoubtedly things which can indeed weigh upon Christian existence but which on the other hand may not and cannot rob us of the joy of being redeemed, of the grace of being safe in God and of our sanctification by the Holy Spirit. Lapses of everyday life are certainly in this sense objectively venial sins.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It cannot be denied, however, that it is a onesidedness in Catholic moral theology and confessional practice to regard each of the individual events of our moral activity on their own, almost in an atomised fashion. We often overlook in this way the total structure of our moral position, our ultimate attitude towards God, and our basic religious condition. Man does not posit individual acts on the basis of the substantiality of a soul of a purely objective kind, individual acts which he strings up on the thread of external time, but rather the one whole man lives out of a basic outlook which is either directed towards God or is turned away from Him. This ultimate, decisive and all-informing basic outlook is, nevertheless, not at all so easily open to man's reflection. Indeed, it simply cannot be adequately reflected on, since otherwise it would be possible to have that reflected theoretical certitude of salvation which according to the Council of Trent is denied to the Christian. We can look at the individual acts of our life but we cannot throw a glance directly on the ultimate source of these acts in our heart. Seen in this light, the question about venial sins takes on quite a different seriousness than we are perhaps inclined to think. Could not this or that apparently harmless unkindness towards our neighbour, when regarded in itself, be deep down merely the distant echo and summer lightning of an ultimate and basic egoism which in the end is really mortal? Could not such an attitude of egoism which perhaps does not express itself at all in any externally very ugly deeds which would be very objectionable even according to a civil moral code, be exactly [227] what we call a mortal sin? Could it not be that the coolness of our religious life, this easy and apparently harmless indifference towards God, although it does not really manifest itself in clear acts and activities, arises nevertheless from an ultimate, free, terrible, mortal indifference and coldness towards God? And this is after all quite different from a venial sin. It certainly does not mean an individual action associated with a determined point in the time and space of our life. May it not, however, signify an ultimate lost condition, an ultimate and basic 'no' to God? And this would be precisely what we in fact call a state of mortal sin. In this way we could point out still other things which in appearance are merely so-called venial sins but which in reality are the concealed and dissimulated signs of the ultimate, mortal turning away of man from God which man does not admit to himself and which he has exercised as it were anonymously and with the left hand and yet has done in the depth of his freedom. Since, however, we always go on commiting venial sins, must we not then be frightened and ask whether we are not sinners in a far deeper and more radical sense, i.e. men who in the depth of their heart do not want to have anything to do with God, even though externally and in a thin bourgeois sense they still want to be pious and decent people who 'keep their plate clean'? This would put quite a different face on the doctrine that every man is a sinner at least in so far as he commits venial sins. On the other hand, this does not mean that we must think of ourselves as lost, as excluded from the kingdom of God and deserted by the Spirit of consolation, even though we trust in God's grace with an honest heart and always turn again to God. The conception that we are sinners takes on a new appearance only in the sense that we must ask ourselves fearfully whether we who hope to be God's beloved children must not always also fear again that we may be something quite different, as long as the basic roots of our heart continue to bring forth fruit which is not really the fruit of the Spirit.

Thus the teaching of the permanent sinfulness of man by venial sins represents a continuous question for us as to what we really are deep down. We must always answer this question in a positive sense, placing our hope in the grace of God but we can never do this proudly and self-assuredly with a theoretical certitude of salvation.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Hence we must somehow pass beyond the distinction between mortal and venial sin, however much it is materially and objectively correct, since it cannot be carried through completely in concrete reflection on [228] our own existence. On the one hand, we are in fact sinners who hope always to be allowed to escape again out of their sinfulness into the mercy of God. On the other hand, there is justice, and if it is really in us through God's grace, it is always also threatened and tempted and hidden from us.

The doctrine of permanent, habitual justice through infused sanctifying grace must not be understood as if this justice were a purely static possession or static quality in man. Rather, this justice is always tempted and threatened by the flesh, the world and the devil. It is always dependent again on the free decision of man. In spite of its character of a state it is suspended, as it were, on the point of the free grace of God and on the point of man's freedom. The grace of justification must always be accepted and exercised anew again, since basically it is always given anew again by God. This permanent condition of grace is always exposed to the freedom of man. The freedom of man in its turn can accept and preserve God's grace only in and through the free grace of God which God has granted and must grant to us ultimately without any merit whatsoever on our part. Since our justice is always under attack, it must always be given to us anew by God's favour and grace. It is therefore also the ultimately indisposable justice. Certainly we believe in God's salvific will . . . but this salvific will, when referred to and having become effective in each of us, is the immense and incomprehensible miracle of God's absolute favour. Man's free 'yes' to God's liberating grace is itself once more a gift of God's grace. Thus we must declare our own freedom to be once more a grace of God, a freedom which is not only a capacity for acting in a salvific way but also an act which really opens itself towards God. Of ourselves alone we cannot do anything at all which could make God direct his grace towards us, for our prayer for grace is based on unasked for grace which must give us both the power to pray and the act of praying itself. God must always anticipate us with his grace. Even when we think we are doing, and actually do, the most personal and original things, we experience precisely in this the earlier and more powerful deed of God in us. Of ourselves we are always sinners. Of ourselves we would always turn away from God if God's grace did not anticipate us. In view of the completely uncontrollable grace of God, of tempted justice, uncontrollable justice, we are always sinners. In this sense, it is possible to find an always true and decisively important Catholic sense in the formula 'Just and sinner at the same time'.

[229] (c) Man the pilgrim is just and sinner at the same time

Even when justified, man remains a pilgrim. As such he has not only an external space of time to live through, but he is 'on the road'. In his personal history of salvation lie is in search of something permanent, indestructible and final. We are on pilgrimage in the faith. We possess God only on the ground of hope. We reach out in hope for what is to come, that which is not yet given to us. Thus possession is given by hope, and by this same hope possession is also withdrawn from the free direct grasp of man. By our free personal history we must first catch up with what by God's deed which justifies us we already are. We are pilgrims in faith and hope, in ever new temptations and trials, by always accepting God's grace anew in freedom. We come from Adam and the land of darkness and look for the eternal light and bright perfection. Since the one great movement of our existence Out of our lost condition towards God always still carries within itself the source from which this movement originates, we are 'just and sinners at the same time' by being sinners in the state of becoming who are still in search of perfection. This does not mean, as has already been said, that these two things, remaining always the same, confront one another in a simple static

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

dialectic. Yet the concrete salvific activity of man is always simultaneously characterised by the starting-point from which we came, by our own lost condition which we have left behind, and also by the goal which we already possess in hope but towards which we also still reach. Here is realised the being-by-becoming of the creature. One can only recognise created man in his historical being-by-becoming, in his tension between beginning and end, by pointing to the beginning and the end. Every moment of this becoming is characterised by both, since this movement has an a quo and an ad quem. Seen as a future citizen of eternal glory, man always moves between the beginning and the end. This 'at the same time' is not a simultaneity of beginning and end, but an 'at the same time' in the tension between both.

Thus the Reformation formula of the simul justus et peccator – if only the factors of a Catholic 'no' to this formula remain clear – has a perfectly positive meaning for Christian existence. The Catholic Christian especially should not interpret himself as the 'good man' who basically and really, unless he steals silver spoons or poisons his neighbour, lives from the very start as a good man in grace, so that, as modern sentiment often maintains, it is really God who must justify himself before man and [230] explain why there is so much suffering, darkness and confusion in the history of the world. The Christian must have understood that of himself he is nothing but nothingness and that left to himself he is nothing but sin. Wherever he discovers something good in himself, he must acknowledge it as a causeless free grace of God. Hence even the Catholic Christian should not spread out his justice before God. He should rather from day to day accept his justice, which in fact divinises him, as an unmerited gift of God's incalculable favour. If he wants to express this by saying that he is always and of himself a poor sinner and always someone justified by God's grace as long as lie does not close himself to this grace of God by disbelief and lack of love, then he is quite at liberty to do so.

Even Catholics like St Theresa of the Child Jesus have done this. When they dared to stand before the countenance of God, they came of and for themselves with empty hands and confessed themselves like St Augustine to be sinners. In this consciousness of their own sinfulness they discovered in themselves that miracle which means that God fills our hands with his glory and makes our heart overflow with love and faith. Anyone who confesses that of himself he is a sinner, experiences precisely in this that grace of God which really and truly makes him a saint and a just man. Then God absolves him from all sin so that he is really and in truth, to the last root of his being, a holy, just and blessed child of God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[231]

16

REFLECTIONS ON THE UNITY OF THE LOVE OF NEIGHBOUR AND THE LOVE OF GOD[1]

Your Association has given itself a strangely adventurous and at the same time sacred task: it has the audacity to try to organise what cannot really be organised, to try to give to what is always new a permanent presence and to try to keep in the public eye what is hidden, what God alone sees and estimates. After all, it has only one real object – to love our neighbour in deed and in truth. You want to love by giving real help, but a help which is not merely an organised effort and effect of socio-political organisation but which in truth remains love. Such love, however, where it truly exists and remains and thus really supports the social efforts between men – even though these efforts can also exist, be demanded and organised 'without real love – is not the function of secular society but itself constitutes a completely new society of men even where it has no name; it allows the eternal kingdom of God to begin in secret and is the miracle of the birth of eternity. Yet for this very reason this venture is strangely adventurous and daring. According to the Apostle, it is completely possible to give all one's goods to the poor and yet lack charity. This means surely that no matter how important and wonderful, and how 'useful' socio-political action may be, it alone does not yet represent what is precisely the decisive factor of this undertaking; by this kind of action alone – without this mysterious love – your 'Association' would sink to the level of a function of secular society and would become that which belongs to the age of a world which passes [232] away. Hence, however much such love as is meant to govern here must think about how it can avoid the danger of becoming an empty feeling and nothing but talk and become a tangible helping action, we must also inquire here about what love is in itself. Even though we know basically what love is only by the fact that it takes place and thereby forgets to ask about itself, there is nevertheless – according to scripture – the Word, which commands it to act in God's name; hence there is also the responsible right to reflect about love itself, even though such reflection – unlike the commanding and promising word of love which goes out from the altar of the highest event of love, the cross – cannot bring with it the power of grace for that which is ultimately itself.

We intend to inquire into charity here by reflecting on its unity with the love of God. Precisely what is not meant, however, is that charity loses itself in the depth of the love of God by dissolving itself or by becoming unimportant as such, or that two ways of fulfilling human existence, although each could be understood and carried out on its own, become subsequently associated. In the case of this unity the important thing is to understand rather that the one does not exist and cannot be understood or exercised without the other, and that two names have really to be given to the same reality if we are to summon up its one mystery, which cannot be abrogated.

Active love as the illuminating situation of modern man's existence

The question about the essential unity of love of God and neighbour which alone brings it about that the two 'commandments' are equal (Mt 22:39) and the realisation that on both together hang the Law and the Prophets (Mt 22:40), is more urgent today than ever before

[1] In this essay, the author takes up in greater detail and more exactly reflections which he has used for the question of the veneration of the Saints (cf. GuL XXXVII [1964], pp. 325-340, on the question of possibility). Cf. also: K. Rahner, 'The "Commandment" of Love in relation to the other Commandments', Theological Investigations V (London & Baltimore 1966), pp. 439-459.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

both for the living action and the theoretical reflection which is carried by that action and at the same time necessarily illumines it. To get some idea of this urgency, we need only take a look at the situation of contemporary philosophy. There is talk of the end of metaphysics; it seems that, in some mysterious and profound sense, we are also already questioning again the transcendental philosophy of the pure subject, with its openness to the Absolute (in the form of the epoch-making conversion of the Greek cosmocentricity into a Christian, modern anthropocentricity), whose meaning and also permanent significance is only being slowly assimilated by Christian philosophy and so will also no doubt be preserved by this in [233] its permanent meaning. Sociology is making an attempt to replace metaphysics or to convert philosophy into an ontology of intercommunication. The orientation of the philosophy of cognoscitive transcendence towards a beyond which is always valid seems to want to turn in the direction of hoped-for future events; action is not now experienced as the derived consequence of knowledge but rather knowledge is seen as the event of self-consciousness which dwells only in action itself. The God of the beyond of the world is suspected to be a non-verifiable ghost which must be laid, since he does not exist there where we experience, achieve and suffer ourselves and where we suffer ourselves in solitude as the only real bottomless abyss. One tries by thought and action to demythologise everything and to destroy taboos in everything until the only thing left is what seems to survive all this: the incomprehensible something which is experienced as the absurd something which one would like to honour by shocked silence, or as the honest and bitter minimum of everyday duty in the service of others, if one is still inclined to act on and talk about an 'ideal' at all.

Be that as it may, it must be placed over against the words of the gospel and the liberating grace of the living God or over against a sector which retains the courage not to despair and to withstand the impatient disappointment regarding every naturally always finite formula of human existence. Yet if Christianity is not to be merely 'objectively' right but is also to say something right by its judgements to the man of tomorrow who must understand himself where and in the manner in which – after all – he exists, then it must obviously be made comprehensible to him that the whole truth of the gospel is still hidden and in germ in what he finds most easily as a deed and then as truth, viz. in the love of one's neighbour. If Christianity is faith, hope and charity, and if these three are not realities added to each other externally, each with a different origin and a different nature, but if love is rather the one word for the perfection of the one reality which we signify by these three names, then love could be the valid topical word for today which calls the whole of Christianity in the man of tomorrow into the concreteness of life and out of that depth into which God (and not ourselves) has immersed it by his offer of grace, the grace which He is Himself. This presupposes, however, that it can really be said seriously that the love of God and the love of neighbour are one and the same thing, and that, in this way and in this way alone, we understand what God and his Christ are, and that we accomplish what [234] is the love of God in Christ when we allow the love of our neighbour to attain its own nature and perfection.

Love of neighbour understood as love of God: The declarations of scripture

The realisation we are groping to reach, if we examine it honestly and soberly, is not as directly and clearly attested in scripture and tradition as one might think. They speak after all of two commandments (Mt 22:39; Mk 12:31), of the second of which it is said merely that it 'resembles' the first. Nevertheless, the two together are valued in the Synoptic tradition as the life-giving (Lk 10:28) epitome of the Old Testament revelation in the scriptures and the prophets (Mt 22:40), greater than which there is nothing (Mk 12:31). Furthermore, in this Synoptic theology of love, it certainly must not be overlooked that in the eschatological discourses about the Judgement, love of neighbour is given in St Matthew as the only explicit

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

standard by which man will be judged (Mt 25:34-46), and that the cooling down of this love is represented as the content of 'lawlessness' among the afflictions of the last days (Mt 24:12). In addition, there is that puzzling saying in the Synoptic tradition that what is done to the least of his brethren is done to Jesus, a saying which cannot be explained by an arbitrarily altruistic identification which according to many commentators Jesus himself undertakes as it were merely morally and juridically in a mere 'as if'. The understanding of this text must certainly first of all proceed from the absolutely unique position Jesus attributes to himself as the Son as such, as the presence of God and of his basileia among us, and must in general try to bring out clearly the unity of this Son with man. If we do this, we will no doubt be led back again to the doctrine of the mysterious unity of the love of God and of neighbour and to its Christological basis and radicalisation. This doctrine becomes most radical (though without any explicit reflection on this fact) in St Paul: love of neighbour (understood as the sovereign commandment: Jn 2:8) is declared to be the fulfilment of the law (Rm 13:8, 10; Ga 5:14), and hence as the 'bond' of perfection (Col 3:14) and as the better 'way', i.e. as the Christian form of existence simply and finally (1 Co 12:31-13:13). In St John, we find then a first reflection on the justification of this radical elevation of the love of neighbour to being the totality of Christian existence, a radical elevation which otherwise might appear to be a pious exaggeration, as it is in fact watered down in the reflective processes of the Christian exhortation to virtue to the point that love of neighbour is a [235] single part of the Christian demand without which, in spite of its difficulty, salvation is lost. According to St John, we are loved by God (Jn 15:12) and by Christ so that we may love one another (Jn 13:34), a love which is the new commandment of Christ (Jn 13:34) which is his specifically (Jn 15:12) and which is the command imposed on us (Jn 15:17). Thus for St John the consequence of this is that God who is Love (1 Jn 4:16) has loved us, not so that we might love him in return but so that we might love one another (1 Jn 4:7, 11). For we do not see God – he cannot be truly reached in gnostic-mystic interiority alone, in such a way that he would thus be really attainable by love (1 Jn 4:12) – and hence the 'God in us' by mutual love is the God whom alone we can love (1 Jn 4:12), to such an extent that it is really true and that, although it is usually not at all clear to us, it is a radically convincing argument for St John that 'a man who does not love the brother whom he can see, cannot love God whom he has never seen' (1 Jn 4:20).

Many things remain undefined and unclear in the explicit wording of this attempt to make the concentration of the whole Christian relationship to God in the love of our neighbour comprehensible. Is perhaps even here the love of neighbour still merely the 'proof' of our love of God simply because God, who is to be loved, has given us precisely this commandment to love our neighbour; and is, therefore, its fulfilment merely the best touchstone for us as to whether we are serious about the love of God, the whole matter resting ultimately nevertheless in two different partial fulfilments of Christian human existence and in two commandments? Is the word about the brother whom we see and about God whom we cannot see, merely – after all – a simple argumentum ad hominem, an inference from the easier (which has not been achieved) to the more difficult (which will then certainly and a fortiori not be fulfilled)? Or may we take the words of St John absolutely seriously, so that the 'God in us' is really the one who alone can be loved and who is reached precisely in the love of our brother and in no other way, and that the love of neighbour encounters the love of God in such a way that it moves itself and us with it, closer to the brother near by and attains both itself and the peak of perfection in the love of this brother, i.e. specifically as love of neighbour, and brings us to God and his love by the love of our neighbour?

Even though we cannot give a sure answer in the purely exegetical sense to this question of biblical theology, theological reflection in [236] tradition gives us a little more courage to answer it in favour of the second part of the above alternative, i.e. in the direction of a radical

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

identity of the two loves. It must be noted in this connection that while, on the one hand, even this theological tradition with its theologumena does not give us any absolutely convincing solution to this problem yet, on the other hand, it does bring data of biblical theology[2] into play for our question which are not given their full effect in these texts or scripture itself which touch precisely on our question.

The teaching of theology

The tradition of the schools in Catholic theology has already held fast for a long time and this unanimously to the fact that the specific Christian love of neighbour is both in potency and in act a moment of the infused supernatural theological virtue of caritas by which we love God in his Spirit for his own sake and in direct community with him. This means, therefore, that the love of neighbour is not merely the preparation, effect, fruit and touchstone of the love of God but is itself an act of this love of God itself; in other words, it is at least an act within that total believing and hoping surrender of man to God which we call love and which alone justifies man, i.e. hands him over to God, because, being supported by the loving self-communication of God in the uncreated grace of the Holy Spirit, it really unites man with God, not as He is recognised by us but as He is in Himself in His absolute divinity. Three things must not be over-looked in connection with this thesis of scholastic theology which identifies the love of God and neighbour at least in their supernatural potency of the one infused supernatural theological virtue of caritas. (1) Scholastic theology does not overlook (in principle quite correctly) the fact that such a caritas can be also a mere impulse for certain modes of relationship to others by personal love which are not themselves formally acts of charity but merely its actus imperati restricting themselves more to a merely human dimension. (2) Scholastic theology, when giving a more precise interpretation of its radical thesis, will presumably often fall short of it, especially when it tries to give reasons for it; it will realise this thesis and will give reasons for it in such a way that it really remains a thesis in words only, and it will not really catch up with the existential, ontological presuppositions of this thesis. (3) If scholastic theology were [237] asked explicitly whether this identity is absolutely valid, it would no doubt answer that every act of charity towards our neighbour is indeed formally, even though perhaps only implicitly, love of God since the act is done after all by definition ‘for the sake of God loved with a supernatural love’; but scholastic theology would probably deny that conversely every act of the love of God is formally also a love of neighbour (even though it naturally includes also the readiness for this). Above all, most theologians today would still shrink from the proposition which gives our fundamental thesis its ultimate meaning, its real clarity and inescapable character, viz. that wherever a genuine love of man attains its proper nature and its moral absoluteness and depth, it is in addition always so underpinned and heightened by God’s saving grace that it is also love of God, whether it be explicitly considered to be such a love by the subject or not.

Yet this is the direction in which the understanding of the thesis of identity as it is meant here leads us, since we hold it to be objectively correct and of basic significance for the Christian self-understanding of the future. What is meant by this requires a more detailed even though unavoidably still very summary explanation.

Love as a reflected and explicit mode of action and as an unconceptualised transcendental horizon of action

If we are to keep our ideas clear and avoid the most gross misunderstandings of the envisaged thesis from the very start, it is first of all necessary to distinguish in a human spiritual act between its explicit object represented in a determined concept and category, which is

[2] For example, when scripture declares that the love of neighbour is supported by the same pneuma (Ga 5:22).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

envisaged in a systematic way both by the intellect and will, on the one hand, and the a priori formal object, the transcendental horizon or 'space' within which a determined individual object is encountered, on the other hand. The transcendental horizon is, on the one hand, the subjective possibility for the individual object to show itself at all; it is, as it were, the system of co-ordinates within which the classified object is given its place and which makes it comprehensible. On the other hand, the transcendental horizon is that which is itself given only in the encounter with the object of a concretely historical experience (it itself in transcendental experience), which of course does not mean that this experienced transcendental horizon of the categorised individual experience must be for this reason already systematically, explicitly and objectively represented and named. [238] The latter is, of course, not usually the case. Indeed, even where this transcendental horizon of objective knowledge is reflected on and where it is therefore systematised, conceptually represented and named, and hence is itself made the explicit object of knowledge, this happens once more in virtue of this same horizon which as such must once more be given in an unconscious manner. The representation of its concept cannot dispense with this horizon itself in its unconscious exercise.

This distinction being presupposed, it must be said, of course, that not every act of the love of God is also a formal act of love of neighbour, if and in so far as the love of neighbour means an act in which our neighbour is envisaged and loved as the conscious object in its categorised and conceptual representation. If one relates oneself explicitly by prayer, trust and love to God, then this is in this sense an act of love of God and not an act of love of neighbour. Moreover, measured by the object, such an act of love of God has, of course, a higher dignity than an act of reflected love of neighbour. Yet where the whole 'transcendental' depth of interhuman love is realised and represented (which, as has been said, can at least be caritas, as is quite certain from tradition), there such a love is also necessarily a conscious love of God and has God as its reflex motive (even though this is of course true once more in very different degrees of clarity). In this case our neighbour, and he himself, must then also be really loved and must be the formal object and motive of this love, no matter how one may explain the unity of the two then given motives. (The neighbour, through God's love for him, is 'one' with God, etc.) Yet this still leaves open the other question which also occupies us here, viz. whether all interhuman love, provided only that it has its own moral radicality, is also caritas (i.e. love also of God), since it is orientated towards God, not indeed by an explicitly categorised motive but (and this is the question) by its inescapably given transcendental horizon, which is given gratuitously by God's always prevenient saving grace.

The anonymous 'Christianity' of every positively moral activity

A second preliminary remark must therefore be made: we presuppose here in what follows a theological opinion[3] which is not indeed commonly [239] held in Catholic theology but which has a sufficiently serious basis to allow it to be presupposed here, even though it is impossible here to develop this basis. This opinion states that wherever man posits a positively moral act in the full exercise of his free self-disposal, this act is a positive supernatural salvific act in the actual economy of salvation even when its a posteriori object and the explicitly given a posteriori motive do not spring tangibly from the positive revelation of God's Word but are in this sense 'natural'. This is so because God in virtue of his universal salvific will offers everyone his supernaturally divinising grace and thus

[3] Cf. on this, e.g., K. Riesenhuber, 'Der anonyme Christ nach K. Rahner', ZKT LXXXVI (1964), pp. 286-303; A. Röper, Die anonymen Christen (Mainz 1963); K. Rahner, Zur Theologie des Todes[4] (Freiburg 1963), pp. 79-86 (English translation: On the Theology of Death, Quaestiones Disputatae 2 [Freiburg & Edinburgh-London 1961] – Tr.).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

elevates the positively moral act of man. Furthermore, the thereby already given, supernaturally transcendental even though unconscious horizon of the spirit (its a priori orientation towards the triune God of eternal life) includes an element of (transcendental) revelation and possibility of faith which also gives such an act that sufficient character of 'faith' necessary for a moral act being a salvific act. This opinion states, therefore, that wherever there is an absolutely moral commitment of a positive kind in the world and within the present economy of salvation, there takes place also a saving event, faith, hope and charity, an act of divinising grace, and thus caritas is exercised in this, a fact which still remained an open question above. There is a possible logical but not a real distinction between a moral act and a salvific act. Yet all this does not mean that we have proved our proper basic thesis about the strict mutual identity of the love of God and the love of neighbour. It still remains questionable whether such love of neighbour is just any one of the moral acts among many others of equal rank which we must interpret as saving acts, or whether this love has a special, all-embracing position within the whole of morality, in such a way that it must be taken as the basis and sum total of the moral as such and hence – when divinised by grace – can be regarded as the saving act of explicit love of God in the sense that even conversely every act of explicit love of God is truly and formally (though in a sense still to he determined more exactly) love of neighbour.

Love of neighbour as the basic moral activity of man

It is the second part of this alternative which must be affirmed. Love of neighbour, even and especially if we regard it to begin with as a moral phenomenon and do not yet ask about the theological virtue of charity at all, is not to begin with just any of the many co-existing morally right [240] reactions of man towards his own reality and that of his surroundings, but is the basis and sum total of the moral as such. Why and in what sense is this so? In the external multiplicity of his surroundings man encounters at a first glance a colourful, apparently arbitrary, juxtaposed variety of objects towards which his moral activity too can be referred in each case and which – as is shown, for instance, by the systematisations of special ethics – are then subsequently and somewhat arbitrarily collected together and ordered in groups. Yet still, the world encountered by man (we prescind from God at this point) is in many respects more originally one world of man. This is already seen to be true by the fact that the true and proper surrounding of man is his personal environment. This environment of persons is the world through which man finds and fulfils himself (by knowledge and will) and … gets away from himself. From a personal and moral point of view, the world of things is of significance only as a factor for man and for his neighbour. This follows first of all from the a priori structure of the one whole man (in knowledge and will), a structure which imposes a unified law of its possible knowledge on the external variety of possible objects and which thus systematises this variety as it is known and willed. Knowledge is, however, of its nature a 'being-within-oneself', or rather a return to one*self* and freedom is not simply the capacity to do this or that but (formally) a self-disposing into finality; the subject (from a formal point of view) is always concerned with itself. Hence it must necessarily be the secret a priori law imposed on the multiplicity of the possible objects for man that they can be concerned with and be ordered for man's knowledge and freedom, precisely in so far as they can serve this 'being-within-oneself' and this self-disposal. It follows from this, however, that the world of things can be a possible object for man's concern only as a moment of the world of persons. In the traditional teaching this is seen also in the axiom: being and the good are identical; the objective moral good is given in a personal being; thus a good which is not the person or something referred to the person as such cannot be regarded as an objective value of moral action. Nevertheless it must be added immediately that this formal nature of knowledge and freedom, understood as self-possession

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and self-deed, refers to the formal nature from a certain point of view and must not be misunderstood in an egocentric sense. Materially – even merely on account of the mundaneness and a posteriori historicity of man – the a posteriori object is the necessary mediation of the knowing subject to itself and so, presupposing [241] what has just been said, the known personal Thou is the mediation, the 'being-within-oneself' of the subject. This condition is even clearer and more radical in the case of freedom: the free self-disposal, when morally right and perfect, is precisely the loving communication with the human Thou as such (not as mere negation of nor as something different from the 'ego' which wants merely to find itself, even though in the other). Yet since knowledge (being itself already an act) attains its proper and full nature only in the act of freedom and therefore must lose and yet keep itself in freedom in order to be completely itself, it has a fully human significance only once it is integrated into freedom, i.e. into the loving communication with the Thou. The act of personal love for another human being is therefore the all-embracing basic act of man which gives meaning, direction and measure to everything else. If this is correct, then the essential a priori openness to the other human being which must be undertaken freely belongs as such to the a priori and most basic constitution of man and is an essential inner moment of his (knowing and willing) transcendentality. This a priori basic constitution (which must be accepted in freedom, but to which man can also close himself) is experienced in the concrete encounter with man in the concrete. The one moral (or immoral) basic act in which man comes to himself and decides basically about himself is also the (loving or hating) communication with the concrete Thou in which man experiences, accepts or denies his basic a priori reference to the Thou as such. Everything else is a factor in this or a consequence of it or an impulse towards it, but in the present order of salvation, i.e. one having a supernatural goal, this basic act is, according to what has been said, elevated supernaturally by a self-communication of God in uncreated grace and in the resulting basic triune faculty of the theological virtues of faith, hope and charity, whereby theological love necessarily and of its very nature integrates and saves faith and hope into itself. Hence the one basic human act, where it takes place positively, is the love of neighbour understood as caritas, i.e. as a love of neighbour whose movement is directed towards the God of eternal life.

Love of neighbour as man's manifestation of his wholeness and essence

The reduction of the spiritual knowing and willing reality of man to that love of his neighbour which is caritas, when seen as man's basic act, does not of course limit this act to the obviously and transparently ordinary [242] everyday events but, even if we prescind to begin with from its theological aspect, gives this act a quality of mystery. When we say that a self-understanding of man – understood as the assembling of his knowledge and as the free self-determination of man with a view to finality – takes place in the act of loving communication with the Thou (in this and in nothing else) so that everything else is a moment, presupposition, initial stage or result of this, then we also say of course eo ipso and conversely that the whole incalculable mystery of man is contained and exercised in this act of love of neighbour; it means that all anthropological statements must also be read as statements about that love which is not merely a 'regional' happening in the life of man but is the whole of himself in which alone he possesses himself completely, meets himself completely and falls into the ultimate abyss of his nature.

His corporeality, his temporality and historicity, his final incapacity to catch up with himself by reflection, the unfathomable and adventurous character of his existence, the anticipation of his future in hope or despair, the bitter impossibility of his perfecting and fulfilling himself and the disillusion proper to him, his continual confrontation with the nameless, silent, absolute mystery which embraces his existence, his readiness for death which after all can also be seen – in a very peculiar way – as the basic act of existence … all

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

these together are necessarily also the essential traits of love for another person. The love of neighbour is not something which everyone always already knows reflexly in the depth of his being; rather, it is that which is sent to man only through the experienced and suffered wholeness of life and still remains even then, indeed especially then, a nameless mystery. It would be necessary to show by an empirical and descriptive phenomenology of love, responsibility, loyalty, venture, and of the unfinished and eternal quality inherent in love, what breadths and depths are implied by love of the Thou, how man really experiences in it who he is, how the 'no' to it imprisons the whole man within the deadly lonely damnation of self-created absurdity, how the totality of reality, which freely gives itself and is accepted and understood as the blessed incomprehensibility – which is the only self-evident thing – opens itself only if man opens himself radically in the act of love and entrusts himself to this totality. It would be necessary to show more empirically than is possible here what is the mutual relation of dependence between the transcendental openness and readiness for unlimited communication with the Thou, on the one hand, and the concrete encounter with the [243] concrete Thou, on the other hand. This would make it more comprehensible that in the act of love for another, and in it alone and primarily, the original unity of what is human and what is the totality of man's experience is collected together and achieved, and that the love for the other concrete Thou is not just something which also exists in man among many other things but is man himself in his total achievement.

If it would thus become clearer by the description of love of the other Thou that this love is really the fulfilment of the total and hence also spiritually transcendental nature of man, then it would also become easier to grasp that it occurs in the present economy of salvation only in the form of caritas for caritas means nothing else than the absolute radicality of this love in so far as it is open to the immediacy of the God who communicates himself under the form of grace.

Normally speaking, we merely say quite abstractly in our teaching on grace that the absolute, infinite transcendentality of the spirit is the 'potentia oboedientialis' for grace and that it is liberated by grace – in its infinity which of itself belongs to this transcendentality – from being the mere condition of the possibility of grasping a certain categorised object to being the possibility of immediate presence to God as he is in himself. This declaration, however, would have to be made concrete in the knowledge that from a more concrete point of view this potentia oboedientialis is precisely the transcendentality towards the other who is to be loved and who first of all is one's fellow man. Even by theological reflection we must arrive at the point where we can say: if in the present economy of salvation and on account of the universal salvific will of God every radically free moral act becomes a saving act through grace and is thus orientated towards the immediate presence to God (as has already been said), then this must be true a fortiori of the basic moral act which integrates everything, viz. the love of our neighbour. Even though this the supernatural nature of a saving act cannot be grasped reflexly by an arbitrary introspection alone[4] (but this is to be ascribed to that systematisation into themes which takes place precisely in man's history of salvation and revelation), it would nevertheless be possible to show, by [244] such a phenomenological description of the empirical, authentic love of neighbour, the elements in it which are elevated and liberated by grace to their absolute perfection and which are then also experienced as such unsystematically. Furthermore, it is not the place here to describe the different concrete forms of love of neighbour. Suffice it to say explicitly here that, even when we are talking about caritas, it must always be a question of real love and that it is therefore [4] The supernatural character of the saving act is also not simply what is beyond consciousness, as is held by a nominalistic tendency in theology even to our own day (outside the thomistic school). Cf. on this: K. Rahner, 'Gnadenerfahrung', LTK[3] IV, pp. 1001 sq.; K. Rahner, Theological Investigations III (London & Baltimore 1967), pp. 86-90; J. Alfaro, LTK[3] IV, pp. 207 sq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

not just a matter of fulfilling a commandment which guards and defends the other against our brutal egoism; 'love for God's sake' – to be precise – does not mean love of God alone in the 'material' of our neighbour merely seen as an opportunity for pure love of God, but really means the love of our neighbour himself a love empowered by God to attain its ultimate radicality and a love which really terminates and rests in our neighbour.

The encounter of the world and of man as the medium of the original, unobjectified experience of God

We must now finally give thought to an objection against any thesis which understands the love of neighbour as the one all-embracing basic act of human existence, viz. that the religious act directed towards God is the basic act of human existence or at least stands equally entitled and equally original, indeed with higher rank, beside the act of loving communication with another person. This objection is, however, a misunderstanding. It must be noted first of all that, at least for the original experience of God, God is not one 'object' besides others either objectively speaking or in the subjective intentionality of man (in knowledge and free action and their unity). God is not an object towards which the intentionality of man can be directed in the same fragmentary and particular way as it is towards the multiplicity of objects and persons encountered within the categories of intramundane experience. God is not originally given in the way in which – as if by chance, externally and without it having to be thus by the nature of human intentionality – a flower or Australia are 'given'. We must not consider man as unconcerned about God until he systematically conceives the notion of God as one reality 'besides' others and this in the merely dividing distinction from these other realities. In the original act which precedes all reflex systematisations, God is always given as the subjectively and objectively all-bearing ground of experience, a ground which is beyond this world; he is therefore given indirectly in a kind of boundary experience as the origin and destination [245] of an act which is objectively directed towards the world and which, therefore, as will have to be said more in detail below, is a loving communication with (or 'no' to) the Thou in the world. God is primarily and originally given in (or as) the transcendental, unclassified horizon of the knowing and acting intentionality of man and not as an 'object' represented by an idea within this horizon. Moreover, even where God is made the subject of religious and Christian reflection – hence, where and in so far as (over and above such a philosophico-religious reflection) He is given (transcendentally) in the 'horizon' of the spirit opened up or maintained in its absolute manner by divinising grace (as the goal of this transcendentality which transmits itself supernaturally) and where he speaks himself (in categories) through the revelation of the Word in salvation history, and where in both these ways he becomes a 'partner' in a personal and direct relationship between himself and man – this revelation of grace and the Word and the real self-communication by grace always happens vis-à-vis and through man who is already 'in the world', i.e. who is given to himself in freedom by entering in love into the world around him, and by personal encounter and communication with the Thou of intramundane experience.

The (naturally and supernaturally) transcendental experience of God which is also the necessary presupposition of the historical revelation of the Word and both is and remains its supporting ground, is possible only in and through man who has already (in logical priority) experienced the human Thou by his intramundane transcendental experience (of his a priori reference to the Thou) and by his categorised experience (of his concrete encounter with the concrete Thou) and who only in this way can exercise the (at least) transcendental experience of his reference to the absolute mystery (i.e. God). The classical thesis of scholastic theology (against ontologism and the innate idea of God) which maintains that God can be known only a posteriori from the created world, does not ultimately mean to imply (if it is properly understood) that man merely comes upon God like any object given to him purely accidentally (e.g. this flower or Australia) with which he might just as well not be concerned (from the point of view of the a priori structure of his knowledge) but it does mean that the transcendentally original a priori experience of his original reference to God and thus of God himself (an experience which must in some measure also be objectified in categories) can be made only in an always already achieved going-out into the world which, understood [246] as the world of man, is primarily the people with whom he lives. Precisely because the original reference towards God is of a transcendental kind and hence does not fall into any category but is given in the infinite reference of the spirit of man beyond every mere object of his personal and material surroundings, the original experience of God (as distinct from his separating representation in an individual concept) is always given in a 'worldly' experience. This, however, is only present originally and totally in the communication with a 'Thou'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Since every conceptual reflection on the transcendental conditions of the possibility of knowledge and freedom is itself based once more on these same conditions, then even the explicit religious act in which God becomes the reflex theme of knowledge and love is once more underpinned and taken up by that act which offers a transcendental, inclusive experience of God (of a natural-supernatural kind) and this by the fact that this act – in our turning towards the people we live with, and therefore in our explicit communication with them – lets us also experience unreflectedly the transcendental conditions of this act (i.e. the transcendental reference to God and the transcendental openness to the human Thou).

The act of love of neighbour is, therefore, the only categorised and original act in which man attains the whole of reality given to us in categories, with regard to which he fulfils himself perfectly correctly and in which he always already makes the transcendental and direct experience of God by grace. The reflected religious act as such is and remains secondary in comparison with this. It has indeed, as has already been said, a higher dignity than the reflected act of love of neighbour, if and in so far as the latter is measured by the particular explicit, conceptually represented object of the act in question. Measured by its 'horizon' or its transcendental possibility, it has the same dignity, the same 'draught' and the same radicality as the act of explicit love of neighbour, since both acts are necessarily supported by the (experienced but unreflected) reference both to God and to the intramundane Thou and this by grace (of the infused caritas), i.e. by that on which the explicit acts both of our relationship to God and of our love of neighbour 'for God's sake' reflect. Yet this does not alter the fact that the primary basic act of man who is always already 'in the world' is always an act of the love of his neighbour and in this the original love of God is realised in so far as in this basic act are also accepted the conditions of its possibility, one of which is the reference of man to God when supernaturally elevated by grace.

[247]

Love of neighbour as the primary act of love of God

We are now in a position to give a direct answer to the basic question of our whole reflections. This was the question about the identity of the love of God and the love of neighbour. More exactly, it was the question about whether the love of neighbour understood as caritas is ultimately only a secondary moral act (one among many) which more or less proceeds objectively from the love of God as an 'actus imperatus'. In other words, does the love of neighbour have God for its 'motive' (just as in the explicit love of God) in such a way that this love of neighbour really 'loves' God alone and hence, in accordance with the will of God who is really loved, is well disposed towards its neighbour and does good to him? Or is there a more radical unity between the love of God and of neighbour (taken as caritas) in such a way that the love of God itself is always also already love of neighbour in which our neighbour is really loved himself? We can now answer: the categorised explicit love of neighbour is the primary act of the love of God. The love of God unreflectedly but really and always intends God in supernatural transcendentality in the love of neighbour as such, and even the explicit love of God is still borne by that opening in trusting love to the whole of reality which takes place in the love of neighbour. It is radically true, i.e. by an ontological and not merely 'moral' or psychological necessity, that whoever does not love the brother whom he 'sees', also cannot love God whom he does not see, and that one can love God whom one does not see only by loving one's visible brother lovingly.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Finally, we would simply draw the reader's attention to the fact that we should really go on to reflect now explicitly on the 'Christological' and 'eschatological' aspects of this situation. If in 'recent times' (and only then) one has learnt to see and love the Father whom one does not see in the man Jesus whom one does see, then the unity of the love of God and of neighbour on which we have been reflecting becomes even more radical from a Christological and eschatological point of view and thus reaches its climax; thus the man Jesus takes on and continues to have an eternal significance for our relationship to God right into the 'direct' vision of God.

The relationship to God through man is thus not merely a 'mediation' in time but also in eternity, and therefore the same is present 'subjectively' as is present 'objectively' through the never reversed acceptance of humanity by the Logos. Unfortunately we cannot enter further into this [248] here, otherwise it could also be shown how a love of neighbour which has reached an absolute (supernatural) perfection of being also includes Christology.

The topical significance of the love of neighbour for modern man's knowledge of God

This whole laborious reflection may appear as if it only considers something which, if true, is valid always and everywhere (at least in the Christian order of salvation). This is quite correct yet our reflections have particular significance for the historical 'moment' in which we live today. A natural-supernatural knowledge and love of God of an existentially authentic kind, in which the reality of God is truly experienced, is in the very nature of things an act which can only be posited by man as a whole. Everything he is and with which he is concerned must be included in this, otherwise the absolute ground of reality, the ground of the knowing and acting spirit, would not be encountered in it and God would not appear in it as God, as a Person, as Freedom and as absolute mystery. This reality, however, which achieves itself as a whole towards God, has nevertheless different aspects in different periods for the man who fulfils himself historically, privileged aspects under which it presents itself and transmits itself to man. Each epoch has different 'catchwords', 'primitive words', under which the one totality of the experience of God is summoned up and comes towards us anew out of the totality of our experience of reality and of ourselves.

Already in scripture, and then also in the course of the history of faith and salvation, there shows itself a variety of such catchwords which always mean and imply the whole and yet appear at the same time as many different gateways which form the particular approach to this whole according to the spirit of each particular age or as particular characteristics of the Christian religious experience of particular men. For St Paul, for instance, the 'catchword' is 'faith', but this is not the same for everyone or every age, even though no one can come to God without faith. It could be asked whether the trilogy of the three divine virtues does not also already indicate a sphere of such a change of 'root terms' for a religious experience in a particular period, just as the key-word for everything in St John is not faith but love, while the Synoptics replace even this by 'conversion' (metanoia). Today, at any rate, when by reason of its enormous numbers, its concrete unity and in its necessarily new social [249] forms, mankind must learn to love completely anew or go under; when God opens out anew as the silent incomprehensibility so much so that man is tempted to honour him now simply by silence and nothing else and when all atheism, which today really exists for the first time, is simply the mistaken adolescent form of this opportunity and the temptation given to us as regards God's incomprehensibility; when an extremely worldly world is coming into being, a world which man creates for himself and which ought not indeed be sacralised but which must be experienced and acted in the depth sanctified by God, i.e. opened towards him … at the dawn of such a new epoch, 'love of neighbour' might easily be the root-word which really moves people and the key-word for today. Nevertheless, if we want to say today that anyone who loves his neighbour has fulfilled the law as such – namely that if we love one another, then God's final salvation is within us (as one might translate 1 Jn 4:12) – then we must understand absolutely fundamentally why the love of neighbour, provided it is genuine and accepts its own proper incomprehensible being to the very limit, already contains the whole of Christian salvation and of Christianity. This must indeed still be unfolded in that complete fullness and breadth which we know and preserve, but whenever someone loves someone else truly and 'to the end', it is already grasped in its original root.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[251]

PART FOUR

Contributions to a Theology of the Church

[253]

A. THE PILGRIM CHURCH

17

THE CHURCH OF SINNERS

The topic of the ‘Church of Sinners’ usually receives a very cursory treatment in Catholic dogmatics. In truth, there are more important and more glorious things to say about the Church. Perhaps the reason why the Church as a Church of sinners does not appear very much in the forefront of theological interest lies in the fact that it is only too clearly a matter of everyday experience. Nevertheless this topic is materially of the greatest importance in our doctrine about the Church, not only because we are here concerned with one of the most agonising questions of ecclesiology which persistently recurs throughout the history of dogma, but also because it is a question of such consequence for the individual’s life of faith. Ultimately, however, the question acquires importance because it is not intended as a question of everyday, superficial experience, but as a dogmatic one, that is to say as a question which has to be answered in the light, not of human experience, conceited, questionable, and distorted by sin, but of God’s revelation.

We said it was here a matter of an agonising question which persistently pervades the whole history of dogma. Christianity has always declared, ‘I believe in the holy Church.’ Again and again in the course of history the question has arisen where this Church is to be found which so confidently declares itself to be a holy Church, therefore the Church illuminated by the light of God’s own holiness. Again and again, on the basis of this article of the Creed, the concrete Church has been rejected as sinful; again and again some new Church has been founded as the true and holy one, and declared to be the true Church of God and of his Christ. Already Tertullian maintained that the universal Church of his time was not the true Church of the Spirit and of spiritual men but a house of whores, [254] because she did not cast adulterers out of her communion once and for all. Somewhat similar was the thought and teaching of Montanism and Novatianism in the third century, of Donatism in the time of Augustine, of Messalianism and other heretical movements within monasticism, movements like that of the Cathari, of the Spiritualism of Joachim of Fiore, of the Spirituals among the Franciscans, of the Hussites in the Middle Ages. All of them wanted a ‘holy’ Church instead of the unholy Church of their time. And even the Reformers of the sixteenth century, who were so insistent in teaching the sinfulness and corruption of all men, made a large part of their attack on the Catholic Church consist of diatribes against the corruption of the papacy and the unholiness of the Church in general.

In the life of the individual, too, the experience of the unholy Church nearly always plays a significant role in his inner struggle to come to terms with his faith. Whenever complaints are heard against the clergy, what else is usually the matter of reproach, but that their lives contradict what they preach? Is anything repeated more frequently than that church-people are no better than others, that the Church too has failed? And these reproaches and the troubled temptations against faith that arise from them have, from the purely human point of view, a certain amount of right on their side. There stands the Church, and she declares herself necessary for salvation, she comes to us in the name of a holy God, she declares herself to be in possession of all truth and grace, she claims to be the one ark of salvation among the flood of sin and corruption, she believes herself commissioned to convert and save all men. And this very Church which comes to us with such claims, why, look at her! – so they will say – look how she seems to use two different yardsticks: she proclaims to poor, troubled humanity the Sermon on the Mount with its 'impossible' demands, but her official representatives seem to let these demands rest very lightly on their own personal shoulders. Don't they all seem to live pretty comfortable lives? Aren't they often avaricious or arrogant or overbearing? Isn't there a continuous succession of scandals, even in the ranks of her religious orders, who after all are supposed to be striving for holiness and perfection? Are the bad popes a mere catch-phrase or aren't they a historical fact? And haven't even her holiest things been continually misused in all sorts of ways for sinful purposes: the confessional and the sacraments in general, the papacy used for transparently political purposes, and so on? That we are all human – [255] so this plaint or complaint continues – that is not to be wondered at; and that the men of the Church also, even her official representatives, are human and sinful, that too is in itself nothing to cause surprise. If this were all, then it would admittedly be quite unjust to comb through the corners of Church history in order to lay bare the sins of the Church. But – the Church puts herself forward as being something essentially greater than a merely human organisation in which it is unavoidable that things often happen in a human and too human way. She claims to hold the place of the all-holy God in the world, to be the holy Church; she goes so far as to assert that her 'extraordinary holiness and inexhaustible fruitfulness in all that is good' is in itself a powerful and permanent motive of credibility and an irrefutable testimony to her divine mission.[1] It is precisely here that the contradiction is to be found: if the Church were more modest – so goes the eternal objection of unbelief – then one could be mild in one's judgement of her and forgive her everything that one forgives in oneself. But because she declares herself to be holy, she must also permit her life and her history to be measured by standards that are higher than the merely human. And what then? Is not then the claim to holiness which she puts forward a singular presumption which proves precisely the opposite of her inordinate claim?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We said our topic is of importance from quite another point of view as well. For us the question is not at all one of how we as Christians who believe in the holiness of the Church manage to deal with our purely human experience of the unholiness of the Church. Rather, the question asked is a dogmatic one: namely, what does Revelation itself have to say about the unholiness of the Church? In other words, we are not concerned with listening to the voice of outraged humanity, (perhaps we know better now than did earlier times that this kind of 'public opinion' even when fairly unanimous is a highly doubtful matter, and that usually each one finds in his experience whatever corresponds to his expectations); we are concerned with examining the self-witness of the Church regarding her own unholiness. For the fact that she is a Church of sinners is itself a piece of the Church's consciousness of her faith. Because if someone with an all too superficial optimism were to hold the Church to be completely 'holy', the Church would not say, 'Thank God! here at last is someone who holds me in just esteem!' No, she would on the contrary have to say to him, 'You are a heretic, and the truth about me [256] is not to be found in you; your mildness is of the Evil One, and you have not grasped what the Spirit of God thinks either about the holiness which he has really bestowed upon me, the holy one, or about the holiness which I, the unholy Church of sinners, do not possess; you do not have in you that holiness which you should have, otherwise you could not think that you had found it in me, any more than someone has it who disappointedly

[1] First Vatican Council, Sess. III, cap. 3, cf. DS 3013.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

arraigns me for not in fact possessing it.'

Accordingly there are two things in question: The Church of sinners, and sinful man before the holy Church of sinners.

I

The Church of God and of his Christ is a Church of sinners. What is meant by this will be explained in two groups of ideas: sinners in the Church, and the sinful Church.

1. Sinners in the Church

It is an article of faith that sinners are members of the Church. Even sinners who are destined to be lost can truly and really belong to the Church. This is a truth of our faith which the Church has constantly taught, in patristic times against Montanism, Novatianism and Donatism, in the Middle Ages against the Albigenses, against the Fraticelli, against Wyclif and Hus, and in modern times against the Reformers, against Jansenism and the Synod of Pistoia. The proposition that sinners, those deprived of grace or those foreknown by God as destined to be lost, are not members of the Church is a formal heresy which has been definitively condemned by the Church.

And let us not be over-hasty in asserting this to be a self-evident truth which could only be doubted by an idealistic visionary. It is not at all a self-evident truth. All that is self-evident is this: there exists a socially recognised 'religious association' called the Catholic Church, to which belong according to the register papers not only those who can be said to be in a very civic and superficial sense 'respectable people', people who have 'no previous convictions', people who can be set up as examples of virtue, people who can even (if one wants to use such a high-sounding title) be described as 'saints'. This is certainly very much self-evident; but it in no way penetrates to the real meaning of the word 'Church' in this Catholic dogma, nor to what meaning is here attached to the word 'sinner'. [257] For the word 'Church' signifies in this connection the visible presence of God and his grace in this world in sacramental signs, it means the historical embodiment of Christ in the here and now of the world until he comes again to 'appear' in the glory of his Godhead; 'Church' signifies here what is human, which while it is really distinct from what is divine is yet inseparably united with it. And 'a sinner in the Church' does not here signify a person who has been in conflict with the police (this can happen occasionally even to the dearest friend of God), but 'sinner' in this article of the faith signifies a person who is in reality devoid of God's grace, a person who is wandering far from God, a person whose destiny is perhaps moving with fearful consistency towards an ultimate eternal damnation. And this sinner belongs to this Church: he is not merely entered in her official register but is her member, a part of the visible presence of God's grace in the world, a member of the Body of Christ! Is this perhaps something self-evident? Is this something which is already unmistakably and without difficulty a matter of our experience? Or is this not rather a truth which in sheer incomprehensibility far outstrips anything which unbelievers can bring forward in their accusations against the Church and their protests at her unholiness?

Yet it is this revealed truth which is clearly taught in scripture and tradition. The kingdom of Heaven is like a net which hauls out of the sea of the world good fish and bad. Only on the shore of eternity at the end of time will the angels of judgement separate the evil from among the good and cast them into the furnace (Mt 13:47-50). At the wedding banquet of the kingdom of Heaven there will also be found seated among the guests those who have on no wedding garment and who will at the end be bound hand and foot and cast out (Mt 25:1-13). There are 'brothers' who by their disobedience to the Church ultimately become as the heathen and public sinners (Mt 18:17). Even the servant who has been set over the household of his lord can be condemned (Mt 24:45-51).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The apostles, too, bear witness to the doctrine contained in these images used by our Lord: there are sinners in the Church, people to whom the Spirit says, 'I know your works; you have the name of being alive and yet are dead' (Rv 3:1 sq.). This is the terrifying part of it: one really has the name of being alive and yet is dead.

The Church of the first centuries found it difficult enough to grasp this truth of faith without trembling, and even as late as St Augustine, who by his struggle against Donatism has become for the history of dogma of [258] the greatest importance in this question, it is not always altogether clear whether in his theory of the wheat and the chaff and of the intermingling cities of Jerusalem and Babylon he unequivocally and definitely regards the dead members as true members of the mystical Body of Christ, or whether he merely means that while the borderline between the two cities is always undoubtedly there, it will be revealed only at the end of time. As regards this matter the Church's consciousness of her belief has subsequently been clarified in the course of time towards the full truth of faith that there are sinners, and that they belong to the Church. There is within the Church sin and failure. And those who sin and fail form a part of the embodiment and manifestation of that divine salvation and that divine grace which we call 'Church'.

It is true that this 'belonging of the sinner to the Church' must be viewed from another side as well, that is, it must be negatively delimited, for the sinner does not belong to the Church in the same full sense as the justified person.

To begin with, it is surely self-evident that one can and must speak of a membership of the Church in all the directions and dimensions into which the Church herself extends, and that consequently whoever does not belong to the Church in one of these dimensions cannot be regarded as her member in the full sense. Now both Leo XIII in his encyclical Satis Cognitum (1896) and Pius XII in the encyclical Mystici Corporis Christi (to indicate only the more recent expressions of the Church's magisterium) emphasised that it would be an ecclesiological Nestorianism and a rationalistic Naturalism if one were to see in the Church nothing more than an external, juridical organisation, merely a visible society, a 'confession' in the civico-social sense of the word. She is much rather the living Body of Christ, animated by the Holy Spirit of God, to whose reality belong divine life, grace, and the power of the future aeon. But since the sinner does not possess this Holy Spirit, it is self-evident that he does not simply belong to the Church in the full sense of the word 'Church' which we have indicated. This proposition in no way contradicts the propositions we set out above from the doctrine of the Church which simply declared the sinner to be a member of the Church. In those propositions the word 'Church' is in fact taken in the sense of the external society; for only on this supposition can the absence of an inner state of grace in the sinner be without effect on his membership of the Church.

That this concept of the Church does not contradict the teaching of [259] Leo XIII and Pius XII referred to above is certain from the following considerations.

The Church has, to a certain extent, a sacramental structure. But in a sacrament we must distinguish between the sacramental sign as such (and the conditions for its 'validity') on the one hand, and the sacramental sign in so far as it is really the cause of sacramental grace and filled with it, on the other. The two concepts must he kept carefully distinct; for it is possible to have in certain circumstances a 'valid sacrament' which in point of fact does not cause any grace in the recipient of the sacrament. Now in a certain sense the Church is the basic sacrament (Ursakrament); hence in her case we must make a distinction between her visible appearance as a body in so far as this is a sign of grace, and this visible appearance in so far as it is a reality filled with grace, and accordingly also between a (merely) 'valid' and a 'fruitful' membership of the Church. The sinner has the first kind of membership of the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Church, but not the second. But by making this distinction the continuing membership of the sinner in the Church is not being reduced to a harmless formality of an external, juridical kind. It is true that the sinner still belongs to the visible appearance of the Church, but his visible membership of the Church has ceased to be the efficacious sign of his invisible membership of the Church as a living, holy community. In a certain sense the sinner has turned this sign into a lie (rather like someone who receives a sacrament validly but unworthily); for he has robbed his continuing membership in the Church of all the meaning and effect to which it is by its entire nature ordered: the inner, living union of men with God and with each other in the Holy Spirit.

2. With this we come to establishing the express point which this doctrine primarily enunciates in all its clearness: the Church is sinful. After what we have just said it is already impossible to maintain any longer as consistent with the faith that there are admittedly sinners 'in' the Church as an external confessional organisation but that this fact tells us nothing about the Church herself. For we have already seen that these sinners, according to the teaching of the Church, are real members, parts, and therefore integral pieces of the visible character of the Church herself. We must now elucidate this a little further.

In order to see our way more clearly, we must keep in mind two things. If we were merely to say, 'Certainly there are sinners in the Church, but this fact has nothing to do with the real Church', we would be assuming [260] an idealistic concept of the Church which from a theological point of view is very questionable. 'Church' is then an idea, an ideal, an ought-to-be, something to which appeal can be made from the concrete reality, something which is meant to be reached only asymptotically, as it were, by slow approximation. That is something which we can of course always love, to which we can fearlessly commit ourselves; it is something untouchable, beyond the reach of the wretchedness of daily life. But this is not really the meaning of the theological concept of 'Church'. In this latter concept the Church is something real: it is the one and only Church which exists and in which we believe, in all cases always including the visible and juridically organised assembly of the baptised, united together in the external confession of their faith and in their obedience to the Roman pope. And it is precisely of this Church that it is impossible to say that she has nothing to do with the sins of her members. Obviously she does not approve of sin; obviously there will always be within her ranks men (and perhaps many men) whom we must call, in some real sense of the word which we need not discuss further here, holy men. But if she is something real, and if her members are sinners and as sinners remain members, then she herself is sinful. Then the sins of her children are a blot and a blemish on the holy mystical Body of Christ itself. The Church is a sinful Church: this is a truth of faith, not an elementary fact of experience. And it is a shattering truth.

Furthermore, we must consider a second fact. If what we said is true, then it is also self-evident that the official representatives of the Church, those men whom a superficial theological consciousness especially among the Catholic laity likes to regard exclusively as 'the' Church (as though the laity, too, were not the 'Church', as though they represented merely the object of the Church's ministration, an error emphatically opposed in Pius XII's encyclical on the Church), that those men too can be sinners, and in fact have been and are in a very noticeable way. But then it is again even clearer that the concrete Church is sinful (and once again, only in the concrete is she the 'Church'). For it is surely beyond dispute that the sins in question do not occur merely in a realm of the 'private life' of these ecclesiastics, but may also influence very substantially their concrete mode of action as official representatives of the Church. When the Church acts, gives a lead, makes decisions (or fails to make decisions when they ought to be made), when she proclaims her message, and when she is obliged to proclaim it in accordance with the times and historical situations, then [261] this activity of the Church is not carried out by some abstract principle and not by the Holy Spirit

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

alone, but rather this whole activity of the Church is at the same time the activity of concrete men. And since they can in fact commit sin, since they can he culpably narrow, culpably egoistic, self-satisfied, obstinate, sensual or indolent, this sinful attitude of theirs will naturally affect also those actions which they initiate precisely as ecclesiastics and in the name of the Church as acts of the concrete Church. There exists no dogma according to which the assistance of the Holy Spirit which always remains with the Church would limit the effect of the sinfulness of the men who administer the Church to their purely private lives and not permit it to have any influence on those events which must be characterised as unmistakably acts of the Church, if the concept of the Church is not to evaporate into the abstract ideal of an invisible Church. It is true that the Christian's conscience can, if he thinks himself capable of attempting it, discover such motivations; he can also, indeed he must, refuse obedience in a case where he is commanded what is sinful, but he cannot withdraw himself from obedience to the Church as long as he himself is not commanded to do anything sinful (even though he may think that the command springs at least partially from sinful narrowness, obstinacy and love of power), and above all – and this is here the only point – he cannot dispute the fact that such actions of ecclesiastics are actions of the Church. This means it must be conceded that the Church can be sinful in her actions. It goes without saying that this happens in opposition to the impulse of the Spirit and the norms and laws always proclaimed by the Church. But this is surely what is so great about this faith in the sinful Church, that she can really do all these things and yet (unlike all human organisations falling away from their original ideals) remain the bride of Christ and the vessel of the Holy Spirit, the only means of grace, from which no one can separate himself by appealing to her own ideal, accusing her of no longer being what she 'once' was (she never was it), or what she ought and claims to be.

Of course we hasten to add that it is not as though the Church were the pure paradox of a union of visible sin and invisible grace. She is holy because she is constantly in a vital contact with Christ the source of all holiness; she is holy, because her whole history with all its ups and downs is constantly pressing forward in the power of her living source, the Holy Spirit, towards that ultimate day to which all her truth, her law and her [262] sacraments are ordered, towards that day when God himself will appear unveiled in his world. She is and remains infallible whenever she makes a solemn dogmatic decision under precise conditions which we need not here further determine. Her sacraments are independent of the worthiness of their ministers, they have an objective validity and efficacy, they are holy and make holy. She never falls victim to the temptation of accommodating to the weakness and mediocrity of men the truth and the norms which her very human preachers proclaim. (How far from self-evident is this miracle of the power and the grace of her holy Spirit; yet it is ever renewed through the centuries!) At all times in a sinful world she has championed the holiness of God and of his Christ, and if we had really grasped how easily man tends to regulate his principles according to his deeds, we would recognise in the eternal 'contradiction' between the holy preaching and the all-too-human life of the preacher of the Church's gospel not so much a stumbling-block as a demonstration of the effectiveness of God's Spirit in a holy Church. The Church is also really so holy in so many of her members, and this holiness can be ascertained even empirically, that for the man of good will, enlightened by the grace of faith, even her outward appearance bears all the marks of a constant motive for faith and an irrefutable witness to her divine commission. In a way which is not at all self-evident but extraordinary, she has really been in all ages the eternally fruitful mother of saints, the holy Church, the bride of Christ, whose appearance even now holds out for the man of faith the promise that she will one day be the bride able to enter without spot or wrinkle the wedding feast of the lamb – on that day when the light of eternal life will reveal what in reality she is even now under the appearance of the woman of sin.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But all this does not give the Church or us her children the right to put a gulf of arrogance and superiority between her and the sin which is not only in the world but also in the Church and through which she herself is really sinful, and this in a way in which she alone can be sinful (even where she is much better than those who are outside); for site alone can distort by her sin the eternal visible presence of Christ in the world which she is and so wrap a shroud about him – and do this in the face of men who must seek him as a matter of life and death!

If then holiness and sin co-exist in the 'image' presented by the Church (and the Church is essentially 'image', a sign making historically accessible the grace of God in the world), this is of course not to say that sin and [263] holiness in the Church have the same relationship to the hidden essential purpose of the Church and therefore belong to her in the same way. The holiness made tangible in her history is an expression of what she is and will remain infallibly and indestructibly until the end of time: the presence in the world of God and of his grace. The Church is always something more than an association, more than a 'juridical Church' and confessional organisation, because the Holy Spirit has indissolubly united himself to her. And this Holy Spirit of God, in himself hidden, recreates over and over again in the palpable holiness of the Church a visible manifestation of his continuing presence capable of convincing the world. In this holiness – not in sin – are we given 'phenotypically' the inner glory which constitutes the permanent heritage out of which her whole character is fashioned. By contrast with all other historical structures, including the 'Church' of the Old Testament, this bodily manifestation of the Church cannot be so distorted by sin that the life-giving Spirit would abandon her or be unable any longer to be historically manifested in her. For the power of death will not overcome her (cf. Mt 16:18). On the other hand, the sin in the appearance of the Church is indeed really in the Church herself in so far as she is essentially 'body' and a historical structure and in so far as in this dimension there can be sin. For the existential source of sin, in which it fundamentally subsists, the 'heart', does lie deeper and further than the level of the historical and the social into which it must of course always necessarily erupt when accomplished and where it becomes the sin of the Church. But this sin in the Church is not a revelation of what the Church is in her own, proper, living roots, but on the contrary a contradiction veiling it from view; it is in a way an exogenetic illness in the bodily nature of the Church, not an endogenetic hereditary flaw in the Church herself (even though sin always betrays 'what is in man'). For sin strictly as such is always a contradicting of God and his Christ, who being himself without sin has expiated sin and overcome it, a contradicting of the Spirit of God through whom he has sanctified his bride in the word of life by the baptism of water. Sin is therefore also a contradiction of what the Church is. No one can sin in order to allow God's grace to appear more abundantly and more clearly (cf. Rm 3:5; 6:1), a truth which threatens to be obscured by a dialectical and gnostic kind of mysticism of sin which has been surreptitiously disseminating itself today even among Catholics. And therefore the Church is not sinful in order that God's grace might be revealed more abundantly; sin remains in her a reality [264] which contradicts her nature; but her holiness is the manifestation of her essential being.

It is true that we must make two qualifications in this proposition in order to avoid the appearance of allowing the logical distinction of concepts (which is also an expression of the real situation) to break up the sombre and salutary combination of reality.

First, in the concrete order of salvation whose first and last focal point is the cross of Christ, even the suffering consequent on a sin once it has been committed, the utter absence of remedy from a human point of view, the inconsolable fear which it produces, the earthly darkness which often allows the sin and the suffering consequent upon it to intermingle indistinguishably, can become the manifestation of the cross of Christ in the world and a sharing of its burden: the manifest consequence of sin can in Christ become the conquest of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

sin. When the Church suffers under sin, she undergoes redemption from her fault, for she suffers her fault in Christ the crucified, particularly since sin, in so far as it exists not in the hidden 'heart' but in the world and so in the Church, while it is sin (because the 'heart' must realise its own action always in the world if it is to exist) is equally already the consequence of sin (because the embodiment of the real and hidden evil in the heart) and since it is carried out as such in the Church gives the Church the possibility of expiating and conquering it. Hence if we encounter sin in the Church we should not forget this. We do not usually take scandal at sin in the Church but at the consequences of such sin. We are offended, for example, by the 'hardhearted clergy' not usually because they are empty of love before God, but because they give nothing to us or because their 'failure' humiliates our pride in the holy Church, as whose members we appear before the heathen, and brings us into disrepute in the eyes of those who are without. Why do we not love the Church in such a way as to suffer humbly and silently the ignominy of her sin? This would make her holy much more effectively than our protests against the scandals in the Church, no matter how much they may often be called for and however praiseworthy they may be, and no matter how little the protester should be reproved by anyone who has not previously gone into himself upon the protest, confessed his sin and striven to better himself.

Secondly, if sin in the Church is 'merely' a contradiction of her Spirit, a distortion and illness in her image, this does not make of sin something harmless. For the Church is meant to be the manifestation of God's [265] grace and holiness in the world; she is meant to be the temple of the Holy Spirit. But sinners in the Church make of this figure an expression of the evil of their heart, they make of it a 'den of thieves'. This frightful truth remains, however much it must also be said that sin and holiness in the image of the Church do not have the same relationship to her inner 'truth'.

II

We come now to our second question: sinful man before the holy Church of sinners. We are not asking, 'why and in what sense is this Church of sinners at the same time the holy Church?' For this question was dealt with at least by way of general indications in what we have just said. The other question seems to us to be more important at this point, namely the question how we ourselves, the children and members of this Church, come to terms with the fact of her sinfulness. More precisely, what must be our own attitude in order that this eternal scandal of the Church does not become a scandal for us but rather an edification of our own Christian life and so contribute for our part also to the building up of the Church?

Once more, this Church as she is in the concrete is the Church, the only Church, the Church of God and of his Christ, the home of our souls, the place where alone we find the living God of grace and of eternal salvation. For this Church is one with Christ and the Spirit of God – not confused with them but inseparable from them. From this Church there is no escape which could lead to salvation. One can flee into a sect or something similar. There one may be less burdened and molested by sin, by narrowness, by scandal. One can then have a magnificent alibi to show that one has nothing to do with 'this' Church; perhaps one is nearer to one's ideals, but not nearer to God. Nor can one appeal against the concrete Church to another ideal; for there is only that ideal which has been eternally identified with this Church and eternally lives in her, and from which one falls away oneself if one separates oneself from the unity of this Church, from her love, her faith and her obedience, in favour of a self-made ideal. It is not possible, so to speak, to want to found the Church anew by a kind of generatio aequivoca; for she has been founded once and for all by the one Lord. From her one can flee to her by complaining, weeping, beseeching in anger, accusing in zeal, but one can never be right in fleeing away from her; one can never abandon her [266] without losing to the same degree that which one professes to want to save.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Every spirituality, no matter how deep, which can no longer bear both the figures of the Church as virgin and as woman of sin – in humility and love, with the forbearance and the patience of God – reveals itself after a short period as fanaticism, as the spectre of a spirituality where man in the end remains caught up in himself. One must also give up the illusive desire of continually distinguishing 'accurately' between the 'divine' and the 'human and all-too-human' in the Church. To the extent that the Church herself does this (and she is here in reality broadminded and honest enough, if only we listen attentively to her), we too have the perfect right to lay claim to the freedom of the children of God in theology, in Church art, in practical life, in our method of prayer and our way to God, and no one, as Pius XI said with reference to theological opinions, ought to demand more of us than the Church, the mother of all, really (and not just presumably) demands of all. The more closely we get to know this Church, her life and her teaching, and the more open and unprejudiced is our attention to her directives, the more we will also note how wide this Church is and how much she frees us from ourselves to lead us into the breadth of God, even where she appears to impose limits and speak hard words. But if we begin to distinguish beyond the distinction of divine and human which she herself makes, where can we find an authentic criterion for our distinction? What guarantee is there, that we are not falling victim to our own narrow taste, that we are not rejecting the Holy Spirit (even if only in a particular sphere) when we attempt to trim and to purify the human element in the Church, or when we believe that we must discover and remove abuses and false developments?

Nevertheless, even assuming this primary and fundamental attitude, the honest Christian will see sins and shortcomings, scandals and failures in his Mother. And if he is really a Christian and if his eye and heart have been schooled in the inexorable demands of the gospel, for him perhaps more than for others does the question arise, can he deny the existence of the sins, should he cover them up or minimise them? No. He will of course as a mature person not be one of those who triumphantly try to demonstrate their objectivity and freedom of spirit by sweeping together from every corner of past and present history the scandals of the Church and spreading them out to view at every opportunity before all and [267] sundry, whether they want to know them or not. He will also of course understand that the seamier side of a great history (and the history of the Church is that even from a purely human point of view) does not necessarily have to form the main content of a first elementary text-book for beginners. He will not say that it is a falsification or glossing over of history, if the history of the Church is not turned into a chronique scandaleuse; for, even leaving aside all other considerations, the history of the Spirit of God in the Church is still more important and more interesting than the history of human meanness. But even for him there will remain a very noticeable dark patch in the history of the Church; and we will meet this dark patch not only in studying the history of the Church, but we will also come across it in our own lives, especially if we live with the Church and the more we do so. What effect this dark patch has on the individual naturally depends to a large extent on his spiritual temperament. But perhaps it is not even good that we should come to terms with it too easily.

But what is to be our attitude if we clearly catch sight of sin in the face of our holy Mother the Church, if in the sacred precincts of the House of God we encounter failure, corruption, the feathering of nests, the lust for power, gossiping, under-the-counter dealing or narrow-mindedness? We should see these things as men fully conscious from our own experience of being ourselves sinners. When we see the sins of others it is so easy for us to forget that we are all-too-prone to pray, 'Lord, I thank you that I am not as one of these sinners here, like these self-righteous Pharisees in the Lord's House', in other words, that even in the pose of the humble Publican we can be . . . Pharisees. If sin in the Church serves first of all to call to mind our own sinfulness, if it shocks us into remembering that our sins are the sins of the Church – whether we are priests or laymen, powerful or lowly people in the kingdom of God – that we all contribute our share to the Church's penury and want, and that this is the case even though our sins may not figure in any chronicle of the Church's scandals, then we have taken up the proper, that is the Christian, position to see the sins of the Church in their true light. Perhaps we will even then remonstrate, complain, struggle and attempt to better things, in so far as it lies within our power or falls to our duty; but first we will weep over our own sins by means of which we ourselves are crucifying the Son of God in his Church and obscuring the light of the gospel for the world. And we will bear the ignominy of the Church as our own and suffer it, [268] for it is in truth our own, because – whether we want to or not – we belong to her and have sinned in her. So we will comfort ourselves with that divine consolation so incomprehensible to the children of the world, the consoling fact that he has given us – each of us – a Mother whose sin is surrounded by God's mercy, a Mother upon whom, in spite of her daily sins, God bestows holiness and grace, who can never place her confidence in her own power and strength but only in God's mercy, which is grace and not merit.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If we look at the sin of the Church in this light, our eyes will also be ever more ready to observe the hidden and the manifold glory and holiness of this our mother the Church. If we usually see little of this, then the reason is not that we are observing the world and the Church exactly, critically and realistically, but that our eye is that of a still self-centred sinner, that our eye is weak and blinkered. But once we have honestly wept over the sins of the Church and our own sins, if in this confession of our fault it has dawned on us that all true holiness is a miracle of God and a grace and not something to be presumptuously taken for granted, then after being washed clean in the tears of repentance our eye may be capable of seeing clearly the sacred miracle which God daily renews in his Church: that in spite of everything her hands are today as yesterday overflowing with grace, that the entreaty of the Spirit and his inexpressible groaning still ascend from her heart, that the angels of God still carry the prayers of the just in this Church like incense before the throne of the eternal God, that her voice still proclaims the Lord's Word faithfully and unflinchingly with the clear firmness and single-mindedness of love, that she conceives life for her children ever anew in her maternal womb, that the Spirit of God continually wakens men to holiness within her – children and aged, prophets and hidden worshippers, heroes and crusaders – that in her the Lord's act of redemption continually takes place to the end of time. And always we will be able to repeat again, even with tears – whether they be tears of repentance or of joy – the prayer, 'I believe in the Holy Church'.

The Scribes and the Pharisees – they exist not only in the Church but everywhere and in every guise – will always haul 'the woman' before the Lord once more, and secretly delighted that 'the woman' is after all not (thank God!) any better than they are themselves, accuse her: 'Lord, this woman has been discovered in the very act of adultery. What do you say?' And this woman will not be able to deny it. No, it is a scandal. And there [269] are no extenuating circumstances. She thinks of her sins, because she has really committed them, and in doing so she forgets (how could a modest maid do other?) the hidden and the manifest glory of her sanctity. And so she has no intention of denying them. She is the poor Church of sinners. Her humility, without which she would not be holy, knows only of her guilt. And she stands before him whose bride she is, before him who has loved her and sacrificed himself for her in order to make her holy, before him who knows her sins better than any of her accusers. But he remains silent. He writes her sin in the sands of the world's history, which will soon be wiped out and her sin with it. He remains silent for a short while which to us seems to be thousands of years. And he passes judgement on this woman only through the silence of his love which pardons and absolves. Throughout the centuries new accusers stand

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

beside ‘this woman’, and they always slip away again one by one, beginning with the eldest; for never has anyone been found who was himself without sin. And at the end the Lord will be alone with the woman. And then he will stand erect and look upon this prostitute, his bride, and ask her, ‘Woman, where are your accusers? Has no one condemned you?’ And she will answer with inexpressible repentance and humility, ‘No one, Lord.’ And she will be astonished and almost dismayed that no one has done so. But the Lord will come close to her and say, ‘Then neither shall I condemn you.’ He will kiss her forehead and murmur, ‘My bride, holy Church.’

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[270]

18

THE SINFUL CHURCH IN THE DECREES OF VATICAN II

If we are to propose for our consideration a theology of the Church which is universal, exhaustive and fully developed in all directions, then there is one theme which can certainly not be omitted from it: the Church of sinners or, as we can also put it right away in order to bring out clearly the whole import and difficulty of the question, the sinful Church.

I

This topic must form part of any ecclesiology which considers its object in a thorough-going and balanced fashion, for that there are members of the Church who are sinners in the sense of living in a state of grave sin, that all the members of the Church,[1] if we exclude Mary, must truthfully [271] and humbly[2] confess, 'Forgive us our trespasses',[3] is simply an explicit dogma of the Church.

But then the question arises, how this fact is to be related to another fact which is equally a dogma: the Church is the holy Church. How are these two facts reconcilable, without reducing the holiness of the Church which is professed in the Creed to the invulnerable holiness of her objective institutions, her teaching and her sacraments?

In fact this question was a very live issue in the ancient Church and in medieval theology and it had there a very troubled history. It is a long way from St Paul's declaration that the Church is made holy 'without spot or wrinkle' (Ep 5:27) to the more sober realisation of St

[1] That sinners are still members of the Church in a real sense has been substantially defined by the Council of Constance (cf. the errors of Hus and Wyclif, e.g. DS 1201, 1203, 1205, 1296, etc.). The history of this dogma is well-known. Movements have constantly reappeared which were in the last analysis 'enthusiastic', like Montanism, Donatism, the various heretical wandering preachers and sectaries of the twelfth century, the Cathari, Wyclif and Hus, which harboured the dream of an utterly pure Church from which are excluded all those who have lost baptismal grace. Cf. R. A. Knox, Enthusiasm (Oxford 1950); H. Grundmann, Ketzergeschichte des Mittelalters (Göttingen 1963). It was to such doctrines that the Council of Constance finally put an end. Since Constance, however, its doctrine has been handed on in the customary teaching on membership of the Church without any further refinement (in part even in the theology of the Reformers): the sinner in a state of grave sin is quite simply a member of the Church, provided that he has not lost the faith. In this way of viewing things the Church is seen exclusively under the aspect of her visible and social nature and of the historical form in which she appears and from this is determined what constitutes (full) membership in her; it is stated that the sinfulness (even public) of a member does not touch the constitutive marks of the Church in the dimension under consideration and therefore does not alter the structure of membership in her and that membership itself. It is noteworthy that the new decree (no. 14, in emphasising the 'Spiritum Christi habentes') penetrates more deeply and sees more clearly without denying or obscuring what the Council of Constance has defined: the fully adequate nature of the Church includes also her holy Spirit, interior grace, and therefore this must also be called the grace of the individual within her if full membership is to be adequately described; consequently the sinner is not simply in the same sense and to the same full extent a member of the Church as the justified person. Between the two modes of membership there exists the same relationship as between a 'merely valid' and a 'valid and fruitful' sacrament. Even the merely valid sacrament is a true sacrament (otherwise it could never 'revive' in certain circumstances); but it is not what it should be and desires to be, namely the appearance of grace actually conferred. So the sinner's membership in the Church (as basic sacrament) is indeed valid, but it does not in fact confer what it signifies, the inner grace of the Church. Yet it remains true that the sinner is in a real sense a member of the Church.

[2] Cf. DS 1537.

[3] ibid., Mt 6:12; cf. also DS 229.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Augustine in his fight against the moral pride of Pelagius and Pelagianism, who held the sinlessness of the normal Christian to be a possibility, that St Paul's phrase is applicable in the strict sense only to the heavenly Church in the final consummation.[4] Accordingly, in patristic times and in the Middle Ages one spoke without hesitation of the sinful Church, of the Church [272] as the woman of sin, and this not only in the sense that the mercy of God has turned sinful humanity into the holy Church, that is of the sinful Church in so far as she is regarded in her origins, but also of the Church in so far as she is sinful now, of her sinfulness as a moral condition.

The Revelation of the New Testament at any rate knows that the reliability of a firm faith does not mean a false security. There is no fixation in grace. Even Peter denies the Lord. 'It would be incomprehensible, if such words and events were to have reference only to the acts by which the Church was founded and to have no further significance for her continuance once this had been secured. The New Testament never speaks of the assurances which have been granted to the Church of Christ without placing immediately next to them the threat of misuse, the possibility of defection. Nowhere is the spotlessness of the bride an already achieved fact which the bride only has to accept without troubling herself any further about it.'[5] The Pastoral Epistles already give evidence of defection and backsliding. No sacrament, no mission of the Spirit and no discernment of spirits is a final assurance of salvation, which comes from faith (cf. Heb 6:4 sq.).

The problem of the sinful Church is not, it is true, treated expressis verbis in the New Testament. There are sinful members of the Church (whether all are in this condition is not stated); it may remain questionable[6] whether the failure of a community can be regarded as the sin of the universal Church. The emphasis is placed – particularly in St Paul and St John – rather on the holiness and ideal figure of the Church. Historically it may be noticed that while we can recognise in the epistles of the New Testament a certain perplexity over the sinfulness which remains in spite of life in Christ, the whole force of the question of the 'sinful Church' as a whole in fact enters upon the scene (even conceptually) only later when in the third century the problem can no longer be by-passed owing to the beginning of an established Church. Yet the frequent parenesis reveals [273] how much sinfulness there still was in the universal Church; certainly it is nowhere stated that the Church as such is not affected by it.

Neither are the statements in the New Testament about the holiness and perfection of the Church such as to exclude sinfulness altogether. All the statements about holiness have a strongly eschatological character: the texts about the 'holy People of God' (Ac 15:14; 18:10; Rm 9:25; 2 Co 6:16; Tt 2:14; Heb 4:9; 8:10; 10:30; 13:12; 1 P 2:9 sq.), about the 'holy remnant', the 'new Jerusalem', the 'Bride of the Lamb', the 'Temple of God', the 'royal priesthood' (Rm 9:6; Heb 8:8; Ga 4:26; 2 Jn 1:13; Rv 12:1 sqq.), and so on, describe the Church to a certain extent from the point of view of her final end and her consummation,

---

[4] For the explanation of the text from Ephesians (5:27) given by the Latin Fathers (eschatological explanation), tradition, and modern Protestant and Catholic exegesis cf. especially H. Schlier, Der Brief an die Epheser (Düsseldorf 1957), p. 256 sq., particularly p. 258, note 4. For the exposition of the text in patristic tradition cf. E. von Dobschütz, Das Decretum Gelasianum in kritischem Text herausgegeben und untersucht, Texte und Untersuchungen 38, 4 (Leipzig/Berlin 1912), p. 236 sq. To complete this cf. Hugo Rahner, Symbole der Kirche: die Ekklesiologie der Väter (Salzburg 1964), p. 394 sq. For the exposition of the text in the early Middle Ages cf. A. M. Landgraf, Dogmengeschichte der Frühscholastik IV, 2 (Regensburg 1956), pp. 48-99.

[5] Hans Urs von Balthasar, 'Casta Meretrix' in Sponsa Verbi: Skizzen zur Theologie II (Einsiedeln 1961), pp. 203-305, here p. 218. For the Old Testament cf. p. 208 sqq., for the New Testament p. 215 sqq.

[6] It remains questionable because we must here prescind from the teaching of St Paul according to which the 'local Church' is not a mere administrative district of the Church, but – and this even with a certain priority – the concrete appearance of the Church as such, so that for St Paul the question can scarcely even be asked whether predicates which are accepted without reservation as applicable to the local Church can be denied of the Church simply as such.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

from 'above', without thereby wanting to make any statement about the presence or absence of sin in the Church as it actually exists: this would rather be the task of a description from 'below'. This principle of interpretation is applicable at least in part to St Matthew. The Church is continually threatened from within (Mt 24:10 sqq.), by false teachers and pseudo-prophets, by the temptation to misuse her mission, something which Jesus was not spared when he was tempted (Mt 4:1 sqq.); God grants a place in his Church even to the wicked, the weeds can grow until the time of the harvest, in the fishing-net there are both good and bad fish (Mt 13:24; 13:36; 13:47), all of which is certainly intended to describe not only the relationship of the Church to the 'world' but also an empirical situation of the Church in herself particularly since Matthew 16 and 18 refers to a penal process against sinful members of the community in which the 'binding' and 'loosing' presuppose a permanent relationship of the community to its sinful members, a relationship which does not exist in the same way towards those who are without (cf. 2 Co 2: 5-11; Co 5:1-13). Here as in St Matthew, the effect of Satan's working in the community is being described, as well as the fact that in the Church sin and holiness are interwoven in one texture and will be separated out only at the Judgement whereas now they are inseparable.

In St John and St Paul it is the ideal characteristics in the Church which are clearly brought to the fore. For the sinfulness of the Church perhaps the following can be cited. In general, the present is still the time of weakness, imperfection and temptation (1 Co 4:11 sqq. 13:9 sqq.; 2 Co 4:7 sqq.). In 1 Co 5:1-13, the community as a whole has failed in its duty ill the case of the man guilty of incest, as St Paul expressly notes, because it has not cut itself off from the sinner. Quarrels and divisions are other faults [274] which St Paul knows in the communities (1 Co 1:10 sqq.). At first sight it might be objected that the situation of 1 Co 5:1-13 cannot be pressed into use as supplying a biblical support for the question of the sinful Church, because the corrective for the community's sin is again an 'ecclesiastical court of appeal', namely the Apostle, who decides upon the definitive giving over of the sinner to Satan (1 Co 5:4 sq.; cf. 1 Tm 1:20), and in this way the purity of the community of salvation is restored. Yet precisely this act of the Apostle presupposes that the community as such must have known itself to be involved in the incest of the individual member, for St Paul knows that a judgement of separation such as he has made is quite unnecessary with regard to a heathen and that Christians can have uninhibited dealing with such a one because his behaviour does not affect the community as such (1 Co 5:9-13). In the case of the man guilty of incest the evil member is really in a religious and not merely sociological sense in the midst of the community and must therefore be 'got rid of'. His sin affects the community as such. On the other hand, the image of the Body, which is brought out here as in Ephesians, Colossians, Romans, Galatians, cannot be brought forward, as it often is, for the holiness of the Church; it signifies primarily the unity and harmony of the Church. Ephesians 4:15 sqq. speaks of a growth to the pleroma of Christ, therefore here the perfection of the Church is clearly being understood as an eschatological condition. In Hebrews our question is not immediately answered: while it is true that the people of God is a wandering people on the way and in a state of incompleteness in spite of its firm grip on the υ(πο/στασιφ, the characteristic failing being α)ποστη|=ναι (Heb 3:12), yet at the same time the people, consisting of 'με/ι<οξοι ξρισι<ου~' (Heb 3:14), is no longer as a whole subject to rejection (Heb 10: 24 sq.). But certainly individuals can lose their membership of God's people through 'sin' and thereby fall back into the state of Israel, the rebel people of God, the state of disobedience. Sin therefore here signifies exclusion from the community of salvation. How far this sin which arises within the ambit of the wandering people of God at the same time affects that people, is a question which is not expressly reflected upon any further.

In the seven letters to the Churches (Rv 2-3) the addressee is always the community as such, together with its bishop (2:7; 2:11, 17, 29; 3:6, 13, 22). Therefore here there is no difficulty in seeing the community itself as sinful, as needing conversion and as threatened by judgement.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The various scenes in the gospel involving sinful women have had from [275] the beginning a great deal of significance for the Fathers of the Church in their view of the concrete, living form of the Church. The whore in Luke 7, the Samaritan woman of doubtful morals with her five or six husbands (Jn 4:17 sq.), Mary Magdalene[7] and in general the dealings of Jesus with publicans and sinners (cf. Mk 2:15-16; Mt 9:11; Mt 11:19 and parallel), the adulteress in John 8 and other words of Jesus (Mt 21:31 sq.) and parables (cf. Lk 15:11 sq.) remain for the Fathers signs of a serious insight into sin and calamity within the Church.

Harking back to the zeal of the Old Testament prophets for the purity of Israel as the people of God, there was an increase in accusation and consciousness of sin but also in astonishment at the wonder of forgiveness and of grace in the face of the faithlessness of the elect people of God in the New Testament. The threats uttered by the prophets against fallen Jerusalem, Sodom and Gomorrah, Tyre and Sidon, Nineveh, the laments and many other fragments from Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Hosea and also from the Song of Songs become symbols of the power and the misery of sin in the Church. Rahab and her house,[8] the marriage of Hosea with the prostitute as a symbolical representation of the people's breach of faith with their Lord,[9] the first act of infidelity by Eve[10] and especially the Jerusalem texts (Ezk 16; 23; Jr 4:29 sqq.) which sound particularly severe,[11] the fate of Thamar and other themes[12] become for the Fathers and for medieval theology warnings for the Church, warnings which are always called out with bitter insistence at times when the passionate zeal of spiritually aroused prophets and of resolute Church reformers protesting against the overwhelming abuses and wrongs of the Church issues a call to repentance.[13] It is true that often there is mention of the sinful provenance of the Church, of the men of the Church (and [276] therefore not so often immediately of the Church as such), for in spite of the most vigorous denunciation the spotlessness of the Church[14] is never in any doubt; yet the reference is precisely to such men as constitute the Church and officially represent her, and who are therefore closely bound up with her very essence.

We do not here intend to give an account of the investigations which have been made into this ecclesiology of the Fathers, so that it will be sufficient to refer to the works cited.[15] But even these few indications surely suffice to show that the vital interest in this theological theme grew noticeably less in late scholastic and post-Tridentine theology, although of course

---

[7] For a full exposition see U. Holzmeister, 'Die Magdalenenfrage in der kirchlichen Überlieferung' ZKT XLVI (1922), p. 402 sqq., 556 sqq. Cf. also von Balthasar, loc. cit., p. 235 sqq.

[8] Cf. the many texts in H. U. von Balthasar, loc. cit., pp. 222-239; Jean Daniélou, Sacramentum Futuri (Paris 1950), pp. 217-232.

[9] H. U. von Balthasar, loc. cit., pp. 239-251.

[10] loc. cit., pp. 251-257.

[11] loc. cit., pp. 257-280.

[12] loc. cit., pp. 280-289; for the Babylon theme p. 289 sqq.; for the Shulammite p. 297 sqq.

[13] Cf. Yves M.-J. Congar, Vraie et fausse réforme dans l'église, Unam Sanctam 20 (Paris 1950), p. 155 sqq., 170 sqq., 200 sqq., 257 sqq., 220, and especially the third part, p. 356 sq., 539 sqq.

[14] Cf. H. Riedlinger, Die Makellosigkeit der Kirche in den lateinischen Hohelied-Kommentaren des .Mittelalters (Münster 1958).

[15] Cf. also G. Teichtweier, Die Sündenlehre des Origenes, Studien zur Geschichte der kath. Moraltheologie VII (Regensburg 1958), pp. 58-67, p. 250 sqq., p. 253 sqq., p. 294 sqq., p. 336 sqq.; for St Augustine cf. F. Hofmann, Der Kirchenbegriff des hl. Augustinus in seinen Grundlagen und in seiner Entwicklung (Munich 1933), pp. 233-257; M. Seybold, Sozialtheologische Aspekte der Sünde bei Augustinus, Studien zur Geschichte der katholischen Moraltheologie XI (Regensburg 1964).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

it was never denied that the Church must reckon sinful members as still part of her body.[16] In practice the Church was experienced as the established Church of a homogeneous Christian society. It was known and it was stated that many members of the Church were sinners and yet were still her members. But this fact which was admitted almost as a matter of course was not felt to be a vital problem of the Church herself. She herself was seen and praised as holy. If the question was asked why she is holy in spite of her sinful members (and will not just become holy at the end of time, as St Augustine and the majority of the Latin Fathers comforted themselves by saying), then on the one hand the 'objective' holiness of her institutions, her sacraments and her teaching were pointed out, and on the other – particularly in apologetics – it was emphasised with Vatican I[17] that the Church, as is evidenced by the number of her saints and martyrs and her beneficial influence on all spheres of society and culture, has always manifested and still manifests an inexhaustible and incomparable fruitfulness in all that is good; moreover, the Church through admonition, reproof, and all her means of grace works for the conversion of her sinful members.

Fundamentally even the encyclical of Pius XII 'Mystici Corporis' [277] contents itself with this answer now become traditional. The Church – against the tendency to be found in St Augustine – is somehow, without its being noticed, 'hypostasised', she becomes almost like an independently existent 'entity', which stands as teacher and guide over against the people of God; she does not appear to be this people of God itself (even though structured hierarchically) in its actual state of pilgrimage. For this reason it is easy to conceive her and understand her as 'holy' without the question arising whether or not (and how far) the sins and failings of her members fall on herself and, if so, how this can be reconciled with her true holiness which is part of the substance of her creed. Much less is it asked in a really radical and explicit way whether and to what extent even her 'objective', 'institutional' holiness in teaching, sacrament and law suffers a kind of reaction from the sinfulness of her members, if these objective realities are viewed not merely in abstraction but in their historical reality and in their actual realisation by human beings in the Church. But traditional theology by applying the distinction between objective and subjective holiness[18] already places these questions in parentheses or else dismisses them as of no consequence because of its apologetic interest inclining to the 'notae ecclesiae'[19] as the properties which make the Church definitely and clearly 'recognisable'. The immediate life of the Church has indeed preserved among believers, however nebulously, the consciousness of the constant need of cleansing and penitence in the Church. Evidence for this is given even today, for example, by the collects of the First Sunday in Lent and the Fifteenth Sunday after Pentecost.[20]

[278] In short, having examined the facts of the case and the history of the Church's dogmas we find the question of the Church of sinners to be a real one, one which has not

---

[16] Cf. Pius XII, Mystici Corporis, AAS XXXV (1943), p. 238, 202. Cf. DS 1201, 1203, 1205 sq., 1221, 2408, 2463, 2472-2478; also 1544, 1578, 1963 sq.

[17] Cf. DS 3013, 3014.

[18] Cf. e.g. J. Salaverri, 'De Ecclesia Christi' in Sacrae Theologiae Summa (Madrid 1962[5]), no. 1182-1192, 1204-1208, 1228-1263; 'Heiligkeit der Kirche', LTK V[2], 128-129 (F. Hofmann). For some further indications cf. K. Rahner, 'The Church of the Saints', Theological Investigations III (London & Baltimore 1967), pp. 91-104.

[19] For the concept of 'notae ecclesiae' and its history, cf. the corresponding article by A. Kolping in LTK VII[2], 1044-1048, and especially the indications of J. Ratzinger in LTK VI[2], 181; for the history cf. G. Thils, Les notes de l'église dans l'apologétique cath. depuis La Réforme (Gembloux 1937), p. 287 sqq.; B. Duda, Joannis Stoikovic de Ragusio O.P. († 1443) doctrina de cognoscibilitate ecclesiae (Rome 1958); A. Lang, Der Auftrag der Kirche, Fundamentaltheologie Bd 2 (Munich 1954), p. 554 sqq. It would be the task of a further investigation to decide whether the Constitution on the Church also gives in this matter at least implicitly some indications for new perspectives on the 'notae' or 'conditiones ecclesiae'.

[20] Cf. Missale Romanum, or. dom. XV post Pent.: '*Ecclesiam tuam, Domin*e, miseratio continuata mundet et muniat; et quia sine te non potest salva consistere, tuo semper munere gubernetur . . .'

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

been fully worked out or even today found its proper place sufficiently clearly in normal ecclesiology. And yet this question would seem to have an existential-religious importance for the life of the individual and of the Church as such. That the guilt of the individual (whether in the ranks of the shepherds or of the flock) has an importance for the Church and affects her being, is scarcely a topic which appears in the average teaching about sin in theology and in preaching, and yet it is not merely a theme of the oldest tradition beginning with scripture: without this doctrine of the sin and the guilt of the individual in its significance for the Church the whole history of penance with its many ramifications from its roots in the Old Testament and the New Testament right into the late Middle Ages becomes quite incomprehensible.

This theme can and must become of really wide-ranging importance in the religious life of the individual and in the 'awakening of the Church in souls'. And how should the consciousness of the Church as 'ecclesia semper reformanda'[21] be really alive in all its sharpness and depth (where it is a question of a permanent metanoia of the Church and not merely of an adaptation 'to the circumstances of the age' of the liturgy, law and pastoral practice), if one instinctively lives only in the consciousness that the individual persons in the Church could be at times imperfect and even sinful but in the case of the Church everything is always all right, because she is without any doubt 'holy' and no shadow of the shortcomings of her members can ever fall upon her?

This subject has also a great ecumenical importance. Protestant theology repeatedly complains that Catholic ecclesiology proceeds too much 'from above', that it sees the Church merely as an objective institution, an 'institute of salvation', and then glorifies this Church in a Luciferian theologia gloriae, instead of placing her, as the community of sinners which constantly flees anew from her ever renewed sin to the pure grace of God constantly re-actuated and which is only thus and in so far as she does this truly the Church, in a theologia crucis under the cross so that there she may not boast of her glory but acknowledge her sin and thereby [279] alone be 'holy'. Of course a Catholic answer to this 'protest' against a true or a supposed Catholic doctrine of the holiness of the Church, in order to be an adequate answer, has involved the whole Catholic doctrine of the relationship of nature and grace, of the meaning of grace, of the nature of justification, of the truth and falsity of the Lutheran principle 'simul justus et peccator',[22] of the relationship in Christian existence and in the Church between what is already present and the eschatological reality of the future. But the question how far in our doctrine we really take account of the pilgrim state of the sinful ecclesia crucis while acknowledging the holy ecclesia gloriae[23] and how far we treat it seriously in our Church life is a weighty question directed to us by Protestant theology. It is for this reason that our topic is also of eminent ecumenical importance.

II

Now the Constitution on the Church of the Second Vatican Council is not, and does not attempt to be, an absolutely complete ecclesiology. But neither is it on the other hand a Conciliar document which in order to repel a new heresy singles out one point or another to [21] Cf. Y. M.-J. Congar, O.P., Sainte Église, Unam Sanctam 41 (Paris 1963): 'Comment l'église sainte doit se renouveler sans cesse ?', pp. 131-154 (with many references to the witness of the Fathers and tradition).

[22] Cf. R. Hermann, Luthers These 'Gerecht und Sünder zugleich' (Darmstadt 1960[2]); W. Joest, Gesetz und Freiheit (Gottingen 1961[3]); H. Kösters, 'Luthers These "Gerecht und Sünder zugleich" ', Catholica XVIII (1964), pp. 48-77; 193-217: (a review and critique of H. Hermann with many bibliographical references).
[23] A notable attempt at a composite view of glory and cross in the image of the Church is to be found in Hugo Rahner, Die Kirche, Gottes Kraft in menschlicher Schwäche (Freiburg 1957).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

clarify and defend it. It discusses the Church in general and attempts to give a reasonably balanced and in some way adequate treatment of the nature of the Church. This is immediately evident from the whole structure of the decree and its sequence of chapters, and may also be deduced from the pastoral aim which the decree sets itself which can only be achieved by a certain completeness in its treatment of the topic. For this reason it is not an unfair question, or one making from the outset too great a demand on the document, if we attempt to ascertain what it has to say on the 'Church of sinners'.

In the first place, we must note quite simply, merely pointing out a fact and not making a complaint, that the Constitution on the Church does not treat this question with the explicit clarity, intensity and detail which one could perhaps have expected. This topic did not give rise to a single [280] paragraph, or even to any series of weighty principles. We will attempt to show in what follows, however, that the document does not remain completely silent on this topic, that it does in fact offer some very noteworthy points of departure for a theology of sin in the Church as such. But it can certainly not be said that this question is treated systematically, that it emerges clearly as a 'concern' of the authors of the decree or of the Council, or that the ecumenical importance of the question is made evident in what is said. (It might even be said that the parenetic impulse of the texts, if one may coin this phrase, is in almost every case a movement from what is good to what is better in virtue, not from sin and its recognition to an ever renewed reaching out towards pardoning grace, which would be possible even on the supposition of an interior justification, since the justified man always remains a sinner having need of an always new forgiveness by God.) It is in order for us to make this observation if only because in the Council a few Fathers in fact wished for more on this topic, although their suggestion did not make sufficient headway.[24] This fact is perhaps sufficient to show that our observation is not made merely on the basis of an entirely subjective point of view.

On the other hand the fact of a certain deficiency is also understandable; the Constitution was never conceived from the outset as the balanced and systematically complete summary of a whole ecclesiology. It grew slowly in an almost accidental way by filling out and adding to the pre-Conciliar schema, which at the beginning after all only set out to treat certain particular topics which were held to be of contemporary interest by that Roman theology which was primarily responsible for it. Furthermore, a [281] more penetrating treatment of this topic would not easily have been able to avoid the question whether and in what sense one could speak not only of a Church of sinners, that is of a Church in which there are those guilty of grave sin and in which all others too are in a certain sense sinners because of 'venial sins' (for example, according to the mind of St Augustine), but whether in fact one could also speak, indeed must speak, of a sinful Church, that is to say whether one could and must say this explicitly. Considering how matters stand or stood in contemporary theology and especially in the Theological Commission where the decree was elaborated, it would have been too much to hope for that a sufficiently large majority could have been reached in this [24] These voices did not only make themselves heard among the Fathers in the general emphasis on avoidance by the Church of every form of 'triumphalism'. Council Fathers like Bishop Stefan László (Eisenstadt, Austria) and others expressly demanded that this theme should be dealt with and put forward draft texts. Cf. László's speech, 'Sin in the Holy Church of God' in Y. Congar, etc. (Eds), Council Speeches of Vatican II (London & New York 1964), pp. 29-31. It is partly H. Küng's influence which can be recognised here, who already during the time of preparation for the Council drew attention to this subject; cf. e.g. his Justification: the Doctrine of Karl Barth and a Catholic Reflection (London 1965), [the German original of which was published in 1957]; The Council and Reunion (London 1962), pp. 34-52. Cf. also for this question, besides Congar's work already cited (note 21), Ch. Journet, L'Église du Verbe incarné, 2 vols (Bruges 1941, 1951), vol. I, XIII sq.; vol. II, 395 sq., particularly 893-894; H. de Lubac, Katholizismus als Gemeinschaft (Einsiedeln/Köln 1943), p. 61 sqq. The author may perhaps be permitted to draw attention to one or two modest attempts of his own, cf. especially 'The Church of Sinners', reprinted above in this volume.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

question without great difficulty. The awareness of many of the Fathers of the immediate theological and mediate ecumenical and pastoral significance of the problem was simply insufficiently developed for this. And in the traditional ecclesiology of the past century this topic was also not far enough evolved (beyond the doctrine that sinners are members of the Church) as to make it appear to a majority of the Theological Commission or of the Council Fathers self-evidently a topic to be treated expressly. This suffices to explain the fact of the Constitution's reserve regarding this question.

Nevertheless, the decree does not avoid the question completely, even though it does not present it all together in one place as a unified continuous statement. It does after all say so much that it offers to future theology plenty of incentive for development. The following considerations are intended to bring out into the open these possibilities contained in the decree itself.

III

To begin with, let us point out the framework which is in fact given in the Constitution for the doctrine of the Church of sinners: the doctrine of the pilgrim Church. The theme of the Church on the march, still making her pilgrimage through the history of the world and not having here any lasting abode, and so while in this state still bearing the 'form of the world' (no. 48), runs through the whole decree. It is indeed true that the decree in bringing out this aspect of the Church is thinking of her historical character and above all of the fact that she is and must be the Church of poverty, humility, temptation, suffering and persecution, [282] following in this way her crucified Lord. None the less she is clearly seen as ecclesia peregrinans, ecclesia viatorum, in contrast to the Church of the eternal consummation. And this already implies that the Church is not simply a heavenly entity passing through history as a stranger and untouched by it, not sharing in its life and its sorrow. If in the decree the concept of the people of God with whom God has made a covenant rightly stands in the foreground, almost being preferred to the concept of the 'mystical Body of Christ', and so becomes something of a guide-line for the whole of Conciliar ecclesiology, then with this representation of the Church as the community called together by God room is made or can be made from the beginning for the idea of the Church of sinners much more clearly than if the Church had been seen from the beginning only as an 'institute of salvation', which will certainly look after men for their healing, but which is not herself identified with her community (whereas for every individual she is as this hierarchically ordered People of God, which is the fruit of salvation, also the means of salvation).

Within this framework it is in the first place clearly stated that sinners still belong to the Church. The question whether an apostate from the faith still belongs to the Church in the same sense as the believing sinner is passed over. As already stated, in no. 14 the grace of justification is seen also in its significance for incorporation into the Church.[25] In any case, [25] Provided (a) that the 'Spiritum Christi habentes' is understood of the grace of justification; and (b) the 'Ecclesiae societati' is taken not reduplicatively but specificatively, or that these two possibilities remain in the balance. If the Church is intended precisely as the visible society, then of course there can be no question of the grace of justification being a constitutive element of incorporation into this society as such, and the 'Spiritum Christi habentes' is only specificative: not the reduplicative qualification of the subject of the whole sentence ('Illi…'). But if 'Ecclesiae societati' means simply the Church, which is a society (specificative), then the 'Spiritum Christi habentes' can and must be taken as one of the constitutive elements of 'full' incorporation ('plene incorporantur'). The ambiguity of the sentence cannot be avoided by an appeal to the 'plene', for we can conceive of both a 'full' incorporation into the Church as society and a 'full' incorporation into the Church as a society filled with the Spirit, the two of which are not simply identical. If every sin did not involve a certain rejection of the Church by the sinner it could not be said that through the Sacrament of Penance a 'reconciliari

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

no. 14 declares clearly that there are men who are incorporated into the [283] Church but are not justified (in caritate non perseverans). It is then explained, making use of an 'Augustinian' expression, that they belong 'corpore' but not 'corde'[26] to the Church. It is therefore not overlooked that an incorporation which is absolute and in every respect full does imply the grace of the Church. And so at any rate it is stated that there are sinners in the Church, in 'her bosom' (in Ecclesiae sinu). By the fact therefore that a man is an enemy of God, devoid of grace, given up to the slavery of sin and to the power of the Devil,[27] he does not cease to be 'incorporated' in the society of the Church (Societas Ecclesiae).

It is of course true that of itself the above-mentioned '"corpore" quidem, sed non "corde" (in ecclesiae sinu) remanere' permits of many further interpretations.[28] But if one takes into account all aspects of the whole decree and the theological tradition immediately underlying it, one must objectively say that it is a question here of a genuine incorporation which has a positive value for salvation.[29] One might also say that it has the same kind of positive significance for salvation as belongs to a sacrament which has been validly but unfruitfully received (especially baptism), which ought not to have been received in this way, but which can 'revive' and in fact brings with it an obligation and inner dynamism to being revived. This is already involved in the statement that even in the case of the sinner (who is also included in the intention of the whole principle) there is given the vinculum sacramentorum (cf. no. 14).[30] But [284] all this implies conversely that these sinners co-determine the 'quality' (if we may use this word) of the Church herself. They still belong after all – and from the point of view of social life even 'plene' – to the corpus of the Church (incorporantur) and are members of the people of God marshalled in the Catholic Church. The Church does not only stand over against them like an institute of salvation which, while remaining itself quite untouched, regrets that its care did not have more success, but must regard these sinners as a part of herself, as her members.[31] Actually, then, the decree cum Ecclesia' (no. 11) is brought about. Cf. in connection with these thoughts K. Rahner, 'Forgotten Truths concerning the Sacrament of Penance' in Theological Investigations II (London & Baltimore 1963), pp. 135-174 (with further bibliographical references).

---

[26] St Augustine, Bapt. c. Donat. V, 28, 39 (PL XLIII, 197): 'Certe manifestum est id quod dicitur, in Ecclesia intus et foris, in corde, non in corpore cogitandum.' Cp. also the parallel texts from St Augustine cited in note 12 of the second chapter of the Constitution with the formulation used in the text itself.

[27] Cf. DS 1668.

[28] In St Augustine it often has almost the meaning of mere appearance, of something fictitious: chaff on the threshing-floor of the Church. Cf. for this the above-named study by F. Hofmann, Der Kirchenbegriff des hl. Augustinus (Munich 1933); J. Ratzinger, Volk und Haus Gottes in Augustins Lehre von der Kirche (Munich 1954); H. U. von Balthasar, Augustinus: Das Antlitz der Kirche (Einsiedeln 1955[2]). For the continuing existence of similar formulas among the early Scholastics, cf. A. M. Landgraf (see note 4 above), pp. 60-63, 72, 84, 88, 99.

[29] This can be said because this 'incorporation' still signifies a connection with Christ, at least through the compago visibilis, through the vincula professionis fidei, sacramentorum et ecclesiastici regiminis ac communionis (no. 14).

[30] This statement can of course raise the question whether the baptised person who has become an unbeliever does not also still possess this 'vinculum sacramentorum' and at least in the case of merely 'internal' disbelief, that is disbelief which does not become socially obvious, still have the vinculum professionis fidei (which is something else than faith itself) and so is still incorporated into the Church just as much as a mere sinner. It seems that with the majority of theologians we can answer this question without any difficulty in the affirmative, without deviating from the decisions reached in no. 14, because this passage does not concern itself with that question. Cf. K. Rahner, 'Membership of the Church according to the Teaching of Pius XII's Encyclical "Mystici Corporis Christi"' in Theological Investigations II (London & Baltimore 1963), pp. 1-88, esp. p. 13 sq., and p. 8, note 8.

[31] How far the Constitution on the Church gives us here as in other connections a deeper insight into the significance for salvation of the Church in general, and how far this picture of the Church differs from patristic and medieval ecclesiology and from that which dominated the nineteenth century, would have to be the subject of a special investigation.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

recognises the fact that the Church is a sinful Church and not merely that in her (the holy institute of salvation) there are sinners (as object of her ministrations). It is true that the Constitution avoids the expression 'sinful Church'. But it brings out the fact behind the expression, namely that the Church is herself affected by the sins of her members. How exactly this effect upon the Church is to be theologically conceived is a matter about which the decree has nothing to say, so that we must return to this question towards the end of the present article. But that according to the Constitution the Church is affected in this way there can be no doubt. In the first place, it is expressly stated that the sins of Christians 'wound' the Church ('peccando vulnerare'). Of course of itself this could be interpreted as meaning that the wounding of the Church consists formally in the (social, public, etc.) consequences of sin which are to be found in the Church, not that the Church herself in a certain sense is the subject of these sins on the part of her members; in other words that she is only damaged by sin but does not thereby herself become sinful. But it is expressly stated that the Church is 'semper purificanda' (no. 8), that she 'poenitentiam et renovationem semper prosequitur' (no. 8), that she 'seipsam renovare non desinat' (no. 9), which must surely at least [285] include a moral renewal,[32] since the whole context makes it clear that the Church by this means is and remains the faithful bride worthy of the Lord. But the Church cannot be the subject of her own renewal and purification if she was or is not also in the first place and in a certain sense[33] the subject of sin and guilt. It would be a most arbitrary form of hermeneutics to maintain that 'Church' here signifies all of a sudden merely the average mass of individual believers. 'Church' means here what it means everywhere else: simply the Church. She is 'in proprio sinu peccatores complectens' (no. 8) and therefore has not only external but also internal 'afflictiones et difficultates' (no. 8), even in the same way ('pariter'). It would be quite arbitrary to want to exclude precisely moral afflictions and difficulties.[34]

Quite in accordance with this it is said in no. 65 that the Church only in Mary 'ad perfectionem iam[35] pertingit, quae est sine macula et ruga'. So the Augustinian interpretation of Ephesians 5:25-27 is in a certain way taken up and completed here: the Church herself as being in a pilgrim state has (apart from Mary) still the 'macula et ruga'; believers (Christifideles)[36] must still 'peccatum devincere' (no. 65); 'incessanter renovemur' (no. 7, cf. Ep 4:23). On this basis one can without hesitation understand [286] the following of the Church herself where it is said, 'Cum vero in multis offendimus omnes (cf. Jn 3:2), misericordiae Dei jugiter egemus atque orare quotidie debemus: "Et dimitte nobis debita nostra" (Mt 6:12)' (no. 40). It is in a way regrettable that the footnotes in the text[37] do not

[32] It is significant that the charisms also serve the 'renovatio ecclesiae', as is made clear in no. 12. The permanent necessity for the charisms is thus implicitly presupposed.

[33] This sense must be harmonised with the fact that (a) only physical substances which are free subjects can be the subjects of faults and moral renewal in the strictest sense, and (b) the Church is 'indefectibiliter sancta' (cf. no. 36). It is always to be kept in mind that if, because of (a), one refuses to admit this wider but true and religiously important sense of 'subject of sin and conversion', it will also be impossible to conceive of the Church as the subject of (subjective) holiness, which is something that must be maintained by reason of the whole theology of the New Testament, the Creed and the rest of tradition.

[34] The 'proprio' in the passage just quoted from no. 8, 'in proprio sinu peccatores complectens', is emphasised because it is stated by contrast with Christ who – himself without sin – came to blot out the sins of the people. Cf. also no. 42, where it is stated of holy people that they are to be found 'in sinu' of the Church, which clearly presupposes that their holiness is of some significance for the holiness of the Church.

[35] With this 'iam' the reference must be to the privilege of Mary's complete sinlessness while she was on earth (DS 1516, 1573, 2800 sqq.), because in heaven the Church is 'sine macula et ruga' also in the other saints.

[36] The transition in this sentence (cf. no. 65) from 'Ecclesia' (first clause) to 'Christifideles' (second clause) is noteworthy. Clearly the redactors of the text here shrank from saying openly that the Church still has to conquer the sin within her and so grow to holiness.

[37] Cf. note 3 of Chapter V (no. 40): references to St Augustine and to 'Mystici Corporis'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

refer to the Council of Carthage of 418[38] and to the Council of Trent.[39] For these texts would really be 'loci classici' compared to those in fact referred to. Nevertheless, the notes on this do draw attention to St Augustine (besides Pius XII); it was this anti-Pelagian conviction 'we are all sinners' of St Augustine and of the Council of Carthage (looking back to St Paul in Rm 3:23; 5:18, etc.) which was the reason for St Augustine's declaring the Church herself to be sinful and promising her the perfection 'without spot or wrinkle' only in eternity. But if the Church herself can be seen as being in a certain sense the subject of the guilt of her members, then it also becomes intelligible how she can be understood as the subject of 'tentationes' (no. 9: 'per tentationes vero . . . procedens ecclesia'), where the 'tentationes' must he understood as temptations to sin and not as mere 'difficulties' and 'trials', as they would otherwise be indistinguishable from the 'tribulationes' named in the same sentence. This being so, it has an ecclesiological significance and is a statement not merely referring to the individual or perhaps even understood individualistically, when it is said of the lay-people in the Church that they have the duty 'regnum peccati in se devincere' (no. 36), and when the bishops themselves too are regarded as still having the duty 'mores ad bonum commutare' (no. 26). Precisely in connection with this service towards the erring and ignorant brother is adduced the fact that the Shepherd, who has himself been taken from among men is clothed with weakness (cf. Heb 5:1 sq.).

Admittedly the question is not further discussed how the leaders in the Church not only can themselves be sinners but in fact are all such in the Augustinian sense,[40] and above all how this sinfulness inevitably, even though not necessarily in the same degree, has its effect upon the whole exercise of their office and how in this way the Church almost necessarily even in her official sphere is 'sinful' in a quite specific sense: the decree does not go any further into these questions or develop them.

[287] Since it goes beyond the subject matter of this essay, we only briefly point out the fact that the decree again and again brings into prominence the power of the Church constantly to overcome the sin existing within her, a power given her by God in his Spirit through Christ. Her members can and must fight against the Prince of this World (no. 48), they must transform the world which after all also exists in the Church (cf. no. 31; 35), they must conquer sin in themselves (no. 65). In the Church there exists moreover the ministerium reconciliationis (cf. no. 28) and the permanent making present and applying of the one, expiatory sacrifice of the cross of Christ (cf. no. 3; 28).

In much the same way the doctrine of the Church of sinners is found explicitly or implicitly in other documents of the Second Vatican Council. In the Decree on Ecumenism (no. 4)[41] it is admitted that for the separated brethren and for the world the face of the Church is 'less' resplendent because of the lack of Christian zeal and so the growth of God's kingdom is retarded. The Church must every day be 'purified and renewed' until she can present herself to Christ at the end 'glorious and without spot or wrinkle'.[42] Therefore there is no hesitation in addressing the Church herself as the subject of purification and renewal, even if that from which she must be purified is indicated in somewhat too careful and mild a way (as a want of that 'fervor' which gives rise to the duty of striving after 'perfectio christiana'). But in so far as Ephesians 5:27 is interpreted in the Augustinian way, an indication is also given that the want of 'zeal' and the necessity to strive after 'perfection' have as their reason the sin within the Church. In no. 6 there is talk of the 'renovatio Ecclesiae',[43] of a 'perennis reformatio'[44]

[38] Cf. DS 229-230 (can. 7 and 8).
[39] Cf. DS 1537 (Decree on Justification, chapter 11).
[40] Cf. DS 229-230, 1573.
[41] AAS LVII (1965), p. 95.
[42] loc. cit.
[43] loc. cit. p. 96.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation of which the Church qua humanum terrenumque institutum has constant need, in which is expressly included a reformation 'in moribus'. But this necessarily involves as the terminus a quo a state of sin from which the Church must be 'purified' in a permanent 'reformation'. This becomes all the clearer when it is emphasised in this decree that this reformation must begin with the 'interior conversio'[45] to a 'novitas mentis' (no. 7).[46]

It is true that a certain timidity becomes evident when the decree explicitly speaks of the sins against unity and of the prayer for forgiveness, [288] where the subject of the sin and of the prayer for forgiveness is 'we' (no longer the Church!) (ibid.). Similarly in no. 3[47] the decree only speaks of the fact that the separations from the Catholic Church took place 'non sine hominum utriusque partis culpa'. Hence there is fault also on the Catholic side, but it is expressly laid at the door only of her 'men', which does not of course exclude a fault on the part of the Church herself, particularly since the persons immediately concerned in this fault are the officials of the Church who act juridically in the name of the Church, so that their fault affects the Church as such in a very palpable way.

IV

On the other hand, according to the Constitution on the Church, the Church is 'indefectibiliter sancta' (no. 39) and therefore is repeatedly called with the Creed simply 'Ecclesia sancta' (no. 5:8; 26:32 etc.),[48] 'sponsa immaculata' (no. 6), 'gens sancta' (no. 9), 'digna sponsa' (no. 9), 'sacerdotium sanctum' (no. 10), 'populus Dei sanctus' (no. 12). How the Church can be at the same time the sinful Church of sinners and the holy Church is a matter which the Constitution does not really consider explicitly. Certainly the Augustinian solution alone does not suffice, according to which it is the Church in eternity which will be holy 'without spot or wrinkle' and this is applied by way of anticipation to the Church without qualification. It does not suffice, because in this document it is to the earthly Church that the quality of holiness is ascribed.[49] Clearly the meaning of the Constitution is not satisfied by the 'objective' sanctity of her institutions and doctrines either. For reference is repeatedly made to the 'subjective' holiness of her members in this context. The whole of chapter V is evidence of this. But the functions of chapters IV and VI, too, can only be meaningful within the context of the whole decree if the necessity of this 'subjective' holiness is recognised. Hence the Church must be 'subjectively' at once 'holy' and sinful. But how and in what sense this is possible is a question which is not considered in any more precise detail.

[289]It is stated that the Church on earth has a 'vera sanctitas, licet imperfecta' (no. 48). One could be led from this into thinking simply that the same is true of her holiness as is true of the holiness of the justified individual: he is truly holy through the grace of justification but his holiness is still in danger and has still to find its fulfilment and perfection.[50] This holiness must still be 'actualised', as it is expressly put in no. 40. One could add that the decree furthermore explicitly presupposes that there are in the Church as a matter of fact such

---

[44] loc. cit. p. 97.
[45] In no. 8 (loc. cit., p. 98) the expression 'cordis conversio' is used.
[46] loc. cit., p. 97.
[47] loc. cit., p. 93.
[48] Accordingly the document speaks of the 'sanctitas Ecclesiae' (cf. nos. 39, 42, 47, 48) and not just of the holiness of individual Christians; cf. also the expression 'sanctitas Populi Dei' (no. 40).
[49] Cf. for the exegesis of this the bibliography cited in note 4 above.
[50] Cf. for the New Testament H. Küng, 'Rechtfertigung und Heiligung nach dem Neuen Testament' in M. Roesle and O. Cullmann, Begegnung der Christen, Festschrift für Otto Karrer (Frankfurt 1960), pp. 249-270.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

justified persons, even persons in a state of great perfection, as chapters V and VI presume and expressly state (cf. e.g. no. 42).

But by establishing that there are in the Church both sinners and just (even perhaps of great perfection), are the two statements really reconciled? The possibility and reality of the reconciliation of these two would become more apparent if one were to take into account that in Mary at least the earthly Church has already reached that 'perfectio' by which she is 'without spot or wrinkle' (cf. no. 65). But a simultaneous assertion of these two propositions is clearly insufficient. No matter how correct, it would be an evasion in the face of the particular structure of our question. The solution would be too hasty. For the 'indefectibilitas' of the holiness of the Church (no. 39) does not belong to the holiness of the individual (even with regard to his 'ontological' and subjectively still imperfect holiness).[51] Therefore this 'indefectibilitas' of the Church's holiness has not yet been made intelligible.

But the very concept clearly signifies that the relationship of sin and holiness in the Church is not the merely external, dialectical one of the juxtaposition of sin and holiness (distributed among different members), but that the holiness of the Church has a precedence over her sinfulness, so that in the eyes of God the ultimately determining predicate of the Church is not her sinfulness but the holiness effected in her by God's eschatological action, the sanctification bestowed upon her by God in Christ which constantly triumphs over sin. For this reason it is impossible simply to transfer to the relationship between the sinfulness and holiness of the Church the relationship between sin and holiness as in a Catholic sense it can be said to exist in the justified individual whom one can also [290] call 'simul justus et peccator'.[52] Nowhere is it more apparent that the essence of the Church is not merely the sum of her individual members. But it is precisely at this point that the decisive problem is situated, for this proper 'essence' of the Church must not be allowed to give rise to a false 'hypostasisation' of the Church.

But the decree does not reflect on any of these exact distinctions. One can only refer to no. 48, where there is at least a point of departure for the solution of this more precise problem. Through Christ, his incarnation, his cross and his glorification, the eschatological situation is already present. 'Iam (ergo) fines saeculorum ad nos pervenerunt (cf. 1 Co 10:11) et renovatio mundi irrevocabiliter est constituta atque in hoc saeculo reali quodam modo anticipatur: etenim Ecclesia iam in terris vera sanctitate licet imperfecta insignitur'. But this means in effect:[53] through Christ and his victory upon the cross there is given to redeemed humanity as a whole, and therefore above all to the Church, not only the possibility of salvation, but by his grace which is in fact victorious there is given and manifested the realisation of this possibility. Because the eschatological victory of Christ has brought it about and made it manifest that the efficacious (and not merely sufficient) grace of God and Christ is not only possible but is in fact given, and this to the end of time, the Church as a

[51] Cf. DS 1541, 1544, 1573, etc.

[52] For 'simul iustus et peccator' cf. the bibliography cited in note 22 above. For Luther cf. the critical work of W. Joest, 'Paulus und das lutherische Simul Iustus et Peccator' in Kerygma und Dogma I (1965), pp. 269-320; for a possible Catholic understanding of this formula cf. H. Küng, Justification: the Doctrine of Karl Barth and a Catholic Reflection (London 1965); H. U. von Balthasar, Karl Barth: Darstellung und Deutung seiner Theologie (Cologne 1962[2]), p. 378 sqq. (Cf. also the literature cited there by R. Grosche, A. Kirchgässner, H. Volk); cf. K. Rahner, 'Justified and Sinner at the Same Time' in this volume p. 218 sqq.

[53] To bring out this connection of subject-matter it would have been more appropriate to make use here (no. 48) of the expression 'indefectibilis sanctitas' (no. 39), for it is not just an imperfect though true holiness such as already existed, for example, under the Old Covenant which is the special characteristic of the Church's eschatological situation, but the indefectibility of this holiness (parallel to the charism of indefectibility in truth of the Church's witness as an institutional entity, which also did not exist in the Old Testament, which did not know or possess an 'infallible magisterium').

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

whole,[54] through this predestination of efficacious grace made visible in Christ, is preserved [291] by God, antecedently to the actual behaviour of her members, from falling away from the grace and promises of God in any fundamental and essential way. Hence the Church is (even subjectively) 'indefectibiliter sancta'. For this reason the relationship of the Church as a whole to justice and sin is not the relationship of a neutral freedom or indifference to two possibilities which are, as it were 'objectively' (from her point of view), on the same level. She is as a whole, from the human point of view, one who is utterly incapable by her own power of performing any saving act or of reaching a state of justice,[55] who is therefore in this sense also sinful; and she is by God's prevenient, efficacious grace to which she has been absolutely predestined one who has been raised to true holiness, even though on earth this divinely bestowed holiness still has to grow. This predestination by God of efficacious grace for the Church as a whole has already superseded man's freedom, without destroying or damaging it, and this has been made manifest in Christ's victory: therefore for the Church, which after all has been brought into being by God and not by men, it is the predicate of holiness which is the decisive and determining factor as opposed to her sinfulness.

Yet the appellation 'the Church of sinners' has a profound meaning. Not only every individual in the Church must truthfully and humbly confess himself a sinner,[56] but also the Church, for she is the community of these sinners. As such a community of sinful men redeemed and organised by Christ (the fruit of salvation), she is also the instrument by means of which God effects the salvation of the individual (the means of salvation). She would not be the really existing people of God but a purely ideal entity, possessing an almost mythological character, if one were to think that the sinfulness of her members did not also determine herself. Only if the Church recognises herself to be the Church of sinners will she be permanently convinced[57] of the fact, and aware of the full [292] force of the obligation it entails, that she has a constant need of being cleansed, that she must always strive to do penance and achieve inner reform (cf. no. 8). Otherwise all demands for reform will become merely presumptious prescriptions and inefficacious desires all of which, while they can perfect the legal system of an institution and develop a pastoral technique on the grand scale, are not in touch with real life, true faith, and the human Church. Once it is kept clearly in mind that the Church on earth is always the Church of sinners, then it becomes intelligible how and why she is the holy Church: namely by the grace of God, which alone does not permit the Church as a whole to fall away from God's grace and truth and so makes her indefectibly holy. This grace operates in the Church as such particularly where she actualises her whole essence fully, that is in the definitive witness to her faith and in the sacraments.[58]

---

[54] Naturally nothing is stated thereby about the individual member of the Church as such. He can suffer the loss of grace and normally does not know whether he will persevere in grace (cf. DS 1534, 1540, 1541, 1563 sq.). Cf. a few remarks on this by K. Rahner, 'Justified and Sinner at the Same Time', above p. 218 sqq. Cf. note 52 above.

[55] Cf. DS 1541 sqq., etc.

[56] Cf. DS 229, 230; 1537.

[57] Consciousness of the necessity for such constant renewal need no longer be rejected as suspect since the highest authority in the Church has himself made this element the matter of his concern: cf. the allocution of Paul VI 'ad Emmos Patres Cardinales, Exmos Praesules, Revmos Praelatos ceterosque Romanae Curiae Officiales' in AAS LV (1963), pp. 793-800, e.g. '…ma trova la Curia stessa all'avanguardia di quella perenna riforma, di cui la Chiesa stessa, in quanto istituzione umana e terrena, ha perpetuo bisogno' (p. 797); cf. the talk about 'perenne rinnovamento' (ibid.); cf. also Julius Cardinal Döpfner, Die Reform als Wesenselement der Kirche (Würzburg 1965).

[58] The official life of the Church and its functions in doctrine, cult, sacraments, government and ecclesiastical discipline need not necessarily possess without further qualification under all circumstances and in every condition the same quality of eschatological indefectibility which we must ascribe to the Church as a whole. For the meaning of this question, its answer and its consequences, cf. K. Rahner, 'The Church and the Parousia of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Since ultimately this is always and in every individual case the work of efficacious, unmerited grace, and not at man's free disposal, that 'actualistic' element in the being and action of the Church which Protestant theology quite falsely finds wanting in Catholic ecclesiology is in fact present in a Catholic understanding of the Church. Even the most 'objective' and most 'institutional' element in the Church is only accomplished, and rightly accomplished from every point of view, under the grace of God. And if the Church is holy not only institutionally but also 'subjectively' and her holiness is a reality already present here and now, and not a mere juridical claim or an eschatological hope for future credit, then God gives this holiness to the Church in so far as he grants to her and her members the possibility and the reality of constantly fleeing from their sinful state to the mercy of God which alone makes holy.

[293]

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTE TO CHAPTER 18

The following bibliography only gives a selection of the secondary literature utilised in the above essay. It does not make any claim to be complete.

Balthasar, H. U. von, 'Casta Meretrix' in Sponsa Verbi: Skizzen zur Theologie II (Einsiedeln 1961), pp. 203-305.
Balthasar, H. U. von, Augustinus: Das Antlitz der Kirche (Einsiedeln 1955[2]).
Congar, Y. M.-J., Vraie et fausse réforme dans l'église, Unam Sanctam 20 (Paris 1950).
Congar, Y. M.-J., 'Comment l'église sainte doit se renouveler sans cesse?' in Sainte Église, Unam Sanctam 41 (Paris 1963), pp. 131-154.
Daniélou, J., Sacramentum Futuri (Paris 1950), p. 217 sqq.
Dobschütz, E., von, Das Decretum Gelasianum in kritischem Text herausgegeben und untersucht, Texte und Untersuchungen 38, 4 (Leipzig/Berlin 1912), p. 236 sq. (A history of patristic interpretation of Ep 5:27).
Grundmann, H., Ketzergeschichte des Mittelalters, Die Kirche in ihrer Geschichte, Band II, Lieferung G, Teil I (Göttingen 1963).
Holzmeister, U., 'Die Magdalenenfrage in der kirchlichen Überlieferung' in ZKT XLVI (1922), pp. 402-422, 556-584.
Hofmann, F., Der Kirchenbegriff des hl. Augustinus in seinen Grundlagen und in seiner Entwicklung (Munich 1933), p. 233 sqq.
Knox, R. A., Enthusiasm (Oxford 1950).
Küng, H., Justification: the Doctrine of Karl Barth and a Catholic Reflection (London 1965).
Küng, H., 'Rechtfertigung und Heiligung nach dem Neuen Testament' in M. Roesle and O. Cullmann, Begegnung der Christen, a Festschrift for Otto Karrer (Frankfurt a.M. 1960), pp. 249-270.
Küng, H., The Council and Reunion (London 1962), pp. 34-52.
Landgraf, A. M., Dogmengeschichte der Frühscholastik IV/2 (Regensburg 1956), pp. 48-99.
László, S., 'Sin in the Holy Church of God' in Y. Congar, H. Küng and D. O'Hanlon (Eds), Council Speeches of Vatican II (London & New York 1964), pp. 29-31.
Lubac, H., de, Katholizismus als Gemeinschaft (Einsiedeln/Köln 1943), p. 61 sqq.
Rahner, Hugo, Die Kirche, Gottes Kraft in menschlicher Schwäche (Freiburg 1957).
Rahner, Hugo, Symbole der Kirche: die Ekklesiologie der Väter (Salzburg 1964), p. 394 sq.

Christ', below p. 295 sqq., particularly the third section, p. 305 sqq. The ideas developed in that essay are also in other ways the basis of the present article and can serve to complete it and exclude misunderstanding of it.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Rahner, Karl, 'The Church of Sinners' in this volume pp. 253-269
Rahner, Karl, 'Membership of the Church According to the Teaching of Pius XII's Encyclical "Mystici Corporis Christi"' in Theological Investigations II (London & Baltimore 1963), pp. 1-88.
Rahner, Karl, 'Forgotten Truths Concerning the Sacrament of Penance' in Theological Investigations II (London & Baltimore 1963), pp. 135-174.
Rahner, Karl, 'The Church of the Saints' in Theological Investigations III (London & Baltimore 1967), pp. 91-104.
Rahner, Karl, 'The Church and the Parousia of Christ' in this volume pp. 295-312.
Rahner, Karl, 'Justified and Sinner at the Same Time' in this volume pp. 218-230.
[294] Ratzinger, J., Volk und Haus Gottes in Augustins Lehre von der Kirche (Munich 1954).
Riedlinger, H., Die Makellosigkeit der Kirche in den lateinischen Hohelied-Kommentaren des Mittelalters (Münster 1958).
Schlier, H., Der Brief an die Epheser (Düsseldorf 1957), p. 256 sqq.
Seybold, M., Sozialtheologische Aspekte der Sünde bei Augustinus, Studien zur Geschichte der katholischen Moraltheologie, XI (Regensburg 1964).
Teichtweier, G., Die Sündenlehre des Origenes, Studien zur Geschichte der katholischen Moraltheologie VII, (Regensburg 1958).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[295]

19

THE CHURCH AND THE PAROUSIA OF CHRIST

While the title chosen for this systematic paper is 'The Church and the Parousia of Christ', the word 'Parousia' can and must be understood as including all those events of the divinely effected consummation which in Catholic theology are customarily comprised in the phrase 'The Last Things', and not only that particular moment of them which we call the 'Second Coming of Christ'. This is justified not merely by the fact that it is scarcely possible to establish a special relationship of the Church, her nature and her existence, to the Second Coming of Christ as such in the narrower sense alone, but also by the fact that the reality of the Second Coming which can be expressed in dogmatic terms, in so far as it can and must be distinguished from its mode of expression, is scarcely separable from the Last Things as a whole, as long as these are thought of (as is naturally the case here) in their relationship to the fulfilment of the whole world's history and not merely to the fulfilment of the individual as such. For otherwise we could only say of the Parousia of Christ that it is nothing more than the completion of history (Christ's, humanity's, and the world's) in God, in so far as it is then evident to all (because all have reached their end in the finality of being saved or lost) that the reality of the crucified and risen Christ who 'comes again', in so far as all come before him, is the beginning of, and the continuing reason for, the irreversibility of the history of salvation, its central meaning and its climax.[1] Therefore in so far as we are here practically identifying the [296] Parousia with the Last Things as the consummation of the whole history of humanity and of the world (so including the return of Christ, the resurrection of the body, the universal judgement, eternal life in the vision of God, damnation, the new Heaven and the new Earth as aspects of the final cosmic completion), we are also presupposing that the really basic Christian understanding of the history of salvation recognises in it a genuine temporal order, the real inclusion of the whole man (body, soul, and world) in salvation and a dialectical identity in difference in man as an individual person and as a member of human society. This leads us to conclude, however, that the Last Things, as truly still awaited, are to be understood as still lying in the future in a genuine, even 'worldly', temporal order. The question here is therefore that of the relationship of the Church to the Parousia and the completion of the history of salvation and of the world, understood in that sense. Hence also the theme of our whole consideration is not the Parousia of Christ, but the relationship of the Church to the Parousia. It must of course be admitted that not all aspects of this relationship are here considered. For example, the question of the proximity or remoteness of the Parousia can be understood to be as much a part of the question of the relationship of the Church to the Parousia as a part of the question of the Parousia in itself; but we do not treat of it here.

I

[1] If on the one hand we consider what can be objective 'in itself' in a return of Christ and what must be imaginative representation of it in the biblical and traditional accounts (cf. K. Rahner, 'The Hermeneutics of Eschatological Assertions' in Theological Investigations IV (London & Baltimore 1966), pp. 323-346), and on the other hand do not forget that men's 'coming before' the glorified Christ by their own (personal and collective) completion is itself an act of God in Christ, then this statement can be accepted without hesitation. But it is important, because the second coming of Christ, if it is not to be understood mythologically, cannot be a renewed entry of Christ into our dimension of space and time as we now know it, but the elevation of this dimension into its glory. And that is exactly what this sentence is trying to say.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The Church is the community, called together by God's grace in Jesus Christ, of those who in hope and love believe in the Parousia of Christ as still to come. By this proposition we do not intend to imply, on the one hand, that the nature of the Church is thereby adequately determined, particularly since belief, while essentially always eschatological, can also make its appearance in forms in which it is not yet a faith fully expressed, immediately related to the incarnate Word, or put into the concrete form of a common profession, through which alone it is in the proper sense constitutive of the Church. On the other hand, this proposition is [297] intended to express an essential element of the Church: this faith which hopefully awaits the return of Christ is not merely something which the Church teaches and mediates to individual men for their individual salvation, but is a constitutive element of the Church as such. The Church is after all not merely a means of salvation, an institution for salvation, but herself a fruit of salvation, a community of faith, and she is a means of salvation precisely in so far as she is also a community of faith. But this faith with its concrete profession in cult and social life is precisely faith in the Parousia, because belief in the one living God, in the incarnation of God, the self-communication of God to his creature in the forgiving and divinising grace of Christ, is essentially not belief in a perpetually valid, static truth and reality, but faith in the sense of acceptance, made possible by the action of God, of a saving event which is now already taking place but is not yet finished, so that it can be accepted by the believer as having happened only by his reaching forward in hope to its fulfilment. The Church would therefore understand herself falsely as a mere saving institution and only as a means of salvation, were she not to think of herself in her first and fundamental self-realisation and accept herself as the community of those who hope, those who are waiting, of pilgrims who still seek their own homeland, of those who understand and master their present in terms of the future.

If the Church is to understand herself as the fruit of salvation and as a community of faith in this sense, then she must always understand herself as still provisional, as still looking for her fulfilment, as overcoming herself, since indeed we call the fulfilment which she seeks no longer Church, but the kingdom of God. Inasmuch therefore as she recognises herself to be the intimation and sacrament of final salvation which is already present in her even if it is accessible only to the eyes of faith and hope, she ought never to misunderstand herself to the extent of thinking that her present form is the ultimate one, or that her historical dimension affects in the last analysis only the individual for whom she is the means of salvation, or that while her present form will one day pass away, namely at the Parousia, yet between Pentecost and Parousia it has no history.[2] If even the last alone were the case, then the Church as such [298] would not primarily be the community of pilgrims in faith and hope, but merely a static, unchanging instrument of salvation which, being itself without history, would merely be applied to individuals and their salvation.

It is true that the Church has something which remains permanent throughout history, because she has a real essence which will be annulled not by history but by its abolition, and because she is the fulfilled sacrament of final salvation, at once hearing God's exhibitive word of grace and salvation as present and herself being this word, the two in mutual

[2] This formal and abstract sentence does not convey much in its empty abstraction. We admit this. It would have to be materially filled out in a genuine theology of Church history. One would have to show from the Church's history, for example, that it can be no part of a Catholic understanding of the Church (and is in no way justified by ecclesiastical history) that the Church is becoming ever 'more perfect', that she 'unfolds' her essence and her faith always 'better', but that, if she has a history directed to the Parousia, she can also be seen and experienced dispassionately as the Church which grows old, for which every 'development' (which really takes place) signifies at the same time a symptom of old age, the danger of losing herself in details and matters of secondary importance or in a too self-reliant entrenchment in this aeon.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

interdependence; but even this permanent and indestructible element she has in a really genuine historical form which changes, which must always be sought anew, which must be endured in its historical originality and contingence, and whose transformation, while always both aim and result of the action of men obedient to the Word of God, is yet never adequately calculable in advance.

Therefore the Church, if only she be rightly understood, is living always on the proclamation of her own provisional status and of her historically advancing elimination in the coming kingdom of God towards which she is expectantly travelling as a pilgrim, because God for his own part is coming to meet her in the Parousia and her own pilgrimage, too, is taking place in the power of Christ's coming. The essential nature of the Church consists in pilgrimage towards the promised future.

II

Yet the Church has a quite special relationship to the fulfilment of created reality and history and therefore to the Parousia of Christ, and one which is different from other created beings, because she is herself an eschatological reality; that is to say, the future fulfilment, notwithstanding its being still to come, is in her already a present event, so that she makes her pilgrimage in a certain sense in her end to her end and in her faith is [299] conscious of this her unique – in fact eschatological – situation in such a way that this element belongs also to the faith which is constitutive of her being.

1. In the first place, the Church is herself an eschatological entity in the sense that she is the Church of those graced by Christ's Holy Spirit and this bestowal of grace upon her members is of her very essence. For notwithstanding the uncertainty of salvation for the individual[3] and the fact that it is always in peril, and notwithstanding the Catholic doctrine that even sinners belong to the Church, the Church cannot be conceived as a purely external religious organisation. She is the Body of Christ precisely to the extent that her members are graced with Christ's Spirit, and this possession of the Spirit is one of the most essential constitutive elements of the Church. And so our understanding of the nature of the Church depends essentially on our understanding of what we call justification, sanctification, being anointed and sealed with the Holy Spirit, participation in the divine nature, indwelling of the Blessed Trinity, the New Creation. It will be readily understood that we cannot expound here in this connection the whole of Catholic doctrine on grace as supernatural, divinising and justifying (imparting pardon), bestowed upon man in Jesus Christ through faith, hope and charity and by baptism, or even further to clarify it from an apologetic point of view, although it is of course true that only this way could an adequate understanding of the essence of the Church in the Catholic sense and of her relationship to the Parousia be achieved. Here we intend to confine ourselves to saying at least a little about this, that as a consequence of the Catholic doctrine of justification the Church herself appears as an eschatological entity.

Sanctifying justification, as the supernatural self-communication of God to man which really takes place in the event of justification and is not merely promised as a future and still completely outstanding gift, is itself already in truth and reality the gift of eternal life, precisely that in which eternal life as the fulfilment of man and his history will consist: God himself, who in his grace has given himself into man's possession, for [300] this grace is in [3] This is not the place to expound more precisely the teaching on the uncertainty of salvation for the individual (cf. DS 1541, 1566) and to reconcile it 'dialectically' with the 'firmissima spes' which the Christian may and should also have. The only point here is that we should recognise that the situation of the individual and the situation of the Church as a whole (or the situation of all Christians understood distributively and the situation of all Christians understood collectively) are not the same.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the last analysis nothing else than God communicating himself and making himself the principle and object of life for the spiritual creature. Christianity of course rejects the doctrine that from the beginning God's life is itself man's own fundamental being, so that he only has to come to himself in order to be with God, but Christianity, at least in the Catholic understanding of it, unmistakably teaches that God gives himself even now with his own, infinite glory into the possession of him who believes and loves; that he offers this his own life as source and object of a creature's life at all times to every man, even – in virtue of his universal salvific will – to sinners, though out of pure grace and love, so that man as he in fact exists inevitably meets in the history of his essential fulfilment the God of eternal life in Christ Jesus, provided that he does not by a deliberate fault deny his own being and its concrete history. And in so far as justifying grace is in the Catholic understanding of it not merely any kind of forgiveness of sin or justification or equipment for a positively moral act which pleases God, but in the last analysis God communicating himself in his whole inexpressible glory and fullness of life, so is this grace fundamentally an unsurpassable and therefore definitive and in this sense eschatological constitution of man. It is ultimately no merely creaturely condition of man on the basis of which and by means of which he seeks a coming constitution which still lies wholly in the future, which he might perhaps already foresee and long for in a purely mental way as something not yet existing. It is the arrival of his definitive future which precisely as already given bears his history in which he accepts and takes possession of this his future. However much the Catholic doctrine of the universal salvific will of God forces us to say with regard to all sinners that this movement in the end towards the end is possible to all men at least in principle by the grace which is offered to all men, the knowledge in faith and the acceptance of this eschatological situation of all men is itself again made possible and supported by the same grace.[4] To that extent it belongs itself to the eschatological situation of men and together [301] with the offer of God's communication of himself to all men constitutes that eschatological reality in which the justification of the explicitly believing Christian and with it the inner reality of the Church herself consists. This eschatological, final and essentially unsurpassable bestowal of grace upon man by God's self-communication, which is explicitly grasped and proclaimed in Christian faith, is naturally to be understood as at once supernaturally divinising and justifying the sinner by forgiveness, and in this its unity it constitutes that eschatological gift by which the Church is what it is.

2. This eschatological, unsurpassable and irrevocable self-offer of the Blessed Trinity to mankind is not only fundamentally unsurpassable as the communication of God himself and not only irrevocable through the incarnation of the Word of God remaining eternally valid and through the resurrection of the Son, so that the Judgement too takes place precisely by reason of the unrepentant salvific will: this self-offer is also eschatological and thereby constitutive of the nature of the Church in so far as this self-offer produces by its own power (through the pre-defining power of grace) its acceptance in fact on the part of mankind and for its part guarantees this acceptance to be final and, as victory of God's love, irrevocable. The victorious self-communication of God, not only proffered but accepted in faith, hope and love by the power of grace, is itself as eschatological and victorious a part of the content of that faith by which the Church herself is constituted, confesses with praise the victory of God over the sin of the world, and thereby already here and now lends to this victory an historical and in a certain sense sacramental presence and accessibility in the world. The Church is

[4] In so far as the acceptance of grace in faith and love is itself not only the history of man's reaction to God's offer of grace but the history of grace as such, it is clear even from this that talking about the eschatological movement of history to the goal in the goal itself is quite compatible with a true being-in-the-future or with a true 'not-yet' of the goal. But the converse is also true: the being-still-to-come of the future does not nullify its pure presentiality. For the doctrine of grace, at least in the Catholic understanding of it, states that God is in his self-communication the principle of the movement to the goal which is himself.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

constituted thereby as the community of those who believe and confess that God's grace as love which forgives and communicates God himself is really victorious in the world and that its victory in the free acceptance of that love by man is itself the work of God's self-communication in grace.

In so far as this faith confessing the eschatological victory of the grace of God is itself an element in this victory and not merely a polite answer on the part of man to an act of God which as such does not yet include this reaction of the creature but is synergistically added to it, the Church believes and confesses that this eschatological victory of God's communication of himself happens, even if not exclusively in her, yet precisely also in her and upon her. For the Church is the community whose faith proclaims this victory and this in such a way that the proclamation of the [302] final and irrevocably initiated victory of God, and not merely the victory itself, can no longer disappear from the history of mankind. But if this proclamation of faith in the victory, as that faith made concrete in history, is itself invincible and an inner constitutive element of the victory itself and at the same time of the Church, then the Church must necessarily be one which confesses of herself in praise of God's grace that in her the acceptance of the divine self-communication, that is the justification of man, is indefectible and that her faith in it as the historical presence of this victory can never disappear. To this extent therefore the Church professes of herself an indefectibility of her holiness and faith. Whether, in what way, and under what conditions this indefectibility of the Church in love, hope and faith which derives from her ultimate nature is and must be also a characteristic trait of the institutional and of the official in her, is a question which cannot and need not be further considered at this point of our discussion, although it is to be suspected that only this new question would touch the real apologetic problem. The Church is therefore not merely that reality which moves in the end to the end, but at the same time and because of it that whose movement both signifies and proclaims the permanence of this movement in the end and by means of both these together represents that eschatological entity which waits upon the Parousia of the Lord as future by bearing in herself the Parousia of the Lord as present, so that present and future mutually bear one another out of the event of Christ which happened once and for all in the 'past' and remains eternally valid in the incarnation of the Word of God, the death and resurrection of Christ.

3. What we have said under I and II, 1-2, is simultaneously true and possible in so far as God's communication of himself to mankind is accepted and possessed by the Church through the power of grace in that particular way which must be described as faith, in distinction to unveiled contemplation, and as hope, as reaching out to what is still in the future, and thereby leads to the received grace of everlasting life the peculiar characteristic of hiddenness. The hiddenness of grace as the life of eternity already given here and now and the possession of this life as faith and hope in distinction to unhidden possession mutually condition one another and constitute in their unity the peculiar note of the eschatological situation of the Church. Yet they permit of being described in some way one after the other.

God's communication of himself to man is hidden to the extent that [303] in the phase and situation of its free, historical acceptance by man's vital act it is not given to him as something with which he can be concerned in its own reality as the immediate object of his own spiritual self-realisation, that is by immediate vision and unmediated community, but as the principle (even though known by the word of faith) of his obedient intercourse with the objects of the world, personal and otherwise, which are distinct from God. The man of grace moves towards the goal precisely and only as far as this goal is itself the principle of his movement towards the goal. Faith and hope, therefore, although built upon God as their principle, are 'only' faith and hope, as distinct from the vision which possesses and enjoys immediately, and they give to God's communication of himself as received and accepted the characteristic of hiddenness to the extent that faith is always mediated by the categorial word

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation of faith (fides ex auditu) and therefore does not permit man's absolute transcendental dependence on the life of the Blessed Trinity by its real communication of itself to be for him given in itself. Therefore hope, too, although it is borne by the hoped-for itself and only so can be hope, can represent the hoped-for to itself only in the categorial word about it. Movement in the end to the end becomes faith and hope through the objectification brought about in the world of what is already really possessed in faith and hope, and only because of this necessary categorial objectification in the world can the divine self-communication still be accepted by an historical, free decision of man. This for its part is demanded not only by the dignity of the free human person who is to be favoured with God's life and by the proper nature of the divine life which is to be communicated, which is personal free love and of itself calls for a similar answer, but also and above all by the ultimate structure of the divine economy of salvation, which is built upon that Christ who freely and in obedience became man precisely because in that way God can appear in the finite as what he really is and freely wants to be in our regard.[5]

By the hiddenness of the divine self-communication in grace which is already here and now the gift of eternal life, and by the particular character of the acceptance of this divine self-communication as an acceptance in faith and hope, the real eschatological presence of the future as final and irrevocable and as such definitively accepted is not suppressed but rather [304] confirmed. For faith and hope are not merely human attitudes towards something to come, and therefore only promised, but they are man's personal self-realisation, the ultimate and most necessary principle for whose being and actualisation is the grace of God itself. But this is not any kind of aid given to an act which would still be merely human and creaturely and rob the aid and the divine word of revelation of its power by making it subject to the a priori of human nature. The grace of faith and hope in the last analysis (leaving out of account creaturely and necessary effects of grace which can rightly in their turn be called grace) is God himself making it possible by his communication of himself to man for his act to remain truly human and yet to be the hearing and the uttering of the Word of God as such and not merely of the response to it within the horizon of mere finitude and merely human-spiritual transcendence; this self-communication of God as the reason for hope results in man's hope grasping not merely the concept of a future hoped-for object within the horizon of human desire but the hoped-for object itself.

In so far as faith and hope have what is believed and hoped for, namely the God of eternal life, as the inner principle of faith and hope and to that extent experience in the act of believing and hoping this a priori principle of faith and hope itself notwithstanding its necessary categorial mediation through the human word, and although it is not represented objectively in its own self, we must without hesitation speak of an experience of grace, of revelation, and of faith. In it the Church is not only in fact given the eschatological gift by which she is herself constituted but this is experienced. The Church is the community of those who already possess the eschatological gift which is God himself, who in full liberty really accept this possession, who confess in faith that this possession and its acceptance has been caused by the free action of God's love, and who hope for the unveiling of this possession by the power contained within it. She belongs therefore to the present time in so far as she is still moving towards the goal by faith and hope, that is in so far as she must still let the Parousia of Christ come upon her, and at the same time she belongs to eternity, as she moves towards her end in virtue of the future which has already arrived.

The Church's experience of herself as the community which possesses the eschatological

---

[5] Cf. the author's 'Current Problems in Christology' in Theological Investigations I (London & Baltimore 1961), pp. 149-200; and 'On the Theology of the Incarnation' in Theological Investigations IV (London & Baltimore 1966), pp. 105-120.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

good of salvation 'only' in faith and hope is naturally not only an experience of faith and hope to the extent that what is really believed and hoped is experienced through the mediation of human [305] categorial objectivity in a way which is itself again merely abstract. This mediation is a concrete historical one and signifies for faith and hope real darkness, trouble, constancy in the face of always new and unforeseen situations, of contradiction on the part of unbelief, of despair, of a future Utopia conceived within the limits of this world. In brief, the concrete history of the Church is the means by which the transcendental experience in faith and hope of grace as the divine life itself is objectified and so becomes in the concrete the object of man's saving decision. And this history of the Church's experience is therefore at once a means and a temptation for faith and hope. If one were to deny to history a positive function as a means one would fundamentally be disputing that in her explicit confession of faith, which is after all part of the dimension of history, the Church is herself again a work of grace and not only a merely human reaction to a grace which remains meta-historical. If one were to deny in this history the character of temptation for faith (in theory or in practice), then the Church would be regarded fundamentally as the manifest presence of God in the world and faith and hope would become an evident possession of eternal life, which could at the most be hidden in some way by that human history which remains extrinsic to salvation and its possession and does not play any part in the history of salvation as such.

III

In this third section we would like at least briefly to touch upon a question which was left open in the previous section, namely the question what exactly is the relationship of the Church as institution and official ministry to the Church as eschatological entity. The eschatological character of the Church was after all developed from the concept of the Church as the fruit of salvation, not so much from the Church as means of salvation. Now these two aspects are essentially interdependent, even though they cannot be simply identified with one another. For the Church is at least in part the means of salvation precisely in so far as she is the believing and confessing community, constituted by the predetermining power of God's grace, of those who glory in the triumphant grace of God's divinising and forgiving self-communication to mankind and who with missionary zeal as 'God's co-workers' in the service of grace move men precisely through this confession of faith to accept divine grace. On this ground alone there can be no adequate distinction between the Church as the [306] institutional means of salvation and the Church as the fruit of salvation.

But since there is an official ministry in the Church and this and its functions cannot be simply identified in a Donatist fashion with the Church as grace, the question of the relationship between the Church as institution and the Church as fruit of salvation, that is as the eschatological being-present of final salvation, is not yet answered by what was said above in the previous section about the Church as an eschatological entity. The distinctions which it is necessary to make between faith as officially proclaimed and faith as existentially accepted in a way conducive to salvation, between the valid sacramental sign and the sacrament as in fact effectively productive of grace, between the institutional and the charismatic structure of the Church, between the Church which as a whole is certain of salvation and preserved in faith and love by God's grace, predetermined to be effective, and the individual who notwithstanding his external membership of the Church can be a sinner and destined to perdition, these show that the official ministry and its functions in the Church in teaching, cult, sacrament, administration and ecclesiastical discipline, do not without further qualification possess in all cases and under all conditions the same quality of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

eschatological indefectibility which we must ascribe to the Church as a whole. If the Church's indefectibility in faith and love (in each case of course in its own way) belongs to the Church in so far as she is herself the fruit of salvation and it is from this that we must ultimately deduce theologically an indefectibility of her official ministry,[6] then it becomes evident from the distinction we have just indicated between the Church as means of salvation and the Church as community of salvation, that absolutely speaking one must also assume in the Catholic understanding an indefectibility of the official ministry in all its functions, although in each case in a specifically different way; but at the same time it is permissible to view this indefectibility in so far as it is predicated of the official ministry, the institution and thereby [307] of the historically tangible form of the Church, as a peripheral instance of the Church (which to be sure really occurs concretely and tangibly according to the Catholic understanding of the Church), instead of, as is usually done in Catholic theology, developing fully this indefectibility only in relation to the teaching office of the Church and then setting up that indefectibility as the normal case and interpreting other acts of the teaching office which are lacking in that indefectibility (which in the case of teaching is called infallibility) as peripheral instances.

Nevertheless, and this at the moment is the decisive fact, there is an indefectibility of the Church also in her institutional office and not merely of the Church as an eschatological community of salvation. Yet this indefectibility, as we may legitimately say within a Catholic understanding of the Church, has its raison d'être in the Church as community of salvation. For not only can the former in fact be deduced from the latter, as we intend to show immediately, but the limits of the indefectibility of office become thereby understandable, whereas they would remain incomprehensible if this indefectibility were conceived purely and exclusively as the formal equipment given to the Church's office by God's juridical commission. Finally, only in this way does it become comprehensible why the Church ascribes to herself in her office such an indefectibility which she denies to the office in the Old Testament Church which was also originally founded by God.

In the Catholic understanding of the matter, the indefectibility of the eschatological community of salvation also gives rise to an indefectibility of the office of the Church because this office (as a teaching and pastoral office) was founded by Christ as an authoritative factor within the Church on which the faith, cult and action of the Church depend and must depend, while the community of salvation would in its faith and life, at least in the tangible dimension of history, cease to be the historical presence and visible victory of Christ's grace either if it could in principle and essentially as a whole be torn apart from Christ, his truth and his love by its official ministry, or if in order to prevent this happening it had to revolt and separate itself in principle from the official ministry and its historical legitimation.

In this way, however, we already have as well an indication in principle of the limits of the indefectibility of this office in regard to its teaching, sanctifying and pastoral power: such an official act participates in the indefectibility of the community of salvation if and in so far as it would, [308] were it not itself indefectible, in safeguarding the structure of the Church tear her away from Christ so that the Church as an historical phenomenon would cease to be the eschatologically indefectible community of salvation. But this would happen if the highest

[6] In saying this we are not denying that an ultimate indefectibility of the Church's official ministry can be derived from those texts of the New Testament which speak directly about the Church's office, of its mission and its function within the Church. But if the question is then asked why such an indefectibility belongs to this office in the New Covenant although no such indefectibility ever belonged to any office up to then in the history of salvation in spite of its being positively led and guided by God, even when that office was bestowed by God himself, then the only possible answer is that here it is a question of an office in a Church which is itself the eschatological fruit of salvation and as such (but only as such) cannot be other than indefectible.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

teaching and pastoral office of the Church were to make use of its highest teaching and pastoral authority over the whole Church with a force definitively binding upon all with the fullest obligation, and in doing so were to contradict the truth and the salvific will of Christ to such an extent that the acceptance and the following of such an act would place the universal Church as a whole in unambiguous contradiction to Christ, and so into absolute error as 'No' to his truth or as 'No' to his unifying and sanctifying love. The canonical determination and making precise of this principle which. enables us to accept an official act of the Church as indefectible by faith in her and in her eschatological indefectibility, no longer falls within the framework of these considerations. But from the stated point of departure it is possible to recognise clearly the limits of this indefectibility of the Church in the various forms of official action. Where it is not a question of a definitively and irreversibly posited official act of the universal Church it does not necessarily and with the certitude of faith have in itself the prerogative of indefectibility of the Church. And in so far as the Church as still in a pilgrim-state, waiting, hoping, must also be the tempted and tried Church in order that her relationship to the realisation of salvation which is already given in her should be one of faith and of hope, in fact tempted by her pilgrim existence itself, the acts which do not possess this indefectibility necessarily and inevitably belong to her pilgrim existence in faith and hope.

From here we would really have to reflect more accurately than is usually the case in Catholic ecclesiology on the fact that these indefectible and defectible self-realisations of the Church, specifically those of her official ministry, make their appearance in the concrete existence of the Church and the Christian presence in a way which does not really permit the reflection which accompanies historical existence to make an absolutely clear-cut division between these two acts. Unfortunately it is impossible to discuss this point further here, much as it would undoubtedly contribute to a notable softening of polemical opposition between the Christian confessions. At least let us note that even according to the Catholic conception an 'infallible' definition, for example, of Pope or Council does not necessarily signify that this definition must be opportune [309] from every point of view, that is that its content must be easily capable of assimilation by the mass of the faithful in the historical situation of that time or that it must be particularly conducive to the accomplishment of the act of faith as a unified whole. Nor does a definition as infallible necessarily rule out the possibility that the way in which it is in fact understood in a determinate historical situation may be charged in spite of every clarity and precision in its formulation with associated interpretations, imaginative categories, practical consequences, and so on, which do not in any way participate in the infallibility of the definition, which render its acceptance in faith more difficult or even perhaps impossible for certain hearers without any subjective fault on their part, and which can only in a later historical situation of the Church be clearly and explicitly distinguished from that which was really and properly meant in the definition. The clearest proclamation of the principles of moral theology as guide-lines for actuating love for God and our neighbour still leave the individual and the Church to a large extent in the dark as to how they should be applied in the concrete situation: what concrete profession the individual should take up (although this can determine his eternal salvation); how the dialectically opposed principles of mildness and severity in the bringing up of children, of zeal and tolerance in public life, and so on, should in the concrete be combined and at the same time be respected; what attitude the Church should concretely and practically take up to world-powers which are hostile to Christ; what is really right in evaluating A B C warfare. There are innumerable obscurities of this and a similar kind in the life of the Church and of the individual Christian. The Quaestiones Disputatae of moral theology are really not concerned with mere subtleties which have no practical significance. The theories of the 'moral systems' which have been devised to solve such obscurities also do not take us much further because these theories in their turn are obscure in themselves and in their application. One cannot

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

even console oneself with the thought that these obscurities cannot compromise one's salvation as long as goodwill is there. For it could be the case that one could more easily and more clearly become aware of the fact that one does not perhaps possess this goodwill at all, if a bad will were not able so easily to hide behind theoretical obscurities.

All these small indications which are really self-evident are here intended only to draw attention to one fact: the doctrine of the indefectibility of the teaching and ruling office does not imply at all that the [310] Church and the individual Christian wander idly from one clear certitude to another. Despite this indefectibility, Church and Christian must laboriously make their pilgrimage through the obscurity of this aeon, and for both there ultimately remains only one thing: trust in the grace of God alone. The Catholic doctrine of the indefectibility of the official ministry and its acts in determinate circumstances does not therefore in any way imply that this area can be so circumscribed as to make it from every possible viewpoint utterly and clearly distinct from all that is defectible in the Church, that according to the Catholic understanding there is, so to speak, a piece of the Church which is clearly distinct from everything else as purely the divinely founded Church of sure salvation and of the absolutely unobscured truth and love of Christ.

IV

Our treatment of the subject of the Church and eschatology would be left incomplete if we did not also cast a glance at those this-worldly future hopes and Utopias which exist today in a way and with an urgency which was impossible in earlier ages. Obviously even in earlier times man was a being who could and had to fashion his life actively in freedom. But in earlier times, and particularly at the time of the origin of Christianity, the area of man's capacity springing from his inner nature of freely and actively fashioning his own being was so narrowly limited and so well within his range of vision, that its possibility for the future had in practice to be experienced as the more or less near present. Man could at that time have only an inner attitude of surrender or protest against a fate laid upon him in point of fact simply by nature: he could not really be the active, creative designer and planner of himself, the world he lived in, and so also of a more remote future. But this is something which he can do today. He does not just more or less accept Nature as his world, but he changes it and fashions it into that world which he has of his own accord determined to live in. Nature is no longer merely the given unalterable stage upon which he acts out his being, including the history of his salvation and damnation, but the mere material, the quarry, out of which he first constructs the scenery in the midst of which as expressing his own self-understanding he wants to live out his historical existence. The practical possibilities of such an active self-realisation in the active transformation of the human sphere of existence are today perhaps still [311] very limited: but this future has begun, and there is an enormously increased area of the future which man anticipates in his planning.

Christianity must come to meet this really new experience of man's existence; it cannot be mastered immediately and adequately from the New Testament alone, for such an existential experience did not exist at that time to any notable extent. The Church as the eschatological community of salvation living in the faith and the hope of a future which is the gift of God himself and which is not designed and created by man, must come to terms with this new existential experience of modern man to whom is opened both for himself as an individual and for mankind as a whole a real and extensive future which can be foreseen, planned and realised. This will mean in the first place, that Christianity should recognise the fundamentally Christian roots of this situation of modern man and so accept it as being itself genuinely Christian. In point of fact this situation has a Christian origin, firstly because

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Christianity of its very essence conceives the totality of reality primarily as history and Nature as one element of this, and not vice versa; secondly, because Nature as truly created and thereby as not divine and the role of God as the personal partner of man signify that it is not a numinous Nature but the Word of God and man himself who are the real representatives of God in the world and that Nature is in reality that which man is to make subject to himself, because it is nothing else than the continuation of his bodiliness and therefore reaches its fulfilment in him and his history: it is not the other way about, man ultimately sharing the extra-human and infra-human destiny of Nature.

Once the Christian antecedents of man's new situation as homo faber sui ipsius et mundi are seen in spite of all the hybris and corruption which surrounded this new understanding of existence at its birth and still surrounds it today as it continues upon its both beneficial and harmful way, then Christianity must unhesitatingly recognise that future plans and future utopias within this world are not only from the Christian standpoint legitimate, but are the destiny which God's providence has assigned to man, in the carrying out and suffering of which alone can he live his Christian calling genuinely and completely today. Only on this condition can Christianity say to the man of today that his future, too, stands under the sign of creatureliness, of sin, of law, of death, of pointlessness and of redemption by Christ and that this future, too, is redeemed and sanctified and given its own proper meaning by the fact that it is [312] already overtaken by the future of Christ come upon us and by the divine self-communication, and that therefore this future too, if it is to bring man his salvation, must happen in the kairos of Christ. But the Church must see (and live out) the fact that she is not the true and credible eschatological community of salvation by being the resentful, ineffectual and fearful host of those who deny themselves the greatness, the duty and the danger of this world of the future or who have taken up towards it an attitude which regards it exclusively as material, indifferent in itself for the practice of Christian virtue, material without any of that original, worldly value which precisely as secular and worldly must be accepted by the Christian as a Christian without again sublimating its worldliness in a religious sense. What all this signifies more precisely in the concrete, how in this situation the different Christian professions each have their own specific tasks, opportunities and dangers of failure, cannot be considered any further here. But this will have to happen, if the Church's understanding of herself as the eschatological salvation-community to which God has given himself and which still waits for his kingdom, is today not to be misinterpreted by the Church herself and misunderstood by non-Christians.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[313]

B. THE BISHOP IN THE CHURCH

20

THE EPISCOPAL OFFICE

FOREWORD

A vigorous attack has been made in an article[1] by D. T. Strotmann on many of the considerations contained in the following article of mine. Right at the beginning I would beg the reader to read Strotmann's article for himself and then to ask himself quite impartially whether I have always been correctly interpreted and whether I have really been convincingly refuted. For my part, suffice it to say here that I answer this question in the negative. But I restrict myself to a few remarks without entering into all the questions exactly.

In my opinion, Strotmann over-estimates the theological significance of the ancient tradition and practice of the East, and at the same time I find him offering no arguments against my considerations apart from a reference to these. Anyone who comes to realise how little it is possible in any case to draw a theological argument for the sacramentality of Orders from the sources of revelation themselves will allow to Orders a much greater flexibility than Strotmann is able to bring himself to do. The multiplicity of bishops in the ancient Church is a consequence not of the 'jus divinum' of revelation but quite simply of the social and political conditions of the time and does not therefore constitute any argument that it must always be so. The multiplicity of small dioceses, for example in Italy, does not produce damaging results only because Rome excessively curtails true episcopal liberty (p. 195). When one considers how difficult it is from the point of view of the history of revelation and of dogma to justify the division of Orders (into bishop, priest and deacon) as based [314] on 'jus divinum', one sees the indispensability of the fundamental principle that the Church can 'divide' the one fullness of the power of Orders according to practical requirements without vitiating its sacramentality. But then not only is the ascription of sacramentality to the minor Orders in the Middle Ages no longer quite so absurd as Strotmann thinks (p. 190), but there arises the possibility of an historical formation of the different grades of Orders, so that there is nothing really astonishing – from a dogmatic point of view – in a certain lack of definition of the borderline between patriarch and simple bishop, the emphasis upon which calls forth the indignation of Strotmann (p. 193), but which can have practical consequences. – If I conclude that Pope John XXIII's measure of making all cardinals bishops be theologically meaningful, then being in the pope's company I am in good company even if my opinion is not approved of by Strotmann (p. 191), without my being able to see – and this is no less important – how Strotmann really justifies his opinion in this matter.

If Strotmann holds the idea of a 'personal diocese' to be absurd (p. 195, 197), the decree on the Oriental Churches (no. 4) of Vatican II does not seem to support him, because here the possibility is foreseen that 'the Ordinaries of the various individual Churches' can exist 'in the same territory'. These are then surely to all intents and purposes personal dioceses. Why then should other cases which occur to us be a priori impossible? If this kind of thing were quite impossible in principle, then strictly speaking an abbey like Chevetogne with a rite alien to the place where it is situated would also be impossible.

---

[1] 'Primauté et Céphalisation: A propos d'une étude du P. Karl Rahner' in Irénicon XXXVIII (1964), pp. 187-197.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

My reflections upon the meaning and form of the college of cardinals in no way aimed at putting them in the place of the college of bishops. What Strotmann says in this connection about my ideas is a complete misunderstanding. His own description of the essence of (p. 193), when measured against the statements of Vatican II, is only half the truth. The bishops are as corpus and collegium (with and under the pope) the one supreme bearer of the fullness of power in the Church; this is definitely a part of the essence of the episcopal office. But then today there necessarily arises the question whether and how this college can be represented and made effective by a smaller group. Such a smaller group would not downgrade the episcopate to a college of parish priests, as Strotmann seems to fear, any more than an assembly of patriarchs would turn the bishops subordinate to them into simple priests. After all, the question of a representation of this kind was raised by the Council and [315] not just by me, and was accepted by the pope ('Senate of Bishops'). A plenary Council can today no longer effectively exercise the universal function of the episcopal college. Surely it is the case that the bearer of that episcopal and immediate jurisdiction over the whole Church and over each individual Church which dogma ascribes to the Roman primacy is chosen most meaningfully by a representation of the whole Church. But if this representation for this election cannot in practice be effectively brought about by a meeting of all the bishops of the Church, then the most meaningful alternative is for an electoral commission of the episcopal college (namely, the college of cardinals) to be entrusted with the election. The only condition is that the college of cardinals should be so constituted as really to embody such a representation of the whole episcopal college. Even now I cannot see what reasons motivate Strotmann's protest against this idea. We will have to wait and see how Paul VI will develop and reconstitute the college of cardinals. The indications of this further development which are to hand up to the present do not in any case absolutely contradict the kind of development we have here outlined.[2] At least there is no sign that in Rome the college of cardinals is regarded as an 'institution périmée' (p. 191). Against this one could ask quite simply, who then is to elect the pope, if the college of cardinals is abolished? [316] Neither the three thousand bishops nor the parish priests of Rome appear to be practically fitted for the task. Who then? The possibility of participating in the election of the pope was for the patriarchs (at least for Maximos IV Saigh) a main reason for eventually entering the college of cardinals. At present four Eastern patriarchs are members of the college of cardinals, something which Strotmann previously rejected most vigorously (p. 191). I do not intend to go any further into this matter here and make capital for my thesis out of the fact that it was Maximos IV himself who eventually entered the college of cardinals. One would also have to discuss further the juridical alterations in the status of cardinal (precedence, titular church,

[2] Since then Paul VI in his allocution at the beginning of the Fourth Session and in the Motu proprio which was published later has announced the formation of the 'synod of bishops'. In its present structure this synod of bishops is not identical with the existing college of cardinals. To that extent the remarks we have made above and in the following essay appear to be overtaken by events. But in reality we will have to wait and see what concrete Constitution the two organs of the bishops' council assume, how the two consultative assemblies are co-ordinated and what relationship the whole 'synod' has in reality to the college of cardinals. A large percentage of the cardinals of today are certainly represented in one way or another in this synod of bishops. But what in the concrete the relationship between the college of cardinals and the synod of bishops is to be is not at all clear, at least for the more remote future. There are all sorts of possible lines of development and of evolution open. Besides, it would be disastrous if in the joyful exuberance of seeing the synod of bishops realised at long last the actual significance of the college of cardinals were to be underestimated. We need only remind ourselves that the college of cardinals is invested with the power of electing the pope and – at least for the present – will clearly continue to be. In this sense the author would like to think that even today, although under different conditions, his former reflections (certainly with changes of emphasis) are worthy of consideration. The whole question can really be taken up again only in a much larger context, but at present we are unable to make any very decisive comments, especially since the practical working of the synod of bishops (including its relationship with the reformed Curia) still lies before us.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and so on).[3]

If my simple question (it was no more than this) whether it is not possible to understand the primacy as being the supreme grade of the Sacrament of Orders is rejected by Strotmann as sheer nonsense (p. 189 sq.), I would like to ask again what is the transmission of the charism of infallibility in this office and the certain assurance from God, because of the indefectibility of the Church, of the divine grace of the office which is needed for its right exercise? Why is it impossible to understand this granting of such full power in the office as an 'opus operatum'? If today it is the aim to bring jurisdiction and the episcopal power of Orders closer together (in this connection see Strotmann's remark on page 190, note 2), if we are again coming to emphasise relative ordination as the normal case of episcopal consecration, why should it be absurd to regard the relative consecration of the pope for this primatial See as a specific episcopal consecration (as its highest degree)? If the objection is made that today and for a long time past the pope is usually already a bishop before the papal election, then one could point to previous ages and their practice as a theological fundamental model for the answering of the question: one could say that the same problem appears whenever a bishop becomes a patriarch in another See and one must find a meaningful solution for this case; one could say that election and acceptance of the powers of the primacy can be regarded as a sacramental sign (in particular cases as a completion of the episcopal laying on of hands) just as much as the laying on of hands itself particularly since everyone knows today that the possibility of the Church's determining for herself the form and matter of a sacramental rite is very far-reaching. There are other sacraments [317] (Matrimony, Penance) which consist in a juridical procedure and yet are sacraments. This question has never been asked before: we are not accustomed to it. But is this really a penetrating reason for rejecting it as a meaningless piece of scholastic hair-splitting? Considering the historical development of sacramental doctrine and of the papal primacy, this does not seem to me to be the case, because this history is certainly not concluded. Strotmann objects that the election to the papacy when accepted does not confer any 'character indelebilis'. I ask in response, does this involve the negation of a sacrament? What about the 'character indelebilis' of a bishop consecrated in a relative ordination for a particular Church, when he renounces definitively his Church and jurisdiction over it? Would it not be possible to see the case of the resignation of a pope from his office as being the same as that of such a bishop, so that it is by no means established that in the case of a papal election there is no such thing as a 'character indelebilis' rightly understood? Should we not be particularly careful in handling this indelible character from the point of view of Eastern theology? – Nor do I propose any 'nouveau genre d'évêques' (p. 195), but merely seek to find some theological meaning in an existing institution (that of titular bishops), precisely in order to have a principle for guarding against the misuse of this institution. I do not see that in doing this I am doing something senseless.

THE EPISCOPAL OFFICE

The question of the episcopate within the Church, of its collegial unity and its function in the Church as the supreme bearer of the fullness of power in union with the pope is one of the central questions of the Council now meeting. In accordance with the nature of a Council, with the kind of possibilities open to it for expressing itself and their limitations, the Council will be able to say very little expressly regarding this topic, though what it does say may be important and fundamental. It may be presumed that it will declare firstly, that there exists in the Church not merely an accidental, conceptual collectivity of many individual bishops, but [3] This is not the place for a discussion of the so-called Latin Patriarchates in the East and in the West.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

a proper college as a collegial unit (a 'moral person'), that this collegially composed unit of the universal episcopate is part of the unalterable constitution of the Church (of 'divine' law, not of positive ecclesiastical and changeable law), that this college has its head in the Roman pope, who is not merely 'princeps inter pares' but possesses [318] (precisely as head of this college) the supreme powers accorded him by Vatican I, and that therefore this college is a college and can act as such only in union with the pope. Presumably the Council will declare secondly, that the college, understood in this way, is the bearer of that supreme and full power in the Church (the power of Orders and of jurisdiction in the three 'offices' of teacher, priest and shepherd) which according to the will of Christ and the nature of the Church belongs to her. We think that it will declare thirdly, that not only does this college exercise its power in an extraordinary way in an Ecumenical Council, but that it can exercise it also outside a Council (subject to the conditions which derive from its very nature, among which is of course the participation of the pope). Fourthly, there will probably then be drawn from these dogmatic principles a few – very modest – conclusions: that every bishop bears a responsibility (even though no jurisdiction) towards the whole Church flowing from the episcopal office itself, which must, for example, give rise to a duty of helping the missions; and that conferences of bishops are a practical consequence of this fraternal union of bishops.

Presumably nothing will be said about the more exact determination of the relationship of the pope to the (rest of the) college, that is about the question which in the context of the relation of Pope to Council was expressly left open by the First Vatican Council and is even today a matter of controversy, whether there are two inadequately distinct subjects of the supreme power (pope and college) or only one, the second theory in its turn being capable of being understood in several quite different ways. The historical question remains open, how the present subject of full power in the Church came to be developed from the 'constitution' of the primitive Apostolic Church, that is to say the question of the more precise historical descent of the episcopal college from the Apostolic college (and contained in this is the question of the manner in which the ecclesiastical office, which in the last analysis is one, came to be divided up into the office of bishop and the office of simple priest, and hence of the precise delimitation of these two powers). The question remains untouched, how more precisely the entry of the individual bishop into the college is effected (we will come to speak of this question almost immediately). The question is not discussed, what more precisely are the modes of the extra-Conciliar yet collegial acts of the college, that is to say what possibilities of initiative belong to the members of the college in relation to their head, what kind of part the pope must play or can play [319] in it (explicit or tacit, canonically instituted or para-canonical), whether the so-called 'ordinary magisterium' of the college of bishops (together with the pope) which according to Catholic doctrine enjoys in determinate conditions the same infallibility as an ex cathedra decision of the pope is such a collegial act or not. (To us it seems self-evidently so.)

I

It is not our intention here to enter any further into the theological foundation of the doctrine proposed by the Council, or to take up any direct position regarding the questions mentioned above as remaining open which are connected with this doctrine. Rather we will attempt at our own risk and on our own responsibility to cast some glances from this doctrine upon a possible future practice. In so far as for this purpose it is necessary to form opinions on theologically controverted questions we must naturally venture to do this. In this connection it must of course not be overlooked that while practical possibilities of this kind can be aligned with such theological opinions as a point of departure, they cease to be merely

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

possible if those opinions should be right. Positive legal enactments in the Church within the framework of the unalterable divine constitution of the Church can be justified in different ways, and they are not necessarily impossible or inopportune if a particular reason for them does not enjoy universal consent.

In all the considerations which follow this is not to be forgotten: the Church is an eschatological salvation-entity, which remains constantly enveloped by God's grace, and at the same time a visible society which is the historical presence of this salvation-entity in something like a sacramental way (that is, the permanent authentic presence of grace). With this is given the fact that her essential structure, in so far as it is iuris divini, participates in her indefectibility. It cannot therefore come about that essential elements of the constitution which the Church ought to have should become complete casualties or be completely ignored. It cannot therefore happen, for example, that the college of bishops iure divino under the Pope as head should at one stage simply be unknown as the bearer of supreme power in the Church or should be an element not producing any effect in the life of the Church. And with a little unprejudiced attention the reality and the effectiveness of such an entity can in fact be observed. All this in its turn does not exclude the possibility that [320] much of this reality should exist and live para-canonically, if only because there does not really exist a written constitution of the Church. The code of canon law is not such, though it specifies elements of it. Moreover, the Church's consciousness of her constitution has a history exactly as her dogma and the understanding of her faith do. As it lives by her life carried on unreflectively, so it has in its development and its history also an influence on the concrete life of the Church. Moreover, the constantly changing external historical situation of the Church demands a continually new concretisation of the permanent essential structure of the Church to correspond to the conditions of the time, because the real essence of the Church (which is more than the idea of its essence) only exists in contingent, historical men and in their historically conditioned activity. It is therefore self-evident that the permanent essence of the Church, her divinely bestowed constitution, can be more or less clearly, purely and effectively in evidence in the historical image presented by the Church. In this sense, there is no doubt that the papal primacy of jurisdiction, for example, was not always 'there' as it is now. In consequence it is always perfectly legitimate to ask whether this or that element of the Church's constitution could not be brought out more clearly or be lived more intensely, whether accidents of historical development do not obscure such elements, whether the 'phenotype' (if we may use this expression) could not in constitutional practice (in written and unwritten constitutional law and life) correspond better to the 'genotype' of the Church in constitutional theory. That this is self-evident can be doubted only where the constitution of the Church is reduced to a written constitution, where without mystery or history it is identified with the paragraphs of a fixed enactment so that the only way of examining the constitutional life of the Church would be to ask whether in fact these paragraphs are being observed or not.

In this connection the following should be noted when evaluating the earliest development of constitutional doctrine and life in the transition from the Apostolic Church (the 'primitive Church' in the theological sense) to the Church of the second century ('Early Catholicism'). In the Church of this period a development might under certain conditions be possible and historically observed which, on the one hand, is really a determination specifying in history the originally given, manifold possibilities in the constitutional structure of the Church, and yet which on the other hand possesses and permanently retains the character of [321] divine law for the Catholic understanding of the Church's constitution. For this it is only necessary that (a) it be understood that every historically unique entity, and therefore also the Church, has in many ways a 'one-way' history and consequently not every development and historical decision must be or can be subject to revision; (b) one can and may suppose (a supposition

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which can afterwards be demonstrated to be historically comprehensible and justified, even though perhaps not 'compelling') that a particular development was a decision made legitimately even if not simply necessarily and caused what was in itself open to manifold possibilities to be made meaningfully and inevitably concrete and specified in one direction; and (c) it can be taken as a fact that such a decision still belongs to the apostolic age, and therefore can be regarded theologically as part of the process of revelation itself and not merely as part of the handing on of that revelation 'which closed with the death of the last apostle'. For example, if at the end of the apostolic age the Church has as a matter of universal practice an episcopal constitution, because at the beginning of the period of 'Early Catholicism' it is everywhere historically in evidence, then it can be taken to be 'iuris divini' without one's being compelled to take up the position that already in the writings of the New Testament it is so clearly formed, so unmistakably predominant over 'presbyteral' tendencies, that any other constitutional development would from the beginning have been totally unthinkable. This remark is not without importance here. As we have neither the duty nor the intention of establishing here the collegiality of the episcopal college theologically from the loci theologici of dogmatics and ecclesiastical law, that remark can serve to make understandable that the later, more clearly given constitutional structure of the Church which we presuppose in the following considerations is a good 'scriptural' one, and in what sense this is so. And moreover it is precisely the collegial, the 'presbyteral' (if the word be rightly understood) idea in the Church's constitution for which we are here considering practical concrete forms without endangering the 'monarchic' idea in the same constitution.

Our reflections take as their starting-point the question how exactly the co-option of a bishop into the college is related to his appointment as bishop, to the conferring of the office (by ordination and by the granting of jurisdiction or by the first alone). Do these two sides of (membership of the college and the granting of the office) mutually implicate one another in a relationship of interdependence, or is the [322] membership of the college a mere consequence, and to a certain extent a secondary one, of the individual episcopal office and its bestowal? The same question may be studied in an analogous case: is the pope supreme pastor of the Church simply and solely because he is Bishop of Rome, with which Roman episcopal office the supreme pastorate is connected (inseparably or – by a papal act – separably), or is he, at least from a really absolute point of view, logically 'simultaneously' or even logically 'first' head of the whole Church and elected as such, so that together with this or through it he is also Bishop of Rome? In a papal election is it the successor of St Peter who is elected, in so far as he is supreme pastor of the Church even in the last analysis independently of the Roman See, so that indirectly the Bishop of Rome is also determined because Peter had charge of the Roman community, or is the primary aim to elect 'only' the Bishop of Rome who becomes by the fact that he is Bishop of Rome also the occupant of the universal Petrine office, because this must exist in the Church and the Bishop of Rome as the successor of Peter the first of these Roman Bishops also acquires this. supreme pastoral office? The practical consequences which this intricate and seemingly uninteresting question could give rise to (for the pope and, here particularly, for the bishops) will appear later. In answering these two questions, which are ultimately one and the same, we do not here defend an absolutely one-way material relationship of logical priority and posteriority between the two elements which are in fact present in each of the two offices (pope and bishop). For us it is sufficient to maintain a relationship of at least reciprocal dependence between the two elements, that is to refute the opinion that membership in the college, or the supreme pastoral office, is purely a further consequence of the other element (the episcopal individual office, usually territorially circumscribed; the local Roman episcopal office). We are saying, therefore, that it is at least equally legitimate to see the given situation in such a way that it can be formulated so: because someone is admitted (by Orders and canonical mission) into

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the college of bishops, he is a bishop. Because someone is elected as supreme pastor of the Church (and accepts this), he is Bishop of Rome. And not only the other way about. We are quite conscious of the fact that this so carefully formulated thesis may not possess the ultimate clarity of formal law and logic. But it seems to us well-founded (at least as a minimal theory) and is sufficient to enable us to catch those glimpses of the present or hoped-for future practice of the Church which we are striving for.

[323] As a foundation for our thesis we must first point out the fact that the college of bishops is regarded in the whole of Christian tradition as the successor of the apostolic college. That the bishops are the successors of the apostles in their (inheritable) office is a doctrine of Catholic faith. If there exists an episcopal college and there existed an apostolic college, then we can and must say as a consequence of that doctrine of the faith that the college of bishops is as such the successor of the college of apostles. There is also no other way of explaining the fullness of power of a Council, since the individual bishop is not infallible but the Council is, and this supreme authority and doctrinal infallibility cannot be delegated to it by the pope, for then this delegated power would not be the highest authority in the Church, which however it is. Accordingly Salaverri, for example, qualifies as a Catholic dogma the thesis that the college of bishops (both within and without a Council) is the bearer of infallible teaching authority (under determinate conditions). The college as such succeeds the apostolic college and is formally its continued existence, and in it the bishop has as its member the highest power of any which he possesses. Now the apostolic college is not constituted – if the word may be forgiven – by local apostles. Its existence and authority is objectively prior to a possible assumption of an individual territorial function by the individual apostle, even if the legendary division of the world among the apostles should be true. And in the same way the Petrine office, at least at one stage in Peter himself and in his main function in the apostolic college, is not originally 'locally' specified. Neither Peter nor the apostolic college exercised in the proper sense the function of a 'local Bishop' of Jerusalem, which was always regarded as belonging to James. Hence if the college of bishops is formally as such the successor of the college of apostles, this characteristic too must be found in it. As a college it is not simply the union of local bishops as such, but a collegial governing board in the Church which cannot as such derive its authority from the locally limited authority of its members as local bishops. Of course it is a theological problem demanding an answer, why this successor-college consists of men who occupy (at least in the majority of cases and at the beginning exclusively) a localised and limited ecclesiastical position: from this one could of course penetrate further into the difference which also exists between the apostolic and episcopal colleges. But these questions which are not here in dispute must not be allowed to obscure our discernment of the fact that the college of bishops as such derives its [324] existence and its right from a college which did not consist of men having a territorially circumscribed mission and authority, and that the college of bishops cannot in any case be formally made up of individual bishops in so far as they have territorially limited authority. The same is true of the Petrine office. The function of supreme pastor cannot be derived from the local function of Peter and his successors as bearers of these local duties and powers. Consciousness of this fundamental structure is also attested by that practice of the ancient Church whereby in the case of the election of a new local bishop not only the local community and their clergy took part, but also the neighbouring bishops, metropolitans and patriarchs. The election of the pope by the college of cardinals is at least formally an election by the suburbicarian bishops, or at any rate not simply by the representatives of the Roman community as such. Also the practice of an international college of cardinals, which today we take practically for granted, indicates that at least today it is formally and immediately not only a question of electing the Bishop of Rome as such, but of electing the supreme pastor of the whole Church. For this reason an ever stronger

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

internationalisation of the college of cardinals has prevailed since the establishment of this method of election. The assignment of a Roman titular church to the cardinals who are not suburbicarian bishops only serves to make it clear that it was desired with this wider view of the meaning of the election not to lose consciousness of the fact that it was always at the same time also a matter of the appointment of the local Roman bishop.

On the basis of the indications we have given, we may now state the following: admittance to, and membership of the college of bishops (or respectively appointment to the supreme pastorate as such) is one side of the episcopal (or respectively Petrine) office or its bestowal which is essential, of equal importance and immediately given with the respective office, which cannot be one-sidedly derived from the other side (local authority) or be viewed exclusively from the point of view of the latter. A bishop is bishop of a given locality because and in so far as he is a member of the episcopal college as the supreme governing body of the universal Church, although in saying this the justification for the converse view is not being disputed. Ordination and canonical mission also have as their immediate signification admission into this college which itself has no territorial character and whose authority over the whole Church is not achieved by the individual bishops piecing together their [325] limited territorial authority and thereby covering the whole earth. At the same time it remains true and not without importance that they represent their particular Churches in the college and place their treasures at the disposal of the whole Church: their spiritual character, historical situation, vital power, the will to responsibility for the totality of the Church.

II

From the point that we have reached we must now strive to gain those glimpses which we are seeking of the outlook for the future in the practical order. We will attempt to indicate a few of these without troubling about any particular systematic order.

1. The College of Cardinals

If the college of bishops with the pope at their head possesses the supreme and fullest authority in the Church, it would seem in itself an obvious conclusion that it should be this body which elects its new head whenever it should become necessary. For the determining of the pope as the supreme pastor of the whole Church is dogmatically, if we are right, at least as important as the electing of the pope as the Bishop of Rome. And the first aspect is for all practical purposes today by contrast with the early centuries of the Church of so much greater significance than the second, that if it comes to a kind of ‘conflict of authority’ regarding the method of election this must without any doubt be given priority. Also such an election by the corporate body which represents the whole Church would today with its world-wide facilities for travel no longer be a practical impossibility in contrast with the first eighteen centuries of the Church. We already pointed out earlier that the historical development of the college of cardinals itself is the result of the implicit consciousness that here it is not merely a question of the election of the Bishop of Rome as such by the local Church of Rome, but of the election of a man in whom the whole Church can be and ought to be interested. Therefore from the viewpoint of purely systematic thought it would seem obvious that the representatives of the whole Church should elect its head. Even if it were to be said that those who worked most closely with the deceased pope form the best electoral body, one would have to add that those who work most closely with the pope with regard to the government of the [326] whole Church are, from the theological point of view, precisely the bishops and not the heads of central ministries, who as such can have at the most only a delegated authority over the Church from the pope which is essentially limited, and is not that

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

fullness of power which belongs to the college iure divino.

But now we must consider with all due respect the fact of the existence and history of the college of cardinals as an electoral board for the pope. And there is no need to close our eyes to the fact that while an election of the pope by the college of bishops is today technically possible, it would yet be from other points of view difficult to carry out. An election of this kind would surely be possible in practice only if the assembly of all the bishops were to set up in their turn some kind of electoral committee (at least as preparatory). And then we would be back again at some kind of college of cardinals. The thought that the episcopal college has from the point of view of constitutional theology the prior claim to be called to elect the pope would therefore be best vindicated in practice by bringing it about that the college of cardinals itself is so formed that it can be regarded as a practical representation of the college of bishops. (This does not of course necessarily mean that the college of cardinals in electing the pope should be bound to any kind of 'mandates' and that a cardinal would not be free and indeed obliged to cast his vote according to his own conscience.) As is shown by the practice of the Council, such a representative function of the college of cardinals in fact gradually arises para-canonically almost of itself: the cardinals here have greater rights to submit their vota, and their word has in point of fact greater weight in the aula than that of other bishops. And yet they are speaking here as members of the episcopal college. Even if it be said that it befits the function of a cardinal as a member of the highest government of the Church to be also a bishop even if he is not regarded as a member of a more restricted representation of the college of bishops as such, it could again be held against this that a cardinal is not as such a member of the supreme government of the Church at all, but an official of the Pope, while it is the Pope himself and under him the college of bishops who constitute the highest government of the Church, so that the admission of a cardinal into the college of bishops cannot rightly be made comprehensible from his real function as it exists or is conceived. If the cardinals are in fact all bishops, this is most easily understood if their college is conceived as a restricted representation of the college of bishops. The progressive internationalisation [327] of the college of cardinals which has been steadily carried forward for the last half-century points in the same direction.

In addition there is the following circumstance: John XXIII has consecrated as bishops all cardinals of the Curia who were not already bishops. It is difficult to say what exactly was his intention in doing this beyond emphasising the dignity and significance of a cardinal. Nor can it be foreseen whether this practice will be maintained in future. One may also admit that this procedure at first struck one as strange: one almost had the impression that the highest degree of the hierarchy of Orders was being used in the manner of honours and titles for something like social and decorative purposes, that the title of an office was being bestowed upon someone without any thought of the exercise of that office, because as mere cardinals without being bishops they would not necessarily and iure divino have a seat and a vote in the Council like residential bishops. In the perspective which has now opened up to us the matter assumes quite a different aspect. It is, to begin with, utterly appropriate that a man of the importance of a cardinal should belong to the college of bishops, since this, being by its nature (at least equally as much as the sum of local bishops as such) the supreme collegial governing board of the Church, must consist not only of local bishops but must also appropriately include such members as contribute to the government of the universal Church as immediately as the local bishops. Such are the cardinals. It represents therefore an adjustment, simplification and clarification of the concrete structure of the Church if these men also really belong to the governing board of the Church established by divine law, if what they already are juridically and practically is also sacramentally consolidated. This can be a difficulty only so long as one holds in too indiscriminate a fashion that of itself and fundamentally the college of bishops can be made up only of local bishops by its nature. If one can overcome this prejudice and realise that everyone who in point of fact actually participates in the highest governing body of the Church should also have the sacramental authorisation and grace of state for it, then John XXIII's measure will appear to be objectively correct. But then the college of Cardinals becomes a kind of commission or committee of the college of bishops, to which is committed most appropriately from the viewpoint of the ultimate constitutional structure of the Church the election of the pope, and it becomes understandable why it is today and will remain for the future the best papal electoral body. The only proviso is that its [328] composition should be such as really to constitute a representation of the whole episcopate. For this it is precisely not required, according to what we have just said, that it should be composed exclusively of archbishops and bishops of residential sees. It is quite appropriate that in it should also be represented authoritative men from the central administration of the Church (with their meaningfully bestowed episcopal rank.) However it could be concluded from the foregoing that if the college of cardinals is to be viewed like this, the dignity of cardinal cannot be used as a kind of reward to crown a career in the diplomatic or curial service of the Holy See, and that it could be limited to that period of time in which someone authoritatively participates in the direction of the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

2. Titular Bishops

If it follows from the nature of the college of bishops that from the very beginning there can be members of it who are not properly bishops ruling a particular place (or their co-adjutors with right of succession), then it is also in principle quite thinkable, on the basis of an explicit realisation of the Church's ultimate constitutional structure and not merely on that of the possibility of an 'absolute' conferring of sacramental Orders, that there should be bishops who do not administer a local diocese, that is titular bishops of various kinds. From our point of view a pre-condition for this possibility, which is not only absolutely possible but quite consonant with the fundamental constitution of the Church, must certainly be that these men should occupy an office, should fulfil a function in the Church which corresponds to the office of a bishop and thus makes it appear meaningful and appropriate that its bearer should also be a member of the supreme governing college of the Church. There are functions and offices of this kind in the Church. It is impossible to divide up the Church exclusively on a territorial basis (even leaving out of consideration her summit). The territorial principle is one important, natural and permanent structural principle in a Church consisting of men living in space and time. But it is not the only structural principle. Just as it is right and necessary (and of this we will have more to say) that there should be in the Church exempt Orders, personal parishes, and institutions which cut right across the territorial divisions of the Church or embrace several dioceses, so there are in the Church offices and functions of an institutional kind which do not lend themselves to normal territorial [329] division and yet are materially of the same importance for the Church as the functions of a local bishop. A Catholic university of the stature of Louvain, for example, is at least equally as significant a 'member' of the Church as a small Italian rural diocese. It is therefore not at all meaningless or alien to the constitution of the Church if its rector is a bishop. And this remains true even though we fully realise that the majority of the episcopal college will consist even in the future of local bishops and rightly so, precisely because the majority of really significant collegiate members of the Church will continue in future to be territorially distinct dioceses. Following upon this, one might freely ask whether it would not be most appropriate from the standpoint of a clear and courageous theology of the constitution of the Church if the supreme and permanent heads of the great exempt Orders (or a great part of them) were to become bishops. After all, they take part in the Council with a right to vote (although this is a situation bound up with

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

great distortions which are merely historical in origin).[4]

As a consequence a distinction in the theological meaningfulness of different sorts of auxiliary bishops might be brought to light. According to Catholic dogmatics, the practice of the Oriental Churches and certain special dispositions of the Latin Church, even a simple priest is sacramentally empowered (conditional upon the necessary habitual or express permission) to administer confirmation validly and licitly. In itself there is nothing fundamentally against the extension of this practice, particularly since the religious effect (sacramental, but also psychological) of the administration of this sacrament by a bishop is no greater than that of administration by a simple priest and the Western practice consumes a great deal of the bishop's time which could be better spent in other ways for the salvation of souls.[5] From this point of view it would be difficult to maintain that the function of an auxiliary bishop if restricted to administering confirmation bestows upon him an importance in the Church such as to make it necessary for him to be a member of the [330] apostolic college of bishops and so to be a bishop. If therefore the office of a mere auxiliary bishop is relatively rare outside Central Europe, this is from the constitutional-theological standpoint absolutely right. On the other hand, an additional bishop[6] in a large diocese which for various reasons (for example if it comprises a big city) cannot perhaps be meaningfully divided can have so many duties and so great a significance for the whole Church even beyond his diocese that it is entirely justified that he should be considered for membership of the college of bishops (and therefore should rightly be a bishop), indeed more so than the bishop of a miniature diocese which could easily be merged with a neighbouring one. From the point of view of the theology of the Church's constitution auxiliary bishops of this sort, too, are rightly bishops. We have already indicated that the same thing can be said analogously for the same reasons of the bearers of significant and decisively important offices in the central administration of the Church. In that case too the conferring of episcopal rank can appear not only justified by the fundamental conception which we have expounded, but as positively commendable, even though the bearer is not already a cardinal. On the other hand, from the same point of view it must be said that an episcopal consecration and dignity is not a suitable means of honouring the occupants of second-rank curial or diplomatic posts, particularly if they have superiors with the rank of bishop or cardinal, or of giving them more authority vis-à-vis the residential bishops.

3. 'Relative' and 'Absolute' Ordination

We can presume as well known what is meant by this heading: in a relative ordination a bishop is consecrated for a determined Church as its local bishop; in an absolute ordination Orders are conferred without any such special relationship (and we are given a constant reminder that in itself relative ordination is the normal case by the practice of conferring a titular see 'inpartibus infidelium', for which purpose nearly two thousand names are held in readiness). This is not the place to rehearse the history of the slow appearance of absolute ordination alongside the older relative ordination which for a thousand years was defended as the only justified form, or to set out the reasons for and against this absolute ordination. But we may suppose that under the previous two points we have acquired enough illustrative material to permit of a further clarification of the [331] central question. If the college of [4] If one looks at the matter dispassionately, it is really quite nonsensical that the superior of a small monastic congregation should be a member of the Council, whereas a Franciscan provincial with ten times as many priests under him as many a diocesan bishop is not. Is the difference in the duration of the office (for life in the one case, for a limited period in the other) really a sufficient ground for this?

[5] The fact that on the occasion of such a 'confirmation round' other useful things are also done (visitation of the parish, and so on) does not in any way alter what we have said.

[6] In the Archdiocese of New York there are ten auxiliary bishops.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

bishops is one and has as such a function in the Church, and if episcopal ordination as such immediately admits to the college, then theologically there cannot be a purely 'absolute' ordination in any unqualified sense: in every ordination there is bestowed besides the sacramental power of Orders membership in the college of bishops, which is not merely the bearer of the power of Orders but inseparably also of pastoral power. Therefore every ordination is a participation in the power of the Church in every respect, even if with regard to the pastoral power such participation is in the first place through membership of the episcopal college as such. This accords with the fact that, quite apart from our particular point of view, the idea is gradually gaining ground that ordination itself does not confer any radical sacramentally grounded and formed faculty for the exercise of pastoral power, as is also evidenced by the liturgy of Orders in the different Churches. If, then, there is a relative ordination in a really theological sense whenever an episcopal participation in the universal power of the Church is granted together with the bestowal of a real office (and so, for example, also of the function of membership in the college), then there cannot be any absolute ordination in an unqualified sense. What is called in vulgar or merely canonical usage relative ordination is then a particular species of relative ordination namely that in which is conferred also the office of a local bishop. But this does not alter in any way the theological structure of the conferring of the office. In both cases the ordination 'relates' to, is 'relative' to, an office.

This conception naturally presupposes that titular bishops too belong to the college of bishops. There are no serious objections to this conception. An objection could only be justified if it was possible to show that only someone who has the power of jurisdiction in his own diocese could be a member of the supreme bearer of jurisdiction in the Church. But such a conception would presuppose the idea that the college of bishops becomes the bearer of this power by the individual bishops in some way adding together territorially and materially limited power of jurisdiction and in this way constituting the supreme bearer of the full power of jurisdiction. But this is impossible, as is demonstrated most clearly by an office which flows from this power, namely the infallible teaching office of this college (together with the pope): a mere summation of authentic but not infallible teaching offices in the individual bishops does not result in that teaching office which both in and out of a Council [332] is indefectible. If one then wanted to say that this quality of indefectibility comes to the teaching office of the whole episcopate from the infallibility of the pope, then it would again be impossible to see why the pope can only permit a bishop to participate in this if he is also a residential bishop.

Nor can one object to these reflections by pointing out that while titular bishops can be and are members of the Council, they are not necessarily so, and this would have to be the case if they were members of the college. For even if it is granted that they are, it is still open to the positive law of the Church and of the disposition of the Holy See in determining more precisely the exact constitution of a Council for good reasons to refrain from calling individual members of the college of bishops to the Council, since this (as such iuris humani) being the representation of the college of bishops does not demand a physical completeness in the number of the assembled bishops and since there is no need to dispute that there is a certain difference in membership oft-he college as between local Ordinaries and certain kinds of titular bishops. The fact that titular bishops belong to the college of bishops can really not be doubted, neither on general principles nor precisely from the viewpoint that to be a bishop signifies formaliter to be a member of the college. This is true even if we emphasise that membership of a college admits of different degrees and modes so that a titular bishop does not have to be, nor is, a member of the episcopal college in precisely the same sense as a

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

residential bishop.[7]

Added to this is the realisation that the ideal of relative ordination makes it desirable to have as subject of episcopal power and dignity someone whose other episcopal function (as distinct from his function as a member of the college) makes it precisely appropriate that he should be a member of the supreme governing body of the Church. Now we have sought to show that there are such functions which are not identical with the function of a local Ordinary, and that on the other hand titular bishops not infrequently exercise only such functions as do not make their [333] bearer appear objectively as a suitable member of the supreme governing body of the Church. A relative ordination, therefore, which would be desirable from every point of view, that is both theologically and juridically, would he one in which someone receives an office or in which someone's office is sacramentally consecrated which truly qualifies him to be a suitable member of the college of bishops. This office may then be of a local or non-local kind. A merely 'absolute' ordination (even if it is relative in the sense previously described) which would be wholly undesirable would be one which, apart from the membership of the college and the bare power of Orders, does not give anything and does not come upon or confer any function in its bearer which in its significance for the universal Church makes him 'homologous' with a local Ordinary.

4. The Essential Nature of the Diocese

If we listen to a recital of the statements of the Schoolmen on the nature of the diocese we will be given few illuminating insights: a diocese is a member-Church over which presides a bishop with a pastoral authority which is prescribed and precisely delimited (against pope and perhaps patriarch and metropolitan) by ecclesiastical law; a bishop on the other hand (if one abstracts from his power of Orders, which does not give any sign of being related in any immediately visible way to a circumscribed territory, and certainly not to its shape and size) is a man who governs a diocese with pastoral authority. There is thus a perfect circle in our understanding. But now that we are faced with the new and urgent question in practical law and pastoral theology of how large a diocese should in fact be and whether dioceses should be divided or amalgamated, we see that we can no longer he satisfied with such answers. On the other hand these practical questions which we have just mentioned cannot he answered simply 'in practice'. It is only when we know what a diocese is intended to be, what are really its functions and what are not (for example, because they can equally well be carried out by a dean, if necessary armed with the power to confirm; or because in all cases they can only be dealt with by a 'chief bishop', that is a metropolitan, a patriarch and their combinations, or a national or continental bishops' conference) that we can 'practically' ask how a diocese should be formed with regard to its size and institutions in order to enable it to carry out these functions. For example, someone who is of the opinion that a bishop must 'know' [334] all his priests or be in a position to confirm all the members of his flock personally will form a different ideal image of the most desirable extent of a diocese than will someone who rejects a guide-line of this kind as romantic and paternalistic.

Now it is surely evident at the start that we can neither have an 'ideal' image of the diocese which is equally valid for all times, nor develop an imaginative 'model' of the diocese for today in such a way as to allow us to deduce from it, for example, a particular number of square miles or of inhabitants as its 'ideal' size. The first is impossible, because quite clearly a diocese in its concrete historical form is a consequence of many natural (geographic, racial,

[7] Here we may briefly refer to the following: exactly as baptism constitutes a certain, although not a full, membership of the Church even if the baptised person is a heretic or a schismatic, so a valid episcopal consecration gives a certain, although not full, membership of the episcopal college, even if the consecrated person is a heretic or schismatic. This is especially so where the heresy or schism is only material and the absence of any 'affectus haereticalis aut schismaticus' is sociologically obvious.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

social, historical) conditions which are changeable. The second is impossible, because these differences can be found to exist even today at the same time. But setting out from the fundamental idea of these new reflections we can say something to make the 'idea' of the diocese more concrete than it is in the formal determination of the notion with which we began.

At this point, it is good once more to arouse our wonder at the fact that the supreme governing body of the Church which originally had its normal seat in one place – Jerusalem – is largely composed of men who are at the same time governors of a 'province' of the Church and so are 'scattered' throughout the world. In the case of other sociological entities this is seldom so: the 'Government', the 'Cabinet' of a country will scarcely ever be composed of the governors of the provinces of the country. Neither is our wonder in any way dissipated by the mere consideration that the Roman Pope represents in this governing body the unity of the Church while the bishops represent the plurality and multiplicity of the Church's members so that these members of the board must come from all parts of the world. For even though the bipolar structure of the supreme governing body (a head of the college who is personally capable of action and a synodal plurality of members) includes a representation of the whole Church, this is no reason why it should be in itself identical with the total number of the leaders of the local Churches. And yet this fact which is so far from being self-evident is the case. Again, this is not the place to draw consequences for the theological character of the college of bishops and the particular nature of its origin from the apostolic college from these observations of the difference between a supra-local apostolic college which exists in one place and an episcopal college composed of local bishops who are 'scattered'. (Clearly it is not [335] the successor-college in the sense that the same permanent college as a moral person is merely made up of different physical persons: it is one college following upon another college.)

If we are to take full account of this surprising fact we will have to say that the members of the supreme governing body of the universal Church must be men governing such a notable part of the Church that it can rightly expect to be personally represented on that board. But this means conversely that a diocese must be such (in size, life, and character) that in it (precisely in its geographic, demographic, historical and religious make-up of that particular period) the totality of the Church is made to appear, that it can really be called a 'Church', that is, it can be characterised by the same theological concept (and not just that of a part, a province and so on, of the Church) as the universal Church herself, something which one could not say nor ought to say of a local parish. For the Church in contrast with every other society has the peculiar characteristic of being able to make her appearance whole on the spot. A State has in a particular place only one of its places: a city or a province which can never rightly be called by the same name as the whole State. But in the Church it is quite otherwise: she can be in one place as a whole and therefore the community of that place can rightly be called 'the Church'. The Church is 'there' on the spot, because her highest self-realisation which qualifies her as a whole and which cannot be thought of as any higher or more concentrated even in the totality of the Church can take place in a particular spot and not only in the territorial totality of the Church: the celebration of the Eucharist, where the Lord is truly present as Lord and sacrifice of the Church, and the proclamation of the efficacious Word of God in which the mighty deeds of God towards man are heralded in the event.

As a consequence one might be tempted to think that simply every local community about an altar and not only the diocese is already Church. It is a fact that this difficulty could scarcely be felt at all in ancient times because the average true and full community about an altar coincided with the community about a bishop. But it is precisely this view of the local community as a kind of actual presence of the whole Church which leads to the conclusion

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

that only that local community is really completely 'Church', and so a diocese, in which the whole of the Church's realisation of her life can be representatively brought about, and not only the celebration of the Eucharist (Sacrament) and the proclamation of the [336] Word. This presence of the whole of the Church is of course not conceived in the sense that wheresoever there are 'genuine' dioceses the Church is really present wholly with her life, but in the sense (and this is a variable requirement according to place and time) that a proper diocese must also be to a sufficient extent the bearer of such functions as necessarily belong to the -universal Church over and above the Eucharistic celebration and the proclamation of the Word. For only such a member-part of the Church can meaningfully claim that its leader should be a member of the supreme governing board of the Church.

In connection with the foregoing the following consideration should be kept in mind: the possibility of the Church as such coming to appear in some way as a whole at a particular point in space and time in the world depends to a large extent on the secular sociological conditions existing in that particular place at that particular time. For a diocese today to be able to be a diocese, that is a Church which really represents at least in some way the Church in all her dimensions, it, requires pre-existing conditions of a sociological, economic, and cultural sort which are simply not possible in a very small diocese (we are always speaking of a diocese which is already developed or at least capable of being developed). Because the spiritual, cultural and social life of today is of such a particular kind, and therefore the organisation of the Church with her theological, spiritual and religious life must also as its analogue be of this kind, it can exist only in relatively widespread or highly populated areas. A 'village' cannot support the image of a developed and complete diocese. But the same is now true also of smaller areas which by contrast with earlier social frameworks are now no more than the villages of the present age. When today one reflects upon the diocese which corresponds to the present, one must keep in mind that the fundamental extension of the local community of today is no longer the town but the industrial zone. Just as there was a historical transition (of a gradual kind) from the village-culture to that of the town, so today we are experiencing a transition from the town-culture to a culture for whose local unit we do not even yet have a proper name, which for the moment we may call 'industrial zone'. These sociological developments ought not to be overlooked when one reflects upon the nature of a contemporary 'proper' diocese. Could one possibly conceive, for example, of the Ruhr having several dioceses? If not, and if such an industrial area is becoming more and more [337] the normal type of human life, what are the consequences for the correct size of a diocese?

What we have so far said may still be only a vague indication of the fundamental-theological nature of a diocese: if we wanted to say anything immediately more precise, we would be led into the difficult question we do not intend to discuss here, in what sense the bishop and the diocese are 'iuris divini', that is once more how and why the one office of the Church (given in and supported by a successor-college similar to the apostolic college in its unity of Peter's office and the 'Twelve') should be borne by a college organised on a territorial basis; and why, for example, (de facto or de jure?) the sum of patriarchs or metropolitans alone does not deserve consideration as such a successor-college, so that these alone would have to be called 'bishops' in the theological sense, whereas those we now call bishops would be merely a kind of 'archpriest' or 'dean'.[8] But even the still vague

[8] If we consider the fact that on the one hand even a 'simple' priest can under certain conditions confirm, perhaps even ordain to the priesthood (cf. DS 1145 sq.), and that on the other hand a patriarch or metropolitan nearly always participates as a consecrator at a normal episcopal consecration, we see how difficult it is to say dogmatically just what a bishop is. Even if we maintain that de facto he is distinct from the simple priest 'ratione ordinis', the question still remains open whether this distinction is itself iuris divini or not, precisely how it is to be explained (whether by the fact that a simple priest has the episcopal power of ordination

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

information what a bishop is (as member of the college) and what therefore he should be (in his particular office) already offers a criterion by which to measure dioceses as they exist in fact. ii it is necessary for the diocese to be a real representation of the life of the universal Church (in its natural and supernatural character), then it is not excluded but rather implied that this kind of representation and therefore the form of the diocese is subject to historical change. The ancient bishopric of a [338] locality and the contemporary (apart from Italy) bishopric of a province, for example, represent the change from the ancient Polis-State (which also exercised a great historical influence in the Hellenistic-Roman Empire) to the region-State. We cannot here go any further into the history of the form and function of a bishopric, a history which is complex and varies greatly in different continents. But if our fundamental line of thought is correct then certain consequences will follow which are of considerable practical importance for our time. A diocese, as it ought to be, should not be too small: it must really be able to support of itself the organs which belong to the Church as such (prescinding from her central government). And since the apparatus of the institutional in the life of the Church in today's world of technology and mass society necessarily becomes ever more complicated (pastoral institutes, training places for the most diverse forms of aid in the Church, finance, widely organised charitable works, and much more of the same kind), the objectively correct trend is tending to an increase rather than a decrease in the size of dioceses. If the city is becoming increasingly the normal domicile and usually there is only one diocese in the one city, then by force of circumstance the large diocese will become the normal type of diocese. And this is also theologically justified: the occupant of a miniature see of a few thousand souls, and this in regions where dioceses could easily be combined, has no meaningful claim to be a member of the supreme governing college of the universal Church.[9] This is particularly so in a period when the universal Church consists of four hundred millions and almost unavoidably has at the same time two to three thousand bishops whose number can after all not be multiplied indefinitely if – and one need only think of a Council and its technical problems – they are really still to constitute the supreme government of the universal Church. It is no use resisting a development towards relatively greater dioceses, hindering the fusion of small dioceses, or pleading for the division of dioceses on grounds which are of a rather romantic or paternalistic kind. The only consequence of such a procedure would be that what a real bishop must be if he is to be a member of the episcopal college would [339] practically even if not terminologically be found only in the case of higher bishops, patriarchs or metropolitans, or with the presidents of bishops' conferences, and he who is still called bishop but is no longer really fully such would in practice be no more than a dean with the power to administer confirmation. He would no longer be at the head of such institutions as make a territorial district into a 'Church'.

---

restricted to the point of invalidity of the act, or by the fact that it is simply not there) and whether this distinction must have been the same at all times in the Church's history or whether the Church's intention regarding the two Orders could itself be subject to historical change. It is difficult to characterise the bishop on the basis of the power of jurisdiction because at least as a matter of fact his pastoral power is limited by that of the pope (and perhaps of other higher bishops) and because even those who are not bishops can have a share in this power which is capable of being divided and apportioned in the most diverse ways. And so it is really simplest and clearest to say that a bishop is a member of the supreme governing body of the Church and to determine from this what office he should fill and what powers he should be invested with in order that he might meaningfully be called a bishop, that is to say, that he might meaningfully and appropriately from die nature of things be co-opted into this supreme college.

[9] If it be objected that this is all very well, but such a one is still a consecrated bishop, then we need only remark that the question here is precisely this, who should be meaningfully consecrated a bishop as member of the college of the Church's universal government and under what conditions; the question is not whether someone once he has been consecrated is then rightly a member of that college.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Wherever a diocese is incapable of supporting by itself a seminary corresponding to the demands of today, wherever the institutions demanded by the educational system, or charitable organisation, the influencing of public opinion, the management of mass media or of cultural life, cannot be supported by a diocese in such a manner that in some way they are representative of the whole Church, then in that place there does not exist a member-Church which can and should be led by a successor of the apostles such that over him he needs to have only the principle of the unity of the college, the successor of the apostolic college, for his normal activity. In other words, it would be a diocese more in name than in reality. If in order to be effective a genuine, large, living diocese of the kind we have envisaged really requires further intermediaries between its head and the individual local community, that is intermediate instances 'below', which may easily be the case, then these should be created, if those which already exist (deaneries, inter-parochial diocesan organisations, personal parishes like student communities, and so on) are insufficient; or those which exist should be allowed more powers in accordance with the principle of subsidiarity which also applies to the Church. But this is no reason for making the dioceses so small that their head must sink in the spiritual, sociological, and properly ecclesiastical sense to the level of a parish priest who administers confirmation and is able to ordain priests. His pastoral authority too must be capable of showing the stature and impressiveness of a successor of the apostles and a member of the total government of the Church. For this there is required not merely the existence of a formal pastoral authority, but it must also have an object, a field of activity, and a matter for its objectification which is worthy of its significance. What we have said is of course primarily intended to apply to a diocese which is fully constituted and not to one still in process of being built up, and naturally it must be filled out in the concrete in a very variable way according to times, regions and their cultural and social development.

[340] 5. The Bishop and his Priests

Here and there the anxious question has already been raised, whether a clearer prominence given to the mission and authority of the bishop who rules his diocese in the name of Christ and not as a mere official of the pope may not be accompanied by the danger of substituting for a centralised and – allegedly or really – autocratic régime from Rome a practical 'episcopalism' with an autocratic régime in the diocese. We, in our middle-European lands, will not feel ourselves bound to hold this danger to be very great or urgent. Our diaspora-situation does not favour such a danger: bishops and priests are too dependent on one another in the crisis of neo-paganism. If we prescind from quirks of character and temperamental outbreaks which can have a good or bad effect in every 'system' and in the latter case must be borne with patience and . . . humour, and which with virile and fraternal openness of priests before their bishop can always be sufficiently contained, our bishops are in no danger and under no suspicion of being or becoming autocrats. But this may be quite otherwise in other countries with a different historical and psychological conditioning. Perhaps an African bishop may involuntarily affect the attitude of a tribal chief, or there may be still preserved in one or another French bishop something like a piece of the mentality of the ancien régime. In any case, in order to avoid this danger it is at all times and in every place necessary that the theologically correct relationship between bishop and presbyterium should be kept vitally in the forefront of our consciousness.

Our approach permits us to clarify this relationship. We do not in any way maintain that the relationship of pope to episcopate is in our fundamental theology simply carried further down in the same sense as equally 'iuris divini' and so can be simply transferred univocally and mechanically to the relationship of bishop to presbyterium. But at this point we can say two things. First, the fundamental-theological structure of the Church, in so far as it demands a bipolar unity of a monarchical and a collegial element inseparably related to one another

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

(without on that account being a college of mere equals, as in the 'definition' of a college given by Ulpian), can surely also serve as a guide for the relationship of bishop and presbyterium. Second, if the principle of collegiality is applied to this relationship at least as a guide from the point of view here emphasised, then we must say the following. The priest enters by his priestly ordination into a college, the presbyterium, which is surely to [341] be thought of as fundamentally iure divino[10] a college for the bishop. And in point of fact the New Testament and the primitive Church do not actually show any knowledge of the single priest but only of the presbyterium. The latter is even locally united with the bishop, it is not a subsequent collection of parish priests residing in places where there is no bishop, but precisely the college in the same place where the bishop is: he does not ordain a priest because he cannot be everywhere, but as a helper in his office where he actually is. He does not ordain an individual, but surrounds himself with a college. He does not act without the presbyterium. This does not mean that he is dependent upon his presbyterium juridically and in a way subject to legal action, but that he knows himself to be no lonely, autocratic monarch who could say, or would want to say: 'The diocese, c'est moi!'. One can unhesitatingly say that the 'synod' of the bishop with his presbyterium is just as old and original as the synod of bishops among themselves (even though it is not on that account constitutionally of the same kind). Perhaps today it may legitimately be the case on practical grounds that the function of the former episcopal presbyterium is carried out to a large extent (leaving aside the rare occasion of a diocesan synod, CIC c. 356-362) by the cathedral chapter and the other priest-members of an episcopal Curia, and perhaps in the concrete situation of today with the necessary big dioceses and the local separation of most priests from the episcopal seat it must be so. But if one looks at this episcopal Curia keeping in mind the bipolarity of bishop and presbyterium, one must say that the fundamental-theological structure of the Church is realised purely and clearly only if the episcopal Curia is chosen and constituted in such a way that it can be accepted to be really the representation of the presbyterium; that therefore a similar [342] relationship exists from a theological point of view as our previous reflections showed to be desirable between the college of cardinals and the episcopal college. This does not in any way mean that the episcopal Curia must be elected by the presbyterium 'from below' (or even as a kind of supervisory body over the bishop on behalf of the presbyterium). This is not the case with the college of cardinals and it would offend against the subordination of the presbyterium to the bishop. But this may well mean on fundamental-theological grounds (and not on merely pragmatic-psychological ones) that the bishop has the moral obligation to constitute his Curia in such a way that it is also the representation of his presbyterium which he himself after all has ordained as his presbyterium, as his council of 'Elders', even if the honouring of this moral obligation is not subject to a juridically laid down control by the presbyterium.

Only when the priest is seen as always the member of the presbyterium does it become quite understandable (particularly when one thinks of the practice of the early Church with her many small episcopal sees) why every head of a permanent, local altar-community of any size, that is above all every parish priest, is not a bishop. It becomes understandable why a [10] Although it has not been strictly defined, it is theologically certain that the threefold gradation of the Church's office (bishop – priest – deacon) is part of the unalterable, divine constitution of the Church. But if in stating this one were to think merely of priests as individuals, called into being simply to the extent that a bishop has need of help, then it would also be possible to conceive of a bishop deciding that he can do without such help and so eliminating the threefold gradation of the office at one fell swoop. To bring this about one need only think of the theoretical possibility of consecrating every parish priest a bishop and so making individual priestly assistants superfluous. Therefore if the 'second grade' of the priestly office is really to be iuris divini, it can only be thought of as the college for the bishop; strictly speaking, therefore, priests do not primarily take the place of the bishop where he cannot be himself, but support him as the presbyterium surrounding the bishop where he is.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

diocese is a really theological entity, not merely an administrative organisation of many local communities, but a real, spiritual entity: the bishop does not ordain priests in order to send them away from him with their faculties, so that each may be a priest for himself but he entrusts to the members of his presbyterium, which remains always his, particular local commitments and so remains the episcopal Father of his whole diocese. From this it will also be understandable that the local parish is indeed the normal and most common type of such a commission of the member of the presbyterium, but that members of the presbyterium can be called upon as representatives of the bishop for other kinds of altar-communities, if and in so far as such non-parochial, permanent altar communities (personal parishes, religious communities, and so on) remain meaningful. The 'territorial principle' is not the only constitutive principle. It is precisely when the individual priest is seen as a member of the presbyterium that a romantic parochialism is avoided which would make of the parish priest a little bishop (and tries to make him, for example, irremovable or untransferable in the same sense as the bishop). The dignity of the parish priest is not lessened but increased, if he is seen as a member of the episcopal presbyterium, as the representative here and now of the episcopal church. But the parish is not a diocese in miniature. [343] If it were regarded as such, it would properly have to become a diocese. But against this must be said everything that was set out above against miniature dioceses.

Finally, our approach makes it theologically comprehensible why up to the present the dividing-line between the sacramental powers of the bishop and those of the simple priest has not achieved perfect clarity in the Church's consciousness of her faith. One can only say with any certainty that a priest cannot consecrate a bishop. But it is not even certain whether he cannot under certain circumstances validly administer priestly Orders. It is certain that he can confirm. This is a curious situation. For since a simple priest is the bearer of all the jurisdictional authority of a bishop, it might in the abstract be held according to present-day theology that simple priests exercise alone all without any bishops the offices in the Church which are really necessary for her life, since one needs episcopal consecration only if one needs bishops. But these are not required if all their functions can equally well be carried out by the simple priest, in so far as these functions are necessary for the salvation of Christians. These speculative reflections are merely meant to show that the border-line iuris divini between priest and bishop is not so easy to draw as it is sometimes thought. But this is the point which becomes understandable if the bishop cannot really be thought of without his presbyterium and therefore if in certain circumstances a subordinate member of this unity of bishop and presbyterium (who is designated by sacramental Orders) can represent the bishop. In the ultimately decisive matter he does it in any case: in the celebration of the Eucharist. And this has always been and is today the most central function of the bishop (because here in this most intimate mystery of the Church she is made present most actually and most intensively): it is for this reason that Thomas Aquinas and all the great theologians would not admit any sacramentality of episcopal Orders as distinct from priestly Orders. This is again an indication of the point we are making: bishop and priest belong most closely together because the priest is not a smaller 'recapitulation' of the bishop, but a member of his presbyterium apart from which in the last analysis[11] he cannot be thought of; and this is the reason why his [344] powers as representative of the head of the presbyterium are somewhat changeable and have not always been the same perhaps in the different periods of the Church's history in accordance with the possibly changing intention of the Church in raising men to the priesthood.[12]

[11] Even if we think of an individual consecrated bishop in abstraction without any priests of his own, he is still surrounded by priests through his necessary union with the whole college of bishops, since according to DS 1776 the universal episcopate can certainly not be without a presbyterium.

[12] Theologically such a possibility must be taken seriously. Although a society's office may ultimately be one by

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

6. The Unity of Offices and Powers in the Church

By this heading we do not mean the unity of the bearers of the offices and the powers, but that of the offices and powers themselves, certainly in so far as this unity can be seen from the unity of the episcopal college with and under (and also through[13]) the Pope and from the inseparable unity of the conferring of powers and the co-option into the college in the case of the bishop. It is of course obvious that these brief reflections from a particular standpoint can in no way claim to be a complete treatment of the subject indicated by the title 'Unity of Powers'.

We set out once more from the fundamental fact that the college of bishops with the pope at its head is the bearer of supreme and full authority in the Church. A society ('people of God', 'people of the Covenant', 'community' of Christ) which proclaims its unity as one of its most essential characteristics and which has one goal and one mission must also he necessarily one in its office, and this ultimately single authority and this ultimately single office pertains to the college of bishops, which is [345] thus actually characterised by the full possession of this one authority and this one office. In so far as in this one office and in the one authority upon which it is based we can and must distinguish, no matter for what reasons, offices and authorities of various kinds, these must therefore never be simply enumerated purely arithmetically but grasped in their unity, or developed from the one fundamental essence of the Church, from her unity and the unity of her mission and her goal.

We must now take note, to a certain extent empirically, of the fact that the supreme bearer of this one office, or alternatively that the members of the college which is this bearer, are constituted as such on the one hand by a sacramental consecration which gives them a power to sanctify (potestas ordinis), and on the other by the conferring of a pastoral power (potestas iurisdictionis) which is not yet given or need not be given by episcopal consecration (at least as 'absolute') at any rate as wholly at their free and actual disposal. And yet it follows from what we have just said that these two powers (and the offices which are built upon them and through which they are exercised) must have an inner unity and an ultimately indissoluble connection. If one wishes to see this, it is no use looking merely or in the first place at the individual bishop as such, but it is necessary to reflect on the college of bishops as such and their ontological and logical equality with or precedence over the single bishops or their merely consequent summation. For there is no difficulty in the case of the college of bishops in propounding the thesis that in it as such a separation of the two powers is quite impossible, without coming into conflict with the fact indicated above.[14] The Church cannot after all be thought of without bishops, that is without that power of Orders which involves the legitimate reason of the unity of the society and of its aim and purpose, a partial participation in it is changeable of its very nature and as a consequence of historical situations without this involving any change in the nature of the one office. There is no reason to suppose that the same cannot be true of the Church. The nature of the one office which is iuris divini and its threefold gradation need not be affected by this. If, for example, the Church declared one day that no priest is capable of administering priestly ordination in any circumstance and under any condition whatever, this would not mean that this had always and at all times been so. Perhaps the case is somewhat similar when the question is asked whether an episcopal consecration even without a preceding priestly ordination is valid or not. After all, we have at least an analogous case with regard to the 'matter' of the Sacrament of Orders, where the Church has explicitly (DS 3861) left open the question whether this essential matter has at all times been the same. Presumably the Church can also determine the precise extent of the powers which she intends to confer through priestly ordination and by this means vary the distance between the simple priesthood and the episcopate, although her intention is on occasion very implicit. Such a consideration could perhaps diminish or eliminate altogether many a difficulty arising in these matters in the early periods of the Church's history.

---

[13] DS 3051.

[14] Namely the fact that someone may have an 'episcopal' jurisdiction without being consecrated a bishop, or someone may be a consecrated bishop without – at least apparently – having the potestas iurisdictionis.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

authority to celebrate the Eucharist and to hand on this authority (power of ordination). But neither can there be any Church without the pastoral power, without which the one life of the visible Church is not thinkable. Now it is surely unthinkable that these two powers which necessarily exist in the Church should be distributed between two completely and fundamentally different bearers. For apart from the question how one could even imagine this being carried out in practice, this is quite impossible for the reason that these two powers include one another at least in part. The leader of the Eucharistic celebration [346] is after all not to be thought of as the mere agent of the consecration ex opere operato, but as the fully authorised leader of the celebration of the community with the right and the duty of admitting to the altar-community or excluding from it as the highest realisation of the unity of the visible Church. If he does this because he is the possessor of the power of Orders, he is already positing sacred law. If the exercise of the power of Orders of reconciling with God and the Church in the Sacrament of Penance were simply dependent on someone who does not himself possess this power as a matter of principle and in every case, then it would be no more than an abstract theoretical postulate and nothing in reality. The giver of the jurisdiction for confession would be the true possessor of the Church's power of reconciliation, since only by him would its exercise be made possible. This is further unthinkable for the reason that this power also essentially signifies the power to admit to the full Eucharistic community of the altar, which power must however by the very nature of the case be possessed by the leader of the community's celebration of the Last Supper. Therefore the power of Orders and pastoral power at least partially include one another; they are basically two elements of one and the same fundamental power, which is divided into two powers only in relatively secondary effects and applications, where each of them is not necessarily determined in the same way or by the same norms as the other. But if they hang together in such an inseparable way in their deepest root, then the bearer of this completely one power can only be he who necessarily possesses both. And this bearer is the college of bishops under and with the pope.

It follows from this that it is a duty of the pope to receive episcopal consecration, if he should be elected when he is not a bishop. For even though one might justify the prescription of canon 219 of the Code[15] in the considerations we are here concerned with by saying that as head of the college he already participates in a certain sense in the power of Orders of his college before he is himself consecrated a bishop and so participates in this power also personally as an individual and not merely as a member of the college, it is surely more than a demand of reasonableness or even of the look of the thing that the supreme head of the whole Church, in whose person inheres the fullness of pastoral power, should also possess that power which in the last analysis cannot be separated from [347] pastoral power in the Church or in the whole college, namely the power of Orders, with which is immediately given sacred law, and in which the latter in fact has its origin.[16]

---

[15] 'Romanus Pontifex, legitime electus, statim ab acceptata electione, obtinet, iure divino, plenam supremae iurisdictionis potestatem.'

[16] At this point we may ask in some surprise – if for once we may be permitted to say this out loud – why it is taken so much for granted that the act of transmitting the supreme pastoral power resident in the pope is not a grade of the Sacrament of Orders. It is clear that the mode of appointment to this office (without any laying-on of hands) is no absolute barrier to maintaining the opposite opinion: a sacrament (as may be seen in Penance and Matrimony) is not necessarily bound to a 'matter' which is distinct from the 'form' (the word which assures the grace). If it is said that papal election (with its acceptance) does not confer any higher 'power of Orders' but only constitutes 'ratione iurisdictionis' a higher degree in the official hierarchy, we are entitled to ask the counter-question whether this answer is really as clear as it appears to be at first sight in view of the radical unity of the two powers, whether it was not with a formally similar argument that St Thomas and the medieval theologians disputed the sacramentality of episcopal consecration (that is, because it did not confer any new authoritative power – in this case in relation to the Body of Christ), whether it is a priori evident that the conferring of the power of an office can only then be sacramental, that is bound up with the ex opere operato

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[348] This unity of powers in which is given the one essence and the one mission of the college of bishops is also a manifestation of the fact that law and the juridical order in the Church are an expression and an element of that grace which is preached in the gospel, and that they are an instrument of salvation and not the sting of sin only when they accompany grace and are redeemed by it, by that grace which is promised us efficaciously and without repentance in the Sacraments.

This unity of powers in one and the same bearer, in the one college of bishops, also brings home from the point of view of constitutional theology, even though it does not urge it in every individual case, the principle that wherever there is given an 'Ordinarius' with reference to pastoral power as a permanent office in a subject for life, then that subject should also be a bishop. This is not merely because (as we saw above) such a one can meaningfully be a member of the supreme governing body of the Church (as also vice versa), but also because the exercise of such pastoral power should be supported by that grace which first sanctifies power in the Church and makes it a means of sanctification, and seeing that it involves such decisive events of grace should also be made historically and ecclesiologically (socially) visible in the Sacrament. As we have said, this may not be urgent in the individual case, because even without such a sacramental foundation and consecration of the pastoral power in the individual he and his activity stand within the whole of the mystical Body of Christ and as a consequence (that is, of the Sacrament of Orders which is infallibly present in the Church) the activity of such an individual also has this grace assured to it. But careful consideration should be given to this reflection in the practice of the Church. The fundamental-theological structures of the Church would thus be brought to a clearer and purer concrete development.

The question why and how the radically single power of the Church, while remaining one in its root, even though possessing two constitutive elements, yet unfolds into two separate powers which then in their [349] divided form no longer exhibit precisely the same characteristics, is a question which naturally does not concern us here. We only wish to add bestowal of the grace of the office, when this official power is itself a commission to perform sacramental acts. If it be said that the idea that the election of a pope could be the highest grade of the Sacrament of Orders is quite unheard of up to now, we may point out that up to the Second Vatican Council it was also not absolutely certain that episcopal consecration is a grade of the Sacrament of Orders. One might continue by asking whether, arguing from the nature of the Church as the basic sacrament, it is not necessary to say that appointment to the highest and most decisive office in the Church is also God's absolute promise of the divine Pneuma for rightly fulfilling this office (no matter whether the man completely takes up this promise or not), and what is really the difference between such an absolute promise and an opus operatum. One could ask whether the radical unity of the two powers in the Church does not suggest that the gradation of each of the two powers is given in the same way on both sides. If it be objected that appointment to the papacy does not produce an 'indelible mark', the character which is part of the essence of the Sacrament of Orders, it could be pointed out that a pope can be released from his authority only by his own act of renunciation, something which is not so in the case of any other degree in the hierarchy of jurisdiction, and that by this fact alone his office is already assimilated to the permanent powers of Orders in the lower degrees of the hierarchy of Orders, especially since the bearers of all these degrees can in practice renounce every exercise of their powers; the difference which then still remains can be explained by the nature of the case, that is by the essence of the supreme office, which cannot be taken up again by someone once he has completely renounced its exercise. It must also be always kept in mind that the theological nature of the pope's office can only be rightly seen if he is regarded also as a bishop, because he is head of the episcopal college as a hierarchy of Orders, and that therefore his appointment as pope necessarily signifies a modification of the episcopal authoritative power which he has or must have. Why should this modification in fact not have a sacramental character? Merely because we are not accustomed to see things in this way? But could we not see them in this way if we were once accustomed to seeing that the conferring of an office in the Church (as a whole) is of its nature a sacrament under the necessary conditions and with the corresponding intention on the part of the Church (to confer a definitive office) and that therefore and as a consequence of this the degrees of this office introduced by the Church (even it may be from apostolic times and irrevocably) are sacramental stages of the one office sacramentally conferred?

---

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

here the note, that it is certainly insufficient to characterise the one power (power of Orders) as incapable of being lost and the other (pastoral power) as capable of being lost. For in its first bearer, the college of bishops with the pope, the pastoral power, too, cannot be lost: the college as such cannot lose it, and it is also implicit in the doctrine of the ultimate indefectibility of the socially constituted Church as such and the necessity for the power of Orders and for pastoral power of a historically visible apostolic succession that the historically visible college of bishops with the pope can never (as it were, all of a sudden) cease to exist and be replaced by an absolutely new college which is brought into being, so to speak, by a 'generatio aequivoca'. Certainly the fact that Catholic ecclesiology both regards it as self-evident that a pope should be elected and therefore does not receive his office (as in the case of the bishop) handed on by his predecessor, and is also able to reckon with the possibility of a pope as a heretic or schismatic losing his membership of the Church and thus his office, indicates that the office of pope, rightly understood, is also supported by the college of bishops: it is because the Church remains an hierarchically ordered one even at the death (whether understood physically or morally) of the pope and the office is therefore historically then still in existence, that the election of a new pope is possible. In such a situation the Church posits without the pope an ecclesiastico-juridical act of the highest importance, namely the election of a new pope, even though this act consists merely in indicating the person who is to receive from the Spirit his full authority as pope (admittedly only in one respect, since the episcopal consecration of the pope is not purely an event 'from above' and episcopal powers yet belong to the essence of the papacy), and even though the Church is obliged to the act of choosing a pope. So if ultimately the power of jurisdiction cannot be lost in the Church, in so far as it reposes in the college of bishops, the power of Orders is on the other hand in many ways capable of being lost, or rather it is at least capable of being 'bound' to the extent of invalidating an act (for example, a priest's power of absolution; his power of confirming which is surely radically conferred on him sacramentally), and there is still not complete clarity in sacramental theology on the question of how far it is possible for the Church (even if this power, for whatever reason, should not be unlimited) to withhold [350] validity and not merely lawfulness from a determinate subject's act even of the power of Orders. One ought to study anew from this point of view the historical questions of the 're-ordinations' in ancient and early medieval times and of the invalidity of Anglican Orders: perhaps the situation is simply this, that both the positions adopted in these questions are 'in themselves' possible and the dispute, rightly seen, is really over whether the Church in making its decision de facto allowed or (from the beginning) denied any validity to a simoniacal Ordination (as an act). (Similarly with Anglican Orders.) From such reflections, too, it follows how close is the unity of the two powers in the Church. Yet this is not the place to pursue this question any further.

7. Exemption

The whole problematic area designated by this heading, too, cannot here be treated in all its depth and to its full extent. But our point of view permits us to attain to a very basic understanding of the real fundamental-theological side of the problem. The college of bishops with and under the pope is one, and it has as a college and in its head a unified function which is inter- or supra-territorial, which is not really the sum of the territorially limited functions of its individual members but is at least equal to them. From this fundamental idea it follows that someone can quite meaningfully be thought of as a member of this college who does not exercise at the same time any territorially determined pastoral function in the Church, provided only that his membership of the college be justified on other grounds, as, for example, in the case of a curial cardinal who is a 'titular bishop'.

Now there exist in the Church 'member-Churches' which on the one hand have every right

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

to exist from the essence of the Church and yet are not simply a territorial 'province' of the Church, and on the other are of that importance for the whole Church and exercise that representative function for the Church as a whole which we demanded above for the constitutionally correct essence of a territorial diocese. In a word, there are 'personal dioceses', or at least there can be, indeed ought to be in certain circumstances. We do not mean by this that every 'personal diocese' which in fact exists (for example, the military Ordinariate of Colombia with twenty-four military chaplains) is from the fundamental-theological point of view such a 'personal diocese' which ought to exist. Just as juridically there exist miniature territorial dioceses which from the [351] fundamental-theological point of view should not exist, the same can happen in the case of 'personal dioceses'. But it is quite possible for large divisions of the Church to exist as representative of the whole Church without coming into being simply by the territorial division of the earth as the one field of the Church. For while man's relationship to a place is a very important and primordial element of his existential condition, it is not the only one and not necessarily the most fundamental where it is a question of the effect which such existential elements have upon the mode of man's incorporation into the supernatural community of faith, cult and life which is the Church. Localisation is after all in the first place a profane and not specifically Christian and ecclesiastical datum. Its importance for the mode of membership in the Church is therefore to be proved and not assumed as self-evident, especially since no one can any longer say today that the necessary localisation of the altar-community is identical with the territoriality of the diocese (as was almost everywhere the case in practice in the first centuries of the Church). The principle of territoriality is a natural principle for the essence of a diocese, in most cases rightly applied, but not one which is always the only valid one. This is already the case with the parish, and it is fundamentally no different with the diocese.

When in the Church a group which has the characteristic of being representative of the whole Church is in being as a result of the natural presuppositions for such divisions or of some qualities specifically proper to the Church and is unable to live and develop its own being and life within the framework of a territorial diocese, then in principle it has the same function and the same right as a territorial diocese. For the most part it then also has, according to current law, an 'Ordinarius'! So it does not take anything from the territorial diocese; its equally original right is not an exception from something which of itself belongs only to a territorial diocese.

The word 'exemption' is conditioned by history (because such personal dioceses arose in most cases chronologically later than the territorial diocese, the juridical recognition of their own legal status was thought of as an 'exception', as an 'exemption'), but the term is unfortunate and obscures the true state of affairs. That explanation of exemption as it exists in fact in the Church which relies upon the episcopal and direct jurisdiction of the pope over every bishop, every diocese, and every individual Christian, to which particular members of the Church therefore [352] 'directly' subject themselves, is alone insufficient. It is true that this line of reasoning shows why such 'exempt' organs of the Church still have an episcopal head and therefore do not fall outside the framework of the hierarchy even if their immediate Ordinary is not a residential bishop. But, to begin with, the explanation of 'exemption' as an immediate subjection to the Holy See is unfortunate, since on the one hand the pope exercises an 'immediate' jurisdiction over every member of the Church and on the other even in the case of exemption the pope is not the immediate Ordinary. In the second place, this explanation presupposes what must itself be explained, namely that the pope can exercise his always immediate jurisdiction in some cases even by 'cutting out' the territorially structured jurisdiction of an immediate episcopal Ordinary which would otherwise be given, and that this is meaningful.

It is not our intention here to delineate in particular the more personally structured forms

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which, because they have a nature similar to a genuine diocese (unity, size, the capacity to represent the Church by their own spiritual-ecclesiastical make-up, and so on), also have the 'right' to exist (in the wider sense, in that they ought to exist from the point of view of constitutional theology) just as much as a diocese, that is to say, to be subject to their own Ordinary. But there are such member-Churches: they are quite thinkable from the constitutional-theological point of view and do in fact really exist. They do not really become 'detached' from a diocesan unit by 'exemption' in order to begin to exist, but the 'exemption' is only recognising from the point of view of constitutional law what already was the case from the point of view of constitutional theology: a part-Church whose principle of distinction from other parts is not territory. That these formations in the Church, while having an Ordinary, do not in most cases have an episcopal head does not alter the correctness of these reflections. Even apart from such 'exemptions', there are part-Churches which do not yet have a bishop (for example, apostolic prefectures) but tend to such a status. Besides, from the constitutional-theological point of view it would he best if under the necessary conditions such 'exempt' part-Churches did have a bishop as their superior.[17] But of this we have already spoken in a different connection. If such part [353] Churches, which do not strictly follow the territorial principle, rightly exist, then between them and the local dioceses (precisely as between these themselves) there is required a legally regulated co-operation, so that 'exemption' from the local bishop can never be absolute. Independence from and obligations towards the local diocese will naturally vary according to the nature of the subject-matter in question (the interior life, activities proper to an Order which are or are not exclusively those of a local bishop, normal pastoral concern with the members of a local diocese, and so on). The question could unhesitatingly be asked as a consequence whether those non-episcopal Ordinaries who have a seat in the Ecumenical Council or at least should have one pari iure should not also be meaningfully members of a corresponding conference of bishops.

From such considerations it is quite possible to pose the question in an ecumenical context, whether in promoting the unity of Christians we should not reckon more courageously and with less inhibition with the possibility that those forms of Christianity which have arisen in history and are still separated, once they are united with the Catholic Church under the necessary dogmatic and constitutional conditions, would be allowed to conserve to a large extent their previous independence and their own character in constitution, liturgy, theology, and so on, even if territorially they co-exist with Latin Churches. Such a thing may appear to the mere jurist and administrator impractical and difficult. But that is no reason for simply annihilating these part-Churches.

8. The Duties of the Bishop

Given that a bishop is 'aeque principaliter' member of the college of bishops as he is pastor of his own diocese, it follows that he also has duties and responsibilities with regard to the whole Church. It is true that in part he attends to these precisely in so far as he participates as a member of the college in the strict sense in a proper collegial act of the college, and in so far as he leads his own diocese and strives to make it into a living member of the universal Church, which really contributes to the welfare of the whole Mystical Body. But because he is a member of the college, he has beyond this even as an individual a responsibility for the universal Church, a responsibility for the neighbouring dioceses, for the missions of the whole Church, and so on (although as an individual he naturally has no pastoral authority

[17] It must not be forgotten that once life according to the evangelical counsels is ecclesiastically institutionalised in religious orders specially directed by the Church, it is no longer possible to say that this involvement in the hierarchy contradicts the spirit of the free charismatic life which, religious life strives to be.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

outside his own diocese). How such a co-responsibility can be given an institutional expression, for example [354] by bishops' conferences, has already been discussed elsewhere. This responsibility of every bishop for the whole Church was clearly realised and expressed in the institutional life of the ancient Church, and this already at a time when there was as yet no written law for synods and similar institutional expressions of the responsibilities of the individual bishop towards the universal Church.

9. The Idea of the Patriarchate

If a bishop can only be bishop of his diocese in so far as he is at the same time a member of the college, then his unity and co-operation with other bishops is in principle not a matter for his own free judgement but something which flows essentially from the nature of his office. If there necessarily exists a college, then the union of a bishop with other bishops is not merely the union of all individual bishops with the pope. For while this is one constitutive element of the unity of the college, and its foundation, its guarantee and a criterion of its existence, it is not its only constitutive element. For the mere union of many with one does not yet turn the many into a college. A collegial unity of the kind we have in mind was realised in earlier times in the patriarchates:[18] a territory which formed a geographical, historical and ecclesiastical (missionary) unity, notwithstanding the fact that it consisted of several dioceses, became constitutionally one unit, or alternatively the single dioceses which originated as daughter Churches of the original unit were conserved in that unity.

From the point of view of constitutional law it can certainly be said that these patriarchates are only of human and ecclesiastical law. But as we indicated above already, we must distinguish two types of human law in the Church: firstly a human law which – even if motivated by objectively good motives – supervenes more or less as a pure addition on divine law, at best as a purely additional help for the carrying out of divine law, and secondly that human law which is no more than divine law made concrete in history. This latter is at times so much the case that it is difficult to say where exactly the boundary should be drawn between what remains divine in a law and what is its concrete historical realisation. This can be [355] seen in the dioceses themselves: each one is a concrete realisation of the episcopal principle in the Church, they could not all at the same time cease to exist, and yet no individual diocese can lay claim to divine law for its existence and its boundaries and the exact contents of its rights.

The old institution of the patriarchate, apart from the historical rights of the individual existing patriarchates, also belongs without any doubt so much to the second type of human law in the Church that it may even be questioned (if one attends to the reality and not to the nomenclature) whether a patriarchate is any less of divine law than a particular diocese or 'the' diocese, that is that organisation in the Church which in fact is designated by this term. One only has to think of the fact that, without altering the reality, one could in certain circumstances objectively and terminologically just as well say for 'patriarch': 'bishop of a large diocese', and for the bishops subject to him: 'auxiliary bishops with the rights of a vicar-general of the (chief) bishop', in order to see that the distribution of the labels 'divine law' and 'human law' between bishop and patriarch is not quite as self-evident as is usually assumed.

As soon as one has clear ideas about the collegiality of all bishops the unfavourable impression at first created by these relationships between different legal structures with fluid lines of demarcation disappears: after all one can participate in the one authority of the one [18] We are not concerned here with the difference between patriarch and metropolitan, which is determined by historical factors and is fluid in meaning, as long as we look beyond the words to their content. Everything we are saying here could equally well be put under the heading 'Chief Bishop' and 'Chief Diocese'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

college in different ways which can be determined in the concrete by the Church herself. What name is then given to the various bearers of the various ways in which this participation can be formulated is then almost merely a matter of regulating language – which should be done as accurately as possible. Rightly understood, one can say without any scruples that the real, fundamental-theological essence of the patriarchate belongs to the ius divinum[19] in the Church, because the collegiality of the bishops gives rise to the conclusion that they must realise a concrete and particular unity with one another at that time and in that place where a large part-Church embracing several dioceses grows up in the spheres of history, ecclesiastical tradition, sociology, and so on, or where such a unity already precedes the division into dioceses. Whether such a greater Church is called a patriarchate, a metropolitan union, or anything else, is a question of secondary importance. This is especially so because the dividing line [356] between the duties and rights of a 'patriarch' on the one hand and those of the individual local bishops on the other have been fluid and can vary according to time and place. Where energetic and effective national conferences of bishops exist or are in process of formation, a 'patriarchate' is already materially there, provided that there also corresponds to the national (or continental) unity of such a union of bishops a greater Church Which has historically, liturgically (or para-liturgically), theologically etc., its own proper character which enables it to fulfil within the whole Church a function which is proper to it (which does not mean that it must be legally exceptional).

If, however, it becomes clearly evident that patriarchates of this kind (in many respects newly fashioned) are already there or in process of formation in a para-canonical way, then these ought to be consciously promoted in such a way that their concrete form is a genuine realisation of their fundamental-theological essence. This involves above all a balanced relationship between the patriarch (no matter how he is designated: whether metropolitan, patriarch, president of the conference of bishops, cardinal,[20] or anything else) and the college of bishops belonging to this 'patriarchate'. The relationship need not be exactly the same as that which prevailed in the earlier historical patriarchates; much less is it necessarily that which prevails iure divino between pope and bishops. It is precisely because the unity of the episcopate is already guaranteed in the pope that the relationship between the members of a particular grouping of bishops can be more 'democratic'. But this again does not mean that it is desirable from the fundamental-theological [357] point of view for the 'patriarch' to have the patriarchal right simply of a 'primus inter pares'. Since in fact he will not be such, it is much more intelligent to recognise this without scruple and make it a juridical fact and so provide a firm hope that the 'patriarch' will not unduly limit the independence and responsibility of the individual bishops but rather protect it, more so then if he exercises in a purely extra-canonical way a power which he in fact possesses even if juridically it does not exist at all.

---

[19] Although we realise at the same time that this ius divinum must become concrete in determinate historical forms and will therefore rightly become concrete differently in different times and places.

[20] If the constitution of the college of cardinals is such as we have sketched it above, in other words if the college of cardinals genuinely represents the whole episcopate (which does not necessarily mean that it must be made up exclusively of residential bishops), and if in many cases (not necessarily always and exclusively) cardinals and presidents of national bishops' conferences are accordingly one and the same, then 'cardinal' could quite possibly become the new title for that person who is from the point of view of constitutional theology all that is meant by a real patriarch. It would also be a start towards getting rid once and for all of the unfortunate problem of the relationship between patriarchs and cardinals. In such a development one ought not to worry about moving even further from the traditional number of seventy cardinals than John XXIII has already done. Of the forty-four bishops' conferences listed in the Annuario Pontificio many already have or are worthy of having a cardinal as their president. As a consequence, a college of cardinals should not be thought of in too small a way, since it cannot he thought of as composed merely of the presidents of bishops' conferences.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

10. A Consultative Board of Bishops around the Pope

It is well-known that Paul VI declared himself very willing to accede to any request that might be expressed by the Council for him to set up in Rome a consultative board of bishops from the whole world to support him in the government of the universal Church. About this possibility there are three remarks to be made from the standpoint of fundamental theology.

1. A board of this kind is of its nature a consultative board. For it cannot limit the supreme jurisdiction of the pope, since this is not dependent upon the co-operation of such a board. The pope could indeed, if he wanted, work together with this board in the manner of a Council. For – in the abstract – one could quite conceive this board as being the real and authorised representation of the universal episcopate, so that the pope could set up with it a real and permanent Ecumenical Council in miniature without making it necessary for this board to consist of very many members. For there have been Councils enough in which there were present a very small number of bishops and which are yet reckoned to be Ecumenical. Moreover, the ecumenicity of very many of the old councils was a very para-canonical matter, that is to say, it arose not so much from the nature of the gathering itself but from an express or tacit subsequent consent of the universal episcopate and of the pope. But as we have said, in the case of this board the intention appears not to go beyond a consultative body, and there is no need to go beyond it. Its significance can nevertheless be great.

2. It must not be overlooked that even without such a board there can be given, and was and is given, the fundamental-theological necessity of co-operation between the pope and the universal episcopate. The phrase 'ex sese' in the definition of Vatican I[21] does indeed signify that the supreme [358] decision of the pope in matters of faith and ecclesiastical law cannot be subject to any legal control or confirmation on the part of another juridical instance, but it does not exclude but rather implies that in making such a decision the pope is acting as head and member of the Church and thereby (since this Church has necessarily by her very nature an episcopal structure) also as head of the college of bishops, that he is bound to the scriptures and the faith of that Church which has its authentic teaching authority in the universal episcopate, that he must proceed according to the norms of justice and love and must therefore respect the concrete form of the Church, her wishes and the movements of the Spirit within her.[22]

A really living and constant agreement between the pope and the universal episcopate is therefore normal and necessary for the pope in the whole accomplishment of his office: even though the fulfilment of this requirement is not subject to a legal check by the remaining bishops, as was taught by a false Gallicanism and Episcopalism which placed the Council above the pope. Such unity and co-operation has also in fact always been present – according to the possibilities and needs of particular times – in a sufficient (which does not necessarily mean ideal) way, even if to a large extent it was accomplished para-canonically. The bishops are directly or indirectly (through nuncios, and so on) in touch with the pope; the papal theologians are moved or influenced (consciously or unconsciously) by the theology of the whole Church – which in its turn is in contact with bishops: even if it wanted to, Rome could not possibly ward off the influence of the total life of the Church. Indeed it is the case in man's intellectual history as elsewhere that even a 'No' to a movement becomes in its turn subject to the law of that against which it is protesting. The Church and her Spirit have a thousand ways of influencing Rome, and perhaps those which are not legally defined and therefore cannot be deliberately checked are the most effective, even though there may be [21] '. . . ideoque eiusmodi Romani Pontificis definitiones ex sese, non autem ex consensu Ecclesiae, irreformabiles esse': sess. IV, cap. 4; cf. DS 3074.

[22] So much is this true that the old canonists had no hesitation in reckoning with the possibility of the pope, if he does not act in this way and therefore becomes a schismatic (by his breaking away from the total organism of the Church) or even a heretic, ceasing to be a Catholic and therefore pope.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

need of much patience until they have made their mark and become so much accepted in Rome that they are then sent out again as impulses from there.

While it is true, therefore, that the unity of pope and universal episcopate [359] which from the fundamental-theological point of view is necessary does always exist (quoad substantiam), it can yet be greater or less, more quickly or more slowly effective, can in different periods evolve different means and modes of effectiveness, it can become more explicit and canonically more evident. And in this respect the planned board is theologically an important and useful arrangement. It does away even 'optically' with the false impression that the vital flow of the Church is exclusively from head to members, that the supreme, officially organised centre of the Church is always the only place where her Spirit is permitted to launch his new charismatic impulses. It makes it easier to take account of the present day. For today it is practically impossible to guarantee that the head of a large community (or company) with a multiplicity of interests in extremely complicated situations should be 'kept fully informed' in any other way than by a team of leaders, a brains trust, and so on, even though the head himself alone has the last word. To imagine that a well-educated, well-intentioned man of great personal 'experience' can today still be sufficiently informed without any further trouble, and that in any case he has no need of any institutionalised sources of information, is an antiquated paternalism which has nothing to do with the rightful freedom and independence of a supreme head. A consultative board around the pope of the suggested kind drawn from the universal episcopate is a good constitutional concrete expression of the theological unity of pope and universal episcopate in the government of the Church. Then one also sees where the responsibility for such information lies; national bias in the observation of the reality about which information is sought can more easily be avoided; the information can be gathered more quickly and more regularly. Naturally this board must he rightly structured and organised if it is to fulfil its tasks. Its task is after all to be a means of overcoming the fortuitousness and the subjective contingency of the experience of individuals (the pope and the Roman Curia), and this would not happen if a number of bishops were merely to meet together from time to time in Rome for an 'informative exchange of ideas'. All round and comprehensive information demands here as in other spheres of high politics today, organs of assembly, examination and correct assessment of events, movements and the appearance of new ideas.

3. The standpoint from which we have been contemplating this consultative board makes it clear that it need not be only non-Roman members of the universal episcopate who belong to it. If we set out from [360] the fundamental-theological recognition that the universal episcopate does not have to consist merely of diocesan bishops but that it can meaningfully have other members too, and that for example really leading men of the Roman central government under the pope would from the fundamental-theological point of view meaningfully be members of the supreme episcopal governing board of the Church, then this also applies to a kind of 'committee' of the college of bishops. If the rector of a university which is in some way representative of Catholic learning is rightly a bishop, he could in certain circumstances also rightly be a member of this consultative board. And this is all the more true of episcopal members of the Roman Curia. While it is inevitable but meaningful that with the existence of such a board the Roman Congregations must appear more than heretofore mere administrative rather than legislative organs of the pope, at the same time if the insight we have just called attention to is respected, even more clearly will the impression be avoided that the Roman Congregations with their experience of legal deliberation are themselves to be excluded whenever the episcopal consultative board is engaged upon such legal deliberations and the establishing of laws, that is to say exercises a legislative function.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[361]

21

PASTORAL-THEOLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS ON EPISCOPACY IN THE TEACHING OF VATICAN II

There can be no doubt that the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church is the most significant achievement of Vatican II as far as the immediately tangible results of the Council are concerned. Within this Constitution itself the teaching on episcopacy is the most important section. It would not be true to say that everything else in the Dogmatic Constitution is only the framework and ornament of this; it may even happen that only at some later date will the full significance of something else in the document become apparent to the Church and to the world, for example what it says about the possibility of salvation for all men, even those outside the Church. But the very lengthiness and sharpness of conciliar debate over this section on the bishops demonstrate that the Council itself saw in this its greatest achievement.

Conciliar teaching on this matter has a great pastoral-theological importance both in itself and in its consequences which are pointed out by the Dogmatic Constitution itself. In what follows we wish to make some remarks about this. Within the limitations of a brief essay we may be permitted to omit from our consideration those parts of the chapter on the hierarchy which treat either of the pope or of the particular functions of each individual bishop as such (as priest, teacher, and shepherd of his diocese) which are already well known and realised in practice, or directly of the individual priest or deacon.

To begin with, the teaching on the episcopal office in this document may be summarised as briefly as possible. Jesus Christ gave to his Church a hierarchical constitution, that is he established offices with a sacred authority (as service) whose bearers are in the first place the bishops as successors of Christ's apostles under the pope, who is the visible foundation and principle of the unity of the episcopate (no. 18). According to [362] the will of Christ, the apostles, chosen as the leaders of the Church, already formed a college (no. 19). Their successors are 'ex divina institutione' the bishops with and under the pope (no. 20). In their episcopal consecration by the laying-on of hands, which is a true Sacrament, they receive all their offices, even though the teaching and pastoral offices can be exercised only in the unity of the Church (no. 21). The bishops form a true college in the same way as the apostles formed a college as ordained by Christ. This college possesses its authority only in union with the Roman pontiff and under his leadership, in accordance with the supreme authority ascribed to him by Vatican I. But in forming such a college all the bishops are the bearers of full and supreme power in the Church. This power can be exercised by the college of bishops both in a conciliar way (in an Ecumenical Council) and in an extra-conciliar way, provided only that a collegial act takes place in co-operation with the pope. One becomes a member of this college by sacramental consecration as a bishop and union with the head and members of the college (no. 22). Hence the individual bishop as an individual is not only the leader of his own diocese, endowed with sovereign authority, but as a member of the college has also by Christ's institution and command a responsibility (not jurisdiction) and a duty towards the whole Church, for the unity of her faith and life and for her mission. The unity of the college and of its function is displayed and made effective in the practical order by wider ecclesiastical units (patriarchates, etc.) and today also in bishops' conferences (no. 23), although these are determined by historical circumstances.

What then is the significance of this conciliar document on episcopacy from the standpoint of pastoral theology? First of all, although practice, which is the difficulty, has yet fully to implement theory, this doctrine represents a clear rejection of the idea implicit in the practice of recent years and so prevalent under the surface among many of the laity and the clergy, that a bishop is nothing more than a subordinate official of the pope. The bishop rules his flock by his own (not delegated) ordinary power in the name of Christ and not that of the pope (no. 27); this does not detract from his obligation to lead his flock in unity with and under the authority of the supreme power in the Church. To the bishop is fully committed the pastoral office in its normal form (‘habitualis et cotidiana cura’) (no. 27). He cannot therefore consider himself to be the mere recipient and executor of commands received from higher quarters. He has an independent duty and responsibility which he cannot simply [363] shirk. He would therefore not be fulfilling his office fully, if he regarded himself as the mere executive organ of universal ecclesiastical laws or of initiatives emanating from Rome. Whether alone or in union with his neighbours in regional bishops’ conferences he must strive to recognise for himself the scope of his tasks and the right moment for acting: he must make decisions, develop initiatives, discover solutions, which are not the mere application of universal norms provided by ecclesiastical law and pastoral theology. Only in this way can his diocese and the fulfilment of his duty contribute to the good of the ‘whole body’ of the Church (no. 23), for this Church is not a homogeneous mass but an organic structure which possesses a real variety of members and by means of it ‘universalitas’ (nos. 1-3, 22, 23).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The conciliar declaration that the sacramental Ordination of the bishop confers all three offices (of teacher, priest and shepherd) will cause the canonists many a headache. For it is not too easy to reconcile this with the doctrine for so long traditional that there are two fundamental powers (sacramental and pastoral power: potestas ordinis and potestas iurisdictionis), the latter of which is not transmitted by Ordination (considered in this case as absolute) but by a canonical mission. This is not the place to deal with this question; but the fact that the Council finds a sacramental and therefore pneumatic basis for the transmission of every office is of incalculable significance for juridical practice in the Church. Justice and love, law and fraternity, charisma and institution cannot be simply identified even in the future, because for man, a pluralistic being in spite of his pneumatic unity, they are not the same, and it is precisely the distinction which serves the unity. But the very fact that the law is rooted in the Pneuma makes it unmistakably clear that in the Church the law is no worldly law but a law which is holy and sustained by the Spirit, the embodiment of grace, and that it is put into effect and applied in accordance with the will of Christ only when its application is inspired and sustained by this Spirit: the spirit of humility, of the will to serve, of fraternity, of respect for every person and his conscience, of self-criticism, of the will of those in authority to be open to advice and new experience, of the ‘affectus collegialis’ which the bishop too must cultivate towards his priests, of the will to co-operate with them and regard them as his friends (cf. nos. 27, 28). Canon law must be sustained and inspired by the Pneuma of Christ, for only then can it really be called the law of Christ’s Church.

[364] The Council says that the one, whole office which is sacramentally conferred on the bishop (in its threefold direction) is legitimately divided in the Church ‘vario gradu, variis subiectis’ (priests, deacons) (no. 28). Although this does not set out to solve the problem encountered in the history of dogma whether Christ himself expressly willed the three levels of the one sacrament of Orders or whether this is the result of a legitimate decision of the apostolic Church, it does indicate the dogmatic basis for an outlook and attitude which are important from the pastoral point of view. The almost incalculable multiplicity of offices, functions, authorities and institutions which exist in the hierarchical Church and which often have an almost secular air, evidently determined by merely external circumstances, and which are reflected very inaccurately in the three stages of Orders, must all be seen and lived as rooted in pneumatic unity in the sacrament of the episcopal and priestly office. Every office in the Church must be understood spiritually, as the making concrete of the sacramental mystery of Orders, and where this is no longer seriously possible it should be

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

entrusted to lay people who can carry it out just as well or even better.

As the conciliar teaching on episcopacy clearly indicates (no. 23), the institution of patriarchates, ecclesiastical provinces and episcopal conferences is an application (even if formally of human law) of the collegial structure of the Church, an application which is determined by historical circumstance. The subject of bishops' conferences is too wide and important for us to be able to do justice to it here. Besides, we must wait to see what will be the juridical development of this institution after the Council. One can only hope that the collegialis affectus will here be given a 'concreta applicatio' (no. 23), that is to say, that the bishops' conferences achieve that juridical form and acquire that spirit which the pastoral situation of the different countries and continents renders necessary, if we are really to have Churches in those countries and continents which are capable of acting on their own and do not depend exclusively on Rome and its nuncios for representation, leadership and united responsibility. In the long run it will inevitably happen that in particular cases an individual bishop will be legally bound by the decision of a bishops' conference. It will also be the task of such bishops' conferences to administer those interdiocesan organisations and institutions (charitable organisations, film institutes, etc.) which in this day and age are pastorally indispensable. The same applies to the re-drawing of diocesan and [365] provincial boundaries: it is essential that the bishops' conferences fully share in this work.

A further practical conclusion of human law may be drawn from the collegiality of the bishops with one another and with the pope as head of the college: the need for the pope to be supported in the government of the universal Church by representatives of the bishops of the whole Church. This is, of course, not intended to lead to the establishment of a permanent Council, for this co-operation does not involve a collegial act of the whole episcopate. Nor is this support already sufficiently given by the episcopal character of many of the officials of the papal Curia. It should be genuinely a matter of representatives of the bishops of the world. Hence it would also not do for the bishops in question to reside permanently in Rome, otherwise they will only become Roman curial officials or agents for bishops or bishops' conferences without any initiative or responsibility of their own. This does not exclude the possibility that the bishops could be additional members of Roman official bodies without, presumably, permanently residing in Rome. From the nature of the case, they would have to be episcopal representatives of bishops' conferences, chosen by these conferences, meeting at regular intervals in Rome and there constituting an advisory body to the pope, which would thus be superior to the executive of the curial offices since it would be immediately attached to the pope as the bearer of legislative power in the Church. If the episcopal advisory board which the Council desires were erected in this fashion, a quite considerable piece of that curia! reform which Paul VI at the beginning of his pontificate declared himself to favour, and which the Council too wished to see, would thereby already be accomplished.

Although the Constitution on the Church does not contain any express indication regarding the proper size of a diocese, it does provide the objective basis for deciding this difficult question. A diocese is ruled by a member of the supreme governing body of the universal Church and not by some subordinate official of this government. The universal Church is also the corpus Ecclesiarum. This yields as the supreme positive principle for the extensiveness of a diocese, that the essence of the Church must be clearly allowed to appear in it; and as the negative principle for the limitation of a diocese, that the bishop must still be able really to fulfil his office in its regard. If at present or in the future a diocese is not in a condition to represent and make actual in some way the life and fulfilment [366] of the whole Church in all its different dimensions, it is not in the full sense a 'Church' and is not suited for government by a member of the supreme governing board of the Church. The concrete application of this principle naturally depends on many demographic, social, psychological, economic, geographical and historical factors, but none of this detracts from its great

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

pastoral-theological significance. There is no doubt that the resolute application of this principle must lead to the amalgamation of many miniature dioceses. But this is not to deny that the negative principle set out above, which is likewise a consequence of the nature of episcopacy, also demands the division of dioceses which are too large.

When we reflect upon the teaching of the Council on episcopacy we feel constrained to face a problem which is partly dogmatic and partly pastoral-theological. It is not easy to formulate this problem. We could perhaps call it the problem of the relationship and the tension between the theoretical and the real structures of the Church. We must explain what we mean by this. In the Constitution on the Church the bishop appears (leaving aside the pope for the moment) as the pastor of his Church without further qualification: in him is to be found the fullness of all sacred authority, he preaches, he teaches, he sanctifies and he guides the Church's people entrusted to him. The whole official action of the Church in the transmission of truth and grace is concentrated in him. And at this point the objection might be raised that this description is surely very unrealistic: in reality the bishop is surely a kind of higher administrative official, watching over and co-ordinating the real and essential work of the Church, while this latter, the real care of souls, the Kerygma, the word of grace in the sacraments, the witness to Christ before the 'World', is in reality (in so far as it has an official character) carried out by the priests in the parish. One could object that the description of the episcopal office in this Constitution has an a priori and unrealistic character and does not describe basically and adequately what the Church really is in actual fact. (We might briefly note here that we are in this matter touching upon a problem which is also ecumenical and theologically controversial: the Lutheran theology of the Church views the official activity of the Church as primarily to be found in the actual preaching of the gospel in the concrete community by the pastor and therefore can only recognise the 'bishop' as the necessary 'superintendent' of this life of the concrete community.) It is of course possible to answer these objections by saying that the Council's teaching recognises and recounts at length the importance [367] of the individual parochial priest as a helper of the bishop, as a real priest and leader of the concrete community (especially the altar-community). One could add that the Council underlines the essence of the concrete community (the altar-community, the local community, the parish) as a true 'Church', in which the Church is realised and made present to the world, in a way in which it has never appeared before in any doctrinal document; a doctrine whose pastoral-theological consequences can hardly even be foreseen as yet, because in reality the foundation has here been laid for a theology of the parish and not merely for its juridical position. But theologically and pastorally all this does not really meet the difficulty or solve the problem which we have in mind. For this one would have to develop further the theology of the local altar-community as the manifestation and actualisation of the Church as such at a particular point in space and time, and make it vital and fruitful in the life of the individual community. One might say that as long as the local community does not recognise itself with an existential faith in thought and deed to be the Church to which can truly be applied everything that the Council proclaims of the glory and mystery belonging to the Church, as long as the individual community feels itself to be no more than the smallest administrative unit by means of which the universal Church (alone) effects the salvation of the individual, it has not yet truly understood itself. Here there are tasks before us which are pastorally of the greatest importance for the life of the individual communities and for the full and correct structuring of this life, without which the episcopal Church too is not what it ought to be.

In order to overcome this difficulty, that is in order to understand thoroughly and theologically the relationship of tension between the episcopal Church and the local Church, it is necessary to reflect further upon this relationship. In the ancient Church there was no problem: every real local Church was an episcopal Church. In medieval and modern times in the West the problem could not be properly formulated either: the local community did not feel itself to be the Church, and there was therefore no problem in regarding its institutions as institutions of human law which can be set up at will as appears necessary. But if the local community is the Church, its concrete form while being changeable and determined by historical circumstance is the concrete form of the essence of the Church, in which must be manifested 'iure divino' what the Church is, so that the Christian can truly experience here what is [368] really meant by 'the Church': the sacramental presence of the divinising and forgiving grace of God in the unity of men in love. If the empirically real structure of the Church in the local community is really present and capable of being experienced, the episcopal nature of the Church's essential structure which lies as it were at a deeper level in the organism of the Church will become accessible to the religious experience of the Christian and will no longer give the impression of being an abstract theory which has little contact with the concrete life of the Church.[1]

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[1] For a deeper theological discussion of the above reflections, apart from the other contributions to the topic in this volume, cf. K. Rahner and J. Ratzinger, The Episcopate and the Primacy, Quaestiones Disputatae 4 (Freiburg/Edinburgh-London 1962); K. Rahner, 'Zur Theologie der Pfarrei' in H. Rahner, Die Pfarre (Freiburg i. B. 1956), pp. 27-36; K. Rahner, 'Reflection on the Concept of "Ius Divinum" in Catholic Thought' in Theological Investigations V (London & Baltimore 1966), pp. 219-243; cf. also 'Dogmatische Fragen des Konzils' in Oberrheinisches Pastoralblatt LXIV (1963), pp. 234-250.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[369]

22

ON BISHOPS' CONFERENCES

The question of the nature and significance of bishops' conferences, of the position which they ought to occupy and which has still to be assigned to them in the common law of the Church, is one which has been newly posed by the Council.[1] At the very beginning of the Council it was already evident that conferences of bishops possess in practice a greater significance than has been accorded them in law. We saw it in the first general assembly of the Italian hierarchy known to history (in Rome on the 15 October 1962). We saw it in the formation of a pan-african bishops' conference which joined together nine separate conferences of bishops already in existence or in process of formation: this became one of the most dynamic and the best organised of all the bishops' conferences which came into being during the first session of the Council. The selection of Council Fathers to serve on the different conciliar commissions was made largely on the basis of the suggestions put forward by the various national bishops' conferences. Already in the first session of the Council there was a growing tendency for single bishops in the Council to speak on occasion no longer in their own name only, but to be permitted and encouraged to appear as the spokesmen of particular groups of bishops, which meant in practice of bishops' conferences. It may be assumed that this development will be carried further during the second session on the practical grounds of better organising the agenda, that is to say in order to speed up the debate and make it more searching. But what is most important of all is that in the very schemata of the Council's decrees there appears to be a marked desire to accord to large episcopal conferences (national and perhaps even supra-national) a much more secure canonical status and to entrust to them duties and responsibilities which up to now have never been possessed by any [370] individual bishop, or even by any provincial or plenary (national) Council, but only by the Holy See. In this way there would be created again a real intermediate legal instance between the Apostolic See and the individual bishop, something like the older patriarchal and metropolitan unions which today exist only in name, but in a new form. It is of course quite likely that the actual regulation in common law of the nature, duties and competence of bishops' conferences will only come about in an exact form with the new codification of canon law which can only happen after the Council, although it is quite possible that the Council itself will lay down fundamental norms for such episcopal conferences. But it will be absolutely necessary for this codification to be vigorously pursued, as the preparations already made to this end do indeed promise.[2] It might be objected that before the end of the Council a purely personal consideration of bishops' conferences is somewhat premature. But even in the Council and in the official consultations after the Council for the reform of canon law this question will need a great deal of intellectual co-operation from individual theologians, canonists and experts in the pastoral and administrative practice of the Church, and it is so important for an understanding of the nature of the Church in general that perhaps it is permissible and helpful to set down a few thoughts on the matter even now. In a short essay like this the question can of course be treated only in a fragmentary way. It is moreover noteworthy how sparse is the literature on

[1] Cf. Piet Fransen, 'Die Bischofskonferenz – Kornproblem des Konzils', Orientierung XXVII (1963), pp. 119-123, esp. p. 122 sq.
[2] Cf. AAS LV (1963), p. 363. The members of the Commission for the Revision of the Code include, for example, the two German cardinals Bea and Döpfner.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

it.[3]

[371]

PAST AND PRESENT FORMS

There can be no question here of recounting the pre-history and the history of bishops' conferences. Their pre-history would consist of the story of the origin, constitution, government and effectiveness of those major units of the Church which join together several territorial dioceses and which, as regards the Church's government, stand between the individual diocese with its bishop and the universal government of the whole Church by the pope. This pre-history would therefore be practically identical with the history of metropolitan unions and patriarchates, with the significance and effectiveness of metropolitans, patriarchs, primates, and with the effectiveness of provincial synods, plenary and national Councils. All these canonical entities still exist in some form in the current law of the Church, in so far as there still exist metropolitan unions with a certain, though extraordinarily limited, range of duties, and provision is made for plenary and provincial Councils in canon law, the latter being supposed to meet in principle at least every twenty years.[4] Also they still have some practical effect in so far as right up to the present provincial, plenary and national synods are in fact held in many parts of the world. And they are the antecedents of present and future bishops' conferences in so far as they have united several dioceses in common juridical and pastoral action and this not merely for that part of the Church which was so united, but directly or indirectly have been of importance beyond this for the universal Church. With a view to the question we are discussing we wish to make only two remarks about all these different stages of the antecedents of bishops' conferences: in the first place, it is noteworthy that these juridical structures already existed and were put into effect in synods before the universal primacy of jurisdiction of the Bishop of Rome became practically evident to any notable [372] extent, in fact even before the first Ecumenical Council at Nicaea. This fact certainly should serve to call our attention to the necessity and importance of such major assemblies of the Church existing between the individual dioceses and the supreme government of the Church, the pope and the Ecumenical Council. In the second place, ever since the Middle Ages the importance of these entities within the Church

---

[3] One could, for example, compare the commentaries on c. 292 of CIC: cf. e.g. E. Eichmann and Klaus Mörsdorf, Lehrbuck des Kirchenrechts ([9]1959), I, 393; M. Conte, A. Coronata, Institutiones Iuris Canonici I (Turin 1928), 427 sqq.; H. Jone, Commentarium in Codicem Juris Canonici I (Paderborn 1950), 257; A. Toso, Ad codicem iuris canonici commentaria minora, Lib. II De personis, Tom. I (Rome 1922), III sqq.; E. Regatillo, Institutiones Iuris Canonici I[5] (Santander 1956), 322 sq. (A typical comment may be read here: 'Aliae conferentiae . . . In Germania omnes episcopi Borussiae quotannis ad sepulcrum S. Bonifatii, Fuldae. Hae vi iuridica carent.' This therefore seemed to the noted canonist the most important thing about such bishops' conferences.) For the history of episcopal conferences cf. H. E. Feine, Kirchliche Rechtsgeschichte I[3] (Weimar 1955), 577, 591, 614; W. M. Plöchl, Geschichte des Kirchenrechts III.I (Vienna 1959), 212-216. Further reading: LTK II[1] (Freiburg 1931), 377 sq.[2]; II (Freiburg 1958), 506 sq.; RGG III[2], 1804; DDC I (Paris 1935), 1175 sq.; N. Hilling, AKKR XCIII (1913), 265-268 (Leo XIII and the bishops' conferences); H. Storz, Staat und Kirche in Deutschland im Lichte den Würzburger Bischofsdenkschrift von 1848 (Bonn 1934); J. Rommerskirchen, 393-407; C. Wolfsgruber, 'Die Konferenzen der Bischöfe Österreichs', TAPQ LVIII (1905), 243-266; Ph. Maroto, 'Circa le Conferenze Episcopali in Itahia', Apollinaris V (1932), 277-280; Fr. Houtart, 'Les formes modernes de la Collégialité Episcopale' in J. Congar and P. D. Dupuy, L'Episcopat et l'Église universelle (Paris 1962), 497-535; J. Faupin, La Mission de France (Tournai 1960), 16-18 (French bishops' conferences only since 1939); Regional bishops' conferences in Africa: Stimmen der Zeit CLXXII (1962/3), 342 sq.; A. Simon, Réunions des évêques de Belgique 1830-1867: Procés-verbaux, Centre interuniversitaire d'histoire contemporaine, Cahier 10 (Louvain-Paris 1960); V.-L. Chaigneau, L'organisation de l'Église catholique en France (Paris 1956); Information catholiques internationales, 15 April 1957, no. 46, 15-22.

[4] CIC c. 271-291.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

has been constantly reduced in the West by a long and complicated process, and this process is practically identical with the historical development of the papal primacy of immediate jurisdiction over the whole Church and over every single diocese, which for the Western Church reached its highest point ever in Vatican I, the legal structure of the code of canon law based upon it and the administrative practice of the Holy See in accordance with it. The fact of this process of decline in the importance of the major ecclesiastical units in the West standing between individual dioceses and the Roman See, at least under a juridical aspect, undoubtedly poses the question whether this process is really terminated or whether tendencies and energies are not making themselves felt in dogma and the concrete situation of the Church's life which, while not simply leading back to the ancient forms of these major units, do impel us forward to new structures similar to the old, which will fulfil in the present and in the future the former duties of these major units in a new form, for example in the form of bishops' conferences.

The real history of bishops' conferences began one hundred and thirty years ago.[5] Already in 1830 the Belgian bishops gathered together at least once a year in the archiepiscopal palace at Mechelen. After a small episcopal conference in Cologne, 10-13 May 1848, the German and Austrian bishops at the invitation of Archbishop Geissel of Cologne met in Würzburg in 1848 in thirty-six sessions from 23 October to 16 November [373] for voluntary synodal discussions and occupied themselves especially with the relationship between Church and State. (They strove during the course of this for a strengthening of the metropolitan unions and expressed a desire for a national synod, without however pursuing Dollinger's plan for a German National Church with a primate[6] at its head.) There followed in 1850 a first bishops' conference of the Bavarian episcopate in Freising. Since 1869 the bishops' conference of Fulda is a gathering which takes place regularly once a year, but in addition to this there are conferences of Bavarian, West German, and latterly also of East German bishops. In the course of the past century the practice of episcopal conferences as assemblies of bishops from a more or less extensive territory has gradually spread throughout the whole Church. This was a development already encouraged by Leo XIII,[7] who, for example, gave to the bishops' conferences of Austria-Hungary and of South America something in the nature of statutes.[8] This development also had a certain outcome in canon 292, § 1 of CIC,[9] in so far as this prescribes that the bishops of an ecclesiastical province (therefore of a metropolitan union) should meet together at least every five years for pastoral-theological consultation.[10] Yet these prescriptions do not do justice to the proper nature of a bishops' conference as demanded by the real situation, since a metropolitan union usually covers too small a territory and includes too few bishops to act as a basis for giving the bishops' conferences their real

[5] Examples from the second half of the nineteenth century are still accessible in Collectio Lacensis III, 7. 853, 1203, 1057; V, 931 (s'Hertogenbosch 1868), 941-946 (Cologne 1848), 946-958 (Geissel's plan for a German bishops' conference), 959-1143 (the bishops' conference at Würzburg), 1144-1161 (Cologne 1849), 1161 (Cologne 1850), 1162-1189 (Freising 1850), 1189-1200 (Bamberg 1864), 1201-1204 (Passau 1864), 1203-1216 (Freiburg 1851), 1215-1220 (Fulda 1869: the first Pastoral Letter of the Fulda bishops' conference), 1317-1324 (Salzburg 1848), 1313-1332 (Görz 1848), 1331-1394 (Vienna 1849: first Pastoral Letter of the whole Austrian hierarchy), 1393-1398 (Vienna 1868), 1397-1408 (Prague 1868); VI, 699-726 (Milan 1849), 727-738 (Milan 1850), 739-772 (Spoleto 1849), 773-810 (Loreto 1850), etc. (In the same volume there are the acts of the bishops' conferences at Pisa, in Sicily, at Siena, at Milan in 1850).

[6] Cf. H. Becher, Der deutsche Primas (Kolmar 1940), 224-281.

[7] Cf. N. Hilling in AKKR XCIII (1913), 265-268. Pius X in his time praised such annual 'congressus', yet he urged the holding of provincial synods (Coll. Lac. V, 1200). Cf. also Acta Pii IX, pars I, vol. III, 674.

[8] Cf. AKKR LXXX (1900), 381-383 (Austria), 766 sq. (South America).

[9] It is interesting to note that Gasparri cites no sources for this canon. Cf. also for the Eastern Church, I Opera c. 351 (AAS XLIX [1957], 538).

[10] In the questionnaire for the use of metropolitans and bishops making their reports to Rome there is also a question on the holding of bishops' conferences: AAS II (1910), 20; X (1918), 488.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

importance. Therefore in practice the real bishops' conferences cover a much greater territory. It is noteworthy that there are such episcopal conferences also in missionary lands.[11] Almost everywhere today, in fact, they are already replacing the plenary and provincial synods.[12] Yet the bishops' conferences are not, at [374] least up to the present, merely a modern and useful form of plenary and provincial synod; they differ from them juridically especially in two ways: firstly, plenary and provincial synods are the bearers of their own superior authority and are therefore capable of passing laws within the framework of the Church's common law which bind the individual bishop and the individual diocese who fall within the competence of the synod even when the bishop in question has voted against these laws in the course of it. By contrast, in the conference of bishops existing up to the present only those agreements can be reached from a legal point of view which bind the individual bishop and his diocese by his own consent, which therefore become law and then only diocesan law by this consent alone. Secondly, plenary Councils (synods of bishops uniting several metropolitan unions) can only be held with the previous consent of the pope and under the presidency of his legate; the decisions of a plenary or provincial council can only be promulgated and enter into force after being previously confirmed by the Roman See (through the Congregation of the Council). On the other hand, free discussions by individual bishops with one another at bishops' conferences are effective without any participation by the Roman See, as long as they remain within the limits of that jurisdiction within which every bishop can arrive at decisions without any special express permission from Rome in virtue of his 'potestas ordinaria' which makes him more than a mere official of Rome. (This is not to forget the fact that the central government of the Church in accordance with canon 250, § 4 of CIC has in certain cases reserved to itself the ratification of the decisions of bishops' conferences.[13]) In addition, the episcopal conferences are not bound by the prescriptions of CIC c. 281-291 concerning the methods of convocation and procedure of plenary and provincial synods, and are in this way much more easily able to accommodate themselves to the circumstances of the place, the needs of the time, and the nature of the matter under discussion, and so are also technically easier to organise. Yet it is true that up to the present they have no real canonical existence; the holding of them is at present subject to no regulation in common law,[14] their competence is not clearly [375] defined and up to now it cannot in any case exceed that of the individual bishops. Above all, we are faced with the question whether their character as a voluntary agreement of individual bishops is sufficient for the needs of today.

DOGMATIC CONSIDERATIONS

[11] Cf. J. Rommerskirchen (note 3 above). The astonishing effectiveness of the African bishops' conference at the Second Vatican Council is a matter of common knowledge.
[12] A list of bishops' conferences today: Annuario Pontificio 1963, 796-801.
[13] Cf. e.g. AAS XXIV (1932), p. 242.
[14] With regard to more recent declarations of the Holy See on the question of bishops' conferences, cf. also AAS III (1911), p. 264 (Bavarian bishops' conferences); AAS XI (1919), pp. 72-74, 175-177 (the division of Italy into eighteen 'regioni' for bishops' conferences); AAS XI (1919), pp. 171-174 (American bishops' conferences); AAS XV (1923), p. 108 (Australian bishops' conferences); XV (1923), p. 339 sq. (Portuguese bishops' conferences); XXIV (1932), p. 242 sq. (the annual meeting of bishops' conferences, submission of their resolutions to the Congregation of the Council); XLV (1953), p. 247 (bishops' conference for the Philippines); XLVII (1955), p. 461 (approbation of the statutes of the Canadian bishops' conference); XLVII (1955), pp. 539-544 (letter to Cardinal Piazza, president of the Latin American bishops' conference); L (1958), p. 224 sq. (approval of the 'Estatutos de la Conferencia Episcopal de Colombia'; unfortunately these statutes are not given here); L (1958), pp. 997-1005 (the pope's allocution to the Latin American bishops' conference in Rome).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Before we attempt to set about making some observations about the problem of bishops' conferences as it arises from the Church's situation today, we must first set out some dogmatic considerations intended to clarify the position of bishops' conferences in the Church from the point of view of a dogmatic ecclesiology.

Just as according to the gospel Peter and the remaining apostles by the institution of Christ formed an apostolic college as a real, single entity of sacred right, so also the Roman pope as the successor of Peter and the bishops as the successors of the apostles are closely bound together. The college of bishops, which succeeds the apostolic college in its doctrinal and pastoral power and in which the apostolic college possesses its historical continuation, forms with the Bishop of Rome as its head the one, undivided subject of full and supreme official power in and for the universal Church; as a college made up of many members it represents the legitimate diversity of the members of God's people, and as a united college under one head the unity of the same people of God. This united college of bishops as the bearer of full and supreme power in the Church can exercise the supreme power of the doctrinal and pastoral office not only in a solemn and extraordinary way in an Ecumenical Council, but it is also capable of a collegial act of this kind outside a Council, so that one can see such a collegial act of the college of bishops under and with the Bishop of Rome, for example, in the 'ordinary magisterium' wherever it [376] possesses an infallible authority.[15] With regard to his power as teacher and pastor the individual bishop is bishop of his particular diocese, but over and beyond this he has a certain function in the universal Church in so far as he is a member of the one episcopal college and in it shares responsibility for the act of the college as a whole. It is of the very essence of the episcopate that the individual bishop belongs to this college. This fact gives rise to further duties, rights and obligations on the part of the individual bishop even as an individual in regard to the universal Church. He has a relationship to it, and while he has it as a member of the college, for that very reason he has it as an individual. It is true that he has no real jurisdictional power except in relationship to his own diocese. But this does not mean that he has no duties, rights and obligations towards the universal Church. In the first place he represents the whole Church in its unity before his own diocese, his own Church, in which the whole Church is made present in the dimensions of space and time. As a member of the episcopal college which is the supreme governing body of the universal Church he also has an official duty towards the whole Church. All bishops must defend and promote the unity of faith and discipline of the universal Church and must educate the faithful to a love of the whole mystical Body of Christ, above all of those members who are poor, suffering and enduring persecution for the sake of justice. They must promote each and every kind of saving activity which is proper to the whole Church, particularly the propagation of the faith among the heathen. Moreover it is clear that the effective pastoral care which they bestow upon their own flock is of benefit to the whole mystical Body of Christ, which, as St Basil says, is the corporate unity of many Churches.[16] Pope Celestine[17] already emphasised in the presence of the Fathers of the Council of Ephesus that the anxious duty of proclaiming the gospel to the whole world lies equally upon the whole college of episcopal pastors as upon the pope.

This fundamental relationship which every individual bishop as such has to the whole Church and to all its members (though precisely because he is a member of the college of bishops) allows us to recognise the proper [377] dogmatic ecclesiological foundations for the bishops' conference. Such conferences of bishops do not rest merely upon the practical necessity of co-operation between individual bishops, particularly if their dioceses are [15] Cf. K. Rahner and J. Ratzinger, The Episcopate and the Primacy (Freiburg/Edinburgh-London 1963), p. 92 sqq.

[16] St Basil, In Is. 15, 296 (PG XXX, 637); cf. St Gregory the Great, Mor. 4, 7, 12 (PL LXXV, 643).
[17] E. Schwartz, Act. Conc. Oec. I, 2 (Berlin 1925/6), 23.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

adjacent. While a bishop as an individual is incapable of exercising any jurisdictional power over another diocese, it is on the other hand not the case that in such a conference he is no more than a counsellor quite freely and arbitrarily selected as such merely because bishops are 'professional colleagues'. Antecedent to their meeting together in a bishops' conference and independently of any mutual request for advice and help, every bishop bears a responsibility for the whole Church and therefore for all those members of the Church which we call dioceses. And since this universal responsibility of the individual bishop as an individual cannot be allowed to remain a merely abstract and formal requirement but must be embodied in a concrete and visible way, just as the general love for mankind becomes in God's grace love for our 'neighbour', so the responsibility of the individual bishop for the universal Church is naturally expressed in the concrete by a shared concern for the kingdom of God and the salvation of souls in the 'neighbour' dioceses and in the whole of the actual natural and supernatural surroundings in which the bishop and his own diocese are situated but which, at the same time extend beyond it.

In this case, then, the notion of the bishops' conference springs from the very nature of the Church. Certainly it is of 'human law' and certainly did not always exist in the Church in the sense in which it is intended and practised today; it is still seeking its concrete legal form; tills depends on many circumstances determined by the times. Yet the bishops' conference is a possible and today perhaps even an absolutely necessary expression of an essential element of the Church. It is based on the one hand on the fact (which up to this point in our reflections we have perhaps not emphasised sufficiently) that the plurality of independent members of the Church (called dioceses) belongs to the immutable essential structure of the Church and that therefore the dioceses do not merely represent subdivisions, demanded by practical considerations, of a united ecclesiastical monarchy which is fully homogeneous or should be as homogeneous as possible. But once this is clear and once we take into consideration the fact that an individual diocese too is in its extent, manner of administration, etc., largely dependent upon natural and historical conditions, then it also becomes clear that larger parts of the Church which are composed of [378] several dioceses but have much in common in their natural conditions and in their historical origin within the Church form genuine major structures of the Church as such and can therefore supply a real theologically significant basis for patriarchates, metropolitan unions, bishops' conferences, and so on. For this reason 'intermediate instances' of this kind between the individual dioceses and the power of the primacy are not entities to be established or abolished simply at whim for mere convenience of administration. Rather they are seeking in a positive, canonical statute of human law a concrete form of their essence which is antecedent to this its legal expression. On the other hand, that essential element of the Church on which the idea of a bishops' conference is based includes the right and duty on the part of the individual bishops to shoulder their share of the burden of care for the universal Church and so for the members of the Church next to them, from which our reflections on the dogmatic foundation of bishops' conferences set out.

Only one further remark needs to be made regarding this dogmatic foundation for the bishops' conference, even though the groundwork of this remark cannot here be more precisely laid. It is true that the organisation of the Church into dioceses, the 'monarchic' government of such a diocese and therefore the difference between bishop and simple priest are iuris divini. Yet theologically and from the viewpoint of the history of the Church's structures it is surely quite legitimate to hold that this necessary subdivision of the Church into individual 'Churches' (not merely into provinces of the one Church) as demanded by the ius divinum is not necessarily and inevitably made concrete in the plurality of those Churches which today we call dioceses. If we proceed from the principle, which dogmatically is surely above suspicion, that the Church by using her own judgement can divide the sovereign and sacramental fullness of power given her by Christ, that she has also in different times and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation places divided it differently, then the conclusion surely becomes more difficult to avoid that we must not absolutely restrict our search for the plurality and collegiality (iuris divini) of the Church's power of government and its bearers rigidly to what today we call bishop and bishopric in simple opposition to patriarchates, metropolitan unions, and so on. Fundamentally, it is too simple and schematically biased a distinction, which does not fully respect the possibilities we have indicated for the concrete Church in determining her constitution, if one regards the dioceses as [379] divisions of the Church which are iuris divini and other major divisions between the dioceses and the universal Church as merely of human law. In these greater divisions of the Church falling between the diocese and the universal Church, too, an essential structure of the Church iuris divini can be put into effect and made concrete, even though in a historically determined form.[18]

BISHOPS' CONFERENCES

In the following section of our reflections we wish to make a few remarks about the legal status, competence and structure of the bishops' conference, not as it already exists today but as it ought to exist. In a question of this kind we are naturally concerned with many matters of mere opinion on which it is possible to hold different views and which can be solved in the practical order only by the free legislation of ecclesiastical authority itself.

The Bishops' conferences which have existed and been seen in practice up to the present do not of themselves signify a college which is more than the sum of the bishops taking part in it. In contrast with plenary or provincial councils, episcopal conferences up to the present have no authority of their own, they are not a legislative organ of a part of the Church. Leaving aside at this stage the question which we will have to deal with later, when and to what extent a bishops' conference should be able to acquire the right to legislate for its part of the Church in a way binding the individual bishop, in principle one can hold that the bishops' [380] conferences of the future should he collegial bearers of superior authority and legislative power for their part of the Church, that they should therefore acquire a status corresponding to that of the present plenary or provincial councils. The importance of bishops' conferences has grown greatly, as the history of the last hundred years and also the Second Vatican Council have demonstrated. The bishops' conferences fulfil today, and will no doubt increasingly fulfil in the future, functions which on the one hand cannot be carried out by the individual bishop and the individual dioceses, but which on the other hand should not be transferred to the supreme government of the universal Church, in accordance with the principle of subsidiarity which equally applies to the Church.[19] But if such an intermediate instance between the pope and the bishops is necessary, then it must be granted a legal status. This status is not granted by CIC c. 292, since the bishops' conference there envisaged is only the conference which corresponds to the provincial council and therefore comprises only the [18] The resolute will of the Uniate Churches of the Near East to preserve and extend their patriarchal institution cannot therefore be decried as an obstinate clinging to outmoded structures of the Church. The same essential reasons which determine the territorial division of the Church into dioceses are effective to produce larger territorial divisions. We must also keep in mind that the ultimate theological nature of a diocese cannot be determined from the nature of the bishop. For the question is precisely why this determinate piece of territory must be given a leader who possesses the fullness of the power of Orders and an ordinary power of jurisdiction while other (larger or smaller) territories must not. But once it is clear that the nature of a diocese must be viewed as based upon the unity of a particular area of natural and supernatural life, then it becomes quite understandable that even greater natural and historical areas (which in our case correspond to particular conferences of bishops) are not simply arbitrary divisions introduced by the central administration which can abstain from introducing them if it thinks that it can manage without such 'divisions'.

[19] Cf. e.g. Pius XII, AAS XLIX (1957), p. 927.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

bishops of a single metropolitan union, and this, at least as a general principle, is today too small to support a bishops' conference of a kind which as a genuine intermediate instance between Rome and the individual dioceses could fulfil those functions which today and in the near future will increasingly devolve up. Moreover the bishops' conference of c. 292 does not have its own superior authority. But as such it is not really a genuine intermediate instance, for its prescriptions derive their real effective force either from the pope alone or from the individual bishop as such, and this does not suffice to constitute a true intermediate instance. For this reason it would also not contribute to giving a bishops' conference the nature and powers of a true intermediate instance with its own initiative and responsibility, if its decrees were to receive their binding force only through the approbation of Rome, so that, from the viewpoint of the bishops' conference, such decrees would really be nothing else than proposals made to the central administration in Rome. Since it is self-evident that bishops whether individually or in common can make such proposals, it does not require the organisation of bishops' conferences to enable them to do it. A real intermediate instance is given only where it is recognised as possessing its own sovereign power and so the right of making its own independent decisions. Just as such a power residing in the individual bishop does not detract from the meaning of the papal primacy of power and its organs, so [381] it cannot be said that a bishops' conference does, if it is capable of enforcing decisions without their needing specific papal approbation. This is not to deny in any way that ordinary and immediate papal jurisdiction extends to the bishops' conferences just as it does to the individual bishop. Moreover the duty of reporting regularly to Rome which is laid upon the bishops will naturally apply also to the bishops' conferences. Hence it is highly desirable that the new code of canon law soon to be drawn up should make the setting up of such bishops' conferences which are in principle also the bearers of their own sovereign authority juridically possible, by analogy with the patriarchates and metropolitan unions of the Eastern Church.

As regards the extent of the bishops' conference, that is regarding the question as to which bishops should be collegially joined together in one and the same bishops' conference, it must be said that today and in the near future the first and most important bishops' conference will be that which unites all the bishops of one and the same State. Bishops' conferences based upon an ecclesiastical province are now out of date. If we leave aside the question, which is after all secondary, as to what is the situation of a bishops' conference or of bishops' conferences in a State which is itself a federal State, where the principle of parallelism between bishops' conference and State must be sub-distinguished according to whether the single federated States within such a State are still genuine, independent entities or mere administrative circumscriptions of a single State with the honorific title of 'Federal State' or 'Land', we must say that today the most pressingly important form of bishops' conference is the college of bishops of one and the same State, that is the national bishops' conference. The individual State is today a force which influences and penetrates every sphere of human life. So much does it impress itself upon all spheres of life in accordance with its own particular historical and political character that the Church must necessarily have a representation parallel to it, and precisely a representation of the Church of this particular country (and not merely of the Holy See and the universal Church as such, which may be represented in this State by a nuncio, who cannot, however, in the nature of the case be regarded simply as the representative of the Church of this country itself). Leaving out of consideration the tendency to create supranational entities like UNO, NATO, EEC etc., and the tendency to transfer certain of the sovereign rights of individual States to these supranational instances, the States of today are more than ever [382] before the managers and representatives of the life of the human community and even to a large extent of the individual. Social, cultural and political circumstances in the different parts of a modern State which roughly correspond to individual dioceses have become very much alike. The conditions underlying the most important political and pastoral decisions of the Church in the different dioceses of one and the same country are therefore to a large extent the same throughout that country. When the different dioceses come to make these important decisions they all find in practice that their negotiating partner is one and the same State. Hence it is self-evident that the national conference must be the basic type of bishops' conference today and in the near future. If within a single nation (either because it is a modern State of giant proportions, like Brazil for example, or because for historical reasons there is a vast number of dioceses within the territory of one single nation) a bishops' conference of this kind would convoke such an immense number of bishops that the capacity for quick and clear action could be greatly impaired, such a circumstance is no evidence against the-principle that the fundamental type of bishops' conference today is the national one. In cases of this kind the capacity for quick and efficient action on the part of a national bishops' conference could be guaranteed by other means, whether by courageously reducing the excessive number of diminutive dioceses, as for example in Italy, or by establishing a practical procedure which safeguards the capacity for effective action on the part of the national bishops' conference (perhaps by providing that only the metropolitans of a country need appear at its ordinary assembly).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Nor does it speak against the fundamental principle that national episcopal conferences are the norm, if in certain missionary territories and States of smaller dimensions which are still in the process of being built up and are still seeking their national identity it is possibly the case, or even in actual fact the case, that an inter-State bishops' conference, which unites together the bishops of several such States, can be more urgently needed and will then be a better expression in this part of the world of the theological meaning of such conferences than a national conference would he. The principle we have laid down does after all proceed upon the assumption of a culturally, socially and above all historically developed State of a certain size with a genuine social and political character of its own which allows it to be an independent partner in the community of peoples.

[383] This fundamental principle regarding the extensiveness of a national bishops' conference does not in any way exclude but rather implies, at least in this day and age, that beyond the national bishops' conferences, there may also be supranational bishops' conferences, and indeed that in certain circumstances there must he such. It was, for example, no mere chance that during the first session of the Second Vatican Council such supranational groupings of bishops came into being almost of themselves. It was not a question here of a pressure-group tactic, characteristic of power-politics, aiming to achieve momentarily urgent goals, but rather of the grouping which naturally takes place of itself even outside the Council whenever Middle and West European, African, or South American bishops find themselves together even if rather informally. Today supranational political, cultural, and social spheres of interest are being formed which even from the point of view of ecclesiastical politics and pastoral practice manifest a certain unity, so it can be quite meaningful, sometimes quite necessary, to organise a supranational bishops' conference geared to dealing with them, since these greater spheres of interest are in their turn such that neither the individual bishop nor the central government of the Church is immediately competent in their regard. One only has to think, for example, of the adaptation of the liturgy to the spirit and culture of the African continent, or of the pastoral problems that will ensue if the old Europe increasingly grows together economically, socially and culturally into a unity transcending individual States. It will easily be seen that the same reasons which demand national bishops' conferences can also beyond this demand supranational bishops' conferences. And we have not yet touched the question whether a canonical determination of the influence of the larger sections of the one Church upon the central administration of the Church in Rome could not itself demand

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

such supranational major organisations and therefore supranational bishops' conferences. If, for example, we wish to conceive a consultative representation of the universal Church at the Holy See and its particular 'ministries' in such a way that there would be proportional representation and yet the number of representatives could not on practical grounds be too great, we necessarily come to the conception of major ecclesiastical spheres of common interest (e.g. Middle and West Europe, Latin America, North America, Latin Europe, Near East, etc.) which, if only to determine who are to he the aforesaid representatives in Rome, would have to organise corresponding supranational bishops' conferences. Perhaps one [384] could call them, even if with a certain terminological inexactitude, continental bishops' conferences.[20]

A further question regarding the bishops' conference of the future concerns the matter and extent of its duties and competence. Leo XIII already in his time drew up a very extensive agenda for the Austrian bishops' conferences.[21] The range of duties of a national bishops' conference arises of itself from its nature and composition. To begin with, among its responsibilities will naturally be that range of duties which, while belonging to the individual bishop who is its member in virtue of his office and his ordinary jurisdiction, cannot in practice be fulfilled by him without the agreement and co-operation of the other bishops in the same country. Within the limits of these duties a bishops' conference, at least if it succeeds in achieving the free agreement of all its members, is the bearer and wielder of its own duties and rights[22] (even though the result will represent only diocesan law as long as 'a bishops' conference does not as a college possess its own sovereign authority or chooses in a given case not to exercise it). Not only properly pastoral questions committed to the individual bishops are comprised in the conference's duties. These include also the duty of representing before the State the particular Church which is brought together in the national bishops' conference. This can be deduced of itself from what we have said, and historically, too, it has been the occasion for the formation of such bishops' conferences. Its tasks also extend to fulfilling the role of chief supervisor to those ecclesiastical organisations and institutions which are themselves of an interdiocesan kind (although this may vary in degree according to the particular nature of the institution in question). For modern social development has brought it about that in the ecclesiastical sphere, too, societies and institutions have had to be created extending as single entities over several dioceses (and yet which are not 'exempt' like certain religious orders). One need only think, for example, of the [385] German Caritas Organisation, of the many organisations with a central administration covering the whole territory of the Federal Republic, of the national branches of papal works of charity, and so on. So long as a bishops' conference is not the bearer of sovereign authority these inter-diocesan institutions have on the side of the hierarchy nothing really corresponding to them of the same status from the formal legal point of view. From a pastoral standpoint, a bishop must encourage and promote such an inter-diocesan organisation within his diocese; from the legal standpoint he is not really equal to it. Only by friendly agreement can their relationship be regulated at the moment, as long as the bishop does not wish to have recourse to the extreme means of forbidding such an organisation in his territory altogether. This fact, too, clearly leads us to the need for a bishops' conference, and moreover one with its own authority, in order that a legally equal partner should stand over against these inter-

[20] The first such continental bishops' conference was held at Rio de Janeiro in 1955 from 25 July to 4 August as the Latin American bishops' conference. Cf. also AAS XLVII (1955), pp. 539-544: Pius XII, 'Ad Ecclesiam Christi'; Conferencia general del Episcopado Latino-Americano (Rome 1956).
[21] AKKR LXXX (1920), p. 382 sq.; similarly for Latin America, AKKR LXXX (1920), p. 766 sq.
[22] 'It is quite clear that what is discussed and decided at a bishops' conference has no need of being submitted also to the Apostolic See': J. B. Sägmüller, Lehrbuch des katholischen Kirchenrechtes I, 4 (Freiburg 1934), p. 613, note 4.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

diocesan organisations. This does not necessarily mean that all these inter-diocesan organisations would have to be mere organs of the bishops' conference without any autonomy of their own, irrespective of their particular nature. The more precise determination of their relationship to a bishops' conference depends assuredly also on their own proper nature and the degree of their 'ecclesiality', which varies considerably between the various institutions.

If the exposition of the duties of individual bishops in the doctrinal section is correct, it follows as a consequence that such a bishops' conference, simply as the assembly of several bishops, has of itself duties also towards the central government of the Church and towards the universal Church. For these duties and tasks fall upon the individual bishop already, and so all the more do they fall upon a bishops' conference without there being required for this in principle any special authorisation from the pope. After all, the individual bishop is not a mere recipient of orders or executive of the supreme, central authority in the Church: on the contrary, as a bearer of ordinary jurisdiction by divine law and as a member of the college of bishops he also has the mission, right and duty to maintain an active attitude over against the papal central government, even if such a duty, in the face of the universal primacy of jurisdiction of the Roman pope (and this even regarding the individual bishop), is not susceptible of a strictly juridical codification, one which would allow a claim to be laid before a higher instance to ensure that these rights and duties are respected by the Roman central government. An [386] active influence of this kind from the individual diocese upon the central government has always in fact been present. Naturally every bishop has the right to have recourse to the highest authority in the Church with petitions, submissions, information, proposals, complaints, etc., and he does so almost of necessity, because the reports required of him are in the concrete not merely something like the rendering of accounts by a provincial official before the central government but inevitably also represent quite justifiably an influencing of the supreme government of the Church. If, then, the individual bishop is not the mere executive arm of the supreme central leadership of the Church but also, even if in a completely para-canonical way, actively shares in the universal government[23] of the Church (although this participation by the individual as such does not possess a properly sovereign character), this is all the more true of a conference of bishops. Moreover, it would be quite likely that in the case of the bishops' conference such assistance in government would be laid down in the positive, human law of the Church. (For example, in the filling of episcopal sees its assistance may be prescribed, or it may be granted the right to be heard before decisions are made by the Roman Congregations.)

Among the duties of a bishops' conference which derive simply from the nature and the mission of the episcopal office itself there is after all also that of playing a part in meeting the needs and problems of other parts of the Church. Of its nature, for example, a bishops' conference must assume an obligation for the propagation of the faith throughout the world. When campaigns like 'Misereor' for the developing countries or 'Adveniat' for Latin America are supported by a bishops' conference, this corresponds precisely to the theological nature of such a conference.

Regarding the range of its tasks, ultimately we must surely consider the fact that it is in principle possible and in many cases perhaps also desirable that the Holy See should transfer to such a bishops' conference the competence over certain matters which do not immediately follow from its particular nature but which can be habitually delegated to it by the Holy See as a participation in its own responsibilities of divine or [387] positive human law. While [23] We have already referred above to the 'ordinary magisterium' of the whole episcopate, through which the individual bishop is in fact the teacher not only of his own diocese, although his authority to teach with respect to his diocese is of a different kind in sacred law from his participation in the ordinary teaching office of the college of bishops with respect to the universal Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

hitherto, for example, the Holy See has reserved to itself each and every regulation of the official liturgy of the Western Church, it would be quite possible and desirable that certain responsibilities in this field, at least within previously defined limits (for example, the regulation of the more precise proportions to be observed between the Latin and the vernacular liturgy) should be committed to such national or continental bishops' conferences. With respect to this sector of possible duties conferred upon a bishops' conference there then arises the question whether each particular actualisation of this sort of competence by a bishops' conference should then again be made dependent for its validity upon a special act of approbation by Rome or not, a question arising from the Pope's general right of supervision over all that goes on in the Church, based upon his primacy of jurisdiction. The answer to this question will largely depend, from the material point of view, on the particular kind of powers in question and cannot therefore be answered in the same way for all cases. However, basing ourselves upon the principle of subsidiarity and the necessity for a bishops' conference to be a genuine intermediate instance between the individual diocese and the papal primacy, we may say that as great an independence and autonomy as possible is desirable for such bishops' conferences even in their relationship with Rome.

In conclusion we may attempt a final consideration concerning the inner structure of such a bishops' conference. Such a college must naturally have a president. It is taken for granted that this president is not the nuncio or apostolic delegate to the country in question. Where there already exists in a particular country a traditional primate (beyond the mere title) this primate will quite naturally be the president of the national bishops' conference. Where there is no such primate it will be scarcely necessary in this day and age to confer such a title on the president of a national bishops' conference. It will rather be quite natural for the senior cardinal or metropolitan to be the president. Such a bishops' conference, because it will have permanent commitments, will also form commissions assigned to the different spheres of interest (education, press, State relations, charitable organisation, etc.), and it will have a permanent office (secretariat) and a public relations service corresponding to the size of the bishops' conference and the range of its concerns[24].

[388] In this connection we must finally touch briefly upon the most delicate question of all, namely how the decisions of a bishops' conference are to be reached. Since all bishops' conferences up to the present have been free meetings without any proper authority of their own between individual bishops, their decisions have been based upon the free agreement of all the bishops and have bound each bishop legally only by his own consent. To be sure there are many bishops who feel that this system of a merely fraternal discussion should be maintained even in the future. They fear that otherwise, if one may put it this way, they will find in addition to the pope in Rome another Lord and Master nearer at hand who brings with him the danger that the bishop is no longer the Master and Father in his own diocese but has become the subordinate executive of this intermediate instance, and in this case it does not make much difference whether this new Lord and Master is the majority of the conference or perhaps in practice its president or the primate of the country. On the other hand, it must be recognised quite simply that the bishops' conference is an urgent necessity because in the sociological and pastoral conditions of today a quick, secure and efficient intermediate instance is necessary. And at least in the case of many countries it may be doubted whether today or in the near future a bishops' conference can fulfil its functions as we have conceived them, if its decisions remain in all cases dependent upon the agreement and the goodwill of [24] Cf. in connection with this e.g. in Houtart (note 3 above) the account given of the commissions (or departments) of bishops' conferences (pp. 505-506) in the various countries, of the permanent secretariats of bishops' conferences (pp. 506-508), of CELAM (the council of the Latin American bishops in Bogota) (pp. 516-519, 522-532). Concerning the establishment of the French bishops' conference cf. Herder-Korrespondenz XVI (1961/2), pp. 447-450.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

each and every individual bishop.[25] The question therefore arises whether the bishops' conference of the future must not be legally recognised as possessing a superior authority, enabling it to make a decision binding upon all its members even if the complete unanimity of all its members is unobtainable. Perhaps a possible solution to the problem would be to strike a middle path between these two systems of decision-making (of a free agreement or a majority decision binding upon all) by assigning from the beginning certain areas of its work to the one method of arriving at a decision and others to the other. Another middle path would be found, for example, by [389] laying it down in the constitution of such a national bishops' conference that a majority decision of the conference binds all members only whenever the majority is two-thirds or more of all those present, and that in other cases the individual bishop remains free to decide on objective grounds whether he will accede to the majority decision or not.

In conclusion we may add two remarks. The foregoing considerations refer to the abstract and formal nature of a bishops' conference, to its formal juridical structure. The real importance of such a conference can only be clearly seen if one turns one's eyes to the urgent concrete pastoral needs and problems facing the Church in this day and age. If as a result of this the need for bishops' conferences is demonstrated, it will also become much clearer what their nature must be and why they are an urgent necessity, something being urged by the development of the constitutional law of the Church. The second remark is this: what has been said here is a purely private reflection, and not even that of an expert in the question; therefore its value is no more than the value of the reasons advanced in its favour.

[25] In Brazil it has happened even in recent times that individual bishops have openly protested against the decisions of a commission appointed by a bishops' conference and have rejected it as having no competence.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[390]

C. THE INDIVIDUAL AND THE CHURCH

23

ANONYMOUS CHRISTIANS

It is almost two thousand years since the Church received her commission to preach the message of Christ to all nations unto the ends of the earth. In principle we have reached those ends of the earth: the limits of our world have been marked out. Yet what position does the message of Christ occupy in it?

In the ancient cultures of Asia it has never been able to gain a foothold, and in the West where it became one of the historical roots it is still steadily losing in importance and influence. The Christian faith is widely interpreted as one possible form of religious explanation of man's existence, alongside of which others are to be ranged either by an equal right or even as showing greater promise. Religion itself appears to many as only one of many forms of man's understanding of himself, which should be allowed to have its say or which should be combated as harmful.

This is the situation in which the believing Christian finds himself, and he is forced to recognise that the future will only bring this picture into sharper relief,[1] that the saying about the little flock will become still more true in spite of all the Church's pastoral and missionary efforts.

The Christian is convinced that in order to achieve salvation man must believe in God, and not merely in God but in Christ; that this faith is not merely a positive commandment from which one could be dispensed under certain conditions; that membership of the one true Church does not constitute a merely extrinsic condition from which it would be appropriate for someone to be freed by the mere fact that he does not and cannot know about it and its necessity. On the contrary, this faith is in [391] itself necessary and therefore demanded absolutely, not merely as a commandment but as the only possible means, not as a condition alone but as an unavoidable way of access, for man's salvation is nothing less than the fulfilment and definitive coming to maturity of precisely this beginning, for which therefore nothing else can substitute. – In this sense there really is no salvation outside the Church, as the old theological formula has it. But can the Christian believe even for a moment that the overwhelming mass of his brothers, not only those before the appearance of Christ right back to the most distant past (whose horizons are being constantly extended by palaeontology) but also those of the present and of the future before us, are unquestionably and in principle excluded from the fulfilment of their lives and condemned to eternal meaninglessness? He must reject any such suggestion, and his faith is itself in agreement with his doing so. For the scriptures tell him expressly that God wants everyone to be saved (1 Tm 2:4); the covenant of peace which God made with Noah after the flood has never been abrogated: on the contrary, the Son of God himself has sealed it with the incontestable authority of his self-sacrificing love embracing all men.

But when we have to keep in mind both principles together, namely the necessity of Christian faith and the universal salvific will of God's love and omnipotence, we can only reconcile them by saying that somehow all men must be capable of being members of the [1] Cf. K. Rahner, 'The Teaching of Vatican II on the Church and the Future Reality of Christian Life' in The Christian of the Future (Freiburg/London 1967), pp. 77-101.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Church; and this capacity must not be understood merely in the sense of an abstract and purely logical possibility, but as a real and historically concrete one. – But this means in its turn that there must be degrees of membership of the Church, not only in ascending order from being baptised, through the acceptance of the fullness of the Christian faith and the recognition of the visible head of the Church, to the living community of the Eucharist, indeed to the realisation of holiness, but also in descending order from the explicitness of baptism into a non-official and anonymous Christianity which can and should yet be called Christianity in a meaningful sense, even though it itself cannot and would not describe itself as such. If it be true that the man who is the object of the Church's missionary endeavour is or can be already prior to it a man who is on the way towards his salvation and finds it in certain circumstances without being reached by the Church's preaching, and if it be true at the same time that the salvation which he achieves is the salvation of Christ, because there is no other, then it must be possible to be not only an anonymous 'theist', but also an [392] anonymous Christian, and this (since the Church of Christ is not a purely interior reality) not in any merely intangible inner way, but also with a certain making visible and tangible of the anonymous relationship. – How is a relationship of this kind to be conceived?

It cannot be simply given already by the mere fact of being human. The attempt to account for the grace of redemption and nearness to God in such a way would merely negate it as grace. Grace, as the free self-communication of God to his creature, does presuppose the creature, and this in such possession of its being and its capacities that it can stand in and on itself and bear witness to the glory of that almighty creative power and goodness which was able to say of its works that they were good. At the same time such a creature must be given the possibility of hearing and accepting as beyond itself the incalculable new turning of God towards it in his revelation. That is to say, it must be, to begin with, a being of unlimited openness for the limitless being of God, therefore that being we call spirit. Spirit signifies that immaterial being prior to and going beyond every individual thing that can be known and grasped, that openness which is always already opened by the creative call of infinite mystery which is and must be the ultimate and the first, the all-inclusive and the fathomless ground of all that can be grasped, of all that is real and all that is possible. In order to know something of this mystery which we call God there is also required some knowledge of his superiority over the world and of his personality, knowledge therefore of the fact that the fathomlessness of this ground is that of a freedom which man has to thank for his own awakening and of which he knows at the same time that it has not yet opened itself utterly and bound itself completely by this its first still open call. Awakened by its creative word, he now awaits more profound communication. Does the divine liberty banish him into the distance of its silence or has it given him these ears that he may now hear for the first time its real word?

Man therefore is not only capable of hearing a possible word from his hidden God, but in the sense we have explained is also positively expecting it, little as he has the least right to demand it. Every denial of this fact of his being ordered to the unsurpassably Absolute would implicitly merely affirm it once more, for it too would speak with the claim of absolute truth, would be subject to the demand of an indisputable good, would derive its force from the desire for a final and definitive meaning.

Now, how does this tendency towards God, which is on occasion [393] quite implicit and incoherent and yet always completely permeates man's being and existence, include a reference to the incarnate God, to Jesus Christ? – Much as the fact of Christ is the freest and in this sense (although only in this sense) the most contingent fact of reality, it is equally the most decisive and important and moreover the fact which has the most obvious relevance to man. If one takes it seriously that God has become man, then – it must be said – man is that which happens when God expresses and divests himself. Man is accordingly in the most basic definition that which God becomes if he sets out to show himself in the region of the extra-divine.[2] And conversely, formulating it from the point of view of man: man is he who realises himself when he gives himself away into the incomprehensible mystery of God. Seen in this way, the incarnation of God is the uniquely supreme case of the actualisation of man's nature in general.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is true that before Christ no philosopher ever recognised in man's self-interpretation these depths of the human reality, but as a historical being man is one who in the concrete comes to be and to know what he is only in the unfolding of his history. Now that his thinking is illuminated by the light of the revelation which has in fact been made in the historically accomplished reality of Christ, he can recognise this unapproachable height as that perfection of his own being which can be effected by God, not in order that in a rationalistic fashion man may have it under his control but in order that he may more fully recognise the fact that he is ordained to this mystery. Bestowal of grace and incarnation as the two basic modes of God's self-communication can therefore be conceived as the most radical modes of man's spiritual being, beyond his powers to compel and yet precisely as such eminently fulfilling the transcendence of his being.

The believer will then also grasp that this absolute eminence is not an optional adjunct to his reality; that it is not given to him as the juridical and external demand of God's will for him, but that this self-communication by God offered to all and fulfilled in the highest way in Christ rather constitutes the goal of all creation and – since God's word and will effect what they say – that, even before he freely takes up an attitude to it, it stamps and determines man's nature and lends it a character which we may call a 'supernatural existential'. A refusal of this offer would therefore [394] not leave man in a state of pure unimpaired nature, but would bring him into contradiction with himself even in the sphere of his own being. This means positively that man in experiencing his transcendence, his limitless openness – no matter how implicit and incomprehensible it always is – also already experiences the offer of grace – not necessarily expressly as grace, as a distinctly supernatural calling, but experiences the reality of its content. But this means that the express revelation of the word in Christ is not something which comes to us from without as entirely strange, but only the explicitation of what we already are by grace and what we experience at least incoherently in the limitlessness of our transcendence. The expressly Christian revelation becomes the explicit statement of the revelation of grace which man always experiences implicitly in the depths of his being.

If man accepts the revelation, he posits by that fact the act of supernatural faith. But he also already accepts this revelation whenever he really accepts himself completely, for it already speaks in him. Prior to the explicitness of official ecclesiastical faith this acceptance can be present in an implicit form whereby a person undertakes and lives the duty of each day in the quiet sincerity of patience, in devotion to his material duties and the demands made upon him by the persons under his care. What he is then taking upon himself is therefore not merely his basic relationship with the silent mystery of the Creator-God. Accordingly, no matter how he wants to understand and express this in his own reflective self-understanding, he is becoming thereby not merely an anonymous 'theist', but rather takes upon himself in that Yes to himself the grace of the mystery which has radically approached us. 'God has given himself to man in direct proximity': perhaps the essence of Christianity can be reduced to this formula.

In the acceptance of himself man is accepting Christ as the absolute perfection and guarantee of his own anonymous movement towards God by grace, and the acceptance of this belief is again not an act of man alone but the work of God's grace which is the grace of [2] Cf. the more detailed reasoning given in our essay, 'On the Theology of the Incarnation' in Theological Investigations IV (London & Baltimore 1966), pp. 105-120.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Christ, and this means in its turn the grace of his Church which is only the continuation of the mystery of Christ, his permanent visible presence in our history.

It is true that it would be wrong to go so far as to declare every man, whether he accepts the grace or not, an 'anonymous Christian'. Anyone who in his basic decision were really to deny and to reject his being ordered to God, who were to place himself decisively in opposition to [395] his own concrete being, should not be designated a 'theist', even an anonymous 'theist'; only someone who gives – even if it be ever so confusedly – the glory to God should be thus designated. Therefore no matter what a man states in his conceptual, theoretical and religious reflection, anyone who does not say in his heart, 'there is no God' (like the 'fool' in the psalm) but testifies to him by the radical acceptance of his being, is a believer. But if in this way he believes in deed and in truth in the holy mystery of God, if he does not suppress this truth but leaves it free play, then the grace of this truth by which he allows himself to be led is always already the grace of the Father in his Son. And anyone who has let himself be taken hold of by this grace can be called with every right an 'anonymous Christian'.

This name implicitly signifies that this fundamental actuation of a man, like all actuations, cannot and does not want to stop in its anonymous state but strives towards an explicit expression, towards its full name. An unfavourable historical environment may impose limitations on the explicitness of this expression so that this actuation may not exceed the explicit appearance of a loving humaneness, but it will not act against this tendency whenever a new and higher stage of explicitness is presented to it right up to the ultimate perfection of a consciously accepted profession of Church membership. Here alone does this belief find not merely its greatest support and source of confidence but also its proper reality and that peace which St Augustine likened to repose in being: peace and repose which do not mean stagnation and flight but the capacity of casting oneself all the more resolutely into the inexorable will of the mystery of God, since now, as St Paul says, one knows whom one believes and to whom one fearlessly submits in radical trust.

To anyone who thinks that he cannot or dare not believe (perhaps because he fails to appreciate to what an immeasurable experience of relentless love the acceptance of its human nearness can call us – from a great distance, as though its mystery and its sublimity might thereby be destroyed), or to anyone who is quite certain that he does not believe, these reflections may mean very little, and they are not in the first place directed to him, although they could make even him attentive to the voice inside him. What is said about the 'anonymous Christian' would therefore be completely misunderstood if it were thought that it represents merely a last desperate attempt in a world where Christian faith is fast disappearing to 'rescue' in its ultimate significance all that is good and [396] human for the Church – against every freedom of the spirit. But the Christian who finds himself in a diaspora situation[3] which is becoming increasingly acute, the believer who finds his faith and his hope sorely tried at the sight of his unbelieving brothers,[4] can derive from it comfort and the strength of objectivity. Knowledge about the anonymous Christian does not in any way dispense him from caring and troubling about those who do not yet know the one necessary truth in its explicit affirmation in the gospel message. But this knowledge will keep him from panic and will give him the strength to practice that patience which – according to the Lord's saying – brings salvation to life, his own as much as that of his brother.

Our topic with all its urgency cannot be avoided or dismissed as unimportant either by a theology of grace and of the Church which has a true understanding of itself or by an honest pastoral theology which looks at our times dispassionately. The exact word may not have any importance, but the matter we are contemplating is undeniably of central importance for the

[3] Cf. also K. Rahner, 'Der Christ und seine Umwelt', Stimmen der Zeit XC (1965), pp. 481-489.
[4] Cf. K. Rahner, Im Heute glauben, Theol. Meditationen 9 (Einsiedeln 1965).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

relations of the contemporary Christian to the world around him. Theologically we should not make any mistake in assigning its proper 'place' to the doctrine of 'anonymous Christianity': this is not a hermeneutic principle critically to reduce the whole corpus of traditional theology and dogmatics (in the same way as an existentialist interpretation or the theses of the Anglican Bishop Robinson) and thereby to make Christianity in this form more acceptable; from a dogmatic point of view, this doctrine is perhaps even a peripheral phenomenon whose necessity, lawfulness and correctness derive from many other individual data of ecclesiastical teaching or are at least demanded by them.[5] As again this dogmatic-theoretical position, a theology which proceeds in a more historical-existential-practical way can certainly assign to these statements about 'anonymous Christianity' a more central position,[6] yet without coming into conflict with other fundamental dogmatic certainties. It [397] would be quite foolish to think that this talk about 'anonymous Christianity' must lessen the importance of mission, preaching, the Word of God, baptising, and so on.[7] Anyone who wants to interpret our remarks about anonymous Christianity in this way, has not merely fundamentally misunderstood them, but has not read our exposition of them with sufficient attention.[8] I think that only two things are necessary in order to understand correctly what is intended by this phrase: some really thorough thinking about various fundamental data of the traditional theology of the Schools, data which often are left lying together in sterile proximity, and at the same time an unbiased contemplation of the real situation of mankind, of Christianity and of the Church today.[9]

What is meant by this thesis of the anonymous Christian is actually also taught materially in the Constitution on the Church of Vatican II (no. 16). According to this document those who have not yet received the gospel and this without any fault of their own (and this possibility is clearly presupposed as a real one) are given the possibility of eternal salvation ('aeterna salus', which can only be understood of supernatural salvation). The only condition is, from the point of view of God, 'gratiae influxus' (or 'divina gratia' as it is also called), and from the point of view of man, 'Deum sincero corde quaerere eiusque voluntatem per conscientiae dictamen agnitam operibus adimplere'. This fulfilment of the duty of conscience is explicitly supposed as possible also in the case of those 'qui sine culpa ad expressam agnitionem Dei nondum pervenerunt'. That an inculpable atheism of this kind can last a long time whether individually or collectively is not stated, but not excluded either. Since this atheism is seen only in opposition to 'expressa agnitio Dei', there is a clear indication that beneath such an atheism there may very well lie an unreflected, merely existentially actualised theism (precisely by a radical obedience to the dictates of conscience). But an incoherent theism of this kind can in [398] certain circumstances surely last a long time, without it becoming at any time during this period impossible to say any longer 'aeternum salutem consequi possunt'. In its statements the Constitution on the Church is in

---

[5] This difference from Bultmann's demythologisation is perhaps too little stressed in the otherwise good article by H. Ott, 'Existentiale Interpretation und anonyme Christlichkeit' in Zeit und Geschichte: Festgabe R. Bultmann edited by E. Dinkler (Tübingen 1964), pp. 367-379.

[6] Cf. in a wider context K. Rahner, Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II (Freiburg 1966), Kap. VII, §3, §4 no. 6, etc.

[7] Cf. e.g. L. Elders, 'Die Taufe der Weltreligionen. Bemerkungen zu einer Theorie Karl Rahners' in Theologie and Glaube LV (1965), pp. 124-131.

[8] Let me refer the reader merely to Theological Investigations V (London & Baltimore 1966), p. 131 sq. Regarding the dispute with L. Elders let me draw attention to the account by F. Ricken, '"Ecclesia . . . universale salutis sacramentum": Theologische Erwägungen zur Lehre der Dogmatischen Konstitution "De Ecclesia" über die Kirchenzugehörigkeit', Scholastik XL (1965), pp. 352-388, esp. pp. 382-385 (note 147).

[9] For a further presentation cf. the abundant documentation given by Kl. Riesenhuber, 'Der anonyme Christ, nach Karl Rahner' ZKT LXXXVI (1964), pp. 286-303.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

no way implying that here in these cases salvation is achieved as it were in a substitute fashion by means of a purely natural morality. This would indeed contradict scripture and the magisterium.[10] It is also excluded by the words of the Constitution itself: salvation is reached 'non sine divina gratia', 'sub influxu gratiae'.

There is no justification for regarding this grace as being supernatural in a merely ontic, pre-conscious sense, such as would be required for the positing of any moral act which, as far as consciousness was concerned, was purely natural. Rather must we conceive this grace as more than merely ontic, as also entering consciousness and therefore as engendering true faith in the theological sense, even though this is not yet reflective.[11] The lesser interpretation is also excluded by a remark in the same Council's decree on the Missions (no. 7), in which it is explicitly said that God 'in the unknown ways' of his grace can give faith without which there is no salvation even to those who have not yet heard the preaching of the gospel. Although in the face of this theological optimism of the Council regarding salvation it remains the task of theology to show why the necessity of the gospel, of the Church and the sacraments are not thereby devalued, it is quite impossible to doubt that what is meant by the 'anonymous Christian' (the name itself is unimportant) is compatible with the Council's teaching, indeed is explicitly stated by it. Neither is this the place to demonstrate that such a theory in no way cripples the missionary impulse of the Church but rather puts before it the person to whom it addresses itself in his true hopeful condition so that it can approach him with confidence.

[10] Cf. DS 3867 sqq.

[11] These two sentences are an amplification of the original German text made in light of explanations furnished by the author himself. [Translator's note.]

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[399]

VOLUME 6

LIST OF SOURCES[1]

1 THE MAN OF TODAY AND RELIGION
The first version of this was published under the title 'Der Unternehmer und die Religion' in a publication of the consortium E. V. Bonn (Bonn 1962), pp. 26-42 (the lecture given on 26 October 1962). A revised version was given in a lecture in the German Library in Rome and published after renewed revision and expansion in Der Seelsorger XXXV (1965), pp. 18-30.

2 A SMALL QUESTION REGARDING THE CONTEMPORARY PLURALISM IN THE INTELLECTUAL SITUATION OF CATHOLICS AND THE CHURCH
First published in Stimmen der Zeit XC (1965), pp. 191-199.

3 REFLECTIONS ON DIALOGUE WITHIN A PLURALISTIC SOCIETY
The speech of thanks at the celebration in connection with the bestowal of the Reuchlin Prize by the town of Pfortzheim on 26 June 1965. The speech was printed in a revised form by the authorities of Pfortzheim as a booklet under the same title. Cf. also Stimmen der Zeit XC (1965), pp. 321-330.

4 IDEOLOGY AND CHRISTIANITY
A talk to Catholic students of the University of Erlangen on 15 July 1964, published in Concilium I (1965), pp. 475-483 (German edition). [This has appeared in another translation in the English edition of Concilium Vol. 6, No. 1 (June 1965), pp. 23-31.]
[400]
5 MARXIST UTOPIA AND THE CHRISTIAN FUTURE OF MAN
A talk given on 1 May 1965 in Salzburg at a meeting of the Paulus-Gesellschaft on the theme 'Christianity and Marxism'. First published in Orientierung XXIX (1965), pp.107-110 (No. 9 of 15 May).

6 PHILOSOPHY AND THEOLOGY
A talk given at a symposium on 'The Significance of European Culture for Universal History' in Salzburg 27-29 September 1961. The text printed here follows a tape-recording which was slightly edited. First published in Kairos IV (1962), pp. 162-169.

7 A SMALL FRAGMENT 'ON THE COLLECTIVE FINDING OF TRUTH'
Contribution to a Festschirift in honour of Helmut Kuhn, Epimeleia: Die Sorge der Philosophie um den Menschen, published by Franz Wiedmann (Munich 1964), pp. 61-67.

8 SCRIPTURE AND THEOLOGY
An article printed in Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe edited by H. Fries (Munich 1963), Vol. II, pp. 517-525.

9 SCRIPTURE AND TRADITION
Lecture given at a meeting of the Catholic Academy in Bavaria on 10 February 1963 in [1] We obviously cannot list here the numerous reprints in German or any of the translations which have appeared, apart from a few cases where there is some special justification for doing so.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Munich. Published in Wort und Wahrheit XVIII (1963), pp. 269-279, and in Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil, No. 24 in the series 'Studien und Berichte der Katholischen Akademie in Bayern' edited by K. Forster (Würzburg 1963), pp. 71-91.

10 REFLECTIONS ON THE CONTEMPORARY INTELLECTUAL FORMATION OF FUTURE PRIESTS
Published in Stimmen der Zeit XC (1964/5), pp. 173-193. That essay has been reproduced here without alteration; but cf. the amplification provided in note 1.

11 THE SECRET OF LIFE
Lecture given at a meeting of the Catholic Academy of the archdiocese of Freiburg i. Br. on 23 May 1965 at Mannheim. The text has been revised and is published here for the first time.
[401]
12 THE UNITY OF SPIRIT AND MATTER IN THE CHRISTIAN UNDERSTANDING OF FAITH
A paper given at the Pentecost congress of lay theologians at Münster-Gievenbeck, Haus Mariengrund, 4-8 June 1963, and also given as a lecture on 27 April 1963 in Salzburg. Published together with the paper 'Das Selbstverständnis der Theologie vor dem Anspruch der Naturwissenschaft' in a special issue of the periodical Religionsunterricht an höheren Schulen (Patmos-Verlag, Düsseldorf 1963). The author has in certain parts of this paper taken over formulations from his Hominisation: The Evolutionary Origin of Man as a Theological Problem, Quaestiones Disputatae No. 13 (Freiburg and London 1965).

13 THEOLOGY OF FREEDOM
A lecture given on 30 November 1964 at the one hundred and seventy-fifth anniversary celebration of Georgetown University within the framework of the 'Patrick F. Healy Conference on "Freedom and Man"'. The text given here has been revised and considerably expanded.

14 GUILT – RESPONSIBILITY – PUNISHMENT WITHIN THE VIEW OF CATHOLIC THEOLOGY
A contribution to the cycle of lectures at the University of Zürich in the winter term 1962/3 given on 17 January 1963. Published in the symposium Schuld – Verantwortung – Strafe im Lichte der Theologie, Jurisprudenz, Soziologie, Medizin und Philosophie, edited by Prof. E. R. Frey (Zürich 1964), pp. 151-172.

15 JUSTIFIED AND SINNER AT THE SAME TIME
Published in Geist und Leben XXXVI (1963), pp. 434-443.

16 REFLECTIONS ON THE UNITY OF THE LOVE OF NEIGHBOUR AND THE LOVE OF GOD
Theological draft of a lecture given at the general meeting of the Katholische Fürsorgeverein für Mädchen, Frauen und Kinder on 11 May 1965 in Cologne. Published in Geist und Leben XXXVIII (1965), pp. 168-185.
[402]
17 THE CHURCH OF SINNERS
First published in Stimmen der Zeit LXXII (1947), pp. 163-177, afterwards separately under the same title (Freiburg i. Br. 1948 and Vienna 1948).

18 THE SINFUL CHURCH IN THE DECREES OF VATICAN II

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The main part of this essay originates in a study written by the author for the collective work L'Eglise de Vatican II, edited by P. Guillaume Baraúna, O.F.M., and published in seven languages. The text given here is one which has been expanded by incorporating considerations relating to De Oecumenismo and by amplifying the exegetical and dogmatic-historical part.

19 THE CHURCH AND THE PAROUSIA OF CHRIST
Lecture given at the united meeting of the Protestant and Catholic ecumenical working-groups in April 1963. Published in Catholica XVII (1963), pp. 113-128.

20 THE EPISCOPAL OFFICE
Published in Stimmen der Zeit LXXXIX (1963/4), pp. 161-195, and in W. Stählin, J. H. Lerche, E. Fincke, L. Klein and K. Rahner, Das Amt der Einheit: Grundlegendes zur Theologie des Bischofsamtes (Stuttgart 1964), pp. 245-311. The foreword which has here been prefixed to the article was specially written for the present volume.

21 PASTORAL-THEOLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS ON EPISCOPACY IN THE TEACHING OF VATICAN II
Published in Concilium I (1965), pp. 170-174 (German edition). [This has appeared in another translation in the English edition of Concilium Vol. 3, No. I (March 1965), pp. 10-14.]

22 ON BISHOPS' CONFERENCES
Published in Stimmen der Zeit LXXXVIII (1962/3), pp. 267-283.
[403]
23 ANONYMOUS CHRISTIANS
This essay was originally a broadcast review of the book by A. Röper, Die anonymen Christen (Mainz 1963) which was put on the air in the summer of 1964 by Wesrdeutscher Rundfunk and has never before been published. In preparing it for publication here any references to its original context have been removed and some additional matter has been incorporated which tries to take account of certain objections.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[1]

PART ONE

Fundamental Questions

[3]

1

CHRISTIAN LIVING FORMERLY AND TODAY

There can be no doubt that at the present time a great unrest prevails in the Church, pervading all 'classes' and groups. While it may perhaps be true that many are troubled simply on the grounds that others 'give them no rest', still there are others also who go so far as to wish that this unrest may be still greater than it in fact is. Finally we ourselves must point out calmly that the world of humanity taken as a whole, together with its life, its basic concern (angst) and its hopes, does not take these 'movements' within the Church and among the few Christians involved over-seriously. The true origins of this unrest are not to be found in the Council. The Council is hardly more than the occasion which throws more plainly and more openly into relief in the Church these differing attitudes and positions within it, which would have been present in any case even without the Council. Admittedly the Council has given rise to a sort of 'backlash'. The Council sought to overcome the forces that threaten the Church in the present time, but in doing so inevitably seemed, at any rate to the eye of the beholder, to impart a certain increase of strength to these forces. For he who decides, as indeed he must, to embark upon an 'aggiornamento', notices straight away – there is absolutely no way of avoiding this – that the Church is relatively out of gear with the historical situation and with the needs of the hour, which he has hitherto refused to take into consideration. He becomes uncertain, and that in itself straight away makes his position inevitably more difficult. Now anyone who feels inclined to lay this as a reproach at the door of the Council must ask himself in all earnestness whether he can find it in his heart to wish that the Church might have postponed this process of taking cognisance of her own true situation for a few decades longer – for certainly this is the utmost to which it could have been deferred – and that she should only then have been brought into the state of 'crisis' in which she now in fact finds [4] herself, only in a far more radical state of crisis than is the case at present.

This contemporary unrest is hard to analyse at any rate in its entirety. It consists of a mixture of anxiety in the face of what is new, and an almost unbridled craving for the new merely because it is new and therefore 'more interesting'; in other words one of the elements in this unrest is truly creative in that it rightly looks to and seeks for renewal in the sense of a better way of life for Christians and for the Church. Another is anxiety over the present instability of the situation in which the Church and the believer lives. Yet another is a falling-off of the true spirit of faith, which breaks down before the onslaughts of the present world. Our task must be to consider the situation in which this unrest has arisen, to be patient with it and gradually to understand it and to endure it so that the Church may become that which she must be. Even the Church cannot choose the situation in which she lives. It is given to her, and therefore it is good.

1. The Problem of Christian Living Today

One of the aspects of the Church's life in which this unrest manifests itself is that of Christian

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

living, of the religious life properly so-called. In speaking of this area of the Church's life we mean from the outset to exclude the liturgy. This is not because no unrest of the kind of which we have been speaking exists in this limited sphere of religious activity; nor is it because we imagine that the liturgy would still be the liturgy even if it was celebrated in a mere 'objective' sense, without the personal participation of the individual. Our reason for excluding the liturgy is simply that it demands a separate and prolonged consideration in its own right, and in fact by a specialist in the field.

Even with this restriction the problem of Christian living in the post-conciliar age, the 'spirituality' of tomorrow, remains a question of the highest importance. Indeed, rightly understood, it is the decisive question tout court. For if the Council had achieved or inaugurated nothing more than an improvement in the communal 'image' of the Church, an increase in its social prestige, a more attractive formulation of the liturgy or one more in tune with the popular mind, an increase in freedom and democracy in the authoritative structure of the Church and of tolerance towards outsiders, a more harmonious position in the totality of philanthropic movements of the world – if that were all that the Council had achieved, [5] then it would have failed to attain to that which must properly be achieved in the Church as such: namely that man, that is 'I', may love God more, may become more believing, more hoping, more loving to God and man, may worship God better 'in spirit and in truth', may more willingly accept the darkness of human existence and death, may carry and use his freedom more freely and more responsibly. And this is, in fact, what 'Christian living' means if the word is taken as connoting first and foremost that which is explicitly religious. And by comparison with this, which is uniquely necessary, all else is secondary, important indeed as means, but in the last analysis only as means.

The question which we are putting, therefore, is: How does post-conciliar Christian living, the Christian living of the future, appear? In this question it is not ultimately important whether this Christian living is accorded a very large place or a relatively minor one in the decisions of the Council. In any case in the troubled question of this Christian living and the form which it takes the Council has played and continues to play to this day, the role of a catalyst. The question is extremely difficult, therefore, if only because in the Church, the Father's house which has many mansions, 'Christian living' is an extremely complex factor. It differs according to age and sex, according to nationalities and cultural milieux, according to the various ideas and traditions which have been handed down, according to worldly avocations, according to the general spiritual level prevailing at any given point, according to the categories into which the community is divided in terms of clergy, religious and laity. In the course of our present considerations, therefore, we can treat of the problems arising in relation only to one kind of Christian living, that which applies more or less to the state of the Christian layman who is an uncompromising and whole-hearted member of the Church, and whose standard of education represents that of an average cross-section of the community in our central European cultural sphere, and is not too rudimentary.

2. Christian Living in the Church Today as Heritage and as Commitment.

It may be taken as axiomatic that the new mode of Christian living will be Christian and ecclesiastical as it has always been practised hitherto in the life of the Church. A little further on we shall have occasion to speak of the new form which Christian living will assume. But a factor that must be mentioned first (though this is not the same as saying that it is the most important) is that element in Christian living which endures unchanged [6] yesterday, today and tomorrow. This must be considered under two aspects: first that which is true and authentic in ancient tradition; this must be allowed to prevail against any false understanding of the Council. Second the instinct which prompts us to crystallise the spiritual life in terms

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation of institutions and 'practices' this must be allowed to prevail against any tendency to a false existentialist subjectivism, which remains formless, arbitrary and unrealistic, and, moreover, in constant danger of being ungenuine.

First it would simply be foolish to suppose that everything not mentioned by the Council in the devotion of Christians as practised hitherto should be tacitly consigned to the past, and should be regarded as having no place in the future. The Council has had much to say (even though often using other terms for it) about the modes of Christian living appropriate to the layman, the priest, the religious, and even though its pronouncements may strike one as somewhat traditional and cliché-ridden, they are not the less important for that, or less significant as guiding lines for the future. It would be erroneous, however, to suppose that whatever subjects were not explicitly covered by the statements of the Council were ipso facto less important, less central and less pertaining to the essence and structure of living devotion, and the Christian living and devotion of the future at that. Even a Council operates only with a little pail as it draws upon the ocean of the spirit and the heritage of Christian living in defining what Christian life is to be in the future with all its possibilities, which are bestowed upon the Church by the Spirit. Here and there the Council does underline certain elements which must be observed in the Christian living of the future: thus that the life of the Christian must grow from a lively participation in the celebration of the Eucharist and in the genuinely communal worship of the altar; that Christians must take the scriptures as the basis for their thinking and acting; that they must exercise a spirit of fraternal freedom, and must not withdraw into a sort of pseudo-ecclesiastical ghetto, but must rather learn to regard the world with its needs and its future destiny as their Christian task. But the documents of the Council do not offer any kind of systematic programme for the form Christian living is to take in the future, nor even a truly clear, concrete and productive plan or model for such a mode of life. The references to Christian living at the Council were too random, and at the same time too much in the abstract to provide for this.

To assert that there is an underlying element in Christian living which [7] remains the same in spite of all the differences between the new and the old in it, and in spite of all historical vicissitudes, necessarily implies that this element has survived unchanged because it has been preserved as an historical heritage in the form in which it has de facto developed. Perhaps we could actually go so far as to say that today the real nonconformists are to be found in the group of those who have a genuine, calm and loving respect for the religious heritage of the past and the experience of past generations – such at least is one's impression when one observes the feverish excitement of many over-zealous individuals. Certainly it would be far from true to say that some current fashion is the swallow that heralds the true spring that is to come. If anyone believes that he can practise a new type of Christian living in the Church and can make out a convincing case for it, let him submit it, this devotion of his, to the 'discernment of spirits'. He will then find that one criterion of the genuineness of his Christian living which is far from unimportant is to test whether in practising it he can preserve the heritage of Christian wisdom and experience in the spirituality of past centuries.

To take a few random examples: meditation on the scriptures as practised today presupposes a modern and down-to-earth exegetical approach, ensuring that it is the scriptures themselves that are being read, and that it is not one's own pious fantasies that are being read into them. But meditation on the scriptures is far from being merely the waging of an unrelenting and destructive struggle against supposed dogmatic taboos until finally nothing more remains than the exegete's individual outlook and interpretation. Must this tendency continue until the love of reading the classics of spirituality and even the Christian mystics withers away or simply ceases, and the religiously inclined individual of the future becomes, in his own field, like some present-day student for whom German literature begins at earliest with Benn and Brecht? Certainly the Imitation of Christ will no longer be the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

formative work for the devout Christian of tomorrow; but must it on that account vanish altogether from the spiritual library of the future? And are there not many other classics of spiritual writing with which the devout Christian must be familiar unless there is to be a glaring gap in his spiritual and intellectual formation? Again the confessional is certainly not the outmoded shell within which modern psychotherapy is practised, and must not be misunderstood in this sense from either side of the confessional grill. It may indeed be difficult to foresee, in terms that are altogether concrete, what place frequent [8] confession will have in the life of a wholehearted Christian of tomorrow. Here too many modifications may be introduced quite legitimately on various grounds. But the more frequent 'confession of devotion'[1] is far from being on that account simply a practice which belongs to the Church's museum of antiquities. He who wreaks destruction here without at the same time building up has failed to understand the spirit of true and sincere morality, and of self-criticism in the life of the Christian.

Theologically speaking the tabernacle is certainly first and foremost the place in which the Bread of Life destined for consumption by the faithful is contained. But to reject on that account everything which has grown up in the Church and is still alive in the way of Eucharistic devotion as mere outmoded practices is still, for all that, a sacrilege.[2] Why should the Christian of the future too not kneel in prayer before the body of the Lord which was delivered up for him, before the sacramental sign of the death of the Lord and of his own death in the Lord which is made present to him? Or in the future is there to be no supplication, no forgiveness and no death? Are there only to be men who, when confronted with this abyss of existence, give themselves up to craven flight? If not, then in the future too there will be men who kneel in prayer and supplication before the shrine of the Eucharist, look upon him whom they have pierced; men who are ready to accept their fate, to which they commit themselves in the paschal mystery of Jesus.[3] In the future are there to be no more convents or monasteries of the contemplative life, in which men called by God bear witness on behalf of their brothers and sisters to the fact that all Christians, each one in his own way, must preserve that spirit of detachment from the happiness which this world offers in which alone this world acquires the beauty of its redemption? Is silent meditation no longer to be practised today as a part of our spiritual exercises? Must the clamour of the yearly fair intrude upon such times as these also? Or must we be silent here in order to learn how to endure that silence which will [9] be broken for each one when the crisis point of his life and the loneliness of his death come upon him?

These are mere random examples, all of them intended to illustrate a single point: the Christian living of tomorrow too has a great heritage to preserve. It is genuine only when it too regains its living relationship with its own past.

Again the Christian living of tomorrow is faithful and obedient to the spirit of true Christian religion when it has a taste for that which is solidly established, practised and has already taken shape, for that which is 'the practice' – in short for forms of devotion which are established institutions in the Church. It will cease to be faithful and obedient in this sense if it allows itself to be swayed by undisciplined impulses. There is no soul without a body, there is no genuine and serious religious life without man subjecting himself to discipline and rule, exercise and duty.[4] This institutional factor in Christian living is something which the devout

[1] For a deeper understanding of this cf. 'The Meaning of Frequent Confession of Devotion', Theological Investigations III (London & Baltimore, E.T. 1967), pp. 177-189.
[2] For the relevant theological principles cf. 'The Presence of Christ in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper', Theological Investigations IV (London & Baltimore Md, E.T. 1966), pp. 287-311.
[3] An attempt is made to indicate the power of Eucharistic devotion in everyday life in 'The Eucharist and Our Daily Lives' in this volume, pp. 211-226.
[4] On the necessity of this 'categorical' element and its relationship to the transcendental cf. Handbuch der

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Christian of the future, if he is to practise it genuinely, must decide for himself to a far greater extent than formerly, and which, far less than formerly, he will be able to take over simply as the generally accepted and practised way of living as a Christian. But precisely what form this institutional factor will take is in many respects a difficult question. Anyone, however, who supposes that the institutionalised practices in Christian living are already outmoded simply on the grounds that they are uncomfortable and involve strict discipline is deceiving himself and will never attain to a genuine mode of Christian living unless the grace of God rescues him by means of some catastrophe, whether interior or exterior, from his impoverished and diminished form of existence, which has only a colouring of Christianity. Certainly there is no commandment of God or the Church directing us to say our prayers precisely when we get up or go to bed, or before meals. He who really is a man of prayer without these praiseworthy Christian customs may in all Christian freedom regard himself as dispensed from them. But will he be a man of prayer? Will he be able to lay the supremely decisive moments of his life before God in prayer if in his everyday life prayer is simply the outcome of a momentary prompting or merely the 'liturgical' prayer of the Church's public services, or if he has not previously fixed his own times of prayer which he voluntarily engages himself to observe. It is strange. The most complex techniques of Yoga are [10] considered reasonable, yet the old Christian methods of prayer and meditation, as for example the rosary, are regarded as unmodern. But why precisely? Is this the result of experience or is it merely that the practitioners are all too eager to know better? Many instances of such institutional practices of devotion, even such as were or are common to the entire Church – one is thinking of the prescriptions of fasting, abstinence, fasting before receiving communion, holy water in the home etc. – may be susceptible of change, and may actually need it. Such changes in fact the official Church has already undertaken in many cases. But must the life of the Christian of the future be on that account actually devoid of any such formation by the Christian institutions? Is it already outmoded to keep a crucifix in one's own home? Why should there not be continuity between past and future in that the custom of having established usages which are Christian and human could be discovered and practised afresh? Are the students who make pilgrimages from Paris to Chartres simply engaged in a piece of sentimental folklore? Or can there not still be some meaning in such practices in the future too, even though – or perhaps because – such pilgrimages are very different in form and manner from the pilgrimage of a Polish peasant woman to Tschenstochau?

Where the power of Christian living to embody itself in concrete practices of devotion is plainly flagging then Christian living itself is beginning to die. And under these circumstances it will die however anxious its practitioners may be to express it in forms which are more tactful, reasonable and tasteful; however reluctant they may be to have a crucifix hanging in every factory workshop; however ready they may be to agree with their irreligious contemporaries that there is no need for church bells to call Christians to early Mass at six o'clock on Sunday morning. After all they have watches and alarm-clocks of their own!

All these institutional practices in Christian living are subject to manifold kinds of change. Thank God such changes are actually made.[5] But change is something quite different from demolition and atrophy. The secular institutes could make a major contribution here in testing out the merits of new, assured and practicable institutions, embodying genuine devotion, in developing these and setting an example in practising them.

Pastoraltheologie II/1 (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 64-70.

[5] For a right understanding of change as conceived of in this context cf. 'Kirche im Wandel', Schriften zur Theologie VI (Einsiedeln, 1965), pp. 455-478; Das Konzil – ein neuer Beginn (Freiburg, 1966).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[11]

III. Perspectives of Christian Living in the Future

For forms of Christian living in the future the preservation of our spiritual heritage is important. But it is not the ultimate and definitive factor. For it is possible to preserve an heritage only if one keeps abreast of what is new and what belongs to the future. Mere conservatism is sterile and cannot of itself attain its legitimate goals. It is evident that as applied to Christianity the term 'new' always implies the creative discovery and adaptation to the needs of particular epochs of that which in essence has been present right from the origins. Perhaps we may draw special attention to three factors bearing upon the Christian living of the future, of which we shall shortly be speaking. Admittedly it must be plainly stated by way of preliminary that abstract and theoretical postulates for this Christian living of the future are, and continue to be, something quite different from examples in the concrete, which are living and productive. These latter in their concreteness and precisely because of it are effective by the power of the inalienable gift of the Spirit to the Church, and are not begotten in the experiments and researches of speculative theology. But Christians can pave the way for this gift of grace in the Church in that they can be patient and hold firm throughout the present situation without indulging in self will either by becoming reactionaries on the one hand, or by embarking upon any destructive quests for novelty on the other, and in that they can seek to achieve further progress in this situation wherever possibilities arise for them to do so.

I. THE EXPERIENCE OF GOD AS INCOMPREHENSIBLE

The primary and essential factor, and one which must play a decisive role in the Christian living of the future also, is one's direct personal relationship with God. This is a truism, for it merely points out that which constitutes the immutable essence of Christian living.[6] And yet today this point is far from being self-evident. We live in an age which speaks of God as remote and silent, which – and this applies even to the theological ideas put forward by Christians – speaks of the 'death of God'; in an age of atheism, and an atheism which, so far from being confined to the ideas to which evil and godless dispositions and rebellious attitudes might be expected to give rise, can also be the outcome of a wrong interpretation of [12] a human experience which is at once extremely genuine and extremely difficult.[7] We live in an age in which man actively manipulates the world and himself in which the world, from being thought of in concrete terms as subject to the control of heavenly powers, becomes the object of rational research and a quarry of arid facts from which man draws his materials for the construction of that world which he plans according to his own image and likeness, and where there seems to be room for wonder only where man himself is absent from the scene.[8] We live in a world in which man has made even his own interior life the subject of technical scientific investigation; a world in which he analyses himself and in which it is by no means a foregone conclusion that among the factors arising from this analysis he will discover anything approximating to 'God'; a world, on the contrary, in which the suspicion is never absent from his mind that his religious experience may be unmasked as an outmoded and erroneous interpretation of psychological drives, needs and processes which can and must be [6] cf. in greater detail the studies referred to in this chapter, Note 4 (with further bibliography).

[7] For a precise understanding of this experience cf. 'Science as a "Confession"?' Theological Investigations III, pp. 385-400; H. U. von Balthasar, Die Gottesfrage des heutigen Menschen (Vienna. 1956).
[8] For a clearer analysis of this situation, and for a theological interpretation which is in conformity with this cf. Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1, pp. 178-276, esp. pp. 214 ff., 242 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

explained and brought under control by quite different means than through a mythical and indefinable entity called 'God'.[9] We live in fact in an age in which, so it appears, 'God' (or what is understood by this term) can no longer be used in order to 'stop the gaps' which we discover in the inadequacies of our existence. We receive the impression, rather, that either we ourselves must stop these gaps or that they must remain unstopped. At any rate they cannot be stopped with the idea of God. It follows that intercessory prayer has become an extremely questionable procedure. We live in an age in which the question is not so much how as sinners we may gain access to a gracious God who will justify us; on the contrary the impression is that it is God – if there is a God – who must justify himself to his creatures in their distress, while they for their part have no need of justification. We live in an age which becomes suspicious when in answer to its questions an 'other-worldly' dimension is pointed to, in which everything is reduced to clarity and order. In such a world it is certainly far from immediately obvious that [13] one should be devout in the Christian sense – the more so since the idea formerly accepted as axiomatic by the community as a whole, namely that one can and must be this, no longer exists even though ninety per cent of the children in our society still receive religious instruction.

What is obvious is that in the face of a practical, or even a theoretically worked-out or positively militant atheism the real and basic question at issue, namely the question of God, cannot be treated of here and now. This would be to go altogether beyond the limits and possibilities of so brief a consideration as this.[10] All that can be attempted is to make some few observations on the actual problem of living a Christian life in this situation. First it is obvious that in this situation Christian living must of necessity be on a modest and inconspicuous scale, and indeed that this is as it should be. For us Christians this situation is not of our own seeking. But it simply rules out for us the luxury of any elaborate systems of devotion such as were possible in the old days. Today anyone who manages to live with this incomprehensible and silent God is already practising devout Christian living. One who finds courage to call upon him ever anew, to speak to him in a spirit of faith, trust and patience in his darkness, even though to all appearances no answer is returned except the hollow echo of his own voice – such a one as this is already a devout Christian. If a man, repeatedly empties himself of all else so as to open himself to the depths of his being to the incomprehensibility of God, then, even though he seems again and again to become blocked up with direct experiences of the world in its palpable reality, the tasks with which it presents him and the needs which it demands that he supplies by his own efforts, as well as the beauty and glory of the world still unfolding before him – if he still manages to live with God and commune with him in spite of this and without the support of 'public opinion' and custom, then he is already a devout Christian. Finally if he accepts this task as the responsibility of his life, and fulfils it constantly and unremittingly in his acts, and not merely in response to sporadic religious impulses, then he is a Christian, and a devout one today. Obviously he will participate to a reasonable extent in the liturgical and sacramental practices of the Church (and also have a real understanding of their significance), especially today, when it is once more being realised that man is no isolated individual; but [14] he will have quietly to define for himself where the real and supreme task of his religious life lies, a task which more than ever today is quite inalienable. If he is to achieve this then, in this wintry season, the tree of his devotion cannot be expected to bear such an abundance of leaves and blooms in the form of the various devotions and pious practices of the past. He will apply himself to the fundamental realities and truths of the Christian faith, and can count upon his fides implicita to cover many

[9] A full discussion of the ideological attitude of suspicion towards Christian living is to be found in Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/2, pp. 109-202.
[10] More in detail on this in the author's article (published in the periodical Concilium III (1967), Vol 3, March. cf. also the other contributions to this volume).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

other secondary truths, derived from these, which he does not call in question. Corresponding to this fides implicita he also has a certain pietas implicita to fall back upon, without actually filling his mind and heart with the luxuriant growth of Christian devotions of earlier ages. Then the centre of live religious interest was not the incomprehensibility of God and his effective presence in the crucified one, the one abandoned by God, but rather devotion to the Blessed Sacrament – this was particularly developed – veneration of the precious Blood, the Immaculate Conception, the gaining of indulgences etc.

Now it must be admitted that if we are to have the courage to enter upon a direct relationship with God in his ineffability, to accept that our devotion must, in this sense, be cut down to the bare essentials and to accept, furthermore, the silent self-bestowal of God as the true mystery of our own existence, then we do need to do something more than merely to take up a given rational attitude to the speculative problems of the divine, and to respond in merely doctrinal terms to the teaching of Christianity. We do need to work out a certain theology of mysticism, a mysticism that leads to a religious experience which indeed many suppose that they could never discover in themselves, a theology of mysticism which can be imparted in such a way that each one can become his own teacher of mysticism. So long as we fail to realise the manifest fact of how inescapably our existence, in all its self-consciousness and self-responsibility, is orientated towards the absolute mystery which we call 'God' and which bestows itself upon us, we have not even begun to understand so much as' the rudiments of this mystical theology. This approach to mysticism must rid man of his anxiety (angst) in the face of attack, so that the only thing that makes him tremble is the designs engendered in him by his own longing to launch himself upon the immensity of empty nothingness when he begins to call upon God and to give him, the ineffable, a name.[11]

[15] Simply in order to make it clear what is meant here, and in the consciousness that the concept of 'mysticism' is a loaded one (rightly understood it is not the opposite of belief in the Holy Pneuma but rather identical with it) it could be said: the devout Christian of the future will either be a 'mystic', one who has 'experienced' something, or he will cease to be anything at all. For devout Christian living as practised in the future will no longer be sustained and helped by the unanimous, manifest and public convictions and religious customs of all, summoning each one from the outset to a personal experience and a personal decision. For this reason, therefore, the usual religious education as practised hitherto can only provide a very secondary kind of formation or preparation for the institutional element in the religion of the future. The mystical approach of which we are speaking must impart the correct 'image of God', based upon the accepted experience of man's basic orientation to God, the experience that the basis of man's existence is the abyss: that God is essentially the inconceivable; that his inconceivability grows, and yet does not derogate from the fact that the more rightly God is understood the more nearly does his self-bestowing love touch us; the experience that in mapping the course of one's life one can never confine God to specific points in it without being brought up against the fact that when one does so the sum fails to come out right; the experience that he only becomes our 'happiness' when we pray to him and love him unconditionally; but also the fact that he cannot be defined as a dialectical negation of the affirmative 'thrown up' by our experiences, for instance that he is not simply the one who is remote as opposed to one who is near, not to be thought of as the diametrical antithesis to the world, but rather that he transcends such oppositions. Our basic orientation to him is more primary, then, and prior to all such dialectical opposites, and this has the effect that he wills to be and is 'our' God in an act of absolute self-bestowal and grace as he who is 'so and not otherwise', without becoming involved in the complexities of our dialectic.

[11] On the mystical approach to religious experience cf. the article referred to in this chapter, note 10; Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1, pp. 269 ff. (Bibliog.).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The mystical approach of which we have been speaking must teach us in the concrete to maintain a constant closeness to this God; to say 'thou' to him, to commit ourselves to his silence and darkness, not to be anxious lest we may lose him by the very fact of calling him by a name, as though he cannot, if he wills (as in fact he has willed) also enter into our eternal duality precisely because he does not constitute one element among others in our scheme of things. It must teach us that he does not belong to any [16] specific place in our scheme of things (e.g. only 'outside'). Such an essentially Christian approach to mysticism must, of course, also take cognisance of the place which Jesus of Nazareth, the crucified and risen one, must occupy in it.[12]

For such a relationship to God theology must work out a fresh understanding and a practice of intercessory prayer corresponding to it, and so far it has not done enough in this direction. Perhaps it might be said that the particular task which man himself has to perform, or the particular fate which he has courageously to accept as inescapable does not as such need to be the direct subject of petition on his part, whereas on the other hand it is only in prayer that man can accept himself as a whole, and thereby all the particular aspects of his life. It follows from this that petitionary prayer in the concrete can only avoid being a 'troubling of the gods', and be really prayer to God when it consists in that opening of the heart so as to respond to the inconceivability of God as love in which alone one is always heard. Only that petition which is truly sure of being heard is petitionary prayer at all.[13]

2. LIFE IN THE WORLD AND SERVICE OF THE WORLD CONSIDERED AS PERTAINING TO RELIGION

The practitioner of active Christian living in the future will have to recognise as an integral element in his Christian living the factor of the fully free and the fully human. This is, of course, an obvious and axiomatic element in the Christian understanding of life, yet it is one which is still very far from being sufficiently brought out: namely that there is an intrinsic plurality in man's nature, a plurality such that he must not for one moment attempt to impose unity upon it, or produce an integral synthesis [17] of it by his own powers; that he has to accept this plurality of his own being patiently, whole-heartedly and without struggling against it, recognising that God penetrates with his grace even into those regions where no altar has been raised to him.[14] If we accept the teaching of Vatican II to the effect that God himself can still be the salvation of one who, in all honesty, and therefore in all innocence, believes that he must be an atheist,[15] then it is also true that in the life of the Christian too he can still be present wherever life in the world is lived joyfully, eagerly, earnestly and bravely even without any explicit reference to religion. Here lies the true meaning of that term which is so often misunderstood, 'the religion of the world'. The underlying conception is that this world is presented as an opportunity and a task because God wills it precisely in its worldliness and [12] It is only if we include this dimension, which is missing here, that we can arrive at the depths of the Christian message in the true sense. Inasmuch as this aspect cannot be worked out here a whole series of points which are important and indispensable for establishing the Christian devotion of the future are missing from this attempted outline. For the more speculative aspects the author may refer to his article 'Theologie und Anthropologie' (which appeared in the Festschrift für M. Schmaus, (Verlag Schöningh, 1967). Indications of a more practical kind are to be found chiefly in Betrachtungen zum ignatianischen Exerzitienbuch, (Munich, 1965). Further aspects of the christological basis for Christian devotion are to be found in this volume pp. 152 ff.

[13] For a more detailed treatment of this cf. Von der Not und dem Segen des Gebetes (Freiburg, 6th ed., 1965), pp. 76-92.

[14] On the anthropological basis for this cf. Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1, 22 ff.

[15] The study referred to, this chapter note 10, provides an analysis of the relevant texts of the Council.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

as a world made by man himself, and because he has let it grow immeasurably in breadth compared with the worlds of earlier ages and, in spite of all its ills, has also let it become more glorious. It is no longer true that the world as human begins only (or almost only) at the point at which man makes it explicitly human in forms of communal worship, and religious poetry, or in ascribing an explicitly religious meaning to it and using it in explicitly religious ways. Wherever secular life is lived with unreserved honesty there ipso facto an essential element in religious life is already present because God loves the world in itself, endows it with grace in itself and in no sense regards it as a rival to himself as though he were envious of it.[16] He who responds to the world with genuine love ipso facto encounters in it the Cross of Christ and the inconceivability of God. He has no need whatever to conjure them up first in order for them to be present there. If he practises the virtues of the world, suffers himself to be educated by it in joyfulness, courage, devotion to duty and love, then ipso facto he is actively practising a vital element in genuine religion in his life and such worldly virtues will one day open to him the innermost mystery which they contain, namely God himself.[17] That in man which is really of value and fundamentally alive is already Summoned to receive the grace of Christ even before it is explicitly [18] 'baptised'. Indeed, provided the Christian does not close his heart to God there is actually no need for it to be so explicitly 'baptised' always and in every case. Because this is by no means always possible, and because the Christian is not the achiever of his own integrity, one who at basis is willing only to play the part of God himself. God alone remains the one true unity in the plurality which is in man.

A further aspect of 'the religion of the world' in the true sense follows as a direct consequence from this. Responsible action in the world is itself an element in active Christian living. What significance could the endeavours of the so-called 'secular institutes' have if they were only auxiliaries dressed up in more or less modern uniform to assist the clergy in their task? If secular activity as a task and as a deed did not already have a place in their lives even before it achieved an explicitly religious inspiration and was integrated into their religion? Nowadays man does not simply find himself living in a world that is already given; rather he himself makes his world. Thereby he incurs opportunities, tasks, responsibilities and dangers which formerly simply were not there.[18] The active Christian living of the future, therefore, will be practised on this plane also – and not simply in the quiet corners of those who, because they are rich, can manage to live far from this world of work and of the humanisation of the world, practising the piety of Philothea, or else who, as the proletarian poor, have not yet been admitted as responsible contributors to the formation of the world as it evolves. Certainly making some new discovery in physics or flying in space like Gagarin does not ipso facto make one a man who loves God. But neither will the genuine religion of the future begin only where all that leaves off. Vatican II exhorts Christians to consider their task in the world of today, to co-operate with all in the construction of a greater freer world, one more worthy of mankind, to take the responsibility and to have the spirit not merely to depend upon the moral directives of the official Church, not merely to ask how man should act in a given case in order to avoid offending God, but to ask what man can do in order to make life more worth living.[19] Now in directing [19] these exhortations to Christians the [16] The author describes certain concrete manifestations of the 'religion of the world as understood here in Alltägliche Dinge (Einsiedeln, 6th ed. 1966).

[17] Examples of such virtues are to be found in this volume, pp. 229-293.
[18] On this new situation cf. 'Experiment Mensch', Die Frage nach dem Menschen. Festschrift für Max Müller, (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 45-69.
[19] The fact that the Council too makes demands of this sort upon Christians in their lives is shown in particular by the pastoral constitution 'On the Church in the Modern World'. On this cf. the author's article, 'Zur theologischen Problematik einer "Pastoralkonstitution" (which appeared in the Festschrift für J. Höfer, R. Baumer and H, Dolch edd., (Freiburg, 1967)).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Church is not betraying her message of the Cross, of humility and desire for the eternal in order to adapt it to a world which has become emancipated from religion. Rather she enjoins upon believers to bring their Christianity to bear upon their task, a task which did not exist in this form in earlier times,[20] but which does present itself now and, moreover, for the Christian as such, and therefore as a true part of his religion, though admittedly in this, as in all other spheres each one must act according to his own gifts and calling, and perform his own task and not that of another. The Christian cannot simply dismiss politics as a 'dirty business', and expect God to give this 'dirty business' to others to carry out and not to him, so that he himself can pursue his own quiet devotions in the comfort of the petit-bourgeois. The world as developing and unfolding, as a 'worldly world' operated by man lays claims upon the Christian today, and the fulfilment of these claims in what might be called a 'political' form of religion is today or tomorrow an integral element in genuine Christian living.[21]

3. THE NEW ASCETICISM: IMPOSING ONE'S OWN LIMITS

Among many other aspects of the Christian living of tomorrow which we might also take into consideration, and which are certainly also necessary, a third one has still to be mentioned: the fact that there must be a radical change in the forms of asceticism that are practised. In earlier times certain limits were imposed upon man in his activities to a large extent by the sheer force of external circumstances, by the situation in which he lived. His faults swiftly brought their own retribution and exacted their own revenge. The majority of men at least led lives that were brief and hedged about with dangers, and in which there was little or no opportunity for luxury, caprice, free time, travel, enjoyment etc. Christian asceticism, therefore, consisted in the patient acceptance of the poverty and toil in one's life which this implied, or in additional ascetical practices which were to some extent imposed from without as e.g. in monasticism, but far less in a positive summons to a form of asceticism [20] which was the outcome of life itself and of the actual daily circumstances in which it was lived. Under these circumstances asceticism – if it was undertaken over and above such hardships as have been mentioned – acquired the 'image' of something extraordinary and heroic. In this way Christian asceticism consisted in passive endurance[22] or else supplementary, extraordinary measures. Today man, who to a large extent has gained control over nature by his technical achievements in the sphere of medicine and all other fields of technical mastery, has to an ever-increasing extent the ability to play the part which perhaps, in virtue of his true nature, he should play.[23] He can live without restraint and still avoid incurring thereby any of those disadvantages which used to ensue as a natural consequence upon such a course. Sexual excesses are no longer 'punished' by children or by disease. The misuse of power no longer brings about its own downfall so swiftly as formerly, when a king who was immoderate in the exercise of his authority quickly incurred a tyrant's death at the hands of some assassin. The idle are no longer brought to heel under the stimulus of hunger. Medicine today rather helps than restrains the quest for enjoyment. Moderation is no longer imposed from without.

---

[20] On the concrete tasks which the Christian has to perform in the world cf. in extenso, Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/2, pp.40 ff.; 42 ff.; 148-175 (with numerous further references); 208-228; 236 ff.; 243 f.; 248 ff.; 258 ff.; 262 ff.

[21] For the justification in theory of the basic ideas put forward here cf. K. Rahner, Christlicher Humanismus', Orientierung, 31.5.1966; J. B. Metz, Verantwortung und Hoffnung (Mainz, 1966).

[22] On the true significance, theologically speaking, of such traditional asceticism cf. 'The Passion and Asceticism', Theological Investigations III, pp. 58-85.

[23] On the difficulty of this question cf. the study referred to in Note 22, especially pp. 56 ff. and, on the ascetical aspects, pp. 65-68.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Man must practise it of his own free will. And thus a new way of practising Christian asceticism is opened up, one which, precisely because it proceeds 'prudently' is not so manifestly heroic or spectacular as the asceticism of former times, which took more active forms. The ascetical practices of those former days had the character of that which is extra and out of the ordinary. But today ascetical practices have rather the character of freely fulfilling one's responsibilities in the performance of one's duty. Yet this is almost more difficult than the former kind precisely because it must necessarily appear in the guise of that which is manifestly the 'prudent' course.[24]

This 'asceticism in the consumer society' (which, however, applies to [21] all areas of life) is difficult.[25] At basis, and as applied to the generality of men (we are not thinking here of those individuals in whom a certain weakness of the acquisitive instincts goes some way towards lightening the burden of taking their own decisions and renders them immune to the claims of an acquisitive society with its suggestions of new needs) it will be achieved only by one who is open to God, and therefore can undertake in all sincerity a renunciation.[26] which seems to be unattainable to the man who is weighed down by anxiety in the face of death. Certainly God and the state of being open to God are far from rendering one psychologically immune to pain, ideas which can be exploited in order to facilitate the asceticism so necessary in a consumer society. To think of them and to attempt to apply them in this sense would be ipso facto to negate them. Only where God is loved for his own sake does he also become a source of blessing. Only where an individual is open to the absolute future of God[27] will he also overcome the tendency to immoderate greed, to fill his life with the greatest possible enjoyment (taking this to include power also), and so ultimately to destroy himself by sheer excess.[28] And conversely: when man observes that moderation which is appropriate to his nature genuinely without any thought of reward then he is already in a mysterious sense giving his assent to God and to his absolute future even when he does not realise this.

Such is the new asceticism appropriate to the practice of Christian living in the future. It can be the new way of putting into practice that more fundamental mystery of Christian asceticism which consists in sharing in the death of Christ on the Cross, and which is offered to us because today too life still continues mysteriously to be the Passion. Today, in contrast to earlier times, this self-imposed moderation is to a large extent no longer capable of being crystallised into a general [22] institution. But for all that it must not remain at the level of theory an abstract commandment. It must assume a form in which it can be effective in the concrete and can provide a practical pattern of living and, from being morality in the abstract, must precisely become 'morals' in the concrete 'ethics' and good habit.[29] This again

---

[24] Such prudence or reasonableness must not be understood to be 'obvious' in the sense that it is dictated by a prior rule of 'nature' which applies always and in all circumstances (theologically speaking in the sense of 'nature pura'). For this applies in any case to all exercises of the human reason throughout the world in virtue of the constant vulnerability of human nature. It applies even to the baptized ('Concupiscence'). Hence the theological concepts of prudence and freedom must bethought out afresh.

[25] A comprehensive analysis of the 'consumer society' and its background is to be found, with bibliography, in the Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/2, pp. 130 ff.; 175ff.

[26] On this cf. 'Reflections on the Theology of Renunciation', Theological Investigations III, pp. 47-57, and also, in greater detail, 'The Theology of Poverty' in this volume, Part B, pp. 168-214.

[27] On this concept, and on the manner in which it gives the lie to all ideologies which promise a future utopia in this world cf. Theological Investigations VI, pp. 59-60, and also this volume, pp. 49 ff. and the article referred to in Note 22, especially pp. 62 ff.

[28] On the anthropological basis for this cf. Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1, pp. 34 ff.

[29] A task which still remains to be accomplished by the philosophy and theology of the future is to define the new form which such habits must assume in existential and ontological terms (cf. e.g. the works of G. Funke), so that this category, so important yet, precisely in contemporary thought, so misunderstood, of the 'habitus' of classic theology, may be made available to the theology of Christian living.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

is a major task for those secular institutes whose members genuinely do continue to live in the world: to provide examples which show how even in the contemporary setting it is possible to live a life that is moderate, self-disciplined and pure, in which one rises above that state of doubt and anxiety about death at the bottom of one's heart which makes one acquisitive and so, in the last analysis, unready also to take selflessly upon one's self genuine responsibility for the good of others in a practical and down-to-earth way, and in doing this silently and cheerfully to endure renunciations. In so acting the members of such secular institutes must be genuine, uncompromising, gentle and at the same time strict with themselves.

A few concluding observations still remain to be added. The impression may, perhaps, have been given, that it has not been made altogether clear precisely how all these factors and rules for the new kind of Christian living can be assembled into a unity. A further point also requires clarification. We might have entered still more deeply into the question of how the old and the new could be fitted together in the concrete in the unity of these devout Christian living of tomorrow; how in this Christian living the heritage of former times could be preserved a harmonised with the new forms of devotion; how mystical experience of God could be harmonised with humanist activities in the world. We could have given a still better idea of the ultimate and underlying unity of these factors.[30] But even then the full synthesis of all these factors in the concrete would still remain a prime problem and a task which is to be achieved only in living practice, and not by means of theological theorising. [23] Living practice itself when undertaken in patience, in a quest which is constantly renewed, in self-critical 'discernment of spirits' always remains the gift of the Spirit to the individual and to the Church. Above all patience is necessary because it must always sustain us in times of transition from that which was formerly accepted and approved but has now become out of date to that which is new and still has to gain approval. Patience will preserve us from any premature reactions in this situation. For these represent a danger to conservatives and progressives alike, each in their own way. As an irreducible amalgam of many factors life in the truest sense and rightly understood always entails compromise.[31] But this takes place on the historical plane and is not capable of being worked out in theory beforehand in any adequate way. For this it is necessary to have patience, courage and trust in the incalculable wisdom of life, and above all in God.

In the future there will be many forms of Christian living. The fact that in spite of the development of mass societies man can develop many more and more varied ways of living than formerly even in the worldly sphere – this fact alone is of itself sufficient to make this true.[32] In former times, in spite of all differences the mode of Christian living adopted by those Christians of central Europe who sought earnestly to practise their faith was relatively homogenous. This appears, for instance, in the styles adopted in the orders of tertiaries, Marian confraternities etc. It is also clearly illustrated by the fact that the prescriptions of canon law for the spiritual life of the secular clergy are uniform almost down to the smallest detail. The range of variations in the modes of Christian living of the future will be greater than these, and this is as it should be. It is important to have a full and clear realisation of this situation. Otherwise, as so often happened in the past, it will be falsely suggested that the many Christians who deviate from the normal and average way of practising this Christian [30] Special reference must be made at this point to the works of W. Dirks: 'Wandlungen der Frömmigkeit', Weltverständnis und Glauben, J. B. Metz, J. Splett edd. (Mainz, 1965), pp. 254-264; 'Vernunft und Heiligkeit', Integritas, B. Stolte, R. Wisser edd. (Tübingen, 1966), pp. 294-305. Many suggestive points are also raised by H. J. Schultz, Frömmigkeit in einer weltlichen Welt (Stuttgart, 1959).

[31] This word must not be understood here in a bad sense. The very fact that the manifold factors in man's own nature cannot adequately be harmonised is in itself enough to demonstrate this point.

[32] cf. Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1, pp. 206 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

living are in bad conscience, and that all is not well with their way of life as Christians and members of the Church. The young Christians of today must quietly develop a new way of Christian living and demand the right to practise it in the Church. If it leads to charity, joy, peace, patience, kindness, self-discipline and other manifestations of the presence of the [24] Spirit one can only say with Paul (Gal 5:23): 'Against such there is no law'. Not even the law of the Church.[33]

Finally one cannot divide the old and new elements in Christian living into different compartments because the new is genuine only when it preserves the old, and because the old only remains living when it is lived anew. In the old and in the new, however, one element must be the same which survives yesterday, today and for ever, and of which we have not been able to speak nearly enough: God the incomprehensible source of life's blessing, the mystery of the crucified and risen Christ, the blessing which extends its holiness in and through all the monotony of everyday life, the hope for that eternal life which consists in the unveiling of God in his incomprehensibility. Where this is present and living there is a Christian, and that Christian is living his faith. This is true of the future also.

[33] As a further small example of such new attempts cf. the songs of Père Duval, and on these the author's article, 'Ein kleines Lied', Glaube der die Erde liebt (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 157 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[25]

2

BEING OPEN TO GOD AS EVER GREATER

On the Significance of the Aphorism 'Ad Majorem Dei Gloriam'

It is well known that the saying 'Ad Majorem Dei Gloriam', 'To the Greater Glory of God' is the motto of St Ignatius, of the Society of Jesus and of its constitutions.[1] It is also well known that it is roughly the equivalent of that 'more' or 'greater service and praise' (of God or of Christ) etc. referred to both in the Constitutions and in the Exercises.[2] Again and again it is taken as the maxim which gives expression to the very nature of the Jesuits, their Order and their spirituality.[3] In truth this maxim constitutes a very obscure saying. It is reasonable, therefore, to offer certain observations concerning it. They touch upon a question which is basic to Christian life as a whole.

No attempt can be made here to present an historical background to our question. Instead something must first be said concerning the deficiencies of this saying, and this by way of an introduction to our considerations. This will lead on secondly to certain preliminary observations. Thirdly we must indicate the context in terms of the history of spirituality against which this saying must be viewed. Fourthly we shall have to treat of the [26] meaning expressed in this saying, and fifthly of certain dangers entailed in an attitude such as that expressed in this saying.

I

Let us as Christians examine this saying more closely. The moment we do so it seems wholly unsuitable to express what is distinctive and characteristic of one particular order. First, as might be said by way of objection, it is quite clear that a maxim such as this is binding upon every saint and every Christian. There is no such thing as a saint who neither practises nor intends to practise heroic virtue. But included in the very notion of heroic virtue is the idea that the individual concerned wills to do what is better, and what is better in an heroic degree. In other words the decision to do all for the greater honour of God seems capable of expressing only something which must apply to everyone who strives for sanctity. Furthermore every Christian is actually bound to strive for sanctity in this sense, a fact which has only recently been reiterated by the Second Vatican Council (Constitution on the Church, C.5). For according to the teaching of the gospel every man must love God with his whole heart and his whole strength. Perhaps he does not do this yet; perhaps he has not yet succeeded in the concrete in drawing his whole being, his whole resources, his whole life and his whole effort together in one total act of love for God, but in the last analysis he would be

[1] The expression occurs in this or a similar form 376 times in the regulations of the order written by Ignatius.

[2] On the meaning of this 'magis' in the Exercises cf. K. Rahner, Betrachtungen zum Ignatianischen Exerzitienbuch, (Munich, 1965), pp. 27 ff.

[3] In fact, however, the motto of the Benedictines, 'Ut in omnibus glorificetur Deus' (cf. 1 Pet 4:16) has materially the same meaning, unless it be objected that in this case no special value is attached to the major gloria, the greater honour. The motto of the Friars Minor runs: 'Ad Majorem Dei Resurgentis Gloriam' ('To the Greater Honour of God [Christ] in the Resurrection', in memory of the birthday of this order on the first Sunday after Easter 1589). It is known that for Calvin too, a contemporary of Ignatius, God's 'fame' and 'honour' is the prime motive for God's actions, and therefore must be so for the actions of all Christians too (cf. Corpus Reformatorum, Braunschweig, 1863-1900, XXXVI, 294). Hence the motto 'Soli Deo Gloria' appears over many reformed churches. cf. also A. Favre-Dorsatz, Calvin et Loyola (Paris-Brussels, 1951), pp. 20 f.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

sinning mortally if he deliberately decided to refuse to give God a greater love than he has so far managed to achieve. Perhaps in some particular case or other he can refrain from taking the better course without sinning, or at least without sinning gravely, perhaps only thereby committing an imperfection or a sin of omission, even though he sees what is the better course and is capable of taking it. But he can only act in this way because this neglect in the here and now does not constitute any absolute decision concerning his basic attitude.[4] For the total integration of one's whole life, with all its powers, in perfect love of God is far from demanding, as a matter of absolute necessity, that precisely here and now we must always take the better course, and for this reason, precisely here and now, we can take the course that is less good. But if anyone were to decide to adopt this attitude, which he has taken up in some concrete individual case and at a particular [27] point in space and time in his life for the fundamental attitude that governs his whole life he would be sinning gravely. In other words, according to the gospel the spirit of the Sermon on the Mount demands as a matter of absolute duty and under pain of grave sin that every Christian shall strive after a greater perfection than that which he has already attained in the concrete circumstances of his life. Man is par excellence the being which is in fieri, the being which, in virtue of its very nature (in virtue of nature and grace alike), is bound to keep itself in openness to an ever-greater future. And from this point of view the maxim of St Ignatius and his order seems to be totally incapable of providing any meaning which precisely for the spirit of his own foundation and for himself can be regarded as a distinguishing characteristic.

One can regard the inadequacy of this saying from another viewpoint also. If one is honest and makes no claim to asceticism, if for instance one rids one's self of the habit of speaking so facilely in 'devout' circles of sanctity, striving for perfection and willing to take the better course, then one can only be profoundly shocked at a saying such as this one, concerning the 'major Dei gloria'! For is man not the lowest of creatures and the sinner among them? But if he is both of these can he then exist for the greater honour of God in any true sense?

But there is still more. In the theological treatise 'De Deo Uno', 'On God the One', we are taught that man cannot say that God has created the best of all possible worlds. Therefore he is far from willing his own greater glory at all times and in all cases. If one may so express it he is one who is thoroughly 'realistic and down-to-earth', one who wills sometimes one thing and sometimes another, who views it in all its finite limitations and accepts it for what it is – so finite as it actually is, so easy as it would be to improve upon.

A further point which must be made is that from the biblical aspect the honour of God for which we must work is first and foremost the revelation of the 'glory' ('doxa') of God to us. As creatures we are essentially those who have to receive the deed of God upon us, the deed of his compassion, his self-bestowal. Now if we are indeed those who must receive the deed of God upon us, and if God is he who creates that which is finite and limited, that which falls short of his divine omnipotence, what then can it really mean to say that we must do all for the greater honour of God? What does this saying mean if in the last analysis we have always to recognise that we are sinners, those therefore who essentially fall short [28] of the possibility of honouring God which God himself offers us? What, in that case, can this saying concerning the greater honour of God really be intended to signify?

It might even be said that this saying is typical of the new age, inspired by the spirit of the renaissance. It seems to be the saying of a man who feels himself to be the perfector of the world, and in this awareness purposes to usher in the kingdom of God and thereby give God honour. In Calvin too we meet this fervour to set up the kingdom of God upon earth, the fervour which aims at a spiritual conquest of the world. Have not many great Christians of [4] On this conception cf. recently H. Reiners, Grundintention und sittliches Tun, Quaestiones Disputatae 30, (Freiburg, 1966).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this age felt themselves called to bring about the greater glory of God in the world – that, in other words, which was not there before, that which is unprecedently great, that which is audacious that which puts all previous possibilities in the shade? Now when Ignatius adds to this that he intends that all that he does shall be done to God's glory this does not of itself entail any fundamental difference in this basic attitude. But does he not feel himself to be the one who has it in his power to bring about in person this greater glory of God? If against this view the objection is raised that as Christians we are obviously aware that this ability to achieve the greater is still itself a gift of God, then the question immediately arises: If this consciousness of having received the power to achieve the glory of God is really alive in us can we then really speak so facilely, so boldly, with such conviction of our own powers to do something for the greater glory of God, or should we not rather say with the psalmist that God himself must take steps to ensure at least that his name is not dishonoured in the world through us?

The ardent conviction that one is as it were, the representative of God, who defends, maintains and increases the glory of God in the world is in fact to a certain extent an attitude of mind that belongs to the new age, and is therefore conditioned by it. But if one reflects upon the 'end of the new age', as it has been called, then one is compelled to say that this world into which the man of the new age has entered as creator and perfector has in the meantime grown cruelly profane. It is a worldly world, one which, however much it may throw man into relief, does not so clearly reveal God and his doxa; a world which has been made by man for his own greater glory. But to speak truly one experiences all that man is capable of doing in the world either as profane or at least as ambiguous. We no longer find it so easy as the men of former centuries to recognise precisely what is in fact 'more' to the glory of God. For this God whom we have to [29] honour in this world is still he who is inconceivably transcendent over all that exists, all that we experience and can do. The result is that to us of the present day all that we can offer God by way of his external glory in the world seems to be so immeasurably beneath God himself, so ambiguous, so insignificant that it does not (or would not) come in the least easy to us to say: 'What I now undertake is for the greater glory of God'. Left to ourselves we would be inclined to say, rather: 'We hope that at any rate it has something to do with God!'

From various aspects, therefore, this aphorism 'Ad Majorem Dei Gloriam' is far from being as self-evident as perhaps it may seem to the devout man with his traditional stock of phrases.

Now before proceeding any further and coming to consider the meaning of this saying certain further preliminary observations remain to be made.

II

Every attitude, every idea, every distinctive form of spirituality in the Church emerges from a particular situation and is conditioned by the circumstances of a particular epoch. The situation itself does not remain, but this idea or attitude can survive and continue. The situation in which it emerged is historically conditioned, but what emerges in this situation, so far as the Church of God is concerned, and the life of the Church of God in the true sense, is not something which simply vanishes with this situation. It would be foolish to refuse to recognise those elements which are appropriate only to the particular epoch, the historical context in which this saying, 'Ad Majorem Dei Gloriam' emerged precisely in its existing form so as to become, as it were, the beacon or the motto which sums up the spirit of the Society of Jesus. But this should by no means be taken to imply that this spirit must once more disappear. The birth of the Franciscan movement was conditioned by the cultural, and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

indeed by the economic circumstances prevailing at a particular point in history, those namely in which the city first emerged as a distinctive cultural environment. Monasticism as such arose from certain cultural and, in fact, economic circumstances prevailing in Egypt at the time, which are quite distinctive and well defined. Again, if we consider the institution of the papacy, the definition of its infallibility is rooted in a particular situation in the cultural history of the 19th century, that namely in which the idea of monarchy was emphasised in reaction against the liberal and [30] pseudo-democratic ideas which were threatening to destroy it at the time. Without this atmosphere, without this basis in a specific situation no movement would have emerged even in the Church. Jesus himself in his teaching, directly from heaven though this came, spoke precisely in and from the particular situation with which he found himself confronted. So true is this, indeed, that we have, as it were, to look closely in order to realise that ultimately something which is in fact radically new has emerged at all from the situation. In view of these considerations it can be said that we must look into and evaluate impartially the particular historical context of such circumstances, in which movements have emerged within the Church, and must yet be convinced that something has been born here which is not subject to the conditions of time in the same sense as our other movements and fashions belonging to particular epochs, which do arise only to disappear once more. Much that arises in the Church has come to stay. It is taken up and destined never more to be relinquished. It becomes more developed, more explicit and finally arrives at a stage of development and explicitation at which it can never more be forgotten. What is taking place here is exactly what takes place when, for instance, a definition is produced of infallible teaching authority, whether by the pope or by a Council. Such a definition has its own particular ‘kairos’, its appropriate point in time, that point at which alone it could have emerged, a situation which once more disappears, whereas that which has arisen as a result of it still remains as a vital factor in the life of the Church. This does not, of course, mean that what has once arisen in this manner remains always and in all circumstances the ‘last word’ on the subject, the ultimate point of development which must necessarily stand as far as possible in the forefront of the Church’s conscious faith and life. The definition of the Assumption is only a few years old. Of course it is a dogma and continues to be such, and, moreover, will always be taught as such. Yet already at this stage how little lasting or effective impact it has! This is a real factor. There will always be such withdrawals into the background of factors which were once more ‘actual’ in the life of the Church.

To this first preliminary observation a second must be added, necessary if we are correctly to evaluate the maxim concerning the greater glory of God precisely as the watchword of a particular order. If we take a cross-section of the members of any organised society we shall find that only in a very restricted sense do they realise the distinctive aims and spirit of that society. Quite in the abstract and in general it can be said that it is not in [31] the least necessary for any one individual member of a great community always and in all circumstances to be representative of the distinctive spirit of that community. To demand this would be mere childish pseudo-idealism, which, in its ultimate implications, would be ridiculous. This in turn implies that we are not contesting the interpretation of a maxim which expresses that which is typical in the spirit of the Society of Jesus by saying: ‘If this interpretation were correct, then Fr so-and-so or brother so-and-so would have to be quite different. But since he is a good Jesuit, and since the life he leads and the work he does in the order is wholly correct, and since his spiritual life is such that he “dies in the Lord”, it follows that this interpretation cannot be correct.’ Such a line of argument would be false. For there is no need whatever for every member of an order to express in his manner of life what is distinctive and typical of his order in a particularly outstanding degree. It is necessary to emphasise this point so strongly (although strictly speaking it is obvious) because if we do not have a clear realisation of this principle we might, for instance, be able to object to a particular interpretation of the words and maxims of St Ignatius by saying: 'This has never yet been entertained by such-and-such or such-and-such a particular devout and praiseworthy Jesuit; therefore this interpretation cannot be correct'. This line of argument is false. There are a thousand matters in the Exercises which might be worked out theologically, which are authentic ideas of St Ignatius himself, yet which have passed quite unnoticed by individual Jesuits, who have never realised their significance. Moreover, this is far from being a bad thing. The individual as an individual has no need whatever to bring to fruition in his own life and in an especially representative manner what is basic and distinctive in the ideal of his order. In this sense there are among the Jesuits not only Franciscans, but also Capuchins, Benedictines and secular priests etc., who are, nevertheless, completely authentic members of the order, and the converse too is equally true.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

There is yet a third preliminary observation to be made, one which it is likewise important to recognise clearly in this context. That which is highest is always the most dangerous too, the most easy to misinterpret and also that which is always and inevitably only half understood. The great inspiration, the comprehensive idea, the most exalted spirit in an individual is necessarily that which at basis is least of all talked about in order that it can be most of all lived. For this latter is harmed and threatened by too much ingenious or pious talk – for both are dangerous. By [32] these means it is very easy for some principle to degenerate into a mere catchword which everyone has on his lips, and which everyone invokes; and then it loses its true value, and from being most often referred to becomes most often misunderstood.

III

Now let us turn to that situation in the history of human thought in which Ignatius was placed, and which initially made it possible for this aphorism to be formulated. Taking account of the Spanish tradition to which Ignatius belonged we can undoubtedly regard him as in many respects a man of the late Middle Ages and of the 'devotio moderna' which, in the last analysis, does in fact belong to the 'autumn of the Middle Ages'. But ultimately speaking he is still, in a true sense, a man of the New Age. In saying this we do, of course, once more have to distinguish: there is a new age which is now gradually drawing to its close – as Guardini has pointed out – and also one which was initiated in those centuries to which Ignatius belonged, never more to cease: the age of the rational, the planned, the scientific and technical. It is at this turning-point that Ignatius stands, a turning-point at which interest begins to be directed towards the subjective, towards the question of salvation as it bears upon the subjective life of the individual, of the sense in which God is a 'gracious God' precisely to me. This is the point at which attention begins to be turned from the cosmo-centric to the anthropocentric (as J. B. Metz would say), to man who controls and directs himself and his world by means of rational planning, and directs himself and it towards a future that is open. It is a time when attention is turned to the subjective viewed as a task and as the object of a conscious mission in the Church and for the Church. There have, of course, always been apostolic men. But in the case of Ignatius something peculiar and special emerges in the relationship of the apostle to the Church, something which precisely has not appeared in earlier ages.

Our scholastic background and our sense of the Church always make us prone to think of things as though everything in the Church of God were always the same. Often we suppose that there has always been an awareness, so far as man and his problems are concerned, of his relationship to God, the Church, the sacraments, the word of God, his fellow men etc. In a certain sense this is, of course, thoroughly legitimate and [33] right. But on the other hand there really is a history of ideas, of dogma, of devotion, and it is not true that everything has always been the same. There are cases in which the old becomes new precisely in a manner for which there has been no previous precedent. In this sense Ignatius stands at a quite decisive turning-point, at the turning-point which absolutely divides the ecclesiastical history of ancient times and of the Middle Ages from the Church of the New Age. Of course he does not stand there alone. Of course the epoch which constitutes this turning-point is, from certain points of view, several centuries 'long'. It may be that we in the Church of today are in many respects still standing at the end of the Church of the Middle Ages, which only now is gradually realising and understanding precisely what was initiated with Ignatius, with Francis of Sales, with the whole New Age, with the Reformation, the Renaissance, the new natural sciences, the new technical achievements, the realization that the world is one single planet in place of the individual histories of particular regions taken in isolation one from another. But there is this turning to the subject, to subjective striving for salvation, to the subjective viewed as a task for the Church, to the attitude of reflection upon one's self, to that of 'sustained finality', to an existential ethic, to a 'choice' in which the subject in some sense exists by his own decision, chooses, transcends, reflects and is not merely, so to say, called by God in a manner which entails no self-reflection. This is, in short, a turning to self-responsibility. And although Ignatius stands in the midst of this revolutionary change he in turn is, nevertheless, the one who has already, to a certain extent, transformed something which was subject to the conditions of this particular modern world into something lasting. This appears for instance in the fact that in spite of his subjective approach to the salvation of souls, in spite of the fact that in his ideas the 'subjective' aspects of devotion outweigh the 'objective' ones, in spite of the fact that he founded an order which was no longer communal in the same sense as the orders of the Middle Ages, he is, nevertheless, the man of the Church, the man to whom the phrase 'sentire cum ecclesia' may supremely be applied. And if he is this, then he is this, in a true sense, 'in spite of' his subjective approach. For from the point of view of the history of ideas what provides Ignatius with his initial inspiration, what confronts him as unavoidable, is not the Church but modern man considered as personal subject. For Ignatius modern man considered in this sense is an ecclesiastical entity 'in spite of' his subjective aspects. The subjectivism involved here is not Calvinist or Lutheran, [34] although Ignatius' approach to the subjective aspects of salvation is based on exactly the same experience as that of Luther, and although he raised the question of whether he was or was not confronted by a gracious God in a form every bit as radical as Luther, radical in a sense which would have been impossible in previous centuries. Perhaps it is precisely because Ignatius is the modern par excellence, as it were, in this unique sense that he sometimes gives the impression of being so archaic from one point of view, while from another he seems to figure simply as the representative of one unique epoch. Yet even while recognising this we must once more avoid exaggerating it to the exclusion of all else if we are to take seriously the historical influences to which a given man is subject, his recognition of the truth and his intellectual attitude.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It was necessary to make this third point by way of introduction in order to recognise at all that we are justified in supposing that there is something to be discovered in Ignatius or in his use of the motto concerning the 'Major Dei Gloria' which had not previously been recognised and expressed always and in all circumstances by everyone.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The attempt must now be made, therefore – and it is here that we first touch upon the real problem at issue – to say something about the meaning of this saying. The particular factors in the attitude which finds expression in this saying must first be analysed. This brings us to one specific element among them which seems to us to be the definitive one and this definitive element must then be investigated more closely.

Anyone who says that he wills to live, act, suffer etc. to the greater glory of God thereby asserts first and foremost that he resolves to adopt an attitude of absolute self-surrender to the sovereign will of God, and believes that he has taken up this attitude. The first element in such an attitude, therefore, is obedience to God, and that 'indifference' or detachment which is necessary for this as it can be formulated on the basis of the Exercises. Man is ready to do God's will, and he knows that when he does it he is honouring God, his disposition of things, his position as supreme Lord. But anyone who explains that in this way he is being fundamentally obedient to God who reveals himself in his doxa, and anyone who supposes that in speaking of the greater glory of God there are inevitably matters [35] which must be tested, selected and then put into practice on the basis of this, and that in such testing, choosing and acting the glory of God, or even the greater glory of God, is achieved – anyone who thinks this, I say, must not overlook the fact that dispositions have already been made to which he is himself subject. This is the second element. When the Exercises are made or given, when plans for life are projected and subjects for choice are put to the test, when we examine what we must do, then all too often we overlook the fact that we are already subject to pre-existing arrangements, that we are very far indeed from being simply those who make the arrangements. If we enunciate a maxim which is intended to govern our actions then we must at the same time admit that we are quite unable to take this maxim alone as the sole adequate principle by which we shape our lives. Any principle such as that of 'omnia ad majorem Dei gloriam' necessarily entails an attitude which is theologically a priori, and in dealing with such principles we must see that this a priori attitude must from the outset necessarily be supplemented and limited by an existential a posteriori. Someone who is sick cannot start questioning whether an activity which presupposes good health would not be for the greater glory of God in his case. When we set out to direct our lives to the greater glory of God the demands of God himself are not the sole considerations from which we start. In certain ways our lives have already been arranged for us beforehand. There is much that is totally excluded from the sphere of our choice. Freedom in the creature is already subject to pre-existing conditions. Man's freedom to act in history – and this applies to his strivings for salvation too – always takes the form of an obedient fitting in with situations which we can do nothing to alter. Indeed it always means accepting the fact that we have been made to fit in necessarily and inevitably with a given concrete situation. There is a certain priority of the actual over the merely possible, and this element of the concrete and the factual in us, in our life, in the span of life allotted to us, in our temperament, our hereditary traits etc., is, as it were, the woof which runs across the warp of the a priori principle 'Ad majorem Dei gloriam'. To put it better: this state of being fitted in with things as they are must from the outset be taken into our calculations if we are rightly to understand the maxim with which we are concerned. We are very far from being simply those who can arrange things for the greater glory of God. Rather God has – perhaps before any such decision on our part was possible – already made his own arrangements for us to act for his lesser glory. Now if we [36] were to try to defend the principle simply by saying that humbly submitting one's self to this will of God is precisely acting for his greater glory, then it is true that formally speaking we would be saving the principle from being overthrown, but in fact this would do nothing to alter the situation. It can be seen, then, that when man enquires what he, as the disposer of things, can do for the greater glory of God, he is, even as he asks, already subject to dispositions superimposed upon him from without.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now a maxim which is to be comprehensive enough to include both these factors must also implicitly express the fact that there is a certain fluidity in this state of being subject to superimposed conditions; that the obedience involved here has a special element in it, an element of changeableness, of being subject to the vicissitudes of history. To put it another way, and thereby to sum up the first three elements once more: in this statement, 'I will lead my life to the greater glory of God' man says: 'I await a command from God, and ask in all openness what this command is to consist in'. Secondly he says: 'In the most essential matters the command has already been issued. Whether I like it or not it has already been imposed upon me, so that I am very far from being in all respects the one who is summoned or the one who is questioned. The field available to me to choose from for the greater glory of God is already restricted from the outset'. And thirdly he says: 'This state of being called by God, whether the call has already taken specific shape or whether it still remains open and general, is subject to change. Now I am healthy; tomorrow I am sick. Now I must do this, tomorrow that'. Man's state of being subject to prior dispositions on God's part has a certain intrinsic fluidity in it. Obedience does not in the least imply that we have to work out a plan on the grand scale once and for all by some abstract principle. Rather in essence it implies that obedience must take place in the historical vicissitudes of our human existence, ever new, ever unanticipated and incalculable as these are. 'Ad majorem Dei gloriam', therefore does not by any means imply – at any rate in any adequate sense – that man can map out the course of his life once and for all on the a priori principle of the greater glory of God. It means that in essence he is not so much the author of projects as the one who has been 'projected', one whom God has already made dispositions for, and who is always only partially in a position to make fresh dispositions on his own account.

He who knows that God has already made arrangements for him, and [37] that from time to time he must respond in all obedience to fresh arrangements imposed upon him by God, and must take these upon himself as they come upon him in a concrete historical situation, (one, therefore which cannot a priori be mapped out), such a one can ipso facto accept the vicissitudes to which he is subject. This 'letting things fall upon one' is an essentially Christian attitude. For only that freedom which, in spite of its power to dispose of things, and its capacity, so to say, a priori to map out the course of life, recognises that it is a creaturely freedom, i.e. a freedom subject to conditions superimposed from without, is a genuinely Christian freedom. And only the life which lets itself unfold in an uncalculating manner, stage by stage, here below is a truly Christian life, evincing the humility appropriate to a creature, trust in God, recognition that one alone knows what is adequate as the formula of our life and its reality, namely God and not ourselves. This acceptance of the fact that our life is arranged by God, and this obedient acceptance of the fact that our life is unforeseeable and subject to the vicissitudes of history, is an essential element in Christian life.

For all this man is capable – and here we touch upon the fourth element – of perceiving, realising, taking into his calculations in an extremely impressive way, the fact that this state of being subject to prior dispositions and the changeableness of such dispositions is under the greater, broader power of God to dispose of things – and at the same time in man's own power. Man is essentially the one who must simultaneously plan and live from day to day. The one who plans out his life and his activities beforehand, and yet must still accept what comes to him. If it be objected to this that planning consists precisely in the fact that man does accept what God sends to him – then we must reply that strictly speaking this is not planning at all. For when God sends some fate to us then we are no longer in a position to raise the question: 'Is it to the greater or lesser glory of God?' Instead we have quite simply to accept it. In other words in the concept of 'major Dei gloria' the explicit, reflexive conscious planning of life really is included, even though man is, and necessarily must be, the one who submits to being disposed of, who accepts, and in a certain sense, who is not capable of planning. It is in this explicit, conscious and constant awareness of man's own further openness to the possibility of having conditions imposed upon him either by God or by man himself that what is definitive in the fourth element involved in the 'major Dei gloria' really consists. In this saying we must realise what it means when it [38] says 'ad majorem Dei gloriam'. The 'major Dei gloria' is not so much that which is actually done, but rather that towards which our acts are orientated in order, as it were, that they may attain to it as their ultimate goal.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Let us now examine this fourth element somewhat more closely. First, what constitutes it is not found in every man or in all cases. This brings us back once more to the problem which was already adumbrated in the introductory remarks. It might be said that either the 'major Dei gloria' expresses something essential to Christianity as such, in which case it must always have been there from the first, and must be present in every Christian and in every Christian life, or it says something which does not belong to Christian existence as such, in which case it follows ipso facto that it is a matter of indifference – every bit as much so as for instance it is a matter of indifference whether Ignatius wore a woollen or a linen garment. But to say this would as we have seen be precisely to interpret the facts wrongly. There are factors which are essential to Christianity, which in a certain sense must always have been present wherever Christianity is found and yet which even allowing for this we have not always been used to adverting to so explicitly as real and vital factors present in our lives. Now the fourth element which we are considering is numbered among these real factors. Another way of expressing this state of affairs might be to say that the actual subjectivity of the subject here becomes the theme of the subject's investigations instead of being merely the mode in which his self-explication is realised in the concrete. This is something which is typical of the new age. The Christian recognises that what he is actually doing in the here and now, the conditions to which he is subject in the here and now, fall essentially short of what he is actually capable of in terms of the fulness of Christian existence. As a result of this realisation he constantly orientates his individual decision in the here and now towards the boundless range of other possibilities open to the Christian and will thus learn to regard himself as the subject not only of what he actually does in the concrete but also of what he is capable of over and above this. In this way he can assume possession of himself as a subject in this sense on his own account. Only on the basis of this attitude can he truly ask what in the here and now is or is not 'ad majorem Dei gloriam'. But just as it is not until the New Age that this sense of the self as subject is arrived at, so this saying 'ad majorem Dei gloriam', intended in the same sense and with the same depths of meaning, is likewise only arrived at in the New Age, and in fact only from Ignatius onwards. This [39] 'selfhood' of the subject was not always a theme of investigation for the subject himself in the sense in which it has come to be so in the New Age. And therefore the wider range of possibilities over and above the conditions actually prevailing in the concrete here and now and ordained by God was not always a theme of investigation for the Christian considered as subject in this sense. But in order to avoid any misunderstandings on this point we must straight away add: this New Age is very far from being the age of unChristianity, though it is constantly being accused of this. This subjectivism is, in the last analysis, nothing else than the outcome of Christianity itself. It is true that we have become accustomed to regarding the New Age more or less as a falling away from Christianity; and in fact this is correct to the extent that in the New Age many individuals have fallen away from Christianity, and many legitimate developments both on the human and the Christian plane have emerged initially outside the Church's orbit. Nevertheless the modern age, in spite of its interest in the subjective, in spite of Descartes, Kant, German idealism and modern existentialist philosophy, is, in the last analysis, something which is there because Christianity is there. It has been thrown up by Christianity to provide opportunities for self-reflection and for the necessary unfolding of Christianity

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

itself in terms of self-reflection. When, therefore, we say that Ignatius' formula, 'Ad majorem Dei gloriam', does not become possible until the New Age this does not mean: 'Sad to say' St Ignatius could only have lived in the New Age, and he has done or seen something in that Age which is not evil, but which, in the last analysis, would have been more or less superfluous in earlier ages. No, the New Age is an age which Christianity itself has ushered in in order to realise itself by way of self-reflection.[5]

This fourth element has, furthermore, a critical function to perform in relation to the actual concrete process of taking the decision. First an example may help to throw light on this point. In the life of St Francis of Assisi St Bonaventure relates that St Francis had the gift of tears, and in his mystical meditations melted, as it were, into tears to such an extent that a doctor drew his attention to the fact that if he wept so excessively he would [40] become blind. To this St Francis of Assisi replied: 'What does it matter if I lose my eyes, seeing that these are things which I have in common with the flies?' If St Ignatius had had his attention drawn to the same danger he would have sought to stem his mystical flow of tears. Now we can describe neither the one nor the other procedure as 'the more Christian' or 'the more holy'. Moreover we should remember that we have no understanding of such mystical gifts, and that therefore we have no right to interpret St Ignatius' actions on grounds which make us far too ready to believe that we can reconstruct what Ignatius' answer would have been along these lines. For someone who really can weep tears of mystical ecstasy – for such a one the reply of St Francis of Assisi is really the obvious one. Of course if God had taken away this gift of tears from St Francis he would have submitted to this, and would have been content with it. But in the actual moment in which God, so to say, bestows himself upon him in this manner he looks neither to left nor right but uses to the full this gift of God's grace, this ordination of God – uses it, as it were, without reflecting upon it and, in a certain sense one might almost say, naïvely. In Ignatius' case it is quite otherwise. Here the subject is alive to himself in a much more intense and radical manner. Having become aware of all these factors he, so to say, draws back from them in a special way for which there is no precedent, withdraws himself in a certain measure from these concrete circumstances in which his own existence is realised, objectifies them to himself and asks: 'Now is this really and definitely the best course? It is certainly good – but is it to the greater glory of God?' The realisation of existence in the concrete – even when it is willed by God, perhaps when it is actually commanded by him, and at least when it is ordained and allowed by him – is explicitly measured against a higher standard, and inevitably in doing this the subject stands back from this concrete mode of his own existence. Not everyone does this, and indeed not everyone needs to do it. Not every saint has done it in this sense. In fact we cannot do it ourselves in all circumstances. This is not because, as Ignatius himself will say, many situations are simply as they are and cannot be altered, so that they are not subject to our choice at all, but rather because an attitude of absolute reflection upon one's self, an absolute transcendence of the self reflecting upon itself in relation to what can be chosen or altered would once more be the measure of a freedom and a possibility of decision which does not belong to the creature.

Everyone who has pastoral experience will have encountered this [41] again and again in his life. Again and again he will find men who in their devotion have become neurotic from a reflection upon themselves which is excessive, because again and again they direct everything into the empty space of other, greater, ever-changing possibilities, and then want to make a fresh choice 'for the greater glory of God' for every step they take on the basis of [5] These statements, and the special emphasis given to them here, are deliberately intended to bring out one single aspect of a more complex process. On the problem itself and its manifold aspects cf. the author's expositions in Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II, 1/2, (Freiburg, 1966), 1, 178-726; 2, 35-45; including the observations of J. B. Metz, ibid., pp. 239-267. cf. also K. Rahner, 'Der Mensch von heute und die Religion', Schriften zur Theologie VI (Einsiedeln, 1956), pp. 499-544.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this attitude. Men such as these forfeit a certain trustfulness, a certain immunity from the dictates of their own temperament and their own impulses. But this does not for one moment alter the fact that this fourth element does involve a critical function with regard to the concrete situation which already confronts us or the decision directly demanded of us in the here and now. To this extent the typical attitude of choice is implicitly contained in this saying, 'Ad majorem Dei gloriam', together with all that the Book of Exercises has to say about the three classes of men, the three degrees of humility etc. It might be objected to this that every Christian must freely work out and so choose his own salvation. And if he chooses rightly he has brought to bear the right principles of choice, with which, naturally, he must in some measure be acquainted, for the purpose. All this may be true, but nevertheless this peculiar attitude of choice, this withdrawal of one's self to an absolute point in order from there to reflect and to test what is to be done, does exist. And this existential structure involved in the act of choice does exist in the case of St Ignatius in a degree which the moral theologians right to the present day have probably not yet sufficiently grasped. Again and again it seems to be presupposed that the third kind of choice, the process of rational checking, or the element of the rational in the two other modes of choice and stages of choice in the Exercises and in the Christian life is absolutely the decisive factor. Now this is not true. On the contrary, Ignatius is the first – is, indeed, almost unique in this among the theologians – to have developed in his Exercises a logical structure of choice which is indeed applied in the practice of these Exercises to the extent that they are carried out because it must be applied. And yet no-one has really penetrated beyond the theological and metaphysical principles and presuppositions behind this structure of choice.[6] Ignatius does, in fact, envisage a Christian [42] who – and this is something which carries immense dangers with it – as person, as 'self' in the New Age takes up a transcendent vantage-point from which to consider, test and choose what is and what can be to the greater glory of God. And this is precisely what lies behind this saying, 'Ad majorem Dei gloriam'.

This in turn throws light on a further point, namely the significance which this saying has for an existential ethic of the present day.[7] It is precisely not true that everything can be rationally deduced. It is not true that the individual in his individuality, in his decision, is simply the individual instance of more general, more abstract principles. We can realise how difficult and obscure these questions are by considering, for instance, the difficulties raised by the theories of J. Lahitton with regard to the recognition of priestly vocation. One may be quite ready to accept that this theory has its importance as a practical rule of thumb for ecclesiastical superiors in judging of a man with regard to his possible vocation to the priesthood. But if these principles are understood as having a theoretical, metaphysical, existential or ontological value Lahitton's theory is basically false. What would be the use of the whole process of choice formulated by St Ignatius, with all these subtle rules etc. concerning 'consolation without prior cause' etc. if, from the aspect of metaphysics or existential theology (or however we may wish to express it) the situation were such as that which Lahitton envisages for certain cases in which the presence of a priestly vocation has to be discerned. In such cases, indeed, one would only need to say: 'Dear friend, if you are a normal, balanced man, then you only need to have the right motives and your vocation is established. You can depend upon it that it is there. You have passed the entrance

---

[6] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Die ignatianische Logik der Existentiellen Erkenntnis. Über einige theologische Probleme in den Wahlregeln der Exerzitien des hl. Ignatius', Ignatius von Loyola. Seine geistliche Gestalt und sein Vermächtnis, (Würzburg, 1956), pp. 343 ff. – K. Rahner, Das Dynamische in der Kirche (Freiburg, 3rd ed., 1965), pp. 74-148.

[7] On this cf. the author's article, 'On the Question of a Formal Existential Ethics', Theological Investigations II (London & Baltimore Md, 1963), pp. 217-234; and further the articles collected under the title, 'Der Einzelne und die Kirche', Schriften zur Theologie VI (Einsiedeln, 1965), pp. 499-544.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

examination. You are an intelligent man who shows with ample probability that he can observe celibacy, and you yourself know whether you have the right motives'. And if the subject then replied: 'Obviously I don't want to be a rich man, nor do I seek for any special comfort in life. I want to do something for the good God', then one would only have to fall on his neck and say: 'You have a vocation!' One has only to compare with this the complex, intricate 'apparatus' for testing a vocation which St Ignatius sets forth in the Exercises to realize [43] that the saint had a quite different idea of the existential decision and the process of arriving at it than that implied by such rationalism. For Ignatius there really is something like an existential and ethical attitude on man's part, which precisely implies an openness to that which lies beyond the data which can be calculated and deduced on the rational, abstract and essentialist plane. And this existential and ethical attitude finds expression both in his Exercises and also, in brief, summary form, in the saying 'ad majorem Dei gloriam'. Now if one reflects that this 'major Dei gloria', if it is in fact to be made effective at all, is ultimately a gift of God and must necessarily be so, then one realises what really is implied in this saying: an openness to the direct personal love of God, which is no longer arrived at through intermediate causes, and, in fact, the end of legalism and the freedom of children of God in the Pneuma of Christ. It is here that what is proper to God's own sovereign disposition of his creatures comes, in a certain sense, into force; a disposing of things which is no longer mediated through worldly causes or through the Church's official direction, a disposing of things which really can and must be called 'the better' precisely because it is itself the freedom of God in his sovereign act of disposing. And it is only when someone knows himself to be called, and is open to this sovereign act of disposing on God's part that he is truly in the New Testament. This does not, of course, mean that it is only with this attitude proper to the New Age and subjective in a good sense, which is characteristic of Ignatius, that Christianity began. But something specifically Christian here becomes explicit and actual for the first time, so that it can be seen and apprehended as such.

V

In conclusion something must be said about the dangers involved in such an attitude. First this attitude is strongly self-reflective and subjective in character, not in the sense that the general rules of the natural and divine laws do not have to be observed, but in the sense that the personal self is in a position of almost radical withdrawal from every form of actualisation in the sphere of human living in the concrete, and this means that he evaluates, judges, criticises, transcends, rejects, makes fresh choices of, etc. the various concrete forms of human acts by the standard of the absolute possibility of giving glory to God. Such an attitude does, of course, carry with it the danger of being fatally damaging to that attitude [44] of spontaneity and freedom from restraint and over-calculation on man's part which is necessary for his acts to be fully human and fully Christian. In his act of reflecting upon himself man cannot overcome his own radical inadequacy. If he sets himself to do this, if he wanted to do it in a manner that did go beyond this radical inadequacy of his, he would be going beyond himself as man, as creature. In the last analysis he would be presuming to be God. That which is unthought out, uncalculated, belongs essentially to man too, and to that extent the attitudes here described represents a radical danger to this spontaneity and freedom from restraint, to that basic peace in which man dares to live with himself. There are men who fail to achieve this, and who are not better but worse on this account. Viewed from this aspect one can exercise too much 'examination of conscience', self-control and self-criticism. Whether it can be stated as a general principle that we of today are in danger of gradually slipping into this is a question which need not be entered into here. But fundamentally

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

speaking the attitude which we have been describing does entail this danger. He who is always asking 'is this to the greater glory of God in these present circumstances?', he who, so to say, does not bring an immediate, spontaneous and unselfconscious enthusiasm to bear on his concrete actions ipso facto fails to perform them in a manner which is to the greater glory of God.

The Jesuits are often accused of being rationalists. This need not necessarily be a reproach. Rationalism may be no less justifiable than any other of the possible attitudes. But what is noteworthy is that on the basis of his deepest inspiration, his special brand of mysticism, Ignatius perceives the absolute sovereignty of God, measured by which any specific activity or non-activity on man's part must be totally inadequate. It is on the basis of this vision, then, this overwhelming experience of God as ever greater, that Ignatius feels himself compelled to ask in all that he does, however good it may be, whether something still greater, something less inadequate to God's immeasurable greatness, would not have been possible. This attitude, which, as it were, is the outcome of a mystical and non-rational approach, and at the same time of one which is existential in the right sense, can degenerate precisely into an over-cautious pseudo-rationalism if it is not spontaneously carried through. The true Ignatian scepticism, however, towards what is given and what we are confronted with in the here and now, has the function precisely of leaving the last word to God. Yet it is often invoked in order to reduce everything to [45] shreds by rationalism, and to destroy an enthusiasm which is spontaneous, fine and, in the good and holy sense, naïve.

The attitude in question involves a third danger, which appears still more clearly. This consists in the fact that in the case of narrow-minded and petty people the 'aristocratic scepticism', as it might be called, can drift into something approaching officiousness and a 'managing' attitude, and thereby religion can actually become choked by legalism and institutionalism. One becomes sceptical with regard to particular details. One finds that this or that is not so important. One perceives that some particular point is still not the vital factor. But when we adopt this attitude the one factor which is vital, namely God who disposes of our lives in absolute freedom and grace, is no longer there for us. For instance one adopts a rather casual attitude towards liturgical practices because one feels that 'nothing is really and certainly achieved by all these externals'. Again in theology the smoothest and most harmonious opinion is sought for, one which upsets no-one etc. And why is all this? Man is, in a certain sense, sceptical towards everything, and because of this the temptation arises all too easily of erecting a voluntarist system in the proper and formal sense on the basis of established and institutional practices, not because one is prompted to do this from one's own interior convictions or from some interior inspiration, but really because, for want of this latter factor, one is afraid to lose even that which has gone before, unless one falsely 'rigidifies' it in this way. As a result of this we find that deficiency, which we have encountered often enough, of any genuine, spontaneous, living enthusiasm. How much in the way of a fruitful exchange of ideas, how much spontaneous love in this connection, how much apostolic zeal, which is overpowering in the holy sense, can still manifest itself or speak out today? How anxious we are to ensure that nothing of the love which we entertain in our hearts shall be noticed! All these experiences, instances of which are all too frequently to be met with, and which make life so impersonal, so drab and so grey, can of course be the sign of a fine and laudable attitude, the maturity of the saint who sees through himself to his depths. But they also serve to show what dangers are involved in constantly asking where the 'major Dei gloria' lies.

The motto coined by Ignatius expresses something quite simple but something new in the history of ideas, namely that man dares once more to measure even the element of the holy in what he does and in what he intends to do by the mysterious and immeasurable greatness of God, and [46] thereby does not merely submit in all humility as a creature subject to

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

historical limitations to the various dispositions which God imposes upon him from time to time, but actually collaborates in bringing this intervention of the ever-greater God in his life to fruition, though always, of course, in subordination to God himself, through him and for him. Thereby man measures what is holy in his own actions once more by the greater holiness which, in the last analysis, can only be God himself, and what God alone brings about by his own direct action as Ignatius says. 'Ad majorem Dei gloriam', therefore, signifies the attempt constantly to judge the glory of God actually achieved in our actions by that greater glory of God which could be achieved, in order that we may be always ready and open anew, and in a manner that cannot be foreseen, to try to achieve that other glory of God (as we may now better express it) which God demands of us at another stage in our lives.

'Ad majorem Dei gloriam' opens up to man in his personal and subjective life, so to say, the greater range of possibilities entailed by the ever-greater realisation of God's own greatness precisely at that point at which we, because we do act for God's glory, might suppose that we should thereby exchange this same glory as embodied in our actions, for God himself. Such a supposition would be utterly false. If Ignatius' attitude should be qualified as an awareness of God as 'Deus semper major',[8] then exactly the same is true of the saying 'Ad majorem Dei gloriam'. Likewise in a certain sense man has always been aware that God is ever greater than his creature's own apprehension of him, and yet this sense of the incomprehensible greatness of God as ever greater is, in a certain sense, something that belongs peculiarly to the New Age, but belongs to it in such a way that it is permanent. And just as all this is true, so too in the same sense it is true that there had always been a certain basic awareness of the truth which found expression in the saying 'Ad majorem Dei gloriam' even though it is to the New Age that this truth properly belongs. But when we say that it belongs to the New Age we mean that it belongs to it in such a way that it is permanent and enduring.

[8] cf. Erich Przywara, Deus semper maior, Exerzitienkommentar, 3 vols (Freiburg,1938-1940); new and expanded edition, Vienna-Munich, 1964, 2 vols.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[47]

3

INTELLECTUAL HONESTY AND CHRISTIAN FAITH

On first reading the title ‘Intellectual Honesty and Christian Faith’ the somewhat over-hasty enquirer might feel that there was no problem at all as to what intellectual honesty really means. The only question to be raised in this connection, he might feel, is whether this honesty can be maintained in the context of Christian faith. Now it is certainly true that in the very nature of the case the problem of how the two are to be reconciled will be one of our major preoccupations. But the first point that we have to recognise is that it is by no means so clear as all that what ‘intellectual honesty’ really is.

I

In portraying the intellectually honest man we might say that he is one who does not delude himself. He faces fully and unreservedly the difficulties entailed in adopting any ‘credal’ position today. He is quite ready to concede that the upholders of other views have just as much intelligence and good will as he has himself. He has the courage to change his convictions as circumstances demand. He is resolved to be not fanatical, but rather ‘impartial’ and ‘objective’ in arriving at his conclusions. He constantly re-examines his own positions quite as critically as those of other people. He allows for the fact that in his case too, under the influence of the spirit of a particular age, a particular social class, a particular kind of upbringing, personal calling, or even temperamental or social bias, he himself may be subject to prejudices. He realises that he must do his utmost to overcome such prejudices together with the ideological presuppositions arising from them. And in all this he fully recognises that the truth may be not so much consoling as terrifying. Such a description of the intellectually honest man is certainly one which, seems acceptable – at least at first [48] sight. But if we are really in earnest in seeking to understand what constitutes intellectual honesty we must take into account the fact that, great though this virtue is, all the dangers which it is intended to avert are in fact present in the very process of formulating the concept of intellectual honesty in this sense, and threaten to distort and even destroy the actual concept itself. For this reason an attempt must be made to say what intellectual honesty does not mean if the actual concept itself is not, once more, to be hopelessly distorted by some ideological prejudice and the spurious authority which this carries with it. In this connection two postulates seem to me to be of fundamental importance.

Intellectual Honesty and Human Decision

It is not true to say that intellectual honesty is arrived at only when the subject is unencumbered (or, better, believes himself to be unencumbered) by the burden of any radical human commitment. It is a great temptation to suppose that the intellectually honest man is the one who maintains a sceptical reserve; one who does not commit himself and comes to no absolute decision; one who does indeed test all hypotheses but (the apostle’s recommendation to the contrary not withstanding) does not opt for any one of them; one who seeks to avoid error by refusing to commit himself definitively to anything; one who makes the radical mistake of taking the weakness of indecision (though it may be conceded that when this is only temporarily or partially present it may be a virtue) for the courage of the sceptic who is

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

devoid of illusions. No – intellectual honesty is not at all like this! Certainly there are cases in which men are so perplexed that they genuinely believe that they cannot truly proceed any further with a previously held position, as for instance in the case of an anguished atheist who in his despair can only see all existence as absurd, so that this absurdity hangs as a sort of Medusa's head before his eyes. Such a one must quietly reconcile himself to this position, and try to accept even this experience calmly. For even this, so the believer says, will be made by God to bring a blessing upon him. But he must not assert that this is the only proper attitude for the intellectually honest. How could he presume to know this? How does he know that no-one ever emerges from this purgatorio or this inferno? How does he know that no-one ever has the strength to experience all this and still to believe?

[49] In any case, whether we regard it as a curse or a blessing, freedom is inherent in our very nature (for our purposes it makes no difference how one interprets this freedom so long as one recognises that it is inescapable). And this freedom of ours is such that it plays a vital part in even our most basic human decisions and attitudes. It is true of believers and unbelievers alike that there are no ultimate basic attitudes, no absolute standards of value or systems of co-ordinates for determining the meaning of existence such as might enable them to evade the struggles and hazards entailed in the responsible exercise of freedom. This is not because it is sheer blind caprice that rules at this level, but because at this level it is no longer possible to separate one's basic views from the exercise of one's freedom. Hence it is that one who seeks to set himself free by being a sceptic, who refuses to commit himself or to make any position whole-heartedly his own on the grounds that he is anxious to avoid all danger of error – such a one does not remain free but has actually committed himself in the worst possible sense. For he is living his life, living it once and for all, and thereby carving out a course that is irrevocable. In the very act of living his life he stands committed. If in spite of this he attempts to live without self-commitment, in a certain sense to remain in the dimension of 'brute fact' and the biological, and if he attempts by these means to return the 'entrance ticket' which admits him to the sphere of freedom and decision, to remain 'neutral', then this is itself in its turn a decision, and it is quite impossible to explain why there should be any better grounds for arriving at this particular decision than at any other.

Furthermore there is no such thing as remaining poised in some dimension which is prior to decision. The attempt to remain neutral, therefore, is in practice only the refusal to bring one's powers of speculative thought to bear upon the decisions entailed willy nilly in the fact of living one's life at all. For in this there is one decision at least which we must arrive at (even if our speculative thought upon the subject is only at the incipient stage): whether life is to be regarded as absurd or as filled with ineffable and mysterious meaning.

In short: intellectual honesty commands us to have the courage to take basic human decisions however weighed down we may feel by uncertainty, darkness and danger. For these obstacles are inevitably entailed by the fact that the minds with which we take our human decisions are finite and historically conditioned. And these minds of ours, while fully recognising the disadvantages to which they are subject, still must decide.

[50] But once this has been said it must once more be reiterated: we have to allow for the case of one who, in all responsibility and in accordance with the ultimate dictates of his conscience with regard to truth, finds himself so perplexed that he believes himself bound in duty to remain undecided upon many questions, and indeed, as it seems to him, upon the most ultimate questions of all, in order to be true to that conscience; one who believes himself bound with all the resources of his spirit to keep an open mind and not to give any definitive answer in the sphere of speculative thought. Such a one may, and indeed must, remain open as his conscience dictates. The enlightened believer will have only two points to make about this: first that there is one thing that no one man can know of another: supposing a man takes up such a stand at some point, whether proximate or remote, in the course of his

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

existence. No-one can know whether a decision made at that particular point does not ipso facto entail a definitive decision against the sacred as providing existence with its meaning. But neither does one man have the right to bow down in worship before that particular meaning, when it is still remote from his own experience, merely on the grounds that the other feels himself compelled so to bow down, from a similar position of remoteness. Secondly the believer, faced with the man who, in the name of responsibility to the truth and intellectual honesty, is maintaining with difficulty his openness to the question to which, as it seems to him, there is no answer, will draw his attention to the fact that even this decision, namely that he can find no answer, does in fact constitute an assent to that which the believer himself calls the divine and blessed mystery of his existence, and further that the one who finds himself unable to find an answer has simply not yet been favoured with the courage to define explicitly for himself that which he is already implicitly acknowledging in his life by the silent eloquence of hi actions.

Intellectual Honesty, Responsibility in Faith and the Exploration of Ideas

In the concept of intellectual honesty in relation to the exercise of faith a second misunderstanding must be guarded against. This is the opinion that in order to remain intellectually honest while believing one would have to have thought out in a 'scientifically' adequate way all the presuppositions which such belief, and especially Christian belief, necessarily entails. Faith implies a whole wealth of material in the form of the facts, statements and ideas which go to make up its content. And this is true not [51] merely of that relatively early stage in belief in God at which one is able to explicitate one's belief in the form of a concept able to be reflected upon and investigated, but also, and still more, at that further stage at which one actually comes to believe specifically in Jesus Christ, in a concrete saving history and in the Church.

Now if it were in principle the case that in order to believe at all while still fulfilling the requirements of intellectual honesty, one would first have to have thought out in an adequate and scientific manner all these presuppositions objectively implied in the content of faith, then there would indeed be an almost unresolvable conflict between intellectual honesty and faith. For who could maintain that he would ever be capable of achieving such a thing in his brief life-span, with the limited possibilities of scientific investigation open to him, and with his lack of specialist knowledge in hundreds of fields?[1] Who could achieve a thorough grounding in all the following subjects at once: metaphysics, philosophy of religion, history of religion, knowledge of the religious and intellectual background of the period of Jesus Christ, exegesis and biblical theology together with the immensely complicated methods which have been evolved, and which are nowadays required for these, knowledge of the relationship between Christianity and the ancient world in which it emerged, history of dogma and of the complex idiom in which the dogmatic teaching of Christianity and of the contemporary Catholic Church have come to be expressed, a precise knowledge of the problems of theological controversy between the Christian confessions and the history of these? To have a knowledge of all these at once, and a fundamental knowledge at that? Never! No-one, not even the individual who is a specialist in theology! For even he, at any rate today, apart from the fairly restricted sphere of his own special branch of theology is for practical purposes a non-specialist believer and Christian in all other departments of his life which have a bearing on his intellectual responsibility for his beliefs.

A further difficulty in addition to the above is raised by the approach to fundamental

[1] cf. the author's 'A small Question regarding the Contemporary Pluralism in the Intellectual Situation of Catholics in the Church', Theological Investigations VI (London & Baltimore Md, 1969), pp. 21-30.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

theology usually adopted by Catholics.[2] Certainly fundamental [52] theology has, of its very nature, the task of entering ex professo into all the relevant problems and investigating them to the utmost possible extent with a view to providing a rational justification for faith (for the purposes of the present argument it makes no difference precisely what we mean by faith here). But in doing this it gives rise to the dangerous impression that the individual Christian has the same responsibility as an individual, especially if he is 'educated', that namely of working out for himself in a similar direct and scientific manner the problems of fundamental theology; that he must himself as an individual have competent scientific knowledge of all the 'preambula fidei'; that such a responsibility has to be undertaken by anyone who is endowed with intelligence and good will, at least if he is educated, and that only the 'uneducated' are in the nature of things excused from this responsibility. (In the case of these latter the special circumstances of their faith are matter for independent investigation). Some such idea does exist, though as an implicit presupposition rather than as explicitly asserted 'in thesi'. On this showing faith does admittedly come into conflict with intellectual honesty in the educated man. If he wants to be intellectually honest he sees how impossible it is for him to achieve this, because he recognises the complexity of modern science, and because he himself experiences its fluctuations, its disappointments and its uncertainties. And he therefore supposes that he cannot and may not believe because the idea has been suggested to him that it is only possible to believe in a rational and responsible way if he has more or less adequately discharged in his personal and individual life the task of research which is the object of fundamental theology.

There are, of course, non-Catholic interpretations of faith which make this appear irrational from the outset, and which confine it in its content to a sphere which must be ruled out from the first as an area for rational investigation. In other words these are theories which right from outset interpret faith in such a way that it seems of its very nature to be a totally irrational experience and irrational attitude, and so to be incapable of having anything to do with intellectual honesty. But for the Catholic understanding of faith there is no such easy way out of the problem. As Catholics understand the matter an intellectual element is of the essence of faith as such. It bears amongst other things upon historical realities of which it cannot be said that they are simply, and from the outset, incapable of rational investigation. The believer recognises that [53] the logical and the existential factors in his awareness constitute a unity, and he cannot and will not schizophrenically divide them one from another. The totally irrationalist concept of faith turns it into an ideology – turns it, so far as the concrete existence of the realistic man, relying on his own experience of reality, is concerned, into a dream which has no validity except precisely in the realm of fantasy.

The believer, therefore, must justify himself by the standards of intellectual truthfulness according to his own Catholic understanding of his faith, and must tackle the question of intellectual honesty on the basis of his own resources, but this precisely does not mean that this honesty is only sufficiently achieved when every individual believer has independently, in his own individual mind, and by an adequate process of scientific investigation, fulfilled that task with which fundamental theology is objectively presented. As a presupposition this is false. So far from this, even by standards of truthfulness which are fully responsible one can and must believe without having scientifically investigated all the objective 'preambula fidei' for the purpose.

Why is this? It is because the intellectual life of man is always, fundamentally and inevitably designed in such a way that a perceptible existential difference (as we might call it) prevails between that which is implied in the very fact of living and that which is the outcome

[2] On these lines of thought cf. especially K. Rahner, Im Heute glauben, Theologische Meditationen 9 (Einsiedeln, 2nd ed. 1966).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of scientific speculation upon one's life. Man cannot shape his existence solely and exclusively on the basis of factors which he has made his own by a process of scientific investigation, and which he has 'proved' to himself in this particular manner (which is by no means the only one). And because he apprehends with his reason the inevitability of this difference, because he knows that the act of living in a particular way is not merely the outcome of rational speculation, he is therefore justified by the standards of his own sense of truthfulness, in other words 'intellectual honesty', and for this reason has a duty to accept this difference and, in deciding the shape of his life, to commit himself in an absolute and definitive way (in our case by faith) to that which has not been 'scientifically proved' in any adequate sense.

This does not, of course, mean that speculative testing and criticism within the limits of what is really possible form no part of man's obligations. One of the factors which belong inevitably, and from the outset to the very mode of existence which man must accept in all obedience and trust is that there is an area of speculation and testing by means of the [54] critical faculties, an area which is admittedly capable of broadening and development. So soon as the answer to one of life's questions has been found it ipso facto raises another one, to which there is as yet no answer, so that one has to bend one's self to the task of answering this one also. But it would be precisely not intellectual honesty but rather intellectual scrupulosity, destructive and incapacitating, to adopt the position that the life of the mind or spirit either could or should be constructed only from materials which have been submitted to the processes of scientific speculation for testing and proving. I love my mother and accept all the consequences which this love entails, even though I have no theoretical certainty whatever that Mrs So-and-so really is my mother. I have a manifest right and duty to take a political decision, possibly even to fight on one side or the other of the barricades, even though I have no theoretical certainty that my decision is, objectively speaking, the right one. Nor could even the most advanced computer, such as those which our contemporaries attempt to employ in such questions, excuse me from taking this decision for myself. I cannot take refuge from this situation by defining some theoretical position of sceptical neutrality because this in its turn is precisely a decision too, involving just as many consequences for me as the 'taking of sides'. If it be asked how, in that case, and given the existential difference mentioned above, man can submit to the demands which this terrible situation makes upon him of necessarily having to take some decision, it would be reasonable to reply: 'It is demanded of him, and protest against the demand takes place, in its turn, within this situation and does not escape from it. Those who, in all obedience and honesty, come to decisions in this way, even though the decisions themselves may be quite opposite one to another, are actually more closely and fraternally united among themselves in loyalty to their own consciences and in the courage they have shown in coming to a decision with regard to the truth than they are to one who, when faced with the demands of truth, attempt to maintain a policy of sceptical withdrawal. And this is true precisely in those cases in which both those who commit themselves and those who refrain are aware of how dark and how painful any such decision can be. Finally the actual decision when it comes may indeed be deficient in terms of objective rightness. But however much this may be the case it still remains true that in every such decision, involving as it does a spirit of responsibility and loyalty to the truth, the subject gives his absolute and definitive assent to the absolute and definitive demand presented to him [55] by that mystery of existence which we call God. It follows that provided the heart seeks the truth in this mystery in all innocence, it remains within the orbit of his favour even when it errs.

We have been raising some points of fundamental importance with regard to the 'existential difference', as we have called it. Now these obviously apply also to the relationship between intellectual honesty and faith. Indeed they apply here most of all. For

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

faith is primarily concerned with the all-embracing meaning of existence, and Christian faith (as the declaration that historical events have a saving value) makes assertions about human existence in all its dimensions. In this case, however, the 'existential difference' between the events actually pointed to and their significance on the one hand, and the conclusions arrived at in terms of scientific speculation and theory on the other is necessarily and inevitably at its greatest. One who both believes and is intellectually honest knows this, must know it and acknowledge it, and has no need to shrink from this state of affairs. Of course there is an almost incalculable number of particular questions which – taken all together – it would be quite impossible for the individual to work out for himself by his own personal scientific investigations for the sake of providing a rational justification for his faith. But this is precisely what intellectual honesty does not demand. Why should one not trust one's own living experience without prejudice in this sphere as in other spheres of life even prior to any theoretic evaluation of such experience? Obviously one recognizes that one's Christianity, one's Catholic faith, is conditioned by one's historical, social and psychological circumstances. One realises that in a vast number of cases these conditioning factors are not present. One can say to one's self in all calmness: Presumably I myself would not in fact be a Catholic if the factors conditioning my life had been otherwise, if I had not been born and brought up as a Catholic from my childhood.[3] One realises, and can readily concede, that even in ideal cases, where very far-reaching investigations in the field of fundamental theology are possible, one cannot really obtain any absolute certainty in the attempt to find a rational justification for one's faith as such. In other words one's ideas are, [56] humanly speaking, always open and provisional, and capable of further development.[4]

All this maybe demanded by intellectual honesty. But it does not imply any suspension of faith in weary scepticism. Faith as such, as an act of human living in which the ultimate meaning of existence is accepted and embraced as God's word to us, is endowed with that absolute transcendence, that freedom from all conditions, which is indispensable to it if it is to be faith at all. But for this it precisely does not need, over and above the word of God and his grace (of which we shall have to speak at a later stage), any comprehensive evaluation in terms of theory of all its implications and presuppositions. In the first instance faith is present simply as something given (or as a possibility actually pressing in upon us in the here and now). As such it finds sufficient initial justification by what it carries with it in itself. It is a fact of life which man commits himself to whole-heartedly and without prejudice as justified even on the rational plane, so long as the opposite of faith has not become certain to him. The reason for this is that man must give life itself the chance to justify itself. And this can only be achieved if it is lived in a spirit of trustfulness. A further reason is that faith as conceived of here gives reason and order to existence; that it opens up into that infinitude which alone provides the perspective in which meaning and mystery can be reconciled, and can permeate the whole of life; further that conscience and morality with regard to truthfulness (to the extent that this is identical with a feeling for word and freedom which is self-authenticating) commands us to hold firm to such awareness of ineffable mystery to the very last, and never to surrender it except if a greater, purer, more all-embracing meaning presents itself. Yet a further reason is that faith that is really committed feels itself protected and nourished by the experience of grace which precisely carries its own intrinsic justification with it. For such experience of grace, however subtle and indefinable the form in which it manifests itself, and

[3] One can concede that one's personal faith is historically contingent in this sense, without thereby asserting that there are no objectively valid grounds whatever which objectively speaking – should cause everyone to be a Catholic, and without contesting the real possibility that another individual can become a Christian and a Catholic from a non-Christian and non-Catholic background.

[4] This means that the fact that the assent of faith is absolute does not for one moment imply that the rational justification of the 'preambula fidei' as such needs to be raised to a similarly absolute level.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

however silent and interior the state of liberation which it brings, does point us on to the mystery of God.

Now for the act of faith to be justified in this way, and in a manner which, while prior to any formal theorising, nevertheless does fall within the purview of fundamental theology, what is required? Certainly not [57] that there should be any positive or explicit realisation at this level that the experience of the illumination of one's existence by the mystery of God, and of being enveloped in that mystery (the 'mystical' experience of faith, as it may be called), can only really take place in terms of that whole range of factors on the human plane which make up the manifold content of the Christian and Catholic faith. The requirements of intellectual honesty are fully satisfied so long as this is de facto the situation in which the experience of faith is located, and so long as this mystical experience of faith, as realised in the concrete in the actual believers, that is in ourselves, does not elevate us above these factors or invite us to depart from them. With this proviso we are fully justified in committing ourselves to this synthesis, which is prior to any theorising on our part, between the mystical and transcendental experience of faith on the one hand, and the concrete factors which make up the content of the Christian faith on the other as a de facto reality, and in realising it as absolute and irrevocable in the act of faith itself. For as conceived of here faith itself possesses an intrinsic critical element of its own. Faith itself, that is to say, actively explores its own content. Faith itself activates the critical and speculative faculties of the believer, causing him to put the vital question of what his conscience demands of him in terms of truthfulness to himself. But the process of reflecting critically upon his faith, and of putting this question to himself of how it is to be justified in theory, must be allowed to develop in its own way. It must be allowed time so to develop. In investigating these theoretical questions the starting-point must be precisely those factors with which life confronts the concrete individual in his own personal and unique situation, and in the particular development of his own ideas. These are the factors which are real and genuine enough to offer genuine possibilities of really mastering this problem of the theoretical justification of faith. This attitude of judgment and criticism in the true sense may or may not raise connected questions which it is indeed possible to conceive of as legitimate in their own right, but which need not necessarily present themselves to the given believer in the concrete as problems which he feels himself personally bound to solve. He may not feel himself so bound precisely because he may, in all reason, modesty and courage, feel compelled to recognise that he is not competent to solve them. It is not necessary for everyone to be a Qumran specialist in order to be able to be honest in his beliefs. Not every honest believer is bound to enter into the most recent developments (as instanced in the 'Spiegel') [58] in the 'life of Jesus' discussion. It is strange. One so often hears mention of the nature of man as historically conditioned (geschichtlich) even in his recognition of the truth. Yet there is an unwillingness confidently to accept one's own real and personal history (Geschichte) as the basis for deciding one's existence. There is an idea that it is impossible to establish any absolute truth for those who remain within history, and are involved in it. But history itself demands this because truth does de facto arise in history, and without it there would be no history in the true sense at all.

II

Up to this point we have been attempting to consider the question of intellectual honesty and faith by seeking to investigate somewhat more closely the real significance of the concept of 'intellectual' honesty. The same attempt must now be made in the converse direction, in that we must ask ourselves what is really meant by faith.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Christian Faith Considered as a Whole

As a specific, total and fundamental determination of human existence faith is necessarily an entity which is as complex as human existence itself, and one which, like human existence, resolves itself into the mystery of God. If therefore, we are to raise the question of what is meant specifically by Christian and Catholic faith with all its essential content, and not merely what is meant by the assent to God involved in an abstract or merely transcendental 'theism', then we must turn our attention to the 'basic fundamentals' of this faith. This does not mean, however, that we shall be investigating more closely all the widely differing ways in which the particular assertions of Christian and Catholic faith are to be related to these 'basic fundamentals' (whether objectively by establishing an intrinsic connection between the actual realities referred to and these fundamentals or subjectively by examining the believer's own assent to these assertions). The fact that the Catholic understanding of faith does necessarily entail this difference between what is absolutely basic and what is derived is explicitly stated in Vatican II.[5] The fact that precisely for the sake of reasonableness and intellectual honesty it is necessary for the individual to draw this distinction for himself is immediately evident from what has been said in the first part of our considerations. While bearing [59] in mind the necessary sense of historicity and of community (even in the dimension of truth), and while bearing in mind the difference between the existential decision which is prior to scientific investigation on the one hand, and the speculative process of metaphysical and scientific examination on the other, it is prudent, and also intellectually justifiable for the individual as human and as Christian (to put it simply) ultimately to avoid dissecting the totality of his belief into its individual constituents, each one of which would require its own separate speculative investigation and justification. It is sensible, and also intellectually justifiable, to say that Christianity (precisely in all the variations of its content) can be accepted or denied only in its totality, only as a whole. 'There can be no leaving out of particular parts of it'. In this second part of our considerations, therefore, we shall be concerned to throw light upon the fact that this essentially total and single entity that is the Christian faith is of such a nature that it fully measures up to the criteria of intellectual honesty.

For the purpose of such a demonstration it must, of course, first be laid down what this essentially unified and single whole consists in. This is not easy, but it is necessary to demonstrate it, and in fact to demonstrate it independently of the main line of investigation which we have set ourselves. It is not easy because Christianity, at least at first sight, consists of such a wealth of statements, dogmatic and moral assertions and ecclesiastical directives that it is all too easy to fail to 'see the wood for the trees'. It is all too easy for man to gain the impression that an assessment of this sort, into which so many individual factors enter (all of which, however, must be accepted in globo) would inevitably entail far too many possibilities of error for one to commit one's self to it with a good conscience. It is necessary to raise this question of the 'ultimate essence' of Christianity because one must view the single entity that is Christianity as a whole, even when one is in no position in the concrete to reconstruct it synthetically out of its various parts by a process of speculative reasoning. Again independently of the question which we are posing here, Vatican II regards a global understanding of the faith of this kind as necessary. This is not only to the extent that a distinction is to be drawn between the basic elements of the Christian revelation and the rest of the truths which it contains, but also to the extent that the Council itself attempts a formula purporting to sum everything up 'in a nutshell' for the Preliminary initiation of the catechumen, when it says that such a one must [60] have understood that 'he has been

[5] On this cf. Vatican II, The Decree on Oecumenism, No. 11.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

snatched away from sin and led into the mystery of the love of God, who has called him to enter into a personal relationship with him in Christ'.[6]

Let us too, therefore, attempt to sum it up in a brief formula of this, kind, so that we can go on to see how it measures up to the criteria of intellectual honesty. This, then, is how we should sum up Christianity as a whole: Christianity is the assent on the part of the whole community (Church) formulated and held explicitly by that community to the absolute mystery which exercises an inescapable power in and over our existence, and which we call God. It is our assent to that mystery as pardoning us and admitting us to a share in its own divinity, it is that mystery as imparting itself to us in a history shaped by man's own free decisions as an intelligent being; and this self-bestowal of God in Jesus Christ manifests itself as finally and irrevocably victorious in history.[7] I believe that what is definitive in the Christian faith is expressed here, and that too in a formula which, provided it is rightly understood and explicitated, will also be found to cover the further contents of the Christian faith as well, so long as these are not taken to include those positive definitions freely enunciated by the Church which belong to the dimension of historical and contingent fact as such, and which, moreover, do not represent any particular problem on any reasonable approach to the question of intellectual honesty.

God in his Divinity as the Mystery of Human Existence

Let us examine the formula we have constructed, bearing in mind the provisos mentioned above. What it asserts first and foremost about Christianity and about belief in it is that God is the incomprehensible and impenetrable mystery, and that God must be recognized as mystery in this sense. Christianity is not a religion which, in its evaluation of human existence, postulates the idea of 'God' as a recognised and acknowledged landmark, so to say, one factor among the rest, which can be manipulated and combined with them so as to produce a satisfactory final estimate. On the contrary, Christianity is a religion which projects man himself into the dimension of the incomprehensible surrounding and permeating his [61] existence. It prevents him from falling on merely ideological grounds (for this is the ultimate significance of the Christian religion) into the mistake of supposing that there is a basic formula of existence which is comprehensible to man, which is available to man himself to manipulate, and on the basis of which he can construct existence. Christianity constitutes a radical denial of all such 'idols'. It aims at bringing man into contact with God as the ineffable mystery without any diminution of his own human freedom, and without the hybris of attempting to control God. Christianity recognises that man knows God only when he is reduced to silence and adoration by the experience of this mystery. All his religious utterances are true only in so far as they constitute the ultimate word introducing the silence with which he reacts to the presence of this mystery, in order that it may remain present to him in itself, and not be replaced by the mere idea of God. But Christianity knows that this mystery permeates its own existence as the ultimate reality of all and as the truth of truths; that the Christian in his thoughts, in his freedom, in his actions and in the conscious acceptance of his own death, always and unquestioningly goes beyond that which can be defined, comprehended and conceptually manipulated in the dimension of the concrete and the particular which he encounters in the sphere of life and knowledge. The Christian never simply 'comes across' God (indeed in that case it would not be God at all) as one specific phenomenon among others within the sphere of human existence, one, therefore, which falls

[6] cf. Vatican II, The Decree on the Missions, No. 23.

[7] For a fuller exposition of this cf. K. Rahner, 'Kurzer Inbegriff des christlichen Glaubens für "Ungläubige", Gul 58 (1965), pp. 374-379; expanded in the third number of Concilium 3 (March, 1966).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

within the limits of his ideas and his actions. He is in contact with the living God as the all-encompassing and the unencompassed, as the ineffable upholder of being such that to call him in question is to call everything in question also, ourselves included; one who is not, so to say, conjured up by our questioning, but is already there in that he himself makes it possible for us to raise questions about him by himself providing beyond all question the basis from which such questions can be put, opening the door to them and raising us to the level at which we can ask them.

Rightly regarded Christianity is not a fortress of truth with innumerable windows, which we must live in in order to be 'in the truth', but rather one single aperture which leads out of all the individual truths (and even errors) into the truth which is the unique incomprehensibility of God. But Christianity insists relentlessly, in season and out of season that this overwhelming brightness that is darkness and silence to us, which encompasses our life and permeates everything, that is all other lights and [62] the darknesses that correspond to them, shall not be lost sight of by us, that in our existence we shall not allow our attention to be drawn away from this strange and unearthly brightness, but rather face up to it, trembling indeed yet resolute (in our commitment to it), calling it by its nameless name, never endowing our own idols with that name. But Christianity has something more to assert of this unearthly and ineffable mystery, and this is its real message. For the moment it makes no difference whether a man dares to learn of this real message of Christianity from the innermost promptings of his own conscience as moved by grace, or whether he has the impression that this message constitutes the basic motive force, purged of all extraneous elements, in the religious history of mankind (for in this too the grace of God is mysteriously at work), or even whether he simply receives this message from the witness of Christ and his apostles. In any case this, the true message of Christianity, has this to say to us: God is the incomprehensible mystery of our existence which encompasses us and causes us to realise, however painfully, the limitations of that existence, which he himself transcends. But he does not only present himself to us in this guise as the ultimate horizon of the knowable, towards which the course of our existence as spiritual beings is orientated and by which it is corrected, even while God himself remains remote and silent to us. He does indeed perform this function, setting us at a distance from himself so as to make it possible for us to 'return to ourselves' in knowledge and freedom, and thereby to give coherence and intelligibility to the environment of sensible experience in which we live, viewing it as a cosmic whole and as our environment; and in the very fact of doing this he makes us experience for ourselves our own finite state. But there is more to it than this. The mystery which we call God gives himself in his divine existence, gives himself to us for our own in a genuine act of self-bestowal. He himself is the grace of our existence.

We shall say, therefore, that what we mean by the creation is that the divine being freely 'exteriorises' his own activity so as to produce non-divine being, but does this solely in order to produce the necessary prior conditions for his own divine self-bestowal in that free and unmerited love that is identical with himself; that he does this in order to raise up beings who can stand in a personal relationship to himself and so receive his message, and on whom he can bestow not only finite and created being distinct from himself, but himself as well. In this way he himself becomes both giver and gift, and even more the actual source of man's own [63] capacity to receive him as gift. Thus the finite, of its very nature as finite, finds its ultimate fulfilment in God as the mysterious infinite. The 'creator-creature' relationship belongs necessarily and indispensably to the very mode of reality as such, but does not constitute its actual content. God creates because he himself wills to impart himself by 'externalising' and so giving himself. The distance between him and us is there in order that the unity of love may be achieved. Creation, covenant and law are there (as providing a framework for the finite) in order that love may exist in boundless measure. Obedience is imposed in order that we may receive the freedom of God. We are set far from God in order that the miracle of his nearness to us to bless us and even to forgive our sins maybe made possible. The purpose of all this is not that the mystery may be wholly penetrated and resolved by our minds, but rather that as mystery it may become the blessing of man's spirit, which possesses this mystery directly and in a manner that draws it out of itself in order that in total self-forgetfulness it may love this mystery as its only true light and life. This is the real content of Christianity: the ineffability of the absolute mystery which bestows itself in forgivingness and in drawing us into its own divine nature, and, moreover, bestows itself in such a way that we can sustain it, accept it and once more really receive the capacity to accept it from itself. It can be seen, then, that this self-bestowal of God (upon man in the history which he shapes for himself as a free and intelligent being) has a threefold aspect. Now the three aspects involved, inasmuch as they mutually constitute the self-bestowal of God, are inherent in the divine nature as such. In this self-bestowal on God's part, therefore, what we Christians are accustomed to call the triune nature of God is already present.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

God's Self-Bestowal in History in Jesus Christ

A further factor which belongs to the very essence of Christianity is the person from whom its name is derived, Jesus Christ. But the mystery that is Jesus Christ is bound up in the closest possible manner with the one mentioned above. The mystery of God's self-bestowal, in which God himself in his innermost glory becomes the absolute future of man, has a history of its own because it proceeds from God himself as his free act, and because man, as existing in the dimension of history, is involved in the historicity of humanity considered as a single whole. Also because he has to achieve the ultimate transcendentality of his nature, 'divinized' as [64] it is by God's self-bestowal, in the 'space-time' dimension of history itself in and through a concrete encounter with the concrete world. For it is in this that he exists, is aware of himself and realises himself. The self-bestowal of God, even though it constitutes the innermost and transcendental basis for the world's existence and its history, even though it represents the ultimate entelecheia of the world – nevertheless has a history of its own, that is an inner dynamism such that it manifests itself, unfolds itself and achieves its fulfilment in space and time. We call this the history of salvation and revelation. There is a point, however, at which this manifestation of the divine self-bestowal as something offered on God's part, and as something freely accepted, even though accepted only with the help of God's grace, on man's, attains its acme and the stage at which it becomes absolute and irrevocable. It is the stage at which the dialogue between God and man which is the man, which becomes substantiated in him (so that it is not merely conducted by him as something distinct from his own existence) resolves itself in an absolute assent from either side, and manifests itself as such. In other words the man in whom this identity is achieved appears as God's absolute and irrevocable assent as uttered to and as accepted by mankind. And it is at this point precisely that we find what the Christian faith means by the incarnation of divine Logos. It is ipso facto present when the divine self-bestowal appears in history as absolutely and irrevocably uttered, and absolutely an irrevocably received. Admittedly there still remains the irreducible factuality of the history which has really been lived through, the fact that this takes place and is experienced precisely in Jesus of Nazareth. What we mean when we speak of the 'Church' is the eschatological of presence God's truth and God's love in this entity by word and sacrament. And this means nothing else than that the historical facts are enduring and valid, that in Jesus of Nazareth the history of God's self-bestowal has manifested itself in an irrevocable form, and in this form remains present and remains the object of belief.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

How the Theological Assertions are Rightly to be Understood

The question must now be put whether this message, in which man's ultimate understanding of himself is alleged to consist, is to be considered credible measured by the standards of intellectual honesty.

First, in dealing with such a question it must surely be pointed out that a complex made up of statements of this kind, expressing as it does in the [65] most fundamental manner what constitutes the 'one and all' of human existence, necessarily presents the greatest conceivable difficulties in putting it into words. In the very nature of things this summing up of the whole affords no one fixed point of reference, no factor by which its nature can be unambiguously recognised, understood and determined, and on the basis of which it can be defined and expressed. It is precisely because it is the absolute truth that is in man that must find expression here (but that truth considered precisely as the original and indefinable mystery) that what is expressed is necessarily obscure. The only ones who could fail to be aware of this are those whose sociological and intellectual environment is so closed in upon itself that they cannot entertain the possibility of their own mode of expression being truly or effectively called in question by any other from outside that environment. Now today the field of discourse in which we move is no longer closed in upon itself in this way. For this reason we have a sense of the 'inexactitude' of all theological statements, a sense that all can be called in question as to their precise meaning by a thousand other ideas, approaches or fresh problems which they raise, and can thereby be assigned to the already immense class of ideas which have not been fully thought out or reflected upon. But the threat which this state of affairs in the field of communications entails vanishes when we go on from this to the further realisation that all these religious statements, whatever their particular material content may be, refer to this mystery, which as such is itself unthought-out and unreflected upon, and that they only achieve their true value when they point on to this mystery. One who takes all these statements in this sense thereby ceases to be anxious on the grounds that we do not have a sufficiently exact knowledge of what is meant by them, that no explanation of them turns out to be thoroughly clear and unambiguous, and on the grounds that perhaps it is precisely he who appears to contest them who succeeds in penetrating to their true meaning. All these statements, in fact point towards the one enduring mystery which must endure. Of course on the material level the actual content of the individual statements still remains a matter of dispute, both because some of the real factors which contribute to salvation do belong to the realm of the historical itself, and also because the movement which leads into the ineffable mystery of God (together with the historical media through which this movement takes place) is capable of right and wrong interpretations, fuller and more deficient ones. But even allowing for this the conflict between the various [66] interpretations is, in the last analysis, less dangerous than it appears. For it is a fact of experience that even a formulation which is disputed can, without actually being a matter of indifference, truly direct us to the indefinable mystery of God, and that the truth of one's own tenets does not imply that the tenets of another, even when they are false, may not serve in the concrete to lead that other to a point at which he accepts the mystery of God in a spirit of adoration and love. For we can remind ourselves in all tranquillity (even if this way of putting the matter is unusual) that according to Catholic teaching there are indeed true and false statements about the realities of religion, that to formulate assertions which are false can endanger the salvation of the individual who formulates them, but yet that there are no such things as assertions which point, so to say, to an hypostatised falsehood. Such a thing would be totally incompatible with that event of salvation which leads us to the ultimate reality of God's truth.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The Qualifications and Criteria for Deciding How Faith and Intellectual Honesty Can Be Reconciled

It must be recognised that intellectual honesty requires us to avoid any tendency to identify the fulness of reality and truth with the sum total of those realities and truths which we have actually grasped, or which it is possible for us to grasp and to have at our disposal. In other words the mystery of which we are here speaking does not constitute a phenomenon appearing, as it were, on the horizon of our awareness as intellectual beings. It is not merely one further piece of data for our minds which still remains to be worked out and added to the sum total of our knowledge. On the contrary it is the enduring basis for that knowledge (that which initially sets knowledge in motion with all its subsequent possibilities of being shaped and formed by the human faculties). And if this is true, then what sort of intellectual honesty is it which could ever forbid us to believe in the experience of grace which precisely transcends the ordinary processes of human life, and in the message of revelation which provides the key to that experience? What sort of intellectual honesty could compel us not to believe that this sacred mystery wills to give itself to us in an act of self-bestowal which brings us forgiveness and raises us to the level of the divine, itself becoming an innermost and most sublime source of life in us? What kind of intellectual honesty is it which makes it illegitimate to accept the ultimate content of Christian belief with our minds? For my [67] part I see no reason for such a prohibition. For such belief, at any rate in cases which entail the conscious and mature acceptance of such a promise, a special grace of courage in a supernatural degree is required. For this faith promises to raise man to those inconceivable heights in which alone be really becomes infinitely more than a mere intelligent animal. But who is qualified to judge, and what criteria can be applied in order to prove that such courage is intellectually dishonest, unworthy of belief, not to be credited? This is especially true in view of the fact that every act of knowledge and every exercise of human freedom is a prelude to an opening of ourselves to that which is beyond words and beyond all human capabilities to apprehend or to control. The only question, therefore, can be whether the boundless range of possibilities which spreads before us, immeasurable so far as we are concerned, is filled with the self-bestowal of God as an act of his free love, or whether it remains for ever void. Have we not, therefore, the duty of allowing God to be greater than the meagre confines of our own hearts? Of believing that God can and will come down to us, and that we can and will come up to him? Of conceding that neither of these things are rendered impossible by the finitudes of our own existence?

The Credibility of the Dogma of the Incarnation

This brings us to the question of intellectual honesty in its bearing upon belief in Jesus Christ, the life of Jesus being here taken as the event in which the ultimate and most radical mediation of God's self-bestowal upon the created spirit is realised. This event, therefore, constitutes the ultimate concretisation of Christianity in 'this worldly' terms. There are two points to be made about it.

First with regard to the 'idea' of the God-man, the essential content of the teaching that the Logos became incarnate in our human mode of existence. To a conscience which is intellectually honest and truthful this 'idea' is worthy of belief. The only factors which it presupposes are these: – first that man understands himself as the being which constantly transcends its own nature and reaches out to the mystery of God even as this mystery bestows itself upon man. It must further be understood (and this has already been indicated at least in brief) that the idea of the God-man is already implied as the eschatological climax to that process of historical mediation and revelation in which the transcendental self-bestowal of God is realised. At any rate it is implied as a conceivable goal which this [68] process is open to attain. It is vital, therefore, to rid this idea of all mythological misconceptions. The human side of the God-man is no passive puppet, no mask through which God makes himself known. It constitutes no fresh attempt on God's part in which he strives once more to achieve as redeemer in the world what he failed to achieve as creator of it. The God-man is truly man in that he is set apart from God as his worshipper, in that he is free and obedient, in that his human nature is subject to historical circumstances, progresses and develops (this applies to his religious experience as well, because nearness to God, personality and genuine creaturehood grow in the same, and not in inverse proportions). And the God-man does not represent a second intervention on the part of God as Creator, this time taking place in the already established order of the world, but rather the climax to a history of the world that is also the history of the spirit and the history of salvation. It is to this climactic point that God has ordered the whole of history from its very inception. He has done this through his own self-bestowal, which exercises a decisive influence upon all the constitutive factors in history, for this self-bestowal of God in history constitutes an 'existential', a fundamental orientation of history, which transcends all its particular modalities. Thus the incarnation, considered as the climactic and focal point of history in this sense, had already, by its redemptive power, more than overcome the guilt arising from the misuse of freedom even before it was incurred. The incarnation remains a mystery of the divine self-bestowal. If it is viewed in this context it is impossible to dismiss it as being a mere mythologem, even though, admittedly, it does not compel acceptance by the intellectually honest mind either. In spite of this it is credible, worthy of belief. Believers, therefore, and those endowed with a reasonable sense of history, are not disappointed to find that the incarnation, both in the manner in which it takes place in history and in the manner in which it is recorded in the New Testament (on a true reading of this), is just as hidden and unremarkable, considered as an event, as the deed of grace in general by which man is made a sharer in the divine. This is what one would have expected a priori. Both the incarnation and the deed of grace in history as a whole are accomplished in acts of practical and 'down-to-earth' compassion performed in the context of everyday human life. And yet even in this context this deed of divine grace bears a wonderful witness to itself if we can only view this plane of human existence with minds that are willing to believe.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[69] A further point that is essential is that this 'idea' of the God-man has been realised in concrete objective fact precisely in Jesus of Nazareth. It is essential that we should accept it as concrete fact at this particular point in space and time. Admittedly this means relying on the information that a particular fact has taken place in history, and for man's pride in his own capacity to transcend particular historical facts this is always a scandal. Man is tempted to hold a priori that there can be no question of a truth that is merely 'historical' providing the explanation of his own existence, But it is precisely the intellectually honest who can be self-critical enough to understand that real history cannot be dismissed in favour of theories concerning historicity. History in the concrete, the deeper meaning of which is never sufficiently realised, is necessary as the medium in which man's nature as a free and intellectual being can operate on the spiritual and transcendent plane. And again it is precisely the intellectually honest who can understand that man must commit himself to the finite dimension of space and time in order to render the eternal present to himself not merely as an abstract concept but as a reality actually present within him. It must be admitted that the courage to commit one's self to the concrete in this way is indispensable for faith. It must be unreservedly conceded that even to prove in terms of scientific exegesis that Jesus himself understood himself to be the Son of God in the metaphysical sense of the Christian dogma is far from easy. But one who can read, interpret and translate will not expect Jesus himself to express himself in the formulae of theological metaphysics, and will not feel this to be necessary in order to say what such formulae mean. And given the recognition of this it is not

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in principle impossible to supply such a proof. While this remains a difficult task for the individual in the concrete, with all the possible or impossible conditions to which he is at present subject, it is not the sole means to which the intellectually honest can have recourse in order to establish how Jesus thought of himself, and to justify his interpretation on this point. If the idea of the God-man is worthy of belief, if in fact in the history of human thought intellectuals have had the courage to believe in the concrete embodiment of this 'idea', yet solely and exclusively as realised in Jesus, if we have not, so to say, artificially constructed the circumstances of his life in the laboratory of our own minds, but rather found ourselves faced with them as pre-existing facts, and if we commit ourselves enough to give these facts a chance to prove themselves sound and valid, if finally we find ourselves already belonging to the community of those [70] who believe in Jesus, and if we find God in that community, what reasons could validly be advanced for holding that we were unjustified in doing all this?

Belief in the Resurrection as Reasonable for the Human Intellect to Accept

We Christians experience man as indissolubly one and whole, and on these grounds we can hold that our existence achieves its radical fulness and wholeness only when we believe in the 'resurrection of the body', and understand this formula to express that which is to be man's absolute future. In doing this we do not follow the Platonists in thinking of man as a compositum of previously separate elements. Nor do we seek to know how we should picture to ourselves this attainment of total perfection in man through a process of total 'transformation'. Now if we apply all this to the life and death of Jesus on what compelling grounds can it be shown to be unreasonable for the human intellect to accept the experience of) Jesus' disciples when they say that he rose from the dead? (Notice that this does not, in any sense, constitute a return to this mode of existence!), Is it not, on the contrary, more reasonable to believe for ourselves in what has been believed throughout two thousand years with might, light and strength, that is in the resurrection of Jesus? It is not only the sceptics, but the believers too who recognise that the disciples' experience of their risen Lord is incommensurable with any other experience in space and time, and must in the nature of things be so, since the reality which is the subject of this experience is one which is not subject to the limitations of our mode of existence in space and time. But to say that it is not so subject is not to deny it. It is possible to misunderstand this incommensurability of the disciples' experience of the resurrection, and to relegate it to the realm of myth. But we must avoid this danger. Our own personal experience of the enduring effectiveness of the one man must be fused with the Easter experience of Jesus' disciples, these two experiences mutually complementing one another so as to become absolutely and indissolubly one for us in the actual concrete situation in which we now exist. Where this is achieved the Easter experience does indeed become for us worthy of belief. Rightly understood, the Easter event does not merely bear an external witness to the role of Jesus as Saviour. It is in the Easter event in itself that that role is revealed. In this sense the Easter event coincides with Jesus' own interpretation of himself, and together with it constitutes a unified message which is worthy of belief.

[71] At this point we must break off. We are conscious of having failed to touch even in the most cursory manner upon a great number of questions. Thus a whole complex of questions arises in connection with the bearing of intellectual honesty on that communal and visible reality of the Christian faith called the Church, together with the claims it makes in questions of truth and moral guidance. On these questions, however, we must here confine ourselves to pointing out that in an epoch in which man's responsibilities and duties as a social creature are being ever more deeply realised it would be old fashioned and anachronistic in the extreme to adopt an individualist attitude; to suppose that man could or should attempt to preserve or to realise the ultimate ‘ideals’ of Christianity as an isolated individual, shrinking even as he made the attempt from that historical and social phenomenon in which alone we encounter these ‘ideals’ as historical realities, and find ourselves confronted by them in our concrete lives.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

To sum up my conclusions:– Provided one does not make an idol of ‘intellectual honesty’; provided one does not suppose that the sceptic is most likely to be preserved from mistaking error for truth, provided one does not imagine that one can extend a theoretical suspension of judgment into the sphere of one’s practical life as well, then intellectual honesty certainly does not prohibit one from the act of belief, from deciding that one’s whole life shall depend on that supreme reality which Christianity possesses and avows. Certainly this great virtue of intellectual honesty does not compel one to believe, but it does make it justifiable for one to do so. For even this virtue achieves its ultimate and unique significance only when it arrives at that supreme point (a point beyond all merely intellectual prudence) at which it finds the courage to face up to the mystery of existence, and to love.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[72]

4

DO NOT STIFLE THE SPIRIT!

As a title to the brief contribution which follows, delivered as an introductory discourse on the occasion of the 'Katholikentags' conference[1] his Eminence the Cardinal chose a motto which runs as follows: 'Do not stifle the Spirit!' This quotation from scripture is found in the earliest of the New Testament epistles, the First Epistle of Paul to the Thessalonians, chapter 5, verse 19, in a verse, therefore, in which the apostle is expressing his concluding exhortations to the community he has founded. If we take the verse in this sense it may seem, on the first hearing, to be expressing something obvious. Who would take it upon himself deliberately: obstinately and of set purpose to oppose the workings of the Holy Spirit? And if this saying is indeed addressed in the first instance to the actual community of the faithful as a whole and not to the individual with his personal problems of salvation, then as an exhortation it seems to be almost superfluous. Is the Church not the temple of the Spirit, the Body of Christ which is vivified by the Spirit of, Christ? Does not the Spirit preside in this Church with the power of the eschatological victory of the final age, never abandoning her, always making her the holy Church? How could the Church ever stifle the Spirit of God.

[73] And yet we have only to ask ourselves what Paul actually had in mind in the concrete when he exhorted his hearers in these terms to see that his exhortation both to individuals and to the Church as a whole is far from superfluous. When we first read this exhortation we should tremble at the idea that it is possible for man at all actually to stifle the Spirit, the burning fire of God, at the idea which the apostle presupposes, namely that we ourselves – at any rate in a very broad sense – are actually in a position to do this. If only we reflected upon this what a change it might bring about in our lives! We could stifle the Spirit! We could frustrate his movements in us and in the world! He has been given into our power, made subject to the inertia of our spirit, brought under the control of our cowardice, placed at the disposal of our empty, earthly, loveless hearts! Not only are we able to be false to ourselves and to betray the dignity and destiny of our own nature. We can block the Spirit who wills ever to renew the face of the earth! We can kill the life of God in the world, render the spheres of life Godless, empty and meaningless! Furthermore what a terrible danger there must be, a danger that we are too stupid to notice! How easy it must be for us to bring it about, almost without noticing, that the flame of the Spirit is prevented by us from doing its work! How easy it must be evidently to act like this in all 'good conscience' if the apostle feels himself called upon to exhort us: 'Do not stifle the Spirit!'!

In point of fact, if we think of the gifts of grace bestowed by the Spirit as Paul sees them which must not be brought to nothing we shall find it easy to understand that the object of Paul's exhortations is far from obvious. For such gifts of grace are first of all distributed among many in such a way that no one individual possesses them all, and that they are given

[1] This festal lecture, delivered on the occasion of the Austrian 'Catholic Day', June 1st 5962, has deliberately been left unaltered, even though in certain of its ideas it may perhaps be less immediately relevant to the particular needs of the present moment in history. The period leading up to the Council was different from the present one. Nevertheless those factors which were essential then do still retain their validity for the work of the post-conciliar period as well. Moreover, it may well be that it is actually more necessary now even than before to draw the correct distinction between foolish 'enthusiasm' on the one hand and the prudent and sensible application of charismatic qualities on the other. For this reason it has been felt right to leave the text in its original form. For a right understanding of what is required in this respect for the post-conciliar work that is needful cf. the author's 'Kirche im Wandel', Schriften zur Theologie VI, pp. 455-478, and Das Konzil – ein neuer Beginn (Freiburg, 1966).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

as the Spirit himself decides, and not according to the will and pleasure of any one individual, nor even to that of the authorities in their designs. And yet how difficult it is for one man to allow that the other possesses something important, something God-given, which he himself does not have, which he himself can never altogether understand; something that one's own nature tells one is alien, and which perhaps seems strange and even shocking. How easily man concludes that the divine is to be identified with that which he himself possesses, and which is accessible to him precisely because it has entered into his life. And further, for Paul these gifts are of such a nature that to the worldly individual they seem folly (1 Cor 2,14). They can be manifested in the community in such a way that to the profane they are the occasion of derision; that those [74] endowed with the gifts of the Spirit appear psychologically unbalanced or, to put it plainly, are out of their minds (1 Cor 14,23). In dealing with his communities Paul presupposes that the Spirit blows everywhere, and in the most varied ways: as a Spirit of witness, of loving service, of instruction, consolation, helpful exhortation, alms-giving, understanding, compassion (Rom 12, 4-8), wisdom, knowledge, the prayer that moves mountains, the power of healing, acts of power, prophetic utterances, the discernment of spirits, ecstasies and the interpretation of utterances arising from these, service of others and leadership of the community (1 Cor 12,4-11; 28-30). According to him the Spirit of Christ is active in a thousand forms and in no one individual are all of these present, because it is only all individuals taken together who constitute the one whole Body of Christ. All must take place properly and in order (1 Cor 14,40), but this order in the manifestations of the Spirit is an order which does not restrict these manifestations in any way, which is aware of, and acknowledges the fact that these gifts are inconceivably varied in kind, and quite incalculable. It is an order which lets the Spirit move where and as he himself wills; which admits neither of merely human judgment nor of any hybris on the part of the authorities in the Church in seeking to reduce everything to their own plans. The order of which we are speaking does not allow such people to stifle the Spirit, the Spirit which can be uncomfortable, which always remains fresh and unfathomable, the Spirit which is that love which can be hard, which leads the individual and even the Church herself in directions which they had not planned, leads them always into that which is new and unknown, that which is only seen to be in conformity with the one eternal Spirit, ancient yet ever new, when it has actually taken effect; that which the Spirit himself has intended, and which is beyond all human wisdom.

The Church knows as part of her conscious faith that the Spirit too actually belongs to her, that he is indispensable to her. She teaches explicitly that it is not only her own official organisation, institutions, traditions, the rules of life which are permanent and immutable – in short that which is planned, that which can be foreseen that belong to her as the Church of God. The Church knows that the element of the unexpected and the incalculable in her own history does not consist solely in the incomprehensibility of the circumstances to which she is subjected ab externo, circumstances which she controls by applying her own internal and immutable principles to them. The Church knows that the Spirit of [75] God has been projected into her innermost nature, the living Spirit still actively present and at work in the here and now. The activity of the Spirit, therefore, can never find adequate expression simply in the forms of what we call the Church's official life, her principles, sacramental system and teaching. These can never be the sole or exclusive forms in which the Spirit has, so to say, made himself available to the Church. Pius XII has expressly laid down that not only the institutional factor, but the charismatic one too is of the Church's essence. According to Pius XII those who are charismatics in this sense are not simply at the disposal of the ecclesiastical authorities, nor are they mere recipients of directives. It is true that in the exercise of their charisms these charismatic individuals must submit their lives to the general 'order' of Christ's Church, that it is important for them not to break out of the confines of that Church, which is also, though not exclusively, a Church whose authority is vested in her official ministers. But even though all this is true, still the charismatics can be men endowed with such gifts of grace that Christ can lead and guide his Church quite 'directly' through them.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

All this is a recognised fact. But it is a fact that is too often not recognised clearly enough in theory, and not acted upon vigorously enough in practice. Often the awareness of the role of the charisma of the Spirit in the Church remains at the level of mere theoretic knowledge, which has of itself no charismatic vitality. This is not merely due to faults of self-will and ossification on the part of the Church's authorities. There are other and weightier reasons why the truth of the Spirit and his charisms in the Church should be rendered ineffective in this way. It could be said that from this aspect it was easier to be a Christian in the early Church which Paul knew. The communities were small; their standard of living was simple and easy to understand. There was a place for that which had not been planned for or foreseen, as well as for that which was the outcome of policy and design. Moreover the world in which such movements took place was for its part reliable and comprehensible. Today, on the other hand, we live in an age of industrial societies on a massive scale, an age in which the histories of all the nations have been drawn together into a unity, in which all have achieved a degree of communication with one another which, whether it be friendly or hostile, is in any case extremely real and direct; an age of automation, of cybernetics, of a demand for security which is already becoming neurotic in its intensity; an age in which the aged in the community constitute a far higher percentage of its [76] members than in earlier times; an age in which the needs and opinions of the masses are manipulated; in which the machine has grown immensely in significance as a factor in society, for it is to a large extent inevitable that the circumstances previously mentioned should conduce to this effect. These and similar factors in the contemporary situation apply not only to society in the worldly sense, but also the social entity of the Church, and they are from first to last hostile to all that is charismatic. In other words they have the effect of making it seem as though the only effective and valid factors are those which are the outcome of plan and design, that only the power of the masses has any prospect of success, that the lives even of individuals are more and more dependent upon the great social institutions of the state and its authorities, organisations, ruling officials with their official enactments, five-year plans, subsidies etc., all of them aids to the machinery of propaganda.

If we are honest we shall recognise that this danger in the present age is undeniably a danger for the Church as well. We say that we have entered upon the age of the world-wide Church. That is true. But we have also entered upon an age in which every regional movement in the Church almost inevitably takes place under the eyes of the Church as a whole, and in dependence upon the central machinery of the Church. It is judged according to its real or supposed effects upon other countries and other areas of the Church's influence. There is a danger that no such movement can hope to be taken seriously unless it very quickly wins the support of public opinion in the Church throughout the world.

This is the danger that threatens the charismatic element in the Church from the external situation in which she is placed. But it is intensified by the presence of a further danger, this time arising from the interior situation of the Church. For even today the situation of the Church is still – unhappily is still – one of defensiveness against the powers that threaten her from without, of a unity indeed, but the kind of unity that belongs to a faction closed in upon itself so that watchwords are needed to enter it. It is a situation dominated by a spirit which has been rather too hasty and too uncompromising in taking the dogmatic definition of the primacy of the pope in the Church as the bond of unity and the guarantee of truth, this attitude objectifying itself in a not inconsiderable degree of centralisation of government in an ecclesiastical bureaucracy at Rome, so that regulations governing the life of each and every individual are issued from the Church's central ministries, and no-one can be sure that,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

despite all [77] intentions to the contrary, the approaching Council will not have the effect of strengthening this tendency. For a Council is expected to produce regulations covering a wide area of life, and it is almost impossible for it to avoid prescribing that its regulations are to apply in a univocal sense to the entire Church. In short, the fact that there is a charismatic element in the institution of the Church is recognised. It will not be denied by anyone. And yet because of the contemporary circumstances of the Church, both external and internal, this fact fails to make its due impact both in theory and in practice.

It can be seen, then, that in general the saying 'Do not stifle the Spirit' has the force not merely of an obvious and universal principle, but of an urgent imperative precisely for us in the here and now. As an exhortation, indeed, it has so urgent an application to the contemporary scene that its proclamation must take priority over that of many other principles. But precisely as a most earnest exhortation this saying applies supremely to us central Europeans in our relationships. Let us be honestly and calmly self-critical. What is the state of the Church in the particular sphere to which we belong? Are not weariness and mere routine far too predominant as factors in our lives? When new 'movements' arise or new enthusiasms which set us fresh goals to achieve, or seek to arouse support for new ideas, are we not all too fond of preaching balance and deliberation in applying the Church's principles, instead of boldly translating them into imperatives – imperatives which are not indeed necessary everywhere and at all times, but which certainly are so for us in the here and now? Are we not all too often lacking in the courage to say an unambiguous 'no' or an unambiguous 'yes'? And this applies not merely to those basic principles which are immutable, and which no-one seriously wishes directly to challenge or to deny, but also to those watchwords and slogans of controversy which summon us to a decision in the concrete. Do we know what to reply when someone asks: 'What concrete objectives have you Christians set yourselves to achieve in the next ten years? What is it which does not yet exist, but which, according to you, must exist and which you are currently aiming to achieve? And that too not merely in eternity, but in the here and now?' Do we not all too often claim to be adopting an attitude of detachment towards the various factions, whereas our real reason is that we are unwilling to expose ourselves to any demands in the concrete? Where is the courage we need really to become engaged in the questions of the time, really to face up to them, really to feel the burden of [78] them? Are we not all too ready to suppose, in our weariness and anxiety for peace, that our minds are already clear on all points, equipped with all the answers to all the questions – questions which are, in any case, not all that important? Among us, as in the Church in general, is there not a phenomenon which might be called the 'Church of officialdom'? In other words is there not an intermediary class of official administrators which (almost inevitably, so far as we are concerned, and yet how dangerously!) comes between the Christians and those who are their real shepherds, really called by God to their ministry, and really responsible to him for their flocks? Is not our preaching, the expression of our Christian faith, too traditionalist in character, too second-hand? Does not far too little of it well up spontaneously from that experience of grace, that awareness of being touched by the authentic word of God, which is utterly our own, and which has its source in our innermost nature? Where in the life of the Church do we find its members really initiating an 'experiment' which is not smothered over right from its very inception, so that after all everything remains as it was? Let us face up to the fact that from the point of view of cultural and social history we are passing through a revolutionary change in the times, a change which we certainly do not over-estimate, but rather under-estimate. Let us then take this revolutionary change in all its breadth and depth as a standard by which to measure the vigour, the courage, the breadth of vision which we bring to bear upon the radical change which we ourselves are undergoing in the Church. When we do this are we not compelled to fear that at this turning-point of the times we have proved ourselves still more

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

inadequate than did the Church of the time when the feudal society of the eighteenth century was transformed into the society of civic liberalism of the nineteenth, or the time when the workers emerged as a new social class? Must we not say at this point that our response has been far too hesitant and lame, that we have merely allowed ourselves to be forced bit by bit by the sheer weight of the facts, and that for all this we have lagged pitifully behind the times? In a word where is that bold, powerful, creative 'self-confident' movement of the Spirit among us in the Church?

There may be some who take these remarks of mine merely as so much facile criticism; who refuse a priori to let themselves be disturbed, who proceed from the tacit assumption that all must be well, since they themselves are honest men who do their duty even though they too know of no remedy for the ills of the time and of the Church. But such people have [79] failed to understand the true purport of what I have just been saying. These remarks of mine are not intended to lead up to the recommendation of any facile 'cure-all', which according to my ideas needs only to be adopted for the Church and the world ipso facto to be delivered from their ills. I too have no such prescription to offer. And it is extremely painful and bitter to put forward accusations when one does not know how to alter the state of affairs which is being complained of. Nor do these observations of mine imply that everything in every department of the Church's life is in a bad state. On the contrary there is much that is filled with the Spirit and alive with divine life, love, faithfulness, patience in bearing the Cross, apostolic work which is full of self-sacrifice, youthful courage, theological acumen, a determination to tackle fresh problems and much else besides of which the Spirit is the prime dispenser, so that without him none of these factors would be present in the Church at all. But should all this, for which we do indeed thank God, make us blind to those other factors of which we have been speaking? Are we on this account to be excused from facing up to the real question of which of two alternatives is more characteristic for our particular age and for the Church as it exists in our particular countries? These alternatives are on the one hand the average and the stereotyped, the bureaucratic and over-officialised, the stale and the dull which refuses to commit itself to any form of attack, and on the other the fire and energy of the Spirit, the charism of life that comes from heaven, though again only in the measure in which it can be permitted to exist in this world of the mediocre. However thankful we may be for the Spirit who does not forsake us even in this age, are we not still faced with the responsibility of being honestly and severely self-critical, and saying that it is through our own fault, the inertia of our own hearts, that we feel too little of the movement of the Spirit as guider of the Church, and that too at a time when the impetus of the Spirit was never so sorely needed? In view of this, then, should we not all conclude in fear and trembling that evidently the saying of Paul is addressed to us not merely as a permanently valid principle, but as an imperative for our own particular time, disconcerting, accusing, shocking us out of our complacency?

But if this imperative has, in this sense, a particular application to us of the present age, then the question does become urgent for us: What must we do in order to avoid stifling the Spirit? This is a dark and difficult question. If it could ever be thought easy to answer it would be no [80] question at all. The real answer to it is itself a factor in the movement and guidance of the Spirit, who himself ensures that he shall not be stifled. It can be found, in the last analysis, not by the reflexive processes of theory and speculation, but rather, at basis, through the sureness of instinct to be found in Christian living. And for this reason the poor stuttering school-master can only say very little, and, that in very inadequate and halting terms, on this particular question. And what he says, in so far as anything can be said directly and explicitly on this point, is once more only a part of the theoretic statements which, as we have pointed out, cannot be any substitute for the Spirit, his power and his inalienable and uncontrollable grace. Only with these provisos can there be any right understanding of the few modest observations which follow.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The first thing that we could do, and do with all our hearts, would be to acquire an attitude of caring; of recognising with anxiety that it is possible to stifle the Spirit. The Spirit can be stifled not indeed throughout the entire Church, but still over so wide an area, and to such a terrible extent that we have to fear that judgment which begins with the house of God. And for this reason we must all face the possibility with fear and trembling that we could be the ones who stifle the Spirit – stifle him through that pride in 'knowing better', that inertia of heart, that cowardice, that unteachableness with which we react to fresh impulses and new pressures in the Church. How different many things would be if we did not so often react to what is new with a self-assured superiority, an attitude of conservatism, adopted as a defence not of the honour of God and the teaching and institutions of the Church, but of our own selves, of what we have always been accustomed to, of the usual, with which we can live without daily experiencing the pain of the new metanoia. But if we realised, and with burning conviction, that we can also be judged for our omissions, for a general obtuseness and inertia of heart which, though indefinable, extends over all spheres of our lives, for our culpable lack of creative imagination and boldness of spirit, then we should lend a sharper ear, a keener eye, a livelier anticipation to the slightest indication that somewhere that Spirit is stirring whose inspiration is not merely confined to the official pronouncements and directives of the Church, or to the holders of official positions in her. Then we should be eagerly on the watch to see whether charisms were not appearing, of which only a glimpse and a feeling can initially be obtained. Then we would not make it a condition for admitting those charisms which the Spirit wills to impart (a [81] condition to which, however, we do not subject our own lives and activities) that such charisms must have no element of the human in them, nothing which has not yet been purified out. For this is not possible in view of the fact that even the fire of the Holy Spirit burns up from the thorn-bush of our human – all too human – nature.

The second requirement is the courage to take risks. Let us permit ourselves to reiterate most strongly what has just been said. We live in an age in which it is absolutely necessary to be ready to go to the utmost extremes of boldness in our attitude towards the new and the untried, to that point at which it would be, beyond all dispute, simply inconceivable for one who accepts Christian teaching and has a Christian conscience at all to go any further. In practice the only admissible 'tutiorism' in the life of the Church today is the tutiorism which consists in taking risks. Today, when we are struggling to solve the real problems which confront us, we should not, properly speaking say: 'How far must I go?' because the very nature of the situation itself absolutely compels us to go at least as far as possible. We should be asking ourselves, rather: 'How far can we go by taking advantage of all the possibilities in the pastoral and theological spheres?' The reason is that the state of the kingdom of God is certainly such that we must be as bold as possible in taking risks in order to hold out in the manner demanded of us by God. For instance in œcumenical questions we should not ask: 'What do we have to concede to the separated brethren?' but 'How can we create, in every conceivable way, the conditions which make possible a fruitful encounter with them, provided only that the measures which we take are reasonable, and are in any way reconcilable with the Christian and Catholic conscience?' 'How can we be sufficiently bold and unreserved in doing this, for today it is simply out of the question for us to do anything less in order to bring the unity of Christians at least one step nearer?' It appears to me that this kind of 'tutiorism' should be applied to these and many other questions. In other words one should take as the motive force of one's actions the conviction that for these particular times of ours (the principle does not apply permanently to all times) the surest way is the boldest, and that the best chance to gain all, or at any rate something is not caution, but the utmost boldness in taking risks. And if we do adopt this attitude, then there will be a radical change of policy in many of the questions now being canvassed in the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

What is needful in order for the Spirit not to be stifled is a true and bold [82] interpretation of what obedience to the Church really means. It is a holy virtue. The Spirit of Christ in the Church manifests itself in obedience to the established authorities of the Church. That is no true Spirit of Christ which leads us outside the Church of the bishops, the Pope, the official ministers of the Church. But it is important to recognise the truth that the work of the Spirit in the Church takes effect not only through these official ministers, but through those over whom they preside as well; that his influence also extends in the inverse direction, from the ministered to the ministers. And if this is true, then the individuals upon whom God bestows the grace, and also the burden of charisms (and it would be better if more of the Church's members would commit themselves to accepting that the Spirit might be entrusting them with such gifts and such responsibilities) have also a right and a duty to avoid simply hiding behind an attitude of dumb obedience – in truth not in the least because it is a humble attitude, but because it is a comfortable one. Rather they must speak out – proclaim what they believe to be true, for it is quite possible that this may be the truth of the Spirit of God himself. They must be tireless in testifying to it even in the presence of the established authorities in the Church, and even when it is inconvenient or unpleasing to those 'authorities', even when they themselves have to endure the sufferings of the charismatic for doing so, in the form of misunderstanding and perhaps even disciplinary action on the part of the authorities. The spirit of true obedience is present not so much where the official machinery of the Church is running smoothly and without friction, not so much where a totalitarian régime is being enforced, but rather where the non-official movements of the Spirit are recognised and respected by the official Church in the context of a universal striving for the will of God, while the 'charismatics' for their part, while remaining faithful to their task, maintain an attitude of obedience and respect towards the official Church. For it is God and God alone who builds the one Church, shaping the true course of her history as he himself wills out of the materials of the multiplicity of spirits, tasks and ministries in the Church, and out of the ensuing tensions and oppositions which are so necessary. And further this course may seem quite different from the one thought out and planned in the official councils of the Church's ministers, even though these are quite right and are only fulfilling their bounden duty in so planning a course for the Church.

A further prior condition which is necessary if the Spirit is to become a vital force in the Church is the courage to endure the inevitable antagonisms [83] in the Church which we have just mentioned. The Church is not 'one heart and one soul' in such a way, or to such an extent that there can be no controversy, none of the pain of mutual misunderstandings in her. There are, in fact, many charisms in the Church, and no one individual possesses them all. Nor is it given to any one individual to have all the various kinds of charisms at his disposal. For even though the authorities of the Church are united, and even though they are at one in their care to ensure that there shall be one faith and one love in her, this does not imply that the official Church exercises any real controlling power over all the charisms. On the contrary many different opinions are upheld among us Christians, and this is as it should be. We should manifest many different tendencies, and there is no necessity for each to be positively suitable for all. The sort of love that might be designed to weld all into one uniform whole would be all too easy. But in the Church it is the Spirit of love who must reign, binding the many and divers gifts in their very diversity into a unity. One who possesses this love recognises and accepts others too according them their due value even though they are different from himself and even in cases in which he no longer 'understands' them. The principle which is given to the Church as a concomitant of the love she has to preserve in all her actions lays down that everyone in the Church must follow his own spirit, so long as it is not established beyond all doubt that he is in fact following a pseudo-spirit. In other words it must be presumed, until the contrary is proved, that he is orthodox in his beliefs, that he is a man of good will, and that he has a right to his freedom. To proceed from the opposite assumption would be contrary to the principle mentioned above. Moreover, while it is once more true that it rests with the official authorities and not simply with those subject to them to judge whether in the individual case it has been proved that a pseudo-spirit is being followed, it is no less true that those authorities themselves have the sacred duty, for which they will have to render account at the Day of Judgment, of examining themselves in a spirit of humility and self-criticism, to see whether such proof really has been put forward, or whether they have been over-hasty or self-willed in their judgment, judging merely by the standard of their own spirit and their own lights. Patience, tolerance, according to others their due freedom so long as it has not been proved beyond all doubt that their actions are wrong (and not the contrary of this: to forbid all personal initiatives until they have been explicitly proved to be orthodox, the subordinate sustaining the burden of proof here) – [84] all these are specifically ecclesiastical virtues, which flow from the very nature of the Church. For she is not a totalitarian organisation. Such virtues are the necessary conditions for ensuring that the Spirit shall not be stifled.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is no spirit of indifference to the Church's authorities which leads us to presuppose these virtues in the authorities and to act accordingly. On the contrary it is itself a Christian virtue. One can take for granted that there will inevitably be antagonisms in the Church, for this is something inherent in her very nature as formed by the will of God. There is no need, therefore, to wait for a formal and positive expression of consent on the part of the ecclesiastical authorities for each and every enterprise in order to be able to say: 'We too have the Spirit of Christ'. But if anyone were to conclude from what has just been said that each and every movement in the Church must be allowed to have its head, that no-one should really take it upon himself to appraise the movement of a different party within the Church, to issue warnings against it or to demand genuinely and in all sincerity that it should be resisted, then such an one would have misunderstood what I have just been saying. For to impose this interpretation on what has been said would be precisely to deny that the various movements, tendencies and charismatic impulses, in so far as these are genuine, really do develop within one Church, and that they must really be experienced as the counterpoise to corresponding movements, tendencies etc. in others. Besides such a one would be maintaining by implication that no movement could develop within the Church without the gift of the Spirit from above. Now this is not true. Neither the faithful in general nor the holders of official positions in the Church in particular are equipped with any such a priori immunity to the innate promptings of the spirit of this world. We must therefore be able to summon up the courage or charism – for this can, in fact, precisely be a gift imparted to one particular member of the Church – to say 'No!' as members of the Church. To take up a stand against particular tendencies and outlooks, and that too even before the actual officials of the Church have been awakened to the danger which threatens. For to say 'No!' in this way can be the means of rousing the official Church to perform its function. But it is precisely when we do find the courage to accept these conflicts and tensions within the Church, this real multiplicity of gifts and charisms, of tasks and functions, that we draw the sting from the struggle between opposing tendencies which always and inevitably do occur even within the Church, that we transform that [85] struggle into the strivings of love, and that we set the Spirit free, who would otherwise be stifled.

A further factor to be numbered among the necessary prior conditions for ensuring that the Spirit shall not be stifled is that all members of the Church, whether high or low, must be convinced of the fact that of the various movements which arise and which should arise in the Church, not all of them have necessarily to be initiated by the officials and authorities at their head in order to be legitimate. These authorities must be neither surprised nor reluctant to find a movement of the Spirit manifesting itself prior to any plan or design on the part of the Church's official ministers. Nor must the faithful suppose that there is absolutely nothing for them to do until some directive has been issued from above. There are actions which are, under God's will, demanded by the conscience of the individual even before the starting signal has been given by the authorities, and furthermore the directions in which these actions tend may be such as are not already approved or established in any positive sense by those authorities. It would be necessary in such a case for the individual to think out afresh, and on the basis of this charismatic element in the Church, what place should be accorded to 'canonical approval' and to legitimatised custom contra or praeter legem.[2] By introducing such concepts as these the canonists leave room not merely for legitimate developments in the sphere of what is reasonable and just at the human level, but for the impulses of the Spirit as well. Those, therefore, who have the power to command in the Church must constantly bear in mind that not everything that takes place in the Church either is or should be the outcome of their own autocratic planning as though they belonged to a totalitarian régime. They must keep themselves constantly alive to the fact that when they permit movements to arise 'from below', this is no more than their duty; it does not constitute an act of gracious tolerance on their part. They must not seek to retain all the threads in their own hands right from the first. They must recognise that the higher – and precisely the charismatic – wisdom may quite well lie with the rank and file, and that charismatic wisdom as applied to the Church's official ministers may consist in the fact that they do not close their minds to wisdom of the former sort. The authorities in the Church must always be aware of the fact that neither the obedience which the rank and file owe to them as a [86] matter of duty on the one hand, nor the supreme juridical authority vested in themselves on the other render the rank and file devoid of rights in relation to the authorities themselves. Nor does this relationship provide any guarantee that every measure adopted by the authorities in every individual case is necessarily in conformity with what is right and pleasing to God, or that they must a priori be preserved from extremely catastrophic decisions and omissions.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

All must pray. Each one must have an anxious conscience about his own poverty and deficiency in charismatic gifts. Each one must be ready to pay heed to the gift of another, even when he himself does not possess it. Obedience must not drive out the courage of self-responsibility, nor, conversely, must the courage of one's own convictions drive out obedience. We must be resolute enough to try out even the most radical projects in the recognition that in our situation, so extreme as it is, it is no longer tolerable merely to carry on prudently along the same lines as before. And if we do all this, then perhaps we may clear the ground – even to do this much would be, once more, a grace of God – for the Spirit to quicken us, this in turn being due solely to God's grace. Then we shall have no need to fear that at the judgment of God the reproach will be levelled against us that by our inertia and cowardice we have stifled the Spirit and that we were unwilling to admit it even for a moment.

In the last hundred years the proportion of Catholics relative to other denominations has in practice failed to increase. Instead, despite all the struggles of the missions, heroic as these may appear, it has remained the same. And all this even without counting the shocking extent of the apostasies within the Church in the midst of the so-called Christian peoples. Even if the increase in the world population explosion, as it has been called, merely maintains its present rate, by the end of the present century, which some of us may yet live to see, there will be six or seven billion human beings – in other words twice as many as are living today. Now this increase will take place to far the greatest extent in that section of humanity which either in

[2] For a fuller exposition of this cf. 'Die Disziplin der Kirche' I, Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie I (Freiburg., 1964), pp. 333-343, especially pp. 336 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

practice or as a result of an absolute political prohibition lives outside the Christian sphere of influence. In view of this fact it may be presumed that in the next few decades the Catholic element in the population of the world will diminish rapidly and perhaps even startlingly. This is only one of a hundred considerations which might be advanced in order to illustrate the seriousness of the global situation in which, even from a merely secular point of view, the Church finds herself. [87] This is the situation of the world, and it is also our situation in the present, because it is no longer possible for any country to stand apart as an autocracy in the circumstances of the present time. Have we the courage and hardihood to say to ourselves: 'Do not stifle the Spirit!'? have we the unshakeable faith to trust, in spite of these warnings and exhortations to ourselves, that the Spirit of God will not let himself be stifled because he is the Spirit of him who has conquered the world upon the Cross? With this sort of sincerity and this sort of courage let us go forward as believers to the decisions which we have to make from day to day.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[88]

5

THE CHRISTIAN IN HIS WORLD

'The Christian in his World' – an inexhaustible topic, upon which only a very few stammering remarks can hesitatingly be offered! For the 'world', as envisaged for the purposes of this discussion, is incomprehensible and indescribable. It is the world of a human race that is growing gigantically and at a terrifying rate; a world which has developed into a unified compositum made up of originally distinct cultures and peoples, so that today everyone has become everyone else's neighbour and the history and destiny of every nation has become the history and, destiny of all the others as well. It is a world of rationality, of technical achievement, of atomic power, of automation, of the 'ABC weapons', of the media of mass communication, of nomadic wanderlust, of militant ideologies on the grand scale, of mass hysteria, of propaganda, of the artificial manipulation of human needs, of organised enjoyment; a world which, the more it is subjected to rational planning, the more incalculable it becomes; a world which is no longer something ready given by nature to provide a secure habitation for man, but which constitutes, rather, the material for man's own creative planning; a world the tempo of which is accelerated by man himself. But it is also a world which, after all, never ceases to belong inalienably to what is permanent and immutable in man's nature: his love, his all-transcending questioning, his longing, his loneliness, his demand for happiness and eternity. It is a world of unfathomable anguish and of death; a world that is at once terrifying and familiar to us, and which, in spite of all, we love. It is our world, our fate that we accept, for we know no other besides it. It is in this bewildering world that we live. We must see it as it really is. Let us therefore ask in all honesty: What part does the Christian play in this world?

I believe that the first point to be recognised is this: the Christian shares this world of today, just as it is, with all other men in a spirit of brotherhood. He does not flee from it. He is willing neither to live in a ghetto, nor to take refuge in history. He neither takes flight into a romantic past, [89] nor does he confine himself to one particular small group in society, in which alone he can feel happy. He accepts the world in its worldliness. He has no intention whatever of changing it back into the vanished world of the Middle Ages, in which religion exercised a direct influence upon all departments of life. He makes no pretence of knowing of some prescription, ready-made or even better than the non-Christians, for each and every problem that arises merely on the grounds that he knows that this world is encompassed by the power and compassion of the incomprehensible mystery that he calls God, and upon whom he dares to call as Father. He knows as well as anyone else that his world has been caught up in a movement the effects of which in terms of concrete living in the world no-one sees clearly, since all calculations serve only to increase the element of the incalculable. The Christian accepts this world as it is: a world of human power, and at the same time of human anxiety and utter impotence. He neither idolises it in terms of ideological dreams of utopia, nor yet does he condemn it. It exists; and the Christian, true realist that he is or that he should be, accepts it without question as the sphere of his existence, his responsibility and his proving. He can afford to be a hopeful realist because, even while remaining loyal to this world and its tasks, he is journeying towards the future that is absolute, which God himself has ordained for him, and which is coming to meet him through and beyond all the victories and defeats of this world and its history.

The second point is this: the Christian recognises the diaspora in which he has to live today, wherever he may be, as the setting of his Christian life as something in which an

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ultimately positive significance is to be found. When I use the term 'diaspora' I am using it in the biblical sense in which it is currently employed, not in the sense ascribed to it until recently, in which it designated the situation of a Catholic minority in the midst of a majority of Protestants. This nineteenth-century idea may still have a certain validity in the field of pastoral care, and still point to certain needs which have to be fulfilled. But this meaning is more and more receding into the background, and the term is being applied more and more to a fresh phenomenon, which we now have to examine. This is the society which is based on a multiplicity of ideologies: the society which, taken as a whole, and from the point of view of its constitution, its special patterns and its culture, bears the stamp of other influences besides the purely Christian one. In this society Christians, whether Catholic or Protestant, live, provided they are true Christians, in common as brothers [90] in the diaspora. It is the diaspora in this sense, in which non-Christian liberal humanism, militant atheism and the atrophy of religion are everywhere apparent, that is referred to when we use the term 'diaspora' here; the diaspora which all Christians have in common, in comparison with which the differences between the various Christian confessions seem not indeed unimportant, but historically speaking secondary. This diaspora must be seen by the Christian of today as the divinely ordained 'situation' of his own Christianity. It is the setting in which his free and personal act of faith is posited, a faith which cannot be overthrown in favour of any social ethic, the situation of free decision, of personal responsibility, of personal avowal of one's faith. And all this gives a fresh application to the old adage that Christians are not born but made. This is the situation which had to arise as a necessity of saving history. Christians know than on the one hand, if their own theological expectations of the future are to be fulfilled, they will always exist as the creed that is under attack, and on the other that when all kinds of far from homogeneous cultures are permitted to exist each in its own sphere as parts of one and the same world history, an attack on any one of them will only come from without, from those who do not belong to that particular culture. We Christians accept this situation. Certainly, in common with all other citizens we want to have the right to co-operate in the sphere of public life. Certainly we also demand that in cases in which, in spite of all variations within the community, the unified political system makes it quite unavoidable for all to have one and the same form, the Christian history of our people and the fact that the great majority of the people want to be Christians even now shall be respected. We demand in the name of freedom and tolerance that he who, in effect, gives the casting vote shall not be the one who is most radical in denying Christianity. But we Christians have no interest in maintaining Christian façades behind which no true Christianity is alive, and which serve only to compromise and to discredit such true Christianity. On the other hand it does not seem fair to us either that non-Christians, while secretly conforming to the ancient heritage of Christian culture in their private lives, nevertheless believe that they must attack Christianity in public. We Christians are not to be numbered among those who suppose that their beliefs and their conception of the world can only be rendered attractive if our faith enjoys the special protection of the state. But we do not, on that account, need to suppose that the prevailing political system must be constructed according to rationalist formulas out [91] of a few abstract principles of freedom and equality, and that it must eliminate every element of Christianity which has contributed in the course of history to the make-up of this political system. We accept the situation of a society made up of a multiplicity of cultures, in which Christianity exists as a diaspora. But it is to the society so constituted that we ourselves precisely belong, the masses of our own people together with the heritage of a tradition that has lasted more than a thousand years. This is no mere ballast, but rather genuine riches, carrying with it responsibilities for the future. We recognise that we must genuinely accept this situation. In other words we must be prepared to be critical of ourselves, and to maintain a constant awareness of the fact that on our own principles we ourselves in turn have to

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

accord to others their due meed of freedom even when they use this freedom to come to decisions which run counter to Christianity itself. But while recognising this let us add in all honesty in our dialogue with non-Christians that the formal rules of the game of democracy are not sufficient of themselves to make it possible for all to live together in peace and freedom. For a society or state to exist it is indispensable that there shall be a single common basis of ultimate moral convictions, whether this be the natural law or whatever we may like to call it, or whether the state itself has a code of laws already drawn up in the concrete and conditioned by its own past history. Furthermore, where necessary this common basis in moral law can and must be defended by the power and authority of the society and state itself. It is not easy to accord due value to all these principles at the same time, and so to arrive at a firm conclusion as to what is right for us of today. We are quite ready to enter into discussion, are anxious for a fair and open dialogue with all, and are even ready to entertain reasonable compromises. On the other hand we refuse to be intimidated when we are stigmatised as bigots, narrow-minded reactionaries, or intolerant, merely on the grounds that we hold that Christian ideas too must be allowed to exert their due influence in the sphere of political life. We have only to compare our position with that of that false liberalism which maintains that political life can and must undergo an ideological process of sterilisation, and that creeds and conscience should only be allowed a voice in the churches or the clubs of the humanist society. Is not this too an ideology, and a bad one at that? Since every fresh claim to freedom on the part of one involves an alteration in, and a restriction of the sphere of freedom hitherto enjoyed by another even before his consent has been obtained, no one [92] member can be allowed an absolutely unrestricted sphere of personal freedom. Hence too not all authority is ipso facto and of its very nature hostile to the very essence of freedom. Such authority may be exercised to ensure that all have a reasonable share of freedom in the one sphere of freedom that is available, and to guarantee and maintain a due share for each individual. We Christians are guilty – unhappily this is all too obvious – of sins of our own. For this reason it is difficult to say which of two sins is the more widespread among us: the sin entailed in a reactionary clinging on to Christian forms and customs in the political sphere when these have become obsolete, or the sin of being too cowardly to stand up for what is genuine and new. Perhaps the situation is even such that both sins are often committed at once, and by the same individual Christians – even, it may be, those who occupy high offices and dignities. However this may be, we Christians are willing to accept unreservedly the situation of our diaspora in a pluralistic society, and in doing so to guard against the error of taking refuge in the ghetto of a reactionary defence of the traditional for its own sake, or in the comfortable cowardice of renouncing all claims to influence the course of political life.

There is a third point to be made. It concerns the Christian community. In the situation of a complex society made up of heterogeneous elements and of a diaspora extending through the whole of that society, the Church necessarily changes from a Church of regional and national communities to a Church of believers. What we mean by this is that the members of a Christian community constitute this community not solely in virtue of the continuity of office and the stability of the institutions governing the relationships between those members, though these factors can have a decisive influence upon the lives of the individuals even prior to the personal decision of faith which each one takes for himself. A further factor is precisely this free personal decision of faith which each individual member has won his way to in striving to come to terms with the pluralistic environment. Without impugning the sacramental significance of baptism (including infant baptism) it can be said that for the purpose of the concrete social realities of this environment the Christian community no longer depends (or at least depends less and less) upon baptism and the ecclesiastical institutions as such, but rather on the free exercise of faith. We are, of course, living through a period of transition from the regional or national Church to the Church of believers, and the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Church cannot, in her solicitude for the salvation of all, use her official institutions arbitrarily [93] to accelerate this process of transition. At the same time she must recognise that in this situation one new member who decides to join her from his own genuine decision of faith carries more weight than three who, while belonging or seeming to belong to her, really do so only because of the weight of social tradition.

In this situation two points of importance emerge with regard to the community, and therefore with regard to the task of the individual Christian in the Church as well. On the one hand there must be a continual emergence of genuine new communities. The Church must be manifestly seen to be sustained by the faith of all not merely in her institutions and her official organisation, for this depends upon itself and regards the Christians merely as the subject of its own salvific activities. Church means people of God. Church is identical with ourselves – all of us who believe and bear witness to the world as a community of faith, of eternal hope and love, to the grace and pardon of God in Christ. If such a community is to exist and to constitute a living representative of the Church at one particular place, then the bond of brotherhood between all the members of the community must transcend all differences of individual functions in the community and all distinctions between those who hold official positions in it and those who do not, necessary though such distinctions may be. This bond of brotherhood must overcome and endure through all such distinctions. It must be possible for the established authorities and the ordinary Christians to communicate with one another. All must feel personally responsible and be ready to give their active participation, their hearts and, where necessary, their material resources too in order to ensure the vitality of the community. We must come to know each other and cohere, must play our part in maintaining the liturgy and the attitude of neighbourliness. We must not be willing merely to receive the Church, but must be ready to give; we must positively want to make contact, to get to know people, to help and to serve. The community must recognise that it, and in it the Church, is not merely an organisation based on religious techniques with the function of satisfying individual religious needs, but the community of those who, because they are united in Christ, are also united among themselves. They must be united in such a way that their communal life signifies not merely philanthropy or benevolence towards their fellow men, not merely orthodoxy or reception of the sacraments, not merely a willingness to pay the Church's dues, but truly that love which, confronted in the concrete [94] with a 'neighbour', a 'fellow worker in the household of the faith', does not fail, but rather proves itself. The educated man who is, in the nature of things, an individualist, and who thereby becomes all too easily an egoist with his head in the clouds, has a special responsibility and special tasks here, always provided that he is in earnest in wanting to live a Christian life. He must not, in the first instance, ask: 'What has the community to offer me', but rather, 'What can I myself give to it in the form of active participation, example and help'. Certainly his most important 'lay apostolate' will be found in the sphere of his life 'in the world', his profession, his specialised knowledge, in the secular and civic community, among his fellows at what seems to be the merely human level. Certainly as a Christian too he will have to prove himself here first, in the sphere, therefore, in which there is no need whatever to try and stick a Christian label on his life so that everyone else, wherever he may be, can at once notice what he is. For even such virtues as goodness, faithfulness, courage, a manifestly reasonable attitude to the problems of life and death, self-discipline and a readiness to take responsibility together with other human virtues – these do not cease to be Christian virtues merely because they are sometimes practised in an exemplary manner by those who do not consider themselves to be Christians at all. And even such virtues, provided they are exercised and lived to the bitter end, to the point at which they become incapable of being merely 'profitable' any more, of themselves lead man to the silent mystery in which the ultimate meaning of existence consists, which alone provides it with its ultimate reason and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

significance, to God himself. But all this should precisely not be taken to imply that the Christian in the diaspora has not also the task of helping to build up the Church of God, the community of faith, hope and charity, in his own region, in order that it may bear witness to all to the fact that the ultimate meaning of human existence is not emptiness and absurdity (it makes no difference whether a man shouts his doubts aloud on this point, or maintains a discreet silence) but the absolute future that is God himself. And both factors, the task of the Christian in the world which he shares with all men of good will, and his vocation to build up the Church in the community, are ultimately one and the same. For the consecrated reality that is the Church is precisely a visible sign of the fact that the world, even in its secular aspect, and even when it is at its most worldly, is sanctified by God's grace. And when this world, together with all its sublime, its questionable and its worthless [95] elements, is accepted without reserve and as an act of deep personal decision right to the last, it shows itself to be based on the unfathomable depths of the divine.

The other point which is relevant to the contemporary 'diaspora' situation, and which concerns every Christian in his task as a Christian and as a member of the community of the Church, is this: The community for which each one is responsible must not on any account become a ghetto. This is easy to say, and sounds obvious, yet it is difficult to put into practice. There is no need here to enter into a discussion as to whether the Church of believers, the future community of the believers which has already begun to exist, should be regarded as already and inevitably having the sociological status of a 'sect', (taking this term in a completely neutral sense, and as it is used in the sociology of religion), or whether it is too misleading to formulate it in this way, since it suggests one specific state of affairs. At any rate the community, both in the present and in the future, must be a community of brothers who know one another and love one another, a community that coheres, that creates the kind of environment which is so necessary of common convictions, common aims, mutual help and mutual love, an environment in which Christian faith can develop without restriction, and can exploit all the possibilities so as to become a vital force. But then the danger inevitably arises of a community of this kind becoming a 'sect' in the bad sense, of it forming a ghetto, living as a sort of religious 'back to the land' community. This makes it all too possible to arrive at the unfortunate situation of withdrawing, from an intellectual, cultural and social point of view, into a sort of 'hole-and-corner' existence, having too little to do with normal life, feeling that one belongs to an esoteric and exclusive club, in which the members mutually confirm one another's positions. All this on the grounds that the estimate which the world, the public at large, makes of the Christians is that they represent a quantité négligeable of harmless religious ideologists or fanatics whom one does not have to take seriously because they are incapable of coping with the realities of life. This is not how it must be. The Christian community must not be a fire that warms only itself. It must not be a preserve for life's inadequates, or a rosary confraternity for harmless souls who can achieve nothing more than to be pious, and to make this piety of theirs their sole contribution. An analogy may be drawn between the Christian community and a modern family with a healthy outlook and attitude towards life. A family of this kind is [96] no longer willing to exist in all departments of human living as an autonomous clan, withdrawing in its self-sufficiency from all others. Rather such a family comprises the concrete realisation of a personal independence and freedom which is completely and fully developed in all departments of human living. So too it must be with the Christian community. It must be open to influences from outside itself. Its members must maintain a genuine and unreserved contact in their lives with the world, its outlook, the problems that occupy it and the tasks with which it finds itself confronted today. They must not imagine that the Christian community of today can be an intellectual autonomy in the social, cultural or political spheres, or that the Church has to have an exclusive monopoly of all values and all that is important in life. What has been said of the Church as a whole at the Council must be applied to every regional Church as well. It cannot and will not continue any longer to act as an impregnable fortress with small arrow-slits in the walls from which the defenders shoot at their enemies. Now it is rather the spacious house with the large windows from which one looks out upon all spheres of humanity, all of which are encompassed by the creative power of God and by his compassion. And the altar that stands in the midst of this house is consecrated to God as a sign of grace, not only for those who actually live in the house, but for all who, in a spirit of good will and good conscience, seek to find the way to fulfil their existence. In accordance with this the preaching and teaching in the regional Churches must be of such a kind that as far as possible outsiders too, the onlookers at the divine service and those who merely take an interest, can understand what is being thought and said there. The message must not sound esoteric, as though it were aimed exclusively at a club of privileged members. Rather it must be presented as the mystery of what is manifest and the manifest in what is mysterious, for in reality everyone encounters this in his personal experience of life, even though not everyone is able to recognise it – at any rate sufficiently distinctly – as a factor which deserves to be examined and pronounced upon in its own right. If the Christian Churches of today want to enter into discussions of an ecumenical kind, or on subjects of theological controversy, then they must make sure that this discussion does not sound like a discussion between two ghetto-like ideologies. Rather it must be conducted first and foremost as a general discussion among Christians concerning the possibility of a more genuine encounter with the world which is not Christian or which has not sufficiently realised [97] its own Christian depths. It must be an attempt undertaken in common to think out afresh the eternal validity of the Christian message for the world and its future. I believe that ecumenical discussions of this kind will, in the long run, only be fruitful if they are, at the same time, discussions with the world of today, which has quite different questions to put to Christianity than those which the confessions are accustomed to put to each other. In its struggle against everything that smacks of a sectarian mentality or of the outlook of the ghetto the Christian community must make sure alike in the presentation of its services, the expression of its faith and its community life that it spares no effort to banish and to keep banished every element of the old-fashioned, the prudish, the ‘old-world’, the bigoted – everything, in short, which derives merely from one specific social group, and one specific historical tradition. This does not mean that the Church needs to deny the folly of the Cross, the high ethical standards of the Sermon on the Mount, the need for discipline and the courage of non-conformity. In the heritage of its own past it has preserved sufficient in the way of human and cultural treasures to be able to present itself to the world even today. And that free and unconstrained discipline in moral matters which it stands for and wishes to practise will once more always evoke a response from what is best in the hearts of others also – providing only that there is no attempt at evading the full rigour of contemporary moral problems by failing to face up to the dire needs which are with us every day, or by withdrawing ourselves from these in our thinking and living alike to areas where life has already passed us by. More than ever before the Christian community must always be developing fresh points of contact, which eliminate that feeling on the part of the so-called ‘outsider’ that he is an alien and is viewed with distrust, or else is merely the object of a plot to win converts. The Church must give these the chance to feel themselves to be close friends even though they may not always be able to share in all her dogmatic or moral principles.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

For the community of the present day to reconcile both of the tasks confronting it, to be truly a family united by one faith, and at the same time an open missionary community, venturing boldly on intercourse with the world, is not easy. It is not easy to ensure that the nucleus of the community shall not be made up of individuals who have nothing else to do than to be pious. This is not to say anything against those individuals who, in the wisdom of old age and under the shadow of approaching death, are pious in a very true sense, and are so precisely because to be [98] anything else in this situation would simply be cowardice and a flight from reality. But in its more active sections the community must be made up of those who recognise that in the celebration of the mystery of the Lord's death it is the focal point of their own lives that is made sacramentally present. They must be coming fresh from their work in the world precisely to the recognition of this fact: to find in the dead and risen Lord the ultimate outpouring of grace upon human existence in this present world, and so to go out once more from the experience of, and the act of receiving, this grace to joy and confidence in the fact that their worldly life has been redeemed in its worldliness, and while remaining worldly. But it will be necessary to construct far clearer and more convincing concrete prototype examples than hitherto of what the way of life and social patterns of such communities must be in order for the men of today to feel immediately at home in them. These examples must include preaching, confession, liturgy, work for neighbours in the parish, the charity of the community as a whole. When all this still leaves so much to be desired it becomes absolutely the first duty and task for the Christian of today to collaborate patiently and unselfishly in the construction of such communities, and not to take the lack of them as an excuse for holding himself dispensed from selfless service of this kind.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The fourth and final point is the most difficult, and at the same time the most attractive. Christianity, always ancient yet always new, as it always has been, is and will remain, is, even in these 'diaspora' conditions, and even today, the grace bestowed upon Christians and at the same time the task with which they are presented. We are moving on in ever-increasing tempo to the world of tomorrow, to the unification of world history; to a world oppressively closed in upon itself by the increase of world population; to a world of technical achievements undreamt of as yet, and social patterns of a still more complex character. But at its ultimate roots it still remains the world which everyone has already experienced in the depths of his own heart, and it is inevitable that it should be so. It is the world of happiness and doubt, the world of innocence and guilt, the world of life and death, the world of loneliness and freedom, of love, of faithfulness, of service – that world which, in virtue of what it is, in virtue of its movement outwards and forwards and its terrible imperfections leading to its final collapse in death, raises the question inexorably of the ultimate mystery of itself, God. And why should this be so? It is because in its unfolding process this world is encompassed and upheld right to its [99] innermost depths and in the course of its history by a greater movement, in which God himself encounters it to judge it and to endow it with grace. It is because in the long run no one can fail to hear the ultimate all-embracing question silently put to him, even if, in his own thoughts and in his own life he wants to deny that one should entertain the idea of the incomprehensible. This is the situation that is old and ever new, the truly Christian situation which transcends from the outset all lesser situations, whether old or new which are confined to a particular epoch. We recognise, therefore, that our lives depend in the most radical, and yet in the most obvious sense, upon God; that we are hidden in the absolute mystery which receives us, and in receiving us forgives the sinfulness of our lives and endows us with the grace of itself. Everything else which contributes to our lives is included in this. This assent on God's part is present in Jesus Christ in the dimension of our history, and in that he has shared in our common human lot (not only, therefore, in the labyrinthine depths of our own consciences). We celebrate the death of this same Jesus Christ as our salvation, and in so celebrating it accept our own death also as the drawing of our existence into the immediate ambience of God. In doing this we seek truly to endure that death in this life in such a way that we feel ourselves to be truly the Church, the community of those who have ceased to value this life for its own sake. And all this too remains, even today, that which is old and yet new, and always the same in Christianity, and at the same time that which corresponds to the contemporary situation in which we find ourselves. We must never lose sight of this fact when we ask ourselves anxiously how the Christian should appear in his contemporary environment, and what he ought to be doing today. Much that concerns this problem must be raised in fresh forms and answered anew, and much must remain open. But the innermost and ultimate meaning of the question and answer is still always to be found, even if the finding of it is constantly and indisputably conditioned by the problems and vicissitudes of the particular situation in history that is ours as distinct from all others. For even in this environment, the ultimate question is this: Whether in the midst of the tasks and struggles of this life we respond unreservedly to the call of him who is first and last, present from the very origins and still present in the most distant future, committing ourselves to him in faith, hope and love, in the act of believing that this First and Last has made himself known to us and borne witness of himself to us in the love that is in Jesus Christ, the crucified and risen Lord.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[100]

6

‘I BELIEVE IN THE CHURCH’

Dogma and dogmatic definitions are always a scandal. Let us admit this much to ourselves; many of the statements included in the Church’s ‘dogmatic definitions’ are repugnant to us at the first hearing. All assertions which are intended to be more than the mere temporary expressions of positions which are being maintained in the living context of some discussion are somehow ipso facto strange and unpleasing to us of the present day. It is only with an effort that we can entertain them, and, as it were, not without a struggle to overcome our repugnance. We may recall our reactions when we hear pronouncements concerning personages of the past, concerning ‘heaven’, ‘the resurrection’, ‘original sin’ and many similar topics. Is not this reaction of ours rather like that of a man who, when he is already exhausted and wearied to death, has to listen to a lecture on the technique of how to calculate a matrix of the metaphysics of being? We hear these statements and know what they are intended to convey. We have the impression that we know just as well as the speaker himself what he means, and yet we do not really take it in. Indeed, in our innermost selves, so filled are we with leaden depression and sheer desolation, we have the feeling that there is one thing that we actually know better than the man who is addressing us on these topics. We feel that we know that he does not understand what he is saying, that he does not notice how inappropriate it is at this stage to speak in these terms, even if it ever was appropriate. The effort of will required of us by those who thus address us seems too great, and in any case meaningless and superfluous. We must have patience here. It is impossible to make everything clear and intelligible all at once. All that we intend at this point is to remind ourselves of something which the Catholic Church recognises and acknowledges as self-evident for its own faith. Such a reminder may well be useful for many in the contemporary situation, who already know it all in principle, or ought to know it. For him who cannot [101] tread paths such as these this article can serve as a quiet exploration of his own convictions. It is precisely this kind of individual who must reflect that much still remains to be said in other contexts, for instance about the sinfulness of the Church, the limits of the Church’s authority etc. (on this cf. the relevant articles in Theological Investigations VI (London & Baltimore, 1969).

We are not unbelievers. Oh yes the earlier ‘attitude of unbelief’ familiar to us from our fathers’ time – that is something that we could not revert to even if we wished. The only real practitioners of this who still survive are those who are behind the times (admittedly there may be many of these). How insolent it was, and how exaggerated were its claims to knowledge, this unbelief! It is no credit to us that we can no longer entertain it. Our minds have encountered too many factors which are obscure, and which cannot be dismissed as mere fancies such as might be expected swiftly to dissolve before the light of our intellect. And our heart has felt too much in the way of sorrows even to death through these incomprehensible factors for us to imagine that we could not believe because we know too much. But it is precisely at this point that our difficulty arises. We are, as it were, susceptible to an overdose of the light of faith. Faith is not difficult to us of today on the grounds that we can explain things sufficiently without it, but because faith itself seems to us to be trying to explain more than we can bear. A given statement – e.g. that concerning the bodily assumption of Mary into heaven – seems to be asserting almost too much. It seems to have a clear and happy knowledge of what is meant by the body and its resurrection, by ‘now’, and by ‘heaven’. Yet our faith, so difficult and arduous as it is, yet so tough, so wholly devoid of false pathos or exhibitionism, consists in a constant 'Lord help thou my unbelief!' It takes the ultimate reserves of strength in our hearts to sustain this appeal and at the same time in any one individual it is the ultimate strength upon which his heart can call. For this reason our faith is not curious, eager for novelty. It appeals to God and finds him on the Cross of Christ, tortured to death by us. It reaches out to the sacramental life because it seeks to meet the word of grace in that context in which we find ourselves on this earth and at this particular stage in earthly history. It knows that faith means faith in the Church, and that scripture and oral tradition have been transmitted in the Church. For the monologue which we conduct with ourselves, and in which we are on our own, turning things over and over in our minds, would finally have [102] driven us into doubt if it were not for the fact that this doubt had been transformed by God's own grace into a readiness to hearken to the word that has been sent down with full authority from above in the Church of Christ.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If we want to hear the message that has an absolute value for us, i.e. that decides the ultimate meaning of our lives in our earthly here and now, and in human words, then it cannot simply be left to us to work out for ourselves, but must confront us as the word of authority handed down by God himself, which does not bow to our will, and yet which must at the same time consist in something more than mere abstract or transcendental truths, i.e. statements of universal principle which are so general and vague in their application (however important they may be) that they still manage to survive and to carry some kind of force and authority even when they are denied. Without this kind of message, brought to us in this way, we would either be alone and defenceless, or at most our only weapon of defence would be mere 'metaphysics', and this would be like a net the meshes of which were so hopelessly wide that they would let the concrete reality of our own being, the life we have to live and for which we are responsible, slip through and escape. What is needed in view of all this is a declaration that is authoritative and concrete, and that we encounter as binding upon us. And this is given to us in the word of the Church, which itself encounters us and addresses us as the active mediator of the message, whether we hear it or not. So we are believers, hearers of the word of God as found in the mouth of the Church. What the Church says is our light and our strength, the love of the living God in spite of all the darkness, the word of forgiveness in spite of the experience of our own sins, the word of the Holy Ghost which has been poured out into our hearts in spite of all that they have experienced in the way of weariness, feebleness and emptiness – in short the word of Jesus Christ, the Son of God and at the same time truly man, crucified and raised from the dead into the eternal life of God, he who has plumbed the depths of human destiny, the presence of God in this world, the source of salvation and of peace, Lord of those who believe in him and recognise with trust that their destiny is hidden in him, the head of those who have been called and redeemed, who together with him make up that fellowship of truth and love and mercy which we call the Church, visible for what he is in himself in the authority which has been handed down to its official ministers in the word of God, both written and proclaimed, and in the visible sacraments of the Church. [103] Now if it is true that we are confronted with a message from this Church, how is it that it appears so new and (at any rate in some sense) unaccustomed, 'hard' (Jn 6:60) and forbidding?

Let us gradually get down to work. We are not concerned here to examine the content of such a message. We ask only what the attitude is which we ourselves must adopt in order to hear such a message aright at all.

Undoubtedly it is quite possible to fail to experience something because one is not listening – not listening because one is too indolent or too proud. It is possible to misunderstand something because one takes the initial difficulty of understanding as an excuse for impatience and impertinent contradiction. All new knowledge is intended to change him who acquires it, but it is only with reluctance, or at any rate not with any great eagerness, that we allow ourselves to undergo the painful process of being changed in this way. We want always to remain just as we are (however unhappy we may be in the circumstances in which we find ourselves). What is new is always unfamiliar and frightening. The only thing we hope to gain from the acquisition of any 'new' knowledge is to confirm ourselves in our existing position: 'That is precisely as I had already thought. That is right' (In other words it agrees with my own preconceptions; although we do not actually say this). Real truths, however, when they make their initial impact upon us, make us shy away. They carry further implications beyond themselves; they threaten us, change us, compel us to enter areas of thought in which we can no longer take custom and habit as a substitute for insight, in which we no longer feel ourselves at home, and in which reality appears in a guise which is not yet faded and subdued by familiarity, where that which seems so terrifying and so dangerous now has not yet become a part of our everyday lives.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

What an experience it must be when it is a truth of God that is making its initial impact upon us! What ought our attitude to be to such an occurrence in order not to deny it from the outset? If we are sinners (do we admit this or not?), if we always have the sinister inclination to suppress the truth of God (Rom 1:18), if we are tempted to reduce the truth of God in its greatness to the petty dimensions of human 'truth', then it is obvious that when we first encounter the word of God we are always at first blinded and dazzled by its brilliance, bewildered and upset by the fact that it is so immeasurably above us. And because of this it is to be expected a priori that we should be vexed and out of humour because [104] the message sounds so hard to our ears. We are always tempted to believe that God's word is improbable and complicated (In spite of the fact that because of its immeasurable depths it is divinely simple). We are always inclined to explain away the message as not in conformity with God's nature, and therefore as false and erroneous. But in reality what we mean by this is that it is not in conformity with our own prior conceptions of God, which we presume to be correct, with that particular element of the divine which we have contented ourselves with recognising. It is to be expected from the outset that we shall find reasons enough for taking scandal from the lowly guise in which we encounter the message. It will appear utterly and hopelessly foolish, 'primitive', so far removed from anything sublime or wise that to the world, that is ourselves, it appears as folly and scandal, especially if we are encountering it for the first time. We have heard the old message so often that it sounds familiar to us. We only give half an ear to it, and we are, so to say, 'padded' against the scandal of it by custom (just as in fact we have become accustomed to our own sins and our liability to death, so that the most terrible things strike us as entirely 'natural'). Thus the incarnation of God, the Cross on which God was abandoned by himself to failure make the same kind of impression upon us as a long-familiar piece of furniture in our own houses. We no longer feel either astonishment or exaltation as we look upon it. It is simply 'there', and it is taken for granted that it is right. Let us simply leave it as it is! But if a message of God makes a fresh and unwonted impact on our minds, ill-prepared as they are for it, then this lack of prior dispositions on our part causes us to react with explicit hostility. Our minds, under these circumstances, cannot fail to be kindled to resentment at it. In such a case it is no longer possible for us to apply the tactics of a studied lack of attention. It is no longer possible to continue to wage merely a cold war that is beneath the surface against the truth of God. Man's contradiction of, and revulsion against the truth of God comes to the surface and is made explicit. A thousand reasons for objecting to it will suggest themselves to us. The first will be that it is new. The second that we have enough to believe in as it is without this. The third that we have to be suspicious of those who convey the message to us on the grounds that they are exaggeratedly pious, or else over-zealous enthusiasts. The fourth will be that in any case the matter is unimportant. And so we go on. All these can be real reasons, and are not necessarily false in themselves in every case. Only they do not constitute any genuine

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[105] grounds for resisting the truth of God. Rather they are human objections, deriving from the guise of lowliness and abasement in which the word of God has become incarnate and human, and in which it still continues to do so ever anew.

There is nothing to be particularly ashamed of in the fact that we, or rather sinful and earthly man in us, do take scandal in this manner at the truth of God. It is predictable from the outset that we shall do so. Indeed, if we were to find the truth of God too easy to accept (as do many of the 'devout'), then this rather would be a sign that all was not well; that we had so radically misunderstood this truth that it was no longer the truth that God wanted us to have at all. The truth of God never comes as a kind of poetic consolation or a devotional story for children. But even though it is never this in reality, it can be misunderstood in this sense. And when it is so misunderstood it can be degraded into a sedative to soothe the nerves; in which form it enters easily into the disposition of a 'devout soul'. But this is not a sign that there is an especially firm faith at work here, and that the light of God is shining especially brightly. We have no need, therefore, to envy those endowed with 'spirituality'. If God performs miracles of grace in their case, and the new knowledge is born in them without any birth-pangs, let them have the honour and glory of it! But the grace of faith can work in an obstinate spirit and a rebellious heart as well, and usually this is the way in which God performs his greatest miracles.

As we have said, we have to reckon with the fact that the truth of God, even when it really is the truth of God, does not necessarily 'suit' us. It does not suit us because we do not suit it until we have altered ourselves in order to do so. We must protect ourselves from ourselves. The humility of a sensitive spirit, readiness for change, the courage to take the pain of a new idea, prayer for light from above – these will achieve what is necessary. We do not need to be alarmed when we find that at first a new message shocks us. But we must take care that this initial scandal is made to conduce to our salvation. Now it does this when it startles us and stimulates us into adopting an attitude of patient attentiveness, of enduring the toil involved in learning something new (how hard this seems to us 'old' men!), of praying for light, for the sincerity and readiness to receive which one owes to any word if there is even a chance that it may turn out to be the word of God.

Now that we have sketched in a few rough general outlines, indicating [106] the inner attitude which we ought initially to adopt, we may go on to say something on a further point, namely on the objective sphere outside ourselves in which alone all our efforts can be brought to their true fruition. This sphere is the Church and the Church as object of faith. It is strange. As believers who receive the word of God from the mouth of the Church as God's own truth and as the good tidings of our own salvation, we feel ourselves to be faithful children of the Church. We feel ourselves to be so and indeed we are. And yet when we are confronted by this same Church with a truth that is new and startling – we do not merely have to think of the definition of the glorification of the Blessed Virgin, there are plenty of other examples – then we shrink into ourselves. Then we are startled out of the slumber of habit and custom, which we confuse with the quiet confidence of real faith, and we recognise that after all we do not belong so manifestly and so unreservedly as we had somewhat complacently supposed to the sphere of faith that is the holy Church. We suddenly realise that the reason why we had found it easy to accept the earlier truths was that they were our truths, our habits of mind, and not because they were those of the Church. But now we have to take ourselves in hand, abstracting wholly, in the initial stages, from the actual content of the new message of which we have become aware, and we must ask ourselves: 'Where do I stand, where do I want to stand in order to hear this message aright, to heed it and to believe in it?' And our answer will be: 'In the faith of the Church'. What, then, does this mean? What do we mean by that acknowledgment which we have made innumerable times with heart and lips from our youth upwards: 'I believe in the holy Catholic Church'?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The Church is the object of our faith, and, in a mysterious manner, at the same time the dimension in which it exists. In this dimension alone is it possible to have anything like the fulness of Catholic faith. These two aspects of our faith are mutually complementary, and it makes no difference to our present argument at which of the two points the actual act of faith on the part of the individual is initiated in the concrete: whether he believes in the Church first and then in the rest of the matters proposed for his belief because these come from the Church, or whether he first attains to belief in Christ and his word, and goes on from there to belief in the Church as founded by Christ. In any case, where faith is found in its Catholic fulness and its inner firmness, both aspects are present. On the basis of his faith in Christ the believer includes the Church too in his faith [107] in such a way that it immediately becomes the direct medium and rule of faith as such.

As Christians we believe in that word that comes to us from the incarnate Word of the Father. We live and die on the basis of his message to us, basing everything with hearts and souls and with all our strength on the fact that there is no other name in heaven or on earth in which we could be blessed than the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, crucified and risen. But he is at once the head, the foundation stone and the architect of that entity, visible yet so mysterious, which we call the Church. Like her Master and Head she extends her influence throughout reality in all its dimensions. To her belongs the Spirit whom he has poured out upon all flesh when he departed to the Father at his death, in order that he may come in the Spirit of his Father, who is his Spirit also. To the Church belongs the incarnate Word himself, with the flesh which he took from the Virgin Mary, when, as a son of Adam, he became a member of our race in order that he who sanctifies and they who are sanctified may become a single family, in order that he may sanctify those who are his brethren according to the flesh precisely because she, the Church, has extended his compassion to these, his brethren. This Church is constituted by those whom he has sent into all the world and to all peoples to preach his word. He did this in order that what took place in the very depths of reality (whether we realise it or not) through the incarnation of the Son, his death and his resurrection, may be rendered present to the spirit of man also through the word of his messengers, and may be received in a spirit of obedience and faith into the very centre of man himself, into that dimension in which he is free to be whoever he will be, and so who he ought to be.

This divine reality, Spirit, grace, truth, compassion and love of God, which is the most real factor in the world, however much it may be hidden, is brought about by God through Christ, through his Body, through his word and his commandment, through the authority derived from him, through his sacraments in their palpable and physical reality, their concrete apprehensible presence in the here and now. It is brought about in such a way that (in a manner similar to that in which the body renders the soul present) this reality is at once made present and apprehensible and unambiguously there, and at the same time veiled in the lowly guise of the form of a servant. The believer, therefore, possesses the grace of God in this form, and at the same time it is only to the believer that it is [108] recognisable as the true presence of grace. This means that the Church (just as with Christ) is God's eternal compassion and his Body as it exists in space and time, both aspects (again as with Christ) being inseparable yet distinct. Considered as the sphere of grace in this sense, and simultaneously as an historically apprehensible entity, the Church is the sole dimension in which, in the last analysis, anything like the phenomenon of the Catholic faith is possible at all. The Church is the bearer of the message of faith. She has been entrusted with the word of the Lord in the person of the apostles whom Christ sent. She hands it on faithfully to all subsequent generations. It is not handed down simply in the form of literature (not even through scripture), for even scripture is not self-authenticating, but is rather the book of the Church's memories of her own experience, so that the only one who really understands it is the Church of the origins, because she has written it with the assistance of the Holy Spirit within her. The word of God in history, which went forth once and for all in Christ and his apostles, does not drift on aimlessly, and, so to say, without an owner on the current of secular history down the centuries. Rather it is carried down in a responsible manner by those who are empowered to uphold it, and who derive their authority from the apostles. As it proceeds down the centuries it is preached, expounded and preserved by the Church, administered by her official ministers in dependence upon the bishops and upon the bishop of Rome as the concrete focal point which binds them together and welds them into a unity, and who is capable of acting in his own person. The Church is the sphere of our faith because in the plenitude of power and the authority imparted to her by Christ, (a power therefore which we, the hearers, are bound in conscience to obey) she testifies to the true doctrine of the word of Christ, and only so makes it possible for us to obtain a clear and unambiguous understanding of it. The fact that we do hearken to this word is not due to any personal initiative on our own part, by which, having found this word lost and drifting somewhere or other in history, we grasp hold of it, but rather due to the fact that it comes to us through its own movement, borne up by those who can trace their mission and the responsibilities and powers with which they have been entrusted in an unbroken chain of authority back to Christ himself. When we speak of a word we mean a word as it exists on the lips of men. When we speak of the word of Christ we mean a word as it exists upon the lips of the Church authorised by Christ. It is because she utters it that it is proved to be his word.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[109] But this is not the only sense in which the Church is the sphere of our faith. The Church has a priority in belief. The life of God brought to us through what we call faith and love, is first bestowed upon her, and upon the individual in her. It is not as though she had a separate existence as a mythical entity behind and beyond the individual believers. She is the Church because individuals have taken it upon themselves as an act of personal responsibility and decision to believe. But do not let us forget this: it is precisely this decision that is the act and the work of God, and only truly the salvific act of man when it is faith in Christ as the Word of God already present and real in history. And hence this actual act of faith in the concrete on the part of the individual presupposes that the divine reality is already present in the world. Now this reality is presented to mankind not as a unified group of individuals, but to man as the brother of the Son, one brother among many, as a member of the people called to believe, to man as already inextricably involved from the outset in a common destiny of sin and of salvation. The community of those who have been called out of the world, all of whom are in Christ Jesus, the Body of Christ, the house of God which the Lord has built – this community, therefore, is a reality, and can be so (however many further ‘fellowships’ there may be apart from it, and indeed, all the more so because of them) which has, at least in a certain sense, a priority over the individual, so that it sustains him, and without it he himself would not be what in fact he is, and could not act as in fact he is able to act as a member of such a community. The Church, therefore, as the fellowship of the faithful, is not merely the sum total of those who believe, each one on his own responsibility, and who are united to Christ by this fact. Rather it has a priority over the belief of the individual. It supplies the support and the basis of that belief. Certainly that belief is brought about by the Lord of grace and truth, and his act of grace is aimed at those men, the community of those joined together in one flesh and in one Spirit. Belief, therefore, is indeed a matter which is utterly personal to each individual man, and yet it is not simply his own ‘private concern’. It follows that faith is only completely and truly possible in the community of the faithful, in the Church. Faith, therefore, always includes the act of trustful and loving surrender to the faith of the Church, active participation in the faith of the divine community of truth, for which the Lord has supplied the basis by giving of his flesh and his Spirit, and by being its true founder. Faith does not only mean accepting what ‘I’ as an individual believe that I have [110] heard. It also means accepting what the Church has heard, giving my assent to the 'confession' of the Church. The Church is not merely the upholder of the message of Christ in the sense that she extends it to the individuals (only to disappear once more after the manner of a postman). Rather she is the enduring and abiding medium of faith, that in which faith is posited in order that one voice of praise of the living God may resound as from one mouth and one body, to give glory to his compassion.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

However much, therefore, the individual may be sure that 'his' God has bestowed a special revelation upon him, and in a manner exclusive to him alone, he must make sure that in his faith he believes that which all believe. He must always be ready to give his mind in a spirit of submission, humility and obedience to the recognition of faith and the progress in faith which belongs to the Church as a whole. He cannot act as an 'heretic', choosing only that which pleases him as an individual. Always he must submit himself trustfully to the faith of the community of believers, which is always greater and more comprehensive than his own as an individual. Heresy is always more than merely an error concerning some specific point of faith, but rather, prior to any such deviation, error and apostasy from the Church herself, and from that insight into the inscrutable mystery of God which is bestowed upon her as the one recipient of his favour. This mystery is revealed to her as the bride of the Lamb. It is the mystery of the love of Christ made known to her in water and in the word of truth – to her, and to each of us only in so far as we are members and participants in this bride of the Lord. It is of no avail for the individual to try to rearrange and adapt his own personal ideological presuppositions, and so to arrive at Christianity by putting his own personal house in order. He can only be a Christian by entering into that house that is wide enough to shelter all, into the temple which God himself has built from living stones, and upon the rock that is Peter, the foundation of the apostles and prophets, as also of their lawful successors.

The Church, therefore, is always the measure of our faith, the measure and not that which is measured. Certainly she is the one who hears God and obeys him, the one who herself only receives the measure of her faith from the word of revelation, the word of scripture, from that understanding of her faith which God has bestowed upon her in earlier ages. Certainly she humbles herself ever anew in order to hearken to what God is saying to her in his revelation. But it is not for me as an individual to [111] put the Church to the test to see whether she does in fact conform to the measure of her faith as thus conceived, or whether, measured by the standards which do apply to her, she is indeed hearing the word of God aright. If this were the case I would in fact be setting myself up as the standard by which the Church should be measured, raising my personal understanding of the faith and my insight to be the norm of the Church. I would no longer be the one who hearkens to the Church herself. The fact that the Church does indeed hear the word of God aright is guaranteed by the Spirit who is promised to her. In the last analysis there are no norms, rules or principles for determining whether the faith of the Church herself is correct, such as I, as an individual apart from the Church, could use or apply on my initiative, regarding her, as it were, ab externo and as an objective entity. Certainly there are standards which do apply to the Church. But the fact that she submits herself to these standards, and applies them correctly in order to arrive at a true explication of her faith – that is the miracle of her own Spirit. What these standards are and how they should be applied is something which I as an individual learn precisely from seeing how she, the Church herself, does in fact apply them. And this is the only way in which I can learn this. There is no absolute standpoint apart from her affording a perspective from which she can be rightly regarded. It is only in the Spirit of God himself that she can be judged. Now the moment one decides to stand apart from her in order to judge her, and precisely to the extent that one does this, one has ipso facto lost this Spirit. The only objectivity that can be achieved in faith is the subjectivity of the Church. For the objectivity of faith is guaranteed by the Spirit of God who judges all things, and is judged by no-one. But this Spirit is present in the Church as her subjectivity, and is present nowhere else. No-one can attempt to measure this, the ultimate standard of all measures. This ultimate standard, in so far as it is apprehensible at all, actually is the Church, since the Spirit of truth has united himself inseparably to her, and to me, the individual, only to the extent that I am standing within her, and have given her the allegiance of my faith by believing what she believes. The Church is simply she who is always at the service of God, and who remains always encompassed by the power of God's truth even though, humanly speaking, she is always on the point of rebelling against the truth of God, even though she remains 'infallible' only by a miracle performed by the Spirit and constantly renewed. But it is precisely because, while remaining free, she is so possessed by the Spirit [112] that she becomes the ever-obedient servant of the truth, it is precisely for this reason and for no other that she becomes the mistress of our faith too. But she becomes this in a manner that is absolute and unconditional.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

From my point of view also – where else could I find the firm concrete criterion which I need, one which is not subject to the vagaries of my own spirit and opinions, to judge whether I as an individual and in the personal allegiance of my faith, really do stand in the truth of God? Do my conscience and the inner experiences of my spirit supply such a criterion? No! – For it is precisely this conscience of mine that attests that what my spirit demands is that faith which comes from hearing and obeying, the faith which listens and does not speak itself. But when I believe in the Church this does not take away from me the reality of my own inalienable decision of conscience in faith and for faith. I would not in fact be in the Church at all if I had not, of my own free choice and in the grace of God, given her my assent. But what I am seeking is a quality inherent not in the believing subject, but rather in the object of belief a quality which assures me that I am not mistaken as to the true content of my belief. It might be asked whether God has to supply me with such a criterion, or whether in fact he could have contented himself with assuring me in the witness of my own conscience that what I had heard was in fact his truth and not simply the voice of my own heart, so disposed as it is to evil and error. But this question may be left on one side. It is enough that God has, in fact, of his mercy, given me such a criterion: he who hears you hears me. For the fact, therefore, that it is he whom I hear I do not rely merely upon the content of the message or the overwhelming impression which it makes upon me and upon my conscience, but rather upon the fact that this message is spoken precisely by those who have been sent by the Christ of God. According to the word of the Lord himself it is the messenger who provides the guarantee of his own message by the fact that he has himself authentically been sent. And in this sense too the Church is the guarantee of her own teaching and not, vice versa, the teaching (judged by me to be correct) the guarantee of the Church.

The teaching of the Church is inherent in the Church, and it may seem to authenticate itself by the very fact that it shares in the nature and spirit of the Church, in which humility and freedom are combined. But this is true only because this teaching is precisely an integral element in the Church herself, who can bear witness to herself because she has received her mission from Christ. Only in virtue of this fact is scripture the word [113] which can command obedience. I cannot decide to check the Church's credentials, as it were, by taking scripture away from her (even though it properly belongs to her) and by invoking it against her as a criterion apart. It is she who submits herself to the guidance of scripture. But it is not for me to check or to verify whether in fact she is doing this, for in attempting such a thing I would be setting myself up apart from the Church in order to judge her and to see whether in fact she was really doing this. The only guarantee that she is allowing herself to be guided by scripture is her own Spirit. If I wanted to take scripture alone as the sole concrete embodiment of the word of God which commands my allegiance, then, whether I realised it or not, only two alternatives would be open to me: either I would be entering into dialogue with a book which as such was incapable of defending itself against my wrong ideas or of offering any resistance to my false interpretations, and in relation to which I must in the nature of things have the upper hand, or (the second alternative) I would have to have recourse to the Spirit of the Lord which gives this book its life and defends it. But in that case, once more, the question would have to be raised as to whether in the last analysis it was the book upon which the Spirit had descended and not rather the men whom that Spirit had sent to proclaim his message and so, amongst other things, to attest a priori to the fact that what they wrote had come from the Spirit himself. And when the question is put in this form as to whether the inspiration of the Spirit bears in the first instance upon the book or upon the men sent by that Spirit, the answer can only be: upon the men.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The conclusion of all this is that he is truly a believer who hearkens to the Church and believes in the Church.

In our attempt to define what the right approach should be to the problems which arise when some specific dogma is defined in the Church one further point remains for our consideration, that namely of how the faith of the Church makes itself clearly perceptible to us in the Church.[1] A doctrine of the faith can be made explicit simply by the fact that it is preached by the official teachers of the Church universally throughout the world, and that it is believed by the hearers of the word. Those properly authorised to perform this duty of the 'ordinary' proclaiming of [114] doctrine are the bishops as successors of the apostles in union with the bishop of Rome as the successor of Peter, the head of the apostles. What these bishops preach with the assistance of the Spirit as the one faith of the Church as a whole and as the word of the living God who reveals himself is the word of the Lord, and as such is binding in conscience upon us to believe. But the proclamation of the Church's teaching can also take other forms. Prior to a new and more emphatic promulgation of teaching the Church can give added strength to her own teaching and her faith in general by bringing together the official teachers of the Church, the bishops together with the Pope, and thereby providing an assurance that what the individual official teacher is teaching and what his Church has learnt from him and holds to be true is in fact the teaching and the faith of the Church as a whole, and is thereby confirmed by the witness of God himself. In this way the teaching and understanding of the faith on specific points can acquire an intrinsic certainty, and the council can then go on to proclaim it solemnly by an extraordinary act of the teaching authority of the Church. Yet a third course is conceivable, one which, so to say, constitutes a middle path between the ordinary and extraordinary acts of the Church's teaching authority. In conformity with the position enjoyed by the bishop of Rome among his brethren, in virtue of which he is the teacher in an immediate and direct sense of them, the bishops, and all the faithful also, and in virtue of which he has the task of strengthening their faith, he, the bishop of Rome, as the successor of Peter, and as the chief teacher and shepherd of the whole Church, can lay down authoritatively what is in fact the official teaching of the Church and the faith of the Church as a whole. The Church can reflect upon the tenets of her own faith and define her position in regard to them as binding in conscience upon the individual, and when she does this the Spirit of God does not permit her to fall into error. Furthermore, as the chief teacher of the Church the Pope occupies that position in the Church as a whole at which, even if only in principle, this infallibility of hers acquires its concrete embodiment. For these reasons, when as shepherd in this supreme sense he promulgates his teaching in a definitive manner for the whole Church he enjoys that immunity from error[2] with which God willed his Church to be endowed in her knowledge of him. His 'ex cathedra' definition is [115] infallible. It is

[1] On the whole range of questions connected with this problem cf. especially K. Rahner – K. Lehmann, Mysterium Salutis I, J. Feiner – M. Löhrer eds. (Einsiedeln, 1965), pp. 622-707, esp, pp. 639 ff., 692 ff., 769 ff., 7774 ff. (with extensive bibliography).

[2] For the differences of opinion on this 'freedom from error' cf. K. Rahner, 'The Church and the Parousia of Christ', Theological Investigations VI (London & Baltimore Md, E.T. 1969), pp. 295-312.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this because the Lord ordained that his Church should act as the foundation and the support of truth. The Pope is equipped with this freedom from error to the extent that he is on the one hand a member of the Church and on the other as such precisely the visible head of the Church. And in virtue of this his decision is 'of itself' binding upon all the faithful in such a way that if it were false the whole Church would fall into an error of faith.

The manner in which a conciliar or papal definition of doctrine of this kind comes into existence in the concrete can assume the most varied forms. It can be developed in the midst of fierce controversies or against a background of peace. It can be directed against some heresy that is in process of arising or it can constitute the peaceful culmination of a process of self-reflection by which the Church discovers her identity anew in the developing awareness of her faith. Viewed in terms of practical human expediency it can be evoked by the most varied situations in the field of human thought: by developments in theology, by certain attitudes arising in the realm of spirituality, by experiences, whether good or bad, which the Church undergoes in the course of her history, or by a thousand other factors. It is conceivable that these human situations, which in practice have acted as stimuli and so contributed to such a definition of faith, were of a nature that was anything but pleasant or welcome: the rivalries of opposing schools, political influences, unenlightened devotionalism, reactionary tendencies and resentments – all these can be, and have already been, contributing factors in this sense. As such their influence can be discerned right from the outset of the history of dogma and of the councils.

It is perfectly possible that – if we may put it in this way – the divine logic in such events may be far from simply coinciding with what human logic and human designs would have suggested in arriving at such a decision. The theology arising from the prior deliberations which, at the human level, constituted a contributing factor towards an eventful decision of this sort can in historical terms be ill-informed. Technically speaking it may have been far too limited in its outlook. Humanly speaking it may have been grossly inadequate and lacking in vitality. Such a decision may – viewed purely historically and from a 'this-worldly' standpoint – have been taken in an intellectual atmosphere which later turned out to be unfortunate or at least overtaken by historical events, and which therefore disappeared. Such considerations may even strike the [116] contemporaries of those engaged in making the decision and those actually involved in the conflict of ideas which precedes it. It may fill such people with anxiety and fear, and, from the human point of view, make it immeasurably more difficult for them to give their assent of faith to such a definition. Such a definition can, however true it may be, be in a certain sense 'one-sided'. I mean by this that there may be other truths, no less true than the one actually defined, which it may be necessary to set alongside it in order to provide a counterpoise to it, and so to ensure that it is the truth in all its aspects and as a balanced whole that is actually proclaimed. Yet in the actual definition which is produced these further supplementary truths may fail to be expressed at the same time and with equal clarity. All this is part of the human lot to which we are all subject; our experience of the divine truth necessarily takes place in the history of the Church, in our own human history. Yet in all the vicissitudes of that history it never ceases to be the word of God. It can be degraded; it can be circumscribed in the interests of human – all too human – ambitions, feelings etc.; it can be unworthy in its formulation through human short-sightedness and narrow-mindedness. Even to the view of a Christian – for this too is subject to human limitations and short-sightedness – it may seem inexplicably bound up with, and conjoined to error, to the point of being logically speaking hopelessly paradoxical. As a result every instinct, and even the conscience of such a Christian may be in revolt against it. But there is one thing which it cannot do: cease to be what it is, the truth of God in the mouth of the Church. But this is precisely what would be the case if what the Church with her ultimate teaching authority, proclaimed as her faith were in fact to turn out to be error. The divine

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

truth has an extremely human history. This may be. Blessed is he who is not scandalised at the servile guise in which he encounters it!

Such a truth, defined as doctrine by the Church, may have a psychological background as avid for new ideas as that of the Greeks, as enthusiastic as that of the Romans, as complicated and recondite as that of the Germans. It may have all the limitations of 'primitive' (i.e. held back from developing) theology. We may have the impression that those who formulated it had no profound understanding of the restrictions imposed upon those who were 'against' this doctrine in the period when the faith of the Church was first achieving its self-awareness. It may be that the theologians who were 'for' this doctrine achieved a most unjust victory in influencing the Church's official teaching in this way, yet believe that it has [117] thereby been confirmed that they are the 'better' theologians. All this may be the case, and much else besides of a similar nature. But this does not mean that one should allow one's attention to be diverted from the ultimate reality and the profundity of what is taking place when the teaching of the Church is made explicit in its authentic reality as the outcome of her reflecting upon herself. One who does allow his attention to be diverted in this manner is like the man who will only allow that something is alive when the life in it can be defined in terms of 'organic chemistry', one whose idea of the things pertaining to the spirit is limited to those phenomena which can be tested by the methods of association psychology or behaviourism. It must be insisted once and for all that it is not theology alone, whether in its philological or its historical branches, nor is it personal logical deductions alone that define the limits within which we must remain in order rightly to understand the Church's teaching. Rather the Church herself, who possesses the Spirit, defines those limits. This Spirit and his power cannot be translated in any adequate sense into the work of the exegete with his philological investigations, or into the work of the theologian with his researches into history, or into that of the logician with his methods of speculation. Certainly the Spirit does work in all of these fields, but he is always more than the sum total of this work. Any other interpretation would draw the knowledge which faith brings down to the level of mere secular knowledge. No-one can test out this working of the Spirit in his own person. No one can say 'See, it is precisely there, and what is there is nothing else than this working of the Spirit'. All that one can do is as a Christian who believes in the Church and in her Spirit to say: 'If the Church speaks so solemnly and definitively then the Spirit has already performed his work: in the work of the theologians, in the prayers of the devout, in the researches into scripture. The Spirit works through all this, and – a little perhaps – in spite of all this, and certainly his working extends beyond all this. He who entertains reservations with regard to this Spirit, he who wants to subject his power to criteria which he himself can apply is, in effect, denying the true nature of the Church. (He might seek to use criteria in this sense by attempting, for instance, to establish whether the historical method really has been properly applied – obviously according to his own personal judgment – or whether the scriptural exegesis on which the official teaching is based is up to the standard of modern criticism – again, obviously according to his own judgment, or up to the standards of 'science', of which, of course, [118] the individual himself is the authentic representative). When the teaching authorities of the Church require the assent of faith to some defined doctrine, then there are no precautions or safety measures (whether in the writings of the Church or in any a priori established methods of theology) to ensure that the Spirit of the Church is not making any mistake.

All this should not be taken as implying that the Church should either underestimate or neglect either honest exegesis, genuine historical theology, true logic or information of all kinds and ranging over as wide an area of human knowledge as possible. For the Pope, the Council and the theologians alike it is a solemn duty conscientiously to avail themselves of all these means. They cannot leave it to the Spirit as though he were present for the purpose of dispensing them from what they can and must perform for themselves. If they neglect this duty either wholly or in part then God has means enough and punishments enough in his providence and judgment to teach the individuals concerned that they must not tempt God. But even when those actively engaged in preaching and developing the Church's teaching (or alternatively reducing it to stagnation) must be condemned as sinful and stupid men, still even in this case – indeed more than ever in this case – the faults of men remain encompassed by the pity and truth of God, and cannot escape the truth of God. When a man acts and speaks definitively as the Church's official representative, and in the name of God, then however sinful his way of exercising his responsibilities may be, he will never succeed in changing the truth of God into error. In certain cases proof, whether real or supposed, may be adduced that the human element in the process of arriving at a doctrinal definition on the part of the Church is vitiated by the faults of wrong information, over-hastiness, narrow-mindedness or theological over-traditionalism. But this is never a proof that in such a case God himself has allowed human error to be promulgated in place of the attestation of his own truth. In the proclamation of the Church's truth the guilt of the human instruments is no criterion for denying that what she proclaims is true and binding and sublime.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[119]

PART TWO

Mysteries of the Life of Jesus

[121]

7

CHRISTMAS, THE FESTIVAL OF ETERNAL YOUTH

As the festivals return each year in their inexorable rhythm it is difficult to speak of them in a way that is worthy to any extent at all of the eternal youth of the mystery that we celebrate. Preacher and hearers alike are weary in heart and spirit. The gospel words, consecrated as they are by a holy tradition, are in their effect upon us, like window panes that have become misted over. They actually obscure our vision of the reality that lies beyond. The words fall from the pulpit like dead birds from a wintry sky. And all this is only one symptom of the general weariness that pervades our hearts, a weariness that comes from the experience of disappointment and futility, and which is our silent companion as we journey towards death.

But it is precisely because of this that the festival has so vital a contribution to make for us of today. It is the festival of the birth of him who is the Son of God and true man, of him who, in his creaturely being and activity, was so totally and radically given over to God right from the outset that in very truth his life in its creatureliness is the life of God. It is not a festival which is held in celebration of a past that has long since vanished, but one which celebrates a present, this in turn constituting the beginning of an eternal future that is even now approaching. It is the festival of the birth of eternal youth. A child is born to us, but not a child who simply begins to die from the moment when it starts to live. This child is rather one in whom the eternal youth of God breaks in upon this world definitively and victoriously; into this world, which seems only able to go on living in that the death of one of its inhabitants makes way for another to be born. To that extent this world of ours cannot escape from the despairing cycle of birth and death. What we celebrate today is the advent of that child whose true youth is not restricted merely to that meagre stock of life which is allotted to us at birth and which is slowly but [122] inexorably used up in the course of our lives, but is rather the eternal youth of God himself, the youth of God who, eternally ancient yet eternally new, is the endless fulness of eternal life. This eternal youth has taken root in that sphere in which we, who are under sentence of death, still live. Thereby it has not simply abolished death, but has undertaken the higher enterprise of making life victorious, of submitting itself to death in order to make death itself a means by which we ourselves can make our own this eternal youth of God. At Christmas he whose death was the birth of our eternal life himself already began to die. It was on this day that it was revealed for the first time that the life that is allotted to us on our pilgrimage is not merely something that we inherit from former generations, not merely cosmic energy, not merely the spirit which, in itself, is free from earthly limitations only to the extent that it can be painfully aware of its own finitude. The life of which we are now speaking is rather the eternal fulness of the life of God himself, which knows no death, offered to us as free creatures, so that when we accept this life of God himself it may bring about eternal life in us. Right from the very origins this life too has been made present in the world, and it drives the history of the world onwards with a speed that grows ever more daring so that its progress is accelerated not by terror of death and the void but by that life which lies at the very heart and centre of it, and which God himself has decreed. So has it always been. But in the child who has been born today (we can say ‘today’

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

because his birth at that point in history is precisely not something that belongs to a vanished past) something has been revealed for the first time upon the visible surface, so to say, of historical reality. And this is that God, whose glory transcends all transient things is himself, as an act of his own free grace, the ultimate power which lies behind the world. Or let us see this same truth the other way round. It is precisely in our minds and hearts that the experience of the history of the world can properly take place. And when in our minds and hearts we experience this ultimate and intrinsic dynamism in history, tending towards the infinite, we can in all confidence give the name of 'God' to the goal towards which this dynamism is tending, and to the interior power of it. Thereby we can actually perceive for the first time what the word 'God' really means. This is something that was initially revealed and initially brought to its fulness in the Christmas child. For this is the child who today has entered upon the journey of his own personal history, a journey which leads through death right to God himself. And when this [123] child arrives at that point his whole being is totally transformed, for the end of this journey is that state which we are accustomed to call the resurrection. In him the world has won its first definitive victory. For the first time it has achieved its predestined transformation into the life of God himself. For the first time the high points of its history have been plunged into the unapproachable light. Today that victory has commenced which proceeds from the innermost depths of God's own eternal nature, to seize the world at one single point, the point that is called Jesus, and to take it up into the innermost life of God, full of eternal youth.

How frigid and artificial all this sounds – what we can say of Christmas as the birth of eternal youth! Words such as these have to be turned by the individual into the life of his own heart unless they are to remain at the level of mere rhetoric. But how can such a transformation of words from without into the reality within one's heart be possible? For this there is no blueprint. But at the same time we can say this much: Act first and foremost as he who has been born today acted in his own life. He had to do with the lilies of the field in all their beauty, with the sparrows, with the fresh green ears of the growing corn, with his mother, with the malice of his enemies, with hunger and thirst, with the bewilderment of his friends, in short with life just as it is lived from day to day in its bitterness and its beauty, without any falsification, without exaggerating either the good or the evil in it. When you accept this life, opening yourself simply, trustfully, obediently and without protest to its single ineffable meaning, a meaning which pervades it throughout in all its incalculable complexities, then you have begun to celebrate Christmas as the festival of eternal youth, for then your life will keep flowing, ever open to fresh experiences which will not be frozen either by that obtuseness which kills or by some obstinately held ideology which seeks to act as schoolmaster and so to provide a wise guide to life as it leads on to ever-fresh surprises. But you, when you open yourself to the inner meaning of life in this sense, do not give life its meaning ab externo, but rather let that meaning that is already present, even if mysteriously, in its innermost depths, rise up from the roots of your nature, endowed as it is with grace, in a quite simple and unremarkable manner into the sphere of freedom, where it finds expression in the so-called everyday virtues. We are concerned here with the God-given meaning of existence which is intrinsic in those acts which are performed in freedom, and thereby given finality and permanency. It is [124] this meaning that becomes the mystery which you now accept and which you entrust yourself to for guidance.

Listen, then, to the quiet of your own heart. The message of Christmas's eternal youth must come from within in order that the message which comes from without, from the pulpit, can be understood and translated into living reality. Perhaps then you will first hear many terrifying voices, the words of which seem to be running into each other in confusion: the voices of everyday cares, of the disappointments of life, of secret longings and many others; a strange choir! They are like an orchestra in which the instruments are first trying out their powers independently, and in which no kind of harmony seems yet to have been achieved. Rightly understood, however, all the voices of the heart which one can hear if one keeps quiet enough, speak of the youth of eternal life, however complex and confusing the manner in which these voices seem to break across one another. For the voices of love, of peace, of trust, of protection, of the blessings of a life that is exalted above the common, speak explicitly of a youth that endures for ever, and is subject to no limitations. And the voices of disappointment, of emptiness and of doubt are in fact once more simply protests against death, and as such themselves bear witness to the life of which we have been speaking. For a death that was more absolute and more comprehensible would simply be accepted in its own right. Such a death would give rise to no protests. Those subject to it would simply accept it for what it is, and want to die. Death is in no sense a counterpart to life, on an equal footing with it. The effect of grace upon us is that we experience an absolute and unconditional longing for eternal life. And in the light of this all experience of death and all sense of protest against death arising from it is seen to be simply something secondary and derived. It is there merely because life has not yet run its full course in freedom through history.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But when all the voices of this life blend into a single basic harmony in the quiet of one's heart, and all the movements are combined in the one single movement which is basic and primary, when this single basic movement of life is neither interrupted nor held back by any attitude of mistrust or any secret doubts, then it can, on the contrary, achieve the fulness of its nature as sheer infinite freedom. Then all the forces which are innate in man, and which have their ultimate source in God himself, speak together and say: 'I believe in eternal life'. But when the inner man trembles and quails before the utter boldness of his own demand for [125] eternal life, when all this seems to the heart in its poverty almost too good to be true, then the voices of the heart must hearken to the message of the child that is born today, and in the harmony of both these voices together the miracle of a sure faith in eternal life, that is in the birth of Christ, our eternal youth, can be worked in our own hearts. Both voices together, that of the spirit and that of history can become one, do actually become one, because one and the same deed of God has created both voices and sustains them in being in a single act of God's bestowal of himself upon the world. This one word formed out of two separate words promises the youth of eternal life, and it effects what it proclaims, for it is the creative word of God himself. And this word has fashioned the void that is in our life, dedicated as it is to death, only in order to fill that void by imparting to us the plenitude of its own infinite and boundless life. Let heaven rejoice, let the earth exult – so we sing today. A child is born to us. Today the day of the new redemption has dawned. Who, then, has come? He who will accomplish what is new in the old, for the old is still there. What does he accomplish? He accomplishes his own presence in us. Who is he? The unique and ineffable mystery which, nevertheless, we really do apprehend. How has he come? The answer came in the form of a question; God came as man in order that we might understand that by the power of the grace which is in it the question, even as it is put, contains its own answer within it. But even then how has this ineffable mystery actually come to us, when already and at all times it pervades our existence? It is because it is with us now not as something that is remote and that judges us, but rather as something that is unspeakably near to us and that brings us pardon; something by means of which all who love sustain their lives. And this ineffable mystery has also come because it willed to come in spirit and flesh since man as a unified compositum can be redeemed only in both of these. But what effect does this ineffable mystery have, which we call God? It brings us the youth of eternal life in the midst of our mortality, our blindness and our futility. Do you believe this? Lord I do believe, help thou my unbelief! If you believe you have eternal life. And if you think that you do not believe have trust! God will bestow belief upon you, that belief that is recognisable to him. A child is born to us. The eternal youth of the immortal God has appeared as the true interiority of our own life.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[126]

PRAYER

God, the eternal mystery of our life, by the birth of your own word of love in our flesh you have made the glory of your life in its eternal youth into our life, and have caused it to appear in triumph. Grant us that when we experience the disappointments, of our lives we may be enabled to believe that your love, which you yourself are and which you have bestowed upon us, is the eternal youth that is our own true life.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[127]

8

HOLY NIGHT

Everywhere in the world and every year when these days come round the talk is of the 'holy night', that is the night of Christmas (= German 'Weihnacht', literally 'consecrated night'), and everywhere 'Silent night, holy night' is sung. This way of referring to Christmas is simply an echo of the liturgy. For the mystery of the birth of the Lord and his resurrection are the only two mysteries the liturgical celebrations of which begin during the night. And the liturgy calls this night of Christmas the 'nox sacratissima', the night of supreme holiness and consecration. The Epiphany, the Ascension and Pentecost are festivals of the day. But at Christmas and Easter the night is the time in which the divine mystery of salvation enters into our lives. As the reason why this should be so in the case of Christmas we might be tempted to suggest that it was from considerations of fittingness and privacy for these are necessary at any birth. But the fact that Christmas and Easter are sacred nights shows that something more is intended by the celebration of night as holy in this case than simply the quiet and privacy which should attend upon the beginning of any human life. And this serves as an indication to us that there is some common factor which applies to both festivals.

Taken together these two festivals are the festivals of the beginning of our redemption. Taken together they give promise of that day for which we are waiting in faith. It is because both of them celebrate the beginning of the victory of a day that is eternal, because, taken together, they signify the victory of a new beginning – it is for these reasons that both of them take the form of celebrations of supremely holy nights.

There is a strange ambiguity about the phenomena of our human world which serve as the symbols of salvation (or the loss of salvation). This is not because it is possible for man, faced with these simple things of the earth, to 'get everything mixed up'. Where genuine signs and manifestations of God's salvation are concerned man does not 'get mixed up'. The [128] real reason why these symbols should be ambiguous is that these things, which are the signs of salvation, are subject to change as the history of salvation unfolds, for this history is also the history of the world, and these signs are themselves drawn into the history of salvation as it unfolds from Adam right up to the second coming of Christ, in which salvation comes into the world (and not simply into the spirit) in its full actuality. The relationship in which these symbols stand to the history of salvation is not that of static and immutable entities. They are not simply 'used' for the purpose of pointing to something outside themselves that has nothing to do with their own intrinsic natures. It is because the world itself has been drawn into this process of change which is taking place in the 'now' of the period since Christ, and which is to issue in a new heaven and a new earth, and it is because this change is still continuing, that these things, considered precisely as signs, are so strangely ambiguous. This is why they speak to us of both the old and the new.

The symbolism of night is a case in point. Is night not the symbol of that time when no one can work (Jn 9, 4), of darkness and of the shadow of death, in which we sinners are imprisoned (Lk 1:79), of that sinister darkness which overtakes us, and in which we cannot remain (Jn 12:35 f., 46)? Is not every night a reminder of that night in which he was betrayed, and in which Judas went out (Jn 13:20; 1 Cor 11:24; Lk 22:53), of that night in which the most that can be hoped for is that it is already far advanced and that day is coming at last (Rom 13:12), that night in which a man's soul will be required of him (Lk 12:20), and which threatens constantly to become fixed and permanent in the form of the 'exterior darkness'? And yet . . . Night is also the time when the Lord comes (Lk 12:38), appearing at midnight as a bridegroom arriving at the nocturnal marriage-feast (Mt 25:6). Night can be the time of heavenly visions full of consolation and divine guidance (Acts 16:9; 18:9 etc.), the time when the Son raises his heart in prayer to his Father (Lk 6:12). And was not that night when he came to his own, to the dark stable of the world, filled with heavenly song (Lk 2:8 ff.)?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Our night is on the point of becoming a holy night. The day has not yet come to which there is no longer any evening. That time still prevails which holds all things in bondage to the law of death; that time which dissolves things, deprives them of their firm outlines and draws everything back into a darkness inhabited by the ghosts of the past. One can utter lyrical praises to this night of ours as the time of stillness and unity [129] in which all things are gently reconciled; as that which provides a basis for a general stillness, rest and harmony which embraces all things, and yet which is pregnant of all that the future contains as well; as the time when everything returns to itself once more, in order to begin afresh to achieve a brighter future. One can praise the night on the grounds that it is richer than the day, for day makes things clear only by separating them off one from another. One can imagine that it is the night that is the time that is full of mysteries and that by comparison with what it promises day is a mere disappointment, for night does not yield up its hidden riches to the day. But all these experiences of what night means would be so much false romanticism, or else the faint afterglow, as it were, of our enjoyment of day; for night is that which issues from the death of day, and in itself it is really nothing more than empty darkness. It would be false romanticism in this sense if it were not for the fact that into our night-time one has been born who is more than merely one element among the rest, caught up in the despairing cycle of day and night. This cycle consists of an incessant alternation of these two elements, in which neither can prevail over the other. For each of the two elements, day and night, as its turn comes round, must perforce call the other into being and give way to it, and thereby the radical insufficiency of each is revealed. But it is not in virtue of its very nature that night becomes Christmas night. In itself night is simply empty darkness, and it would be false to the facts to pretend that this intrinsic emptiness of night could ever be a hidden fulness. The reason that our night can become, in the deepest and most all-pervasive sense, Christmas night is that he has been born who, as Son of the Father and Word of the Father, is above all time and above the world itself. It is because he who has been born in the time of night is, from his very origins, not a child of time at all, that is of day and night. Every night can be Christmas night because he was born into our night, and thereby filled it with every kind of promise and every kind of miracle; because God has sent down his grace upon the emptiness, the poverty and the darkness of night, and because he has predestined it to issue into the day of his own light, a day to which there shall be no evening. It is in virtue of this, and only in virtue of this that night becomes the promise of that true day. Only because of this is it that day which is already on the point of dawning, the time in which the light shines darkly because the fulness of it is already so inexpressibly near. Saving history as Christians understand it is not simply an interpretation of the natural order such that [130] even without any such interpretation the order would still be just the same; rather it is the process by which the natural order itself becomes radically and all-pervasively transformed into something which only the eye of faith can recognise for what it is, because only to the eye of faith is it apparent that nature too is involved in the order of redemption. It is only in virtue of the fact that the Word of the Father has entered into the world, and has become, in the power of his Spirit, the law which lies at the very roots of the whole natural order, that these things which are in the world can be symbols of that which is to come. Yet they are this in objective fact. And this is why it is precisely the believer, and, in the last analysis, only the believer who can afford to be a ‘romantic’ as he is, for instance, precisely when he sees every night as the promise and the image of the holy night of Christmas.

In that one night every night, night as such, is redeemed and consecrated. Henceforward

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

there is no longer any darkness upon this earth which may not turn out to be the shadowy womb of eternal light. Henceforward when any man closes his eyes he cannot be sure that he will not open them again upon a greater light. Henceforward there is no descent into formless darkness which may not become blessed and fruitful by leading to an ascent into everlasting light. There is not a single day upon this earth which, as it fades quietly into its evening twilight, cannot speak to us of the promise that a day will come to which there is no evening. That future which we await in a spirit of faith and hope as already coming to meet us we call after the day, the light, and other phenomena associated with these. And in this we are right. For these phenomena associated with light are the prime witnesses of the fact that God is pure luminous affirmation, and that the things which God has made, and which are still in process of developing, will not always be caught up in an endless cycle between two equal poles, day and night, light and darkness, yes and no. But is there not some special time – Christmas, for example – when the 'no' which we choose to say to this world can become a 'yes' in the language of heaven? Let us remember that it is the things that are not that God has called, that it is through death that life has been given to us. And again we have to recognise that all things come from him who is above all things. He cannot be expressed, therefore, even by the phenomena of this world associated with light. And yet night too is worthy of our praise. We have to recognise that this too belongs to God (Ps 74:16), and so that to the eye of our faith the light of eternity is already visible even in it, while [131] our ears already hear the hymns of the heavenly choirs with which it is filled.

But in doing this we are acting as sober watchmen who know that God has come into our night in order to lead us forth from it into his eternal day. Christmas night (Weih*nacht*) is celebrated as the beginning of that day in which the sun will never more go down. The reason that the Christian can make the night a festival in this way, and celebrate it as supremely holy, is that he is a child of the day. Only he can look into the darkness without perverting his own nature who knows that the night is already on the point of drawing finally and for all time to its close. The Christian does not, so to say, become intoxicated with a morbid love of the night, as though it held a poisonous sweetness for him. Rather in the boldness of faith he walks bravely through the night which God has made, but which he has also transformed when he brought Christmas into being. We keep a sober watch through the night like the shepherds in the fields. And like them too in the night of our present lives we perform our everyday duties quietly and without question. And then still in the night we hear tidings of the light. There shall be no more night there (Rev. 21:25) because here night has become Christmas night. This is why we can praise the night in our Christmas celebrations: 'Silent night, Holy night'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[132]

9

PEACE ON EARTH

It is customary to speak of Christmas as a festival of peace. But if we are thinking of the Christian meaning of Christmas, and not merely of how it is celebrated in the family and the broader social units, it is not immediately obvious why it should be thought of in this way. For why should the coming of the Word of God in human flesh as an act of compassion simply in itself and as such signify peace? While it is true that scripture itself contains references to the peace which Christ brings, still this is more often and more explicitly associated with his death on the Cross. Prima facie, therefore, the only biblical text which seems to provide any justification for this idea is Luke's reference to the angelic choirs which appeared at Christmas and sang: 'Peace on earth to men who have found favour with God'.

Before we invoke this text, however, or before we wrongly take it as a palliative for the anxieties of life on this earth, turning Christmas into a festival of peace in the secular sense, it is fitting to give some initial consideration to what peace really means as referred to at this point in scripture.

For a point that immediately strikes one is that what the angels tell us here about the peace of Christmas follows upon what they have just said about the glory of God in the highest. And this in itself transfers us into a quite different world from that of the politicians and philanthropists who have so much to say on the subject of peace, whether sincerely or merely rhetorically according to circumstances. Peace as conceived of here in the bible is the outcome and the reflection of the glory of God. But what is this glory of God? Viewed precisely in the context of Christmas it is not primarily or initially something that we pay to God. It is that glory which God himself makes to shine out by performing a deed of his omnipotent compassion in the world of darkness and guilt. It is because he himself comes, therefore, because he himself condescends to us, coming to forgive [133] us and redeem us, that God is present in the world in his glory. And it is this that makes that glory manifest to men. It is for this reason too – this is the message of scripture – that there is peace, peace at least for those who accept this glorious and saving deed of God in a spirit of faith, for those whose inward eyes and hearts are open in love to perceive and to receive what God is offering them at this point: redemption from their sins. Even so, however, the question still remains, how does peace come to him who accepts this glory of God in a spirit of faith?

Let us put the question once more: What is it which takes place at Christmas? Our reply is that the Word of God has become flesh and dwelt among us. But what does this mean? This is that inexpressible mystery which we believe because in the last analysis the only possibility open to man is to believe either in the abyss of emptiness and nothingness or in the incomprehensible mystery of hidden blessedness. All intermediary positions between this immeasurable abyss on the one hand, and this utter sublimity on the other, cannot in the long run be maintained. So far as we Christians are concerned it is the incomprehensible mystery of hidden blessedness that we believe in. But what we mean by this is not some kind of utopian ideal which is to come at some future point, but which has nothing to do with the present world in which we live. No, the incomprehensible mystery of blessedness – we call it God – has already entered into this world itself. God has fashioned this world with its terrors, its conflicts and its ultimate and profound instability only with the proviso that he himself will accept it just as it is, that it belongs to him, that he will endure it and bring it to its due consummation by his own power and by his own fate. That consummation, namely, which a created being can only attain to if it is supported by the reality of God himself or the environment of being which is proper to God, and not merely by the perishable beings which he has created. The eternal rejoicing of the eternal God has itself been made to become the heart of the world. Within the indissoluble unity of his own life he has enclosed all its conflicts, all the onslaughts of its denizens one upon another, internecine in intensity though they are, and has managed so to contain them that they do not break out of this unity of the divine life in which all things remain unified and tend towards the point of reconciliation as the one end of them all. The mystery of Christmas has a twofold message for us. First the conflict between creatures which are mutually opposed is taken up into the unity of the one God and Creator who is over all things. From this position of his, high over all [134] creatures and unaffected by the opposition between them, he has created light and darkness, heaven and earth, the visible and the invisible. But there is more to it than this. Even though this conflict may be allowed to take its course and in fact be given free rein, still it is contained and already, even as it rages, it is transcended by the fact that God himself has taken into himself all things even in their conflicts one with another. This is what has taken place in Jesus. It might seem that this is too little; that such a process of reconciliation, in which conflicting creatures are taken up by God into the peace of his own unity, should take a quite different form, one in which the power and brilliance of such a deed would be made fully manifest. But to expect anything of this kind could only lead to disappointment. The reconciliation must take place in the Son of Man; in a single human life, in its pettiness, in its brevity, in its ordinariness and poverty, with its death. For if God really does accept that which we ourselves are, endures that which takes place in the internecine strife which is waged in the world outside us as well as in the interior of our own hearts, then this must be the form in which he does so accept these things. It must be small, average and unremarkable precisely in this way. Otherwise he would not in fact once more be truly and precisely in that position in which we ourselves find ourselves.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

By the fact of Jesus becoming man the one who is unity itself has accepted all the complexity and conflicts of human existence and truly identified himself with them. But this cannot derogate from the ultimate reconciliation achieved by the unity which lies at the roots of his own being. Moreover this One who is unity itself has endured all this conflict, and has thereby brought it to its ultimate point of reconciliation in his own history. And it is for these reasons that what lies at the very heart and centre of all reality is peace and not that state of inward contradiction which dissipates and annihilates. Conflict there still is in the world and in the heart of man alike. Strife there still is, seemingly internecine in its intensity. All things still seem to be irreconcilably at war with one another. But however much we, caught up as we are in this disharmony and agitation, may sigh for peace as for a distant utopia, still reconciliation is already there at the heart of things. We must make sure that it is believed and accepted in that God-in-creaturehood, the glory of God, comes to be accepted. Things are at enmity one with another so long as they have not discovered the greater unity which transcends them all and at the same time unites them. The all-encompassing which already belongs to the [135] encompassed, the reconciler who already belongs to the contradictory opposites – he is there, since God himself has become incarnate. He who does not accept this unity in a spirit of faith must not complain that his heart, his life, the world, are torn apart in conflict and devoid of peace. But the reason that we can accept God in this way is that he has come in the flesh that belongs to our world, and precisely because he has accepted all the anguish generated in this world of fleshly creatures who tear one another apart and are torn in their turn. He has accepted this in patience, in longsuffering, in endurance, in hope because he, who is our peace, has created peace by accepting flesh in its sinfulness, and by being obedient even in the midst of this internecine conflict, even to the point of death itself. Thus at that point at which patience and resignation begin to evince themselves in the heart, where there is assent to one’s lot even though it is incomprehensible and crucifying, the unreserved

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

acceptance of opposition, endurance, the humility which does not seek to understand or to control – where there is a certain sharing in the achievement of that event which took place at Christmas by the power of God: all is accepted and all has the promise of peace.

The only way in which man can have peace is to accept the incomprehensible God in the incomprehensibility of our own existence and lot. But one can accept both of these because God himself has accepted us when he himself came in the inward conflict of our own flesh. Would not the beginning of eternal peace be there if at Christmas we were to say a quiet 'Yes' to God who came, accepted us, divided and broken though we were, and in his own person brought us reconciliation and unity?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[136]

10

SEE, WHAT A MAN!

Man is a complex and changeable being. It is no blame to him not always to be the same, nor is it demanded of him that he shall be so. For this reason it is difficult to define who and what he really is. There is much that he himself cannot speak of with any willingness. He flees from himself. He is able to do this because it is only possible to reflect upon and speak of one's self when one has time and leisure to do so. But among the factors which are intrinsic to his make-up there is one in particular, that he finds it impossible to speak of, one that reduces him to dumbness. How might a portrayal of man be expected to appear if it were designed to throw precisely this element into relief? The element that makes him what he is, yet what he is unwilling to admit that he is, and is not prepared to be.

It would have to be the picture of a dying man, for though we are indeed unwilling to die, we are nevertheless given over to death to such an extent that death pervades all things for us even in this present life as a sinister power. The dying man would have to be suspended between heaven and earth, for we are not fully at home either here or there. Heaven is too remote from us, and earth too is far from being a dwelling place in which we can feel ourselves really secure. The man in our picture would have to be alone. For when we arrive at our final hour the impression is that our fellow men feel shy and embarrassed (because they, in fact, are not yet ready for that stage in their lives), and that they leave us alone. The man in the picture would have to be depicted as though two intersecting lines, one horizontal and one vertical, were passing through his body. For the heart of man is, so to say, bisected by, and becomes the point of intersection for two such lines. The horizontal one extends out on either side of him as though striving to include the whole world within its ambience. The vertical one points sheer and undeviatingly upwards as though in an effort to concentrate the whole of man exclusively upon him who is uniquely one. The man in the picture would have to be nailed fast [137] to these. For our freedom upon this earth extends only to a certain point, the point at which it becomes limited and circumscribed by the inescapable necessities of life. The man in the picture would have to be represented with his heart pierced through, for at the end everything has been transformed into a lance which spills our heart's blood to the last drop. He would have to wear a crown of thorns, for the deepest pains come not from the body but from the spirit. And finally, since all men are in the same condition as this one man, this solitary figure would, in spite of his solitariness, have to be flanked on either side by other figures, the exact replicas of himself. We might go on from this to represent one of these figures as despairing and the other as hoping. For we never know altogether for sure whether there is more hope or more despair in our hearts as we draw nearer to death. This would more or less complete the picture. It would not represent all that is in man, but it would show what must be shown of us precisely because we are unwilling to accept this particular aspect of ourselves as true (to entertain doubts on this point is simply another way of shrinking from the recognition of this truth). All the other truths which also apply to us do not need to be represented in the picture, because we are ready and eager to recognise them as it is. Our consideration of what such a picture would reveal to us about ourselves poses a question for us which we must answer. And yet this is a question which we are unable to answer by ourselves.

This picture of ourselves which we view so reluctantly is the picture which God has set before our eyes in the death of his Son on Good Friday. And when this picture of man was to be set up before us one of those taking part in this drama said: 'Behold the man!' (Jn 19, 5).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Again, in his writings Paul says of the Christians that they are those before whose eyes Jesus Christ was portrayed as crucified (Gal 3:1). To some it is a stumbling-block, to others folly, but to those who have been called the power of God and the wisdom of God (1 Cor 1:23 f.). Now if God thus sets before our eyes the picture from which we have been copied, then as we view this picture, we are not looking merely at the radical instability of our own existence. Then, in the very act of forcibly confronting us with the question that we are, God also gives us his own answer to this question. It is only because he knows the answer that the drama conjured up by his unfathomable love has brought home to us the question that we ourselves are. And since his eternal Word has itself become man and, in the fulness of his human nature, has died upon the Cross of our existence, he has [138] spoken his answer to us, and thereby given us the initial spark of courage which we need in order to look upon this picture of ourselves, which was concealed from us, to hang it in our private rooms, to set it up by our waysides and to plant it over our graves.

To what extent, then, is this the answer of God to the question that we ourselves are?

The answer to this question might be stated in a single sentence which the Fathers of the Church have repeated again and again: ‘All that was received and accepted is redeemed’. All that he accepted is redeemed because thereby it has itself become the love of God and the fate of God. He has accepted death. Therefore this must be more than merely a descent into empty meaninglessness. He has accepted the state of being forsaken. Therefore the overpowering sense of loneliness must still contain hidden within itself the promise of God’s blessed nearness. He has accepted total failure. Therefore defeat can be a victory. He has accepted abandonment by God. Therefore God is near even when we believe ourselves to have been abandoned by him. He has accepted all things. Therefore all things are redeemed.

Does this pass unnoticed by us? Do we feel ourselves imprisoned in the stifling incomprehensibility of our existence, brought up against a blank wall, and unable to find any escape? Do we find ourselves quite unable to feel that everything is redeemed? Do we imagine that the darkness of Good Friday has in reality lasted continuously ever since the first Good Friday of all? Do we believe that we could accept him, the crucified one, as the image of our existence, were it not for the fact that we do not know how this man, so surrounded by pain and the darkness of death, can also be the salvation and the light of God for us in the extended death that is our life? How is the miracle of Good Friday faith brought about? It is the miracle of grace. No proof can be advanced to justify it.

But let us kneel beneath the Cross, and there pray: ‘Lord I do believe, help thou my unbelief!’ At least for the space of one moment let us command all else to silence, the anguish of our own heart and the poignant question of our spirit. Let us be silent in order that we can listen, and so hear just this one word issuing from the lethal darkness of this man in the moment of his death: ‘Father into thy hands I commend my spirit’. And then – O miracle of grace! – we are able to believe that everything has been accepted by God and redeemed. For let us look more closely into this death of his, and hearken more attentively!

[139] There is one here who is in mortal straits. He has been spared nothing. He has no illusions. This is death. He has no intention whatever of playing the hero in it. There is nothing of the poseur in him. He is not the sort of man who still acts a part even in the moment of death. He has known what is in man. Those about him, therefore, have not made his death any easier, neither those whom we call his enemies, and who feel themselves to be so, yet for whom he prays, nor those few others who, since he has managed, even in this moment of his death to think lovingly of them, have made the act of dying even harder for him. He has drained the cup of life almost to the last dregs. All is darkness without and within. He is alone with the suffocating malice of the entire world, which is stupid and at the same time diabolically malignant. He knows that the guilt of the world, which clutches ravenously for his heart and life, is not the sort of misunderstanding that turns out on closer

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

examination to be a harmless mistake. It is the incomprehensible guilt which leads to condemnation. He is alone with this. The light of his Father's nearness is transformed, so to say, into the dark fire of judgment. There is only abandonment and feebleness left, burning and at the same time, and in an inexpressible manner, dead. Death in its stark reality has penetrated to his heart, and pierced its way into the innermost depths of his human life; death as absolute. 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' And when abandonment and death have pervaded his whole life in this sense, then listen to what he says: 'Father into thy hands I commend my spirit'. It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God, when in an act of inconceivable love, one has identified one's self in spirit with the sins of the world. And yet when he did thus fall into the hands of the living God what he said was: 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit'. If there is one word in all this which is immediately and in itself worthy of our belief it is this one. This word, uttered by him in this moment, must be accepted. There is God the Father. One can commit all things to his hands – all things. In such a way that all things are accepted by him.

One is not forced to believe this word, uttered from the Cross to us and extending beyond us into the unfathomable depths of the mystery of existence. But one can believe it. One has only to hearken to him and to keep one's eyes fixed upon him. Then the crucified one, who is the image of our existence, also tells us the answer which God has given in him, the divine Word incarnate, to the question that we ourselves are.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[140]

11

THE SCANDAL OF DEATH

Every day countless number of people die. Death is the most familiar and everyday of human phenomena. So much is this the case, indeed, that it is possible to hold that we should not make very much fuss about it. Nothing in it can be altered. In the nature of things it is unpleasant for those who have to endure it, provided, of course, that they have some degree of conscious awareness of it, and naturally when the form in which they meet it is too overpowering, too brutally real and vivid, they protest. For the rest one is relieved to assure one's self that to all appearances one is not yet one's self in the toils of death, so that there is no cause for alarm. Only great statesmen, soldiers and doctors are really habituated to death, and, moreover, not over-disturbed by it, since it is others who have to die and – for the time being at any rate – not themselves. How strange all this is! For today the whole of Christendom has a death to celebrate in the most solemn manner. What is the real reason for this? Certainly it was a particularly agonising and unjust death. But death is every bit as terrifying as it occurs in the gas-chambers of Buchenwald or the mud-holes of Vietnam. What then is this celebration of Good Friday meant to signify?

First it is intended simply to serve as a sobering reminder to us of our own deaths. This is not, of course, to deny that Good Friday is first and last the day which commemorates the death of the Lord, and, in the last analysis, his death alone. But one can only truly understand and celebrate this death if one recognises and accepts that one is one's self subject to the power of death. Otherwise one is blind from the outset, and quite incapable of viewing the crucified Lord in a true light. Therefore we must initially think of our own deaths.

This, then, is the situation in which we find ourselves: we are all sitting in the prison-house of our own existence as in the condemned cell, where we are waiting until the time of execution arrives. Until then one [141] can play at cards, enjoy the meal allotted to those under sentence of death, and for the moment forget that the prison door will soon open and we shall be called out for the last journey. But that is precisely what we must not forget. Animals are blind to their approaching death, or at most have some dim irrational fear of losing their lives. But we are aware of death, and must not suppress this awareness. We must live with death constantly in view. We know that we shall simply be thrust into the inexorable loneliness of death where no-one can accompany us any further, where the chatter of life ceases, and no-one can hide behind his fellow any longer. No-one can appeal to the opinion of another. The only thing that still counts at this stage is what one can take with one in death: that is I myself as I was in the ultimate depths of my own heart, that heart that was either full of love or full of spite and hidden selfishness, a nuisance to myself and others. We take nothing with us into this state of abandonment except what we ourselves are in the ultimate and radical decision of our own hearts. Already in the here and now we must weigh our life day by day on the scales of death with a view to being able one day to die our own death. We should set the worthlessness of various actions which we perform, on the one hand, against the value of other actions which we should perform on the other. It is necessary to take both into account; to learn the inward serenity of one who can in all calmness go to meet death not because he is in a state of cynical despair about it, but because he is ready to accept the mystery of death as a mystery of unfathomable significance. We should practise, even in this life, how to die, for surely it is clear that while we shall certainly pass out of life in the biological sense, it is not so clear that we have the ability to die a death that is truly human. For whatever freedom is allotted to man, at its heart and centre death lies as a factor

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation which is wholly beyond his control.

On Good Friday we Christians continue to preach the death of that man until all have died, in order that all may learn how to die, since all are destined to die.

But what we preach on Good Friday is also the death of the one man, the Lord. It is in the case of this one man, initially, that we find the courage to believe that he was not only put to death, was not only swallowed up and engulfed by the absurdity of existence, but that he himself died. In other words he has made death into his own act, in which he accepts the inconceivable which is beyond all human control, and himself acts out what has to be endured. This one man, whom we take as the prototype of [142] those who die, and whom we resolve to follow into death, is Jesus. He is dead just as we shall die: in that darkness into which he uttered his groan: 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' His death included all that makes death terrifying, and all that death entails was truly endured in his person: the physical anguish, the brutal injustice which was an additional factor in his case, the hatred of his enemies, the mockery of their self-assurance, the collapse of his life's work in ruins, the betrayal of his friends, and, over and above all these terrible factors, precisely the banality of death, which is present wherever it occurs, together with the lamentations of those one leaves behind, who are powerless to help one; the gasping for breath and all the anguish from which no-one returns, the utter and complete loss of power, in which one ceases to be heroic.

Now something still remains to be said concerning the death of Jesus, and it is the most vital point of all. In spite of this, however, it does not entail any alteration to, or revision of the significance which we have already seen in his death and ours. No, the manner of death which he has to undergo is determined by the manner in which he was present then, and the manner in which he will be present among us in the future. So much is this the case that we are really dumbfounded at his words: 'My God, why hast thou forsaken me?' This is what every man will say, whatever he takes as his God in his own personal life. It may be the true God, or it may be money, or success, or science, or social progress, or his children, or carnal lust, or any other of the idols which he sets up upon the altar of his heart. These collapse into ruins, and even the true, the ineffable God seems to have given in and to have disappeared from the temple of the heart, leaving it silent. One seems to be engulfed so that all that one can feel is the sheer numbing physical pain until even that too has spent itself. What still remains to be said concerning Jesus' death and ours is not designed to spare us from death in this sense. Nor do we need in any sense to make special efforts to die in an heroic way or in the manner depicted by Christian tradition. And yet there still is something more to be said about this death, so brutal and at the same time so banal as it is. It remains to be said not because it is consoling, for perhaps the effect which it will have upon us will be very far from consoling. Perhaps it will fail to console us because at the roots of our being we are already numbered among those who die, and therefore have to die cruelly unconsoled. The point that still remains to be made is necessary, rather, because God has said it to us all at once and all in one in Jesus, in his life, in his understanding [143] of himself, in his death and in his resurrection. What has he said? It is that it is not until we have reached this point, at which our lives and our experience have been reduced absolutely to nil that the true life begins for us. This should not be understood in the sense that this true life is a further continuation of our present lives, stretching out beyond our deaths in a temporal prolongation. Rather it is because that quality which constitutes the distinguishing characteristic of our lives achieves in this true life its final transcendence over the whole of time. And this quality is the freedom and faithfulness of the love which comes from God, which bears him in itself, and which must be freely accepted and put into practice in the act of living. It is not as though this were inherent in the very nature of death, with all its absurdity. In itself death simply poses the most radical question of all. It calls everything into question and thereby forces us to decide whether we shall opt, even against our own consciences, for those factors in our lives which are consoling and at the same time controllable, so long as it is in our power to do so, or whether we shall give our ultimate loyalty to our consciences, even though they appear to do nothing for us. But in this question which death poses there is another answer, a blessed answer, which is already included in the question itself. This is because Jesus has died, or, to put it in a more prudent and exact form, because that which death, for all its absurdity, contains within itself in the way of mystery and blessing, has been given in him and in him made worthy of belief; because, to put it still more accurately, God has redeemed our death by decreeing that the death which he imposes upon us is a death in Jesus Christ the crucified one, in him in whom God himself took our death upon himself and made it his own. It must be reiterated that death in all its stark reality is not thereby removed from us. But we can die this death, in which the assurance offered us by the Son can become ours, and in which the element of incomprehensibility and of anguish which death contains can actually be a sharing in that which Jesus endured in his death. In this sense the death of Jesus is died by many who do not explicitly believe in him at all, or know him by name, yet who, by remaining faithful to the end, let themselves be received by death without thereby pronouncing a curse upon life. The death of Jesus is died by many because in one's brethren too one can encounter the death of the Son of Man, who lets himself be discovered in his brethren even by those who believe that they do not know him. For to accept one's death is in itself a way of knowing him and entering into communion with him. The [144] life of man is indeed full of doubts. But the worst doubt of all is that involved in refusing to accept the truth of life itself.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

There is no consolation which can render us immune to such doubts. But there is the incomprehensible mystery that the doubt itself can be consoling if it is patiently and willingly endured, and not itself erected into the last of the idols of our human lives. This consolation in death is called by the true name of Jesus of Nazareth. Today we, who are dying, stand at the point where he died and preach his death and our own until he comes in our death.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[145]

12

‘HE DESCENDED INTO HELL’

When we come to consider Holy Saturday we can notice something strange about it. In our religious life we miss it out. We celebrate Good Friday and Easter, the death and resurrection of the Son of Man, who is our salvation. But the day which falls between these two, namely Holy Saturday, is overlooked by us. It carries no significance in our religious life, in the catechism of our heart. And yet there is a significance in this day that goes beyond what the printed catechism has to tell us about it. It is a significance that we ourselves acknowledge every time we say the Apostles’ Creed, the earliest and most hallowed formula of our faith. ‘He descended into hell’. This is the clause devoted to Holy Saturday and giving expression to the inward significance of it. Now we might say that although this credal formula is so short, consisting as it does of only a couple of short lines, it does mean that not only God and eternal life, not only the Lord and his Church, not only Good Friday and Easter, but Holy Saturday too has a special article of the creed devoted to it. And surely it follows from this that in our religious life Holy Saturday needs to be marked by something more than merely a kind of pause between the two great days on which we commemorate the event of our redemption. In this sense Holy Saturday could be said to have a content of its own and a value of its own in our lives. In view of this it ought to be celebrated as the anamnesis, the sacred commemoration of the reality which we acknowledge when we utter the words ‘He descended into hell’.

But in that case what do we mean by this credal formula? And why should not the words we utter in it refer simply to a past event as such, something precisely which we continue to remember as having taken place long ago? Why should these words in the credal formula refer rather to something that still continues to have a vital effect upon our lives in the present? It is because this particular aspect also of the life and death [146] of the Lord is something that we have to live out in our own lives until all is consummated.

Let us examine the faith of the early Church upon this point from the period of the New Testament itself up to the fifth century, in which this declaration that Christ descended into the realm of the dead was accorded a place in the Western form of the Apostles’ Creed. For it is precisely the faith of the Church on this point that has been expressed in a fixed and crystallised form in this article of the creed concerning Christ’s descent into hell. From such an investigation it can be established unmistakably that two ideas at any rate, distinct though mutually interpenetrating, are being expressed in this formula: First, Jesus truly did die and, moreover, the death that he died is the only one that can avail to redeem our death; second, this death brought redemption and release to all those members of the human race who had died before Christ and who, even though at their deaths they were just and in principle saved, had to wait for the salvation laid up for them until the fulness of salvation as such had been achieved in Christ. Both of these two real factors, therefore, are covered by the single credal formula. But of the two it is only to the first that we propose to devote some measure of consideration here, since it has a more decisive effect upon our lives.

‘He descended into hell’. Or, to give a clearer and more precise rendering, he descended into the realm of the dead. This assertion, therefore, declares initially that Jesus truly did die. When we read Peter’s great Pentecost sermon in the Acts of the Apostles (2:22-36) we can see that the underlying intention here is to state who Jesus was and what befell him in his life. Thus when Peter wants to tell us that Jesus was the one who was put to death and rose from the dead then, in order to express the fact that this was in very truth a real death, he says that death held Jesus as it were in fetters, that he was swallowed up by Hades, Luke's rendering of the Hebrew word Sheol, which in Jewish theology signifies the realm of the dead. The Jews believed in some sort of survival after death, and so according to their anthropology the dead man entered the realm of the dead, a 'place', that is to say, if we may express this unimaginable state of survival after death in such terms at all. The devotional theology of Jesus' own time had developed these ideas and had (rightly) conceived of a wide variation in terms of happiness or woe in the states of life open to man in his survival after death. These were determined, it was held, according to the sort of life which the dead man had lived while still on this earth. An [147] instance in which this is clearly brought out is Jesus' own parable of Lazarus the poor man and Dives the rich reveller. Nevertheless all the dead were included in a single sphere, a single basic state. And this is designated precisely as Sheol, the realm of the dead. When, therefore, Peter wanted to bring out the fact that Jesus had truly died, then no other way of doing this was open to him than by explicitly declaring, 'Jesus descended into the realm of the dead, Sheol or Hades'. Probably Paul too is thinking of this when in Rom 10:7: he speaks of one who has to descend into the 'abyss', 'that is to bring Christ up from the dead', and this one has indeed 'descended into the lower parts of the earth' (Eph 4:9 f.). In just the same way Jesus himself had said that he would be 'in the heart of the earth' for three days and three nights (Mt 12:40).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

There is no doubt that these ways of expressing the truth with which we are here concerned do include a certain figurative element. The dead are certainly not in a place which lies at the innermost point of our physical earth. Indeed in terms of our conceptions of the spatial dimension of the cosmos they are not 'in place' at all. Sheol plays no part in the frame of reference provided by our physical sciences. This is not because there is not, and never could be, any such reality as this realm of the dead, but because the very nature of this state is such that it belongs to a totally different dimension from that of our finite conceptual world, and is wholly incommensurable with it. But we would fail to do justice to the full depths of meaning contained in the words we have quoted if we were to take them as signifying nothing more concerning the death of Jesus than the actual fact that he died. Over and above this they have also something to tell us about the state of being dead as this applies to him. In fact it is quite clear that these words look beyond the actual process of dying to the fact of being in a state of death. They therefore oblige us to ask ourselves what we mean when we say that the experience of Jesus consisted not merely in the act of dying but in the state of being dead as well. He was not simply the man who died but, over and above this, the man who was in the state of death.

What, then, are the special implications of this state of having died and of being dead which project us into some further dimension in the meaning of death itself? Since death and the state of being dead are so closely connected it is impossible to regard the two terms as wholly distinct from each other. The one throws light upon the other. The man who has died is no longer there. He has been withdrawn from us into a sphere which is [148] remote and from which no echo returns, into darkness and silence. He has departed from us. This does not carry with it in any immediate or primary sense the connotation of having 'passed over' into 'another world'. Let us examine somewhat more closely this idea of what it means to be a dead man. The dead man has departed from this life. This world of ours, so familiar to him, so much his own as it was, the physical mode of existence in all its dimensions, all the fulness and colour of concrete reality. From all this the dead man has indeed been withdrawn, never more to return to this world in its unglorified state. Yet the form of existence which he does lead is not of the phantom- or ghost-like kind, one which has absolutely nothing to do with the worldly mode of existence. The simplicity of the spirit's mode of existence does indeed imply a certain perfection. But this is not to say that already at this stage it amounts to an absolute and definitive perfection in every possible respect. When we make this assertion

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

we mean neither to deny nor to call in question the fact that with regard to the finitude of human nature there is an intrinsic distinction to be drawn, corresponding to the true and justifiable distinction between 'soul' and 'body'. Precisely in virtue of its openness to reality as such the spirit is not wholly removed from the world at death; indeed the underlying unity of reality as a whole actually opens up to it, so to say, at a new and deeper level. All things become present to it immediately and without distortion. For this reason the dead man is more closely and intimately united to the inward meaning of all that is real. But this totality of the real is still present to it in a peculiarly dim and remote manner. For the dead man this experience of the world in depth, as it were, is painful rather than joyful. He cannot really entertain it or express to himself that in it which is the object of desire to world and finite spirit alike, namely to come to themselves. Everything has become less real, has receded into remoteness, has become more alien and more lonely.

We recognise that this account does not cover everything that there is to say about the dead. Moreover it is quite evident that the state of death as applied to Jesus had further and quite different aspects in virtue of the fact that in death he was the one who was infinitely close to God and the one who, as dead, conquered death itself. But for all this he was precisely: the man who died. Not only for us but also, and primarily, for him the significance of the resurrection is that it was an event that gave him something new, something which, so long as he was dead, he had had to do, without. And however important it is for us on Holy Saturday not to [149] think of him merely as dead, nevertheless he was in fact and in truth the man who had died. His own death was the price which he paid in order to ensure that the state of being dead should have a new significance for us. He descended into this state of death. He endured the nadir of human existence, the ultimate fall into immeasurable depths to which it is subject. And because he submitted to this fate, yielding himself up into the hands of his Father, his entry into this eternal love was initially experienced by him as a collapse into the darkness and anonymity of death, into the real and genuine state of being dead. It is precisely because he was, in an ineffable sense, the one who was alive, that he necessarily felt the disembodied state in which he continued to exist after death so intensely as something to be overcome, something unnatural. He more than any other must have felt himself, in this disembodied state, excluded from that which was his due, that which he willed to be: the one who is alive in the most intensely real sense. He who is the source of light for the entire world, and that too in the created life-principle of his own human existence in all its fulness and breadth (we call this life-principle of bodily existence the soul), was thrust by death into death – in other words to that region where there is no light and no clear bodily mode of being, so that the 'soul' is deprived of that state in which it wills to be. He was in the state of death. In deed and in truth between his dying on Good Friday and the life which he takes up on Easter Day he has his Holy Saturday. We declare our belief in the fact that he descended into the realm of the dead.

Death and life are not simply two events which follow one upon another and are distinct one from the other in human existence. They interpenetrate one another. We are in process of dying all through our lives, and what we call death is the culminating point of an act of dying that extends over the whole span of life. This is why we are constantly undergoing a foretaste of that descent into death which the Lord took upon himself. Do we not sometimes feel as though an immeasurable distance lay silently between us and the things of this world, dividing us from them? Are we not slowly in process of becoming those who depart? Are we not constantly and ever anew saying goodbye? Is not that which is familiar to us changing to an ever-increasing extent into that which is alien and almost hostile and repellant? Long before the hour in which we close our eyes for the last time we are already being drawn back into the depths of the world. This descent into the poverty of our own being has already commenced, and has been in progress ever since we received our human [150] natures, even though only in an invisible and hidden manner, at the roots of our being. This basic condition to which our nature is subject, and which, for all our activity, we can do nothing to evade, is at the same time the factor which makes it possible for us already in the here and now really to participate with Jesus, our brother and the sharer in our human nature, in the celebration of Holy Saturday. Since we are hewn from the same block and since we too are already dying our own deaths in the midst of our lives, we are in a position to understand his fate not merely as outsiders and bystanders, but by actually sharing in it. By faith we experience that his descent into the utter feebleness of our human existence has consecrated all the 'Holy Saturday' hours in our lives. Left to ourselves all that we are would simply be solitary, defenceless and exposed in the midst of the darkness and emptiness of death. But since he has shared our fate and has redeemed us in it this Holy Saturday, in the midst of all its darkness, brings us the light of life. Since he has descended into the unfathomable and bottomless depths of the world there is no longer any abyss in human experience in which man is abandoned and alone. There is one who has gone before him and has endured all such abysses, so that we might conquer. Henceforward whatever disasters may befall, at the bottom of them all is to be found eternal life. 'He who descended is he who also ascended far above all the heavens, that he might fill all things' (Eph 4:10).

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[151]

13

HIDDEN VICTORY

On Good Friday and Easter we celebrate the death and resurrection of the Son of Man, who is our salvation. But generally speaking the day which falls between these two, namely 'Holy Saturday' does not carry much weight in our religious lives. Now perhaps by failing to travel every step of the journey between Good Friday and Easter morning we are depriving the terms 'death' and 'resurrection' of something of their inner significance.

I

Manifestly Holy Saturday ought to have its due place in our life of faith, since we do in fact acknowledge the meaning of it in the Apostles' Creed every time we say 'He descended into hell' or, to give a better rendering, 'into the realm of the dead'. But what is the real message conveyed by this formula, so familiar as it is to us? For the meaning of it forms the content of this particular day.

First and foremost it declares that Jesus has truly died, because in the language of the bible 'truly to die' and 'to descend into the realm of the dead' are synonymous phrases. Let us not suppose that the underlying meaning of this clause is something which is immediately self-evident and devoid of further implications. The Son of God has truly died. He, the Son of God, the sinless, the free, he who alone, in a certain sense, is self-authenticating, he who, unlike the rest of us, is not already called in question and questionable right from the very roots of his being – he it is who, in very truth, has shared in this incomprehensible absurdity which we call death, in which it is made brutally apparent what we are: the ones who are divided against themselves, radically contingent in their being, those who take refuge from a thousand unsolved questions in the ultimate all-embracing riddle of death. He has made himself one with us in death. He has shared our ultimate fate.

[152] There is a further message contained in these words, 'He descended into the realm of the dead'. Jesus is he who is truly in a state of death, and not merely one who dies. But what, then, does it imply, this 'being in a state of death', this being dead, over and above the actual fact of dying? While we are attempting to draw a certain distinction at this point, it does not in fact make any difference whether one particular formulation applies more especially and primarily to the act of dying while another applies rather to the state of being dead. For an assertion that the former is the case is also an assertion, at least indirectly, of the latter. The dead man is the one who has departed, the one who is silent, the one who is remote. The reason he has gone is not that he wanted, in some sense, to change to a different mode of being. Certainly this also is true. But thereby he has also, in very truth, become one who has been withdrawn from that dimension in which alone he can be wholly himself with all the fulness that his nature demands, a dimension constituted by the world, by his own body, by the concrete mode of his existence. Certainly he no longer wishes to possess all this in the form in which he possessed it before his death, unglorified and subject to corruption. But neither does he on that account wish to live the life of a phantom, a disembodied spirit. In this state of disembodiment and spirituality he may have achieved a very advanced state of perfection (This was at least the case with Jesus, who in the depths of his spirit lived in a state of absolute proximity to God in his infinity). But a disembodied spirit of this kind, remote from this world and its physical mode of existence, is still not absolutely perfect in all

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

respects. It is like a seed which has an innate inclination to develop and grow into its due fulness of flowering and fruitfulness, like the idea of an artist which demands to be expressed in that visual form in which alone it can really achieve its due mode of existence. He who is dead and not yet risen is alive indeed, but the dimension in which he now exists is one in which, while he retains his essential identity, his nature has, so to say, been resolved into its basic constituents, and his existence has become featureless and remote from that mode which is natural to it. He has all things – indeed all things are more closely and immediately present to him than ever. He exists at the 'heart' of the world, nearer than ever before to the innermost kernel of all reality. In fact it is only now that he becomes truly near to all this. Yet in spite of this, this reality in its wholeness and stripped of all deception is present to him, as it were, at one remove from himself. It is, so to say, separated from him as by an invisible barrier. He cannot [153] communicate with it. Thus the dead man is open to the suffering that all this entails, but is somehow excluded from the possibility of taking action in order to make this reality his own and to express himself physically in it. What we, on our side of the dividing line, experience of the dead has its exact counterpart in what they experience from their side (though they do have other experiences as well): everything is, as it were, encompassed by an infinite remoteness. Everything is there, but how unreal it has all become, how distant and how dead! One is, as it were, engulfed in an infinite loneliness, left utterly to one's self and at the same time alien to one's self, left exposed and defenceless in that state of being dead which is intrinsic in human nature itself.

II

Our life is hidden with Christ in God, St Paul tells us. Here is a saying that is especially appropriate to Holy Saturday. God's life is in us; the immeasurable value of Christ's humanity and the infinite future are already present to us. But the mode in which they are present is a 'hidden' one. They are, in a mysterious manner, withheld from us. They are present in that mysterious hope in which we think not of that which is to survive and to continue into later times in order to hold fast to the reality that is already present to us, but in which we are, in a certain sense, taken out of ourselves, so that the inconceivable future becomes the centre of our existence, and so becomes present to us as a mystery which we do not yet understand. This situation of hope becomes manifest on Holy Saturday. It is the situation of one who stands between a present that is already vanishing, and a future which is so far present only in hope.

Now death and life are not simply two distinct phases in human existence, the one following upon the other and quite distinct from it. They interpenetrate one another. We are dying throughout our entire life, and what we call death is the end of a process of dying that is life-long, and therefore we are constantly undergoing a foretaste of that final descent into death which the Lord has taken upon himself.

Do we not sometimes feel that between us and the things of this world lies an infinite distance and silence, separating us from them? Are we not slowly becoming those who have to say goodbye? Ah yes! It is not only in that moment which we call death, in order to conceal from ourselves that we are already, even now, in process of dying, that we descend into [154] the underworld. It is not only in that moment that we are withdrawn into the 'heart' of the world, which at first seems to us to be a shadowy abyss. This descent, this journey to the underworld has already begun long since. At least there is a subtle orientation in that direction which affects the course of our lives at their very roots. And it is for this reason that we can truly celebrate Holy Saturday with the Lord – can already, in the here and now, share in his fate and recognise in faith that his Holy Saturday redeems and consecrates our own.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Our Holy Saturday, taken in isolation from his, would simply be a state of living death. Since he has endured it and redeemed it it is the day which carries eternal life concealed within its expectant silence. For since he has descended into the underworld human life no longer culminates in an abyss into which man is cast headlong, and at the bottom of which he cannot find eternal life. Hence that saying of scripture: 'He who descends, he it is also who ascends above all the heavens in order to fulfil all things'.

The life of the present recedes from us, and it is this that we then call our life. But that fuller life which is to endure for ever is still concealed – in that silent future which we are going to meet, the future which we call by the name of 'God', and are able so to call it because our demand for the future as it should be is unconditional and infinite. For only by demanding this kind of future shall we do justice to God who comes to meet us and to be our own future. And it is in this sense that our life is hidden in God. That is at once the pain and the blessing of our life as we live it, our pain, our anguish and – let us say it in all calmness – our disappointment, so constantly renewed. Life is not as we would have it in the innermost depths and in the very centre of our hearts.

The factors of goodness, beauty and vitality in life constantly bloom afresh like an endless promise, only to die once more without having fulfilled that promise. And the promise of an eternal future, however appealing and attractive it may be, is constantly veiled under the appearance of mere illusion in the trials to which our faith is exposed, in the cares of every day. Holy Saturday lasts all our life long. Can we hold out to the end of it in sincerity, in faithfulness, in calmness and in patience, precisely as a time during which we must endure, as a time which has no festivals in the true sense, which is 'non-liturgical', just as the real Holy Saturday is said to be?

If we do this, if we supplicate for and obtain the grace of that firmness and patience which is achieved in a life that can do without any powerful [155] or compelling movements of the senses (few of which are wholly devoid of some element of sinfulness), then this 'Holy Saturday' life of ours will suddenly be filled (though we may not try to force it to this conclusion) with the joy and sureness of its approaching Easter. One notices that precisely the final moment is sustained and lasts on into a blessed and unfathomable future, an Easter day that lasts for ever, and that is on the point of breaking out upon us, or better from within the very midst of our own lives, and becoming our true life. Perhaps too it is only in a certain freedom from tension, anxiety and care, not to be accounted for in merely rational terms, that we first become aware of the presence of this hidden life within us. At any rate it is there. It is still Holy Saturday. Our life is still hidden. But even if hidden it is already present. Its hiddenness implies that this is the moment of faith and of hope, and besides these of that love which is already with us and which will endure.

III

At Easter we are led all too easily to celebrate the resurrection with noisy jubilation, with the blaring of trumpets, with words and music. And certainly no-one can be blamed or suspected of unworthy motives if he indulges in such Easter jubilation, seeing that it is the joy of the eternal victory of life that suddenly breaks out with all its holiness and power from the heart of the believer. But to those who are still pilgrims and, moreover, who still have the path of faith to travel, to those who are more keenly aware of the death and the futility which is present in their human lives than of the glory of the life that is indestructible and eternal a gentler and more modest Easter joy is also permissible. Joy in this particular sense is also possible for those who have become tired to death under the burden of everyday toils and disappointments.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If we wish to understand Easter we must first understand ourselves, that is accept ourselves as we really are. Now we are children of the earth, and as such subject to death. This much is certain. And when we put the question to ourselves of what is to become of us, destined as we are to die, then, as both our own experience and the scriptures testify, we have no reason to assert that we are, in any ultimate sense, divided into two component parts and to ascribe two different destinies to the soul and body respectively. We are children of the earth, and precisely as such we are also spirit and freedom. And we claim a final and definitive state of [156] freedom, responsibility and love corresponding to what we are. We must make this claim if we have really understood what these words mean. Now it clearly follows from this that we wish this final and definitive state to apply to us in our complete natures as concrete physical beings. Again in the last analysis the question of what is meant by spirit in this claim that we make and what the grace of divine life means in this context is a secondary one. What must be recognised is that this insistent and inalienable demand to arrive finally at the definitive state of the freedom and wholeness of eternal life, to apply to us as one and undivided, is alive in us. And if this is the case, then we know at the same time, and need not disguise it from ourselves, that we are quite unable to 'picture' this final and definitive state to ourselves. Such a thing would be still more absurd than to suppose that the caterpillar could imagine what it would be like to be a butterfly. For it is clear that the 'transformation' which our whole earthly life must undergo, as the scripture also tells us, and which pervades it right to its very roots, implies a final and definitive state in a mode of existence that is lifted right out of the temporal order. Any attempt at predicting such a thing would be doomed to failure from the outset. We know nothing more of it than that we shall exist as those who have been perfected and have entered into the unfathomable mystery of love which we call God. And that is enough.

When we think of our own consummation in this way does it lead us away from the resurrection of Jesus? No. So far from this, we have prepared ourselves to understand it, although admittedly this preparation for our understanding of the resurrection derives, once more, from the resurrection itself. In him, the inconceivable – inconceivable in itself – hope of our final perfection becomes faith. We know in fact that in that act which we call his resurrection he has not returned into our earthly state of existence, but that his life has been transformed into the fulness of the presence of God so that he has been withdrawn from our earthly state. Even such experiences as the disciples had of their risen Lord, and which were granted to console and strengthen them, were, in a certain sense, the necessary translation of his own unique and inconceivable perfection into terms which we, in our mortality, can understand here, confined as we are to space and time. The knowledge of these experiences does not justify us in depicting, in terms of our own human ideas, the state of perfection as it applies to the risen Lord who, as man, is uniquely one and whole. But if we obey the innermost longing of our humanity for [157] the final and definitive state that is his, and so with pure hearts direct our gaze wholly and exclusively upon him, his understanding of himself his death and his disciples' Easter experience of him, then indeed we are not forced, but rather empowered and emboldened to say: 'He is risen'. We can say it quite soberly and calmly because we are only asserting what we are at basis awaiting for ourselves, if we take our humanity in earnest, and do not suppose that it can evade responsibility for the eternal in it by escaping into nothingness. And conversely when we look upon him we can believe that at death life does not, in any ultimate sense, sink into the empty void of absurdity, but rather falls into the unfathomable depths of God. He is the first of those who are born through death into a final and definitive state that is predestined for all humanity, because he, being truly man, is also the Word in which God utters himself, and utters himself to us. And so when we too believe this Word and take it to our hearts, the statement, 'He is risen' becomes the essential content of our faith and hope as a whole. For what we mean when we say 'He is risen' is that in death he has overcome and redeemed for ever the very heart and centre of all earthly being. In his resurrection he has held fast to this victory, and he has remained victor ever since. When in the creed we acknowledge that he has ascended into heaven this is only another way of saying that for a while he has withdrawn his glorified humanity from our view, and chiefly in order that the world may no longer be cut off from God as by an intervening chasm.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Christ is already at the heart and centre of all the poor things of this earth, which we cannot do without because the earth is our mother. He is present in the blind hope of all creatures who, without knowing it, are striving to participate in the glorification of his body. He is present in the history of the earth, whose blind course he steers with unearthly accuracy through all victories and all defeats onwards to the day predestined for it, to the day on which his glory will break out of its own depths to transform all things. He is present in all tears and in every death as the hidden joy and life which conquers by seeming to die. He is in the beggar to whom we give alms as the secret riches in which the almsgiver is allowed to share. He is in the wretchedness, the defeats and failures of his servants as the victory which belongs to God alone. He is in our feebleness as the power which may allow itself to appear weak because it is invincible. Even in the midst of sins he is still present as the compassion of the eternal love, ready to be patient even to the end. He is there as the innermost essence [158] of all things, and the most secret law which still triumphs and imposes its authority even when every kind of order seems to be breaking up. He is with us as the light of day and the air are with us, which we do not notice; as the secret law of a movement that we do not comprehend because that part of the movement which we ourselves experience is too brief for us to infer from it the pattern of the movement as a whole. But he is there, the heart of this earthly world and the secret seal of its eternal validity. He is risen. He who hopes utters these words in his heart: He is risen.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[159]

14

EXPERIENCING EASTER

The way of the Cross – our way of the Cross – is something with which we are all familiar. Today it means, generally speaking, something different. The street-plan has been altered. This is, in fact, often brought home to us today in the politics of these changing times. Today the way of the Cross means calamity, cancer, divorce, atomic war, being thrown on the scrap-heap and very much more of the same kind. The road to be travelled has grown longer, and new street-names appear beside the old at its intersections. But for all this it is still the old way of the Cross, which leads by way of much tribulation and pain to final death. Furthermore, in the hospitals of today this death is no different from what it was in earlier times. The eyes wander, seeking round in vain to find some fixed point on which to focus. The words of the doctors, kindly meant though they may be, have a decidedly hollow and distant ring. And so on. Finally a man is laid in a grave. But this is 'of no further concern to the man himself'.

The question, therefore, is simply this: whether the individual concerned is still there to take an interest in his own life and his own death. In so far as anything can be established 'empirically' at all it can be said that those who remain behind are no longer concerned. That much is certain. The dead man is cut off, removed from the activities in which we are engaged. All that is left behind is something strange and rather ludicrous, something that we make to disappear quickly in the process called burial because we cannot really put it to any practical use (unless the Nazis and their later disciples make soap out of it). But what is the situation of one who has disappeared in this way? 'I' may permit myself not to trouble others with this question as it applies to me. But for my own part I cannot ignore it, for I know that I must die. And when I neglect something which so truly concerns me, then ipso facto I have precisely made up my mind in one particular direction. In this case, with the best will in the world, it [160] is quite impossible to be so indifferent to the fact of death as 'not even deliberately to ignore it'.

But surely we should not regard it as so completely clear that with death 'everything is over'. Surely it has not been convincingly established that the rest of the tragedy called human life which we have mentioned above is nothing more than a fulfilment of the 'law of the conservation of energy'. For even before death the matter which we are considering, and which now with death begins to assume quite different forms, was already undergoing changes, though it is true that in the case of a human body the direction in which these changes tended was a little less constant and unambiguous than is the case with other units of matter. But even allowing for all this, there was at that earlier stage something different there as well: precisely a man, with the love, faithfulness, pain, responsibility, freedom and much more besides which being human entails. In view of this what right have we, properly speaking, to assert that everything in man has simply disappeared from reality and turned into pure nothingness – evaporated, dissolved? (Even this way of putting it would turn out to be untenable, because even when something is 'dissolved' all the basic elements of which it was formerly composed still remain, whereas ex hypothesi the human being who was there would have simply to cease to exist. Formerly 'I' was there, but after my death there would have to be absolutely nothing there any longer at all). But what real reason have we for asserting that everything is absolutely 'finished' in this way? Is it that we no longer observe anything of what was formerly there? This argument seems somewhat weak. Logically speaking the only conclusion we could draw from this is that 'for me who remain behind the dead man is no longer there'. But does this mean that in himself he is no longer there? Must he be there for me in order to be there at all? Is it conceivable that his 'basic constituents' were such that they were capable of being transformed in such a manner that the new creature which emerged from the change no longer played any further part in our world? (It should be noticed that on this hypothesis it would be no more necessary for the individual to be 'aware' of these basic constituents in his nature than that he should be conscious of the chemical processes involved in the material changes which in fact he does undergo).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

When we look closely at this life of ours it is of its very nature not the sort of life in which man wants to go on indefinitely taking part in activities on this plane. Of its very nature it strives to reach a conclusion to its [161] present mode of existence. Time becomes an illusion if it involves self-consciousness as with us and is incapable of attaining its fulfilment. If it were capable of being extended indefinitely it would become hell in the sense that it would be a meaningless void. No moment would have any value because it would always be possible to postpone and put off everything endlessly to a future that was infinite and so never made actual. Nothing would ever be too late for us (there would always be enough), and on this hypothesis everything would fall into the void of absolute indifference, where it would have no value. When, therefore, someone departs this life nothing could be easier to understand (If he did not do so one would have to put him to death by force). But when the dying man departs, cannot that element which is absolutely proper to him as person survive unchanged and elevated above the 'space-time' dimension of the merely physical precisely because it was all along something more than the mere interplay of the 'elements' of physics and bio-chemistry, because it was capable of love, faithfulness, and perhaps too sheer baseness and similar qualities; because while it come to be in this dimension of space and time, nevertheless it does not achieve its final fulfilment in this dimension. (In other words it no longer remains behind on that plane on which those who do actually remain behind do continue to exist). We should not understand the existence upon which we enter at death as a mere 'lasting on' of temporal existence in that peculiarly indefinite and limitless state in which it is always open to fresh content, and is therefore, strictly speaking, a mere empty void. If this is the sense in which we think of human existence, then death puts an end to it for the whole man. Anyone who thinks that the immortality of the soul means simply that it 'lasts on' in time beyond death, so that after death a new period of time open up before it, will admittedly involve himself in difficulties which are insuperable both in the realm of ideas and in accounting for the real and objective achievement of man's true final state which does take place in death. But let us consider the case of one who supposes that 'with death everything is over'. The arguments by which he justifies this position are that since the period allotted to an individual man began at a specific point in time it must also end at a specific point, so that the total extent of the individual's existence really does not extend beyond his death. A further and final argument in justification of such a position might be as follows:– Let us imagine time as evolving endlessly in its own course into an indefinite future, while its content undergoes as infinite [162] series of permutations. This would imply that the idea of anything old lasting throughout its extent is ruled out. Now properly speaking this is quite unrealisable in fact, and would be more terrible than any hell. Anyone who takes up this position is being led astray by the limitations of his own imagination as it bears upon our human experience of time every bit as much as he who conceives of the human soul 'lasting on'.

In reality 'eternity' is present in time and emerges from it as it were as a ripened fruit growing out of it. Eternity does not really emerge 'after' the allotted span of human life; rather it completely removes the individual concerned from time, in that it itself becomes disengaged from that time, a limited span of which was allotted to the individual concerned in order that he might exercise freedom in working his way towards his final and definitive state. Eternity is not a way of expressing pure time which lasts inconceivably long. Rather it is the mode appropriate to that spirituality and freedom which is brought to its fulness in time, and for this reason eternity can only be understood on the basis of a right understanding of time. A time which does not, as it were, act as a starting-point for the spirit and for freedom does not in any sense give birth to eternity. (Such, for instance, is the time proper to animals). The final and definitive state of man, therefore, is something that pertains to the dimension of spirituality and freedom in his mode of being, something that is achieved by the exercise of these attributes. As such it transcends time, and must be detached from it in our minds. Yet because, almost in spite of ourselves, we do find ourselves envisaging it as an infinite prolongation of time, we do fall into intellectual embarrassments. Just as with modern physics, we must learn to think in terms that are abstract and non-imaginative, and in this sense 'de-mythologised'. Then we shall be able to say: 'Through death (not after it) the definitive fulness of human existence, achieved by the exercise of freedom in time, is present (not 'begins to take place')'. What has come to be, what was formerly subject to temporal conditions, now is. It exists as something that has been freed from its former temporal limitations. And this state of liberation came about in virtue of the fact that man is spiritual and free, and in order that the elements of freedom and spirituality in man might have final and definitive validity. Is it not possible, therefore, that what we call our life is in fact simply the brief flash of a process by which something comes to be (in freedom and responsibility), which is – is in a definitive sense because it belongs to the dimension of things which 'are' in this special sense (and which are not [163] merely in a constant process of becoming)? And does it not follow from this that the process of becoming ceases when the state of being begins, and that the only reason why we do not notice this is that we ourselves are still involved in this process of becoming?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is really quite impossible to confine reality to the level of those things the existence of which even the most stupid and superficial of men are neither able nor anxious to contest. It is quite certain that reality extends beyond this level. Just as scientific systems have been evolved in order to establish that even in the sphere of the material world the objectively real extends beyond the immediately observable to the human senses, so too there are experiences for the achievement of which, while no systems have been evolved, still a more highly developed spirituality is required. And these experiences put us in touch with eternity in that dimension in which it is no longer conceived of as a further prolongation of time stretching away 'on the other side of' our present lives, but is rooted rather in the time of freedom and responsibility as in the sphere proper to its own development, and from there emerges into life in its fulness, in which time is totally abolished. Anyone who has had to take a morally right decision in a matter of life and death (involving love, faithfulness, sacrifice and so forth), and has taken it radically and without any ulterior inducements, so that he gains absolutely no advantage whatever from it except the intrinsic goodness which he has recognised as involved in the actual decision itself has already experienced in this decision that dimension of eternity of which we are speaking here. And when he goes on from this retrospectively to reflect upon the decision he has taken, and tries to translate this experience into theory, he may arrive at a false interpretation, even to the point of doubting or denying the reality of 'eternal life', and in that case it is regrettable because it is false and above all because it entails the danger of enfeebling or calling in question totally moral decisions of this kind. But it does not for one moment alter the actual experience itself.

It is not necessary here to draw speculative distinctions among the factors involved in this experience between those factors which belong to the spiritual and immortal nature of man, which even as a sinner he cannot evade, and what is to be ascribed to that grace or support which is bestowed by God in his eternity, and which for the Christian interpretation of existence attains its climax, its absolute validity and its manifestation in Jesus Christ, in his criminal's death on the Cross and in the victory which he won there.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[164] But what are we to say of the individual who of his own resources chooses to doubt the validity of his own experience on the grounds that to him, so petty and abject as he is, it is not sufficiently clear, or on the grounds that in that deep sense of mistrust concerning the very meaning of existence from which we sinners all suffer painfully because we are cowards it seems to him 'too good to be true'? Such an one as this must hold firm to human experience itself as found in the experience of him who has risen. There is such a thing as Easter faith. Those possessing it are beyond all reckoning. It is present first in the disciples of Jesus, and the witness which they bear to their Easter experience and their Easter faith is to acknowledge him who was crucified and who saw his designs collapse in total failure on the Cross as one who was victorious with every fibre of his being, and was definitively and finally received and accepted by God.

One must not attempt to resolve this Easter experience into its constituent elements in order subsequently to reassemble them. Here too the whole is greater than the sum of its parts. Our encounter with Jesus who was conscious of being the Son of God as incomprehensible mystery, and who, in his own incomprehensible understanding of himself dared to call that mystery his Father, even in the moment of his death when he felt himself abandoned by God – this encounter itself belongs intrinsically to the experience of Easter taken in its uniqueness and totality. It is an encounter with the love and faithfulness of Jesus, with his flawless obedience, with the darkness of his death, with his total and unreserved acceptance of death, and with the Easter event itself. It may be that we of today cannot draw any clear distinction within the Easter event as understood here between Easter itself (precisely the fact of the risen Christ) and the Easter experience of the disciples. In other words it may be that as far as we are concerned that Easter experience of the disciples can never be merely an external transmission of information (as though they acted as a telephone wire or a telescope) which is, as it were, discarded the moment we have made contact with the event itself. In the case of Jesus' disciples their Easter faith and their Easter experience (their belief and the grounds for that belief) are already blended into each other indissolubly. And the basis for their belief (the risen Christ) is only experienced powerfully and compellingly as providing grounds for faith when the act of faith itself has already been posited. In other cases too there are objects of experience which, while they are objectively real and valid, are still only accessible in the experience of someone else. And the more significant and the more [165] central to existential reality something is, the more likely this is to be so. Certainly the case here is quite different from that in which a reliable and trustworthy witness brings us news of something – for instance that he has seen someone jump into the water. In such a case the possibility of such an experience is already recognised and understood as a matter of our own experience independently of the information we receive about the actual event. And therefore this information on the part of the eye-witness puts us directly in contact with the actual event which he informs us about in such a way that the reliability and trustworthiness of the witness becomes superfluous in the sense that we already have reasons of our own for realising that such an event is possible, and we do not need to be able to recognise this reliability of his. In a certain sense we have already been put directly in touch with the event itself. In the case of Easter, however, it is quite otherwise. This experience is, in the nature of things, sui generis. For the experience of something 'other-worldly' that needs to be 'made manifest' no longer belongs to our 'space-time' dimension, and is not ipso facto available to 'this-worldly' minds to grasp. Certainly it is not in any sense an experience which we can 'understand' on the basis of the experiences which we already have. We have not already acquired knowledge of the possibilities of, and necessary conditions for such an experience taking place such that we could rely on our own resources and apply the everyday criteria of our own pre-existing knowledge to judge of the question of whether we could accept such an event as actually taking place and being experienced in the here and now. The appeal to the empty grave as an occurrence which belongs to the world of our normal experience, and which is accessible to everyone, is no real help at all, in attempting to solve this question. An empty grave cannot provide evidence for a resurrection leading to the final perfection of the individual concerned, because there are so many ways of accounting for such a phenomenon. We have no similar experience, no experience on the same plane with which to compare the Easter experience of the first disciples (that is not counting the 'experience of the Spirit' [Gal 3:1ff.]), and we are therefore forced to rely upon the evidence of the disciples in a manner that is essentially more radical than when we are asked to accept the evidence of eye-witnesses in other circumstances. This is not to deny that this experience in itself and as such has an intrinsic structure of its own; in other words that in their experience the disciples are able to distinguish between the objective basis of their experience as such, and the actual [166] psychological process of the experience. They are able to say 'He reveals himself to us and our experience is not simply a substitute for him.' Nor is it denied that we too can in some sense establish the same distinction between the initial cause of the experience and the actual psychological process of it. We can point to the number of the witnesses, to the fact that in their dispositions they were in no sense attuned to or pre-conditioned to the actual experience which they underwent. We can point to the effects of this experience in the real world etc. But all this does not for one moment alter the fact that this Easter experience bears no comparison with other human experiences, and is unique, and that therefore our relationship to this experience cannot be regarded as on the same plane as our relationship to the accounts of natural events brought to us by eye-witnesses. Without the experience of the Spirit, i.e., in this case, without the experience of the meaningfulness of existence which we receive from faith (existence, that is to say, as it is, as a whole), we cannot achieve the necessary trustful self-commitment to the Easter witness of the disciples. And this remains true in spite of the fact that in many cases one acquires the strength to accept the meaningfulness of existence in faith precisely by committing one's self in trust to the Easter experiences of the disciples, and in spite of the fact that in all cases it is only in this Easter faith that one's realisation of this meaningfulness can become fully and properly what it ought to be. Only he who hopes can perceive the fulfilment of hope, and it is when that fulfilment is in view that hope can acquire its full and due actuality, and so rest content. It is neither possible nor needful to break out of this 'circle', but he who is called to hope in the 'resurrection' of his own flesh (the flesh that he is, and not merely 'has') can, by God's grace, break into this 'circle'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Here too how could it be otherwise, seeing that the total self-commitment of the person has to be achieved not in relation to this or that objective among many others on the same level, but in relation to the ultimate meaning of existence as a whole, which is manifested in history. This being the object of one's self-commitment, it cannot be authenticated on any other grounds except those of itself, however many factors may be included in it which mutually condition one another. (Thus too even the reality of the risen Christ as experienced itself supplies the basis for the experience, and conversely the event only 'manifests itself' to the eye of faith). The one fact which we must never overlook is that the consummation of a human existence, achieved in virtue of the fact that it has been [167] drawn into the immediate presence of God, can never be of itself a piece of evidence capable of being inserted into the sphere of space and time proper to 'this-worldly' experiences, and available as such in that sphere. At most it can 'make itself felt' in a human life, and precisely demand the response of total decision in that life (admittedly in all its dimensions). Nor have we any need to 'picture to ourselves' how a man 'appears' in the genuine totality of his being ('with body and soul', as we say). We can admit without disquiet that we are incapable of 'imagining' what a 'physical' resurrection will be, because (unlike the restoring of a dead man to life, for instance), it is, and is intended to be, utterly different from any restoration to a former state. Rather it signifies that radical kind of transformation (of which we already find mention in Paul as a condition for perfection) which the person must undergo as a free earthly being, bringing his own existence to its fulness in order to achieve that ultimate perfection in which he rises above time and reaches beyond it to the timelessness of eternity. When we speak of a 'physical' resurrection we are merely saying that we think of the whole man as perfected, and, in accordance with our own experience of human reality, cannot regard him as divided into an ever-enduring 'spirit' and a merely transient 'physical nature'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In view of this, on what grounds should we be forbidden by our moral conscience with regard to truth to rely on the Easter experience of the first disciples? Nothing compels us to believe them if we decide not to do so and to remain sceptical. But there is much to give us strength to believe in them. What is demanded of us in this is both the boldest course and at the same time the clearest: to hazard our whole existence on the fact that, taken as a whole, it is orientated towards God; that it has a final and definitive meaning, that it is capable of salvation and redemption; that this meaning has actually been realised in Jesus, who is in this an effective prototype for us all; and that as we look upon him it becomes possible for us to believe it of ourselves as the first disciples have done. We are always in the position of 'wanting to' do something (namely to believe), and to this end we explore the depths of our own natures with a view to summoning up that historical objectivity which will enable us to attain to such belief. But they, the first disciples, actually have believed in very deed and in very truth – believed absolutely and totally, and to the point of death.

Have we a better solution to offer to the basic question of the meaning of our own existence? Is it really more honest, or simply, in the last analysis, [168] more cowardly, when confronted with this basic question, to shrug one's shoulders in scepticism and yet to continue on (to the extent that we do live and strive to live decently) as though everything did in fact have a meaning after all? There is no need to maintain that everyone who supposes that he is unable to believe in the resurrection of Jesus is not able to remain ultimately and unreservedly true to his own conscience in his life. But it certainly will be maintained here that he who really does this whether he realises it explicitly or not does in fact believe in the risen Lord even though for him he is nameless. And it makes no difference to this whether the personal interpretations of his existence which he has worked out for himself agree with, or contradict faith in the resurrection. For such a one, even though he does not explicitly recognize the truth of the resurrection, is, in the basic decision by which the whole of his existence is orientated, tending towards the fulness of existence ('with body and soul') in salvation and redemption. He tends towards this fulness of existence as that which transforms this temporal state itself– tends, therefore, towards the meaning of history itself, and is at most not yet aware of whether history has already arrived at that point which even such faith acknowledges. But then this faith, which is also our own, need not shrink (in view of Jesus and the faith of his disciples) to acknowledge: 'It has already taken place'.

In his history at least the prison-house of this age has already been thrown open. And then we too can say explicitly: 'I believe in the resurrection of the body, that is the transformation and ultimate consummation of my own existence'. The Way of the Cross has a fifteenth station, at which we take leave of the march of time to be received into the inconceivable wonder of the love of God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[169]

15

ENCOUNTERS WITH THE RISEN CHRIST

Hope of the Despairing

Among the mysteries of the gospel, so human and at the same time so altogether divine, and because of this so consoling also, is to be numbered the story of the two disciples who were journeying to Emmaus. If we read this story aright we recognise with amazement that it is a story about ourselves. We need only to tell this story to realise that it is a part of our own lives that is recorded in it, and at the same time the whole of our lives; a part, because the same thing happens again and again in our lives, the whole because our entire life is summed up in this one story of the disciples of Emmaus. As we read we notice that we are actually passing through our own Emmaus story. And as we read we hope and pray that our story too may have the same ending as that recorded in the twenty-fourth chapter of Luke's gospel.

They had been so full of hope; but now they believe that they can hope no longer. For the way matters have turned out is far from being in conformity with their hopes, or – to put it more precisely – with the interpretations which they themselves had placed on those hopes. They supposed that what they were hoping for was deliverance and freedom. We do not know whether they had fastened their hopes upon something that was not really capable of being an object of hope at all, or whether it was merely that their hopes were true and right, yet that they were simply disappointed by what they actually experienced. We do not know which of these two alternatives is correct. Nor did they themselves know this, for our understanding of our hopes, and because of this the hopes themselves, are always still in process of development. The point at which they finally arrive, and what becomes of them on the uncharted ways of this life does not depend merely upon ourselves. For we too are not the sovereign masters of our own course. But in any case when the death sentence was pronounced, and he in whom their hopes were centred was [170] nailed to the Cross, and later when he was buried, then, so they believed, everything was over indeed. The only thing left to do was to give up and take to flight. There are situations in which there really is nothing more to hope for, in which there is nothing more to be said except 'We did hope'. Thus these disciples feel that they have been brought face to face with reality, that they are realists, and they do not let themselves be delayed in their flight by the pious fantasies of well-meaning women. No, they say, we are not falling into that mistake a second time. It is not virtue but cowardice and stupidity, so they imagine, to refuse to recognise the facts. And now, once and for all, it is a sheer matter of fact, which no amount of theorising in the world can interpret away that their hope has been hung on the gallows, and then buried in the grave. They are going away – either going home or going somewhere else, but in any case going.

How strange this is. Each of them is wholly alone, cast into the grave of his own hopeless loneliness. Why, then, are they walking together? Why are they actually still talking to one another, these two modern existentialists? Why are they seeking consolation from one another when in very truth there is no hope that it could be worth their while to discuss? They are running away and – talking. Just like ourselves. They are talking even though in reality it is meaningless to do so, and by the very fact of doing so they are bearing unconscious witness against their own convictions. That they should still be able to talk together like this – that is the beginning of grace. They want to blunt the edge of their own inconsolable loneliness by talk; to cover the void of their own hearts with chatter. And in doing so they give God the opportunity of joining in in their discussion. How often it happens that grace is actually present in our very flight from it! Sometimes God is already speaking with us when we

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

imagine that we are quite alone, and only talking about him, the God that is dead. A stranger meets us on the way. It is the Lord. Our eyes, as they look round joylessly, are held by him. But they fail to recognise him. He who is taken up with himself and has a heart that is devoid of hope has strangely little place in his spirit and heart for others. But while it is salvation even to recognise him, still this remains true first and last, that even clear vision cannot bring it about that he, the Lord, is present and accompanies us; that he himself is actually accompanying us on the journey as we flee from him. This is something that he bestows, and he alone. Though admittedly he does accost many on the way who never notice it.

[171] He is there on the way to Emmaus like one who knows even less than we ourselves, like a stranger, as though he were passing us by. We do not know when he comes or when he will go if we do not say: 'Stay with us Lord for it is toward evening'. Despair and grief had not yet pierced so deeply and lethally into the hearts of the disciples that these hearts refused an answer to the question of the traveller; that in the bitterness that kills they cynically refused to pay any heed to the word of light and consolation. Their heart is not yet so proud that it has taken refuge in a narcissism of pain and death, shamefully hugging its despair to itself. They let the stranger speak, though he knows less than they do. They really listen to him. What he says to them is that mystery which alone is self-explanatory. He speaks to them of the predestined death that ransoms and sets free. He shows them quietly how everything in the world and in scripture alike contains this single message, that the one fulfilment of all hope is to be found there, precisely where they believed that they had been deceived and that they were forced to despair. As for the so-called facts of the case, he only tells them precisely what these disillusioned realists have already seen for themselves, seen all too clearly: that Jesus is the crucified one. But consider the way he presents this fact to them, not as something which he shrinks from or denies, but as something which he accepts, something precious and enduring, something with an intrinsic meaning of its own. And in this way, when they look steadfastly at these facts, with a gaze that no longer flinches away from them, when they accept them calmly for what they are, then the facts themselves are illuminated from within, and disclose their own intrinsic truth: precisely that this descent of Jesus into failure and death is the way by which he enters upon the blessed destiny which is his by right, and attains to his own glory. He shows them this not as a general law in the logic of human existence, as though it followed as a matter of basic necessity that any death should be followed by a new becoming. When he speaks of this descent into darkness as the way of entering into supreme glory he applies it as a law of absolute necessity to Jesus and to Jesus alone; to Jesus as believed in, and to all others only to the extent that they do believe in him.

Scripture does not record that the disciples made any answer to what the unknown traveller said to them. They are silent. Because what is in question here, so far from being some theoretical question, some improved scientific theory, is that on which one dares to wager one's whole heart and spirit right to the last: to discover life itself in the very abyss of death, in [172] the very depths of its despair, and to snatch light as it were from the dragon's jaws. That is why silence is appropriate here, for it is here that the heart is re-born. But before this is achieved amid that silence and expectancy that makes it possible, the disciples can say one word, a word of courteous solicitude such as befits simple hearts that are full of kindness: 'Stay with us for it is toward evening and the day is now far spent'. They are anxious about the night that confronts the stranger, he who so fills the night of their own hearts with light. Even as they seek to stay their brother pilgrim they invite him who is their Lord and the goal of their own journey to be their guest. They offer the pilgrim a roof, and thereby arrive home themselves. They break bread with him, and it is then, not while they are discussing the theology of human existence on the way, but in the celebration of fellowship and communion, that they recognise their Lord. It is he. The words which the stranger has spoken to them are the words of the Lord. By breaking bread with them he roots himself in their hearts. And they recognise the truth. Truly he is risen; out of the grave of the world, and out of the chasm of gloom of their own hearts.

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

How often we ourselves have experienced the same thing, even though, perhaps, only faintly and in small degree, and always lasting only for part of our lives. It may be that he who could survey our entire life-span too in his future will see that we are still on the way to Emmaus, that our eyes are still veiled, waiting for that countenance in which their whole destiny can be read, and however eager we may already have been to speak of the Lord, however much our hearts may have been quietly kindled by his word, yet in the last analysis he still continues to walk among us unrecognised.

In fact it may be that the greatness of life has still to come. We are actually bound to journey on on our pilgrimage, to travel and never to believe that we have reached our goal. For we are still on the way to the Last Supper of eternal life, where the Lord will rise and gird himself in order to give us the wine of inexpressible joy. Because we are still on the way we need not wonder at the fact that our heart constantly becomes weary, or angry, and weeps and complains at the disappointment of its hopes; that again and again we have the impression that we are fleeing from the death of our hope into a sterile void. Even on such a journey the Lord can go with us as the divine compassion present in a hidden manner in our midst, to disclose to hearts that are willing to receive it the meaning [173] of scripture and of life. Even a way such as this can lead to the Emmaus of our own lives, where we shall know the Lord in the breaking of bread.

The Good Shepherd

The second Sunday after Easter is called ‘Good Shepherd Sunday’. Obviously the name is derived from the section of the gospel appointed to be read on this Sunday. This consists of three verses from the tenth chapter of John, the chapter which contains three ‘shepherd’ parables. Our text comprises the third of these, and this arrangement of the sections of scripture included in this gospel is something which we have in common with Evangelical Christians also. In this gospel Christ calls himself the good or the true shepherd. In explaining this appellation which he applies to himself he points out that as the owner of the flock he, unlike the hireling, lays down his life for his sheep; that he knows them and they him, and he goes on to predict that one day he will be the one shepherd over all who will lead all the scattered sheep, Jews and Gentiles alike, into the unity of one shelter in his fold, so that there shall be one shepherd and one flock.

It is an age-old picture which Jesus makes use of here in one of his designations of himself in the Johannine gospel, all of which begin with that phrase of unfathomable meaning, ‘I am’. The image itself derives from the nomadic culture of patriarchal times, when the supreme authority was vested in the father. In this image the true shepherd, as the owner of the flock, is simply to be identified with the Lord, the upholder of all things in existence. Among the Greeks king and generals are considered to be the shepherds of the peoples under them. In the Old Testament Yahweh is the shepherd and king of his people. In Ezek. 34 we find a prophetic threat of judgment and condemnation of the shepherds of the people, who have forgotten their duty and become self-seeking. Here the living God of history promises that he will take up and gather his people anew as their shepherd. And then we find the following oracular promise concerning the son of David: ‘I will set up over them one shepherd, my servant David, and he shall feed them. He shall be their shepherd’ (Ezek 34:23).

In this tradition Jesus clothes himself in an archetypal image: ‘I am the true, the real shepherd’. Again in the synoptics he applies ‘shepherd’ images to himself (Mk 14:27; Mt 25:32; 26-31), even though in these passages attention is focused rather on the salvation to which the sheep [174] themselves are destined to attain (Mt 18:12-14; Lk 15:3-7; Mk 6:34;

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Mt 9:36). Since then this image has become a part of the language of Christendom. For the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews Jesus is the great shepherd of the sheep (13:20). For Peter Jesus, considered as the example and reward of his apostles, is said to be the chief shepherd (1 Pet 5:4), the shepherd and protector of our souls (1 Pet 2:25), while for Revelation he is the shepherd who pastures the peoples with an iron rod (2:27). This is why the early Christians depicted the Lord as the Good Shepherd carrying the sheep. This is the most ancient and the most frequent motif in the art of the catacombs, which was thereby designed to present the Lord as the leader gathering souls into Paradise. And when Abercius of Hieropolis in Phrygia (2nd c.) wanted to tell later generations that he had become a Christian he had the following inscription set on his tombstone: 'I am a disciple of a holy shepherd who feeds the flocks of his sheep on mountains and pastures, and has great eyes that see all things'.

Now let us consider that saying of the Lord's in the Johannine gospel, 'I am the good shepherd'. If we want to understand this saying aright we must take it the opposite way round to what everyday linguistic usage might lead us to expect. This sentence does not consist of a determination or specification of the phrase 'I am', which, in itself, might be thought to be empty and vague. If we took it in this sense we would only know what 'I' was from the clear information supplied by the predicate. Here, on the contrary, Jesus is uttering the words 'I am' in an absolute sense that is self-subsistent and all-comprehending. And the reference to the 'shepherd' only derives its true meaning from these preceding words, 'I am'. Thus one can only realise what is meant by the reference to the good shepherd when one has first understood what 'I am' means. In this case the subject determines the predicate, and not the other way round. This appears from the very fact that Jesus utters a whole series of such 'I am' sayings. He says: 'I am – the messiah (4:26), the bread of life (6:35), the living bread from heaven (6:42, 51), the true vine (15:1, 5), the light of the world (8:12; 12:46), the door (10:7), the shepherd (10:11, 14), the resurrection and the life (11:25), the way, the truth and the life (14:6), the first and the last (Rev 1:17; 22:13), the beginning and the end (Rev 22:13), the root and the bright morning star (Rev 22:16).

In virtue of its authority, which extends over the whole of existence, and makes itself present to man in this way, the 'I am' of Jesus is in itself, and without any further addition, the object of faith which pronounces [175] judgment upon the sins of unbelief. Jesus speaks of those who 'do not believe that I am' (8:24). He also declares: 'I tell you this now before it takes place, that when it does take place you may believe that "I am" (13:19). Just as God is, in the deepest and most ultimate sense, not to be portrayed by any being other than himself – indeed not to be conceived of from any point outside his own being, just as he cannot be included in any system of reference pertaining to our own existence, such as we can understand or apply, and just as he cannot be fitted into any such system, just as he is the one who specifies and determines rather than the one who is specified – a subject in the absolute, and not one which is susceptible of predicates, just as he reveals himself in this guise to Moses as 'I am who am', so too Jesus is the 'I am' in an absolute sense: God whose existence is absolutely sovereign, absolutely independent, and prior to the existence of any other being, and it is as such that he proclaims himself in the words 'I am'. 'I am all, the beginning and the end, the way and the light, the truth and the life, the slain one and the victory over death, root and flower: I am'. And therefore in him, the presence of God for us in a guise which we can apprehend, all things are gathered up as in their origin. That is why all things belong to him. That is why he gathers all things to himself, of which he is author and maker, as into the unity of the end towards which all are tending, just as he constitutes the unity of their common beginning too. Because he is the 'I am', therefore he is the true shepherd, he who alone makes comprehensible what this means: to be the true shepherd.

It is not, therefore, by making use of an already familiar image that Christ makes himself

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

comprehensible to us, even though the image itself is one which we cannot fail to recognise. Rather it is on the basis of his 'I am' that he makes it clear to us who the shepherd really is. Because he is, therefore there is one to whom all the scattered and lost ones belong, one who knows all things, however scattered and confused they may be in a dark and meaningless void; one whom the ultimate instinct of reality, still cohering even in its confusion, yet recognises; one who, by entering into this confusion and offering himself up in sacrifice there, ventures into the desolation of death and so achieves the gathering of the scattered; one, in short, who can unite all things. And because there is this 'I am', therefore there is the shepherd.

The great thinker of our times has called man 'the shepherd of being', and summed up in this phrase the whole destiny and value of man, which, [176] by our own resources, we recognise in ourselves. But the truth which Jesus is uttering to us here is still more basic and primary, and when we let it speak to us in a spirit of faith this truth reveals itself to us as an experience of ours that is more basic and more primary: the fact that we are those over whom the shepherd of men watches, and whom he gathers and guides. He, this shepherd of ours, is no abstract idea which we foster and shepherd as man 'shepherds the winds', but rather he who is there, acting upon us, the crucified and risen Lord, he who is invoked at baptism. We do not speak of him. Rather he says his word to us. He is present in the celebration of the Lord's supper, in which he gives us his flesh and blood. Where he is present and active by his grace, there the beginning of that unity has already been achieved which abolishes all conceivable divisions. Where he is the living God is, God as present and close to us. 'Come', run the words of Ps 94:6, 'Let us worship and bow down; let us kneel before the Lord, our maker. For he is our God and we are the people of his pasture and the sheep of his hand'. And Thomas Aquinas writes in his poem: 'Merciful shepherd, thou true bread, show thyself compassionate towards us. Do thou protect us and shepherd us. Do thou prepare for us the eternal blessing that will be ours in the land without death'.

Here we must break off yet holding firm to the truth that is ours, the truth that we, the scattered ones, are those whose very existence is divided and remote from the rest; those who wander about, those who are disunited, those who are cut off from one another as by barriers, those who are hunted by wolves, those who do not know who they belong to (apart from that one whom they are unwilling to belong to, and who seems to come after them in the guise of the wolf of death). If we held fast to him, and then the word came to us, came to us there where we really are the lost ones, the word 'I am' – then we would know indeed that he is the true shepherd.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[177]

16

HE WILL COME AGAIN

This Jesus who was taken up from you into heaven will come in the same way as you saw him go into heaven' (Acts1:11). This quotation from the Acts of the Apostles may serve to introduce the considerations which follow on the festival of Christ's Ascension.

The first thing which we must recognise is that what the two angels are saying here has the force of a refusal or a dismissal. It informs the apostles that their master will not show himself again in visible form, in that unambiguously human and apprehensible form in which they have hitherto been privileged to know him, until he returns in glory at the end of time. The intimacy which they have hitherto enjoyed is over – over until the end of time. The axiom that is now in force is 'Blessed are those who have not seen and yet believed', those who hope utterly against hope, who are willing to let their whole existence depend upon something which is not humanly apprehensible. We have only the message of preaching to rely upon for what belongs to the apostles directly: to have seen with their own eyes what they have seen and have actually touched with their hands. It is not given to us to share this privilege of theirs. It is the unrepeatable privilege that belongs to the origins. At the same time it is the blessing that is promised for the end. The idea that in the intervening period too this privilege might be enjoyed – that is what the angels refuse to allow. Even though mystical apparitions of the Lord have occurred in subsequent times, this does not invalidate the denial that they are uttering here. The Lord does not appear in his real bodily form. He is remote. He is in a state in which he is sought by faith, he for whom we must wait until he comes again, the one for whose return we keep watch, but who has still to come. Christian life, therefore, is essentially a life of the provisional and transitory. Implicitly it involves the recognition of the fact that nothing definitive and enduring can be attained here; the courage to face the fact that we have here no abiding city. It means that we are [178] forbidden to make any attempt at constructing our ultimate goal in this present dimension of space and time. We shall be able to perceive the reconciliation of the finite and the infinite only when everything is at an end – not in the present. He has gone away. Even as the realisation had dawned – at long last – of who he was, even then he had already gone away. He is no longer there as he was then. We can no longer see him as he was before.

But the angels' word is also a word of consolation and of promise. 'Just as' Jesus has gone, 'even so' will he return. Properly speaking he has now no further destiny to fulfil. There is no need for us to fear that because he has gone away he may return as someone else who, in the meantime, has undergone a transformation, so that he is no longer the person whom we knew, and of whom we have experience. He is the same who was among us, and it is 'so' that he will return. 'So' he remains to all eternity; 'so' and not otherwise. He has not gone in order to destroy his identity, in order to escape from the state which was his when he was here among us, and which he experienced and endured here among us. He is, and he remains, the same as he was here, in order that he may 'so' return as he was then. He has 'gone away' from our human history precisely that the ultimate significance of this human history may endure; in order that it may not be dissipated in the void of the past, but may be able to return, i.e. may manifest itself at that point at which we shall have attained to our own final and definitive state as that which has endured throughout. Nothing in him and in his life has been lost. All has been retained, and therefore 'it will come again'. It will manifest the fact that it has endured in its entirety. We imagine that what departs also ceases to exist, that what is taken away from us cannot also return. But it is not so. The Lord has gone away as man. He has taken with him his human life, not merely a human nature in the abstract, still open to all the possibilities and indifferent as to which of them is made actual in it. No, it is a human life that he has taken with him into the glory of his Father. Certainly the particular concrete events of this life really have disappeared. Indeed there was an inherent tendency in them really to disappear because, precisely, by doing so they bear witness to what is final and definitive. He is no longer a child. He is no longer a youth, no longer the man, no longer the crucified one, the one who dies and sinks into the darkness of death. He has left all that behind him. But precisely because of this all that which he did undergo and subsequently left behind has entered into life in his own personhood, has become a part [179] of himself as he was when he went away from us in order that when he returns he may be just the same. Because he was that which we experienced therefore he will return as he was then: as the man who was a child, and for whom this fact remains eternally present, as the man who walked upon this earth, as the man who bore with us, who addressed words of sincerity and love, grace and forgiveness to us, as the man who went to his death, as the man who has already experienced everything that we have to bear in the way of joy and pain, life and death, victory and defeat. If we rightly understood the significance of the preterite in these statements of ours concerning his 'past life', then we would understand that the only factor which really has disappeared in them is that of 'anxiety' (Angst). The events referred to in these statements could disappear, and what has happened once and for all in history could not remain eternally in force. But the true time which has been won by his redemptive work is not inaugurated in order that that which is initiated may disappear, but is rather the beginning of that which endures. And eternity does not come 'after' time, but is the sheer validity of that which has taken place in time, but endures for ever. And therefore he comes 'so', just as he has gone. In the 'interval' nothing will happen, for in his temporal life itself that eternity which endures has been worked out and suffered for. When this enduring eternity appears to us in the future, it will be the validity of his own history that comes to meet us. This history has now been filled with the glory of God (that is why he has returned home); but likewise this history has become the finally valid and enduring factor which can be restored.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But this means that the word of the angel is a word of promise addressed to us, a word that promises us our eternal and enduring validity. Why has he really gone when, by this entry into the glory of his Father, he is still, nevertheless, the one who remains? It is because he wants to give us an opportunity to live his life; in order that when he returns he may find in us that which he brings with him to us of himself: a human life which belongs to God. In his Spirit, in his Church, in his word, in his sacraments he has indeed remained with us in order that we may continue his life. On the basis of this objective existence with us he must penetrate into all departments of our life in order to conform our life to his – penetrate what we do and what we suffer, our joy and our pain, our strength and our feebleness, our life and our death. It is his will to live on in all this. And if he will so return as he has gone, then the word which we [180] are here considering is a promise that he will give us the grace to live his life, for otherwise he could not come as he has gone.

Lord, when you return even as you have departed from us, as a true man, then may you find yourself in us as the one who bears all, is patient, is faithful, is kind, is selfless; as the one who cleaves to the Father even in the darkness of death, the one who loves, the one who is joyful. Lord, may you find yourself in us, being what we would so much wish to be yet are not. But your grace has not only endured. In reality, it has come to us simply in virtue of the fact that you, having ascended and been enthroned at the right hand of God, have poured out your Spirit into our hearts. And so we truly believe that against all experience you do continue your life in us even though it seems to be only ourselves – Ah! almost always only ourselves and not you – that we find within ourselves. You have ascended into heaven and are seated at the right hand of God with our life. You are coming back with that life in order to find your life in ours. And the fact that you will find it there – that will be our eternity even when we, together with all that we are and have lived and have possessed and have borne, shall have entered into the glory of your Father through your second coming.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[181]

17

THE FESTIVAL OF THE FUTURE OF THE WORLD

We are celebrating the festival of Christ's ascension. We know that properly speaking we are thereby celebrating the conclusion of the festival of Easter, Easter once again, because by his resurrection the Lord has already entered into his full and final consummation. Thus what Christendom is celebrating in this festival, and what it is thereby making explicit, is something which, even though it was already implicitly contained in our Easter faith, is nevertheless new, something which goes beyond what we celebrated at Easter. This is the recognition of the fact that in the fulness of glory upon which he has entered the Lord has been withdrawn from his followers; that the full unveiling of the Easter glory which is to embrace all things is something for which we are still waiting; that the 'little while' is still continuing, in which the fulness of our life in Christ is still withheld from us and from the world itself. Thus the festival of the ascension is, in a very true and proper sense, the festival of faith as such; the festival, therefore, not so much of the real facts in which we believe, but of faith itself. For faith does in fact imply holding fast to that which we have not experienced for ourselves. It implies a building on invisible foundations, a committing of one's self to that which only seems to be there because of the actual act of trust and self-commitment in itself. But when we let the Lord go, and do not cling on to him, so that he is hidden until the end and is only present among his own in a mysterious manner in his Spirit, then we are saying that we are ready to perform precisely that act which we call faith. This is an eschatological entity. It cannot be reduced to the formal acceptance of any kind of truth such as is always possible and can be viewed wholly in abstraction from the content of belief. To believe is to live by the future, to exist in the power of that which, even though it is the centre of our own existence, has, nevertheless, been withdrawn into the future that awaits us. It is a [182] living by anticipation, a being true to a reality that lies in the future. In a single word it is eschatological existence. Ascension is the festival of faith as such.

In this sense the ascension becomes the festival of holy pain. He has departed from us. It is frightening that we feel so little pain about this. He himself thought that he had to console us. But our hearts, so withered and shallow as they are, respond to his consolation merely with amazement. We have to spend a long time in recollecting ourselves before we can realise – perhaps – even to some little extent, the fact that we should be inconsolable at the fact of his remoteness from us. For this we would have really to be holding fast to him. We would have to be overwhelmed with terror and anxiety at the void which his departure leaves for us. Now at last someone was there who is not superfluous; someone who does not become a burden but bears burdens because he is good – good in so unobtrusive a manner that we were already at the stage almost of taking his goodness for granted; someone who called the impenetrable riddle that lies behind all apprehensible things his Father, and in doing so gave the impression of being neither incredibly naive nor tastelessly presumptuous, one indeed who almost led the world into the temptation of taking it for granted when he allowed us too to utter the words 'Our Father' into this divine darkness. It was the compassion of God and his wisdom that were with us in him. At last we were able to think of God in a manner somewhat different from the abstractions of the philosophers. At last one was there who really knew something, and yet did not have to be abstruse in speaking of it; one whom one only had to make contact with, whom one dared to kiss, whom one struck on the shoulder in friendliness; someone who sought nothing for himself – and in these trivialities we had everything, everything made physically present to us: God, his pity, his grace, his nearness. Now he has gone. He wanted to console us by saying that precisely by so doing his Spirit, and in this living Spirit of his, himself would come to us. That is a consolation. Oh yes. For if he were only physically present to us without his Spirit taking possession of us his presence to us would be of as little avail to us as to a Judas who sits at his side or kisses him. But when his Spirit is in us, then we are his, the Lord's, and he is ours. But the fact that we have him only in order to seek him, to be able to seek him and to have to seek him, that he should be among us only in order that it may still be revealed to us what we are in virtue of this fact – this makes the joy and blessedness of possessing him in his Spirit a [183] pain as well. It is the pain of waiting, the pain of the birth-pangs of eternal life, the pain of hope, the pain of pilgrimage. Yet if only we could feel this blessed pain, this grace of the festival of the Ascension more ardently and more keenly! But we are content with this life. Today we are often proud that our loyalties are to the earth (though naturally this can have a good sense). We do not look above or into the future like the men of Galilee. We keep our gaze fixed on the foreground of our lives and on the present. We are not those who wait, those who look, those who are unsatisfied; not those who hunger and thirst for that justice which is to be found only in the future, that future which will bring us the return of the Lord if we keep watch for it. May God give us the grace to celebrate this festival as a festival of blessed pain!

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The Ascension is a festival of the future of the world. The flesh is redeemed and glorified, for the Lord has risen for ever. We Christians are, therefore, the most sublime of materialists. We neither can nor should conceive of any ultimate fulness of the spirit and of reality without thinking too of matter enduring as well in a state of final perfection. It is true that we cannot picture to ourselves in the concrete how matter would have to appear in this state of final endurance and glorification for all eternity. But we have so to love our own physicality and the worldly environment appropriate to it that we cannot reconcile ourselves to conceiving of ourselves as existing to all eternity otherwise than with the material side of our natures enduring too in a state of final perfection. And – one shudders at the 'blasphemy' which such an idea must represent for the Greek mentality – we could not conceive of the divine Logos either in the eternal perfection which belongs to it for ever otherwise than as existing for ever in the state of material incarnation which it has assumed. As materialists we are more crassly materialist than those who call themselves so. For among these it would still be possible to imagine that matter as a whole and in its entirety could, so to say, be raised at one blow onto a new plane and undergo a radical qualitative change such that, for purposes of definition, it could no longer be called matter because this future state would be so utterly different from the former one in which it originated. We can entertain no such theory. We recognise and believe that this matter will last for ever, and be glorified for ever. It must be glorified. It must undergo a transformation the depths of which we can only sense with fear and trembling in that process which we experience as our death. But it remains. It continues to perform its function for ever. [184] It celebrates a festival that lasts for ever. Already even now it is such that its ultimate nature can survive permanently; and such too that God has assumed it as his own body. Non horruisti virginis uterum. Non horruisti materiae beatam aeternitatem. And already for this world as a whole the process of fermentation has already commenced which will bring it to this momentous conclusion. It is already filled with the forces of this indescribable transformation. And this inner dynamism in it is called, as Paul boldly confirms for us in speaking of the resurrection of the flesh, the holy Pneuma of God. It is a free grace. It is not the sort of entity which the world could lay claim to as something proper to itself, something belonging to it autonomously and as of right. But it is the true, the ultimate perfection of the world in all its power, which brooded and hovered over the primordial chaos, and which will preserve all things and perfect all things which were and are. And this power of all powers, this meaning which is the ultimate meaning of all meanings, is now present at the very heart and centre of all reality including material reality, and has already, in the glorified flesh of the Son, brought the beginning of the world triumphantly to its final goal of perfection. The Ascension is the festival of the true future of the world. The festival we are celebrating is an eschatological one. In this celebration we anticipate the festival of the universal and glorious transfiguration of the world which has already commenced, and which, since the ascension, has been ripening and developing towards the point where it will become manifest.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

And there is a truth which we must repeat yet again, even though it is one which we have already seen from the obverse side of the same single reality, and have already stated. Considered as an event the ascension does not only have the connotation of departure and distance. On the contrary it is a festival of the nearness of God. The Lord had to die in order really to come close to us. For the physical nearness of those who are still imprisoned in the flesh, and who have not yet passed through death, is precisely remoteness; though it is a nearness, the sweetness of it is, nevertheless, only the pledge of the true nearness that can only be achieved in the future. And if the death, resurrection and ascension of the Lord constitute one single event, the particular aspects and phases of which cannot be separated one from another, then the separation implicit in this festival is simply another way of expressing the nearness of the Lord in his Spirit, which has been imparted to us through his death and resurrection. Thus he is closer to us than he ever was; closer than he was during the time [185] when he was still in the flesh, closer so long as his Spirit is in us, so long as his life and his death have taken possession of us, so long as his Spirit in faith hope and love has loosened the fetters of our finite state and turned it into the infinitude of his Father, so long as we have abandoned the merely finite and, by his Spirit, have become strong enough boldly and lovingly to sustain the most intimate and at the same time the most ‘otherworldly’ reality of the incomprehensible mystery of God. In his death the Lord has broken the old vessel of the Spirit and has left it unrepaired. Properly speaking the infinitude with which the world has been endowed is the one new vessel into which his Spirit is poured out, for his body, even though it is truly glorified, no longer separates him from us. Rather it has itself become a sheer openness to the world. The Ascension is the festival of the true nearness of the Lord in his holy Spirit.

And it is in this sense that the Ascension is the festival which celebrates our preparation for Pentecost. This festival is simply a transition from the Easter of Christ to the beginning of our Easter, which we call Pentecost. For our sharing in the Easter of Christ is achieved through the Spirit of Christ bestowed at Pentecost. And thus we celebrate the Ascension of Christ by watching and praying for his Spirit: Come and be near to us as Spirit, since you have withdrawn from us your nearness in the flesh. In all these great festivals of Christian living let us beware of intoxicating ourselves with great words. It is not the majesty of the words of theological speculation that constitute the realities in the communication of which the true celebration of such festivals consists. Rather it is the reality of the Spirit of grace himself which both celebrates and is celebrated in us. But this reality, as the living and life-giving, the victorious and the transforming, can also be experienced in microcosm; best of all perhaps in keeping faith with him in a spirit of joy and thanksgiving to God for the life of spring, in the courage and joyfulness which we show in our everyday life, in the calmness, tolerance and love which we show to our neighbour, and many other small miracles of grace of this kind in the ordinary course of life: And all liturgical celebration achieves its meaning only if it finds a true and sustained projection of itself in the ordinary course of life in this way. For where the Spirit performs the miracle of faithfulness and courage in our poor lives from day to day, there is the Spirit of Christ. And where the Spirit of Christ is present the true festival of the Ascension of the Lord is celebrated.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[186]

18

THE CHURCH AS THE SUBJECT OF THE SENDING OF THE SPIRIT

Easter and Pentecost are the two festivals in our ecclesiastical year which go back to apostolic times. This is because they were already included in the synagogal calendar, in which they fall at the same time of year, although admittedly their content there is different. In the time of the early Church Easter and Pentecost were not, properly speaking, two distinct festivals, or even two distinct 'festal cycles' existing independently side by side. Rather Pentecost is the culmination of Easter. Easter is the 'glorification' (doxa) of the Redeemer Christ, a glorification which includes his exaltation upon the Cross and his exaltation at the right hand of the Father in a single festival. Pentecost is the manifestation of that phenomenon which the Lord speaks of in John, 'If anyone thirst, let him come to me and drink. He who believes in me, as the scripture has said, "Out of his (the messiah's) heart shall flow rivers of living water". And John adds to this: 'As yet the Spirit had not been given because Jesus was not yet glorified', and further, 'It is to your advantage that I go away, for if I do not go away the Counsellor will not come to you'. Out of the death and resurrection by which the Lord is taken away from the world, therefore, springs up the Spirit. If Jesus is not glorified it is not given. It will only be poured out if Jesus, by his death, has overcome the world and its prince. On the Cross water and blood flow down from his pierced side as a sign of the fact that the living water of the Spirit, which springs up to eternal life, and which is to flow as a stream from the heart of the messiah, can only come from the Lord 'glorified' in his crucifixion. The Spirit only comes in water and blood. Because Easter, that is death and resurrection, has come, therefore Pentecost has come. And Pentecost is only the event to which all the events of Easter are orientated with an intrinsic teleology of their own in order to find their fulfilment in Pentecost.

[187] But we must ask ourselves what Pentecost really is. It is the festival of the descent of the Holy Spirit, the festival in the baptism of the Spirit, the festival of the 'pouring out of the Spirit of God upon all flesh', the beginning of that dwelling of the Spirit permanently and enduringly 'in the vessel of the flesh and in the Church', to quote Irenaeus' words. Truly Pentecost is not a mere transitory visitation by the Spirit, a mystical ecstasy lasting for a moment. It is not even, in the first instance, a charismatic gift bestowed personally upon the apostles, as it were as private mystics or charismatics. Rather Pentecost, in all its external expressions which seem so strange, is at basis only the outward manifestation of the much more vital fact that henceforward the Spirit will never more be wholly withdrawn from the world until the end of time. For this permanent dwelling of the Spirit in the world is only the outcome of that overshadowing of the Spirit which took place in the incarnation of the Son of the Father. And because the Church is nothing else than the visible manifestation of the Spirit in the world, therefore the Church, which was born of the water and blood flowing from the dead body of Jesus, from the 'second Adam' asleep on the Cross, only becomes visible and manifest for the first time at Pentecost.

Let us develop these ideas a little further. 'The Spirit was not yet given', John declares, referring to the time when Jesus was not yet glorified. And yet we pray: 'Qui locutus est per prophetas', 'thou who hast spoken through the prophets'. Even in this short declaration of faith, therefore, we acknowledge that the Spirit was at work in the world even before Christ, because we know that many times over and in many ways God spoke of old to our fathers. There was no Spirit and yet there was a Spirit. How can these two statements be reconciled?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Is it merely that before the Redeemer came the Spirit was present in a lesser degree, so that now he is poured out in abundant measure upon men? No, though certainly this is also true. But taken in isolation this answer would not suffice, and would not meet the crucial difficulty. Formerly the Spirit was never in the world in the way that it is in it now, now that the fulness and the end of the ages has arrived. The Spirit of whom we speak is the Lord, for the Lord is Spirit, God is Spirit. But how is God in the world? Can lie manifest himself within the confines of this finite state? He himself as he is, can he impart himself – not his gifts, his finite works but himself – to man? It might be said that he reveals himself in the creation. Well, but this is only the hem of his garment, the curtain that veils him. For the creation, nature as the theologians [188] call it, tells us of God only as one who is remote, since the process of nature is cyclic, and it turns back upon itself. Of itself nature does not open up any way to man which can lead him into the inaccessible light of the depths of the Godhead, into the inner life of God himself, into his presence and before his countenance. God himself, therefore, had to come in order to lift us out of the cycle of birth and death, and in order to build a way for us by which we could be led out of the bondage of our humanity, confined as it is to the finitude of its own nature and of the world, into the life of God himself. And this God who comes into this world for this purpose we call the Holy Spirit. The Spirit of God in the Christian sense, the holy Pneuma, is present where the deliverance of man from the world and from sin and from finitude is achieved, and where the way is opened for him to enter into the presence of God himself.

But how is the Spirit to come upon us? How can we possess him, or – to put it better – how can we allow ourselves to be possessed by him? At what point in this finite state of ours does he decide that we shall be allowed to break into the life of the infinite? Does he not move where he wills? Is his work not so mysterious and incalculable that man never knows whence he comes or whither he is going, or where he will allow himself to be found? Are not the ways by which the Lord, the Spirit, comes not untraceable, so that we only know where he is to be found when he has already taken possession of us? Is there anything visible, apprehensible, to which we can point and say: 'Behold, here and now lay hold of this. Then you can be sure that the Spirit who moves where he will has taken possession of you'?

Yes, there is such a thing, because we believe in the incarnation of the eternal Logos, because God himself has entered into the dimension of history, into the confines of space and time; because of his free grace he has assumed for ever a part of this finitude of ours which belongs to space and time: that part which we call the humanity of Jesus. He has assumed this and made it his own life in such a way as to keep it evermore as belonging to his own being. Therefore there is a 'here and now' in the world into which God has come in order to deliver us and to lead us into his own life, in which there is no 'here and now'. In Jesus of Nazareth we have the living God of the living Spirit and of grace. The Church is nothing else than the further projection of the historicity and of the visibility of Jesus through space and time, and every word of its message, every one of its sacramental signs, is, once more, nothing else than a part [189] of the world in its earthiness, with which the Spirit has united itself indissolubly since the day on which the Logos became flesh.

At Pentecost this Spirit has become manifest. Not merely the Spirit who moves intermittently and mysteriously here and there, who takes a prophet and uses him as his 'instrument' so long as he wills to do so, but who never remains lastingly among men, and who provides no lasting sign of his presence and power, but the Spirit of the Son who has become man. That is why – something which seems so contradictory – Peter's sermon, delivered on the very day on which the Spirit descends straight from above into the hearts of the apostles, does not invite the penitents to look upwards too, to see whether the Spirit coming from the realm which is beyond time and beyond history is not descending upon them as well. No, he has only one message for them: Be baptized! It is in the 'here and now'

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of the sacramental sign that the Spirit of Pentecost is present. And he is in this sign evermore and always. It is at that point, therefore, at which the visible sign is effected by the visible messenger, that Pentecost takes place. It is at that point that the Holy Spirit becomes present. Prior to the death and glorification of Jesus this was not the case, and it is for this reason that at that time the Holy Spirit had not yet been given. Previously there was indeed a Spirit of God, but not a Spirit of God made man. Before the incarnation of the Logos the invisible was not present in a mode that was visible and lasting. There was a juridical order which God had instituted for the people of Israel. But this juridical order did not constitute a Church. It was binding upon the men of that time, but it did not bring about any grace, any Holy Spirit. There was a Spirit, but it merely hovered and did not actually descend at any point. It never became 'visible'. Now, on the other hand, in the fulness of time, a visible mode of this kind has actually been achieved, in the incarnate Logos and in his Body, the Church. Ubi est ecclesia ibi et Spiritus Dei; et ubi Spiritus Dei illic et ecclesia et omnis gratia. These are the words of Irenaeus: 'Where the Church is, there is the Spirit of God; and where the Spirit of God is there is the Church and every grace'. In ecclesia posuit Deus . . . universam operationem Spiritus. 'God ordained that the entire work of the Spirit should take place in the Church'. And where the Spirit is active, there, at any rate remotely, a stage is achieved in the construction of the visible Body of the Church.

Thus for Catholics the life of the Spirit, wherever it occurs, is always included within the fold of the Church. And everything else is not the life [190] of the Holy Spirit but rather mere religious excitement. There is no Holy Spirit apart from the holy Body that is the Church. For this reason we are only 'spiritualised', i.e. taken possession of and permeated by the Holy Spirit, we only act in and by the Holy Spirit if we are incorporated in the Body of the Church. For Pentecost is the festival of that Spirit cuius non sunt participes omnes qui non currunt ad ecclesiam, 'in whom only those who hasten to the Church have a share'. Once more we are quoting the words of Irenaeus. And when Paul tells us that the Spirit quickens while the letter kills, the letter here refers to the Old Covenant. But the Spirit which quickens is that which rested upon Jesus of Nazareth and which lives on in the visible historical Church. We must not let the Church begin only at that point at which it no longer gives us unease.

Because the Church is there, therefore there is also a continual Pentecost. Therefore the outpouring of the Spirit upon all flesh is still continually taking place. Therefore we ourselves can still pray continually: Veni Sancte Spiritus, 'Come, Holy Spirit'. And because we say this prayer in the Church, therefore we know that we are heard. For the Spirit of the Lord is not far from us.

But for all this may we not sometimes ask: Where, then, is the Spirit in us? Where are his mighty works, his fire and his rushing wind? Do we not all too often seek in vain for the Spirit in the visible Church? Are not many true indeed to the letter without possessing the Spirit, orthodox without being moved by the Spirit of God? And does it not sometimes seem as though there were, after all, more of the Holy Spirit in many movements of religious enthusiasm than there, where the Holy Spirit has built his temple for ever?

Certainly the Holy Spirit remains always in his Church. This Church will always be the place in which he dwells in order to descend upon all who await him there with hearts ready to receive him. But for us as individuals all this is far from being a comfortable guarantee that he is able to work in us as he would wish to, and as the times demand that he should be at work. We cannot have a comfortable guarantee of this merely on the grounds that we go in and out of the house of the Lord. He is not to be found apart from the letter of the New Covenant, but not everyone who recognises this letter as sacred and says 'Lord, Lord' is ipso facto a Christian filled with the Spirit, spiritual in the sense that God, our own responsibility and our own age demand that we should be spiritual. Only he who is a member of the Church and independent, humble and daring, [191] obedient and conscious of his own personal responsibility, a pray-er and a doer, adhering to the Church in her past and in her future – only such a one as this makes room for the Spirit of God at Pentecost, who appears in the form of a mighty rushing wind, the Spirit who is always ancient and always young – for this Spirit to do its work in him, to renew the face of his own soul, to use those who are his own in order to transform the earth as well.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

And yet . . . Is this the ultimate answer, the solution to every riddle? Where is the Spirit in us, even though we offer him a willing heart in spite of all denials, though we wait for him, though we do not say that we are children of Abraham, knowing very well that God is able to raise up such children even from stones, and to fit them as living stones into the temple of the Spirit? The Spirit comes in tongues of fire and signs and wonders when it pleases him to do so. But for ourselves, he has commanded us to believe in him, in his power and in his presence, even when we do not feel them. The Lord has commanded us not to think out beforehand how we should bear witness to him, because in the moment when we do have to bear such witness – not necessarily before that moment – the Spirit will come to our aid. But in doing this he has also warned us against obstinately seeking to have a tangible and perceptible assurance of his advent to us. Our task is to regard our feebleness as a sign of his complete power; to live in hope against all hope. He who gives the honour to God in this way, and does not seek to possess it for himself, he who commits himself to God in faith without vision, in him the Spirit lives and works. In so far as externals are concerned in such a case everything seems drab and everyday, a mere fulfilment of one's duty, patient expectation, wearisome struggles against manifold temptations. But viewed from within, Christian life consists of a sobria ebrietas spiritus, a clear-sighted and sober intoxication by the Spirit. The Spirit lives within us. There his light shines quietly and, as it were, with an inner life of its own. There his power is growing, though still hidden, as seed grows even though the husbandman sleeps. But when the hour of testing arrives, then – perhaps when we least expect it – the Spirit of wisdom and power will be with us. In this time, then, we will pray for the Holy Spirit, for the good Spirit whom the Father gives to all his children who ask him for it. We will seek him in his Church. With Mary, who was overshadowed by the Spirit, and with Peter, as once in the room of the Last Supper, we will 'be of one mind, constant in prayer'. We will ask God for a humble, and at the same [192] time a bold heart, one which is ready to receive the Spirit of freedom and love, for a believing heart that does not demand signs and wonders, but rather for faith to believe that it is not in the context of pageantry, but in a spirit of quiet and recollection that the living God fills the hearts of his believers with the Holy Spirit who is eternal life.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[193]

19

THE SPIRIT THAT IS OVER ALL LIFE

Only by a process of sober and realistic questioning can we reach back beyond the religious practices to which we have become habituated to the origin of all our festivals, customs and observances. We are celebrating Pentecost. What is it, then, that we are really celebrating on this day? What is the special significance of this festival for ourselves in particular? It is with these two questions that the following meditations are concerned.

I

The answer to this question is not easy. Certainly it is not as one of the three Persons of the holy Trinity that we are celebrating the Holy Ghost. For the great festivals of the ecclesiastical year constitute a sacred anamnesis. That is to say, they celebrate events in saving history. But by commemorating them we make sure that they shall continue to exercise their influence as enduring forces in our Christian lives. But when we say that we are celebrating the descent of the Holy Spirit upon the Church at the first Pentecost after the exaltation of the Lord, then we are brought up short with the question: How is it, then, that in the credo at Mass we actually acknowledge the Spirit who has spoken through the prophets? Does not the power of the Spirit make its impact upon humanity throughout all the ages? Must he not have been present all along and from the very outset if without him there can be no salvation, no forgiveness of sins, no faith, no love of God, no consolation in view of eternity? Must he not have been descending continuously and right from the first if God does indeed will the salvation of all men from the beginning of human history right to the end, in all ages and among all nations? And if our only reply to this question were to be: 'The Spirit who presides always and throughout all history, and who is powerful to forgive, to deliver and to justify, has [194] on this festival of Pentecost descended precisely upon the Church', then the further question immediately arises: 'In that case what can truly be said to have been altered in the history of mankind and its salvation if this humanity of ours has actually been all along – in spite of all sins and all abomination of desolation – the primordial ocean over which the Spirit of God broods? If mankind has always and right from the first included among its members the community of those who, as consecrated and chosen children of grace, have journeyed towards the goal of the eternal life which God bestows?' And then we might seek to say in rejoinder: 'But now, since Pentecost has come, this community of those endowed with the Spirit in the world has been made manifest. Now the people of God, scattered throughout the world of sin as in a diaspora, has become a visible institution, a concrete reality of history'. And then once more it may be asked: 'Even if the people of God has acquired the status of a concrete body in this way, and as such has become visible in history as the Church, does this really have much to do with the Holy Spirit, or is it not precisely the outcome of the work of Jesus in founding the Church, when he gathered the believers about his apostles and gave them this status of an historical institution which we call the Church by causing them to believe in the word which he had addressed to them in history, and to accept his sacraments? And with regard to the Spirit itself, is not the situation that just as he was poured out formerly, so too he is now, and so he will be to the end of time, and that he is poured out also into that other world of those who do not belong to this historical institution of the people of God called the Church? Thus is the birth of the Church

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

not something which has little to do with the Spirit and its outpourings, seeing that the Spirit was given before the Church, and is given to those not included in the Church? Furthermore, if we consider what belongs to the Church independently of this outpouring of the Spirit, namely its institutional status, its constitution, its system of law, its official organisation, then is not all this, if not actually contrary to the Spirit, at least different from the Spirit?' And if the only reply we could make to all this was that now the Spirit has been poured out in greater fulness, that since Pentecost it is more powerfully and more abundantly at work, then certainly we Christians would not care to deny this. But we would still have to ask: 'Was the Spirit really bestowed in lesser measure and less freely upon the men of former ages? Were they really less beloved by God?' And we will feel embarrassed and disconcerted (if we possess any of that courageous [195] realism which is also a gift of the Spirit) as we secretly torment ourselves with the question: 'Is then the outpouring of the Spirit upon the Church really so powerful, so overwhelmingly convincing, so authoritative that everything that has gone before in the history of the Holy Spirit seems petty and obscure by comparison?' And then if all we can say is that at Pentecost the Spirit is poured out over the institutional element in the Church as founded by Jesus, over its lawful authorities, the sacramental signs and the word of preaching in it, then, once more, this might prompt another question: 'Why is that so significant, seeing that already even without this institutional factor, this Spirit of the Father was at work, manifesting itself, judging and sanctifying, beginning with the prophets and extending right up to the time of those who dwelt quietly in the land, already looking for that eternal kingdom of God which we ourselves are still awaiting?' If we sought to rely only upon the words of Jesus in scripture, and upon those of the apostles, according to which, precisely: 'The Spirit was not yet given because Jesus had not yet been glorified', so that the disciples had to wait for the Spirit which the Lord promised to them at his departure, then we should still be faced with the unsolved question of how, in that case, this statement that 'the Spirit was not yet given' can be reconciled with that other truth that this Spirit has, nevertheless, spoken through the prophets, and worked, dwelt and brought to maturity eternal life in all men of all ages who believe, hope and love, by the grace of God, that grace which denies God's mercy to no-one who is ready to receive it.

If we wish to understand what Pentecost really is, we must first recognise one point: Christmas, Good Friday, Easter and Pentecost (in other words all those 'once and for all' events which we celebrate in the great festivals of Christendom) are so closely interconnected that they merely represent the temporal development of one and the same salvific event, the time structure of a single deed of God performed in history and upon mankind. This deed of God, one and indivisible, yet taking place in a historical process that is phased, is the definitive and irrevocable acceptance of humanity in the incarnation of the Logos. In that the Logos assumed a human 'nature', he necessarily assumed also a human historicity, so that this assumption of the reality of human nature was only complete when he had brought the history of this reality to its consummation by his death. What is unique, new and 'once and for all' in this single historical event of assuming human nature and human history is its definitive [196] finality. Always and everywhere where human history has been wrought out the dialogue between God and man, issuing in salvation or perdition, has taken place. Always and everywhere, therefore, the Spirit has been present to judge and to endow with grace. But this single dialogue, which runs continuously through the whole history of humanity, was open. Before the incarnation of the Logos no word of God had entered into world history as an event, no word which God imposed finally and definitively, no word in which God addressed himself definitively and irrevocably to the world, no word which expressed him definitively and exhaustively, no word which disclosed the ultimate and all-comprehending plan of God, no word which brought out the meaning of the real climax in the drama of world history, no word which drew this drama to its ultimate issue and brought out its ultimate

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

meaning. And still less was it revealed before Christ what the import of this ultimate and all-embracing word would be, whether it would import judgment or grace, remoteness or nearness, Lordship or Fatherhood, the relationship of servant or of child, law or grace, the order of created nature or the freedom of the Spirit of God imparting itself and thereby bestowing the infinitude of God upon men. The dialogue lasted throughout the whole history of mankind from the beginning up to Christ. But the last word was not yet spoken. The whole of it still remained open. History was able to develop in either an upward or a downward direction. All was still ultimately in the balance. Every commitment was provisional and subject to revision. Every dispensation was subject to change and decay. One age might be followed by another which abolished the provisions of the first, and did not really so much as allow what was unique and proper to it to be brought to its fulness. But since the Word has taken flesh and submitted to death and to the other conditions of our history, and has subjected itself to these conditions in a final and irrevocable manner because it assumed our human nature as a factor most intimately inherent in itself now everything is different, everything has become final. However much the individual has to experience his own private destiny as still open and undecided, since the incarnation, death and resurrection of Christ human history as a whole has already arrived at its goal. It has been assumed by God for ever. It has been endowed with grace to all eternity. It can never more be abandoned. The factor of sinfulness in it has already been included in this gesture of acceptance on God's part, and has been outweighed by the power of the grace which has conquered it. The world is predestined to salvation and [197] not to perdition, to life and not to death. God no longer waits for the decision of the world as though it had to say the last word. On the contrary he has spoken the ultimate word as his own Word, and at the same time as that of the world itself. And this word is reconciliation, life, light, victory and the glory of God himself, which he himself has implanted in the innermost depths of the world itself to become its glory. And all this is now no longer hidden in the eternal decrees of God, (though it has, of course, been present in these right from the beginning, albeit in a manner which was not available to creatures to recognise and to examine), but has rather become manifest, has been brought into being and given objective reality in the world itself, rooted in the very heart of the world to become the active principle that directs it to its goal. The result is that this active force inherent in the world already bears within itself all the fulness of perfection, and has already imparted this fulness to the world. When, therefore, we say that at Pentecost the Spirit has descended upon all flesh, then we no longer say this only of that Spirit which has always presided in the world, for we are speaking of the eschatological Spirit, the Spirit as the irrevocable gift. This is the Spirit of the eternal predestination of the world as a whole to life and to victory, the invincible Spirit which has been implanted in the world and in its history, and indissolubly wedded to it. This Spirit was not there before Christ, and since Pentecost it has been revealed that this Spirit is the Spirit of Christ, that in its outpouring and its work in the world it shares in the finality of Christ himself; that it is the Spirit of the crucified and risen Christ, and therefore the Spirit who will no longer disappear from the world and from the community of Christ. It has been revealed that the Spirit is the Spirit of the risen Christ, and that it has been promised as such irrevocably and invincibly to the world – it is this that was revealed at Pentecost and was accepted in an attitude of faith by those upon whom the Spirit descended.

II

What is it which brings this event of the Spirit home to us personally? How does it make its message penetrate into our existence in order to prepare us ever anew for the tasks of our lives? Here we may mention only two basic attitudes which derive from this Spirit of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Pentecost: responsibility and trust.

[198]

1. Responsibility

At first sight one might suppose that if this is the situation, if the Spirit is now irrevocably and triumphantly present, if it can never more by any means be removed from the world, if, in a certain sense, it is present as opus operatum, as of formal pre-definition, as that which is eschatologically final and definitive, then surely, one might say, everything has been made quite simple and quite secure. Then one can depend upon the fact of the Spirit's presence, and the burden of responsibility and of care has been removed from man, as also has the anguish and struggle involved in not knowing what the final issue of events will be. But this only seems to be the case. In reality the situation in which man finds himself has been rendered more acute. The hour of victory in the grace of the Spirit is also the hour of decision and judgment, and that too in a more radical sense than ever before. Such is the situation of man in the age inaugurated by Christ, always viewed from the point of view of scripture. What has been offered to men here is indeed the highest and most all-conquering gift of all. But it is also the last; the one which compels man to an ultimate decision, which can never more be revised. This decision is no merely provisional one. Once taken the negotiations leading up to it can never more be re-opened. Certainly we are all now living in the age of the Spirit of God now come among us finally and definitively; the age of the eschatologically victorious Church; the age of Christ, which is also the eternal future. At the same time it is certainly true that the decision which the individual has to take still always remains open. But now because the situation in which the decision is taken can no longer be changed, precisely the same principle applies to this final and 'once and for all' decision. Only in Christ is there any 'topos metanoias', any place for repentance and conversion. The sins against the Spirit cannot be forgiven. There can be no other sacrifice for all eternity outside the dispensation of Christ. One cannot pray for one who, in a spirit of unbelief, absolutely denies Christ. These and similar formulations, the underlying purport of which is to bring out the radical character of the decision involved in the existential situation after Christ, recur again and again in scripture. And what is true as a general and universal principle has an urgent and ever more insistent application to the life of the individual Christian too. Here too, in the genesis of his spiritual being, he reproduces the philogenesis which runs through salvific history up to the time of Christ. Precisely because God has spoken his ultimate word to mankind as a whole, it has the same force [199] for the individual as such. Life is compressed into a single decisive moment. The discussion between God and man is drawn more and more to a single point of intensity and crisis. Life is more and more compressed into a single all-embracing decision. And it is precisely in the nature of this as radical decision that the power of grace, which in itself is victorious, is made manifest. For what applies to other relationships between God and his creatures applies in this case too. The fact that God's power is effective in all that is does not diminish the autonomous power of the creature. On the contrary, both powers increase in the same, and not in inverse proportion. And for this reason the eschatological triumph of the grace of the Spirit of Pentecost 'is manifested' precisely in the creature's acceptance of the responsibility of creaturely freedom at its most radical, and where the issue is literally one of life and death. If there were any individual case in which this triumph of Pentecostal grace did not appear, this would also be a sign that this grace of God, in its own sovereign freedom, had 'omitted' the individual concerned from its operation and had rejected him. The hour of victory for the grace of Pentecost is also the hour of responsibility in its most intense form. Those who acknowledge this grace truly, and not merely in words, are also at the same time the men who so act as though everything depended upon them. But in this they recognise calmly that while they play their part in this manner nothing else is achieved except the victory of grace. And once more it must be reiterated that all that has been said applies most of all to those who, as ministers of the Church, must be first and foremost the bearers of this victorious grace of the Spirit.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

2. Trust

We have seen that if we understand it rightly the triumphant grace of the Spirit in the Church, both as a whole and, in derivation from this, in its application to the individual too, should spur us on to accept responsibility in its most radical form. But however true this may be, it is also true that in the last analysis this Spirit of Pentecost provides grounds for absolute trust. Let us consider the case of one who believes in it, waits for it and is ready to make it manifest in his own life for what it is in itself, in other words as that which, even as it is bestowed, brings with it the power to accept it as well. Such a one as this can trust and hope indeed. He does not know in what form or manner it will be victorious, but he knows the fact that it will be so. He knows that he may not try to prevent it from [200] making failure, death and defeat the form in which its victory is made manifest. He knows that the Spirit of grace, precisely because it is the Spirit of the freedom and infinitude of God, does not exclude anything (except his sins, all of which, so far as he knows, have been forgiven and pardoned), but can rather draw anything at all into the pattern of his coming, his victory and his final and permanent presence if it pleases him to do so: distance and nearness, exultation and tears, life and death, the heights and the depths, honour and dishonour. But precisely because of this it is also true that nothing is in a position to prevent his victory. Everything can remain to all appearances as it was before. But everything can also have been thrust, by these means, into the glory of God. Everything can be permeated with God and with his love. The hidden dynamism which is in everything and which drives everything onwards can be elevated and transformed into eternal life. The Spirit which is God's absolute and triumphant nearness needs no victories such as the world needs, no confirmation of the kind without which the world cannot be sure of its victories. One who has submitted himself to this Spirit and is aware of being one with it in an attitude of Pentecostal trust – such a one as this knows that all the depths to which he can sink have been enveloped in the depths of the infinite love of God. He knows, even without testing, that all his own downfalls have already been swallowed up in that victory which belongs to the Spirit alone. All his own weakness has already been healed at its roots, and only still survives as a pain which proclaims the greatness of the healing. He who believes in and loves the Spirit of Pentecost, who lets that Spirit be the Spirit of loving faith in himself, and make it his own act in him, such a one as this can say with all confidence: 'Everything has already been decided and the history of the world and of my personal life has already been accomplished in the life and death of him who, in obedience and love, died on behalf of his Church. And because of his attitude to his Church, he let his heart be pierced so that the water of the Spirit of Pentecost might gush forth over all who believe in him, and who, by this faith of theirs, become sharers in the victory accomplished in the life of this one man'. And as we listen to this declaration we should not take it merely in the abstract as having a general application. We must face up to the needs of our own existence, unique and unrepeatable as it is, which we are so eager to run away from, which we suppress and are unwilling to acknowledge. We must be willing to face up to this need of ours, and the dire peril in which we stand, and then, in an act of faith inspired by the [201] Spirit of God dwelling in our innermost hearts, make bold to say: 'The victory of the grace which has been given me is the answer to all this. Let me be confident. Let me have trust. For it is Pentecost, the day on which it has been revealed that God himself in Christ Jesus the crucified and risen Lord, has said his last and irrevocable word to you, and has made it the gift of the Holy Spirit to you, bestowed upon you without regret on God's

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

part and in such a way that no-one can take it from you, in such a way that it has a permanent and inalienable place in your life.'

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[203]

PART THREE

The Sacrament of the Lord

[205]

20

SUNDAY, THE DAY OF THE LORD

We come together to celebrate the Last Supper of the Lord. We commemorate the death which has redeemed us. In the liturgical ceremonies we say our 'yes' of faith to that sacrifice as our sacrifice, which he has offered on our behalf to God in his eternity once and for all. It is a sacrifice of himself, and of us in him. We receive the crucified and risen Lord as the forgiveness of our sins, as the Lord of our life, as the love that unites us, and as the presence, in a mysterious and hidden manner, of the future glory that will be ours. We celebrate the Last Supper of the Lord in festal splendour in order that we may be able to do it more perfectly within the simple rhythm of the average and the everyday factors in our lives. The day which is set apart for every Catholic Christian by the celebration of this sacrifice is Sunday, the day of the Lord, on which Christ the Lord himself celebrates it with those who believe in him.

What is Sunday? First of all it is certain, even from the point of view of its historical background in the sabbath of the Old Testament, that it is simply a day of rest. When we look closely at this Old Testament background we are actually compelled to conclude that the decree of rest from work on the sabbath was ordained by God as an end in itself, and not to enable his people to engage in an act of formal worship. For in the original sabbath commandment and the manner in which this was observed no provision whatever was made for the performance of such cultic duties. It really was for the sake of men and not for himself that God interposed this commandment of his. From the point of view of its origin, therefore, Sunday too is primarily a day on which man must do no work, a day on which he must not attempt to support his physical life by toil in the struggle with nature and in the process of adapting himself to the laws of nature. It is a day which serves to remind us that man has not only to fit in obediently with the rhythm of nature, consisting of day and night, waking [206] and sleeping, vigour and weariness, as though he were merely a part of the natural order and subject to its laws. What this day reminds us of rather is that man is the lord of nature and not its slave, that he directs and controls the rhythms of nature by his own power, adapts and transforms nature by his own designs, makes it serve his interests and contribute to his life. The whole of the natural order is included within a single dimension of space, and a single dimension of time. But man makes nature his servant in such a way that from the space and time that belong to it he carves out, so to say, a space-time dimension for himself, where he can exercise his own freedom and his own autonomy in order to shape nature according to his own designs and, at the same time, to keep himself free and to be his own master. Sunday is the tangible expression, which takes the form of a communal celebration, of the fact that within this space-time dimension which he has made for himself man is autonomous and free – not subject, therefore, to nature's behests. Sunday is the celebration of a partial victory in the history of mankind, a celebration which is still of relatively recent in origin. It is a victory won in a struggle which has lasted right from the origins, and which is still incessantly waged. Right at the beginning of man's history God himself has commanded him to engage in this struggle. It is a struggle in which he seeks more and more to bring nature into subjection. Sunday is set apart from the rhythm of nature. As a day it is characterised not by the fact that for sheer weariness we cannot continue any longer, nor yet by mere negative inactivity. On the contrary, this day is an event, a celebration, regularly recurring, of the fact that man liberates himself to a real though limited extent, from the compulsion of nature. And the commandment of God at the creation which empowers and emboldens man, and lays it upon him as a duty (Gen 1:28) to engage in this struggle for his own liberation, is followed by a further commandment, namely to celebrate his victory in this struggle. Viewed from this point of view the efforts of humanity to enlarge this space-time dimension of its own personal freedom still further are in principle wholly legitimate. Those, however, who set this goal before them must bear in mind that they are only continuing a struggle which the Old Testament and Christendom have already long regarded as ordained by God's commandment, a struggle which they have already begun and have already celebrated by a day of rest.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Sunday, then, is the expression in tangible and liturgical terms, of the power actively to dispose of things instead of being disposed of, of the [207] creative exercise of freedom on the part of spiritual beings instead of the passivity of merely natural ones. And this is manifested by the fact that in the last analysis it is the person as spiritual who constitutes the law of nature and not vice versa. And in consequence of this everything points to the fact that Sunday is the day on which man truly recognises himself as one who is more than a mere member of the natural order. To view Sunday in a merely materialist way or actually to spend it like this is to deny its true nature. If it is so regarded it can only be one factor in a rhythmic physiological process, a mere answering of one's biological needs. On this view enjoyment as one of the factors appropriate to Sunday would represent a mere pleasurable reaction on the part of one's physiological make-up. Now let us imagine a man who celebrates Sunday in this spirit. He is in process of emancipating himself from nature, yet he uses his dominion over nature merely in order to realise the purely natural side of his own being, to answer his biological needs, and to find pleasure on the purely physiological plane. In other words he is actually lowering himself in subjection to nature, instead of asserting his dominion over it and recognising that Sunday is at once an expression of the fact that he himself is above nature and of the demand that he shall be so. Now if this were to be our attitude Sunday would not be a day of holiness dedicated to mankind, but a pagan day dedicated to nature, on which man voluntarily turned back to adore that from which he has been liberated. For this reason Sunday can only be rightly observed if man realises himself as man. Now man is spirit, freedom, a being of absolute truth and love, capable of reflecting upon himself; and he realises himself when, confronted by the absolute mystery which we call God, he believes and so dares to commit himself to the incomprehensible. But this means that man is also the being to which this mystery imparts itself in absolute freedom, in grace therefore, as radical nearness, as forgiveness and as that which fills man with this life of God himself. This absolute self-bestowal of God is made apprehensible, revealed and imparted through a historical medium, one which can, in the power of God's all-embracing will to save, extend its influence universally to all ages, peoples and cultural environments. This is Jesus Christ who as God-man is unique. He is the salvation of those who know that they believe in him, and also of those who do actually believe even though they suppose that they do not do so. For in him, the Lord, unification and reconciliation have been achieved in one supreme respect: the question which calls everything in life, right up to the point of [208] death itself, in question has been answered with the only answer possible, the infinitude of the blessed mystery of God. The fact that reconciliation has been achieved for us in this way is celebrated in the Church's sacrifice, in which the God-man continues to abide in the midst of his community, making the final and definitive state to which he attained in his death and subsequent glorification eternally effective among his followers. Man does not truly celebrate Sunday until he regards it as a means of maintaining his conquest of nature. He can only take this attitude to it if he is willing to lose himself in faith and love in the mystery of God. But the only way in which he will be received into this mystery is to be possessed by the Word of God. When he is possessed in this way it means that he is slain and brought to life again. Certainly this may occur wherever man accepts the fact that his existence is doomed to death, and in so doing, upheld by the grace of God, accepts the life of God in a spirit of patient faith and love. And he does this even though he is not able so much as to express to himself what is taking place in the depths of his own spiritual being. By faith, then, we can accept our own existence, doomed to death as it is, as life. And this in itself constitutes a celebration of the death of the Lord, albeit a dumb and uncomprehending one. But once our life has been imbued with grace this sort of celebration emerges from our inward depths and acquires an existence of its own. It becomes an objective factor for us, and acquires a central place in the 'space-time' environment of our existence. The death of the Lord generates life, and this 'celebration' of that death in us is alive with that life. Through grace the fact of its one-ness with that life-generating death becomes explicit. The life-generating death itself becomes real and effective once more in virtue of the fact that it thereby becomes apprehensible in the dimension of space and time and is made manifest in sign and symbol. And when it has attained this status this 'celebration' of the death of the Lord is called the eucharistic sacrifice, the Mass of the holy Church, the Sunday liturgy. Sunday comes to be celebrated in this liturgy. In it the true meaning of the freedom and grace which Sunday represents is revealed and made effective. It is the discovery of the infinitude of God as our eternal life.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Once this has been understood it becomes immediately clear what Sunday demands of us. It must not be wholly taken up with leisure activities in a process of enslavement to the enjoyment industries, whereby man is false to himself and to the mystery of his own existence. Sunday must not be threatened by the 'shift-system' as applied to the working [209] week. Where this is erected into a principle in its own right, instead of merely making provision for exceptions in particular cases, it may, it is true, cater for men's biological needs for rest and refreshment, but it cannot provide them with any opportunity for the celebration of the community of God as a whole. Sunday must not be merely one of the free days, but must be a holy day, and provision must be made for it in the allotment of the other free periods. It is a day on which work and recreation alike are summed up and put in order, and both are incorporated in the prelude to that final consummation in which eternal rest becomes eternal life. This day has a character which we Christians can and must defend in the juridical dispositions of public life as well. For we are not doing violence to anyone if we demand that the free time allotted to everyone, to be used each according to his own conscience, shall fall on the same day, a day which we Christians for our part fill with the celebration of the advent of that eternal freedom which comes from the living God.

Man as he develops struggles free from the foreordained dispositions of the natural order, and to the extent that he does so new possibilities of exercising his freedom open up before him. He has a broader range of possibilities to choose from in arranging and filling his personal and intellectual life, but also new opportunities for arbitrary behaviour without reference to his obligations. And for this reason it now becomes the task of the believer and the spiritual man to take personal responsibility for ensuring that Sunday shall be Sunday; to preserve a cheerful and relaxed asceticism with regard to the addictions and the hedonistic escapism of the present age, and to exercise a religious creativity himself in shaping the pattern of Sunday. He can no longer expect that Sunday as it should really be will impose itself and define its own character by sheer force of social custom. We have to create it for ourselves, each one for himself. And we have constantly to renew this process. Nor do we have any very readily available prescriptions for this. For such prescriptions, even when they derive from Christian circles, are too often simply romantic in outlook, representing glorified versions of the Sunday observances of former times. We cannot be excused from constantly

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

bending ourselves to the task of making Sunday itself constantly new. We cannot evade this task even upon the pretext that it is no longer possible to adopt the bourgeois pattern of thought of the nineteenth century. We must still understand and hold firm to the meaning and the function of Sunday on the basis of the gospel. Only then have we truly understood what it means [210] for us to be and to live as Christians. This is God's day, the day of the Lord, which knows no evening, the day of that freedom and that rest which is life itself a day of God, the mystery of whom we have been favoured to receive, and which alone can avail to bring all else to its final goal. But in the sacred work of celebrating the sacrifice of the Church that is done which we have to do every Sunday and which, when stripped of its veils and made manifest, proves to be eternal life.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[211]

21

THE EUCHARIST AND OUR DAILY LIVES

By way of revising what we learnt from the catechism let us begin by saying something about the actual nature of the Eucharist. In this sacrament saving history as a whole, and at the same time our own personal saving history attains its highest point. In this sacrament the enduring basis for our own Christian thought is constantly re-asserted and made tangibly present in symbol. This climax to the history of salvation as a whole, and to our own personal saving history, is God incarnate. But the fact that he is there where we are, the fact that the eternal Word of the Father, containing within itself all wisdom and glory, has taken to itself our flesh, our life, our destiny, our everyday activities, our death – it is in virtue of this fact that our life is redeemed and hallowed, in virtue of this fact that it is encompassed by the eternal pardon of God, in virtue of this fact that it has been inwardly healed, in virtue of this fact that it is united with God and his eternity and his own eternal and glorious life. It is because of this that his deed of compassion, the sentence of death to which he submitted, was not in vain. The incarnate Word of the eternal Father, which in the incarnation has assumed our life, is the salvation of the world and is our salvation, the salvation wrought out in the personal history of our own lives. This incarnate Word of the Father has penetrated into both of these, the life of the world as a whole, and the entirely personal life which we lead as individuals at this particular point in space and time, and at this particular point in history. He has come into the world at Christmas. He is present among us, has laid hold of our lives in the most absolute and most ultimate manner possible. He could not have made himself more intimately present in our lives than by allowing us to receive his divine Body in holy Communion. In this sacrament it is he who is the salvation of the world who comes to us with his light, with his grace, with his forgiveness, with his power. He himself accepts us who accept him by the act of receiving him, and it really is an episode in saving [212] history that is enacted in this personal history of our own lives. In this sacrament of the altar the universal deed of salvation wrought by God upon the whole world in the incarnation of his eternal Son lays hold of us and of our whole concrete personal lives. In this sacrament we are touched by God's forgiveness, the grace of Jesus Christ, and we are united with God as our eternal life. The Eucharist, the Last Supper, holy Communion, the Mass or, as we like to express it, the eternal celebration of our own salvation bestowed upon us by God himself, is the definitive religious act of our lives, in other words the act that unites us to God. Before we go any further we must momentarily leave this point in order to take up a further one, likewise concerned with this glory which exists at the centre of our lives. We must look into the factor of the everyday in our lives. Let us put forward certain ideas concerning the nature of this factor of the everyday.

We are all familiar with it, this 'everyday'. The first point to be recognised about it is simply that it belongs to the realm of the profane. When we return from the communion rail we like to join our hands and maintain an attitude of recollection. Very soon, so it seems, we find ourselves leaving the sphere of the sacred constituted by the presence of God to go out into the world, the sphere of the earthly, the sphere of the everyday, the profane, the unhallowed, into the realm of business, the world of multitudinous affairs, cares, struggles, in which general confusion prevails throughout and all words are lost and drowned in the universal clamour; where everyone pursues his own desires and aims, where the struggle for life is waged, where there is no common understanding, where factions are the order of the day, where the most divergent views are maintained, where there is hunger and care and inward loneliness. The moment we leave the sphere of the sacred we enter upon the sphere of the everyday, the world which is so full of profanity, and in this world God seems to be remote. We speak of a thousand matters, the newspapers and the general talk are full of anything and everything. And perhaps in the midst of this chorus we come across a small shabby religious pamphlet, or a sermon comes stammering down to us from the pulpit telling of matters which the world does not take seriously. Truly the world of the everyday is a world that is remote from God, and yet it is this world that we must constantly enter. Outside it is, as it were, dark and it is cold, and wherever we are we feel isolated. It is precisely the world of the everyday, and for those who come out of the sphere of God's sacred presence into everyday life this [213] element of the everyday, so profane, so remote from God, will in fact be even more harshly oppressive.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Those who have finally and permanently confined themselves to this sphere of profane and everyday life, or who attempt to do so, no longer feel how profane and how remote from God the everyday life of this world is in which they live. They are, indeed, themselves simply an element in this world. They have standards of their own adapted to the conditions of this world, and for this reason they do not feel – at any rate on the surface of their lives – the contradiction between their true purpose and destiny and their everyday lives. But we recognise that we have to answer to God for our lives. And even though we cannot regard this world in its profanity and remoteness from God as self-authenticating, nevertheless we must go out into this world. We must commit ourselves to it, share in its cares, its struggles, its discussions, its ideas etc., and so we shall constantly feel this world in its profanity, its remoteness from God, its godlessness as something that is oppressive. Inevitably, to some extent, it divides us against ourselves, because we bear God and our responsibility to him in our hearts, and yet at the same time must constantly go out – indeed are sent out – into the world anew, even though it is quite alien to this state of ours of being interiorly filled with God, and to this sense of having to answer to the divine and eternal Master of our own hearts for our lives, which we carry within us. The result is that again and again we must anxiously be putting the question to ourselves, as in fact we do, of how in that case this process of dividing our lives between the everyday on the one hand and God in our hearts on the other can be sustained. And ever anew it will actually be borne in upon us that we, who go out into the world, are ourselves in constant danger of becoming merely worldly. We feel how real the danger is, that our own standards will be altered, that we shall gradually begin to adopt the standards of the world that is merely profane, everyday, and remote from God, that to us too the only things that are near and familiar are precisely these things of everyday life, that they are taking possession of our hearts to the exclusion of all else. We notice then how God, his will, his love, his accustomed nearness, his grace, his forgiveness, somehow seem to be turning into mere ideological tenets. How the call of God to us penetrates only very faintly to the ear of our hearts. How we, who have to live in a world that is profane, remote from God and everyday in character, are threatening to become everyday more profane and more remote from God ourselves. [214] And over and above this is the fact that this element of the everyday in what we do is now truly dark and ambiguous. For what part does it play in our lives? We try to do our duty, and when we have done our best we still do not know in the end whether we have done it aright. In what we do the motifs of heaven and earth are intermingled in such a manner that it is ultimately beyond our powers of reflection to analyse or distinguish between them. They constitute such a mixture of light and darkness that all we are left with is a strange obscurity and ambiguity, a sort of twilight when we seek to examine and reflect upon them. In the end we have done all sorts of things, and do not know whether what we have done really is what we should have done. We grope onwards, questing, questioning, anxiously probing throughout our daily lives, and at the end we do not know whom we have been servant to, whether it really was God, really was our neighbour, or whether we, having become everyday in our attitude, have by our actions only paid tribute to necessity and simply go on because we have no longer the strength to take some other course of action. How dark, how ambiguous everyday life is after all, even with respect to the value of what we do in it in God's eyes, from the moral aspect. And over and above these factors which are inherent in the very nature of the everyday there is also its toilsomeness, the attitudes characteristic of it of indifference, lovelessness, unvarying routine, the stresses which it imposes on us, the unrewardingness of it, the monotony of our voices, the weariness of our nerves, our hearts, our spirits, the experience of being overworked, the experience that the inner resources of our hearts are exhausted. And all this toilsomeness amounts to one thing: nothing else than a slow death (we shall be returning to this point at a later stage).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The factor of the everyday in our lives, therefore, is characterised as profane, remote from God, ambiguous, dark, toilsome and advancing towards death. But a further factor in addition to this is that this general mediocrity, this sense of monotony in the everyday, can actually make our hearts themselves so filled with mediocrity, so weary, so depressed, so ambiguous and dark that we can no longer have any true awareness of these characteristics of the everyday. When an eye full of light looks into the darkness it does see the darkness to some extent, and when a heart that is bold and filled with inward vitality looks at the everyday then it is sensitive enough to feel the monotony, the profanity of the everyday. But when the eye of the spirit itself is dark and dimmed, when the heart itself is also bowed down with the everyday then it is as though we no longer [215] possessed the faculty we need to evaluate the everyday really as everyday, and to impose great and generous demands upon ourselves in regard to it, measuring it by the standard of high ideals and recognising it for what it really is.

It might be said that the everyday so devours us – this at least is the danger – so absorbs us into itself that we believe that it is quite impossible for there to be anything else except this everyday, and everything else is quite ruled out. And then we ourselves – this is the danger – become a still more mediocre 'everyday', which no longer recognises itself as such at all, but is, as it were, inwardly closed in upon itself to such an extent that it never looks up to the true and infinite life which we call God. Instead it constantly turns back upon itself.

Our considerations of the nature of the Eucharist and the nature of the everyday up to this point might even lead one to suppose at first that no two factors could be more contradictory, more set at opposite poles, more mutually opposed and mutually repellant. For the former factor consists in the sacred celebration of the nearness of God, the high point of atonement in our saving history, in which we encounter the eternal word of God become flesh; and the second factor is this one of the everyday, of which we have been speaking. There is the ambience of the holy. There is the nearness of God. There is the light of eternal life. There is eternal power. There is eternal glory, the eternal transcendence over death and, instead of that element of the average and the mediocre which is no longer capable of insight into itself, there is the infinitude of God. There is the boundlessness of eternal life. And here, in the everyday, profanity, remoteness from God, darkness and toilsomeness, the doom of death, the mediocre and the average. What an immense gulf seems to open up between these two factors in our lives! What an abyss seems to divide these two elements in our lives from one another, even though both are present in those lives! And we ourselves do in fact feel this. And if we no longer felt it, if we no longer felt this encounter with the incarnate Word of God in the Eucharist as supremely the immense, the exalted, the holy, the eternal and the divine in our lives, if what the Eucharist brings about in our hearts were actually to be so withered up into a minor but burdensome religious duty, then it would be precisely the factor of the everyday itself, and our own 'everyday' hearts that would have, as it were, swallowed up and devoured this, the supreme event in the celebration of the divine in our lives, that would have reduced even this to an element in the [216] everyday. But we who believe, who seek, who love,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

know what this celebration of the Last Supper of the Lord means, and on the basis of this we realise how great the difference between these two factors in our lives must seem to be.

It is only here that we arrive at the real point of our argument. Our thesis must now be stated as follows: This sacrament of the eternal encounter with God, this climax in our personal saving history, in the history of our individual lives, which is the Eucharist, is in fact the sacrament of the everyday.

Why should this be so? To begin with, this becomes clear in the Church's tradition concerning this sacrament and in her official teaching. In the second chapter of the thirteenth session of the Council of Trent the nature of the holy Eucharist, its meaning, its function and its significance, are more exactly described. This chapter contains a statement about the Eucharist such as is not to be found either before or after the Council of Trent. It consists of a solemn declaration of the Church's teaching on the point. It is laid down that this sacrament is 'animarum cibus quo alantur et confortentur', that the Eucharist is the food of souls, by means of which they are nourished and strengthened. The Eucharist, therefore, is here regarded as our daily bread.

What can be more everyday than one's daily bread? Every day the same thing happens: we eat and drink. We feed ourselves, to adopt the mode of expression customary in profane spheres. It is only rarely that a meal taken in the purely human sphere can be counted as an elevated, fine and fully human event, celebrated in a manner that edifies the spirit. For the most part eating and drinking for the sustenance of our own life is precisely something which belongs to the context of the everyday. And so in the same way, the Church tells us, the Eucharist is the daily bread of poor Christians, by means of which they must nourish themselves ever anew, and strengthen themselves ever anew.

This alone is enough to show that the Eucharist is regarded as the food of a man who becomes hungry again and again, who becomes weak again and again – in other words one who, so far as his spiritual life is concerned, is a man of the everyday.

The same chapter of this Council goes on to say that the Eucharist has a remedial function too in that by means of it we are freed from our daily sins and preserved from mortal sin. Again in this description of the sacrament we find a real echo of the everyday and the wearisome as it [217] exists throughout our lives – lives in which the wretchedness, feebleness, moral weakness, moral weariness and moral instability which are in man manifest themselves every day. For in this chapter the Eucharist is called the antidotum, the remedy by means of which we are freed from daily sins – painfully evident as these are in the constantly renewed onslaughts and constantly renewed struggles – and by means of which we must be guarded against the death of the soul. Here too, in this characterisation of the Eucharist, therefore, man is depicted as we experience him for ourselves in our everyday lives. And the Eucharist itself is viewed in its effects precisely upon man in this guise, in the toilsomeness and weakness of his everyday life. It is viewed as the antidote to this enduring condition of ours. And the same passage goes on to say that through this sacrament we must be united to one another by bonds of faith, hope and love in order that we may all be of one accord, and that there may be no divisions among us. Again it is the factor of the everyday in the life of men, who live and have to live with one another, that is envisaged, and again in this portrayal of the Eucharist in the official teaching of the Church this supreme sacrament of sacred fellowship with God is shown in the central Impact which it has upon our everyday lives. Let us recognise in all calmness that it is in order that we may to some extent live in harmony one with another, at least in the context of the everyday, tolerate one another, bear one another's burdens in peace, in patience, in hope and in some little degree of love, that this Bread of life is imparted to us. This definitive description, put forward by the solemn and official teaching of the Church, is itself enough to enable us to recognise suddenly and surprisingly that this supreme mystery of Christendom, the holy and most holy sacrament of the altar, is manifestly

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the sacrament of our everyday lives.

And let us examine this truth somewhat more closely still.

Who is bestowed upon us in this sacrament? What does this sacrament stand for? What is the message of this most holy celebration in the holiest hour of our lives? It is the crucified Lord and his death. His fate is the redeeming factor in our lives. He, the incarnate Word, is our salvation through his life and through his death.

His fate is certainly more than merely everyday. His fate is the mystery of the Cross. His fate which redeems us is the mystery of Good Friday. But while it is true that he whom we receive as our Redeemer through his life and death is also more than one who has taken a mere everyday lot upon himself it also remains true at the same time that this fate of death [218] which redeems us is, basically speaking, nothing more than the everyday which, as we may express it, manifests itself here in its purest and most concentrated form. This death represents the ultimate in what we mean by the everyday. We cannot find a more precise way of expressing it than that which we have just given. But at the same time it was frustration, it was pain, it was the negation of its Victim's intentions and designs, it was the betrayal of friends. This Good Friday was loneliness itself. This Good Friday was that mysterious cry, the real meaning of which man cannot so much as guess at, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' This Good Friday was the futility of life, the hatred of enemies, betrayal of friends, loneliness, remoteness from God, an exposure of the stupidity of human aims and designs, and death. What is all this? Precisely, as we may express it, the concentrated, the pure essence of what is apportioned to us again and again gradually and piecemeal in our everyday lives. Seneca the sage said long ago that when we start to live we begin to die, and Gregory the Great, in a sermon which we read repeatedly in our breviaries, explains that life is, properly speaking, nothing else than the 'prolixitas mortis', a thread of death that runs right through life. It is, as it were, a slow, long-drawn-out death, one that is, so to say, administered and received a drop at a time. And that is precisely how it is! We should not condemn life. We should recognise its joys, its glory, its greatness, its loyalties, its beauties. And we should praise them in a spirit of thankfulness. But we Christians have neither a right nor a duty to act in a spirit of false optimism, as though life consisted simply in joy and glory for their own sake. For it is sickness, it is loneliness, it is remoteness from God, it is anxiety about the future of one's plans, it is pain, it is toil, it is hardship, in one word it is – the everyday. And even if we take the burden of the everyday upon ourselves – God give us the grace to do so – in a spirit of genuine, wholesome and indefatigable vitality, with the feeling of being well-equipped to take it, with lively hearts and with the optimism of one who is precisely bold and healthy, not woebegone, not over-sensitive – even if we do all this, I say, and even if we recognise that it is precisely our Christian duty not to indulge in self-pity, not to shoot at the little sparrows of our everyday burdens with the artillery of the sacred and the supernatural in a spirit of false idealism – still it nevertheless remains true that a man who really faces up to his life as it is must feel the factor of the everyday as a heavy burden upon him. Indeed he will feel it to be so more and more, and thereby will gradually be initiated into the hard and unwelcome truth that [219] the everyday, that is that which precisely provides the content of our lives as a whole, is the 'prolixitas mortis', the act of dying long drawn out.

Now if Jesus' redeeming deed, his life and death, is received by us in him whom we receive as our crucified Lord, then precisely what is at basis the pure essence of the everyday in the Body of Christ is also received. When we receive the Lord in the Eucharist as him who died on the Cross, then we receive the innermost governing factor of the everyday, because the crucified Lord in his Cross and in his death only expresses in visible terms the lot that is imparted to us in the 'prolixitas mortis' of everyday, as it were piecemeal and drop by drop, or as though we were gradually habituating ourselves to death by practising it again and again. When we receive the crucified Lord we are receiving daily, as the innermost law of our life, the precise counterpart of this slow death in the person of him who, precisely because he is the crucified Lord, sends us into our everyday with the words: 'Go, you are sent forth' with which Mass concludes. Now the everyday in our life is properly speaking not something which has nothing to do with what takes place in the celebration of this sacred mystery. On the contrary, it is through the inner dynamism of what is celebrated here and what is received here, through the power and directive force which it contains within itself, that we are sent out into this 'everyday'. For we have received the crucified Lord and have thereby received his death and his Cross as well. But what is set before our eyes in the holy sign of the Body and Blood of Christ, what has been brought home to us in this way, that same reality is what we encounter as the truth of what is signified in our everyday lives as well. How can we be surprised that the everyday is as it is if we have understood that in every communion we receive we submit ourselves to the Cross of the Lord because it is in his crucifixion and death that we receive him, because we take into ourselves and into our hearts that glorified Lord who has only achieved his glorification by enduring a life which led through the sheer and absolute ruin of death. No, the law of life to which Christ submitted himself in his life and death is what we receive in the sacrament of his life because we receive him as crucified and, as Paul puts it, proclaim the death of the Lord until he comes again. This is why we must realise that the first and primary significance of the Eucharist is not that it provides us with strength for our everyday lives, that it is nourishment to help us by constantly renewing our strength and so enabling us to endure the 'everyday', though of course it does have this function also. But the Eucharist as first and foremost the [220] holy deed wrought by God upon us itself assigns the everyday to us as our task. Viewed in its ultimate perspective the position is not that the everyday is simply something which is assigned to us by chance, by the laws of the earth and of our own lives to be our lot, and then God intervenes, so to say, from outside the situation and helps us to endure this alien and godless situation in which we are placed. This is not the state of affairs at all. At basis it is rather that this 'everyday' itself is something that is given to us by God in Jesus Christ through the bond which we have with him in the grace of baptism, and the giving of it is constantly renewed in the sacrament of the altar. The fact that when we receive Jesus we receive his life as the innermost law of our own lives, and thereby the life that consists in crucifixion and death veiled in the obscurity of faith – it is this that is summed up in a single phrase drawn from the context of the secular, namely 'Our everyday'. For it is in this that we live, to this that we are, as it were, constantly nailed and crucified, in this that we die, and in this that our dying is hidden with Christ, hidden in the drabness of the routine and the humdrum, in the blankness of the everyday. Each day and daily we receive the actual everyday of Christ himself and of his life, his life as it drains away into death – it is this that we receive in the Eucharist. And this everyday life which we receive from God in this form is our daily life as something that is given to us by Christ himself together with the strength, the interior illumination, the interior grace which enables us to endure this everyday. He and his strength, he and his meaning, he and his interior light, he and his daily forgiveness and interior sanctification – the person of Jesus, and these attributes of his together with him, are bestowed upon us by God in the sacrament of the Eucharist.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Finally let us consider now how we can make this truth which we have been examining in some measure a part of our practical lives as well. It is not enough to recognise a truth of religion, to understand it in the abstract with one's mind. We must also take steps to show that we acknowledge it and value it in our lives. It must be put into practice. It must gradually be assimilated. It must permeate our whole interior man (though this can only be a slow process), so that the awareness of it becomes a spontaneous part of ourselves. It must to some extent strike its roots into the deepest levels of our life, our heart, our whole existence, those from which our true life takes its rise. And in view of this it is, of course, of little or no use

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

simply to listen to such considerations on the theological and purely speculative level, and with minds more or less willing to accept what we [221] hear. We have to say to ourselves: 'Merely because we have understood these points with our minds, this is far from meaning that we have taken them into our hearts or made them, in any effective sense, an intrinsic factor, part of the basic pattern of our lives, an element in the inward law which governs them in all their dimensions and at all levels. This we must do, but it is only a gradual process. We must first consciously exercise ourselves in putting this truth into practice. Only so can it be accorded its true place in our lives. For instance it is possible to express in fine words what truthfulness or love etc. mean, and everyone who then hears these words can understand them. But to the mature man one thing is absolutely clear from the experience of his life. It is that when one has practised truthfulness in one's life, when one really has remained faithful through tests and trials, then, even though one cannot say anything more or anything finer about truthfulness, love, faithfulness etc., still one has understood what they really are in a quite different way from when one has simply achieved a speculative understanding of these statements at the purely conceptual level. Thus the truth which has been lived, experienced, suffered involves an insight into what truth means which is quite different in kind from that which can be achieved merely in terms of abstract ideas. Now applying this to the sheer truth as such that the Eucharist is the sacrament of the everyday, we have really to commit ourselves to practising, experiencing, living and suffering this truth, until, from being merely a truth at the theological and conceptual level, it has become a truth of the interior man, a truth of the heart.

In order for one to exercise one's self in such a truth there is much that is needful. First and foremost in order to exercise ourselves in this truth we must, if we may so express it, withdraw into ourselves. We must be recollected. It is difficult to express what this really means. But first it is important simply to bear with one's self not, as it were, constantly to be seeking to escape from one's self into outside occupations; to manage to live – in the contemporary scene it is necessary to say this without having a radio constantly in the background, to bear with one's self and not to give one's self up to empty talk and gossip, and to a reading of the illustrated papers that is a mere waste of time and a dissipation; to draw one's self back, when circumstances demand, from that more subtle form of distraction and of wasting one's own life which consists in an over-busy and all-devouring fulfilment of one's duty, or rather of what we sometimes like to regard as our duty in order to find an excuse for avoiding our real duty. No we must [222] contain ourselves and, as it were, allow our own life-force, the basic resources of our own being, to be withdrawn and gathered into the depths of our hearts. For when we do achieve this state of withdrawal, in which we, so to say, contain ourselves, we still have a further state to achieve: to stand fast. It is by no means the case that in order rightly to achieve this state of recollection and rightly to carry out this process of containing ourselves, rightly to arrive at the attitude of meditation which is necessary, we have actually to withdraw ourselves from the everyday as though the act of containing ourselves in this manner entailed a flight from the everyday. No, what has to be achieved in this state of recollection is that we face up to ourselves as we really are; that we stand firm and confront ourselves; that we do not run away from this. But this in turn implies that we face up to the everyday in our lives. Despite all his efforts the abiding loneliness of man is constantly being brought home to him. He feels himself somehow naked and defenceless. At some level in his being he is a prey to anxiety (Angst), feels pain, is in some sense disappointed with his life. But when they become conscious of these experiences men take fright. They run away from them. They seek, as it were, to bury them beneath the surface of their lives, and for this purpose they grasp at palliatives of the most varied kinds – I am not speaking here of medicines – which life has to offer, precisely chatter, conversation, mere external dissipations. They do not stand firm in face of the real truth of the everyday, and this is precisely what we ought to achieve courageously, honourably and without illusions.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This does not, of course, change the everyday in any way at first. Its impact upon us is not less burdensome than before. It confronts us just as it really is, bringing home to us how drably average our lives are, how mediocre our achievements, and the disappointments of our life in this or that respect. Obviously we must not fall into an attitude of pessimism. God has endowed man directly with strength to bear much, to put up with much, even to disregard much that takes place in his life. And this strength that God has given us must be preserved and used. Obviously we must not indulge in self-pity. But even the experienced man, the brave man, he who has a cheerful heart, constantly arrives in the end, by way of that grey fog of the everyday, in a situation in which he either runs away from it, avoids it, suppresses it, refuses to admit the truth of it, grasps at the palliative drugs of the everyday, or alternatively finds himself faced with the question of how he can put up with this everyday at all. And in the last [223] analysis it is precisely the believer – and only he – who can put up with it. Now in saying this we may, and indeed must, be fully ready to recognise that there may be many who face up to life bravely, calmly, cheerfully and in a spirit of selfless love, yet who do not regard themselves as believers at all. But by the way they live their lives such men avoid falling into an attitude of cynical resignation. On the contrary, in their calm acceptance of their lives they actually achieve, implicitly and in principle, what the conscious and professed believer does explicitly and in the full knowledge of what he is doing and how he does it.

But in any case the process of living the truth and practising it, as we have conceived of this in the present context, necessarily involves this attitude of containing one's self standing firm, bearing and enduring the everyday within the context of the everyday itself by living it in a spirit of faith, hope and love – in other words in the surrender of our whole being to God through these three theological virtues. And in fact the situation is such that these divine virtues have to be practised in the concrete circumstances of our everyday. They must not for one moment be reduced to mere Sunday attitudes, but must be genuinely exercised in our hearts. And they can only be so when they are practised in the down-to-earth, factual, hard, drab realities of the everyday. And this is what we do when we accept our disappointments without being shattered by them because we know that they are, as it were, the medicaments by which our humanity is really healed in its innermost depths. For this humanity of ours is healthy only when it allows God to be God, when it genuinely hopes for eternal life and when on the basis of this hope it genuinely endures the hopelessness of the everyday. It is precisely then, in this acceptance of the futility, the drabness, the mediocrity, the disappointments of the everyday that faith, hope and love are really exercised in very truth. Indeed there is no other way whatever of truly practising these virtues. When we confine ourselves merely to praying for 'the divine virtues to be awakened in us', to employ the terminology of the relevant forms of prayer, then we do indeed give evidence of the fact that our will is good, that we want to have what is signified by this formula, namely faith, hope and love. But the actual process of putting these virtues into practice and exercising them takes place in the context of the everyday, and the everyday provides material for the exercise of these virtues. It is in the situation in which we feel anxiety (Angst), pain and need, and nevertheless still commit ourselves to God – it is in that situation that we really [224] put into practice what is meant by the acceptance of the everyday, and in this the exercise of the holy and God-given virtues of our lives.

And it is only when we are prepared in this way that we can understand the fact that when we receive holy Communion we are accepting the everyday. For then we can say: 'Come Lord, enter my heart, you who are crucified, who have died, who love, who are faithful, truthful, patient and humble, you who have taken upon yourself a slow and toilsome life in a single corner of the world, denied by those who are your own, too little loved by your friends, betrayed by them, subjected to the law, made the plaything of politics right from the very first, a refugee child, a carpenter's son, a creature who found only barrenness and futility as a result of his labours, a man who loved and who found no love in response, you who were too exalted for those about you to understand, you who were left desolate, who were brought to the point of feeling yourself forsaken by God, you who sacrificed all, who commend yourself into the hands of your Father, you who cry: "My God, my Father, why have you forsaken me ?", I will receive you as you are, make you the innermost law of my life, take you as at once the burden and the strength of my life. When I receive you I accept my everyday just as it is. I do not need to have any lofty feelings in my heart to recount to you. I can lay my everyday before you just as it is, for I receive it from you yourself, the everyday and its inward light, the everyday and its meaning, the everyday and the power to endure it, the sheer familiarity of it which becomes the hiddenness of your eternal life'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If the everyday is itself received in the act of receiving holy Communion, if in this act of receiving holy Communion we practise how to accept our everyday, then the everyday will be a further projection of the Communion we receive into the reality of our lives. If we receive the Lord and his grace only in the sacrament, if we do not make the everyday itself a means of receiving the grace of God by accepting it in the guise in which it is mercifully presented to us of the toilsome, the drab and the everyday, then, basically speaking, our Communion will not have been brought to its full and true significance. For there is one point that we must never forget: Simply stated as an abstract proposition of theology it is a truth of faith that the Christian, by every good work, by every act of faithfulness performed in the context of the everyday, by every deed done in the grace of God in the everyday, grows in this same grace of God. By such acts performed in the everyday his eternal life itself develops, is advanced, is [225] intensified and plunges deeper roots into the ultimate basis of his own being. The communion with God in his grace can itself truly grow in the context of the everyday.

Where the everyday is truly and effectively endured an abiding communion with Jesus Christ and his eternal life is achieved, not indeed in the sacramental sign but in the reality of what is signified by that sign, namely in the grace of God. In other words it may be asserted as an absolute truth of faith that the everyday is a continuation and further projection of Communion, provided only that in the power of the Eucharist we manage to endure and to sustain our everyday.

But let us not deceive ourselves. The process of enduring the everyday has itself a very everyday aspect. Enduring the everyday does not consist merely in so filling our hearts with enthusiasm that we render ourselves quite immune to the 'everyday-ness', the monotony, the routine, the mediocrity, the mere toilsomeness and the creeping death that is in the everyday. Nor does it consist in making something exalted and glorious of our everyday. No, this is not the everyday into which we are sent by Jesus Christ in holy Communion itself. We are truly sent into the everyday, and this means into the everyday in all its pettiness and triviality. When we receive holy Communion, and when we pray to Jesus Christ: 'Help me to endure my everyday from an innermost source of strength', then we cannot pray, 'Turn my everyday into a festival day'. Rather we must say: 'Let my everyday be an everyday. My feet hurt me, my nerves are overstrained, my everyday is drab and boring, I always have the same things to do' etc., 'Lord, remain in my everyday. I know that enduring this everyday, accepting this everyday, itself in its turn also remains an everyday act. But that is as you have willed it to be, and therefore my everyday is, in fact, nothing else than the enduring projection of what has been initiated in Communion.' It is itself communion, for in this everyday, when it is endured in this everyday manner, when we 'carry on', when we are disappointed, when we rise and when we fall, when we still manage to be kind even though our nerves are worn out, when we begin to pray even though we have no inclination to do so, when we still bend ourselves to our tasks even though they are hateful – in all this communion is achieved,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

because in this way we grow in the grace of Christ. In other words we attain to an ever-closer union with Jesus Christ and his eternal life. What takes place in holy Communion itself has its exact counterpart in what is achieved here in the everyday, although always with the reservation that [226] that other Communion takes place through the explicit sacramental sign, and is endowed with that unique power which can only be achieved precisely in the sphere of God's sacraments.

The everyday is the continuation and growth of Communion and its projection into the drabness of reality, and therefore our own everyday in all its monotonous and unvarying familiarity, becomes a preparation, constantly renewed, for Communion. The everyday as endured – endured in spite of being merely burdensome, is the finest preparation for Communion. By Communion we are sent forth into the everyday and the everyday needs only to be viewed and interpreted in a truly Christian perspective in order that ipso facto and in itself it may send us to Jesus Christ, into the everyday-ness of his own life, into the death of his own life.

There is a final question with regard to this need to practise living the truth, one which we should constantly be putting to ourselves: Where in our lives does the point of convergence and correlation lie between these two factors, Communion and the everyday, and how can such a correlation be achieved? Our life and the Communion we receive constitute an enduring encounter with the hidden Lord, with deliverance from need and distress, and with the need and distress of others too which, when we help them in bearing it, delivers us ourselves. In Communion, as in the everyday activities appropriate to our various callings, we encounter the Lord only in a hidden manner, in the first case under the appearance of bread and wine, in the second in the guise in which he reveals himself to us in the neighbour whom we serve.

Thus the everyday and Communion are two factors which constitute an everyday encounter with the veiled and hidden Lord, who is visible only to the eye of faith. Now this eye of faith must see somewhat more deeply into the significance of our everyday, and must perceive in the midst of our everyday lives in their everyday-ness Jesus Christ present in his brothers and sisters. The same eye of faith must also perceive the Lord in his sacramental presence, and seek him there. Finally these two factors, the experience of the everyday as seen through the eye of faith on the one hand, and the celebration of the Eucharist on the other, must be correlated and made complementary. Each must be interpreted in the light of the other. Only when we do all this do we achieve a real and effective encounter with Jesus Christ, our Lord, our life, our judgment, our eternity.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[227]

PART FOUR

Christian Virtues

[229]

22

ON TRUTHFULNESS

The question of truthfulness is far deeper and more penetrating than one might suppose from a reading of the relevant treatise in moral theology, that on the eighth commandment, concerning truthfulness and lies. Now since this is the position, in other words since an attempt must be made to include these deeper levels of the theme, which usually go unexplored, in our present investigation of the subject, therefore (this must be emphasised right at the outset for the considerations which follow) we must be permitted in this treatment to leave on one side those aspects of the question which are concerned directly with religious pedagogy. We shall do this in the confident belief that this task is far better left to those who are engaged ex professo in the pastoral field.

I

The first point to be recognised is simply that truthfulness has something to do with truth. It is the will to truth, a mentality, an attitude of mind, in which one reverences truth first as something of intrinsic value in itself, and second as something that is due to one's fellow man, with whom one must always strive to communicate in such a way that truth too can be an intrinsic part of what one has in common with him. It is an attitude and disposition which must constantly permeate one's every thought and utterance, one's whole demeanour, everything that one does, to the point at which it proves itself to be the definitive characteristic of one's whole activity, making itself felt in all that one does. Only on this basis, and with these predispositions can truthfulness become a fixed and enduring attitude freely adopted, in which one speaks the truth to one's neighbour and avoids lying to or deceiving one's fellow man.

Even at this early point we discover a noteworthy and perilous shortcoming in the ethos of our own age. The man of today suffers to no small [230] extent from an incapacity to realise the meaning and value of truth in itself. At any rate he finds it extremely difficult to do so. It should be noted that what we are immediately concerned with here is not truthfulness but truth. For we shall only acquire a real and effective understanding of what truthfulness means when we have renewed our understanding of the meaning and value of truth itself. Today, however, this understanding is threatened. It is not possible here to point out the historical causes and origins of this state of affairs, in which our understanding of truth is imperilled. This would take us too far back in history. The religious dissensions and conflicts, the breaking up of society into many self-contained units, the anti-metaphysical positions which are characteristic of the new age, the purely descriptive positivism of modern natural science, the recognition that the knowledge of the individual is conditioned by far-reaching sociological factors, the deliberate manipulation on the part of political forces of the conclusions of the sciences and of public opinion, the fact that today the individual has a direct and vivid realisation of how manifold opinions, religious and moral outlooks are in the world, the experience of sudden and world-wide revolutions in thought taking place almost overnight – these and similar manifestations are in part causes and in part symptoms of what we are speaking of here: modern man labours under the false impression that only in those cases in which empirical reality is quite directly subject to diagnosis and control on man's part is there much chance of gaining any accurate knowledge of such reality. Modern man regards his own thoughts as unverifiable, as mere opinion, as a view which can neither command reality in all its aspects nor offer any very strong grounds for confidence in the reliability of his own cognitive processes. This attitude of relativism and scepticism on the part of modern man with regard to his own cognitive processes leads to a further phenomenon, still more important than the first. Modern man (and this extends very largely into the sphere of faith itself) is really very far from feeling that truth is important in itself; that it has a value either in itself or even, considered as knowledge, that it has any significance in itself for salvation. In other words modern man is by no means convinced that a deficiency in truth, quite regardless of whether it is culpable or not, could imperil his own life either in the temporal or the eternal dimension.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We have only to apply the experiment to ourselves to realise the truth of this. Let us ask ourselves, then, whether we are really convinced of the [231] fact that knowledge of divine truth as such constitutes a factor which is essential to salvation itself, such that without it, regardless of the reasons why one may have failed to discover this truth, it is simply impossible to attain to salvation at all. Or again we may ask ourselves whether our position may not fairly be summed up somewhat as follows: We hold that if one does know the truth it is certainly excellent and good, because then one can and must act in conformity with the real facts that one has thereby grasped. But for all that, in the last analysis we do draw a distinction between the sphere of the technical and the practical on the one hand, and the higher spiritual sphere of dispensations and principles on the other. In the former sphere if one fails, no matter how inculpably, to realise and apply the rules, then something unpleasant and injurious may ensue. In the latter sphere, however, if indeed it exists at all, any mistakes we may make cannot possibly result in the same injurious effects. For here one can only be held responsible for those mistakes which consist in morally culpable acts (and these only to the extent that they are morally culpable). I believe that it is only by submitting our ideas to this kind of experiment that it is brought home to us how great a danger we all stand in of denying the value of truth as truth; how much we all hold, without realising it, that truth is only valuable as providing the prior condition for coping rightly with reality. For we can only adopt a right practical attitude towards reality when we know what properties it has in itself, and what reactions this or that mode of behaviour may be calculated to produce in it. Perhaps this may serve to bring home to us how far we have moved in our inmost convictions from the position that knowledge as such (though admittedly this comes to its full fruition in love), constitutes in itself the most radical mode of communication with reality. May we not actually have reached the position of thinking of knowledge as providing merely a starting-point and prior condition for such communication with reality, and, indeed, not always even an essential prior condition for it at that?

The successes achieved in the whole interrelated complex of the natural sciences, the developments in technology and other revolutionary changes within the social scene, have all unintentionally contributed to the fact that men have come to prize truth merely as a means of gaining control and mastery over the environment in which they exist (and from this point they have then gone on actually to define the nature of truth in terms corresponding to this essentially functional view). This control over the [232] environmental factors in human life does not consist in knowledge as such; other means are used in the pursuit of it, those namely of technology, medicine, practical genetics etc., and so a basic attitude to life is arrived at in which something is regarded as true only when it can be put to some 'practical use', and all other kinds of knowledge, which cannot be shown to have this particular kind of contribution to make are regarded as mere opinions, mere speculative positions which are adopted, secondary side effects to be ascribed to hereditary or racial factors, social conditions etc. In short the concept of truth here is that of a sceptical pragmatism, which each one may seek to justify for himself whether on biological or sociological grounds according as he wishes. In the light of this it is easy to understand why to one who allows these ideas to influence his own thought to any significant extent it really does seem quite right that that ideology is true which is de facto effective and powerful. It is true in so far, as it claims to shape the future in conformity with the only sort of reality which it will recognise as reality at all: reality on the material and sociological plane with an ideology to correspond to this. Knowledge is reduced to a mere tool, enabling man so to cope with his material and sociological reality that he can gain control over it. This in turn leads to the further conclusion that he is truthful and honourable who assimilates himself to the sociological ideology which has power to shape the future. For it is this, in fact, which constitutes the real and the effective. Anyone, therefore, who succeeded in reawakening his fellow men to a sense of what the nature of truth really is in itself would be performing a vital task indeed. Such a one would also have to enable his fellow men to achieve a renewed grasp of truthfulness as the initial capacity, prior to all presuppositions, to achieve truth in itself, truth in its own unique essence. In saying this we must of course recognise that man is free to use this initial capacity of his or not as he chooses, and he may culpably misuse it and so fall into error. But if we are to attain to the unique essence of truthfulness as defined here the concept of truth on which we must fix our gaze is not one which can be defined in purely neutral and general terms. Certainly it is possible to conceive of truth in a wholly general sense as equivalent to ‘correctness or accuracy’, the idea that a proposition must correspond to reality quite regardless of what this proposition refers to. To define truth thus would be to do exactly the same in the dimension of knowledge (something which is, in principle perfectly possible) as one does in the dimension of being when one understands ‘being’ as signifying the being of a ‘something [233] or other’ completely undefined and in the void, the being of a ‘not-not-being’. When we understand being in this way as merely the unique self-identity of the ‘something-or-other being’ we have obtained no true view of being, We have further to understand that there is being as such, being in the absolute. This constitutes the absolutely primary basis (the very root foundation for all truth and all being) for all human knowledge of being, such that even though it is not explicitly adverted to, without it no such knowledge would be possible at all. It is only on the basis of this primary and implicit awareness of being as such, then, that we can really apprehend what is meant by the being of any given existing thing in its reality. What this properly means must be based on the ultimate priority of being in the absolute. In the same way too truth in its original and ultimate sense is not the correctness of a proposition which is equally valid in all its possible applications, but truth in the absolute, which man encounters as the horizon, omnipresent and all-encompassing, to every ‘concept’ in which the individual and the particular are grasped. Man is conscious of this all-encompassing horizon to his ideas not as an explicit object for investigation in itself, but rather as that which constantly impinges upon his awareness. And this is that truth which supports all other particular truths and is not itself supported by any. It is that which is uniquely self-authenticating (in itself) and, precisely in virtue of this fact, that which is to us the incomprehensible mystery.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is only on the basis of these factors, which we have only been able to indicate in what has been said above, that the ultimate nature of truthfulness as such can be discovered: it is the basic feeling for truth as the initial and absolutely primary communication with reality at its most absolute, and at the same time at its most all-embracing. It is that feeling considered as basic receptivity, submissiveness, readiness not to refuse or to resist that which impinges

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

upon it. It is the openness of man as spirit to being in the absolute (that which provides the basis for the being of all that is). It is that feeling, that initial perception, in which we accept with our minds the mystery of which we are conscious as the foundation and support of all reality, and which we call God, the unique truth of truths which bears its own meaning within itself. It is the basic acceptance of this mystery even though it has no use for us, even though it cannot be exploited by technology and cannot be made to contribute to our biological self-assertion, our physical well-being, our diversion or our enjoyment. It is that feeling for truth which is strict and exacting in its claims upon us, [234] and only bestowed upon us as such; that initial perception which demands a response not merely from the rational faculty of man as refined and developed by technological training, but from his spirit, demands the ultimate decision which is his to make as free, from the whole man. It is at this level that it demands his response, and at the same time makes this response possible.

It must be reiterated that those who define truth as 'the adequation of a statement to the objective state of affairs' are viewing it only as it appears to be, and only in a quite superficial connection, and so as a property which applies with equal validity to every correct proposition. In fact truth, like being, is first and last a property inherent in reality itself (considered as the 'able-to-be-made-manifest' as actually revealed), and simultaneously inherent in knowledge too (considered as openness to the self-manifestation of being). As such it is an analogous entity, and an analogous concept. For this reason it is precisely not applicable in any primary or basic sense in contexts dealing with the practical usefulness of a formula for the technical manipulation of material objects or for predicting the outcome of processes in the natural order. It is not in such contexts of practical living that truth achieves its true applicability, but rather in another context, one in which man as spiritual being realises and possesses his own subjectivity, himself as a whole (a process which ultimately includes the love and freedom pertaining to truth); in which he experience his own finitude, which he likewise comprehends, accepts and endures as a whole; in which, faced with the question of being as such, being in its totality, he holds firm to the ineffable mystery; in which he does not shrink from the questionability, the radically contingent nature of all individual entities, all of which point him on to the nameless infinite; in which he does not seek to grasp reality by taking possession of it for himself, but rather suffers himself to he grasped by it in its unfathomable depths; in which he does not speak but rather falls dumb with adoration. It is in this context that truth in its proper and ultimate sense comes into its own, and it is here that it enters our lives. And it is the acceptance of this ultimate essence of truth, the truth that so constantly goes unrecognised, that itself constitutes truthfulness in its primary and most basic form; it is this that is presupposed in other contexts, in which truthfulness signifies the assent of the free individual to truth.

[235]

II

The second form of truthfulness which we have to explore can be described simply as truthfulness with one's self. At first sight it might seem that this kind of truthfulness is familiar to everyone. Thus we speak of honesty towards one's self. People are warned against 'setting themselves up to be something'; nowadays everyone is familiar with the phenomenon of suppression, masking one's conscience, interior deceitfulness with one's self, dishonesty, 'putting up a façade', sentimentality, affectation and other forms in which a man tries to avoid facing up to his own true nature (that is having that truthfulness which he is empowered to achieve and which the absolute truth requires that he shall achieve). But what we find so often elsewhere occurs here too. One speaks of truthfulness in this sense only because it is no longer able to be taken for granted. One praises something only when it has become lost. One

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

conjures something up only when it is threatening to disappear. One strives to keep something alive only when it is dying. And in fact modern man is sadly deficient in this interior truthfulness.

The reason for this is not immediately to be sought in a moral defect which can then be condemned, branded and campaigned against with exhortations. Not only is this useless but in this case it is also false. For the reason for this deficiency in interior truthfulness is not, in the first instance, a moral defect in the everyday sense of the term. It is to be ascribed rather to the difficulty which modern man feels in really recognising with any clarity which among the forces of his own interior life is the real, the genuine, the truly valid – precisely the 'true'. Modern man too would like not to be dishonest with himself. On the contrary he may, perhaps, even have the impression that he actually is honest with himself in a way that is brutally down-to-earth, harshly realistic, and to a certain extent this is true. He really is genuinely responsive to catchwords, to a certain hollow and anguished idealism. Somewhere and somehow the honest objectivity of natural science and technology really have penetrated into his nature and exercised a formative influence upon him. And we should take great care that in the forms in which our religion is presented we do not offend against this awareness in the younger generation by an enthusiasm that is less than genuine, by raising anguished theological problems in the wrong place, which then give the impression of being alive to themselves yet failing to correspond to the reality of life. If modern man wants to face the [236] facts in all honesty, if he is willing to hide nothing, if he strives to penetrate beyond the façades of idealism, then he finds himself in an embarrassing position, which can become really lethal in its effects, for it threatens his whole ethos of truthfulness and of sober factuality, and there is a danger that this mood of embarrassment will be exchanged for one of cynicism and total scepticism while still continuing to be taken for truthfulness and valued accordingly. In such a case one has the impression of having penetrated beyond superficial appearances only to find nothing behind them. One imagines that one has had the experience of seeing through everything and of now gazing into an empty and indeterminate void. For the conflict between the realities which one has experienced in this way is forcibly brought home to one. They turn out to be unco-ordinated, contradictory and conflicting. As a result one does not know what really to opt for in one's scale of values, the body or the abstract spirit, instinct or norm, the individual or the collective, brute fact or ideal, what is or what allegedly should be the case. Thus the harsh and onerous impression arises all too easily that man is dishonest because he is unrealistic, because man opts for the spirit, the norm, the ideal in the attempt to bring order out of chaos, in the refusal simply to admit what is, in fact, the case. One believes that it is cowardly or dishonest, a tilting at windmills if one does not 'simply take reality as it is'. And thus a perverted ideal of truth emerges with an equally perverted ideal of truthfulness to correspond to it: a truthfulness which has degenerated into cynicism, which pretends heroically to unmask anything and everything. A man with this attitude supposes his disposition to be realistic and true when he only recognises that true and real which is endowed with the harsh reality of the physical and the physiological; which is, in its mode of existence, independent of the freedom of the spirit, with its functions as deciding, creating and authenticating. For it is the spirit which recognises and acknowledges that that which is physically and physiologically weaker is in fact superior, and, in the long run, more powerful also. This perverted notion of 'truthfulness' must be resisted and contested, and the true intrinsic nature of truthfulness with one's self must be revealed for what it really is and developed in man. It is the truthfulness of self-criticism, which militates against the prejudices of the superficial, the clamour of the merely instinctive. This is truthfulness considered as courage to recognise what is truer because more real, courage to live by the spirit. Man must realise and patiently and perseveringly live by the fact that an attitude which opts for a hierarchy of [237] values, for form, discipline and order, has in itself

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and at basis nothing whatever to do with a deceitful and cowardly untruthfulness, that on the contrary it is that attitude of an unbridled yielding to impulses which refuses to be unmasked for what it is, that conceals weakness and decay under the guise of honesty and truthfulness.

Naturally it is not much use to seek to impart this knowledge by means of moral imperatives, when in fact far the best imperative of all consists not in the imperative of exhortation, but in the indicative of insight into a matter. And in this way an appeal must be made to the inner experience of modern man himself, so as to make him understand that it is not those elements in his own make-up which are most conspicuous and most insistently clamorous that ipso facto constitute the real in him; that that which he feels most strongly with his emotions is still far from being the real and genuine depths of his being; that the all-devouring obstinacy of the instincts is still far from being irresistible in the true sense; that true happiness can only be attained at the price of toil, discipline, foregoing many things for the sake of one, and can only be attained in the unity of the whole man which is thereby achieved; finally that here, in the finite state of man and of his world, everything tends to immoderation and self-destruction, and hence the will to achieve infinitude which is instilled in man and is legitimate, the will which seeks to rise above the world and is inspired by eschatological hope, must be steadfastly and exclusively orientated towards that promise which is God himself, otherwise this will must itself be perverted and lead to self-destructive immoderation by the fact of being directed towards objects within this world. Everyone has already had such experiences for himself. He only needs to keep them constantly in mind. He only needs to make a more or less systematic evaluation of them.

Thus man can learn that sober interior truthfulness towards one's self is an art acquired by self-discipline, a therapy of the mind enabling us to see through and to deny the pretensions of what is arrogantly put forward as 'truth' itself, autonomous and self-sufficient, but which in fact belongs merely to particular areas within the total scope of human reality; enabling us to learn that real inner truthfulness, so far from contradicting, is actually identical with what good Christian tradition has long been accustomed to call 'self-denial', that truthfulness is that metanoia which consists in the courage to face up to one's self, to let that which seems to be self-sufficient stand revealed in its radical contingency in relation to God. In [238] other words truthfulness is that entering into the truth, that freedom, to which only the liberation which Christ has achieved on our behalf can admit us. Once this is realised the sincere individual can then be brought to understand that in order to achieve this process of radical self-questioning which is so necessary, he must find a point outside himself (rather as in the geometry of Archimedes), one which is not subject to the autonomous and uncontrollable ideological vicissitudes of his own subjectivity, in other words authority, community, sound tradition, the Church, the accumulated experience of past ages etc. For even if the individual is rightly inclined to be sceptical with regard to such authorities, still he must also be critical and sceptical with regard to himself (seeing that the representatives of these authorities can at least claim as much for themselves as the sum total of certainty which the individual can offer on his own behalf, namely that he is a man). But the individual must also be brought to realise that he is no longer in a position to be truly critical with regard to himself when, out of arrogance, he absolutely refuses to entertain any such archimedian point outside himself. But when somebody does allow the radical contingency of his own being in regard to God to be revealed in this way in obedience to his word and in truthfulness, refusing therefore to take as the absolute standard of his own attitude and behaviour some impulse within his own nature which, however exalted, is still secondary in comparison to God, then he becomes free because the truth sets him free (Jn 8:32). But admittedly only he who, in the courage of truthfulness with himself, allows the experience of his own interior lack of freedom to come to the fore, can experience this freedom which truth brings. But precisely this courage to be truthful with one's self even when it is hard is itself, once more, a grace of God which is

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

bestowed in the very act in which God makes the individual free in his spirit.

Inevitably in order to do justice to certain aspects of the matter under consideration something ought to be said at this point concerning the grace of this truth and truthfulness that set men free, which is a gift of God. It would have to be pointed out that this bringing out of the individual's own lack of freedom and of the state of bondage into which he had fallen, bondage to the power of sin, of the law, of death, of instinct, to the powers and principalities that are in the world (and these would have to be examined not as presented in earlier times but in their contemporary forms and manifestations, that is as the tyranny of so-called public opinion, the allurements of mass enjoyment, the crazes of modern times etc.) is only [239] possible when God gives his free and liberating Spirit to enable men to achieve it. But this would have to be presented in such a way that it did not strike the hearer as so much religious rhetoric, never allowing him to perceive exactly what it really was intended to convey in the concrete. It is true that what is being treated of here is a genuine experience of faith. But however much this may be the case, it would also have to be shown that it is a real experience that is in question here, and not a purely cognitive process confined to the theoretical plane, in which the individual concerned remains detached and uninvolved in relation to some alleged reality existing wholly outside the sphere of his own personal life. Unfortunately, however, it is not possible to enter any further into these questions at this point. We have been treating of truthfulness towards one's self. We have seen that this is a grace of God which comes to men in the word of God, liberating them and giving them the courage to accept themselves as they are. They can do this because one whom God has accepted in his own Son, the Son of Man, can accept himself. On the basis of truthfulness towards one's self as defined here, then, we would have to go on to enlarge upon the concrete forms which such interior truthfulness towards one's self would assume, and the opportunities for exercising it. The nature of these would have to be defined and made recognisable. We would have to treat of truthfulness in expressing one's self in art, in one's presentation of one's self, in the fashions, style of living and enjoyment which one adopted. All these are expressions of interior truthfulness. They have to be regarded as the point of contact between what one is and what one takes one's self for and accepts one's self as. But in treating of all these expressions of one's self one would, admittedly, have to bear constantly in mind that man, even as he truly and genuinely is, is an historical being, one which undergoes changes within its own abiding nature. For this reason it is important not to be too hasty in rejecting what is inappropriate in one's own case as something ungenuine in itself, and, in its application to others, contrary to their true nature. We would be wrong to invoke the concept of interior truthfulness in order to condemn such self-expression in others. But it is impossible here to enter any further into all this.

III

We now come to a third form of truthfulness, the one which is best known, and which is actually called truthfulness almost universally in [240] normal everyday parlance. It is that attitude and outlook which prohibits lying in human intercourse. Here it is human intercourse in its more 'private' forms which we shall primarily be considering. What we shall be speaking of here, then, is truthfulness between men. One who is truthful in this sense is honest, upright, utterly rejects all lying, is reliable and stands by his word.

One might at first sight suppose that it was a moral phenomenon that we had in mind, one which exists more or less independently as a distinct entity in its own right alongside those other forms of truthfulness which we have been discussing hitherto. But this only appears to be the case. In reality truthfulness in human intercourse is merely the outcome and fruit of the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

forms of truthfulness which have previously been mentioned. In order to see this we have only to ask: What is a liar? or, more precisely: Who finds it necessary to lie? Evidently it is he who feels himself insecure, who imagines that he has to defend himself against an opponent who is too powerful for him, one who believes that he cannot live without the special advantages which can only be obtained by lying, one who is afraid to 'take the blame', who has something to hide which in his opinion would, if it were known, lower him in the esteem of others. The liar attaches value to this esteem as something that is vitally necessary to his existence. In this sense the lie appears as a weapon, presumed to be necessary, in the struggle for self-assertion both interiorly and exteriorly. And considered in this light, as a weapon necessary for one's self-assertion, the lie must seem, in the long run, unavoidable to anyone who has not been interiorly liberated from himself in interior truthfulness, and found the absolute courage he needs in order to discover his true nature in the infinite mystery of truth (moreover on the whole, and in the long run, it does not help in the least to invoke the sort of 'prudence' or practical wisdom involved in such sayings as 'lies will not get you anywhere' or statements that in the long run lies do more harm than good to the liar etc.) Only one who has hidden his own true and ultimate self hood in God, and delivered it into his protection, only one who has thereby become secure and unassailable in a truly ultimate sense, finds it no longer necessary, in the last analysis, to defend himself. And only one who no longer has to defend himself can in all cases be truthful to his neighbour. Only such a one can really entrust himself to another, because he does not have to fear that he will ever really be lost. Only such a one can take the risk of drawing the short straw in the struggle for existence, because for him all struggle for [241] existence, all earthly self-assertion, is, after all, only secondary and provisional. Admittedly the converse is also true. Only he who renounces all lies and dares, in an act of free and trustful self-surrender, to commit his very existence to the uncontrollable and the incomprehensible can truly experience what it is to be with God, because only in such an experience can it really be understood what is the true meaning of the Word of God. This is something that we fail to apprehend so long as we think of that Word simply as a supreme demiurge of the world. From all this it may be concluded that in the field of human discourse truthfulness means that that inner truthfulness in which man denies 'his own' self is put into practice and put to the test. In this the individual himself achieves an attitude of self-criticism in which he renounces himself and thereby finds his true and ultimate essence, together with the protection and unassailability which it needs, by an act of loving self-surrender to that truth which is called the absolute mystery. It appears, therefore, that in this context of human discourse too truthfulness goes down to the ultimate roots of human nature, and must do so if it is to be able to survive at all. And this is the first point to be recognised about this third form of truthfulness. It is truly one of the forms in which the unique essence of truthfulness manifests itself as a state of harmony with truth as such, which is achieved by the individual's own free act.

This analysis should naturally not be taken as implying that this truthfulness between individuals has not other roots as well (at any rate initially): reverence for the other person as a being of truth, justice and love. With regard to a 'virtue' such as this truthfulness between persons precisely is, there is one point which should not be overlooked. The position which it occupies in the moral climate of any particular age is proper to that age and, as practised in other ages, among other nations or in other historical situations, is rightly subject to change. Similarly at specific stages in history it can impose its own characteristics on the whole moral climate of the particular period concerned.

The question that arises at this point, therefore, is whether anything can be said from this point of view concerning truthfulness as applied to our own age in particular. This could then serve in turn as a point of departure for a discussion as to the best strategy and tactics to employ from the educational aspect. In this connection we may perhaps take as our starting-point the consideration that when a particular 'virtue' is singled out in the general moral outlook of a particular age and accorded [242] special preference, so that it is esteemed as a virtue the practice of which will quickly bring one to an understanding of moral values in general, this almost always means that the self-same virtue is especially threatened and assailed in the particular age concerned. The converse is also true. The 'saving grace' arises in response to a need that is felt, and the very fact that special efforts are made to draw down this 'saving grace' upon society is often the first pointer to where the danger really threatens. Virtues which are manifestly in a healthy condition and not particularly threatened are not singled out for special praise precisely because they are being practised. It is rather the virtue which is in danger of disappearing or else which is in process of being introduced into society as a 'saving grace' that is the subject of discussion at least among the wise.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now on this showing it may legitimately be concluded that truthfulness may be regarded as one of the virtues which is actually exercising a specific and decisive influence in this sense and for these reasons upon the ethos of our own particular age. The factors which work for good and those which work for evil in the age we live in, as well as those characteristic phenomena which are neither wholly good nor wholly evil, all combine to make it clear that truthfulness is to be numbered among those influences which are particularly lacking in our age, and therefore particularly needful too. It is certain that the father of lies has never had such opportunities to exploit as he has today. All the mass media in the form of the press, films, television, instructional facilities, party propaganda – all these are employed in an educational system which is compulsory and under state control. They are subject to the tyranny of public opinion, exploited in advertising, in the artificial creation of need, brainwashing etc. It is not really that men have become more evil objectively speaking in God's eyes, but rather that the actual possibilities for lying have so much increased. And therefore lying is more prevalent today than ever before. And this element of mendacity can become all-pervasive and extend into all departments of life, permeating everything from the officially fabricated ideologies to the cigarette advertisements, which must at all costs give an 'open air activities' impression, so that no-one shall really know what the true effect of cigarettes is.

To this extent education in truthfulness has to begin in the private sphere of human relations: in a simple and natural honesty, in a conscious process of personal self-immunisation against the persuasions of the advertisers to the effect that various things are actual necessities, against [243] their lies (an education in the art of not succumbing to the convenient lie which we find agreeable, and which we accept even though we know that it is a lie, for one can recognise a lie for what it is and still believe it – this too certainly belongs to the education in truthfulness of which we are speaking). We must also learn to be critical of our own opinions, which tend to be cliché-ridden and unduly influenced by public opinion, of our cheap over-simplifications, and 'closed minds'. We must learn to revise our earlier opinions, which we thought we had acquired once and for all. We must strive not to confuse the preconditioning of our minds through habit with evidence in the real sense in arriving at an opinion. We must practise ourselves in facing up to disagreeable situations without evading them, in the courage which enables us to submit to the criticism of others, in bravely suppressing our antipathy towards our critics. We must exercise ourselves also in acknowledging our own mistakes (how rare this is even among those in authority, even though there would be no question of their authority being undermined by such admissions). We must make efforts really to take seriously the opinion of others first, even when we are ourselves of a 'different opinion' on the grounds that one must recognise that it is just as possible for one's fellow to have hit upon the truth as for one's self.

In this connection there is admittedly one deficiency, which must be mentioned here. It is

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

one that has a bearing upon the ethic of truthfulness of which we have been speaking, and which is, in itself, all too sorely needed today. This is the fault of tactlessness, over-bluntness and self-assured presumptuousness, which is often present in the so-called 'candid criticism' of others as practised today. There is no principle which lays down that one ought to say everything that one thinks or that one supposes one has seen. On the contrary there is a principle of charity according to which the truth, even when it really is such (and not every opinion arrived at instinctively, not every expression of sympathy or antipathy, not every kind of prejudice is ipso facto a truth) must be either stated or withheld only as the circumstances demand. Moreover if such truth is expressed it must be done in a form which does not offend the dictates of true charity. It must always be in conformity with the particular situation. Perhaps the simplest and most practical criterion for ascertaining whether one is prompted by motives of genuine truthfulness and honesty towards another or by those of a loveless arrogance and over-bluntness is to ask one's self whether one would be ready and willing, not only in abstract [244] theory but in concrete practice too, to recommend another to criticise one's self in the same way as one criticises others. At any rate genuine truthfulness and honesty are not to be confused with sheer lack of manners in the way in which one offers criticism. For when criticism is proffered that is officious, over-strong, over-blunt and wanting in the respect due to the individual, then what such criticism reveals is not the attitude of truthfulness in the sense of a selfless love of the true and the objective, but an emotional and obstinate clinging to one's own opinions and one's own subjective attitudes. This is not objective at all, but rather due to impulse and lack of control (and therefore imprudent and presumptuous). Admittedly an over-sensitive attitude towards criticism can reveal the same lack of interior truthfulness with one's self. For if one so hypersensitive to criticism were to be wholly truthful with himself, then he would indeed recognise that he too was restricted, limited, and therefore liable to error and misapprehension. Not only would he recognise this, but he would also accept these limitations of his, and yet realise that at the same time he was, both in his person and in his official work, hidden in God. Then, feeling less insecure, he would have no need to reject criticism so strenuously, or to be so eager to spring to his own defence.

IV

We come now to a fourth form of truthfulness. For the truthfulness of which we have been speaking, which is practised in private life and in personal relationships between individuals, is reproduced on a larger scale and elevated onto a different plane when it becomes truthfulness in the public life, properly so-called, of society, the nation, the Church and the world at large.

Christianity has a quite specific and peculiar bearing on this virtue of truthfulness in public and social life. Christianity is, in fact, that in which the personal truth of God, the self-disclosure of God to humanity as a whole, becomes revealed. In respect of its content, of those to whom it is addressed, and of the actual Revealer himself, this revelation demands intrinsically and of its very nature, to be complemented by an act of attestation, and that too in a form in which it can reach 'everyman' as well as the accredited upholders of this message, for it is 'for each and for all'. Now since the divine revelation consists, in the last analysis, not in the imparting of factual information but rather in the personal self-disclosure [245] of God, and since the response which is 'connatural' can be achieved only in a wholly human, personal, free act of faith, in which this personal truth is received in a spirit of humility and love, this revelation requires to be imparted in a form which is itself connatural both to the actual revelation itself and to the mode, corresponding to this, in which it is accepted. In other words it requires what we call 'witness'. And in this it is different from the mere transmission of a piece of factual knowledge in which the transmitter is not personally engaged in his own message.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Revelation needs witness as an act of personal engagement. Witness is the imparting of a message in which the imparter himself first lives out what he imparts in his own personal life, in which he becomes in his own person involved in the message he imparts. It must further be recognised that this divine revelation is directed to all and not to any kind of esoteric circle, and further that God, as the God of interior grace, can and does entrust every man with the ultimate capacity to understand this threefold self-disclosure of his. Moreover he is ready to awaken this understanding and bring it to the surface by the promptings of his own interior grace. Finally we should notice that this message is intended to touch not only the hidden interior of the individual man with its saving grace, but is also intended to produce in all the spheres of human living the effects of redemption and divine grace. For all these reasons the Church, as the imparter of this truth which she has to express in her own witness, must address herself to all. And this means to the groups and communities into which mankind is organised as well, to the corporate bodies of men, to the public at large, and in all this it must be realised that in addressing her message to mankind at these different levels the Church has to vary and adapt the manner in which she presents that message according to the particular level for which it is intended. And because every Christian is a member of the Church, because everyone is admitted through baptism and confirmation to an active share in the Church's mission, that namely of ensuring that the message of God takes permanent effect by bearing witness to it, therefore every Christian must be a witness to divine revelation in this sense before his fellow men, and that too in their public and corporate lives.

The layman, in virtue of the fact that he is not a member of the Church's clergy, does not have a 'canonical mission' properly so-called. His area of ecclesiastical activity, the area in which he is called, empowered and bound in duty to bear witness in this way, will be confined to that sphere [246] of life in the world to which he already naturally belongs. It is here that he assumes his natural place in the world, in the natural social unit, among the neighbours, in the family, in his profession, in the environment in which his public life is passed, and which is in practice accessible to him. And it is here that he too must be a witness. But the witness that he must bear does not consist only, or even primarily in doctrine and doctrina1 instruction. Rather it is witness in the sense which we have already defined, and for this reason the layman will not normally have to give any kind of catechetical instruction. Nor does he need to stand at street corners disseminating the popular writings of the Church after the manner of the sectarian sellers of the 'Watchtower'. At the same time it must be appreciated that man's existence is made actual in a specific context and with the special characteristics proper to a particular epoch. And included in this actual and specific context of his life as one of its intrinsic constitutive elements is the human word which is, of its very nature, directed to his fellow men. It must be emphasised that the human word is not something merely superimposed upon or added to human existence ab externo, something which can be absent without altering its essential nature. On the contrary this existence would cease to be human in the true sense at all if it were not given expression (admittedly in the most diverse forms that can be conceived of) in words, and that too at all its levels including the religious one. And it is for this reason that the word of explicit witness too has its place in a specific context and environment, that it is uttered in a world situation which is already given and defined. It is for this reason again that every Christian – the layman too therefore – has the duty of bearing witness openly in that particular public setting and environment in which he as an individual finds himself placed. Every Christian is a witness to the specifically Christian truth; every Christian has to bear witness in the manner appropriate to his own particular circumstances and the particular place he occupies in the community at large. The determination not to suppress this witness at the moment of decision is one of the fundamental requirements which characterise Christian living. Whereas in other contexts truthfulness consists in loyalty to the truth which it has been given to one to perceive, the truthfulness that is specifically Christian entails as one of its absolutely essential elements the courage to bear witness in this way.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In this connection we of today must realise two things: first that this public confession of Christian belief has been modified in many respects [247] and for the most divers reasons in its actual mode of presentation, or, to put it another way, that the variations in the actual manner in which it has been received and understood are far from insignificant. But the second point, which it is no less important for us to realise, is that the essence of this specifically Christian truthfulness which we practise by bearing witness to the truth has not been altered and cannot be altered. To appreciate the first of these points we have only to ask ourselves whether modern man has actually become cowardly in the manner in which he bears witness and avows his 'convictions'. For the way in which this duty of bearing witness to the faith is discharged has undoubtedly changed, and we of today are tempted to attribute this change to cowardice. If it is not cowardice, then we must ask ourselves what the true explanation of this phenomenon of modern times really is. We who are spiritual and anti-materialist in outlook often feel that this makes us out of place in modern society – at least in any of the situations which being a member of this society involves. It is not immediately obvious to us that we should bear witness to our Christian faith always and in all circumstances by our outward appearance, by the very clothes we wear. The procession through the streets can, in certain circumstances, give the impression of being inappropriate and embarrassing even to ourselves. Is it so immediately obvious to us that when we are having a meal in a public restaurant we should demonstrate the fact that we are Christians by saying our grace? Or to take the case of one who always and in all circumstances, and in every possible situation, tries to bring the conversation round to matters of faith – is he ipso facto the most effective and the most apostolic Christian? And if in the society in which we live, with all its complex ideological currents, there are many of our acquaintances – even close acquaintances – with whom we have never yet talked about matters of religion, is this necessarily and in all cases due to the fact that we suppress our Christian belief and fail in our duty to bear witness to it simply from motives of cowardice? Not for one moment, of course, must it be denied that behind these and similar manifestations of modern Christianity many human faults may truly lie concealed: faults of cowardice, anxiety (Angst), untruthfulness, weakness of faith, a falling-off in religious self-commitment, a succumbing to religious relativism etc. It would be naïve and foolish to attempt to dispute this. And it is precisely the Catholics of the so-called civilised sphere of central Europe who would do well to have the truthfulness and honesty to admit this.

[248] These, then, are a few small examples which are intended to serve as indications of the manifestations of modern times which we have in mind. But is everything in these modern manifestations to be ascribed to a cowardly reluctance to confess the faith and bear witness to it? I believe not. What is making itself felt here (even though this is not the only, factor) is that modern man draws a sharper distinction in his attitude to religious, as distinct from profane reality, than was usually the case with men of former ages. Modern man feels the reality of God and of religion in general in a quite radical sense as mystery, as 'inexpressibly' exalted above his world. He is inclined to feel that to speak about it is irreverent and almost indecent. He is acutely aware of how radically different in kind religious reality is from the reality of this profane world in which he lives. That this latter has come to be regarded as in a very radical sense remote from God and 'profane' is to a large extent due to Christianity itself, with its belief in the mere creatureliness of all this is not God. And indeed this must be so because for Christians the realities of this world neither can be

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

nor are so numinous as they are for the devout pagan (who has still continued for a long period to live on in the Christian, and ought so to live on in him, but does not necessarily do so). And because the Christian of today experiences the radical difference between the predicamental and the transcendent, between the world and God, between the profane and the numinous, he can no longer speak in the same unrestricted and unembarrassed way of God and of his own attitude towards religion as he does of the other phenomena which belong to this world. He cannot find it very easy to speak of the 'good God' (Even when he does manage to realise God's absolute personhood in its true sense) as did the men of former ages. He cannot think of God as though he were the sole and supreme head of all beings in the universe, whose plans and ideas were fairly well-known to man, and upon whom man could count to make sure that the world would follow that course which man himself had mapped out as it ought to be. Now he no longer relies upon mere distant hearsay for his knowledge of the immense differences between men's opinions in religious matters, but has experienced them for himself, and in the light of this he is no longer bold enough to find it easy to imagine that he himself is sure of being able to say what he really means in such a way that the difference between his tenets and what other people are aiming at in their ideas is unambiguously clear and certainly the only version that is correct. He recognises difficulties but is still, perhaps, very far from feeling [249] that these need necessarily undermine his ultimate and basic self-commitment to belief, or his readiness to believe, which he bashfully keeps to himself (In this respect modern man is presumably more modest than the representatives of the 'enlightenment' characteristic of the last two centuries of central European civilisation). But these difficulties are such as he cannot really solve, and they inhibit him at any rate from giving free and unrestrained expression to his religious convictions in the presence of others. He feels that today the whole area of religious matters has grown almost unmanageably complex, with its shifts and variations of nomenclature, and the multiplicity of facets, points of view and personal experiences which it has come to include. And this complexity is based on such an accumulation of knowledge and such a proliferation of experiences that it seems impossible within the limited span of one human life ever to catch up with or wholly to comprehend the knowledge and experience of one's fellow. Conversely that fellow himself receives the impression, based on similar grounds, that he is neither understood nor able to make himself understood. Against such a background as this, therefore, it seems useless to embark on any religious discussion.

Modern man has not, by the very nature of his calling, lived over a long period in a milieu which is ideologically homogeneous and therefore favourable to discussions of this sort, so as to have an opportunity gradually to grow accustomed to them; such a milieu as we know, rightly or wrongly, how to create for ourselves. He has not thereby habituated himself to such discussions (and even given these favourable conditions what heart-searchings it often requires to do so!). In fact if modern man is to enter fruitfully into such discussions at all then he must adopt a different approach from that which was taken in former times (and which we still often take today). He must be quiet and reserved in what he says. He must speak sparingly and wait until the climate of discussion is really suitable for such an exchange of ideas as is envisaged. With regard to particular questions of theology he will make it a principle to speak of these only when they are relevant, and when, in the situation of those participating in the discussion, they manifestly do contribute to that view of the whole which must be achieved for such questions to be discussed as they should be at all. The situation of those taking part in the discussion must be one in which they are reduced to astonishment and perplexity by the ultimate mystery of existence which encompasses us. They must have an attitude of basic reverence, for only so can the ultimate forces of life be [250] present. And when such matters are not so much discussed as 'torn to shreds' in contests of words modern man will be silent. In the light of this it is not simply cowardice and timidity in the face of the rational and the conceptually unambiguous that makes men less ready to discuss the rational justifications for belief put forward by apologetics in the 'preambula fidei'. One is justified in receiving the impression that even these can be discussed only when there is hope that one's observations will meet with due understanding and respect, and when the discussion takes place certainly in an atmosphere which is realistic and unemotional, but at the same time with an attitude of interior wonder, in which the whole man is deeply aware of being confronted by his own ultimate responsibility and by the mystery of existence.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This evident change of style in the manner in which we bear witness to the faith is not unjustified, but it must be thought out, explained and distinguished from cowardice and from that state of mind in which the convictions of faith are denied either wholly or in part. It must be purified and freed from false forms of this kind in order that it may remain clear that today as always the Christian is equipped, called, empowered and commanded in duty to confess his faith. Otherwise there is always the danger that the demand itself will be refused because, for want of reflection and due consideration, it will be required of the Christian not only that he shall bear witness to his faith, but that he shall do so in the manner appropriate to former ages, a manner which is today impracticable and unrealistic at least for many, in view of the intellectual and cultural differences between themselves and their predecessors. The result of this may be that from motives of their own interior truthfulness they believe that they can and must refuse the demand of the specifically Christian truthfulness, in other words the decision to uphold the truth of Christianity as the word of salvation for all even in their public lives. We still have much to re-appraise, much to put to the test and to try out in practice along these lines with regard to the way in which Christians should bear witness in the present climate of central Europe by confessing their faith before we can once more move on from the level of mere abstract principles to that in which we can have concrete and effective examples.

But while much might still be said about this witness which is demanded of us with regard to the form which it should take in order to meet the special needs of our own times, there must be no doubt about the actual fact that such witness is demanded of us. All Christians must be witnesses. [251] All Christians must be truthful not merely in general but also in the sense that they really do confess the truth which has been bestowed upon them as the grace of faith.

But in order that this bolder (and more joyfully unrestrained) spirit to confess the faith may grow and develop, care must also be taken to encourage truthfulness and courage in avowing the faith in the communal life within the Church herself, in other words among Catholic Christians. Let us allow opinions to be expressed even when we ourselves find them disquieting. Let us really allow 'public opinion' to have a place in the Church herself, where we are in a position to expand or to restrict the opportunities for expressing such opinions. Certainly there are nonconformists who are such in principle, people whose one principle, which dominates their whole being, is the conviction that they discover the truth when they hold a different opinion from those about them, or from the convictions held by the generality of Catholics in their country, the ecclesiastical authorities etc. But such non-conformism (which is, incidentally, an extremely conformist kind of non-conformism, because it can always claim solidarity with the chronic grousers) must not prevent us from giving genuine and honestly held opinions their due hearing even when they are uncomfortable, from taking honest criticism in good part even when it is directed against the prevailing opinions. Such tolerance towards manifestations of integrity, truthfulness and independence of thought within the Church is never comfortable, and rarely appreciated. It is much easier and more rewarding to be prejudiced in one's ideas, whether one seeks support and confirmation from the faction in power or the opposition, but genuinely decent behaviour – and truthfulness is included in this – has never been the most profitable course, and this applies to communal life in the Church as well. And surely this must be so in the nature of the case even in the Church. For even here worldly values cannot altogether be avoided.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This truthfulness in the communal life of the Church, which is a necessary prior condition for truthfulness in the witness which Christians have to bear outside the Church requires, amongst other things, that our official utterances too shall be genuine and truthful. Now this is not the case if we act as though everything in our teaching and our tenets were always clear, as though we had patent ready-made solutions in stock for any and every problem, as though the only pity was that people did not apply to us for solutions from the first. It is not consistent with such [252] genuine truthfulness when we who belong to the clergy act as though we found it easy to make our weak and cowardly flesh obedient to the commandment of God, as though everything among us was perfectly in order, as though we did not find it necessary to listen to those 'outside' the Church. If in our apologetic for Christianity, whether of the offensive or the defensive kind, we measure ourselves and our opponents by two different standards then this is irreconcilable with the sort of truthfulness of which we are here speaking (and often it is not only pagans who do this, but Christians too). Similarly, if we use unfair methods in controversy, or when we cannot listen to what others say we offend against truthfulness. Even in cases in which the position which we were defending at the beginning of the discussion was true and right, still, when the discussion itself is conducted in a serious spirit, we are still offending against truthfulness if our own opinions in all their breadth and fulness, with all their manifold perspectives and variations of emphasis do not undergo some modification as a result of the discussion. All these and similar matters have something to do with truthfulness, because truthfulness is not only the will to achieve formal accuracy in the propositions one puts forward, but also extends to the actual manner in which the correct proposition is put forward, for this too must be true. And truthfulness extends still further, and requires that man shall adopt a critical attitude towards himself in view of the fact that he is a sinner and knows that he has to appear before the judgment of God without first having been able to judge himself in any really adequate manner. For the rest it must be emphasised once more that truthfulness and criticism must not dispense with prudence in their operation within the Church's interior life. Otherwise we may find ourselves handing over all initiative in areas of controversy (both within and without the Church) to those who seek to gain advantages by being untruthful.

V

In the contemporary scene we should, perhaps, speak also of a fifth form of truthfulness considered as the determination to achieve the truth. This is a strange form, and one that is probably seldom adverted to and still more seldom – if indeed ever – thought of as falling under the general concept of truthfulness. I mean the attitude of love towards, and faith in the hidden truth and the unity inherent in that truth which is in one's [253] fellow man and which underlies all his contradictory opinions, opinions which we cannot ourselves accept. This, therefore, is truthfulness considered as openness and sensitivity to the truth which is in another, which has not yet emerged into his explicit awareness but is still concealed under what may in certain circumstances seem to be the contradiction of it.

What is meant by this may briefly be explained. In the concrete environment of thought in which we live we feel ourselves to be men who are cut off one from another, disunited; men who, in the ultimate interpretations they place upon existence, in the ultimate attitudes on which everything counts, are divided. In earlier ages those who were divided in this way in their ultimate interpretations of life were also divided 'geographically' by the empty spaces which intervened, by political boundaries, social strata, distinctions of milieu etc., to such an extent that these differences of faith did not really constitute a significant factor radically affecting the particular kind of human existence of their times, and thus the individual lived in a milieu which was, from the 'ideological' point of view, homogeneous. Today, however, the position is fundamentally different. From his position among his fellows in the field of his calling and in public life it is brought home to modern man every day that he is the one who 'thinks differently' (from his immediate neighbour). The inevitable result of this is that modern man is exposed to a cruel and frightening burden. In the manner in which he lives his life both interiorly and exteriorly he naturally strives to develop that basic image of how life should be lived which is given to him as a constitutive element of the particular philosophy of life in which he is brought up and of his faith. And he constantly feels himself restricted in this, disowned by his fellows, his position radically called in question by the fact that those about him have a radically different outlook. The consequence of this is that all too many degenerate into a sceptical relativism with regard to all philosophies of life, all metaphysical interpretations, or again merely take as their guide for living the fragmentary remnants of standards still held in common (those of humanitarianism, of decency, of good citizenship etc.). For in the general collapse of any unified picture of the world which was once held in a particular society these have still survived. But let us consider the case of one who is unwilling to adopt either of these attitudes, who recognises that in fact this relativising scepticism of which we have been speaking is itself in its turn a point of view which is open to question, and for this and many other reasons is incapable of providing any effective [254] guide to life; one who experiences that a life based on the fragmentary survivals of the spiritual achievements of earlier ages is not enough, and who implicitly acknowledges to himself that one cannot make any progress along these lines, because otherwise the desiccation of the spiritual element in life will extend still further; one who, on the other hand, has resolved to live uncompromisingly by Christian standards in all their fulness, bravely holding out in a situation which has become spiritually hostile and will certainly remain so for an incalculable period; one who takes this attitude even when it means that from the point of view of an outsider he will be living in a tiny minority, for this is that 'little flock' to which, according to age-old prophecy, it has always been the fate of real and genuine Christianity to be confined. It comes to constitute a strange and exceptional group within society at large. Must this be all that he says to himself – simply that such a situation as this must precisely be endured because it does not actually contradict the real nature of Christianity as the act of living one's faith, or the call which the individual experiences interiorly which is a pure act of grace? Or must he develop another attitude over and above this first one, this second attitude helping him by lightening the burden of responsibility which he bears in isolation before God and his conscience alone, cut off as he is from his fellows and not sharing their convictions? For this second attitude too has its origins precisely in this same faith. I believe that here such a supplementary attitude really is possible and in the long run necessary also, even though it has not yet been sufficiently thought out and developed among Christians.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

To understand this we should remind ourselves first that our faith lays down that God wills the salvation of all, and wills it truly and effectively. In other words he also wills the salvation of those who live all round me in a community that is manifold and varied in its ideological tenets and to a large extent not even Christian at all. The Christian hope, which is orientated towards the Lord, his Cross and his Easter victory, gives the Christian himself the right to accept, and the assurance to hope that this salvific will of God, viewed in its application to the whole of mankind and its history, finds expression not merely in a straightforward offering of salvation on God's part, which is then refused, but does effectively and actually succeed and is victorious. Now if we are not to contradict the norms of Christian faith which lay down that Christianity irrevocably and inalienably imports

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

salvation, this victory cannot be achieved as a [255] concomitant of Christian grace and as a concomitant to the true and genuine faith. It must be a victory of that faith which the Christian confesses and of that grace by which he lives. Now if this victory of the salvific will of God is so far-reaching in its effects, and extends far beyond the spheres in which the Christian faith has, as a matter of history, visibly implanted itself and officially been embraced, and if this victory must still endure precisely as a victory of Christianity itself, then it follows that there must be an anonymous Christianity (It is difficult to find any other description for it that is so succinct and clear), a real Christianity which has so far simply failed to be recognised for what it really is, a Christianity which is already latently present even when it has not yet realised its own nature. What this must mean is something with which we are all familiar under different names. We say that when somebody declares that he does not believe in God it may well be that in spite of this he does believe, and does so in truth, but at a level which is so deep within him that he has not explored it, the level at which he takes a genuine moral decision 'determining the shape of his whole life. We speak of the baptismal desire which is implicitly elicited (even the Holy Office does this). We maintain that it is possible that the light of interior grace which God offers to every man achieves, without any deliberation on the part of the individual, but nevertheless in a real and effective sense, quite simply and without any outward sign, the ultimate orientation of that individual's whole spiritual existence towards the absolute fulness of the life which is interior to God. We also maintain that in cases in which this life is accepted it is possible to speak in a fully theological sense of a supernatural faith in revealed truth such that if it is fulfilled in love for this mystery of existence which silently draws the individual concerned towards itself, it justifies him and in this sense makes him a Christian. This does not mean, however, that the individual himself becomes conscious, in a manner which he could articulate or express, of what Christians explicitly and 'officially' believe, or realises that he is in agreement with this.

What has been said above is only an indication. It is neither intended to be, nor capable of being, anything more than this. But this was necessary by way of paving the way for our understanding of the point which we have now to discuss. In order to alleviate the existential situation of the Christian of our own times, and of the complexities of the society in which he lives with its varied and manifold ideological tenets, it seems that it would be of considerable value to take seriously the possibility of which [256] we have been speaking. The Christian can find it far easier, less restricting and less oppressive to be a Christian if he knows that according to his own Christian faith and his own Christian hope the fact that so many men are not officially Christians is to a large extent to be attributed to outward appearances, to what can be apprehended at the external level, to nomenclature (For in many cases the real existential situation which lies behind this, and which has been accomplished by grace, is quite different). But the recognition of this fact will not make the Christian regard his own personal and explicit avowal of Christianity, precisely as explicitly avowed, any the less important or any the less salvific in its effects. For this in fact constitutes that realisation of himself which is bestowed upon him by grace. It is a realisation of how he himself is related to his own salvation, and how he intends to be related to it, and this state of self-comprehension is, in fact, once more the moment of maturity and fulness in that which does thus achieve its own self-explication. But the Christian can take a less restricted view of the world which is in fact his own. In the light of this he sees men who already honour and adore the God whom they do not know, the God whom he himself consciously venerates. In the light of this he is, at one level, constantly the one who is isolated and cut off from his fellows. This is the level of the historically apprehensible, the level of common parlance, of public avowal, of the 'proclamation' of salvation throughout the social order (which is intended to be such). But at the same time the Christian is no longer the one who is hopelessly isolated at all levels of life. He can see himself to be the one who has already advanced further than his fellows (this advance being due to grace), the one who already knows what he is and what he hopes that others too are. He does not have the impression of saying something that is wholly strange and alien to them when he bears witness to his Christianity in their presence. Rather he feels that he is telling them what they themselves already interiorly are without knowing it.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The actual ability to recognise this anonymous Christianity in one's fellow men not merely as a deduction worked out in the abstract and hypothetically but in the concrete experience of life is something which is developed by practice and cultivated. It is the ability to make the hidden truth that is in one's fellow apparent, in the first instance at least, to one's self; in other words, as I believe, this too is a kind of 'truthfulness', the truthfulness, namely, which consists in being able enough and bold enough to let truth emerge for what it is in itself (and that is still [257] truthfulness). This truthfulness is one which is of inestimable significance for Christians, and above all for the young Christians of today, especially in view of the fact that these young Christians are no longer in the least willing to adopt a certain attitude which has characterised Christian pedagogy and the Christian approach to learning hitherto. This is the attitude of standing aloof, as far as possible, from the world of complex and conflicting ideologies and (even if only in ever more restricted circles) to confine themselves to the homogeneous world of those professing the same faith.

Of course this is only to define the task for the modern Christian. What we have said does nothing to solve either the theoretical or the practical problem of how to give the Christians of today the vision to practise this mysterious kind of truthfulness. If we understood this kind of truthfulness, the truth of Christianity, its intrinsic reality would reveal itself to us far more clearly and unmistakably from the world about us; the world would be far less liable to give the impression of total profanity and de-Christianisation, the impression which we so often receive and which we find painful and testing to our faith.

In the Old Testament truth and truthfulness (faithfulness) are expressed by one and the same word, emet (emuna). This is not merely a sign that the language is still at a relatively primitive stage of development, in which such distinctions have not yet been drawn. It is a manifestation of a quite specific interpretation of being and life which is essential to the revealed religion of the Old and New Testaments. Reality is essentially not the objective status of things which cognitive being is 'set over against' as something independent, alien and separate. Reality in the ultimate sense is present where being is itself totally, and without any break in its continuity. It is of itself something illumined from within. It possesses itself in knowledge and love. Reality is ultimately spirit and person, and in the measure that a given reality is not this, is incapable of realising itself, is not objectified to itself, is not apparent to itself, in the same measure the being of this reality is itself as such weak and lacking in ultimate validity. And in this sense truth, as the givenness of a thing to itself, is an intrinsic element in reality itself, so that a given entity has being and exists to the extent that it realises itself, stands out to itself, discloses to itself the truth that is its own nature. From this point of view, therefore, truthfulness is not, in the first instance, a virtue, a moral prescription which regulates human intercourse, but the connatural projection outwards to others of [258] the truth that is inherent in reality considered as the 'being present' of a thing to itself. Truthfulness is the self-confrontation of a reality in so far as this self-confrontation is faithful and really reproduces this 'being to itself' clearly and luminously, undistorted and really achieved, expressed and accepted.

It is here, then, that truthfulness towards others as well has its source. It imparts to the other person only what the individual himself is. It makes his own unique personality emerge from its hidden background and appear before that other pure and undistorted. This truthfulness is in the first instance the free self-disclosure of one's personal being as rendered present to one's self, made available to others, the conveying of one's own personal truth to others. And for this reason it is true that truth and truthfulness are at basis the same: the act of uttering

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

one's own truth faithfully to others. Truth is in origin not the emergence of any kind of thing, but the self-bestowal of being upon itself. As such it is essentially personal, and truthfulness is the disclosure precisely of this personal being to others in freedom and love.

It should be noticed that such an act of self-disclosure, in which one gives one's personal being to others, is, in the very nature of the one who does disclose himself in this way, always a free act. Furthermore being is not simply and in all circumstances that which is open in itself, but rather that which has to be disclosed, to be bestowed. Thus the nature of truth, and of the inner structure of the act of self-disclosure itself as free, means that truthfulness is always a 'grace' too, a favour, a gift. Now Christianity is nothing else than the one joyful message that the absolute mystery which is personal being in the absolute, spirit and freedom, has willed to be absolute truth and truthfulness, in other words the absolute grace of a triumphant self-disclosure to us too. Hence too all that truthfulness which is required of us is not, in the first instance, a law and a prohibition of lying, but rather the power, bestowed upon us as a free act of grace, to disclose ourselves and (since we are finite beings) thereby precisely to come to ourselves, to confront ourselves in our own truth. For we only experience ourselves as that which we are, that which we can be and that which we will be precisely in that we open ourselves to the All of being, God himself in the act of opening ourselves to others. For man too, therefore, truthfulness is not simply a connatural extension of truth in which he possesses himself, but also an indispensable mode for this discovery of his own truth. In the last analysis every liar denies the truth of his own [259] self most of all. He withholds his own truth from himself because in being untruthful to others and to the outside world he also prevents his own truth from appearing.

Now one who loses his own truth is lost indeed, because one who has lost himself cannot possess God either. But he who finds this truth, he who accepts it in an attitude of truthfulness, lives it and makes it manifest, has God, who is the Truth, and this truth is freedom and eternal life.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[260]

23

PARRESIA (BOLDNESS)

The Virtue that the Christian Needs for the Apostolate

In the last analysis all 'striving for Christian perfection' can consist in nothing else than in love of God and one's neighbour, in the fulfilment of that one greatest commandment. It should be noticed that what is required of us in order to fulfil this commandment is that we shall seek God and our neighbour and not ourselves and our own perfection. This fact alone means that it is not a commandment in the true sense at all. Love of neighbour as expressed in selfless service of him belongs integrally to this task, ancient yet ever new, which is laid upon the Christian. And because of this every Christian has a mission, an apostolate. He may have a very developed and explicit awareness of this or, on the other hand, it may remain at the implicit and hidden level as a quality inherent in the tasks imposed upon him by the necessities of his everyday life. Thus everyone has a specifically Christian task to perform in regard to his neighbour, an 'apostolate', a 'mission'. Now if this applies to every Christian it applies with twofold force to the priest, the ambassador of the faith, and to all others who have a defined and official position and function in furthering the Church's mission. Nowadays one's own native land has become 'mission territory' (although great care has to be taken in how this term is applied). It follows from this that in the contemporary scene the specifically 'missionary' virtues have become the virtues of every Christian who does not forget that he has a mission to his neighbour. Something must be said here concerning one such virtue, because it is one that is often forgotten or overlooked. It is so inconspicuous that it does not really have any distinctive and proper name of its own at all. But precisely for this reason we too often fail to take it sufficiently into account in our Christian living, when we reflect upon the tasks our mission imposes upon us, the difficulties they entail and the holiness which should shine out from them.

[261] 1. In order even gradually to be able to clarify, what is meant we must begin by calling attention to certain specific words in scripture. Thus for instance Paul admonishes us that we must be heralds of the word and preach it even akairos, 'out of season' (2 Tim 4:2). There is a word, then, such that to all appearances – that is viewed from the human standpoint and not from that of God – it must be spoken on an occasion, kairos, which is not right, not the appropriate moment, not the right situation. Paul says that he is not ashamed of the gospel (Rom 1:16), and the very fact that this has to be particularly emphasised implies that this attitude of boldly refusing to be ashamed must be intended as some kind of counter to an interior shrinking, a reluctance to speak out, a feeling that preaching the word or any other kind of 'coming out into the open' with the hidden reality and truth of Christianity into the 'world', which is uninterested and irritated by it, is out of place and inappropriate. Jesus declares that it is not enough merely to believe in him. One must also 'confess' him, and that too 'before men'. Evidently, therefore, he holds not only that belief in him is difficult and is the ultimate act for the spirit and heart of man, but that man has the further and supplementary task of confessing him before men. And this too is something that man can refuse to do. This is not so immediately obvious. For if a man already believes why should he feel that confessing this faith of his before men is a further and supplementary task and a still more difficult one? And if we simply reply to this: It is because the other men who do not believe persecute this faith of his, then the question is not solved but only deferred. For what does this really amount to? Simply that when the Christian makes public profession of his faith before others in this way they react to it not as to some strange opinion which is to be tolerated in another since that is what he seems to want, and so to relegate it to the sphere of everyday experience (as with so many other views and opinions), but as to something so provocative, so inappropriate and so dangerous that it is calculated to arouse contradiction, hatred and mortal enmity. Once more, therefore, the ambassador of the faith must have the courage to do something which is anything but obvious. He must have the courage to proclaim the unpreachable, the gospel which provokes contradiction, to act in a manner which is untimely, akairos.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Thus as presented in the New Testament the act of 'confessing' the faith has the character not merely of an unrestrained declaration of one's own opinion, something which is, in fact, understandable in itself in [262] human society (in other contexts men are, in fact, quite eager when 'they have something to say' or can listen to something), but the character of daring too, to speak the Word of God into a world which is absolutely closed to it, has no comprehension for it, offers it no foothold, to bring light, and threatens to quench it. And therefore the ambassador or messenger of faith has need of a quality which scripture calls 'parresia'. In German we have not, properly speaking, any precise term for what this means in the religious and specifically the Christian context. For here it designates a virtue, but a virtue which is a gift of God, which at once sets us a task and bestows upon us the means to fulfil it. It is all very well to take the dictionary translation 'candour', but this does justice neither to the political nor to the moral overtones which are essentially inherent from the very outset in the Greek term. Nor does this rendering 'candour' express an idea which, in the history of our language and thought, has come to be charged with religious meaning, as the term 'parresia' has as used in the Old Testament (LXX) and the New. For instance we cannot speak of the candour of God. And it is only by straining the term that we can think of it as a quality of prayer or something which makes prayer possible. The term as used among us cannot express the act of standing in God's presence in free and joyful openness, nor can it stand for something which is an essential characteristic of the self-manifestation of Jesus in the world. Hence it is that it is only with difficulty that we can translate this word in contexts in which it stands for an apostolic virtue. For when we use the term 'candour' or some similar term, then we are referring to a virtue which is common to mankind as a whole, if indeed, it is not simply a quite neutral specification of the attitude of unconstrainedness, unembarrassment and ease in self-expression – attitudes, therefore, which do not in the least measure up to the distinctive and specific element in this apostolic virtue. For this virtue is exercised only in preaching, considered as the actualisation of the event in which God himself is revealed to a world enclosed in sin.

2. Thus we propose to put forward certain ideas concerning this virtue as it is in itself. These are only few in number. For the most important factor of all must here remain unexpressed. It is that which provides the proper and true basis for this virtue of the apostle and of his mission, namely the parresia of God and of Christ himself.[1]

[263] The Christian messenger is in a situation to which he does not of himself, i.e. in virtue of his own nature and qualities, belong. He is, in fact, on a 'mission'. He has been 'sent'. Necessarily, therefore, he is intruding upon areas which are not, naturally speaking, his own. He comes to men who are in a very true sense foreign to him. His presence is troublesome to them, and he is troubled in turn. He must in some sense seem like an intruder. With his word, the word that is God's word, he intrudes upon a world which is unwilling to hear it, which is mysteriously hostile to this word, because it is a word which brings to light the hidden contents of the heart, because it goes too far, because it makes too many demands upon man, because it summons him out of the sphere of the comprehensible, because it

[1] For a treatment of this idea which brings out its full depths and significance cf. H. Schlier, T.W.N.T. V, pp. 869-884.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

objectifies and makes explicit things which naturally belong to the horizons of human experience, which are present only in a muted and indirect manner: conscience, guilt, death, judgment and finally the living God with the actual summons which he addresses to men. He who conveys this word to others is one who, by his own faults and by his failures to live up to the word he conveys, continually disowns it. He casts his own shadow over the light which he brings. Even while he brings salvation to others he himself must tremble lest he become a castaway. His own word can sound in his ears like sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. What he utters is in truth the love of God at its deepest and most intimate offered to man at the most interior and immutable level of his being. It is a miracle of love, a grace which is inexpressibly tender and loving, and yet the Christian speaks of it (how could he do otherwise?) as though it were the most humdrum of matters. He handles it as one handles the everyday affairs of one's life as an ordinary member of society. He teaches the children, he gives instructions, he is constantly in danger of confusing the means, namely the well-being of the Church, with the end, namely that God shall be freely loved. That which is nameless he calls by a thousand names, and he is for ever speaking of him of whom he himself says that he 'is ineffable and exalted above all that is and that can be conceived of apart from himself' (First Vatican Council).

Besides this there is a further factor to be considered: that elemental embarrassment which is involved in being a man extends to the soul as well as the body. The priest and every other 'apostle', provided he is a true man (this may easily be something that is inherent in human nature as such) is, of his nature, one who would rather be silent, one who prefers to leave the unutterable unuttered, one whom it troubles to have to speak [264] out and to lay the incomprehensible mystery of his heart open to the public gaze. And further it seems that modern man finds it particularly difficult to make the mystery which cannot be named a subject for discussion. He has come to realise how vast and complex his own world has become, to gain a more and more detailed knowledge of its inner workings and the mystery and complexity of its laws. Hence it becomes increasingly impossible to confuse these with God himself. And because of all this he realises how far the God who really can be called God is from our own earthly experience, how far he is above all the possibilities of human expression. He almost has the impression that it is impious to practise any kind of formal religious exercises, any kind of organised religion. He almost has the feeling that from motives of sheer reverence he cannot give his adherence to those who believe that they have already obtained an insight into the designs of God. Still less can he belong to the official representatives of God who have to help him (God) in order that he can survive in the world at all. Does not all this make it difficult to be an official minister of religion, or to 'come out into the open' with one's Christianity in any other way either? Is it not difficult to make it one's calling to speak of God, the ineffable, difficult even before one encounters the malice of enemies who refuse to hear, before the contradictions have commenced? Does not the very nature of religion itself make it difficult when one has any understanding at all of what this is?

Now the virtue which provides us with strength to bear and overcome these difficulties is the Pauline virtue of parresia. Religion, if it is authentic and true, carries with it in its initial stages, a dumbness which is deathlike in its intensity. Parresia is the strength which enables us to overcome this and to speak out in spite of it. It is that indefinable attitude of courage which enables one to say in one's heart: Credidi propter quod locutus sum. In the silence and solitude of his divinity the Father utters the Word. This becomes flesh and forces its way into the empty void of the world in order to make itself heard in a dimension in which, naturally speaking, the only thing that can be heard of him is silence and nameless mystery. And when the Word took flesh in this way it occasioned immense pain and called for immense endurance. Parresia is simply the virtue which enables us to continue this endurance and bring it to its due consummation. It is because God himself has spoken 'in spite of' hostile dispositions in the world that the Church too has found a voice and utterance in the word of avowal, in the word of praise, in the cry of joy, in the prayer for grace [265] whispered by the weeping suppliant. And now we must go right back to the start, and read once more those passages in scripture which treat of the word that is preached akairos, out of season, of the 'shameless' refusal to be ashamed of the gospel, of confessing God before men, of that special kind of boldness which is called parresia, and which is proper to Christianity alone.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But in order to obtain a deeper, and perhaps a still clearer spiritual insight into the significance of this virtue, which every Christian needs in order to accomplish his mission, we must point out certain consequences which follow from what has already been said.

Anyone who has not had the experience of being forced to speak out when he would really have preferred to keep silence is a mere petty propaganda-monger, one who has no true comprehension of the significance of what he is speaking of – not in any sense a priest or a 'confessing Christian' speaking in the power of the divine virtue of parresia. There are those, on the other hand, who do feel the pain involved in the exercise of this virtue, who sometimes have the feeling, so powerful that it seems to threaten their very lives, that they had better impose silence upon themselves, or at least make mention of God only indirectly and, so to say, by means of an embarrassed silence. But this does not mean that they are any the less called to the priesthood or to the mission in which all Christians are ipso facto summoned to take an active part. It does not mean that they have a weaker missionary vocation than one who finds that the name of God comes easily off his lips. If the difficulties which this virtue entails are experienced less and less, then one must ask one's self whether this really is a sign that one is already speaking by the charisms of the Holy Spirit, with the tongues of angels, and in harmony with the exultations of the heavenly choirs, or whether in reality one only appears to be speaking of God, and his living presence is no longer in one's words at all. But one who deliberately evades the pain which this virtue entails, and who really is silent, one who occupies himself with something else in order not to have to speak of God, such a one as this is no apostle of the incarnate Word of God. He betrays his status as a Christian at its most basic level, the level which is referred to in the passage which runs: 'Do not say, "I am only a youth", for to all to whom I send you you shall go, and whatever I command you you shall speak' (Jer 1:7).

The opinion has been put forward (notably in France) that the 'witness' which the Christian layman has a mission to bear consists simply in [266] (silently) being a Christian. In other words he does not, on this view, need in any sense to be the sort of apostle who speaks out unless he voluntarily accepts a supplementary 'commission' from the Church's authorities. But this is not true. Certainly the layman does not extend his activities beyond the confines of his own natural sphere of life (his family, his natural milieu, the community in which he lives and works, his neighbourhood). This is the sphere to which he naturally belongs, and as a layman he is not called to leave it (at least not in any permanent or definitive sense) in order to fulfil his duty as a Christian. But in this sphere he must also bear witness to his Christian mode of existence by speaking out and making it known in words. And for this he too needs this virtue of parresia, which is so difficult. And it would be true of him too that he would be betraying his status as a Christian if he were to evade the pain which this God-given virtue entails. If he tried to evade the duty of exercising parresia in this sense by keeping silent, by making no attempt whatever to speak of God (maintaining that the parish priests do quite enough in this direction, and are actually paid to do it), then he would be offending against his own mission because it is a duty laid upon every man from his natural position in society to bear witness in words too (with restraint and discretion perhaps, but still precisely with parresia too) to what God has wrought upon him and to the source from which his reserves of strength derive.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It has to be something that people notice in us that we find it difficult to utter the Word of God which God himself has placed upon our lips. For only in this way can this word become credible to others. Only in this way does the content of what we speak retain, even as we speak it, the ring of holiness, the quality of silence which it must carry with it if it is not to be confused with the mere noise of this world. We have to ensure that the true power to speak in this sense does not degenerate into the false, over-facile and Godless loquacity of the mere babbler or the manager of an enterprise, something which no longer conveys God but rather one's self. And for this purpose our speaking of God must always proceed afresh from our sense of mission, from a background of prayerful silence. Anyone who would not rather be silent and who cannot endure the silence of God himself does not speak in the true sense at all. His word is not a word proceeding from that parresia which is a grace and a miracle of God. It belongs, rather, to the busy-ness of men, which makes a noise because it is afraid of the silence of God.

There remains our Christian lot as presented in Mt 10:27 (and, in a [267] form which has been completely altered, in Lk 12:3): 'What I tell you in the dark utter in the light, and what you hear whispered proclaim upon the housetops'. The message we have to utter is one that can only be heard where the light of this world is swallowed up by the divine darkness, and the voice of God comes in a quiet whisper which is not to be found in the noise of many human words. And yet this message must be uttered by us from the roof-tops and the pulpits, in the classrooms and in the factory workshops, in canteens, during factory breaks and on Sunday afternoons after the cinema, finally in the humming of the world's presses (in the manner appropriate to each particular context). The message must be spoken in these contexts in order that God may be present even in them, and in order that men may be made to notice and hear where God quietly utters the Word that is himself. Indeed it is for this purpose that the string of our tongue has already been loosened in baptism (Mk 7:31-37), and not only our ears but our mouths too have been opened in order that we may no longer be dumb servers of dumb idols, but that we may be able to 'confess' by praising God and avowing our faith in him (1 Cor 12:2), strengthened for both of these acts by the virtue of parresia.

We are all the poor servants who must, of their very natures, be silent in God's presence once we realise who we are and who he is. And it is in the light of this that we must understand what it means when we say on our own behalf the prayer of Acts 4:29: 'Grant to thy servants to speak thy word with all boldness (parresia)'. What we are praying for here is that the closing words of Acts, which were spoken of Paul, may be true of all God's servants too, ourselves included: 'He preached the kingdom of God and taught about the Lord Jesus Christ quite openly and unhindered' (Acts 28:31).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[268]

24

THE WORKS OF MERCY AND THEIR REWARD

When one sets out to treat theologically of the rewards of the works of mercy one very quickly finds one's self overtaken by the deepest embarrassment. And it may be that the best reward of all is to be placed in this position of embarrassment.

The problem arises from the fact that when someone exercises compassion towards those who are his equals he very often becomes condescending and enjoys this attitude of condescension. At least this very often seems to be the case. One of the etymological roots of the Old Testament concept of compassion concerns this. Compassion is conceived of as a 'stooping down'. And the other root (envisaging parental or mother love) seems not wholly to disagree with the first. But this is terrible. Who wants to be treated condescendingly? Does not the recipient of such charity not seem to be deprived of his basic dignity – the dignity of the poor and the suffering, the greatness of whom appears precisely in their lowly state? Of course it might immediately be objected in response to these apprehensions that all this makes no difference. The hungry man who is filled, the sick man who is healed by the charity of another – these will not spend much time in asking whether the charity which brought them succour was the outcome of pride, self-assurance or condescension. But even if we allow this to be the case – and even so does not the recipient of alms often feel himself mortally wounded in his personal dignity even as he eagerly grasps for these alms? – it would nevertheless still be possible to maintain that this alien kind of charity should be done away with in favour of an approach based on justice, with all the necessary and reasonable means of applying this, in which all are placed on an equal footing, an approach in which everyone is accorded his due rights and so everyone is helped. This would, in effect, circumvent the situation in which one man has to 'condescend' to the need [269] of another, feeling compassion for him from his own position of material security and the abundance of his resources whether interior or exterior. Has not wounded human dignity often enough explained furiously, 'I want not alms but my rights!' Thus it could be said that true compassion must find a way of doing away with itself in order that that poison which is inherent in its own nature, namely pride, may disappear. And let us not be too ready or too quick to reply that compassion is the practical sympathy of the poor and the suffering for the poor and suffering, and therefore far from all self-assured pride or condescension. For we have to recognise, however regretfully, the obvious fact that the poor cannot make the poor rich. He who is really in a state of despair himself cannot truly console another. Such as these can do nothing effective to answer the other's need. Was not the doctrine of the Stoa and the Diatribe right in assigning pity and charity to the list of vices? Is there any other way of helping than turning one's face away as one comes to the help of another, and doing so in such a way that one is manifestly only giving him his due? Is there any other way of helping than by setting out in a reasonable and practical way to give what is needful as something to which the recipient himself, and not the giver, has a legitimate claim? Is the genuinely charitable man not one who feels guilty in the presence of the other, and feels that the 'resources' (and this means more than merely money) on which he draws in order to help that other are so much ill-gotten gains? When we follow the words of scripture in saying that God is compassionate, and we, as creatures and children, live by his mysterious compassion, then this simply raises the same tormenting question in a still sharper form. Is it not easy to be compassionate from the pure fulness of glory and blessing which belongs to God alone? To bestow when one loses nothing thereby? To forgive when what is forgiven could not have done any injury to God? To be patient towards those imprisoned in time from the position of eternity, which no time affects? Is not God precisely the prototype of a kind of compassion which cannot he ours because it humiliates him whom it pretends to raise?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

And yet the message of the gospel does preach that love which stoops down to poverty, a love which, unlike Eros, does not catch fire from the beauty of the beloved, but loves him out of compassion although, or because he is poor, lowly and nothing. The condescension involved in such love may be terrible, but so too is the attitude of mind which refuses to 'receive anything in charity', the claim to be able to help one's self – this [270] is a still more terrible pride. Are not both kinds of pride together at one in their spirit of mortal enmity, by which giver and recipient are divided, and do not both together represent the one single state of need of sinful creaturehood? Who can give without showing himself proud in the very act of giving? Who can receive without losing his dignity in the very act of receiving, without having his resentment kindled?

It is quite evident that there is only one who can give in such a way that in doing so he does not seem to be 'graciously' condescending. It is he who is conscious that he himself and his gift are continually being given and loaned to him by another in order that they may be handed on; one, therefore, who never for one moment loses sight of the fact that he himself is the subject of charity in the most basic, absolute and all-encompassing sense, so that it is not that which is his own which he gives to others but that which he has received. And he gives it as something which he has received, and which he must project further beyond himself because it was not given to him in the first place in order that he could retain it for his own use. A man can only be charitable, therefore, without at the same time becoming frightful, when and to the extent that he is conscious of being himself the object of compassionate love, and to the extent that he accepts himself as such, when he gives in virtue of the fact that he himself is receiving love. Only he who is loved with the love of Agape can be charitable in a spirit of Agape. Only he who has attained to this attitude of humility which consists, once more, in receiving his own self as a gift of love from God, only he who makes this humility the basic fact of his whole existence will avoid becoming proud in the exercise of his charity. Only in this way can he practise charity, and in the very act of doing so reveal not his self-assurance and his riches, but his own poverty, from which the other can allow himself to be given what he needs. And when he who is doing a work of charity looks upon him whom he is helping he sees in him the reflection of his own poverty and need. He is one with him in a spirit of brotherhood, in which all the poor and all the needy have their wants supplied from one and the same fulness, and so he receives from his brother more than he gives: a new insight into his own emptiness. For it is only in this insight that he can avoid losing his own riches, which he has received from the hand of another. Simul dives at pauper.

But in that case are we not all the subjects of that condescending charity which we call the love of God? Do we not, in that case, simply hand on the humiliating gift which has itself put us in a position to be [271] charitable? And is not the result of this that this attitude of charitableness, which has produced and continues to produce its own acts of charity, does not heal but simply carries the process of destruction further? And if the source and origin of all reality and all goodness, that which is present in our innermost being, yet at the same time immeasurably exalted above us (setting an infinite distance between itself and us) is called God, can we then speak in this way? Does he too humiliate even as he gives? Does he bring about the unfathomable pain of nothingness when it is brought face to face with itself and realises itself for what it is? Does he do this by the very act of supplying the immediate need? Or is it rather that when he bestows his grace on man, provided it is really accepted, it is always accompanied by that miraculous love for himself in which one can accept the gift and still not be humiliated precisely because the blessing one receives exceeds the riches and glory of him who gives? Is it not rather that one can receive gifts from this giver because in the gift he gives himself as well? Truly, if in bestowing the gift of compassion one can and does give one's self too, handing one's self over, then no offence is done to him on whom the gift is bestowed. But can we do this in contexts in which it is a question of charity, which can only be expressed in the giving of gifts, rather than of love, which gives itself and by that very fact sets itself and the loving subject free? And further, may it not be that in relation to God it is the absolute sin of sins not to allow gifts to be bestowed upon one? Do we not inevitably here pass from the realm of mere knowledge which is still uncommitted to any particular course of action to that precisely of act, the act namely of love in its receptive aspect, which has its own light in itself and nothing apart from itself?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But there is another answer too to the question of God's act of bestowing, in which he does not destroy by the very fact of willing to give. It is something that can only be expressed with stammering and hesitation. But are we to be silent about it merely because what it expresses seems the most improbable answer of all? God himself has assumed a creaturely status, and made it his own, and has thereby himself endured our state of need. He gave himself to our nothingness, assuming it as his own fate, and therefore he is in a position not to look down upon us or to be condescending when he bestows his favours upon us. In fact he has identified himself with the poor in their tears, their hunger and their death. This may sound like a myth which is no longer applicable to the contemporary scene. But must we not regard the situation in this light: On the one hand [272] we have the absolute fulness, and on the other ourselves, our emptiness and nothingness. Now the fulness creates the empty and, moreover, creates them in a meaningful way (How could it be otherwise when it really is the fulness of light and meaning and goodness?). And if this is the case, then the fulness makes itself responsible for the nothingness. The fulness that is God has committed itself in such a way that it is no longer 'able' to repel the nothingness, to set it at an infinite distance from itself and so to demonstrate the triumph of its own untouchability. It is no longer in a position to thrust the nothingness away from itself and thereby to condemn it to the absolute pain of a wound that is constantly open and never healed. Now that it has committed itself as a free act of love it is under a certain 'compulsion' in virtue of that love to take upon itself the burden of the nothingness. Moreover by accepting creaturehood in this act of absolute self-bestowal God has not only penetrated to the innermost depths of man's being (in the act which we call grace), but actually 'appears' in the concrete dimension of history, the dimension in which alone we find ourselves. And this is what we mean by saying that God has achieved his epiphany in the flesh of that man who is the Son of the Father. Furthermore if modern man finds nothing illogical in pantheism or panentheism, then he has no right to relegate to the realm of myth that free act by which God bestows himself upon the creature in grace and in the incarnation of his Son, which gives the world a share in God's own life. But we have almost lost the thread of our argument. All that we mean to say here is that on the Christian understanding of existence even God in his act of compassion humbles himself, empties himself and bestows himself upon the one to whom he gives gifts from his fulness; that even God encounters himself in the creaturehood he mercifully accepts, sees himself there as a compassionate man who sees his own need in the beggar whom he succours. For the Word has become flesh, has become the Man of Sorrows and the crucified one.

But the most sublime miracle of human compassion is this: He who is really compassionate loses himself, identifies himself with his brother in his need, dares to commit himself to the unknown. His freedom achieves its ultimate act of daring, that of abandoning himself. And then it can be said of such a one (even when it is only the Christian that says this): Many a man has already encountered Christ without knowing that the one with whom he was in contact was the one whose life and death had achieved for him a destiny of blessing and redemption; that by the boldness [273] of his compassion for others he had, so to say, won a place for himself in this life and death of Christ; that he was encountering the one

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

whom the Christians rightly call Jesus of Nazareth. Freedom as exercised in the creature always entails a certain boldness in committing ourselves to those unknown and incalculable factors which, whether we recognise it or not, lie concealed within that course which is visible to us and upon which we decide. Factors which are totally unperceived or absolutely other cannot be taken into our calculations when we make our free decisions, for the object of these must necessarily be that which is defined and limited. But because something is unexpressed and unformulated it does not necessarily follow that it belongs to this category of the totally unperceived and unintended. Now the grace of God and Christ are present in everything as the mysterious essence of every reality which can be the object of our choice. And for this reason it is not so easy either to reach out to receive something from another or to bestow something upon another without thereby having, in some way or other, to do with God and Christ. Let us therefore take the case of one who, even when there is no question whatever of any explicit verbal revelation, accepts the poverty of his own existence as something bestowed upon him (that in itself is not so easy!); one who receives and gives charity in patient silence, or better in faith, hope and love (whatever names he may give to these basic attitudes and motivations). In doing this he accepts his own human nature precisely as that mystery which lies buried in, and at the same time leads on to the further mystery of eternal love, the mystery that carries life with it even in the womb of death. Such a one as this gives his assent to something in such a way that it is equivalent to entrusting himself to the immeasurable and the incalculable. For in fact God has filled this situation with the immeasurable and the incalculable, that is with his own self. The Word has become flesh. Such a man as this is, in fact, without realising it, giving his assent to Christ himself, for he who lets himself go and takes the plunge falls into depths which are there in objective fact, and not merely because he himself has imagined them. He who accepts without reserve the humanity which belongs to himself and his brother (something which is, indeed inexpressibly difficult so that the point at which we really do achieve it in fact remains obscure) has thereby accepted the Son of Man, because God has accepted man in him. When scripture states that he who loves his neighbour fulfils the law then this is the ultimate truth, that which is true in virtue of the fact that God himself has become this neighbour. [274] Thus every time we accept and love our neighbour we ipso facto accept and love in him him who is at once nearest to, and most remote from us. In other words in surrendering ourselves to, and bestowing ourselves upon our brother we ourselves receive a still greater gift: the fulness upon fulness of our compassionate God, and in this himself for his own glory.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[275]

25

PROVING ONESELF IN TIME OF SICKNESS

The Question Which Sickness Raises for Man as a Whole

We shall be attempting here to develop only one single line of thought, that namely concerning the unity, the wholeness of man and the bearing which sickness has upon this.

Christian theology and philosophy recognise the unity and the wholeness of man. Naturally when we Christians assert that man consists of body and soul we are quite right. Indeed a sick man could say with justice that he experiences this duality in his own being only too clearly. But for all this man, that is to say that objective entity with which each of us is directly confronted as a matter of his own personal experience, is originally one, one with a unity which is not the mere outcome or result of a chance combination of two prior entities. It follows from this that what we experience as soul is in reality our own being which is objectively speaking a single and whole entity as viewed from within. And what we call our body is ultimately this same entity in its oneness and wholeness as experienced from without. This is not to deny that this being of ours in its oneness and wholeness, which we are faced with in our concrete living experience, has not behind and beyond this experience two metaempirical or metaphysical elements in it such that the distinction between them cannot be obliterated and they cannot be identified one with the other. But the objective reality which we encounter directly when we apprehend ourselves as a matter of authentic experience is always the whole and single entity, always man in his oneness. In apprehending this single objective reality that is ourselves we do not always penetrate to the same level of reality in it. But it is no less true that in apprehending it we never apprehend merely one constituent element in this whole in such a way that it does not necessarily bring the other constituent element to our awareness as well.

It is not possible at this point to describe the various approaches which Christian theologians and philosophers have devised in order to give intelligible [276] expression to this basic unity of man, or the various attempts which have been made to express this, without falling into the errors of materialism on the one hand, which seeks to deny and existence of the soul as a distinct principle, or into those of an abstract and overspiritualised approach on the other, which tends to deny the reality of the body. But whatever the differences in approach may be, for Christian theologians and philosophers the body is neither the prison of the soul nor a mere container for it, but rather an integral element in man as a unity. Similarly the soul is not a thing which controls the body rather as an operator controls a machine, but this too is rather an integral element in man as an unity which, as one might express it, only achieves its true identity in virtue of the fact that it is itself embodied, and has a body belonging to it, complementing the body so as to constitute the true spiritual reality. Body is not something added on to the soul. Rather it is a concretisation of it, the projection of soul as basic life-force into an already existing sphere of space and time. Thus in a certain sense it is that in the soul which causes it to exist in that concrete dimension of space and time in which it comes (figuratively speaking) to its due fulness and flowering.

For this reason when the Christian intends to confess that in which he believes the final perfection of the whole man to consist he speaks of the resurrection of the flesh, and for the same reason we recognise that we are redeemed through the physical death of the Lord, through his Blood, precisely because the act of obedience and love performed by the Lord in its inconceivable sublimity could only really be achieved in and through what became of the physical side of his nature, his flesh. And for the same reason in its further projections too, in

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

its application to our own soul, salvation history becomes intelligible, acquires a body, in a human word, in the community of the Church as a visible historical entity, in the gestures of the sacraments which touch the body.

What is the significance of all this for sickness and for those who suffer it? We have seen that the man whom we experience in ourselves and whom we name according to our experience is not a compositum made up from body and soul as from two separate pre-existing entities, but is rather a being who is completely one and whole right from the origins and prior to any such distinction, so that any account we can give of body and soul in man presupposes this prior unity of his as something that is already given. Now it is in accordance with this that on the Christian interpretation [277] when an event such as sickness befalls man it always affects him as a whole, as a single entity, one in which body and soul can indeed be conceptually distinguished, yet the unity of which is objectively speaking indissoluble.

Again the experience of so-called physical sickness contains (even though one can often only understand this with difficulty) a statement concerning the sick man as a person who is spiritual and free, a statement about the tasks which his own sickness imposes upon him whether he has already managed to fulfil these or has failed to measure up to them: tasks of courage, of honesty with himself of patience, the task of turning the experience to good account in the religious sense, finally the task of integrating this intervention from without which we call sickness into the single overall meaning which a man has to find in his own existence, a task at which he may already either have succeeded or failed. By the time one becomes aware of sickness in one's self as an objective fact one has already taken up a definite attitude towards it, and this taking up of an attitude is an integral element in the sickness itself.

Admittedly – and in considering the indissoluble unity to be found both in man himself and in his sickness this is the obverse side of the coin – there is no stage in sickness or aspect of it in which man's awareness of himself is confined solely to the spiritual side of his being, or to the level of personality. Something which seems to belong purely to the realm of the spirit and the mind when we are ill can in fact be something extremely physical, something which does not belong to the level of personality at all, but has impinged upon us from without. When a sick man is suffering from the extremes of depression and even despair this may be not so much the expression of his basic attitude as a person but rather a symptom of the external affliction as this impinges upon his personhood, the reflection of something external and alien to his real personality. And it may be that in the same man who seems to be in such a distressed state spiritually speaking what seems to be merely physical and material in his power of resistance, the hold he keeps on life, is in fact to a large extent only the embodiment of a spirit that is fundamentally sound, at one with itself and also with that which has been imposed upon it because it is at peace with God.

It can also be the case that the body has more to tell us about the spirit and the spirit more about the body than either can tell us about itself. Our concrete experience of sickness is never such that we are in a position [278] unequivocally to distinguish between the spirit and the body as two completely separate compartments. We can never say with certainty 'This factor has come upon me from without and is my lot which I must accept and bear. That factor, on the other hand, in the sickness I am suffering from is something intrinsic to myself, something which is the outcome of, my own free action, for which I myself bear the responsibility'. It is, of course, true that a diagnosis which distinguishes between the physical and the spiritual factors in an illness is, provided it is prudently conducted, quite legitimate, and, indeed, necessary from a therapeutic point of view. But however true this may be, when it comes to the ultimate judgment, we can never have any absolute certainty as to which of the various symptoms from which the sick man suffers are to be ascribed to the affliction visited upon him ab externo, and which are the outcome of his own free acts as a person.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now all this means that what is true of man in general applies in a special and heightened sense to the sick man: he is made aware of experiencing himself yet at the same time the ultimate significance of this experience remains obscure to him. Man experiences himself as mystery, as a question to which he has no answer. He experiences his own existence as obscure and almost inexplicable not because it is lacking in objective reality, because there is nothing real behind the experience, but because the depths of being in this self which he experiences exceeds his powers of penetration.

But if man experiences himself as mystery, if he accepts this mystery silence and is submissive enough to accord its full value precisely to in his experience of himself which is too much for him to question, if accepts this question to which he can find no answer not as something which is devoid of meaning and dark, but rather as a light which is too blinding for his eyes, a light which only the eyes of another, of him whom we call God, are strong enough to look upon, then the sick man is at one with God. For he has submitted himself to God, to him to whose charge the indivisible unity of action and passion, the lot that is sent us and the acts which proceed from ourselves as free beings, must remain committed in order that we can come to terms with our sickness even when it remains a mystery.

In sickness man is brought face to face with himself in a particularly uncompromising way. He achieves a state of isolation with himself. And yet he does not know exactly what this state is into which he has fallen, [279] whether he is to regard himself as the controller or the controlled. But he does become aware of this: that that which is under his own control and which he decides upon for himself has, in its final outcome, to be decided for him by another, and that which he recognises as his own act of control and decision is something which in his sickness he experiences as subject, once more, to the silent and more remote control of another, which presides over his own controlling act.

Sickness sharpens a man's awareness of both factors in his life, both that he is in control and that at the same time he is subject to control from without. But he must accept that these are two distinct aspects of what is ultimately one and the same situation, namely the state of being ill, just as body and soul are two distinct elements in the single entity that is man himself, and just as an openness to outside influence and the power to direct himself are intrinsic to his own nature. And if he does this, if he accepts his sickness as a single reality involving both action and passion but ultimately a mystery beyond our own personal control, then both the sick man himself and his sickness are in God's hands. Then the sickness acquires a redemptive value.

Patience

In offering these few brief considerations on the time of sickness I should like to say something about patience. The relevance and appropriateness of this to the situation of the sick will surely be apparent to all. At the same time, however, we should not be too ready to discourse about the sick and the patience they should exercise, for this is not a subject on which the healthy should have much to say.

As soon as the subject of 'patience' is introduced one is immediately reminded of the opening words with which Cyprian of Carthage introduced his treatise on patience seventeen hundred years ago, to the effect that the listeners must already have what the speaker is trying to recommend to them, namely patience, for without this he would not have any listeners at all. And in fact, if one were totally devoid of patience in any sense, then one would never be able to acquire it either, because the very act of acquiring it in itself entails the exercise of patience over a long period. Some degree of patience, therefore, must be numbered among the basic attitudes of man, one that is deeply rooted in his nature. The reason for this is that it must, to a certain extent, support itself. It must already be there in order that it may be summoned up. It must be [280] ready to hand in order that the higher degrees of it may be sought after.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Patience derives from something which is fundamental to the nature of man as such, namely that he is both a person endowed with spirit and simultaneously a being subject to the limitations of time. Beings that are of their nature eternal have no need of patience. They have no further perfection to achieve beyond their present state. They do not look for anything further because the sheer eternity with which they are endowed means that their natures are already in the state of their due fulness and perfection. Again beings which are non-spiritual do not need patience because their consciousness is always limited to the present moment, and precisely in virtue of this fact they know nothing of continuous change as such, of the past and future as these affect them, even though they themselves are constantly undergoing a process of development and change.

But we are beings who are both endowed with knowledge and subject to time. We carry our past with us, and in our cognitive faculties we already reach out for that which has still to come in the future. We actually and consciously live through the process of change to which we ourselves are subject. The interplay of past and future acquires reality as our experience. Not only are we unable to hold back the process of transition and change, we cannot even conceal from ourselves our own inability to do this. Our existence is governed by a single and uninterrupted process of change. We are empowered to see this existence of ours as a whole and to recognise as a law of its very nature that it must constantly press on to further developments. To recognise and accept this fact is what we might call ‘existential’ patience, patience at the existential level. We patiently accept the fact that our existence is subject to change in this way, and yet that it retains its unity throughout the process of change. But the very fact that we are this kind of being and cannot avoid being so, that we have this kind of nature and cannot escape from it – this in itself, once more, presents us with a task to accomplish, one in which it is possible for us to fail; something which we must do for ourselves, exercising courage and faithfulness, being consciously and deliberately true to our own nature in order to achieve it. For a person endowed with, freedom and with spiritual faculties has in his make-up factors which are given, inevitable and inescapable, and at the same time other factors which are mysterious and unpredictable. It is this that sets him the task of exercising his freedom responsibly.

[281] Man, therefore, must freely and consciously come to terms with this special quality in his own nature. He must recognise and accept himself as a being subject to constant and purposive change, and at the same time endowed with cognition. He must not suppose that he is able to interrupt this change, must neither attempt to hold himself back at the stage which he has already achieved, nor attempt prematurely to achieve a stage which still awaits him in the future. In other words he must patiently accept the change to which his existence is subject for what it is, and recognise that it has a meaning and is directed towards a goal. Only then can he be said to be patient with this existential patience of which we have been speaking.

The point to be realised is this: What man has to recognise and accept with this elemental kind of patience is not simply those factors arising here and there in his life which are disagreeable, and which seem to him to be part of a meaningless lot imposed upon him from without. What he has to tolerate and endure with patience at its deepest and most elemental level is rather himself – himself considered as one who is on the way to some future goal, one who may neither stop and remain where he is, nor suppose that he is journeying into an empty and indeterminate void without any ultimate point of arrival. Our impatience with everyday vexations is simply a sign of the fact that at a deeper level of our life we have not succeeded in freely attaining to the virtue of this existential patience and making it our own.

There are those who seek to cling on to the circumstances of the present moment with its

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

pleasures, its successes, its seeming self-sufficiency even though all these are, of their nature, precisely transient and fleeting; those who cannot let go of what belongs to yesterday until what belongs to tomorrow has already been proved to be harmless and reassuring; those who cannot freely enter into new situations which seem to be more arduous or to hold out less promise, who cannot entrust themselves to the darkness or to that which is under the control of another; those who take fright at the silent power which presides over and controls our lives, and which is God, even though he alone knows and decides where this transitory existence of ours began and where it will end. Such as these are incapable of attaining for themselves this virtue of existential patience. They betray the fact that they do not possess this virtue by the impatience which they exhibit in their daily circumstances, and when they meet with the shortcomings, the pains and toils which belong to human life even at its most commonplace and everyday.

[282] On the basis of this too we can understand why sickness above all and pre-eminently should be the situation in which the genuineness of patience is put to the test and proved. For in sickness a still higher degree is demanded of us of that patience which we have to exercise in any case in our everyday lives. And hence it is a situation which really reveals whether we possess this virtue of existential patience or not, or, to put it more modestly and more accurately, whether we have the will to possess it.

It might be supposed that sickness is a pause, an interlude that temporarily suspends the process of change in our human lives, one in which nothing happens, in which one is condemned to a sort of suspended animation, in which one becomes feeble and poor, and so that sickness is a kind of suffering which should not exist, so that the most that can be said is that we must painfully reconcile ourselves to it in order to prevent it from being even worse. But the process of change and progress in human existence is carried further precisely in sickness itself. Sickness takes us out of that state which we had regarded as stable and constant, out of a life which had seemed so full and fulfilling, so unvaryingly right for us, and therefore fixed and unchanging, out of our work, which had acted as an opiate masking our secret existential Angst, out of the business of everyday, out of the state of health which we had taken for granted. In sickness we are carried beyond all this into a state which is unmistakably transitory and not enduring, a state of pain and enfeeblement in which we are manifestly no longer in control, but rather at the mercy of unknown and alien forces. In this sense the real process of change and transition in human existence is accelerated in sickness. And once we have been forced out in this way from a state which only seemed to be fixed and stable, the question presents itself insistently and in a manner which cannot be denied of whether this is a sign that our existence is meaningless and destined soon to collapse into a void of nothingness, or rather a sign that it is being controlled and directed towards an ultimate goal of blessedness. Thus in sickness we are still more inescapably faced with the question of whether or not we do possess the virtue of existential patience.

Patience, therefore, is a quality that is inherent in the very nature of human existence. Now when man finds himself summoned by this to exercise patience freely and consciously as a virtue he can, of course respond by taking refuge in doubt, and this doubt can in its turn be [283] disguised as an optimism that is over-facile and out of place. Another way in which he can evade the question is simply to employ the resources of chemistry and drugs to suppress it and silence it in his heart. But to the question of how to exercise and acquire this virtue of patience as the outcome of a consoling and strengthening faith both of these answers would be false. Impatience in sickness is tantamount to admitting and disclosing the fact that one is deficient in that deeper existential kind of patience in which one keeps one's eyes fixed trustfully upon the underlying unity which persists throughout all the process of change in one's life; in which one recognises that this underlying unity points one on to the still deeper and more mysterious fact that that life is being directed and controlled by a power beyond

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

one's comprehension, a power that one accepts precisely in its incomprehensibility as loving and benevolent, and that one calls God.

Of course impatience in the sick may simply be due to a nervous condition without being in the least a manifestation of the basic attitude of the sick person's innermost heart. And no-one can say exactly which of these two conditions is making itself felt in the painful restlessness of the sick at any given point, or how far such restlessness is due to either condition. Not even the sick person himself can say unequivocally whether his impatience is to be taken as a sign of the former condition or of the latter. Our patience or impatience too is something which, in the last analysis, only God can judge. But for all this there is one thing that we can and must do: we must examine our consciences with regard to the impatience which manifests itself on the surface of our everyday lives during sickness, and see from this what sort of patience in the truest and deepest sense we have managed to achieve. We must recognise that we are called in a special sense to this elemental kind of patience, and must be responsive to this call. It is a patience that takes the form of a certain gentleness and quietness of attitude (and so of holiness too: for it is the outcome of grace) in recognising and reconciling ourselves to the constant change and transition to which we are subject, and which runs as a single uninterrupted process beneath the surface of our lives. We must submit trustfully and without any clinging to the past to this process of transition, in which our lives are carried gently yet relentlessly onwards to that final goal in which their ultimate consummation can be attained. For provided this existential patience has been transformed into the virtue of patience, i.e. into a conscious and deliberate acceptance of, and submission to this [284] process of change and transition in a spirit of faith and love this can bring us the fulness of blessing in which our ultimate perfection consists.

Man has to learn freely to accept himself as a creature of God in his eternity, a creature which is at once subject to time and endowed with self-knowledge, and which therefore has to direct itself towards its own due consummation through a process of transition in time. To achieve this without either clinging on to the present or succumbing to anxiety (Angst) about the future – that is what it means to turn existential patience into a consciously exercised virtue of patience. Patience in our everyday affairs and patience in time of sickness have to be practised and so to bear witness to the fact that we have patience at this deeper and more elemental level within us too. The former kind of patience has to be nourished and strengthened by the latter, and so to prove that it is authentic and true.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[285]

26

ON CHRISTIAN DYING

The death of Christ is not simply an event of the past. On the contrary it is, as all Christendom believes, an event which, even though in the external and superficial sense it belongs to the past, still has an eternal validity in God's sight. For it is that unique occurrence in the history of mankind for the sake of which God in his eternity has once and for all determined to keep mankind for ever enfolded in his compassion and love. But the Christian has to think of this death of Christ in such a way that he reverently and solemnly accepts its enduring validity, and by faith makes its redemptive power effective in our lives also. And in order to do this, and in order really to understand what the message of this death is meant to convey to him he must strive to gain an understanding of the nature of death in general. Of course he can learn something of the meaning of death in general precisely from this message of the death of Christ. But however true this may be, still, in order to have any real understanding of what it means to say 'At that point one died for all' he has to bring to bear on the question an idea of death which is as vivid and as fully developed as possible.

In what we shall be saying about death here we shall be taking it not in the strictly biological or physiological sense of the term, but rather in that sense which it bears in the context of the Christian understanding of human existence. This is not because the latter is in contradiction to the former, but rather because precisely as person endowed with freedom and with spiritual powers man is more than a biological 'case'. The purely biological aspects of death, those, roughly speaking, which fall within the field of medicine, constitute only one element in a broader and more comprehensive whole, and it is with this broader field that theology is concerned because it has to view man as a person endowed with spirit and therefore responsible, a being which has an eternal validity; for under this aspect too death comes as the supremely decisive event in man's history.

[286] The primary factor to which the Christian understanding of death directs our attention is the universality of death. This first point seems platitudinous, and simply to reiterate a fact recognised by all as a matter of natural and common experience. However there is more to it than this. The message of faith on this point is actually addressed, in the first instance to each one of us as individuals as a truth which expresses the ultimate significance of the existence of each one of us taken as a whole, a truth which we must accept and opt for as an act of our own personal freedom. Viewed in this light this initial point is not so self-evident. Certainly we are aware that 'one' has to die. But this is far from implying that 'I' personally have really understood that I have to die, that I myself am already on the way to this death, that all my life through I am advancing inexorably and undeviatingly towards this moment of my death. It is far from implying that I constantly take the recognition of this fact as my starting-point in directing the course of my life, that I never suppress it and never act as though I myself were not already a dying man. But it is this that the message of faith concerning the universality of death is intended to convey to me first and foremost as the most basic truth of my personal life. And further, if this assertion of the universality of death were based, even from the Christian point of view, merely upon the fact that at the biological and physiological level all previous experience bears it out, then indeed it might be possible to regard it as a principle which has only been valid up to the present, but which can now be abrogated. On this view it would have the same degree of validity as the statement that 'Many die of the pestilence', a statement which was indeed true formerly, but which is not so now. It might even be possible to imagine that one day medicine will actually find a way of doing away

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

with the 'unpleasantness' (as it has been called) of having to die on the grounds that strictly speaking biologists are unable to explain why a cell or a group of cells should not continue to survive indefinitely.

But in contrast to this the Christian assertion of the necessity of death has an absolute validity. This is because it is based not merely upon biological considerations, but on human nature as a whole. There is a factor in man, in his very nature and in the way in which he was originally fashioned, which makes it impossible for him ever to escape from or do away with the necessity of dying, that makes it absolutely certain that he will always die. Death is not merely something that is 'appropriate' to man in the sense that it is appropriate to a precious artefact not to be [287] broken because to break it would be an outrage to its very nature and the purpose for which it was designed. On the contrary man is subject to death as a necessity of his innermost nature. It is on deeper grounds than merely biological ones that human nature inherently and inexorably tends towards death as its inevitable goal.

The deepest and most ultimate reason for the connection with and orientation to death which is most intimately inherent in man, which makes him mortal and in virtue of this fact renders all men now and for ever subject to death in the truest sense, is the freedom of the spirit. It is this, ultimately speaking, that makes man mortal, and mortality in the biological sense is only the manifestation and the realisation in the concrete of this mortality, which has its origin and basis in the freedom with which man is endowed as spiritual. How then can this be the case? Freedom is not the power constantly to change one's course of action, but rather the power to decide that which is to be final and definitive in one's life, that which cannot be superseded or replaced, the power to bring into being from one's own resources that which must be, and must not pass away, the summons to a decision that is irrevocable. If freedom were capable of achieving only that which could subsequently be abolished by a further free decision, then freedom would be nothing more than power over that which is purely neutral and indecisive, that which is always open to subsequent revision, a miserable sort of freedom, condemned, as it were, to proceed in futile circles without any final resting place, ultimately meaningless. If, therefore, man is personal freedom, then it follows that he is one who uses the resources of his own innermost nature to form himself by his own free act, for by the exercise of this freedom of his he can definitively determine the shape of his life as a whole, and decide what his ultimate end is to be, the ultimate realisation of his own nature, beyond all possibility of revision.

Now the physical side of man's nature, in which he actively works out the shape of his life as person and brings it to its consummation, is so constituted that it sets him in the dimension of that which is constantly open to further development. It follows from this that while it can be the dimension in which freedom is exercised in fieri, it cannot be that in which the fulness of freedom is achieved, the dimension of that consummation to which freedom finally and definitively attains. Freedom enters into the dimension of becoming and of openness to further development only in order to achieve its own consummation. To this extent it is exercised at [288] this physical level of man's being only in order to pass beyond it and transcend it, and so to attain to its definitive goal. The free man is willing to accept the limitations of mortality only in order that the exercise of his freedom on this plane may enable him to attain to that true immortality which lies beyond, and which consists not in an unending evolution in time but in the achieved finality of eternity itself – in that, therefore, which is beyond time.

At its deepest level the exercise of free decision bears upon death itself. It must do so because, in order to arrive at its own final perfection it must will death as that which puts an end to the mere prolongation of temporal existence. It is only on the surface of our awareness that we shrink from death. At its deepest level this awareness of ours craves for that which is imperfect and incomplete in us to be brought to an end in order that it may be finally

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

perfected. Indeed if anyone told us that our present state would last for ever we would regard this in itself as tantamount to being damned, for it would mean that every fleeting and transitory moment of our existence was ipso facto deprived of its true value, a value which consists in the fact that each of these moments provides us with the possibility of making a decision of final and permanent validity. For the outcome of the free act is always something which endures.

Of course Christianity recognises a special kind of perfection to be attained through the exercise of freedom, one that goes beyond that which death brings, namely that state of perfection in grace which the first man was offered the possibility of attaining to in Paradise. In this situation of primæval blessedness too man would not simply have enjoyed an indefinite prolongation of his earthly life; here too his freedom would have defined some state of final perfection which would have been achieved by some radical transformation of the physical side of his human nature as realised in the concrete. But in Paradise the physical side of the man who had attained to the state of Paradisal perfection would have undergone an extremely radical change. It would have been raised to a state of glorification in which it was no longer subject to constant change and flux, unfolding itself in an unending series of transformations. At the same time, however, primordial man would not have relinquished the physical side of his nature as we have to relinquish it now in order to achieve our own perfection. To that extent this necessity of death to which we are subject is a sign of the guilt in Adam of the whole race, a manifestation of the sinfulness of all. But even this does not derogate from the fact that [289] death precisely as that which perfects us and raises us above the continuous flow of time, as the incursion of that finality which is posited once and for all in freedom, is on a higher level than the mere process of becoming which we now call life. The one death which comes to all is natural and in harmony with our natures inasmuch as it is the birth of that finality aimed at in freedom which is the ultimate object of man's will at its most basic and fundamental. Death is 'unnatural' in its immediate effect upon the physical side, which is an essential part of man's nature, inasmuch as in death this cannot at once be transformed and raised in glory to that state of final perfection for which man's life, taken as a single and continuous whole, is designed. Instead at first this physical side of our nature simply falls away from us as something which we have to transcend and get beyond, and is relinquished as though it were of no permanent significance.

Thus from our consideration of the universality of death, inasmuch as this is an article of faith, we have been brought spontaneously and inevitably face to face with quite different and far deeper factors which are essentially inherent in death. Death is the breaking in of finality upon mere transience – that finality which is the concretisation of freedom come to its maturity. But when we make this assertion we intend it as the Christian answer both to the materialist teaching that at death man ceases totally to exist, and to the teaching of the transmigration of souls, which implicitly denies the unique and final value of this earthly life and its importance as providing the opportunity for absolute decision (in reality this latter doctrine recognises only the miserable fate of being condemned to the eternal cycle of birth and death). But while all this is true as far as it goes, a further point must straight away be added to it: this act of freedom which ultimately determines what man's final state is to be comes to its fulness, as we have seen, in death. For that very reason it constitutes the absolute climax of the process of enfeeblement and deprivation of power in man.

The freedom which is exercised on the physical plane is, in fact, that freedom by which man lays himself open to intervention from without, submits to control by another power or powers. The physical side of man's nature constitutes the sphere in which the interplay takes place of action from within himself and passion as imposed from without. As a physical being endowed with freedom man has to take cognisance of the fact that he occupies an intermediary position. He is neither wholly self-directing nor wholly subject to control by another, but half-way between these [290] two. The mysterious interplay between action and passion in the exercise of human freedom appears above all in the fact that it is precisely at the very point at which man freely achieves his own perfection that he is, at the same time, most wholly subject to control by another. The ultimate act of freedom, in which he decides his own fate totally and irrevocably, is the act in which he either willingly accepts or definitively rebels against his own utter impotence, in which he is utterly subject to the control of a mystery which cannot be expressed – that mystery which we call God. In death man is totally withdrawn from himself. Every power, down to the last vestige of a possibility, of autonomously controlling his own destiny is taken away from him. Thus the exercise of his freedom taken as a whole is summed up at this point in one single decision: whether he yields everything up or whether everything is taken from him by force, whether he responds to this radical deprivation of all power by uttering his assent in faith and hope to the nameless mystery which we call God, or whether even at this point he seeks to cling on to his own autonomy, protests against this fall into helplessness, and, because of his disbelief, supposes that he is falling into the abyss of nothingness when in reality he is falling into the unfathomable depths of God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

On the basis of this it is possible for us to realise that death can be either an act of faith or a mortal sin. In order rightly to understand this we must consider (and perhaps it would have been clearer to make this point right from the first) that the actual act of dying does not necessarily occur at that point in time in the physical order at which doctors suppose it to take place, and at which it is considered to take place in the popular estimation when men speak of the final departure and of death as coming at the end of life. In reality we are dying all our lives through right up to this, the final point in the process of dying. Every moment of life is a stage on the way to this final goal, a stage which already carries this end within itself and derives its significance from it, just as when one sees a shot fired one can already estimate, even as it is travelling, where the impact will fall. Life, therefore, is in a true sense a process of dying, and what we are accustomed to call death is the final point in this life-long process. Dying takes place throughout life itself and death when it comes is only the ultimate and definitive completion of the process. Now this death in life or living death, as it may be called, can become one of two things: it can be made into an enduring act of faith in the fact that our lives and destinies are being directed and controlled by another and that this [291] direction is right; the willing acceptance of our destiny, the ultimate act of self-commitment to that destiny, a renunciation which we make in anticipation of our final end because in the end we must renounce all things; also because we believe that it is only by this poverty entailed in freely accepting our own destiny that we can free ourselves for the hand of God in his unfathomable power and grace to dispose of us as he wills. Alternatively this death in the midst of life can become an act of desperately clinging on by main force to that which is destined to fall away from us, a protest, whether silent or expressed, against this death in life, the despair of one who is avid for life and who imagines that he has to sin and so to obtain his happiness by force. The death that is accomplished in life, therefore, must be really the act of that loving and therefore trustful faith which gives man courage to allow himself to be taken up by another. Otherwise it will become the mortal sin which consists in the pride of seeking one's own absolute autonomy, anxiety (Angst) and despair all in one.

Now in both modes of dying there are, whether we realise it or not, others who have gone before us. We are not the first to die, but are rather the successors of these, caught up in a struggle between life and death which takes place on a more comprehensive scale. Certainly each individual dies his 'own death'. Certainly each individual is unique in the inexorable solitude of his own death because each individual life, despite the opposite impression of a meaningless existence en masse, in which many – all too many – are involved, is unique and unrepeatable in its free moral decision. But even though this death is personal and unique to the individual in this sense, still it is the death which has been ushered into this world of the embodied spirit (a death, therefore, which only the superficial will equate with the death of animals) by the rebellion of the first man. And at the same time it is the death which the Son of Man freely takes upon himself. Our death is modelled upon the death of both of these. For it was precisely the death of Adam that the Son of Man willed to die in order to redeem this death. And because it is never possible for us to say of ourselves with complete certainty which exercise of life we commit ourselves to with the ultimate decision of our free will, we cannot ultimately know either whether it is possible for us to say which of the two deaths we are dying, the death of perdition or the death of Adam which has been redeemed; in other words whether the death of Christ imports life for us or judgment, whether it is the death of despair that we are dying or the [292] death of faith. Both modes of dying are concealed beneath the surface in the everyday process of dying.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Death affects every aspect of our personal lives and being. It constitutes the transition between the sort of being that is becoming and the sort of being that is final completion, from the freedom which has been given up to the achieved finality which is at the same time the moment of radical enfeeblement. To the extent that we regard ourselves from the point of view of this world, to the extent that we are those who are quitting it and not those who are coming into it, to this extent we are, so to say, losing possession of ourselves. And for all these reasons we have no clear vision of what this definitive and final state of death will mean for us. In dying we strive to attain to the inconceivable. It is not immediately clear in the here and now what the fruit of life which we are bringing to maturity will one day be worth. But it is precisely because death is concealed from us in this sense that it is (to reiterate) the situation par excellence in which we can make the most radical and absolute option possible between faith and despair, between the death of Christ and the death of Adam. The dying man passes into a state of silence and solitude which engulfs everything in its own stillness. It is a state to which he has been drawing ever closer throughout his life, the situation in which he is faced with a question, an option to be taken, in which a decision is demanded of him, the situation either of the faith that redeems or of the despair that kills. The fact that death is concealed from us in this way makes it possible for us to choose either of these alternatives.

We have spoken much about death and yet said little. For who can say much about the mysteries of human existence, especially if they are followed through to the mysteries of God himself, whose eternal Word has taken our death upon him and thereby imparted to death a divine value, a divine mystery and an eternal grace? And yet we must think about death, not merely because our life is that mode of existence which of its very nature leads to death, but still more because it is the mystery of Christ the Lord in his Good Friday. Since Christ has died for the salvation of the world, since the life of God and his glory has definitively entered into the world there has been no more decisive factor in the world than precisely this death. By comparison with this every other event in the world is transitory and ultimately unimportant, or important only in virtue of the fact that it precisely does have some part to play in this history of the death of Christ.

[293] If we have been given the vocation and the grace to die with Christ in this death of his, then the everyday and banal occurrence which we call human death, and which awaits each one of us also, has been elevated to a place among God’s mysteries. In order to understand these mysteries and to be able to put them into practice in the liturgy of our life we need only to look to the death of the crucified Lord, and hear the words which he spoke, and which express what is most terrible and at the same time what is most sublime in his death. These are words which we too can hear and repeat in life and death: My God, my God, why have you forsaken me? Father into your hands I commend my spirit. For if we understand death as supremely the state of abandonment by God in which we fall into the hands of the eternal God, then we have already understood and endured death itself.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But together with this one crucified Lord – and the implications of this symbolism are frightening – there are two other dying figures, two men who cursed their fate of death because they did not understand it. Who indeed can understand it? But one of the two looked to the death of Christ. And what he saw there was enough to enable him to understand his own death also. For when one says to the dying Christ 'Think of me when you come into your kingdom' then one has indeed understood death, understood it rightly and received it as one's own salvation. And the Son of Man, he who shared in our fate of death, redeemed it and made it a gateway to life, said to this dying man: 'Today you will be with me in Paradise.'

But he says this to us also. If we have ears for it we have already solved the baffling riddle of death. But in order that the message of the blessing which our death will bring shall not remove from us that holy fear which is so needful for us precisely to obtain this blessing in our death he says to the other thief . . . precisely nothing. The darkness and silence which hung over this death serve to warn us that death can also be the onset of a deeper death still, a death that is eternal. But even as we fear and tremble we can also listen to the joyful message, the Christian gospel of the death that is life; of the coming of the Lord who is that life which knows no death even though it comes to us in death. This reality is still veiled beneath the solemn and humbling experiences which we have to undergo in death. But the death of Good Friday, the death which issues in life and eternal goodness in God's presence – that is the truth about death which faith enables us to know.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[1]

PART ONE

Patterns of Christianity

[3]

1

WHY AND HOW CAN WE VENERATE THE SAINTS?

The seventh chapter of the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church lays down certain points which are additional and supplementary to what is usually called, in the current theological parlance, 'the veneration of the saints'. These are concerned with the eschatological character of the pilgrim Church and with the 'last things'. On the whole, however, this chapter remains in its definitive form as it was originally planned, a chapter on the veneration of the saints, and (without going into details) it presents a comprehensive view of what manifestly belongs to the Church's tenets and convictions on this point as upheld in her faith and life.

Over and above this certain considerations must here be presented which affect our attitudes as men and Christians of today towards the veneration of the saints.[1]

I. THE VENERATION OF THE SAINTS AS AN EXISTENTIAL AND THEOLOGICAL PROBLEM

On closer examination this chapter of the conciliar constitution appears to be devoid of any answer to a question which appears to us of today to be more pressing than it did to those of former generations. This is not intended as a criticism, or to suggest that there is a deficiency in the document which could have been avoided. What we feel to be missing here could not in any sense have been put forward as a conciliar statement, at [4] any rate not at present, because virtually speaking it has not yet attained any conscious position in the Church's explicit awareness of her faith. Expression is given to the objective reality of the communion of saints, their existence in blessedness, their exemplary status, the fact that they are worthy of veneration, their ability to intercede for us with God. Attention is drawn to the fact that in all ages the Church has venerated the saints. By these statements – this is the message of the decree whether explicitly or implicitly expressed – the situation is made clear. We can and should venerate the saints. The only thing left for us to do is to respond to the reality with which we have been presented in the appropriate manner, and in fact to venerate the saints. At this point, however, it may appear to the man of our own times that one factor of decisive importance has been overlooked, namely himself. In other words the question has not been answered as to why and how he, in view of his own special peculiarities, can achieve any kind of relationship with the world of the saints even though the objective reality of this world is not denied. Presumably when faced with the Council's teaching on this point he feels

[1] In addition to the articles on this subject in the lexicons cf. M. Lackmann: Verehrung der Heiligen (Stuttgart, 1958); B. Kötting, 'Heiligenverehrung' in Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe I (Munich, 1962), pp. 633-641; P.-Y. Emery, 'L'unité des croyants au ciel et sur la terre. La communion des Saints et son expression dans la prière de 1'Eglise' in Verbum Caro 16 (1962), No. 63, pp. 1-240; P. Molinari, Die Heiligen und ihre Verehrung (Freiburg, 1964).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

like a young man (if the somewhat startling analogy may be forgiven) to whom a mother is describing the good qualities of her daughter, whom she is seeking to recommend to him as a future wife. He hears the message and does not dispute its accuracy, and yet no love is aroused in him. The fact that the girl is worthy of love does not mean that there is any corresponding ability to love on the part of the young man. 'Can' we of today venerate the saints? What has to be present in us as persons? What has to be brought out into the open, roused from its state of inertia, in order that we can manage effectively to respond to the reality which the Church brings to our notice? What are the basic conditions, subjectively speaking and from our side, in order that we can achieve anything approximating to a veneration of the saints?

How little the constitution is concerned with these difficult and obscure questions appears still more clearly from two small points in particular, to which attention may be drawn. The Evangelical Christian will perhaps admit the validity of all the objective statements contained in this chapter, and still not feel himself moved to actually venerating the saints in practice. In a certain sense it could be said that there is nothing in his own religious experience to correspond to this objective reality as stated in the constitution (and for this very reason and on these grounds alone he will find himself tempted to contest the objective accuracy of these statements).

[5] And further: there is no doubt that an approach to the veneration of the saints might be worked out on 'existential' lines, or at least the ground might be prepared for such an approach. It might be pointed out that a Christian who believes in the truth that the dead are hidden in Christ with God now regards those whom he himself has loved in his own lifetime as already with God, whither they have gone before him. But the constitution contains no mention of any need for such an approach to be worked out, any need to try to appeal to religious experience of this kind at the human level, which is more readily responded to than the adulation of the Church's 'official' saints. Instead the constitution launches itself straightaway into the world of the saints, quite unaffected by these considerations, and in this sense seems to envisage a kind of Christian who, with a kind of naïve religious realism, takes the objective reality of this world for granted as though it were obvious right from the outset, the kind of Christian who needs only to be told of the fact itself that the saints are worthy of veneration in order to respond, and does not need to be told how and why he should respond in the concrete.

The Decline of the Veneration of the Saints in Our Own Time

The present situation, however, is such that at least in the 'Cisalpine' countries of Europe veneration of the saints has suffered an extraordinary decline even among Catholics, so that the ability to practise such veneration seems to have undergone some kind of process of atrophy and decay. This assertion cannot, of course, be proved statistically, especially since the official cult of the Church has continued unchanged. But the fact itself should not be contested on this account. Rather it should be frankly recognised, and the causes of it should be enquired into. Nor should it be presumed from the outset that these causes must necessarily and in all cases be regrettable. This is not to say that we should no longer concern ourselves with the saints. The literature of the last few decades is probably neither smaller in volume nor worse in quality, but on the contrary, has become better than in former ages. But the interest which this literature presupposes and stimulates in the readers is still far from implying any attitude of veneration in the truly theological sense. We may have the greatest admiration for Francis of Assisi, and feel whole-heartedly that he is the very pattern and prototype of Christian living, yet at the same time not have 'said any prayers to him'. In this religious interest in Christians whose lives are impressive, exemplary or powerfully inspiring [6] we Catholics are not fundamentally different from the Evangelical Christians who also have their saints in this sense (even to the point of martyrdom). Whether one venerates Bodelschwingh or Charles de Foucauld in this sense is a secondary question. The real question is whether the modern Catholic, when he has read the life of de Foucauld or his letters, really manages to enter into prayerful communication precisely with him as person, to 'call upon' him, to venerate him in a 'cult', as the language of tradition optimistically dares to call it. Now from this point of view it cannot be contested that modern man has to a large extent lost his capacity to venerate the saints. Admittedly a thousand examples to the contrary can be pointed to in the complex community of the Church, in which many ages live side by side with one another. Of course there is much to be found which seems to contradict this assertion in religious houses with their stable customs and their holy eagerness to see new saints from among their own members raised to their altars, as also in the practice of novenas and pilgrimages. But what we are concerned with here is the member of the Church precisely as conditioned in a special way by the atmosphere of the present world and of contemporary life. Even though he obviously intends to be a Christian and a Catholic he maintains an attitude of aloofness towards religious tradition and its usages, an attitude which is sometimes explicitly declared, but sometimes too only implicit and beneath the surface of his conscious life. And the real question is whether this decline in the veneration of the saints applies in the case of this kind of Christian. It is a question which in all sincerity must be answered in the affirmative. The fact that modern churches are, to so large an extent, bereft of images and pictures is in itself a sign of this. The statues and pictures of the saints are not missed or at the most are only missed because their absence makes the churches seem too cold and bare.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The Experience of the Silent God in Our Own Time

The reasons for this decline are manifold and far-reaching. Most contemporary Christians have already ceased to have any sense of being actively in communication with their own dead, the members of their family and the relations whom they have lost. Though there are exceptions to this the general attitude is that they have departed and vanished from this life. They are forgotten, and in so far as they are thought of at all attention is focused upon their lives while they were still among us and not in any true sense upon the fact that they are still living. It is not that we contest [7] the fact that they are, in principle, living on in the presence of the God of the living, but so far as we are concerned they are not alive. They have been, so to say, completely and totally removed from our sphere of existence. Do we really believe that the city dweller still feels any need to visit the graves of his departed on Sunday after Mass as does the countryman? Is not the custom of placing lights upon the graves on All Souls' Day, at Christmas, etc., confined to one quite well-defined group which cannot possibly be regarded as 'representative' of contemporary life, a group which is slowly but relentlessly being squeezed out of modern society? But if a man thinks even of his own 'nearest and dearest' as disappearing at death into that darkness which surrounds the meagre light of our existence with its silent infinitude how can he then find it in himself to take up an attitude of veneration towards other dead persons during his life merely on the grounds that they were holier?

But there is a further and more radical reason. The capacity of modern man is essentially dependent upon an experience of God which is 'epochal', that is conditioned by the special circumstances of his own particular time. Thus special factors do arise even within the one 'final age' of the Church because the climate of thought and the situation of the world has a profound effect upon the Church also, its destiny and the quality of its faith. Now today it is precisely the man who really and genuinely believes who feels that God has become incomprehensible and 'remote' from him (even if the Christian knows that this incomprehensible and remote God is at the same time infinitely close as the mystery which freely imparts itself to him). Naturally this is something which has always been known and recognised. But modern man experiences it with a new and radical keenness because the world has become so inescapably vast and at the same time so profane, and also because, not surprisingly, God does not appear as one factor 'along with' others which are given in the everyday experience of this world. God is, to a large extent, experienced as the silent mystery, infinite in his ineffability and inconceivability. And the more man advances in his religious life the more these aspects of God come consistently to the fore (instead of diminishing). Into this silent, unfathomable and ineffable mystery the dead disappear. They depart. They no longer make themselves felt. They cease any further to belong to the world of our experience. When spirit and heart seek them, when our gaze follows them into the distance, and precisely when this quest is made in the religious sense (which has nothing to do with a 'spiritualist' kind of [8] communication that remains within the dimension of this present world) then manifestly this gaze of ours meets only with the darkness of the divinity in which nothing can be distinguished any longer. Even if we say that for all this we 'know' by faith that the dead have not been dissolved into this unfathomable and ineffable darkness of the divine, but still live on, then it is always possible to reply: 'But they are no longer distinguishable so far as we are concerned.'

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In other words it is possible to put the objection that the veneration of the saints considered precisely as a religious act cannot be thought of as a further projection of our ordinary connection with other media within this world, for this would be a kind of spiritualism. It must be specifically religious, i.e. the exercise of it must be directed towards God, and must bear upon the dead or the saints only in general terms in the attainment of this end. But ultimately speaking this must be reduced to an act of falling down in dumb adoration before the ineffability of God, and in that case how can it put us in touch with the saints? How can an act of this kind fail to be totally absorbed in and taken up with the inconceivability of God and his will? How can there still be any interest in the individual finite reality of this or that saint? When even petitionary prayer to God constitutes a difficult and obscure chapter in the religious life of modern man how can he still turn to a specific saint with a specific prayer for precisely his help? Will a man of our own times find it easy to believe, supposing that his prayer is heard, that it has been heard precisely because he turned for help to this specific saint? How many men of our own times will have the courage (leaving out of account the possibility that it is simply the mechanics of ancient religious custom that are at work) to choose one particular saint rather than another as a matter of personal inclination to be their patron? When the official Church, even today, still designates specific saints as 'patrons' for particular 'concerns' does any genuine religious interest still survive in this fact? Is not the fact that the veneration of the saints is in practice concentrated upon Mary, however wonderful this Marian devotion may be, in itself an indication of how slight the distinctions have become, so far as our personal feelings are concerned, between the individual saints in our veneration of them?

The Problem of How the Veneration of the Saints Is Reconcilable with the Adoration of God

It is only with great difficulty that modern man can achieve any clear [9] conception of what is meant by the intercession of the saints in heaven such as can be reconciled with his own 'rationalism' (which is, however, a justified rationalism) and with a kind of theological thinking that is realistic and not overweighted with fantasy. The questions which the modern Christian has to put (and he asks them either explicitly or as implied in his basic outlook on life, which is an extremely potent factor in his religion) are these: What sort of idea of the intercessory activity of the saints should I have? Is this intercessory activity on the part of the saints intensified or diminished according to the extremely varied ways in which those still on earth have recourse to them for their intercession? How is their intercessory activity to be conceived of in view of the absolute and immutable decrees laid down from all eternity in the mind of God, by which all things are controlled, and which themselves cannot be determined by any creature? In view of this can this intercession of the saints be anything else than the unconditional adoration of God, whose ways are unsearchable, to whom no-one gives counsel and who has no counsellor? But if this is the case then can we still say that the intercession of the saints is what we normally conceive it to be? And is it still dependent upon whether we who are still on earth supplicate the saints for their intercession? Is it not simply imparted to us according to the degree of our union with God, whether we explicitly ask them for it or not? For instance were Mary or figures such as Augustine less favoured with this intercessory activity since certainly they did not ask for it so much as a devotee of the Middle Ages? Now can it really be said that to all these questions the standard theology of the day has ready to hand an answer that is simple, clear and easy to understand?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Merely as an afterthought it may be pointed out that the distinction which is drawn between mere veneration and invocation of the saints (dulia) and the adoration of God (latria) is important and certainly correct in itself. But it rather obscures than solves the important problem involved. For while we think that we have arrived at a clear and valid distinction we overlook the fact that the unity of the two kinds of veneration represents just as great a problem, and indeed one that is even more important. Unless we can find a clear answer to this second problem it will be impossible to explain what is specifically Christian and religious in the nature of our veneration of the saints, and equally impossible to find out whether the veneration of the saints is in fact a Christian activity or a sort of mitigated spiritualism, magic, or a watered-down form of polytheism. We [10] cannot simply assert that the veneration of the saints does not derogate from our adoration of God or of Christ as the unique mediator. We cannot simply regard the veneration of the saints (dulia) and adoration (latria) as basically united in virtue of the fact that there is unity in the object of these acts, in other words that the saints are united with God through grace and glory. We must also make it clear that there is unity in the subjective acts themselves, that they both pertain to one and the same basic act of ‘religion’. In the theology of love of neighbour as a supernatural ‘infused’ virtue (of charity) an attempt is made at least to explain why and how such an act can and must at the same time be an act of the love of God himself. We should do the same with regard to the connection between veneration and adoration. It will have to be shown why and how the act of venerating the saints is really and intrinsically included, made valid and upheld by that of adoring God, because only in this way can it be a specifically religious activity, that is an act proceeding from our immediate union with God and empowered by the grace of God. Otherwise it would actually remain worthless, and even dangerous, from a religious point of view. The (correct) distinction mentioned above actually conceals something essential. It can be taken in the same sense as the statement ‘Love of neighbour is not love of God’, a statement which even though formally speaking it is correct, obscures the deeper truth of the unity which exists between these two kinds of love.

II. SOME PRELIMINARY THEOLOGICAL CONSIDERATIONS

But enough of problems. What can now be said in positive terms to explain the veneration of the saints, especially with regard to its ‘subjective’ aspects? In answering such a question it must always be borne in mind that the analysis of an act which is essential for our nature as human to be brought to its fullness, does not in itself effect this fullness in the concrete but rather presupposes it, and is ultimately comprehensible only in terms of it. For instance it is impossible to explain what love is in terms of a philosophy and theology of love to one who has never actually loved in any sense in the concrete. In the investigation which follows no claim is made to provide a comprehensive answer to the problem. Moreover other questions,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

connected with this central problem, will not be explored here, such as the question of what the saints in the Church are. They are not merely the happy 'fruit' of the Church considered as an [11] official salvific institution, but rather the creators of new ways of Christian living, i.e. those specific kinds of holiness which have been required of the Church at particular epochs in her history. In the same way we shall not be treating of the question of the imitation of the saints, and why their life represents not simply a constructive model for others to copy but also a dangerous adventure which cannot simply be entered upon without qualification as a 'rule of life' (quite apart from the question of how far their personal limitations and weaknesses may have been conditioning factors in the total image of their lives). Furthermore the reader cannot be excused from having his attention drawn to certain prior considerations which may not be entirely familiar to him in all cases. In every department of theology the whole of theology must in some sense be present if it really is to be a department of theology in any genuine sense at all. But this inevitably increases the difficulty entailed in discussing specific points in theology.[2]

Christ Our Mediator With the Father

We may commence with the simple statement that for the Christian the connection with Jesus Christ the crucified and risen Lord is the basic and decisive act of religion, in which he attains to God who is his God and the God of grace, i.e. the absolute proximity of the mystery which imparts itself in the mode which makes it most effectively and most personally present. Two points are implied here.

The Significance of the Humanity of Jesus for Our Relationship with God

The specifically Christian connection with God is in its very immediacy mediated by the connection with Jesus, in other words through a creaturely reality. Naturally it is not possible here to develop this statement in its full significance and depths. Certain brief remarks must suffice at this point. First it has to be recognised that the risen and glorified Lord is and remains truly man. This fact of itself raises the same problem at this point as the one which we touched upon with regard to the veneration of the saints. So far as the exercise of our personal religion is concerned, why does Jesus as man not disappear into the silence and darkness of the divinity? This real and creaturely humanity of Jesus – why does it not become, in a certain sense, uninteresting and indifferent when we try, [12] with all the resources of our spirit, absolutely to transcend all that is finite, and in grace (which, in the last analysis, is the very presence of God himself to us), to find a way of entering into an absolute immediacy with God? Or is the position that we of today have arrived at such that we actually 'bypass' Jesus? And in that case are we really still Christians, or is Jesus, so far as we are concerned, simply an episode in saving history enacted here below upon earth, so that once he has attained to God himself at the resurrection, and once we have attained to God by the gift of uncreated grace, he simply disappears from view? There can be no doubt that many Christians, so far as any clear and explicit awareness of their religious life is concerned, remain, strictly speaking, at the level of an abstract monotheism. Certainly they recognise that they have been brought into God's mercy and into a direct relationship with him through the redemption wrought by Christ. But precisely on that account they suppose that they no longer have to deal with anything except with God himself purely in his divine nature and abstracting from the incarnation.

[2] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'The Church of the Saints', Theological Investigations III, pp. 91-104.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

There is no doubt that the theology explicitly worked out by teachers and preachers has paid far too little attention to this question,[3] so that it almost appears as though the connection with the risen humanity of Jesus is a sort of adjunct within the total vision of the heavenly glory, supplementary to the vision of the triune God. And the experience of being brought into contact with mythological ideas has only had the effect of making it still more difficult to maintain this idea. If the teaching of the Church on this point is to have a genuine and non-mythological significance then it must simply be the case that the humanity of Jesus is the medium through which our immediate relationship with God is achieved. Of course if we 'picture' the 'figure' of Jesus to ourselves and use as a model for this purpose our external relationships with another man here in this life this statement is untenable. But in that case we have falsified our basic presuppositions. The immediacy of our relationship with God is certainly not invalidated by the fact that we achieve this relationship as our own ultimate act, and at the same time in this act achieve a special relationship with ourselves, find ourselves, as it were, anew. Rather both relationships must be thought of as essential and mutually complementary factors within one and the same act. We shall [13] have something more to say on this point at a later stage, but for the moment let us notice in this connection that man is, from the very first moment of his existence and throughout, the being that achieves a relationship with itself precisely by achieving a relationship with the 'other', in the first instance the other creature, the 'thou', whether this latter relationship be one of love or hate. He is the being that can only achieve its true mode of existence, its own truth and the fullness of its own personhood precisely in this state of communication with the 'other'. In the light of this truth, this process by which our immediate relationship with God is achieved through the medium of Jesus the man becomes intelligible. We obscure the truth of this process of mediation if we think of it too much in the concrete. It must never be forgotten that the most real factor in the spirit is its cognition, its freedom, its love. In thinking of the spirit we must not take material entities as our conceptual model. We must not think of the spirit as a sort of 'support' on which the cognitive powers are then superimposed, and in relation to which they are merely secondary and supplementary, less 'real' than that which 'supports' them. It is only in its activities that the spirit achieves its own reality, and it is only in love that it comes alive in that twofold relationship which is essential to it right from the outset. When I love Jesus I perform that act which effectively achieves direct relationship with God. Why the mediating factor in this case should be precisely Jesus, why it should be that even in the case of one who does not explicitly recognise Jesus (in 'historical' terms) there is still a 'quest' for Jesus, albeit a blind one, in order that the immediate relationship with God may be achieved by grace and may be achieved through him as the mediator – all this cannot be gone into any further at this point. But in any case one fundamental principle is indicated here as to how the Christian experience of the sheer and absolute transcendence of God is achieved: not by rising above and leaving behind the finite, but precisely by being mediated through the finite, the 'world'. It attains to this 'absoluteness' of God as inserted into the world itself (at any rate in the case of Jesus), and recognises it as that which is most proper to itself the 'supernatural state of being' bestowed upon it by God's grace. At this point the concepts break down. But we need only to remind ourselves of the teaching of the God-Man to realise as a doctrine indispensable to the Christian faith that God bestows himself in such a way that while remaining utterly unaffected in his own transcendence and grace he nevertheless becomes, in the most immediate [14] sense, the suppositum of a created nature (and that too, in a mode which essentially goes beyond the ordinary 'Creator-creature' relationship). And what takes

[3] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'The Eternal Significance of the Humanity of Jesus for Our Relationship with God', Theological Investigations III, pp. 35-46. J. Alfaro, 'Christo glorioso, revelador del Padre', Gregorianum 39 (1958), pp. 220-270.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

place in Jesus Christ with a pre-eminent fullness applies essentially, though in a minor and modified degree, to the world in general which God takes into his grace. But if this is so, then it follows that a right and full relationship with the world (which is, above all, a world of persons communicating in love and freedom) is in itself a relationship of immediate contact with God himself. This is not because of any logical necessity inherent in the conception of the world as created, but rather because, of his own free grace, God has, in this way, inserted himself into his own world. As a result this grace-given 'fact' is a permanent and essential factor in the life of every spiritual creature, one which it has to respond to whether implicitly or explicitly with either assent or denial if it is genuinely to arrive at a discovery of itself in a free act of self-comprehension (and by that very fact discover also the 'this-worldly' and creaturely 'thou' which corresponds to it).

Excursus: The Proximity of the Silent God in Jesus Christ

It may be permitted to insert at this point a brief consideration of certain aspects of saving history. Since the essential characteristics of the individual acquire their definitive form in his own history it follows that the historical situation in which he is placed, the spirit of an epoch, plays its part in determining the mode of his formation, and changes the mode in which these characteristics find expression. But now there is only one direction in which the history of man's discovery of himself can run its course; the eschatological situation brought about by Jesus, in which this history must unfold, cannot be reversed. And because of this the task of the Christian, the task which the message of Jesus Christ forces him to face up to, cannot consist simply in establishing for himself that God is silent and absent from his life (whether this is true or only a misinterpretation to be ascribed to his own subjective thought-processes), or in enduring this state of affairs as something to which he has been subjected. It is required of him to make real to himself the immediacy of God as the mystery which in Jesus is near to him and forgiving. He has to do this in the conscious effort of a faith which is capable of growing. The contemporary historical situation which was touched upon at the outset can play its part in determining the form which this effort of faith takes. As an effort of faith it may bear the 'signs of Jesus' in itself, and bring with [15] it the experience of his own desolation on the Cross. But in making this effort man is promised that by grace he will achieve a sufficient degree of success. But now, among the factors present in this special situation of the age we live in, there is one in particular which belongs to it in a quite new and radical manner, one which is still growing and the full benefits of which may perhaps only be felt in the future. This is the fact that man finds himself only in his fellow man, that it is in love for his fellow that man realises himself and this love is not simply one task or duty among many others, but rather the fulfilment of the 'law', i.e. of his own nature (and if there is a true sense in which a man's 'heaven' must be his fellow man as beloved by him, then Sartre's aphorism to the effect that 'Hell signifies other people' cannot be true). But if this is the case then it follows that our contemporary situation, viewed precisely from a Christian point of view, cannot be characterised as the absence of God as thus conceived of at all. It cannot be that which makes it impossible to discover him in Jesus for what he is in himself in his immediacy. Someone may reply that the terrible thing about the present is precisely that we cannot love our 'neighbour', that he is precisely hell for us. But one who in a spirit of faith and love never permits himself to doubt the fact that he is able to love cannot truly dare to say that in this particular contemporary situation of the spirit of Jesus one cannot love. How man can do this and what the implications are of the fact that Jesus is not simply another word, a mythological cypher for God, but rather is himself the crucified and risen Lord, and how and why God himself is attained to precisely in this (not through this) and attained to in himself alone – these are questions which cannot be entered into further at this point. For the purpose of our considerations it is sufficient to take our stand upon the fact that it is possible

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

for Christ to be our mediator in bringing us to the immediacy of God through the 'thou' of another as accepted in love, because this loving mediation in Jesus is the basic doctrine of our Christian faith. Indeed 'faith in Christ' should not be misinterpreted as mere faith in a state of affairs, or supposed to be faith in God himself which is merely 'stirred up' and encouraged by our encounter with the historical Jesus. This faith means a true and essential personal connection 'in Christ' with God.

The 'Presence' of the Historical Lord

This act which is basic to the Christian religion, in which Jesus the crucified and risen man becomes the mediator who brings us to the immediacy [16] of God, is also and no less essentially an 'anamnesis', the recalling and rendering present of his history in the Eucharist and in the tradition of the Church. The subject of this act is the risen Lord as now living. But it is of decisive importance to understand that the act bears upon him precisely in so far as he once had a history of his own, a history which he has now left behind him as that which has passed away, and yet, insofar as he has his own history, still remains present and effective precisely as something which is no longer in process of development, but as something completed and existing in his 'eternity'. The connection with the risen Lord and with the 'historical Jesus' is not achieved by two distinct acts of religion, but by one and the same act. Eternity is not a further projection of history into another dimension of time, but the sheer reality of the history itself as accomplished and complete. And thus the connection with the glorified Lord is the anamnesis of the crucified and dead Lord not merely in the sense that we 'know' that he whom we love 'once' had this history, but in the sense that he is loved in the eternal and enduring reality of his history, and, precisely as the one who has lived through this history, is the mediator who brings us into the immediate presence of God.

The Love of God and the Love of Neighbour is One and the Same Love

Now it might be objected that the considerations set forth above with regard to our relationship to Jesus do not advance us any further in what is for us the real question, first on the grounds that because of the uniqueness of Christ's mediatorship it is illegitimate for us to apply our findings on this to the saints and our veneration of them, and also on the grounds that in our observations up to this point the possibility of venerating the saints from the subjective point of view has not been made clear. In other words the problem which we are really seeking to solve still remains outstanding. Certainly these christological considerations do throw light upon one point at least, namely the value of a religious act in which a creaturely entity endowed with personality and a personal history becomes a mediator, and so provides access to God himself, so that this act really does become an act of religion. But to enter more deeply into both of these ideas let us make use of a consideration which can serve to make two points more comprehensible: first how rightly to transfer the specifically christological ideas to the relationship between us and the saints, second the subjective aspects of the possibility of venerating the saints. We refer [17] to the relationship between love of neighbour and love of God within one and the same grace-given power of charity.

Personal Love as a Basic Human Act

First it must clearly be recognised that the relationship of love between a spiritual 'I' and a similarly constituted 'Thou' is not simply one kind of achievement among many others of equal value, but rather the true and all-embracing act which is fundamental to human living. The very fact that the human environment in the true and authentic sense is constituted by the persons with whom one lives is in itself sufficient to establish this. It is the environment of personal relationships in this sense that provides the world in and through which man discovers himself and realises himself and … comes forth from himself. Knowledge must be

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

integrated and elevated through this love in order to have a completely human meaning. The world of facts is, in the last analysis, significant only as one element in the life of man or in the world of personal relationships which is his. Personal love of one's fellows is the basic act, the truly and fully moral good (bonum honestum).

Now against this thesis it might immediately be objected that it is rather love of God which is the basic act, or which is at least as important in its claims upon man, if indeed it does not stand higher in the scale of values by comparison with the act of loving personal communication. But abstracting for the moment from the question of how we can determine more precisely how the two acts are interrelated (a point which we shall shortly have to enlarge upon) it must not be overlooked, in the first place, that in himself and so far as the created spirit is concerned, God is not one 'object' among others. Man cannot orientate himself to God in the same way in which he orientates himself to the multiplicity of objects and persons in his 'this worldly' experience, that is with a divided and partially distracted mind. In the original and basic act in which God impinges upon man (and this act precedes all conscious awareness of him) he is always given simply as the ultimate basis of experience, that which is beyond the world, upholding it in being and so making the experience possible. In other words God is present here not as a direct object of knowledge or experience but only 'indirectly' as that which is on the horizon of our experience. And even in those cases in which God is taken as the 'subject' of our religious thought, and so, in a true sense, as an 'object', where he himself speaks to us and becomes a 'partner', this always takes place in a [18] man who is already 'worldly', i.e. has committed himself by loving intercourse with his fellow men to personal encounter and communication with the 'thou' in his 'this-worldly' experience. And conversely this communication in love on man's part with the persons with whom he lives is in itself (at least implicitly) a coming to God and into his presence, because the self-commitment of a love which totally accepts the 'thou' of the other being is always in itself, and in an implicit manner, love of God as well. Thus when God addresses man in saving history, and so makes it possible for man to realise and reflect upon his relationship with God, this always presupposes as an essential prior condition that man has already committed himself to a relationship of love in the 'this-worldly' context, and this human love of his has in itself and of its very nature an implicit tendency towards an immediate relationship with God. Impelled by the dynamism of the spirit and by grace it carries man towards God, and only in doing so fulfils its own nature.

Love of Neighbour as Love of God

Our meaning will be made clearer if we consider the more concrete assertions of traditional theology. Theology firmly maintains that there is a love of neighbour which is itself a 'divine virtue', such that its 'formal object' is God himself i.e. a virtue which is exercised and achieved in a relationship of immediate contact with God in himself. Now however traditional this thesis may be in theology it is an astonishing one. For what it implies, if it is taken seriously, is that the neighbour is not only loved because God wills it and so any violation of this commandment would also constitute a denial of the love of God. What this thesis implies is that the exercise of love of neighbour (as charity) is ipso facto and in itself the love of God. But as true love it is a love that is supported by grace. In other words it is a love that is made open by God to attain to God. Now this is achieved not merely here and there but always and in all cases, where the neighbour is truly loved. For there is no need (at least in any absolute sense) for us to think of the grace necessary for this as though it were merely offered at random and now and then. On the contrary this grace is bestowed upon man, certainly as an act of God's free favour, but in all cases, regardless of whether it is accepted by him (to his sanctification) or refused (in which case it inevitably becomes a judgment upon him). This love of neighbour is really love in a sense which conforms to the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

genuine and most basic experience of man in the actual cases in which he loves. It [19] is not, therefore, merely the fulfilment of one commandment which is intended to protect man by shielding him from the effects of the brutish egoism involved in another. Where it is only the rights of another that are respected, where man keeps himself to himself, there is no love in the true sense, and in this situation the absolute essence of love cannot be achieved. It is for this reason that love of neighbour can be of supreme value, and can in itself be the fulfilment of the law. And it is for this reason that in Jesus' description of the judgment the judge only enquires into the one point of whether in our acts or our omissions we have loved our neighbour, seeming in this to be judging by norms which are quite atheistic in character.[4]

The Experience of God as Transcendental and as an Object of Enquiry in Itself

But how is this possible? In order to see clearly on this point certain distinctions must be recognised from the first. Knowledge that is developed and reflexive (and the decision corresponding to this) bears directly upon the concept of a given reality, whereas the original act of knowledge and freedom (however much this may also entail an element of the conceptual) bears upon the actual reality itself. This is made present to the knower either directly as an object: the flower and the man whom we love, or indirectly and in a manner which does not make it present as an object, in that dimension in which the spirit of man is infinitely removed from, and elevated above everything in the human environment and in human relationships which could be rendered present to it as an object, and comes to that state which we call one of 'elevation', the transcendental state.[5] In this state God's self-bestowal in grace is experienced with an immediacy in which the 'object' is precisely not brought into line with the other objects of the first-named experience, is not assignable to any particular 'category'. Thus the process by which we make conceptually present to ourselves both God himself and our connection with him in knowledge and love, so that both he and it become 'objects of enquiry' to us, however important and necessary this process may be, is ultimately secondary. Of course in this too it is precisely the reality of God himself [20] that we are explicitly directing our attention to. But in the last analysis this is in fact because in this act, which bears upon a concept, a still more basic and more elemental act takes place, one which has been elevated by grace to a state of transcendence in which it bears upon the reality of God himself and is upheld and sustained by it. The act achieved by our explicit consciousness always rests upon and presupposes the basic act, without being able to 'take it in' or thematise it in any exhaustive or comprehensive sense in each case.

The original transcendental experience of God in grace, however, is necessarily mediated by personal communication within the 'this-worldly' sphere. For even an act of this kind, and precisely this, needs an object presented in terms of the particular categories, in other words ultimately a 'this-worldly' 'thou'. The original relationship with God is love of neighbour, the ultimate value of which is, of course, dependent upon this grace-given connection with God implicit in it. The thematic act which refers to God in conceptual (symbolic, cultic, etc.) terms always bears the sign of its origins and the fact that it proceeds from that act of love of God which is love of neighbour. Without this reference to one's fellow men it is not genuine. Certainly this theological character of love of neighbour is only present in it through grace, and this itself cannot fully be the object of reflection. But the theological character of love of neighbour is, nevertheless, something that we can experience, even though inadequately, and even though we certainly cannot recognise it by investigating it in isolation and without reference to the history of salvation and revelation. For it is in this history that this character

[4] For fuller details on this cf. 'Reflections on the Unity of the Love of Neighbour and the Love of God', Theological Investigations VI, pp. 231-249.
[5] cf. K. Rahner, 'Reflections on the Experience of Grace', Theological Investigations III, pp. 86-90.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of love of neighbour has acquired objective status and becomes assignable to a particular category. For in the free decision of love, in the total and earnest acceptance of our neighbour, we assent to God in an act which, upheld as it is by the grace of God, signifies our immediate relationship with God. And even though man cannot be certain that he has achieved this assent, cannot 'take any credit' for it, still he can have some awareness of it in a non-objective sense; for even though it has been bestowed upon him in grace it is, nevertheless, the assent which he himself utters to God in his heart.

To sum up: Love of neighbour is the unique categorical and original act in which man attains his full creaturely reality, and thereby achieves the transcendental and direct experience of God through grace. This experience represents the highest aspect and the ultimate value of love of neighbour, and it is objectified in our explicitly religious acts. In this [21] sense it is the ultimate and basic act of love of God and of neighbour, which the explicit acts presuppose, but among all those acts of personal fulfilment which can be objectified to ourselves the religious act derives its special value from that which the agent explicitly formulates to himself as its object, and is therefore higher in degree than an act in which the agent takes a creature as the object which he makes conceptually present to himself.

In conformity with this the love of Jesus Christ represents the unique and the highest act of love of neighbour, because when he becomes the 'thou' which is the object of this act the absolute fullness is given irrevocably of that which all love of neighbour presupposes and gives its assent to in the 'thou' to which this love is directed: a unity of God and man which is the basis for that unity which exists between the divine and human aspects in love of neighbour.

III. THE VENERATION OF THE SAINTS AS ADORATION OF GOD

We are now in a position briefly to apply what has been said to the saints. The 'saints' – in common with all who have died in Christ[6] – belong to Christ Jesus. They are a part of his Body, are included in the anamnesis in which the Church becomes a further projection of the Body of Christ, and therein maintains herself as well as their history now become definitive and complete.

The saints can be loved with a true and grace-given love, and in such love just as immediate a relationship with God is attained as is achieved in other situations through a Christian love of neighbour. This latter, indeed, becomes a specifically religious act precisely in virtue of the fact that it brings us into an immediate relationship with God in this way. But in our love of the saints the unity with Christ which is present in this love and which is presupposed in the beloved is not (as in love of neighbour in the ordinary sense) simply an implicit unity, and one which is in danger of being lost (because the unity of the neighbour with Christ has not yet been 'made manifest' in its definitive fulness). The unity with Christ achieved in love of the saints is rather something that is explicit and definitively complete and is the object of faith. This means that it has one advantage over love of neighbour in the ordinary sense: the theological [22] and christological character of love of neighbour here comes clearly to the fore. Now we can only effectively realise such love when it has first been given to us to come to the act of love in the concrete for the man who confronts us in the body here and now, and only in virtue of this. And because of this fact, even in the most sublime act of love for Jesus and those who have been definitively united with him, the ordinary love which we bear to the 'thou' of our everyday lives is the basis and prior condition for this (and, as has been said, this 'down-to-earth' love in itself constitutes us in an immediate relationship with God in [6] cf. K. Rahner, On the Theology of Death, 'Quaestiones Disputatae' 2, 2nd ed. (London and New York 1965).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Jesus). To put it in biblical terms, only he who has encountered the Christ whom he does not yet recognise in his brother and sister can then go on to encounter him in manifest and explicit form, at latest in the judgment.

Now abstracting from the veneration of the saints as practised by the Church as a whole and in her 'official' life (she must venerate the saints in order thereby to preach the victory of God's compassion), the outcome of these considerations is that the veneration of the saints is not in itself laid as an absolute duty upon the individual Christian. He already achieves the essence of this act in his love of neighbour. Of course he should not radically and explicitly disassociate himself from the exercise of this veneration in the liturgy, in which the Church bears concrete witness to the fact that the grace of God does achieve its redemptive purpose in actual fact in the world taken as a whole. From what has been said it can also be understood that in order to bring the individual to any living understanding of what veneration of the saints should mean we must begin by making him understand that his absolute love, which he bears towards the men involved in his own personal life, remains and undergoes further development into what truly is a veneration of the saints, provided only that this love has in it the courage of the Christian hope that those who are loved have been saved by God's grace. We must begin by making the individual understand not only this but also the reasons for this. Even though we of today leave the dead in what seems to be the silence of neglect this still has a wholly positive side, which can serve as a recommendation to achieve genuine discretion and quietness in the official veneration of the saints too. In the silence of death, in the silent presence of God precisely as the inexpressible mystery, God is actually closer and more 'present' than in much talking. This must be allowed to apply equally to the private and the 'public' or 'official' veneration of the saints. Moreover this latter does not only celebrate the saints as they were on the [23] day of their death, but envisages their actual home-coming. In view of this it can be said that even the evangelical Christian does, in a certain sense, venerate the saints, for he loves his dead, whom he believes to have gone home to the Redeemer. Now the further step of 'invocation' is at basis only the courage of that love which utters a 'thou' that extends beyond all death, and the courage to believe that no-one lives alone, but that the life of each individual in Christ had a value in God's eyes which makes it efficacious for all. But the 'intercession' of the saints does not in any sense signify some kind of agency of intermediaries or 'court of second instance', but rather this: that every life lived in faith and love is of permanent value and significance for all, and that the redeemed man in the state of blessedness receives and lives this significance of his life. And because it is a spiritual world that is in question here, to which God has imparted himself, and in which each is responsible for all, in which one can have a significance for others, the invocation of an 'official' saint whether explicit or implicit, or of one of the individual Christians whom we believe and hope to have gone home to God, and whom we still love, is always the invocation of all the saints, i.e. an act by which we take refuge in faith in the all-enfolding community of all the redeemed.

The basic mystery of Christianity is not that God has created a world different from himself, in which he must be served as Lord, which gives him greater honour in proportion as it disappears, but rather that the grace which in the last analysis is identical with God himself has permeated the world with God's own presence. And when the world runs its course in this sense it is progressively glorified and redeemed. God himself celebrates the increase of his glory, and causes man to come into a direct relationship with himself in and through this divinised world. All this in and through Christ; but nevertheless through Christ he does achieve this as a real and effective relationship. Hence the doctrine of the veneration of the saints is not merely a demand for us to learn what Christianity means. We of today find this part of Christianity difficult, for in the present situation the practice of Christianity is not easy. We must not make it still more difficult by acting as though it were so. But the saints

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

whom the Church venerates will help us precisely here in our current practice of Christianity. They are our brothers who have already attained their perfection, and they entreat the God of the living to let that light shine upon us too which is the manifestation of his own love and the blessed eternity of his own life.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[24]

2

ALL SAINTS

This festival at the end of the ecclesiastical year, which is consecrated to the memory of all saints and celebrated with such solemnity and joy in the liturgy, does not seem to represent any very effective or living force in the awareness of the Christian of today. This may be due in no small part to the fact that it coincides so closely with All Souls' Day, and therefore derives its character to a large extent from this latter festival in our religious practices. On All Souls' Day we are accustomed to make pilgrimages to the graves of our dead, to those final memorials which signify that one who was beloved is still not forgotten. When we consider the matter from the theological point of view it is by no means so far-fetched to regard All Saints and All Souls as connected by the fact that a single common meaning is to be found in both. In fact we do not know precisely where the dividing line falls between All Saints and All Souls. In the deepest sense, indeed, it is not of any great significance, and is in any case provisional. Certainly on All Souls' Day we pray for those who are still in an imperfect state, those already beyond the grave who are still in process of coming to their final perfection. But at the same time these are the ones who have departed in God's grace, who, as the liturgy puts it, have gone before us in the sign of faith and now rest in the sleep of peace. We are praying, therefore, for those upon whom God has finally and definitively bestowed his grace, never more to withdraw it from them. And when we celebrate All Saints we have in mind chiefly those saints who are anonymous, the unknown saints who have not made any general impact in the Church and are not mentioned in her praises.

From one point of view, therefore, the distinction between All Saints and All Souls is only slight. But at the same time it must be recognised that each of these days has a special mystery of its own which distinguishes it from the other, a mystery which deserves to be pondered and prayed in its own right, a word peculiar to itself which has been spoken [25] by God into the Church and is intended through it to reach into our hearts. What mystery, then, does this word stand for which is addressed to us on the festival of All Saints? By way of preliminary it might be answered: The fact that men have attained to their ultimate and definitive goal – that in itself constitutes something that is wonderful. Anyone capable of feeling a spirit of fraternal solidarity with others, anyone who can mentally project himself into others, who is not so terribly isolated from others that when anyone else is mentioned he asks either explicitly or implicitly what that other is to him – anyone of this kind must or should in a very real sense celebrate a festival of rejoicing in his heart because he can say to himself: there are some who actually have arrived, who are perfected, who are already in a state of blessedness, who have attained their due measure of perfection and have not wasted their lives, men to whom something improbable has happened: to be drawn out of and beyond themselves in love, men in whom one does not find emptiness and hidden egoism when they are stripped bare and exposed to view, men who have not wept in vain, who have found life through death and the eternal kingdom through loss, men who by the everyday conduct of their ordinary lives have achieved a dimension of life which is to an undreamt of extent absolute and of such value 'once for all', and that it is worthy never more to perish for all eternity. To this it might be added that we have the right to hope that we can find all those whom our hearts have loved among these who have won and been favoured with the happiness of eternal bliss. Our forebears, the friends who have already gone home, our dead comrades, the nameless soldiers who have died, those who suffered so much while they were upon this earth, the noble spirits whom we have known, all – all who have impressed us as

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

having hearts that were far too full of goodness and human greatness for the eternal God to allow them to perish, for them to have been lost to him who sought them upon his own way of the Cross, who was looking to them even as his darkened eyes gazed upon the void of that death which he had taken upon himself in order to save sinners. We might add that a further implication of this is that all human life is so precious and so noble that it can be brought to this final outcome, that it is only to our short-sightedness, our hardness of heart, our pride, that it seems as though there were far too many human lives, as though there were a sort of mass-production of humanity and a frightful waste of human material in the mass. We might add, therefore, as a further message which this festival has for us, that God can make all [26] into saints, into miracles and masterpieces so full of unexpected blessedness that one's heart can be transfixed with delight at them a whole eternity through. What this festival is saying to us is: Where there is not actually the most profound guilt, where there is not diabolical evil, there, ultimately speaking, there are no minor or intermediary degrees of goodness at the end, but only saints. Then we shall be in a position analogous to that of connoisseurs of art quietly going about their business. We shall seem to go into the junk-shops of world history and wearily rummage about in them with the feeling that in fact all the great works of art have been discovered long since, and given an honourable place in the museums and in the history of art, only to discover under the dust of the altar new and brilliant masterpieces captivating and delightful as on the day when they were painted.

But we must dig deeper in order to discover the theological meaning of the festival of All Saints in its entirety, in order to penetrate to the depths of God's message for this day. Certainly we celebrate All Saints sub una veneratione, and therefore the unknown saints as well, those who lived quietly in the land, the poor and the little ones who were great only in God's eyes, those who go unacclaimed in any of the rolls of honour belonging to the Church or to world history. But in celebrating these anonymous ones we precisely group them together with those whom we can call upon by name, those upon whom the Church calls when the holy community is assembled and she raises her eyes to the thrice-holy God. Now this is something that is indispensable, that in some sense we should celebrate not only the saints who are canonical because they have been canonised, but also, in addition to these, those nameless saints who are consecrated in silence and upon the private altars of our own hearts.

But in order to understand this we must first ask: What does it mean for the Church to canonise saints? What precisely is it which takes place in this act? This is by no means all that easy to define. Whence does the Church have the right to act in this manner at all? Is it not written that we should not judge our fellows until the Day of the Lord comes? Can it then be that the Church can see into the hidden depths, the impenetrable recesses of the human heart? In other contexts does she not take great pains to guard against making judgments about the ultimate subjective state of the individual in God's sight? How can she dare to make such a judgment in this unique instance? Is she in any sense justified in this [27] merely on the grounds that in this case she is not condemning but rather pronouncing individuals blessed? We can only rightly reply to these questions when we understand what the Church herself is. She is not, in the first instance, the proclaimer of that law which makes demands and indeed exhorbitant demands upon men. She is not a sort of institute of salvation which seeks to draw the utmost out of men in all departments of their lives, and then, not knowing herself what the result of her labours may be, leaves it to the judgment of God. Rather she is herself the holy Church. And this holiness of hers consists not exclusively, and not first and last in the holiness of her truth, her laws, her institutions and her sacraments, but in the holiness of her members. It is as the Church of the Incarnation of the divine compassion that she is the holy and the holy in a visible sense. Her mission is not, properly speaking, to proclaim the demands of God's law in such a way that it remains open to question what the outcome of this will be. Rather she is the compassion of God as eschatologically victorious. She is the victory of that grace which has not merely sought to save men, but actually has saved them. The reason that there is a Church at all is that God's grace can no longer be defeated in its effects taken as a whole, and in its impact upon the history of mankind as a whole; because the grace of God is more powerful and has the last word no matter how men may seek to contradict it; because the world has been received into this grace definitively and irrevocably in the dead and glorified flesh of Christ; because the drama of world history, however much longer it may still have to run, however much it may still seem to advance amid blood, tears and despair, has already been brought to its end in Christ with the definitive victory of God as the triumph of holiness and blessedness. And it is of this truth that the Church is witness and representative. It is for this reason that she has the right to be bold enough – bold to an absolutely frightening extent – to make a definitive and unreserved declaration about some at least, referring to them unambiguously by name, and not simply in vague and uncommitted generalities, saying: 'These specific individuals have been redeemed, have been saved for all eternity. These are men who even now have been pronounced free for all eternity, men of whom we know that fact which is the most unascertainable of all, and even though it is the mystery of divine and human freedom, namely that God has received them into his heart for all eternity.' It is because the grace of God is present in the world as eschatologically victorious, because this grace is attainable in the Church, which [28] is the salvation of God actually come into the world – it is because of this that there are canonised saints.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

And now – certainly these saints were saints in an heroic degree. But for all this they lived in the midst of their own brothers and sisters, among us, among those who, as we hope, are in heaven. They themselves did not seem so very wonderful and blessed to themselves – certainly not as the elect in any special sense. They trod our ways, the habitual ways of our lives, in which we hope against all hope, the ways which led, so to say, by a whole series of stations of the Cross to that state of final helplessness in which everything seemed to end in emptiness and ultimate futility. And if they had one advantage over us then it was this: that they suffered especially acutely from that which, as we feel, makes our lives petty, pitiful and humdrum. The geniuses among men come to the fore of themselves. Their brilliance speaks for itself. In the case of the Church's saints, she often has to examine with great care in order to discover what she is seeking for: the divine greatness present in a life lived in the pitiful circumstances of tears, suffering and in the monotony of routine. When, therefore, the Church singles out by name those who are the blessed saints, who represent the Church herself in her function of being the presence of the victorious compassion of God as made accessible in the world, then in a real and justifiable sense the brilliance of these saints falls upon the unknown saints, and can truly bring the consolations of eternity to the heart that is willing to receive them. In the praise of All Saints, however, we are celebrating the Church herself, who, even though she is made up of ourselves, and therefore remains the Church of the sinners, of the poor and insignificant, of the despondent and exasperated sinners, is still the Church of the saints, the Church which is so beloved by Christ with a love unto death – almost, one might say, a fierce love – that she can no longer escape this love. In all the saints we praise the power of that grace which, so to say, makes use of men in order to bring about our salvation, which gives what it demands, which sets us free for that liberty in which we are the freed and the blessed.

If therefore, this is the mystery of this day, to make present and accessible to us, to those who are still imperfect, still toiling, still forever stumbling, those who are in despair and who cry out for help, to make available for these the consummation of grace and of its victory over the weakness and lowliness of man, then the festival of All Saints is not only the festival of the blessed in heaven, but our festival day too, on which [29] we make a fresh start and set out anew on our course with rejoicing. All Saints is the festival of our blessed hope that what they already possess may be imparted to us too. Hope in the new and eternal age is not only an attitude which one adopts or entertains on the grounds that to hope is always better and more pleasant than to despair. The very nature of hope itself has been transformed, since Christ is present where we are, and is present there in a definitive sense. Hope is hope in the victory of Christ. It is not so much a moral requirement which demands something from us, but something which is bestowed, which one should practise and which one possesses simply because God is already bestowing his grace. Such is the hope that is proclaimed on the festival of All Saints, for this is the festival of the victory of grace, the grace which is what it is not because we are the ones who first and last make it victorious, but because the grace itself brings about its own acceptance on our part. We hope because God has acted, not because we have the intention to act. We hope because there are saints.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

All Saints is a festival of love. We should pray that God may touch our hearts in order that for once we may be able to forget ourselves, in order that for once we may find another word than merely the word of self-accusation. We should praise God for his power and mercy in a love which can be extended to others too, and actually bring happiness to them. We should bend our ears to the quiet of eternity, which, if only we are willing to hear it, speaks louder than all the tumult of noise in the world. We should hear it when it says: 'Therefore the Spirit says "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord; they shall rest from their labours for their works follow them".' We should realise that in the course of the world's history an innumerable multitude has already been drawn into the eternity of God before us, so that we are the late-corners. And the realisation of this should generate hope and consolation in us, courage and trust. And in this spirit we should speak with our saints. We should greet them, call upon them for their help on the way which is bringing us to where they are, before the face of Our Lord.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[31]

PART TWO

Positions and Callings in the Church

[33]

3

IDEAS FOR A THEOLOGY OF CHILDHOOD

Our purpose in offering a few ideas on the theology of childhood at this point is not, in any direct sense, to be of assistance to those who, in some way or other, whether as parents or teachers, are engaged in looking after children. We have no intention of offering any guidance of this kind to such people. For this cannot be the aim of a theologian. Certainly he too has responsibilities in the 'field of pedagogy', and not least where this applies to children. He has to proclaim the gospel to the children too. But in this priestly task he has many collaborators. The subject of the discussion which follows, however, is one which goes beyond the immediate sphere of pedagogy, for here we shall be considering what the divinely revealed word has to say about childhood. In the intention of the Creator and Redeemer of children what meaning does childhood have, and what task does it lay upon us for the perfecting and saving of humanity? That is the question before us. It may be that in the course of answering it we shall be able to throw fresh light not only upon our own lives but also such as will be of assistance to those whose daily lives are spent in working for children, loving them, watching over them, estimating their progress and always and in all circumstances loving them. Admittedly in so brief a sketch as this there can be no question of developing more than a few fragmentary aspects of the theology of childhood.

I. THE UNSURPASSABLE VALUE OF CHILDHOOD

The first point of which we intend to treat can perhaps be expressed as the direct relationship to God which is achieved at each of the stages in human development and growth, and so in childhood too, and, arising from this, the unique and unrepeatable value attached to childhood in particular. What is meant by this? In virtue of the fact that we are naturally orientated outwards to the world about us we men are extremely liable to the [34] temptation of interpreting ourselves according to the categories, models and prototypes which confront us from the purely physical or merely biological environment in which we live. And we do the same thing with time too. We interpret the time which belongs to the specifically human dimension, the dimension of man's personal history, in terms of the laws of physical time as these have been worked out and established. Now this means that we think of ourselves in terms that are unphilosophical, unhuman and un-Christian. We conceive of our personal lifespan as the sum total of a series of phases in life, each of which as it is exhausted leads on to the next, the very meaning of which is to disappear into the next, to be a preparation for it, to 'exist' for the further stages beyond itself. Above all we conceive of youth and childhood in this sense. For at this stage above all most of our life has still to come. In relation to the future stages of life which still await us when we are children, therefore, this subordinate and preparatory function is at its most intense in childhood itself. And when that for which

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

childhood is a preparation arrives, then – such is our conception – childhood itself disappears. Now it is precisely the Christian above all who seems to lay special emphasis on the merely subordinate role of childhood, this character which it bears as preparation for the life that is to come, by comparison with the stage of adult life, which in consequence seems to be understood as life in the true sense, as the goal and measure of life. Of course it cannot be disputed that this kind of time, which unfolds uniformly in a single direction, is to be found in man as his history too. On this understanding of time the earlier stages of life are indeed rightly conceived of when they are regarded as subordinate to and preparatory for what is still to come, as practice for what follows, as giving place to a predetermined future. Woe to anyone at any stage of life, and so at that of childhood too, if he seeks simply to remain fixed at that particular stage, living it for its own sake as though idealising it, and making himself as he exists at that particular stage into his own god! Woe to him if he is not ready to relinquish that stage and to enter the coming one! If the present is not ready to bow down before the holiness and majesty of the future!

And yet this is only one part of the truth with regard to the sort of time involved in man's personal history. Man is not a thing that is simply pushed through the space-time dimension as though it were only in possession of the transient moment which is called the present. Man is a subject. He possesses himself. He is at all stages capable of taking himself as [35] a whole. And for this reason, in spite of the continuous process of change and the alternation of action and passion in the time to which he is subject, he has before him his time as a whole. As his life advances he retains the past and goes forward into a future that he has already worked out beforehand. By the exercise of his freedom he makes the time allotted to him present to himself as a whole, past and future together. Now because of this the totality of man's existence as saved and redeemed in its complete and consummated state, in other words the eternity towards which man is advancing in his time, does not constitute a further period appended to, and following upon his life in any true sense, as a further projection of it which could be conceived of in linear terms as extending into an unending future. Rather this eternity is the enduring validity of man's existence before God as lived in freedom. It is the abiding fruit, the sheer definitive consummation of man's time and of man's time as a whole. What confronts man as the goal towards which he advances in his historical existence, in his saving history, is not a further prolongation of incalculable extent added on to his present life. Rather he gathers up the totality of his life as freely lived, he achieves himself in the fulness of his subjectivity and freedom as determined by the content of life, just as at every moment of his temporal life he has already obtained a degree of self-possession such that it embraces the totality of his own life-span considered formally as an empty space to be filled out with content. He gathers himself up in his completed state. He finds himself. His temporal existence is not something which, so to say, he brings behind him, but something which he makes present to himself. He does not bring his temporal mode of existence to an end by quitting it, but by compressing it, so to say, and bringing it with him in its totality into his eternity which is his time as summed up and completed. His future is the making present of his own past as freely lived.

Now all this is every bit as true of childhood as it is of all the other individual phases of human life. Indeed it has to be asserted of childhood more clearly and more emphatically than of any other phase precisely because this one most of all suffers from the impression that it is a mere provisional conditioning for the shaping of adult life in its fulness, and, this being its only function, should be left behind as quickly and completely as possible and vanish into unreality. Childhood endures as that which is given and abiding, the time that has been accepted and lived through freely. Childhood does not constitute past time, time that has [36] eroded away, but rather that which remains, that which is coming to meet us as an intrinsic element in the single and enduring completeness of the time of our existence considered as a

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

unity, that which we call the eternity of man as saved and redeemed. We do not lose childhood as that which recedes ever further into our past, that which remains behind as we advance forward in time, but rather we go towards it as that which has been achieved in time and redeemed forever in time. We only become the children whom we were because we gather up time – and in this our childhood too – into our eternity. Throughout our entire life-span, and because of the decision which is required of us and which bears upon our life as a whole, childhood may always remain open. And we may still have to go on living through our own childhood in our life taken as a whole because it always remains an open question for us. But all this does not alter the fact that we do not move away from childhood in any definitive sense, but rather move towards the eternity of this childhood, to its definitive and enduring validity in God's sight. Childhood is not only of eternal significance for man's destiny to the extent that in childhood the foundations are laid for decisions which have an eternal significance. It is important not only as a point of departure for the adult man, having an influence beforehand on what actually takes place later and thereby on that which will finally takes place when the individual's life comes to its close. More than this it is important in itself also, as a stage of man's personal history in which that takes place which can only take place in childhood itself, a field which bears fair flowers and ripe fruits such as can only grow in this field and in no other, and which will themselves be carried into the storehouses of eternity.

All this is to put the matter in a very abstract and formal way. But if it is understood, then it imparts to childhood a value and an importance which are beyond all conception. Childhood itself has a direct relationship with God. It touches upon the absolute divinity of God not only as maturity, adulthood and the later phases of life touch upon this, but rather in a special way of its own. The special character of childhood may always be fading away so far as we are concerned, and may also disappear into that which comes afterwards in point of time, so that it seems only to derive its justification and its value from this, but this is not so. This morning does not derive its life simply from the afternoon which follows. This playtime with its beauty is not important simply as a prelude to life as lived in full earnest. It is unique. It has a value in itself (admittedly precisely as that [37] which contributes unreservedly to that which is to come). It is precious not merely because it seeks the riches of life in its maturity. The strange and wonderful flowers of childhood are already fruits in themselves, and do not merely rely for their justification on the fruit that is to come afterwards. The grace of childhood is not merely the pledge of the grace of adulthood. The values of imperishability and eternity are attached to childhood in its unique properties even in those points in which it differs from life in its broader phases. The fact that it contributes to the later stages of life is not the sole criterion of its own intrinsic rightness. It must be the case that childhood is valuable in itself that it is to be discovered anew in the ineffable future which is coming to meet us.

II. THE CHRISTIAN AWARENESS OF CHILDHOOD

What understanding of childhood is to be found in the Christian scriptures and tradition? That is the second question which we wish to put in this modest and fragmentary approach to a theology of childhood. Here there can be no question of supplementing the observations which follow with an exhaustive documentation or substantiation from scripture, still less from the innumerable witnesses of tradition. Even so I believe that it will be acknowledged that what is said here has the value of an authentic witness to the Christian awareness of what childhood means.

First and foremost the child is the man. Probably there is no religion and no philosophic

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

anthropology which insists so manifestly and so strongly upon this point as one of its basic presuppositions as does Christianity; the point namely that the child is already the man, that right from the beginning he is already in possession of that value and those depths which are implied in the name of man. It is not simply that he gradually grows into a man. He is a man. As his personal history unfolds he merely realises what he already is. He does not seek about in a void of indefinite possibilities ranging from all to nothing, to see what he can achieve by chance. He is equipped as a man, given his allotted task and endowed with grace to perform it right from the very outset with all the inexpressible value and all the burden of responsibility which this entails. And this, because it comes from God and because his personal history, in spite of being inextricably bound up with the history of the cosmos and of the life principle as a whole, is related with absolute immediacy to God himself, to his original creative and inalienable design for him. The child [38] is the man whom God has called by a name of his own, who is fresh and unique in each individual instance, never merely a 'case', a particular application in the concrete of a general idea, always having a personal value of his own and therefore worthy to endure for ever. He is not an element in a process advancing and receding incalculably like the tides, but the unique explosion in which something final and definitive is constituted. The child is the man who is, right from the first, the partner of God; he who opens his eyes only to keep that vision before him in which an incomprehensible mystery is regarding him; he who cannot halt at any point in his course because infinity is calling him; who can love the smallest thing because for him it is always filled with the all; he who does not feel the ineffable as lethal to him, because he experiences the fact that when he entrusts himself to it without reserve he falls into the inconceivable depths of love and blessedness. The child is the man, he, therefore, who is familiar with death and loves life, does not comprehend himself but knows this, and precisely in this (provided only that he commits himself to the incomprehensible one in trust and love) has precisely understood all, because thereby he has come into God's presence. The child is the man; the one, therefore, who always lives in a spirit of fraternity, leads a life of infinite complexity, knows no law other than that of endlessly journeying on and of great love and of that adventure which he can only recognise that he has come to the end of when he stands before God in his absolute infinitude. This is how Christianity views man and it sees all this already present in the child. And for this reason it protects the child while it is still in its mother's womb. It takes pains to ensure that the sources of life are not poured away upon the trifles of the lowlands of mere lust and desire. It has reverence for the child, for the child is a man.

The child is a man right at the very outset. Christianity is aware of the mystery of that beginning which already contains all present within itself and yet still has to become all; the beginning which is the basis and foundation of all that is to come, its horizon and its law, and yet at the same time cannot even come to its own fulness except in what has still to come in the future. Thus the state of childhood too, is regarded as the beginning of the state of manhood. The child is already spirit and body united in a single entity. It is already nature and grace, nature and person, possessing itself yet exposed to the influence of the world and of history, and for all this it has still to become all things in the future. What is already present in the child has still to be realised, to become actual in [39] experience. And this unity which exists between the beginning and the stage of full development is itself in its turn a mystery which man lives and to which he is subject, but which he does not preside over or control by his own power. It is only when his final completion has been attained that this origin of his is revealed to him; the origin in which he was set on his course. For he began as a child and as a child of God. It is not until evening that the morning has completely passed away.

Childhood is a beginning in two different senses. The assertions of Christianity do not make reality in general, and above all the reality of man, any simpler than it in fact is. Thus

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Christianity has the courage to recognise the duality which man experiences in his existence even in the very beginnings of that existence. Now man's existence as an individual is historically conditioned, and viewed in this light he is not simply pure beginning, unaffected by anything that has gone before. In spite of the immediacy to God which is his right from his origins as that unique and particular creature, fresh from the hands of God, he is the beginning which springs up in the midst of a pre-existing context, a history already wrought out by man before this particular individual arrived on the scene. And this history is, right from the outset, also a history of guilt, of gracelessness, of a refusal to respond to the call of the living God. The history of the guilt of mankind taken as an unity right from the beginning of that history regarded as a single whole is also a factor in the history of the individual. The love which brings grace to man, the love in which God himself with the fulness of his life gives himself to the individual is not simply, or in any obvious sense, an intrinsic element in a love which God might have born right from the beginning towards an humanity which did not fall into sin. Rather it is a love which endures despite the fact that sin rose to power in history right at the origins of the human race. In terms of the history of human existence this is the situation which the language of tradition calls original sin. It is a situation which radically and interiorly affects the individual, and in consequence of which the individual can count upon the grace which he needs, on the sheer proximity of God to shelter and sanctify him, not right from the beginning and in the very nature of humanity as such, but only in virtue of the redemption wrought by Christ. And for this reason Christianity knows that the child and his origins are indeed encompassed by the love of God through the pledge of that grace which, in God's will to save all mankind, Comes in all cases and to every man from God in Christ Jesus. But [40] Christianity cannot on this account regard the origins of childhood as a sort of innocent arcadia, as a pure source which only becomes muddied at a later stage and within the sphere of human cares in which man can control and guide his own course. It cannot view childhood as though prior to this stage it was simply the same as when it came from God as its eternal source, or as though for this reason, even in the context of the actual personal history of the individual and of mankind childhood might once more be wholly purified of every kind of blemish. No, Christianity views even childhood as already and inevitably the origin precisely of that man to whom guilt, death, suffering and all the forces of bitterness in human life belong as conditions of his very existence. But since all this remains within the compass of God, of his greater grace and his greater compassion, therefore this realism with which Christianity reacts to the very origins of man in the child and its beginnings is far from being any kind of implicit cynicism. Christianity's awareness of the guilt and tragedy which belong even to the beginning is, on the contrary, the necessary outcome of its awareness of the blessedness of grace and the redemption which overcomes this guilt and tragedy, and which comes both before and after it. For this is precisely the grace and redemption which the Christian experiences and to which he submits himself.

The child is a child. As soon as we look more closely into what is said about the child, especially in scripture, we notice that in reality it is almost always presupposed that we already know what a child is, so that no explicit information on this point is given to us. Thus the word of God itself indicates that we should rely upon the infinitely complex experiences of our own lives and our contacts with children in those lives as well as on the experience of our own childhood. It is the totality of this experience as summed up in the word 'child' that holy scripture draws upon when it tells us that we must become as children, that we are 'children' of God by grace, that even the children can come to the messiah, and that they both need and are capable of attaining to the kingdom of heaven, that they can believe in Jesus, that to give scandal to them is a crime to be punished by a terrible death. Thus scripture and tradition alike presuppose that we already know precisely what a child really is far more than they tell us this explicitly or treat of it as a distinct question. They leave it to our experience

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

to determine what a child is, and what it means to be a child. But when we consider this experience of ours is it not dark, complex and conflicting in character? Most certainly it is. But even as such it is sanctioned [41] by scripture and tradition, and in this sense we are obliged to put with the obscurity and complexity of our experience of childhood, not to try to iron out the complexities, but to endure them and still manage to be true to our own experience of children in arriving at an idea of what a child is. This is, in fact, only in conformity with the basic principles of which we have already spoken, namely that the child is the man himself in his incipient stages, and, what is more, man as divided within himself right at the beginning of his life and from the beginning onwards. In accordance with this the genuinely Christian understanding and the Christian experience of the child is both idealistic and realistic at the same time. The New Testament, no less than antiquity, the Old Testament and Judaism, shows itself aware of the factors of immaturity and weakness in the child (TWNT V 641, 41-48; 644, 46-645, 8), as can plainly be sensed not only in the writings of Paul (1 Cor 3:1; 13:11; 14:28; Gal 4:1-3; Eph 4:14; Heb 5:13), but also in the words of Jesus himself in the parable of the children in the market-place who are sulky in their play (Mt 11:16f.) But this does not mean that the 'little ones' are lightly estimated by Jesus in accordance with the attitude prevailing among his people and at his time. The children can serve him as examples of lack of false ambition, of not seeking for dignities or honours, of modesty and lack of artificiality in contrast to their elders, who are unwilling to learn anything from them (Mt 12:2 ff.; 19:13 ff.) When Jesus holds up the child to us as the prototype of those for whom the kingdom of heaven is there it cannot be said, even in a relative sense (much less in an absolute one), that what he is thinking of is its innocence. What is implied in this saying in which he holds up the child to us as an example is something far more important: that we can be like children in being receivers and as such carefree in relation to God, those who know that they have nothing of themselves on which to base any claim to his help, and yet who trust that his kindness and protection will be extended to them and so will bestow what they need upon them. And thus without glorifying children or failing to recognise the radical insufficiency of their natures Jesus does see in children those whom he can receive lovingly into his heart. This is what he means when he says 'Of such is the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 19:14). They are those with whom he identifies himself. The woes he pronounces are designed to protect them against scandal, and as he sees it there is an angel who watches over their salvation and who continuously beholds the countenance of the Father in heaven.

[42] For these reasons childhood is, in the last analysis, a mystery. It has the force of a beginning and a twofold beginning at that. It is a beginning in the sense of the absolute origin of the individual, and also the beginning which plunges its roots into a history over which the individual himself has no control. Childhood has the force of a beginning such that the future which corresponds to it is not simply the unfolding of some latent interior force, but something freely sent and something which actually comes to meet one. And it is not until this future is actually attained to that the beginning itself is unveiled in its significance, that it is actually given and comes to its own realisation, as a beginning which is open to the absolute beginning of God who is utter mystery, the ineffable and eternal, nameless and precisely as such accepted with love in his divine nature as he who presides over all things. Such a beginning as this cannot be otherwise than mysterious. And because it is a mystery, and because as a beginning it bears all one's future life within itself, therefore life itself is mysterious, something which is already endowed with a certain autonomy, albeit in a hidden manner, and freed from external control. Hence too, provided we reverently and lovingly preserve this state of being delivered over to the mystery, life becomes for us a state in which our original childhood is preserved for ever; a state in which we are open to expect the unexpected, to commit ourselves to the incalculable, a state which endows us with the power

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

still to be able to play, to recognise that the powers presiding over existence are greater than our own designs, and to submit to their control as our deepest good. In this state we become guileless and serene – serene in a Mozartian sense even in those cases in which we weep and are overcome by dejection, because even these tears we accept as they are sent to us, recognising that the sadness which they express is ultimately a redeemed sadness. And when our powers are at an end we realise in a childlike spirit that our task too is at an end, since no-one is tried beyond his own strength. When we take up this attitude we make the mystery the protection and defence of our lives. We are content to commit them to the ineffable as sheltering and forgiving, to that which is unspeakably close to us with the closeness of love. It is not as though the child as such, has already achieved this in any fully developed sense. But this is how we see the man who, in spite of the perilous state in which he stands, is open to such self-commitment to the protection of the mystery of existence, recognising that the duality of his nature is always more than compensated for by the deed of God wrought upon him. And therefore the kingdom [43] of heaven is for those who are children in this sense when, on the basis of this attitude of openness, and not without a certain metanoia, they become what they are – precisely children. Now this also implies, however paradoxical it may appear, that we do not really know what childhood means at the beginning of our lives until we know what that childhood means which comes at the end of them; that childhood, namely, in which, by God-given repentance and conversion, we receive the kingdom of God and so become children. It is in this sense that we only recognise the child at the beginning of life from the child of the future. And in the light of this, once more, we can understand that childhood invokes a mystery, the mystery of our whole existence, the ineffable element in which is God himself.

III. THE FULNESS OF CHILDHOOD CONSISTS IN BEING CHILDREN OF GOD

We have now reached a stage at which we can take a third point as the object of our enquiry. In a theology of children something must also be said about what it means to be a child of God. At first this may appear strange. The idea of being God's child stands for a reality which seems to be associated with the first phase in human life only through a metaphorical, i.e. inappropriate, application of the concepts of 'child' and 'childhood' to our relationship with God, and therefore to be wholly excluded from the area in which these concepts of child and childhood can be applied in their proper sense. What is correct in this objection is that in a consideration of the theology of childhood as such we cannot undertake the task of pursuing the Christian message of what it means to be a child of God as such. A theological discourse on justification and the grace of childhood in this sense, and as understood theologically, would certainly not be appropriate at this point. But for all this it may be permitted to draw attention to this topic in connection with the subject we are investigating here, because to do so will serve to bring home to us more forcibly the significance and value of childhood in the human sense of the term. The real situation here is not simply that we already possess concepts of child and childhood in the purely human and natural sense, which are then applied in a secondary and metaphorical sense in order to express a religious reality. Rather the primary meaning in itself which, because it is primary seems to be merely human, is in its turn illuminated [44] and deepened by the fact of being applied in the theological sense. In other words it is only through the revelatory usage of the terms 'child' and 'childhood' that the depths and fulness of the human concepts as such can be realised and appreciated in their entirety. For this reason it is surely justifiable to say something of what it means to be a child of God, even in a context in which we are strictly speaking concerned only to say something about the ideas of child and childhood in a human sense. This is, in fact, the situation at this point, and this for a twofold reason. It will be valuable to consider this, and in this way, by including the human and theological concepts of childhood in one and the same treatment, we can ensure that they will constantly reflect and throw light upon each other.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

First it is generally recognised what a decisive influence the experience of a secure childhood can have in the majority of cases for that attitude of commiting oneself to trust in the radical and metaphysical sense, which has a vital and basic function to perform in religion, considered as that which unites us to God as our Father. Certainly this cannot be exaggerated. One must not conceive in terms that are too absolute of the connection between the child's actual experience of his father on the one hand, and the possibility of achieving a relationship to God as Father in the absolute sense by faith on the other. It is perfectly possible that a lack of protection, a lack of that sheltering solicitude and security which comes from the love of one's parents, may actually serve to spur us on to the metaphysical quest for one who will provide us with our ultimate support, who will sustain us and protect us. Otherwise it would in fact be rather difficult to meet the objection that religion in general is only the projection of the father image into the dimension of the infinite, and as such a sort of colossal infantilism. We must, then, observe due caution in deciding where the connection lies between the experience of a childhood that is protected and secure and religious experience. But even allowing for this there is a further point that cannot be contested. We may take the case of one who has never been able to realise in this way what a close relationship with his father means, one which he has felt that he could absolutely rely upon to provide him with love, protection and security. It is precisely such a one as this who can only succeed with difficulty in achieving that idea of God's Fatherhood which he needs, at the level of conscious thought, so that he can express this idea and objectify it to himself in terms of the ordinary categories of thought and action which he uses in his life. Yet it [45] is only so that he can attain to that attitude of radical trust in the very basis of existence, that submissive and trustful self-commitment to the mystery which permeates and presides over the whole of existence, the mystery of God's protective and forgiving love and absolute nearness to him.

In the majority of cases it is true to say that only one who has been able to learn that the names 'father' and 'mother' stand for a protecting love to which he can unquestioningly trust himself – only he will find the courage trustfully to give the name 'father' to that ineffable and nameless source which upholds him in being (and yet this is the primary concept of true religion), to recognise that he has not been swallowed up by it, but that he has found the very source of his own existence in it and has been empowered by it to be really and authentically himself. And conversely: in those cases in which the individual, while he is a child, feels himself to be bereft of protection and abandoned, he will almost inevitably interpret this as the experience of lack of protection in an ultimate and metaphysical sense, as abandonment to absurdity and meaninglessness, to his own personal deprivation of God. He will not overcome the subsequent experiences of life's hardships, and sometimes psychological traumas, by having recourse to the experience of a secure childhood which was able to assent to meaning and to life without reserve. Rather he will interpret this as the logical further projection of that experience of insecurity, of a childhood devoid of love and protection, which was his in the beginning, when life for him was so empty and so devoid of promise. Now this reference to a fact which is recognised by, and a major preoccupation to those engaged in religious pedagogy and depth psychology only serves to emphasise still more the further fact that the human circumstances and the human concept of child and childhood is of the utmost importance for the way in which we understand and apply in religious terms those realities which are expressed by the transferred concepts of child of God, God the Father, etc. However it has still not been made clear that what has been said so far has brought to light a further point, namely that the relationship between the two contexts, the human and the divine, works in the opposite direction. Now this is precisely what is of interest to us at this point.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In order to develop this point the following consideration has to be borne in mind (and here we come to the second stage of our investigation). By way of preliminary it might be asked in a more formal and [46] logical manner what, in view of what has been said, the situation is with regard to the so-called 'transference' of concepts at least in specific instances: Whether in all cases a concept, a word, is only 'transferred' to another context after the particular characteristics of both contexts are already known independently one of another, and after certain points in common have in this way been established from among these characteristics, which make this process of 'transference' natural; or, on the other hand, whether there are also cases, at least in addition to the first-named, in which the so-called 'transference' is precisely the original mode in which the second state of affairs is known, and in which the knowledge of the first comes to its true fulness. Let us take the case of one who, from his knowledge of the Christian approach to ontology in general, knows what the position is with regard to the concept of being, and how he should express the idea of God as the being who is in absolute possession of being as such. Such an one knows what is meant by this second of the two alternatives we have presented. We do not know that a given object which is presented to our experience is a being, and only then go on to infer that God too is a being, only one of particular power and depths, so that this predicate of being can be applied to him too in a more particular manner. Rather the very fact that man recognises a being is in itself something that takes place within a general sphere governed by the transcendental, non-objective knowledge of being. Our non-objective awareness of this sphere in itself always includes – even though in a non-objective and unexplicit manner – the being in the absolute who possesses all being, namely God. The very fact that we recognise a being means that we have this awareness of God at least implicitly. And when this initially implicit awareness is turned into objective knowledge, then we also achieve a better and deeper awareness of what is really meant by calling that object which we directly experienced a being. In this case at least the process of 'transference' is not a subsequent poetic invention, but rather throws light upon the basic movement of the spirit itself, which only grasps something in that it first moves into the sphere of this 'something', grasps it in that it draws it back to the know himself in his sphere, and so 'transfers' it. In other words it is only by being transferred that that which is transferred to the knower's own ground is brought to its true status, the status of intelligibility. Now it is at least possible that this may also be the case when we 'transfer' the experience of a child-parent relationship in the earthly and human sense to a relationship with God, and then speak in a 'transferred' or metaphorical [47] sense of God as Father. For only thus can we know how to call upon the nameless by name. We repeat: it is at least possible that this is the case. But that it actually is so in fact, in other words that the human concept of childhood and parenthood is only fully realised when it is transferred to God, because the transference involved here is at a sublime level – this is a point that must be made clear by approaching the question from a quite different angle.

By way of preparation let us recall (and in fact this means harking back to the first point in our considerations as a whole) that childhood is not a state which only applies to the first phase of our lives in the biological sense. Rather it is a basic condition which is always appropriate to a life that is lived aright. For in the last analysis all the stages of life have an equally immediate relationship to God and to the individual's own ultimate perfection, even though in saying this we must fully recognise the fact that man's life advances towards God precisely through a time-sequence consisting of a series of stages following one upon another. But if childhood as a basic condition were not applicable to a rightly orientated life at all times the principle stated above could no longer be upheld. And there is a further point that everyone understands, namely that for our existence to be sound and redeemed at all,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

childhood must be an intrinsic element in it. It must be a living and effective force at the roots of our being if that being is to be able to endure even in the depths of the mystery. Childhood as an inherent factor in our lives must take the form of trust, of openness, of expectation, of readiness to be controlled by another, of interior harmony with the unpredictable forces with which the individual finds himself confronted. It must manifest itself as freedom in contrast to that which is merely the outcome of a predetermining design, as receptivity, as hope which is still not disillusioned. This is the childhood that must be present and active as an effective force at the very roots of our being. Everyone understands too that the childhood which belongs to the child in the biological sense is only the beginning, the prelude, the foretaste and the promise of this other childhood, which is the childhood proved and tested and at the same time assailed, which is present in the mature man. In other words we must take childhood in this latter sense as the true and proper childhood, the fulness of that former childhood, the childhood of immaturity.

But once we perceive the unity which exists between the childhood that comes at the beginning of our lives and the mature childhood, and once [48] we realise the light which each throws upon the other, then it easily becomes clear that childhood in itself, and even at the human level, entails an orientation to God, that it achieves perfection in that relationship which we call being a child of God, that it is not merely a question of metaphor, the transference of a word from one objective situation to another similar one, in which the comparison is merely secondary and incidental. Here it is rather the reality of childhood in the human sense that is 'transferred' into childhood in the divine sense. For if childhood (and this applies to childhood in the human sense as well) is openness, is trustful submission to control by another, the courage to allow fresh horizons, ever new and ever wider, to be opened up before one, a readiness to journey into the untried and the untested (and all this with that deep elemental and ultimate trust which seems inexhaustible in its endurance, the trust which the sceptics and those who have made shipwreck of their lives bitterly describe as 'naïve') then in all this that transcendence of faith, hope and love in which the ultimate essence of the basic act of religion precisely consists is already ipso facto an achieved and present fact. It is a transcendence in which the act of encountering and coming to terms with the world can be elevated to a religious act, the ideas in which we apprehend the world can be elevated to the level of prayer, and the active control which we exercise over our worldly affairs can be elevated to a point at which we are moved and inspired. In this religious act our first intimations of God are attained, although we do not presume to have acquired any kind of comprehensive knowledge of him. Now it belongs to the essence of such an act that it should not hold back at any point, that its outward movement into the boundlessness of God should proceed without restraint or inhibition, that it should not come to rest at any other point except that of total self-abandonment to the incomprehensible infinitude of the ineffable mystery. And it follows from this that it can be asserted truly and without reserve that man remains religious when he experiences the childhood which is an elemental factor in his nature, when he adopts this and maintains it as his basic attitude and outlook, and allows it to develop to the full and without limitation.

Childhood is openness. Human childhood is infinite openness. The mature childhood of the adult is the attitude in which we bravely and trustfully maintain an infinite openness in all circumstances and despite the experiences of life which seem to invite us to close ourselves. Such openness, infinite and maintained in all circumstances, yet put into practice in [49] the actual manner in which we live our lives, is the expression of man's religious existence. Now this infinite openness of existence which we maintain, and which is childhood in the developed sense, can have its counterpart in our experience in the form of an infinite and loving self-bestowal on God's part. We can experience the fact that it is because of this self-bestowal of God that we do maintain our basic openness. And this openness of ours as men is an infinite openness, which we accept from God, which is upheld by his act of self-bestowal and basically made possible by him. Now it is this openness that constitutes the very essence of childhood in the mature sense, and it is nothing else than what is called in theological language childhood of God, the grace of divine sonship in the Son. When, therefore, human childhood finds the courage to be true to its absolute essence, when it realises its own nature as an openness that is unconditional and infinite, then it moves on to a further stage, projects itself by a process of 'transference' to the ultimate consummation of its own nature, to the childhood of man before God as orientated to him and proceeding from him.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We are told in Eph 3:15 that all Fatherhood in heaven and on earth derives its name from the one and eternal Father who is God. We can go on from this to say also that all childhood in heaven and on earth derives its name and its origin from that one childhood in which the Logos itself receives its own nature in the act of eternal generation by the Father, in which we ourselves are admitted by grace to become participants in this self-bestowal of the Father upon the Logos and so have a share in the divine nature. In the last analysis, therefore, human childhood is not transferred by some dubious process of metaphorical or poetic transference to a quite different reality which we call childhood of God, but rather has its ultimate basis in this itself, so that the latter is always and right from the first contained in the former, and finds expression in it. What a mystery a child is! So writes the poet. Yes indeed! Childhood is only truly understood, only realises the ultimate depths of its own nature, when it is seen as based upon the foundation of childhood of God. And when we really want to know what the real connection is between human childhood and childhood of God, then we need to commit ourselves to the infinite depths and power of that transcendental movement which is latent in human childhood itself, and allow ourselves to be projected from this into that which is enjoined upon us in the Christian teaching about the Father in heaven, and about men who have [50] received the grace from the life of God himself to be children of God and brothers and sisters of one another.

From this view we can then turn our gaze back once more to the child in a biological and social sense as well. In the child a man begins who must undergo the wonderful adventure of remaining a child forever, becoming a child to an ever-increasing extent, making his childhood of God real and effective in this childhood of his, for this is the task of his maturity. It is only in the child that the child in the simple and absolute sense of the term really begins. And that is the dignity of the child, his task and his claim upon us all that we can and must help him in this task. In serving the child in this way, therefore, there can be no question of any petty sentimentality. Rather it is the eternal value and dignity of man, who must become a child, that we are concerned with, the man who only becomes a sharer in God's interior life in that he becomes that child which he only begins to be in his own childhood.

About fifteen years ago I met a well-known positivist philosopher of the Jewish race, one upon whom the fate of his people had left its mark, and who was oppressed by all the agonising questions which his calling and the responsibility of his mission in life raised for him. He asked himself whether he believed in God. And the answer he gave to himself and to others was 'I do not know'. But in saying this he added, 'That we are children of God – that I do believe.' Now perhaps we understand what is sought to be expressed here in a paradox. He who has the courage to accept and to preserve the pure spirit of childhood within him, and to carry it with him throughout his life – he it is who finds God. And he who accepts in this sense the childhood that is in his brothers and sisters has already found God. This is a truth which is present in a very real sense in the text of scripture itself. For what we find written there (though here, it is true, we are turning a negative formulation into an affirmative one) is: 'If you become as children you will enter the kingdom of heaven', and 'He who receives a child such as this in my name receives me' (Mt 18:5).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[51]

4

THE SACRAMENTAL BASIS FOR THE ROLE OF THE LAYMAN IN THE CHURCH

The subject on which I have been called to speak is entitled ‘The Sacramental Basis for the Role of the Layman in the Church’. The topic to be treated of here, therefore, is one which belongs to the realm of Catholic dogmatic theology. In the very nature of the case, therefore, as also with regard to those to whom this paper is addressed, the acceptance of the Christian faith is presupposed. This does not of itself mean, however, that it is a theme which should evidently be treated of only in the pulpit, or one which could only be conceived of as a kind of parenesis, an exhortation addressed to the Christian to do that very thing which, as a matter of faith, he has already committed himself to long since. For there are enough subjects to be found in the field of dogmatics which are certainly not matters of dispute, which in a certain sense every Christian holds to be true as a matter of faith, which even become present to him in the awareness of his faith as manifest truths when explicit reference is made to them, but which, nevertheless, remain for the most part far too much at the implicit level in this awareness of his faith, are far too little thought out, play far too little part in the normal outlook and attitude which the average Christian strives to bring to bear on the realities of his faith, for them to be able to constitute an effective, formative or decisive force in the concrete practice of Christian living. In this sense we can point to a phenomenon which might be called the heresy of forgetfulness, of inadvertence, of inertia, and which is possible even within the Church’s fold, and that to a very advanced degree. Now to speak of such truths and realities of faith explicitly, to express them with all due conceptual exactitude, is a function not merely of preaching but also, and primarily, of speculative theology itself. And such theology is not merely the preserve of the theologians, but is also of concern to every Christian whose general intellectual awareness is such that he must either [52] allow his faith to become an active force in his thinking, or else incur the danger of losing this faith as an effective force in his existence. Now the reality to which expression has been given in the title to this paper is to be numbered so it seems to me, among truths and realities of his kind.

Let us be honest and clear-headed. Certainly much has already been said during the past four decades of the necessity of the Church becoming a living force in the spirit and heart of the faithful; of the fact that the Christians are the Church and should not merely be regarded as subject to her directives and the object of her solicitude and protection. Movements have indeed arisen in the fields of Catholic action and liturgy and work upon these is still progressing. But for these to be significant and effective at all a necessary prior condition is that the average understanding of the relationship between Church and layman shall be reappraised. Nevertheless the fact must be faced that ever since the end of the patristic age of the Church has become, not indeed in theory, not in her innermost understanding of her faith, but certainly to a large extent in average and everyday conception and practice, a Church of mere institutionalism, a clericalised Church. For her all those not included in the ranks of the clergy, the laymen, are the object of her direction and care, of instruction and leadership, to whom grace and salvation must be applied in each individual case. But they have not, properly speaking, themselves taken an active part in the constructive work of the Church or in helping to support her. In view of this we must not expect that in the space of four decades (in other words since the end of the First World War) a radical alteration has already been brought about in a mentality which is the outcome of a history now one-and-a-half millennia old. In the centuries of the great shifts of population the Church came to the barbarian peoples as the representative of a cultural force higher than their own. But her members were not in a position to make actual in any way at all their basic function as constitutive elements in the Church. In the Investiture Controversy and similar episodes the Church had definitively to dissociate herself as an hierarchical entity from the secular and civic community, so as to overcome the danger which had arisen from circumstances reaching far back into the past of the emperor usurping the prerogatives of the Pope. In the time of the Reformation the Church was compelled to set bounds to the demands of the laity, which arose with the onset of the new age and which in themselves were due and timely, that the universal priesthood of all Christians should be actualised in the Church, and to [53] confine this demand within those limits which are, as a matter of divine law, inherent in the hierarchical structure of the Church. These limits are thrown still more clearly into relief when the forces of democracy and social reform first begin to make their impact at the beginning of the new age in movements such as that of the renaissance, the Peasants' Revolt, the Anabaptist movement, etc., which must not be confused with that other tendency, similar in appearance indeed, and occurring about the same time but nevertheless essentially different, for the laity in the Church consciously to assume an active role in helping to discharge her responsibilities.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

All this should cause us neither disappointment nor surprise. So far as concerns the awakening awareness, in any concrete or effective sense, that all Christians have this active function to perform in the Church we are still in the initial stages. The Spirit of God in the Church palpably presses us on to giving practical effect to this new awareness. But God grant of his providence that it may not turn out that the only way of achieving this will be for the Church so to be reduced to the 'little flock' that those belonging to her come spontaneously to be united in the closest possible spirit of fraternity, when each individual – and this includes each individual member of the clergy as well – realises that now all and each must play their part! For in such a case, those who aspire to the honour and dignity of making an active contribution to the work of the Church will have to realise that this can only mean toil and danger for them, and that they must be ready for the ultimate sacrifice. And we must not wait until we are only too glad to provide opportunities for them to play an active part in this way on the grounds that there are all too few individuals left in the Church to lay claim to such an honour. For when we take a sober and unromantic view of the real, average, day-to-day outlook and attitude of the individual members of the Church what do we see? We are compelled to reply: 1. That the Church still persists in being an institution supported exclusively by the clergy, an institution catering for the eternal salvation of the rest of men, the so-called laity, by mediating the truth of divine revelation and sacramental grace to them, and 2. That the layman in the Church is still regarded as the 'layman' in the sense of the non-expert, the non-specialist in ecclesiastical matters. In other words the term carries no further implication than the purely negative assertion that such an individual is precisely excluded from the official administration of the Church, the dignities and functions which are the prerogative of those [54] who, in contrast to the laity, exercise a formative and representative function in the Church.

Of course this everyday and average outlook does not amount to a conscious and clear declaration in so many words that this is in fact the situation. Such an assertion would be heretical. But what still remains to be said about the layman over and above this merely negative estimate of his function is left vague and unexplicitated. It does not constitute any real or effective force in the awareness of the faithful in general or of the clergy in particular. It is not until urgent and pressing reasons arise for actually needing the layman that the other and more positive truths are recalled which, on any adequate conception of what the Church means in terms of the Catholic faith, must apply to the layman too. In such a situation the layman is suddenly confronted with these truths, and then we are surprised when he does not respond as swiftly and vigorously as we had really expected, and make a practical application of them in situations in which it is really the strains imposed on the clergy that are at stake.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But we should not be surprised at this, in view of the fact that the moment the threat to the Church becomes less palpably evident than it is precisely at the present moment, we so supinely (though certainly without any deliberate ill-will) allow ourselves to sink back into our former attitudes and let these truths with regard to the vocation of the layman to contribute actively in the work of the Church to recede into the background. In view of this there is one principle which needs to be stated, explained and proved not because it is new and unheard of, but because the long-established truth which it embodies is still far from having penetrated into the hearts and minds of us all sufficiently deeply. It is this: by sacramental consecration every Christian in the Church has been authorised and empowered for the task of actively co-operating in the work of the Church both interiorly and exteriorly. This task is laid upon every Christian as a duty, and he has been equipped to discharge it. Thus our immediate purpose here is simply to explain and to justify this one principle alone – nothing more than this. There are two points to be considered here: first, what this task is, which the Christian – every individual Christian in the Church – has laid upon him for which he is equipped; second, the means by which he is effectively called and equipped for this task, namely the sacraments which he receives. But it will be simplest to take both these points simultaneously and to develop them in a single line of argument. On any other approach we could not avoid being excessively repetitious.

[55] It is through baptism that one becomes a Christian and a member of the Church. Baptism is the first sacrament of the forgiveness of sins, that in which the grace of divine glory is mediated, that by means of which we are admitted to a share in the divine nature and equipped interiorly and permanently with faith, hope and love for God and man. But how is this interior and permanent grace imparted to the individual man in baptism, transforming him from a sinner into one who is justified? It takes effect in him in virtue of the fact that through this initiation rite he is received into the people of God constituted as an hierarchical society, that is into the community of the believers and of those who acknowledge salvation from God in Christ. It is in virtue of the fact that God incorporates man into the Church in baptism that he gives him the grace he needs for his own individual salvation. The state of belonging to the Church, of being incorporated as a member of the Church, is the first and most immediate effect of this sacrament of initiation, which every Christian receives. For all Christians it is this that constitutes the basis for their being Christians at all, and so for each and every function, whether it derives from hierarchical office or sacramental power or rank, with which the individual Christian can be invested in his life. For if he is not baptised then he can no longer validly receive any other sacrament, nor lawfully be invested with any official power in the Church. It is in virtue of the fact that baptism makes man a member of the Church that it gives him the grace to attain to his own salvation. Are we to conclude, then, that the sole and exclusive purpose of this membership of the Church which is imparted through baptism is precisely that the baptized individual may then go on to receive these further benefits, namely his own individual sanctification and justification? To suppose this would precisely be to deprive the principle we have just enunciated of its real force, and this must at all costs be avoided. How utterly false such a supposition would be appears simply from the fact that this purely individual justification and sanctification can, in cases of need, be attained to through faith and charity alone without the sacrament, and that this does certainly take place in the case of many unbelievers. It follows that over and above these particular effects of the salvation of the individual baptism must have a further significance in terms of its positive effects, one which cannot be reduced to this effect of individual salvation. Membership of the Church is not simply a means of attaining to the goal of one's own private salvation, but rather has a meaning of its own which it derives from baptism itself. This [56] is something which follows necessarily from the meaning and function of the Church in general. And if we ask what this meaning may be, we can only reiterate the point

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which we have just made.

The significance and purpose of the Church is not merely or exclusively to make possible or to facilitate the attainment of salvation in the sum total of many individual cases. For while the Church could be regarded as making a useful and significant contribution to this end, her existence is not absolutely necessary for it in view of the fact that this purpose is in fact often achieved even without any evident intervention on the Church's part. This is not, of course, to deny that since salvation is to be achieved through obedience to God's commandments and a readiness to receive his prescribed sacraments this too is normally to be attained to within the Church. But in the concrete there is one thing that is absolutely impossible without the Church (even if in the abstract it might be possible to conceive of this Church as constantly varying in the forms and constitutional structures which she assumes). This single factor is that the grace of God in Christ is present in the world as an event, and an event which is manifest and enduring in history and incarnate in a physical body. It should be remembered that God has willed to bestow himself as salvation and forgiveness, and to permeate the world with his divinity in an act of supernatural 'pan*en*theism' (if we may make so bold as to express it in this way) only in the incarnation of his Logos, and presumably he could only will to achieve it in this way. And because of this it is of the essence of this particular grace, and belongs to the innermost nature of this self-bestowal of God which penetrates with its 'divinising' influence into the very depths of man's heart in his ultimate free decision as an individual, that it should be actually manifested in the dimension of space and time, that it should have a place in history in the here and now, that it should be projected beyond all mere interiority of the conscience and extended to all the dimensions of human life including the history, the social and political living, the laws, the science and the art which belong to it. Because salvation comes in the flesh of Christ, and because man has to be made whole in and throughout all the dimensions of his existence in their mutual interdependence and influence one upon another, it follows that grace must be embodied, must be an historical and social reality. That grace, as made immanent in these dimensions is called the Church. He, therefore, who is endowed with faith through baptism in that he is incorporated into this Church as an historical and social embodiment of the [57] grace of Christ in the world necessarily obtains, together with this grace of the Church, the right, the task and the necessary equipment to become an active participator in this function of the Church, that namely of being the historical concretisation of the grace of God in the world. To express the matter in another way: grace has a force that actively constitutes the Church in virtue of the fact that it is conformed to Christ in the sense that it is 'incarnational'. From this it follows that even though the actualisation of this essential property of grace may remain at a completely rudimentary stage in many cases, still it must be constitutive of the Church in this sense wherever it is found. When, therefore, this grace is actually present as essentially belonging to the Church herself, in other words as sacramental, its function as constituting the Church must attain a higher degree of actualisation, and must equip those who receive it still more fully. In other words it must so incorporate the individual into the Church that in very truth he does become a member, in other words an actively functioning unit in this community, and an active participant in the basic functions of this community.

Now given that the Church is of this nature, that it is the historical concretisation of the grace of God in the world in which every baptised individual obtains an active share through baptism what are the implications of this in the concrete? What is it that causes grace to create for itself a quasi-sacramental embodiment in the world in this way? It does this in virtue of the fact that it derives from Christ the incarnate word of God. It is because in this way it stands revealed most clearly and unmistakably in its true nature as a free act of God deriving not from forces intrinsic in the creation and coming from below, but rather directly from God's own sovereign initiative. In this way it can be accepted in its true nature. For it makes its impact not simply by diffusing itself constantly and all-pervasively throughout everything in the world, and therefore in a manner which makes it indistinguishable from the world. Rather it has a distinct historicity of its own. And the final reason for grace being accorded a quasi-sacramental embodiment in the world is that it must confront man as a free and embodied, and therefore historical person as such. In other words it must itself be historical in this sense. Thus the Church has not simply the function of mediating grace, such that strictly speaking the Church would be superfluous if this grace of God were, so to say, designed of itself to penetrate and percolate into man's innermost soul. The function of the Church is rather to provide an outlet by which grace [58] breaks out into the world, into history, into the social and communal life of man. She has the function of giving grace a concrete embodiment in the word, in the sacrament, in ecclesiastical law, in the concrete visible lives of those endowed with grace, simply in order to ensure that this grace may be extended into these spheres also, that these spheres also may be drawn into the kingdom of God, may become the body of the Logos. The Church is the quasi-sacramental word in which the all-pervasive activity of this grace becomes effective, in which it is made present in history with an exhibitive force, in which the fact that it has come and come victoriously is publicly proclaimed. And every individual who has been baptised has a share in this function. When we view the phenomenon of Christianity from this aspect the actual fact itself indeed remains unaltered, but the perspective in which it can be viewed surely does alter in certain notable respects, for now the Christian is no longer so much one who possesses grace (as though it were more or less certain that this is not the case with non-Christians) as one in whom grace is meant to be made manifest in the dimension of history. In fact can we say with certainty of any individual, even if he is unbaptised, that he certainly is not endowed with the grace of God, the forgiveness of sins? No. And in that case what precisely is the difference between those who are Christians ex professo and those who are so in an unacknowledged sense (if I may so refer to the unbaptised who are, nevertheless, justified)? The difference consists precisely in the fact that baptised Christians appear visibly in the dimension of history and before their fellows as those who have embraced the word and the sacrament, whereas the others are Christians only in the hidden dimension of their own interior consciences, informed by a faith that is only implicit and of which they may not necessarily be conscious in any explicit sense. And the explicit, i.e. baptised Christians have an absolute obligation to be what they are in this dimension of the historical and the social. The task is laid upon them to be true to this state which they have entered upon, to be upholders of the Church's function as the visible and social embodiment of grace, and they have really to embrace this state as a matter of personal decision, to undertake it and act upon it in every department of their lives. What applies to the Church applies also to the individual baptised Christian. By baptism he is deputed to be a bearer of the word, a witness of truth, a representative of the grace of Christ in the world. The unbaptised man is the object of the Church's solicitude, on whom she [59] brings to bear the force of her sanctification, her forgiveness and her grace. At the very moment when this takes place he who has hitherto been the object of the Church's solicitude is transformed into a member of the Church, into an element in the Church's subjective life and activity. He is no longer 'over against' the Church, but rather stands with the Church 'over against' the world. He is one who has been called, chosen, separated from the world. He must shine like the stars in heaven in the midst of a generation that is dark and desolate.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Of course even when the individual has been baptised the Church still continues to maintain her role in his regard. In relation to him she is the subject from whom he receives benefits, and to whose guidance he submits, while conversely in relation to her he is in the position of a recipient of favours. But with regard to one who is a member of her own self, subordinate to her, paying heed to her and led by her, and to whom she is related as subject to object, the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Church exercises this function of hers in a particular way, and, moreover, a way that is different from the way in which she acts towards one who is not baptised, although in fact she has claims over him too. But she would be quite incapable of acting in this particular way towards the baptised individual if he were not precisely also a member of her own self, one who shares in her own position as subject, and assists her in sustaining her active function. Moreover it must be emphasised that he does this precisely as a baptised individual, not only and not primarily as priest, bishop, as one vested with hierarchical authority in the narrower sense. For the peculiar nature of her relationship with the individual Christian is precisely determined by the fact that he is an active member of her in this sense, and that too even in cases in which she addresses herself to him in the name of Christ. Paul says at one point that God alone judges those who are without. The Church's power to judge is restricted precisely to those who are within. This is not because they must be more severely treated, but rather because they are something more than mere individuals. They are more because they have a function which is identified with that of the Church herself. When therefore the Church instructs her own members, calls them to order or sanctifies them, she is in fact safeguarding her own function as bearing witness in the world, and extending it to these as well.

In all aspects of her relationship to her own members one of the determining factors is the function which the Church herself maintains and exercises precisely through these members of hers in the world in general. [60] Paul finds no difficulty whatever in accepting the fact that those whom he is instructing have intercourse and fellowship with non-Christians. But he forbids them to have the same intercourse and fellowship with Christians who are sinners, and he reacts far more vigorously against the smallest deviation from the gospel as preached in the Church than against errors outside the Church. Again he is sensitive with regard to the impression which a communal assembly and their liturgical celebrations make upon non-Christians, and again in the Pastoral epistles we may search in vain for any real exhortation to the clergy to exercise any external apostolate. It seems, therefore, that no provision whatever is made for any 'propaganda' to those outside the Church, and that no particular necessity for this was felt. Now behind all these phenomena, and many others which we pass over here, we can discern a single underlying conviction, namely that each individual Christian manifestly shares in the responsibility for the Church and her functions as a whole. He is made a sharer in this responsibility precisely in virtue of the fact that he is a member of this Church. This is why when he falls into sin he is treated differently from an outsider. In failing in his own individual task, the contribution which he has to make to the holiness of the Church as the visible manifestation of the victory of God's grace in the world, he compromises the Church herself and her task as well. This is why the Church withdraws herself from the sinner by means of a kind of official ban or excommunication, because otherwise she herself would betray her own task. This is why the primitive Church had no misgivings in taking it for granted that the missionary work of the Church would be carried on without anything much in the way of systematic or official organisation, because in fact each individual Christian has to bear witness in his life to the fact that by his grace God has laid hold of his life to transform it and to fill it with his grace. Baptism, therefore, in that it admits the individual Christian to a place in the Church, initiates him into the basic function of the Church herself, in that she identifies herself with the imminent advent of the kingdom of God in the victory of his grace. And even in cases in which the Church's solicitude for the salvation of mankind is directed towards the individual himself as its object the Church cannot forget that the baptised individual is an object of such solicitude on her part in a totally different sense from the unbaptised. In caring for the salvation of the baptised the Church always takes cognizance of the further fact that he can only achieve this salvation of his if, and to the extent that he exercises his [61] active function in the Church, and in collaboration with her works for the salvation of the world by bearing witness to God's truth and God's grace.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It may be that baptism does not impart to the layman any new position in the world such as that occupied by the officials of the Church's hierarchy. In normal cases the only ones who can be official emissaries of the Church in the hierarchy of her apostolate are those who by their vocation are withdrawn from the secular position which they formerly occupied in the world in order to go forth to all peoples. But in normal cases the baptised layman, unlike these, continues in that secular sphere of life which he previously occupied in the world before he was baptised. In spite of this, however, he acquires through baptism another and a fresh task to be discharged precisely in this position in which he finds himself at the purely human level. For it is because of him that the Church is present precisely there. When we use the term 'Church' here this is not to be thought of simply as an externalising application of this concept to the Church as an organisation, or simply to her legal constitution, her influence as an organisation, as a 'perfect society', as visible in her own history. When we use the term 'Church' here and in this context what we mean by it is the grace of God, the power of God as faith, hope and charity, trust in the meaning of existence and its further projections into infinity in the deed of God. 'Church' here, therefore, is intended to signify truth, that liberating truth which alone can open up all human truth to the infinite and dazzling mystery of God. 'Church' in this context signifies the courage to commit oneself to eternity, the daring of that love in which man uncalculatingly and finally lets his entire existence fall into the incomprehensibility which we call God. When we speak of the Church then we mean by it all this precisely to the extent that this grace does not simply take effect somewhere in the deepest recesses of our conscience, so that we hardly dare to make contact with this infinite mystery of existence, but rather acquires a body, is unashamedly borne witness to (even if not in the high-flown phraseology of a Christianity that is pretentious), is joyfully lived, lovingly handed on to others, makes its impact in all dimensions of existence whether in life or in death. It is the Church in this sense, therefore, that we are speaking of here, and we shall say of the Church in this sense that through the baptised its presence must be made manifest. It must be there wherever one who is a Christian in this sense is there.

The mission of the baptised layman to share in the task of the Church [62] does not begin and end with the observance of peaceful Sunday devotions. It does not consist in any primary sense in Corpus Christi processions with the notables of the parish or the political party or the good Catholics. It does not mean casting one's vote in favour of the Catholic interest, nor yet in patiently paying the Church's dues. Rather it implies an awareness, so deep and so radical that it revolutionises everything, of the fact that the baptised man is constantly confronted with the task of a Christian precisely in that environment in which he finds himself and in which his life is passed, that is to say in the wholly natural context of his calling, in his family, the circles in which he lives, his nation and state, his human and cultural milieu. And this task consists in establishing the dominion of God in truth, in selflessness and in love, and thereby making what is truly essential to the Church's nature present in the setting in which he is placed, from the position which only he can occupy, in which he cannot be replaced by any other, not even by the clergy, and where, nevertheless, the Church must be. Of course once the layman takes up his task in this position of his he will undergo a further experience: for him this Church is the Church of truth, of kindness, of selflessness, of honourable behaviour, of courage, of a tacit harmony with the dark mystery of existence, a silent attitude of readiness and sure hopefulness with regard to death, and of a practical fulfilment of duty even when no further profit is to be attained from it. And he will experience the fact that this Church has representatives and champions who never know that this community, to which they belong by being true to it in their actions in this way, is precisely the people of God which, according to the will of God and Christ, attains tangible form as a society and an unequivocal place in history, in other words a quasi-sacramental value as an effective sign, precisely in the Church of Jesus Christ. This is because this anonymous Christianity, present

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in those who only think that they neither are nor should be Christians, does in truth live by, and bring to its fulness, that grace of Christ which finds its historical concretisation and embodiment precisely in the Church.

Now when we speak in this way of a Church of interior grace characterised by a love and faithfulness that are effective, and an attitude of acceptance towards death (in which faith and love are always brought to their consummation), then we are not indulging in any kind of conceptual sleight of hand, so as to substitute a different concept of the Church for the usual one. No, what we have in mind here is not in any sense an 'invisible [63] Church', but is precisely that which manifests itself in the concrete and visible Church. And even in those cases in which the Church has less of the outward form of a visible society, the reality of which we are speaking here still belongs to the Church and is in very truth orientated towards it. Nor do we underestimate the importance of the fact that the Church as a concrete and palpable entity should have the further quality of being visible. For indeed she both is and must be the concretisation in social and historical terms of that divine reality which we call grace and spirit. Now according to the teaching of this same Church this reality both can be and is already present and powerfully at work even in those areas in which she has not yet been unequivocally manifested to the world as an historical and social fact with a concrete embodiment of its own.

What we are asserting, therefore, is that the Christian, from his position in the world, and in the power he receives from his baptism, has to render present the victory of grace, of love and of faith, of the fact that the kingdom of God has arrived. And he has the responsibility of being a sign in the world and to the world of the eternal reality of salvation. But in making this assertion we are not for one moment denying that there are other Christians too, unprofessed Christians, present in the very milieu to which the professed Christian himself belongs. It is no mere hypothesis, but a sure fact, that such unacknowledged Christians are there, and in them the same power of grace has already begun to do its work. It is on their behalf too, therefore, that the professed Christian must bear his witness. This situation may make it more difficult for the professed and acknowledged Christian to stand out from the rest so clearly in the position he occupies in the world, in his family and his calling and in the task he has to perform in the world, to the extent that these others are ultimately quite unaware of the fact that they are Christians. Yet the professed Christian has to stand apart from the rest in such a way that the Church which he represents can very clearly be distinguished from the world in the worldly milieu in which she finds embodiment. But all this does not in any way alter the task and the special responsibility of the baptised Christian to make the Church present in that context in the world which he occupies as one who has been baptised. When God of his sovereign freedom distributes talents and graces to men, and causes the Spirit to move in them through all the byways of the world, this often has the effect, if we may so express it, of creating a rival to his own Church, for in doing this he raises up men outside the visible Church who are endowed [64] with graces belonging to his Church, men who are not yet incorporated into her visible and official structure, and who may only be so incorporated when the consummation of the ages has arrived and everything that has proved itself good and true is gathered into the Church to enjoy eternal life. But in spite of all this there is no reason for the baptised Christian to be any less conscious of his mission and his radical responsibility. Wherever he finds himself confronted by justice, right living, love, faithfulness, courage, consolation in life and strength in death in the world, there he knows that the grace of Christ is at work. Because without this grace even the natural human virtues do not in the long run endure, and therefore when they manifest themselves amid all the darkness and guilt of this world they bear witness to the grace of Christ, whether those possessing them realise it or not. And when the Christian encounters such natural human virtues in the world he cannot say 'See, even without Christianity and the Church

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

human goodness is achieved'. Rather he must say to himself: 'There has been achieved here that for which you have been sent, commissioned and endowed with grace twice and three times over by the finger of the living God when it sealed your soul and your life with the irremovable seal of baptism. Woe to you if in your life the witness to God's goodness shines out less brightly, less convincingly, than it has shone in the primæval forest of Lambarene, or in the case of Simone Weil, or in the lives of such as Wolfram Siewers and many others of whom we may think that the sign of Christ shines upon their brows even though they themselves appear to be unconscious of it. It is a fact that the Christian who is so ex professo through baptism is often sent to the unacknowledged Christian who is so through an interior grace which achieves its effects within him without his knowing it. And it is precisely because of this situation that the commission to share in the Church's task which is given with baptism becomes once more a mission to perform an act of total and unconditional obedience in faith, an act in which witness is borne to God even though this witness may seem not to be successful in winning over those to whom it is addressed to the point at which the witness itself can claim any credit for his work.

One point at least is clear. Through baptism a man becomes not only subject to the Church, bound by its rules, a sharer in its blessings, but a member of the Church as well, one who has to share actively in the performance of its functions. He has to be a witness to the event in which the victory of God's eschatological grace has arrived, in which God himself [65] becomes the salvation of the world, and in virtue of this the baptised Christian in the Church acquires a position which consists not primarily or exclusively in the fact that he is a subject for the hierarchy to exercise their authority upon, and is distinguished from the clergy simply by the fact that he is non-clerical. This much is clear and unmistakable. Something which bears upon the relationship between the various elements in the Church should not become the first point for consideration right at the outset. The nature of the Church cannot initially or adequately be described simply by pointing to the relationship which her individual members bear one to another, because in fact, in order rightly to determine how two elements in a whole are related one to the other one must first understand the nature of the whole itself. When, therefore, we set out to establish the exact legal status, the functions and duties of those vested with authority in the Church, and, as the outcome of this, the rest of the duties to be performed by the other members and functionaries who have to be subject to these established authorities, all this cannot count as a description of the nature of the Church, however essential the functions vested as a matter of sacred right in these officials of the hierarchy may be, and however many blessings they may bring on the Church, and however indispensable they may appear. But when we say that the Church is the Body of Christ, the enduring presence in history and in the world of his truth and grace, the effects wrought by the incarnate Word made abiding in the flesh, and when we say that every baptised individual shares in these because he is a member of this Body, then we have said everything, provided that we have really understood the principle which we have just stated.

We might, of course, go on to develop many particular aspects of what has been said up to this point. If we were to take this course we would have to point out that the Church's essential function as envisaged here is far from being confined to those powers which the officials in the Church can bring to bear, and which are of a legal and constitutional character. We would have to point out that there is such a thing as a charismatic factor in the Church which is no less vital as an element in its nature than the factors of the institutional and the official. We would have to point out that there is, and must be, an unfolding of conscious faith in the Church, a progress in the life of faith which is unplanned and which is the outcome of the Church's own experiences. And this is not controlled by the human designs of the Church's officials, but rather [66] guided by the Holy Spirit. It is true that the official teaching authority of the Church is not juridically dependent upon these movements of faith,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

but it is so in fact. We would then have to point out that the Spirit is far from choosing to produce his effects always and necessarily through the officials of the Church. Thus for this charismatic element in action, in faith and in love, which operates under the direct influence of the Spirit, the 'layman', on the basis of his membership of the Church through baptism, can be, and often enough is in practice, just as much the point of entry and the medium through which the Spirit operates as the cleric, so that he too has the duty of developing the sort of sensitivity to this movement in himself which will make him adequate for his position in the Church. We could then go on to remind ourselves that according to the words of Pius XII there must be, and in fact is, something corresponding to the factor of public opinion even in the Church, and that without this the Church would suffer damage in her shepherds and her flock alike, and that the laity inevitably are and must be to a large extent the upholders of this necessary factor of public opinion in the Church. We might draw attention to the fact that there must necessarily be something like a supernatural 'existential' ethic, even though what is normally designated as 'situation' ethics is a heresy. In other words, to put it briefly, the decision which the individual Christian takes at particular points in his life must indeed be brought into line with the universal principles as proclaimed by the teaching authority of the Church, but cannot be derived in any adequate sense from these alone. At this point, therefore, every individual and every Christian stands in an immediate relationship to God, one which does not withdraw him from the visible Church, but which cannot be left to its visible authority to sustain (even though this latter still continues to have its force as a norma negativa against deception). Moreover it would have to be pointed out that any such decision on the part of the individual Christian, in other words on the part of the so-called individual layman too (and here it must be pointed out that the immediate relationship to God involved in this must be thought of as wholly based upon the grace of baptism), has a vital significance not only for the individual concerned in his own private life but for the Church as a whole as well.

The role of the layman in the Church as constituted by baptism is to be understood, therefore, as deriving not primarily from the position of the clergy, but from the very nature of the Church herself. Naturally in any community of men organised as a society there must be a leadership and [67] this must be vested in specific individuals. Naturally in the Church of Christ this power of leadership is founded by Christ himself and not constituted by a democratic process from the rank and file upwards. But this is in virtue of the fact that the Church, and therefore the position, task and function of every member of the Church too, as instituted by Christ, stems from above. Thus if we take the analogy of a politically organised society, a people or nation, this does not owe its existence as such in the first instance to the fact that some political system is already available in the abstract. Rather it is the historical and human entity that is already in existence for the political constitution to be applied to it, and so to organise it into a society, in other words a people with a culture and communal organisation which has developed in the context of history. And just as the life of the people thus politically organised does not only, not originally, and not in any ultimate sense consist in the exercise of authority on the part of its officially constituted leaders, but rather these are in the position of servants contributing to the life of the people as a whole, so too it is with the Church. Even though its constitutional structure derives from above it is already in existence prior to this as the community of the redeemed, the believers, those who are impelled by the Spirit of God, those who are beloved by God, those who are called to eternal life. The life of the Church is embodied in the activities of all these. And in relation to this the members of the ecclesiastical hierarchy, precisely in their constitutional function as leaders of the Church, have to act as servants. The ultimate aim of all who work in the Church and for the Church is to ensure, as a living fact of faith, hope and love, that the grace of God shall be received as the life of God in the Church, that witness shall be born to the truth of God, to the faithfulness of God, to the hope of eternal life. In relation to this everything else in the Church, including the whole constitutional organisation into authorities and subordinates, and the provision for official leaders vested with authority, is only a means to an end. The provision for such authorities is designed for an end beyond themselves. They are there because the Church must exist, and what is in truth her primary task must be performed. But they are not in any sense an end in themselves. Their presence in the Church does not mean ipso facto that she has already arrived at that true flowering of her own true nature which she is intended to achieve. One might, therefore, go so far as to say in a very true and uncompromising sense that the clergy exist because the laity exist, and the term 'layman' is not in [68] any sense derogatory, but rather is equivalent to 'member of the Church'. For the Church is composed of these laymen, and in them she achieves her own fulness as the life of Christ in the world.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We have spoken of baptism as the sacramental basis for the position of the layman in the Church. Baptism provides a sacramental basis in this sense in virtue of the fact that through it the baptised individual receives his divine calling and is established in a position, i.e. in an enduring and inalienable form of life in which he makes an active contribution to the Church in the realisation of her own nature and destiny. But all that we have said of baptism applies in a still higher degree when we come to think of the sacrament of confirmation. In the last analysis it is not of decisive importance when we have received this sacrament of the outpouring of the Spirit, or how we have understood it. The decisive point is rather whether as confirmed individuals we finally come to notice at any point in our lives what has been achieved in objective reality in this sacrament, and what we have subjectively to accomplish by the strength which it confers. For a dogmatic theologian it is difficult to distinguish with complete precision between the two sacraments in their meaning and their effects. It is precisely as taken both together that they constitute a single initiation into Christian existence. Sacramentally speaking these two sacraments represent two distinct aspects of our Christian calling considered as a single entity. For this reason we do not need here either to make the attempt at separating or distinguishing the two sacraments from one another in any very explicit way. All that we feel is necessary to say here is this: the sacrament of confirmation is a sacrament of witness to the faith, of charismatic fulness, of the Holy Spirit, the sacrament in which those sealed with the Spirit are sent into the world to bear witness in order that the world may be made subject to the dominion of God. It is the sacrament of strengthening in the faith against the powers and forces in this world, the powers of lying and disbelief and of the diabolical hybris involved in attempting to work out one's own salvation. And if this is the significance of this sacrament, then we can realise still more clearly how little the Christian as confirmed layman is a mere object for the Church's educative and directive activities as exercised through the authority and leadership of her hierarchy. We can realise how much more he is placed in the position of one who has a mission and a task, a personal responsibility for the world in virtue of his initiation into Christianity.

Of all the other sacraments too it could be shown that they have an [69] ecclesiological aspect; that they do not merely constitute so many events in which one's own salvation as a private individual is conferred and catered for. On the contrary they are meant to contribute to the Church as a whole. So true is this, indeed, that they always have the further significance, over and above their immediate effects, of initiating the recipient into an active task in the Church. And this is the case with all the sacraments including those which every layman receives. The sacrament of penance, as the sacrament of reconciliation with God and the Church, is in fact the sacrament in which the fulness of what was conferred in baptism and confirmation is restored, and in which the initiation which they bring is, in a certain sense, re-activated. This is true also, therefore, with regard to being assigned a definite position in the Church. He who receives the Spirit anew receives him (as the Fathers of the Church have explicitly realised) as the Spirit of the Church and precisely in virtue of the fact of being reconciled with the Church. And therefore he receives the Spirit precisely as willing to seize upon, save and fill with the life of God himself the world which belongs to the community of the believers, these believers being themselves filled with the Spirit. It is in this guise that the Spirit bears witness to himself through the existence of the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The fact that the sacrament of the Eucharist is a sacrament of unity with the Church achieved through being filled with the Spirit, the Church's own bread of unity in love, and that it is not, in the first instance, a sort of sacramental private audience with God in heaven – all this is in fact a recognised truth. He, therefore, who receives this Bread of life can do nothing else (provided that he knows what he is doing) than to receive from the Spirit which the Body of Christ imparts to him the power of the unity, this expression of the highest unity of eternal life, is something that all Christians receive in the same way; none of them, therefore, has any prior claim over the others in this, which constitutes the supreme sacramental expression of the whole essence of Christianity. Certainly this sacrament above all, as symbolising and deepening and rendering ever more effective the unity of the Church, must of its very nature give expression to the hierarchical structure of the Church in the manner in which it is celebrated. The Last Supper of the Lord, in which all share, since all are loved and redeemed in the same manner, must be celebrated in a way that has been fore-ordained, and that is in conformity with the will of Christ himself in that the bishop or priest has the presiding role. Without an officially worked out order of celebration of this kind no celebration [70] of the Eucharist of the Lord could be conceived of as the celebration of the Church herself. But precisely as ordained in this way, the Last Supper of the Lord is designed in the intention of Christ himself, for all Christians, for the Church as a whole. Certainly it is through the officially deputed ministers of the Church that Christ extends this Bread of eternal life to us, but he extends it to all. And it is true even of the ordained minister, the member of the hierarchy, that he achieves the fulness of his personal Christian life in virtue of the fact not that he imparts, but rather that he receives this sacrament like every other Christian. It is in this way that as incorporated into the Body of the Lord he becomes filled with his Spirit and so finally achieves in this the highest act of his personal life, one which, once more, he has in common with all Christians: that he believes, hopes and loves.

The fact that marriage directly imparts to the Christian a social and ecclesiastical function, a position which has its basis in the world but in the Church as well, is something that hardly needs to be gone into at any great length here. It is through the sacrament of marriage that the actual common life of those who have been united by it is dedicated as the effective sign of the unity between Christ and his Church. It is through this sacrament, therefore, that the community of the married actually comes to constitute a Church. And while marriage does not impart an irremovable character to its recipients as do baptism, confirmation and orders, nevertheless it is true of marriage too that so long as it lasts as an enduring bond between two Christians in this world and in the time appropriate to it, in other words until the death of one of the two parties to the marriage, it has the force of an abiding sign of grace. It is a sign that this grace of Christ is always extended to the partners to the marriage, and always ensures that this particular state shall endure in the Church as well. For marriage has the force of inaugurating men into the closest and most intimate kind of unity that exists, and at the same time of imparting a sacramental consecration and an imperishability to this community, turning into a sort of microcosmic 'local Church'. For this community consists precisely in the 'two-in-one-flesh' relationship of two married individuals, such that the community thereby constituted represents for them a Christian grace and a Christian task to bring salvation into the world.

It must be remembered that the death of the Christian, and, together with this, the right attitude with which he endures the death-throes when [71] these press in upon him (even in

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

cases in which they are overcome and he is restored to health once more) is an act of dying with Christ, an acceptance of death in faith, hope and love as the ultimate reality of life which has been redeemed by Christ and accepted by him in person. It must be remembered too that the death of Christ, even though he died this death in circumstances of the most cruel loneliness that could be conceived of, not the most private event in his life, but rather one of cosmic dimensions, in which all was redeemed and the world was cleansed of its guilt. And if this is true, then too our death as a dying with Christ must also have a significance that extends to all men. We suffer together with all, and for all in the fate in which all are ultimately made equal, and the death we die, because it is hidden in the death of Christ himself is one that generates life. And therefore it is not surprising that even in this moment of the uttermost loneliness, the Church does not let man simply fall into this ultimate incommunicability of death, death as the most solitary of events, but actually accompanies man in this moment through the sacrament of Extreme Unction, the sacrament specially designed for this moment of the death throes. And she does this because the dying man, sanctified and strengthened by this prayer of faith, precisely in these moments of death achieves once more an act which affects the entire Church. When an individual 'dies in the Lord' then he has also died with the Lord on behalf of all who belong to the Lord. And in this sense the Christian never loses that position which has been conferred upon him sacramentally in the Church and for the Church until all is consummated.

At the outset of these considerations we formulated the following proposition: by sacramental consecration and the power which this confers every Christian in the Church is equipped, empowered and commissioned to take up a position of active co-operation in the Church's internal and external work. It has been impossible for us, within the brief limits of an essay such as this, to develop this statement further, or to show how it provides the most complete basis for what we have been saying, and, as an interpretation of the actual content of this essay, is the most all-comprehending that could be devised. If we could go on to develop this point the question which would now arise (though this is no longer possible within the limits we have set ourselves) would be what the significance of this is in the concrete for the individual Christian of our own times. But even as it is one point at least should have been made clear: as applied in the context of the Church the term 'layman' means the [72] opposite of what this signifies in other contexts, when it is applied in the profane sphere, as for instance in the assertion: 'In the field of criminal law he is an utter layman.' In the secular sphere 'layman' means one who cannot take part in the discussion, who has nothing to contribute, who is excluded from a specific area of life and responsibility. But when the term 'layman' is used in the theological context it means the opposite of this. Certainly the findings of the most recent investigators may be correct when they say that the use of this term for the baptised and believing Christian in order to express the difference which exists between him and the cleric is not derived directly from the biblical concept of the 'people of God' (in other words from the concept of the λαο_φ θεου~ with which it has linguistic connections). According to these findings the manner in which this term was applied right from the beginning shows that it carried with it the further connotation of 'non-expert', 'amateur'. In practice, however, it would have the most devastating results – and to some extent these do exist in fact – if the sum total of the individual Christian's conception of his own position as a Christian was that he was not a cleric and therefore had at most a subordinate and more or less passive part to play in the Church's life. In virtue of his baptism every Christian is one who has been anointed and consecrated, a temple of God, one who has been chosen and set apart, one who has been called and summoned into the community of those who know and acknowledge that God has taken compassion upon the world, and has called her into his own life. Every Christian has a share in the active function of the Church both in her internal and external affairs. The word of God is laid upon his lips too, even though he has not the authority or the mission to preach in the officially constituted communal assembly, for in fact he has to uphold the gospel message in those areas of human life upon which the communal assembly has to make its impact if it is to have meaning and authority at all, those areas, namely, in which that life is lived which this word of God is intended to illumine and to redeem. Generally speaking the baptised Christian should convey this word by the integrity with which he conducts his life rather than by his own words, though this is not always or exclusively the case, and there may be occasions when it is legitimate for him to speak out as well. Nevertheless he is a member of the Church which possesses the word, and as such is sealed by the spirit of God. For this reason the saying applies to him: 'Woe betide me if I have not preached, if I have not born witness.' By baptism and by all the other sacraments too, every [73] Christian is made responsible in his own measure for helping in the task of the Church, namely that through her the grace of God may be made present palpably and convincingly in that world which has been redeemed by the love of God and yet which still needs to be redeemed by being made to experience and to accept this fact of its own redeemed state. This is always an act which takes place both in the Church's interior life and in the sphere of the external world as well. In the Church's interior life because all of us as Christians must constantly be re-discovering and reliving our Christian state anew. Externally because far the greatest part of the world has not yet consciously apprehended that which has, nevertheless, already been received into the depths of its subconscious, namely the grace and promise of being definitively possessed by God's grace which does, nevertheless, need to be explicitly and consciously grasped.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

One fact remains true, and it should not be glossed over, because it is quite unnecessary to do so. There is a very real difference between the cleric and the Christian who has not been entrusted with specific tasks of organisation and leadership in the Church in virtue of having received the sacrament of priestly consecration or order. In this respect it is Christ's will that there should be an ascending order of rank and degree in the Church. But these differences in rank and order are so only with regard to quite specific functions in the life of the Church and her disposition and organisation as a society. They have nothing to do with the holiness of her members, or the fact that they are encompassed by the love of God. Nor do they even necessarily have anything to do with the objective significance of the function concerned for salvation. For it can be the case that a free charism in the Church, such as a layman too can be favoured with, may in practice be of greater significance for the salvation of mankind and of the world than the exercise of an institutional, official or even sacramental authority. Nor does this organisation of the Church into orders and degrees affect God's radical claim that we shall uphold and preserve the truth that the whole world in all its dimensions is that which has been brought into being by God's own creative act, and that we shall make his redemptive act effective in it too. This is a task and duty which is laid inalienably on every individual regardless of his rank or order. Now if taking all these factors into consideration, we were asked to produce a formula which was at once concise and comprehensive enough to sum them all up in one, we might propose the following: Certainly the layman in the Church is different from the sacramentally constituted cleric because [74] both have different tasks to perform in the Church, tasks which mutually complement and condition one another. But when that is realised and stated the best way to express the matter would be to say: the layman in the Church is not a 'layman' but a Christian. And in either or both of these aspects of his position in the Church he is confronted by the question of whether he wills to be what in fact he is.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[75]

5

THE POSITION OF WOMAN IN THE NEW SITUATION IN WHICH THE CHURCH FINDS HERSELF

The Church is an extremely complex and multi-dimensional structure, and this is true not merely with regard to its hierarchical structure and the diversity of tasks, rights and duties belonging to its members and which derive from the very nature of the Church herself. A further factor which we should never forget is that while the Church is one, this unity of hers is one in which the greatest possible diversity and multiplicity of individuals, peoples and cultures live and move. If we may so express it she includes among her members the greatest diversity of human types which it is possible to conceive of, ranging from the men of the stone age to those who, while they live in the present, really belong to the twenty-first century. All these live simultaneously side by side in the Church.

The Church's life as a society is carried on in the lives of her members through the most manifold system of interrelationships. For this reason, while it may be true that human nature as constituted by the distinction of the sexes may endure throughout as a metaphysical reality, still the actual mode in which this one nature is objectively realised in the concrete is stamped and conditioned by the special circumstances of history which correspond to this plurality of types and situations justifiably existing in the Church. The diversity to be found in the Church today, with all the different territories, nations, cultures and different types of society which she embraces, means that it is possible to speak of the situation of the Church only in an extremely limited sense. And in the same way there is very little that can validly be asserted of the woman as a single and entirely homogeneous type with a definite concrete position in the Church capable of being investigated. On these grounds alone this is a subject which can be treated of only with the strictest reservations. Of course in raising this [76] question of the position of woman we are thinking of her position in our society and in the Church as we know it, and not, for instance of the position of an Indian woman in the Church as it exists in the primaeval forests of Brazil. But even so the reservation expressed above still applies. For even the Church as it exists among us and woman as she exists in our society are still abstract concepts, and the realities corresponding to them in the life of the Church and of women today are extremely diverse in character.

It is true that in answer to our question it might be possible to adopt an approach of prudent conjecture, and so to sketch in the basic outlines in a portrait of woman, her potentialities and tasks such as would gradually become more typical as our 'big city' culture developed its rational, technical and cosmic potentialities. But in all this there is one point upon which we must be clear, namely that this process of predicting a future type or category is uncertain in the extreme, so that the sort of conclusions we can draw and the sort of estimates that we can make of what will be required on the basis of such a portrayal can only be conditional in so far as they can be applied at all in any effective or universal sense to woman today and her position in the Church. Any of our contemporaries who is really serious in accepting history for what it is and who recognises it as the will of God must take the representatives of the past just as seriously, and allow them to have just as much value as those who feel themselves to be the spokesmen for the future of mankind. For the past is just as much with us as a reality present and divinely willed as is the future, and for this reason even what is out of date still has its significance. And the power to render present everything of the past which should be preserved as well as everything which is to come and must come in the future is nowhere summed up in any one individual person. It is true of the woman of the past and the woman

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation of the future alike that we can only rightly understand the Christian position and the Christian task of each of these types in so far as we recognise that each has a value for the other, and that their full value is only appreciated when they are brought together in the unity of an understanding love.

To this first point a second must now be added: every present conceals within itself, combined in an unity in which they cannot ultimately or totally be distinguished one from another, the following factors: the nature of man himself which endures through all change, the fact that he is called upon to enter into an immediate relationship with God, the guilt of [77] the past and the present, the legitimate impulse to advance towards the future, the failure to understand what this impulse signifies whether this failure be blameworthy or not, and finally the assent of God to man which creates salvation for him and again and again rises superior to all his sins. And because of this the attitude of the Church in response to the demands of the times and to man's will to advance towards some future still unrealised can in all cases only be one which is both critical and positive at the same time. The Church cannot simply join in the general chorus of those who demand a new age and with this a transformation of the Church herself and of her life as well. For in all this an element of short-sightedness is inevitably involved as well, as the heritage of the past and as the guilt of the present, a guilt which belongs to us all since we are, and continue to be, sinners.

Unlike the world, therefore, the Church cannot simply issue watchwords to set the spirits alight of those who belong to her. Conscious of the duty which her past lays upon her, she will always adopt a critical attitude even, once more, to those estimates which are made of the future of the world and of the Church herself. But it is no less true that she cannot simply wage a defensive battle on behalf of the concrete realities which survive from the past of the world and of her own life. For this past is itself subject to the same law which we have mentioned above, namely that a whole series of factors are united in the present: the enduring nature of man himself, the process of becoming in history to which he is subject, the providence of God in its salvific effects upon him and his own guilt. And for this reason the past can never simply provide the ideal pattern according to which the future should be constructed. This realism, in which the Church identifies herself neither with the past as it has been in concrete fact nor with the future as it is postulated, is inevitably felt by the members of the Church to be tiresome. And it must be borne with patience and hope. It is in this realism that the hope and faith of the individual Christian is made effective, for in it two essential factors are brought together, namely the incalculable and uncontrollable complexities of the world on the one hand, and the abstract rigidity of man's own conception of the future on the other. These are viewed as under the control of the Lord of history himself, whose designs, for all our planning and proposing, always remain ultimately hidden from us.

A final point which must be added is this: By reason of the unbridgeable gulf which exists between the universal and the concrete particular all those [78] rules of action which can be deduced from the natural law and the gospel, and which can be laid down for the future, remain at the abstract level. They never admit of being reduced to directly concrete terms or into imperatives which are binding absolutely and in all cases, and which can be laid clearly and unequivocally upon all Christians as an absolute duty. For this reason even within the Church and within the unity of her faith and her love there are inevitably differences of opinion as to what should be done in the here and now, and this divergence of opinion must be borne with in patience and love, and can only be resolved in the concrete through our own free decisions as exercised in history itself. And this history can neither be controlled by any authority nor catered for by any theory in any adequate sense.

All this must be borne in mind if we are to make any attempt at stating what the position of woman should be in the new situation in which the Church finds herself. If we do attempt

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation anything of this kind then we must begin with certain theories which remain at the abstract level, and which, while they may in themselves be binding upon all, are necessarily applied in the concrete in terms of an outlook which is historically conditioned. And this outlook does not have the same degree of binding force as the theories themselves. A further factor, apart from these theories, which we have to take into account is the arbitrary demands for a particular kind of future which are made, and which, basically speaking, cannot be regarded as binding upon any Christian in virtue of the nature of Christianity itself. Now when we attempt to define what the position of woman in the new situation of the Church should be then inevitably these two factors are blended into an unity which can no longer be analysed or resolved into its constituent elements in any adequate sense. This fusion of abstract theory and concrete demand, therefore, always manifests itself in the concrete form of that which is historically conditioned, in other words in a form which Christians do not necessarily have to agree with each other about.

I. THE UNITY OF THE WORLD AND THE CONSEQUENCES OF THIS FOR THE CHURCH

When we say that the Church now stands in a new situation we mean that this situation is new in a deeper and more far-reaching sense than could have been said of any given age in the past as it followed upon the preceding one in the general process of history. Without prejudice to the [79] supernatural dynamism of the Church, which is the work of the Spirit within her, it seems that we should ascribe this new situation to the new situation which prevails in the world in its purely secular aspects. This in turn is a situation which has been brought into being by the fact that the ‘new age’ is coming to an end, and a future one has already begun. It is this, then, that we should look to if we are ever really to come to some definite conclusions about this new situation which prevails in the Church, to some extent to arrive at some definite theory with regard to its significance, and to anticipate how it will develop, instead of merely enduring it without comprehending it.

The new epoch in world history is one in which that history has achieved a real and concrete unity such that all the particular histories of peoples and of continents which have hitherto remained separate one from another have been brought into communication. The result of this is that the fate of each individual member of the human race and of each individual, country and nation, constitutes a factor in the historical situation of all the other individuals and all the other nations too. We might put it this way: in the scriptural narrative of the Tower of Babel we are given an insight, in terms of the theology of history, into what the consequences are of this episode. God is represented as intervening providentially, and ultimately for the sake of saving mankind, in order to prevent men from adopting an united stand against him. This is viewed as the beginning of the process by which the individual peoples and nations departed one from another on their separate ways of salvation. Today this process has been reversed by an act which is just as providential and at the same time just as dangerous too. Mankind has once more been drawn into a unity, and in this a real possibility has arisen of a collective and cosmic atheism, but also of a world Church really coming into being to afford universal access to God to all history and to all men.

This cosmic unity, by which history becomes one, has its origins in the West. And from here it is possible for the saving history of Christianity to be extended to all the world. As viewed in its ultimate and deepest sense this unity is itself the outcome of a Christian interpretation of man’s meaning and mission. This cosmic unity, comprised by the saving history which proceeds from the Christianised West, is the unity of a world that has been divested of the numinous, a world that is dominated by human reason and human technical

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

achievements. It is a world which man no longer accepts simply as the natural order, directly controlled by God, but [80] which he himself constructs according to his own plans by his reason and technical mastery, and in this sense it is a 'humanised' world. This world is one in which man takes over personal responsibility for his own moral decisions, shapes his life and works out or fails to work out his own salvation. But over and above this it is also the world in which man can use his technical mastery in an ever-increasing measure to manipulate himself and his nature. He can actively transform and reconstruct his own real selfhood, which hitherto he had simply to take more or less as given. This world is a world in which mankind is increasing and multiplying at an immense speed, and therefore necessarily requires far more developed and precise patterns of social living than has been the case hitherto. At the same time, without denying the tendency of this world towards this cosmic unity and these more intense forms of social living, it is still a complex world with many different elements in its make-up. And this is precisely due to the fact that because man has been freed from the dominion of nature and has been able to rationalise his environment to a far greater extent the objective impact of the human intellect in the arts and sciences has increased rather than decreased, while the differences which exist between nations and the complexities inherent in the one history of mankind, so far from disappearing have actually intensified.

It is this world, then, that exercises so decisive an influence upon the situation of the Church. She has become a world Church not only by definition but in real fact as well. For this reason she is no longer materially to be identified with the culture of the West, but embraces a whole range of national histories and cultures. Formerly she could have been accused of an almost naïve symbiosis, of identifying herself with a particular form of civilization which in practice she herself more or less controlled, but now she is to an ever-increasing extent emancipated from this, and is developing into a Church in a secularised world, a world that is made up of numerous and complex elements, and is the outcome of rational planning. The inner dynamism proper to this world does indeed remain encompassed by the creative and salvific will of God. But to a large extent it can no longer be directly shaped by the Church's official authority or integrated into her life by being presented with her concrete imperatives. The Church is the Church, and, as instituted by God, she offers salvation to all men and is aware that she is basically and fundamentally the Church of all men. But on any realistic assessment of the future she cannot count on being able to include all men among her members as [81] those who actually and explicitly confess her faith and receive her sacraments. With regard to the generality of mankind and its development she will, upon all human calculations, continue to be, and that to a still greater extent than hitherto, the 'little flock', and this in spite of all missionary endeavours on her part. Indeed, relatively speaking, she will become a still smaller flock despite all the efforts which are rightly made to ensure that she shall remain a Church of the ordinary people. To a still greater extent than in former times she will become the Church of those who believe as a matter of individual and personal responsibility. Hence she will recognise her role still more clearly as the leaven in the lump that is the unified history of the world, as the 'arch-sacrament', i.e. as the sign of salvation which God has set up in the dimension of history for the salvation of those, too, who are not numbered among her members as a visible society.

II. CONCRETE REQUIREMENTS FOR THE EQUAL STATUS OF WOMAN TO BE MADE EFFECTIVE IN THE CHURCH

What is the significance for this new situation of the Church in a new world? We cannot, of course, undertake here to provide a systematic or comprehensive answer to this question, nor

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

even to indicate the lines along which such an answer might be developed. All that is possible here is to provide a few partial answers chosen more or less at random, and these can only be given with the proviso that other points are not being dealt with here, even though they may be more important.

1. First certain consequences must be mentioned of what has been said above, which apply to the Church herself in the exercise of her authority, and which bear upon her attitude towards women. In her own personal life too the Church must recognise without reserve the fact that women have equal value and equal rights with men. Contemporary theology has had much to say in general terms about the position and function of the layman as based upon the baptism and confirmation which he has received. And all this applies directly, and in an equal degree, to women as well as to men: the right attitude for the authorities of the Church to adopt towards them, the universal priesthood of all believers, the fact that whole areas of human knowledge are relatively autonomous and independent of the Church, the fact that the world has legitimately become secularised, and the task of the layman in the world, which is to bring redemption and [82] sanctification into it. No-one, of course, would contest this as a general principle. But the actual practice of the Church falls away in many respects from this principle, manifest though it may be.

When the doors of the Second Vatican Council were opened to laymen as well as to clerics it was taken for granted that this applied initially to men only. But in reality the correctness of this assumption is far from self-evident. Of course, there is a point at which limits do seem to be imposed to the equality of rights which women in the Church should enjoy: the impossibility of women receiving the sacrament of order in various degrees or being consecrated as priests, and thereby becoming members of the official hierarchy. Whatever the position may be with regard to the theological arguments which are put forward in support of this doctrine (and undoubtedly in many instances at least those who put forward these arguments are unconsciously and without realizing it working from positions deriving from an age which is no longer with us and with which we no longer need to identify ourselves), there can be no real point or prospect of achieving anything by pursuing this question at this particular point in the history of the Church's understanding of her own faith and of her practice outside the specialist circles of those engaged in scientific theology. Nor is it of any avail to point to the developments in theology and in actual practice with regard to this question which have taken place among Evangelical Christians. For these do not in fact recognise any official priesthood based on sacramental consecration such as provides the basis for the fundamental distinction between clergy and people. For the present, therefore, it is legitimate to pass over this question in a spirit of patience, whatever conclusions one may arrive at with regard to the binding force of that theological principle which excludes women from the official priesthood. For even without this we still have much to achieve before we can say that we have effectively put into practice the principle that women should have equal rights with men in the Church.

The more the world changes in terms of culture and social living, the more fresh tasks and fresh patterns of living emerge in the lives of individuals and of society, the more man and woman emerge amid these changes in the human environment as equal in capabilities and equal in rights to exploit these new potentialities and to ensure that they are actualised, the more the life of the Church too changes in proportion to these other changes in her human situation. For the life of the Church [83] must be projected and extended into all these new and different spheres of life in the world, and for this reason there is a proliferation in the Church of those tasks and opportunities which can be entrusted unreservedly to women just as much as to men, and which in fact must be entrusted to them.

It would take us too far afield to describe these new opportunities in detail at this point. But they are there, and the Church, just as much as contemporary society, which in practice has become so emancipated from her, must gradually learn to rid herself of the prejudice that the ones to exploit these opportunities and perform these tasks should properly and in the first instance be exclusively of the male sex. The fact that society in the world and in the Church has become so multi-dimensional, and that the work to be done has been broken down into so many subdivisions means that we have perforce to recognise the whole new complex range of tasks which can be performed equally well by either sex, and to which the differences between the sexes are wholly irrelevant. At the same time, however, in the concrete manner in which these tasks are performed, men and women will each bring their special qualities to bear, and this cannot be otherwise than beneficial in ensuring that in the execution of these tasks, to which the sex of the actual performer makes no difference, every aspect of them shall in fact be catered for. When the Church speaks of the position and the task of the layman in the Church and in the world she must apply equal standards to men and women in real fact and not simply by paying lip-service to the principle of equality between them.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

2. In her preaching and in her cure of souls the Church must take into account the unmarried, independent and professional woman no less than the mother and the housewife. If we abstract for a moment from the ideal of Christian virginity as undertaken for sake of the Lord we may hold as an absolute principle that the fulfilment of woman's vocation as human and Christian is to be found first and foremost, and in normal cases, in partnership with her husband and in the exercise of married love and motherhood But there is a further point which the representatives of the Church must be resolved unreservedly and realistically to take into account in the present and the future of the Church, and which the first point does not for one moment invalidate. This is that both in the preaching and the practice of the Church justice must be done to the number of unmarried independent and professional women, including those who do not belong to religious orders or secular institutes. What has just been said about the [84] rights and duties of the Church, namely that she must respect the principle that women have equal rights with men in the life of the Church as well, and must turn this to good account for the Church's mission, naturally applies in a special degree to women in this unmarried and independent state. Such women should tell the Church what new forms of specialised pastoral activity, what new types of vocational groups within the Christian community, and what new kinds of active mutual 'pastoral' help between women in this state are appropriate to them in their situation and to the times in which we live.

3. Apart from the personal position of these single women a further factor which does have a bearing on the situation, even if it is not an essential reason for introducing changes, is the dearth of priests. This is one reason why the Church of today has been forced actively to call upon women to a greater extent than formerly to help in fulfilling those tasks in her apostolic mission which belong originally and primarily to the members of her hierarchy. In other words she has had to give women a share in the apostolate of the hierarchy itself. In discharging tasks of this kind women act as social workers, catechists, parish helpers, etc., and this must not be confused with that mission and task, that apostolate, which every woman is equipped and commissioned to perform in virtue of the fact that she has been baptised and confirmed and on the basis of the royal priesthood which belongs to her, and which she has to exercise from her own position in the world. Nor should this function which belongs specifically and ex officio to the Christian woman in the world be thought of as a lesser and more restricted way of 'participating' in the apostolate of the Church's hierarchy. On the contrary it is to be understood as function of the laity ab initio and in its own right. Certainly this participation on the part of the layman in the apostolate of the Church's hierarchy is understood by him as having a further significance beyond this, and as having the force of a permanent vocation. In this sense it has a meaning, an indispensability and a value of its own. But precisely because of this it is a necessary condition that those who have an official position of this kind must not be regarded by the clergy as subordinate helpers and auxiliaries

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

to be exploited for their own advantage.

Opinions may vary as to how precisely we should interpret the ancient Christian institution of deaconess and its relationship to the institution of deacon. But whatever conclusions we may arrive at on this point theology of the diaconate does show that the deacon too is not merely an [85] insignificant and subordinate auxiliary designed for the help of the priests, but is directly under the authority of the bishop, and that he has a task to perform in the Church which belongs to him personally ab initio and in his own right. The same could also be said of those functions which are performed ex officio by women, and which likewise belong fully and properly to the apostolate of the hierarchy. Those members of the Church who ex officio have such tasks entrusted to them must, therefore, be accorded the dignity, independence and responsibility due to them and necessary for them to discharge their functions properly. This dignity and personal responsibility should not be regarded as deriving from a concession granted to them by the condescension of the clergy. Rather, while always remaining under the control and authority of the bishop, it must gradually, yet at the same time boldly, establish itself as properly belonging to a legally authorised institution in order that there may no longer be even an impression that it needs to be left to the short-sighted caprice of the individual parish priest or chaplain whether there shall be such participation in the apostolate of the Church's hierarchy.

4. From many points of view the Church will have to develop new and better kinds of relationship between the clergy and women, such as are more appropriate to the times. In this respect much may already have been achieved, but nevertheless much still remains to be done. Relics of patriarchal attitudes in the relationship between priests and women still survive, which belong to past ages and do not derive essentially or necessarily from the spiritual authority of the priest as pastor and confessor in relation to the individual Christian.

5. The Church must be bold and far-sighted in demanding that the religious communities of women shall be shaped in accordance with the needs of the time. This applies to the secular institutes which have recently emerged, in which the women have to exercise their own creative powers in finding a form of life which corresponds to the evangelical counsels in the midst of the world, and in which they are not simply the objects of apostolic zeal on the part of the founders of orders of priests. But the same principle also applies to the communities of the women's orders which were founded in former times. In recent times the popes have called for the life in women's orders to be adapted and remodelled in conformity with the needs of the age, and in a manner which corresponds to the outlook on life of women of today, and the tasks they have to perform within the unity of their orders. But sometimes one has the impression that these [86] appeals have met with too much caution and respect for secondary traditions, and too little boldness or readiness to undertake genuine experiments. Obviously the evangelical counsels and the act of embracing the Cross of Christ must uncompromisingly be preserved. But this does not exclude courage and boldness in undertaking a genuine and radical re-shaping of many of the day-to-day customs practised in the religious orders. There must be a place for contemporary woman too in the religious communities if she is to be able to make fruitful her efforts to become a disciple of Christ uncompromisingly and without reserve, and if she is to be given an opportunity to fulfil her role in the Church in a manner which is genuinely and effectively human and Christian at the same time. If in this respect the women's orders may be said to show too little courage and trust in the Spirit, who is present with us even today, then there can be no doubt that it is for the authorities in the Church to strengthen this courage and to open up the way for this resolve to take effect in the concrete. The prescriptions of the Second Vatican Council relating to life in the religious orders today clearly point in this direction at least in principle.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

III. THE INDISPENSIBILITY OF WOMEN FOR THE NEW TASKS THAT ARE THEIRS

Certain further consequences arising from the new situation in which the Church finds herself must be mentioned here, since they have a bearing on the actual position of women. In view of the undeniable complexity of human, social and cultural factors in the midst of which the life of women in the Church and the world is lived, and necessarily has to be lived today, they are such as can be spoken of only with the greatest reserve. This is true both with regard to their application to the individual woman, and because of the fact that these consequences have been selected somewhat at random.

1. In the new situation in history of the world and of society woman is presented with fresh problems to solve for the world. These are such as can be solved by woman herself and in her own way, and not, in any direct or adequate sense, by directives issued by the authorities of the Church and in their preaching. Probably no single or absolute solution can be found to the question of what form should be imparted to those aspects of human living at the earthly level which are of special concern to [87] women. And yet what is being treated of here is, in the strictest sense, a Christian task.

The task of woman in the purely secular sphere and in society, with which she is presented as a secular and at the same time too, as a Christian task, is of such a nature that the problems which it involves must necessarily be left for the most part to woman herself as she exists today to find solutions to both in theory and practice. Obviously in her official preaching the Church both can and must proclaim the immutable principles of the natural law and of the gospel message as these affect the lives of women, just as she has done in former ages. She must stand firm in defence of these principles and this message, and constantly bring them home to woman anew in a manner appropriate to the particular epoch. But it would be a mistake not only in practice but in theory too, if we were to believe that these basic principles were sufficient of themselves to enable woman to recognise in the concrete what the concrete situation of these present times demands that woman herself shall accept as the task of her womanly life and in the role she assumes in contemporary society. The more complex and intricate the present has become – a present in which it is precisely man's own manipulation of himself and the construction of a humanised world that has made the situation of human life so complex and incalculable – the wider the gulf becomes between the abstract norms, the abiding validity of which is upheld by the Church's authority, and their realization in the concrete; the gulf between the principles and the imperatives, between an abstract statement of what is the case and the concrete constructive plan to be followed. It is quite impossible for it to be otherwise. It is something that is inherent in the nature of the case and in the contemporary situation which makes the ontological difference between the universal and the concrete particular into a gulf which is experienced as such in our everyday lives more clearly than ever before.

It would be foolish and un-Christian to make this a reproach against the Church, and in particular against her preaching, carried on as it is by human intermediaries, or to condemn her on the grounds that today she is unable to produce any living models, any convincing pattern for the life of contemporary woman such as has an immediately formative influence upon life itself, and such as in fact can and must be produced in this age. It is true that in the official preaching of the norms which govern the conduct of the life of woman today it generally seems as though the Church can no longer rise above a confusing ambiguity full of phrases [88] such as 'On the one hand . . . on the other', 'Not only . . . but also', 'Yes, but we must not exaggerate'. But this is entirely right to the extent that the official authorities of the Church recognise their own limitations, with which they must come to terms, and beyond which they cannot go without special charismatic powers. But this observation must not be interpreted as a denial of the Church. Over and above this official and abstract kind of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

preaching she has another and totally different task to perform, namely to provide the concrete model, the constructive pattern of life which is necessary for woman in the present age.

At the same time, however, the Church which both can and must perform this task is not, in any direct sense, the Church of officialdom as such, but rather the Church of women themselves. Supported by the message of the gospel and the power of the Spirit they can both discover and present this concrete pattern of life for women today as something over and above the basic norms and principles of Christianity with their permanent and unchanging validity. This task belongs inalienably and exclusively to woman. It cannot be taken away from her by the official authorities. Certainly the manner in which it is performed must always be subject to control and criticism on the part of the Church's authorities, and must be in compliance with their demands. But it is, and continues to be, a task for woman herself, and not, in any direct sense, for these officially constituted authorities of the Church.

In earlier times it was, in a certain measure, possible to translate the universal norms and principles of the Church directly into practical imperatives because the process of translation did not involve any intermediary stages between the two such as could be consciously and explicitly pointed to. The result was that one always knew what actually had to be done, and the only question was whether one was willing in actual fact really to carry out this duty which one had recognised clearly and concretely as such. Today, however, the way which leads from the norms and principles of the gospel to the point of putting them into practice in the concrete has grown longer. The gulf between the teaching of the gospel and the concrete realities of life needs to be bridged by means of a concrete model or plan. But in this context to construct such a plan is the task of women themselves. The question is how in the concrete a woman can uncompromisingly and fully be human and a woman of this age, and precisely as such a Christian who bears witness in faith, hope and love in her professional and social life, in marriage, in the worlds of fashion, [89] politics, science and art. And the answer to this question in all its convincing clarity must be discovered and presented by woman herself. Therefore a quite specific task is laid upon her, one that is greater than in former ages, in which the official Church could tell her more or less directly how she should act as human and as Christian.

Now to this problem which has to be left to woman herself to solve, it is presumably quite impossible to find any one single solution universally valid in all cases at all times and for all individuals. Indeed it is not even desirable to aim at producing such a solution. There must be a whole range of constructive patterns and models for the life of contemporary woman in the world, and these must be of various kinds. The situation is similar to that which in earlier times applied to the individual religious orders. A whole range of quite realistic and nevertheless very different forms were found for these, and were put forward and developed as permanent constitutions. And in these forms one and the same Spirit of grace and one and the same Christian ideal were presented in a way in which they could really take effect and generate new life. And in the same way we have boldly to take into account the fact that there must be a whole range of such productive patterns and models in the Church devised and presented by women under the impulse of the Spirit.

This process of discovering and presenting the concrete forms which the life of the Christian woman should assume in the dimension of the worldly and profane is a truly Christian – indeed actually a theological task of the Church herself inasmuch as the women who are her members are representative of her. Admittedly it is necessary to draw a very clear and realistic distinction between the sphere of the worldly and the profane with its relative autonomy on the one hand and the specifically religious and ecclesiastical sphere on the other. But at the same time it would be false to regard this wholly profane sphere as being of no concern to Christians as such. The worldly can indeed be distinguished from the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Christian in the sense of that which pertains to the official Church. But the worldly itself as such constitutes a truly Christian task. For in it salvation is worked out and the grace of God with its power to save and to liberate is lived and. attempted. Thus the question arises of how women should live in those states of life which seem to be purely worldly in character in all their dimensions. But it is for Christian woman herself to decide this question as her primary, proper and inalienable task. If she fulfils this apparently worldly task, if she shows in the concrete how the life of woman today in [90] the world both can and must be lived in faith and in the Spirit, so that this life itself constitutes salvation and is a part of Christian life as a whole, then she has fulfilled the task of the Church as such – fulfilled it in the Church and for the Church.

All this may sound extremely abstract and theoretical. But if it is correct, and if it is understood, then what follows from it is precisely the truth that it cannot be the task of the priests or of the male sex themselves to develop and to present this concrete pattern for the life of the Christian woman in the world.

2. To discover and to exemplify in her way of life this concrete, constructive and inviting pattern of what the life of contemporary woman should be, and to discover this from the age itself – this, therefore, is the inalienable task of the Christian woman But precisely because this creative task belongs exclusively to her, and because it is a new task, it can only be performed by her when her life as a mature Christian derives its strength from the centre and source of the Christian reality. Indeed this task consists in a discerning of spirits, as well as in the loving acceptance of whatever the Lord of history wills to make real precisely in this age of ours. It also involves a use of the critical faculties to set on one side all elements of error and sinfulness in this reality, with which woman is presented in history. Woman, therefore, in that she is made inalienably responsible for the performance of this task has to adopt a complex attitude in which she both gives herself to, and withholds herself from the historical reality with which she is confronted. But she can only achieve this if she really lives by the grace of God and the truth of the gospel.

The present age, however, does not hesitate to impose upon life patterns which are, in the most intense degree, the outcome of conscious thought and deliberation, and for this reason a task such as we have outlined above demands the highest thought and deliberation likewise. Moreover this is a fresh task, and is laid upon woman herself. And for these reasons the manner in which the task is performed must be consciously religious and spiritual today to an extent which did not need to be demanded in earlier ages. To this end a certain theological knowledge is required, though today the situation is different from those former ages in which only those of the male sex who had official positions in the Church could have such knowledge at their command. That capacity for illuminating and critical speculation which is needful for the solution of the problems confronting [91] women must be present, therefore, in woman herself as the person responsible for carrying out the task. In spite of the fact that the official Church continues undismayed to preach the principles of Christianity, there are today a thousand moral questions and problems which can only be solved by the individual Christian himself in the concrete realities of his own life, and which, moreover, must be solved in that context even when this Christian has accepted the norms and principles declared by the official Church as the true expression of the Spirit which moves him personally in a clear attitude of obedient faith. But for this purpose it is necessary that there shall be in the layman, and therefore in woman too, a far deeper theological awareness, a far more direct and more living contact with scripture, a far more autonomous exercise of moral decision than in former ages. It is vitally important, indeed indispensable, that women shall mutually impart one to another a deepened awareness of the Christian faith of this kind, and over and above this a certain mystical insight into the original Christian experience. For what is in question here is precisely not merely the imparting of some theoretical or abstract

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

knowledge of the norms of faith and morals, but rather the imparting of a kind of religious knowledge that can already be characterised as existential and is directly assimilable, one which, therefore, so far as woman is concerned, must already bear precisely a feminine stamp. In saying this we have no intention of conjuring up a vision of learned women theologians well-versed in science. The catechists, teachers of religious knowledge, mothers with children to instruct and women leaders of bible-reading circles, etc., are just as indispensable.

3. The contemporary age of the Church will demand from woman as a member of the Church that she shall devise a kind of religious life which is clear enough to understand and powerful enough in practice really to be lived effectively. Of course the requirement as stated here applies just as much to men as to women, because the basic forms of life in the present, and the forms of religious life corresponding to these, are the same for men and women alike. Nevertheless particular mention must be made of this requirement in this context because the special characteristics of the feminine nature, or what many women or many members of the clergy too, regard as typically feminine qualities might seem incompatible in some respect or other with a form of devotion and of religious life which has been made conformable to the present age in the manner described. Not only the men but the women of the present [92] age too, must learn to live in a situation of religious diaspora. They must learn that faith as it exists today is under attack. That it must be a faith that is constantly striven for anew, and that this is not incompatible with its true nature or its firmness and constancy. Both for her own sake and on behalf of those entrusted to her care woman must learn that faith is not a kind of folklore, not in any sense like the sort of heritage of local customs that are handed down from one generation to the next, and which woman's temperament and her readiness to find security in what she can take for granted make her particularly prone to opt for. But woman must learn that so far from this faith is in fact the exercise of the most elemental, radical and irreversible kind of decision.

Religion as practised by women, if it is to convince the world as being genuine, must be discreet and restrained. It must not make any false claims as being immediately obvious. It must establish its credentials in the sober realities of everyday life. There must be no attempt to suppress the specifically feminine qualities which legitimately belong to this approach to religion in favour of a kind of religion that is masculine in character. It must clearly be rooted in the sources of scripture and the classic spiritual teaching of the Church. It must accept that which is of decisive importance and which must have a decisive influence for what it is and let that which is secondary and immaterial be secondary and immaterial. Even though this faith may rightly involve great solicitude and great fear for the salvation of the woman's husband and children, and perhaps for relatives too, when these have fallen into unbelief, still it must be the faith of a bold and trustful hope that God's grace can still be effective in saving men even in those cases in which we can no longer perceive it at work. Woman's faith and the expression of her religious life must be joyful. It must not seem to be a false substitute for what life has denied to her in purely human terms. It must not appear to be the means by which she maintains a false kind of self-assertion and self-justification as though she had been denied the opportunity of a real task in life. In her religion she must discover the source within herself the grace which from the very outset her human heart has received into its innermost depths as life and love, and she will experience it there as a supernatural vocation to share in the life of God himself though this is not incompatible with the fact that she will also experience and endure her habitual down-to-earth everyday life as well. Religion must not appear as a kind of ideological superstructure, such that, if it were removed, the life that still [93] continued without it would be the same as the lives of those who do not believe or suppose that they do not believe.

I realise that I have not said much, and this may be due to my own limitations. But I also believe that we must and should have patience with an age of uncertainty, in which fresh quests have constantly to be embarked upon. It is at once the task and the grace of the Christian to hold out, in this way, without falling into any attitude of embittered cynicism in which he allows everything to take its course. It is his task and his grace in a world which will always remain characterised by darkness and guilt. Today there is much of which we have a clearer and more penetrating knowledge than in earlier times. But our lot in the present is not really harder than that of earlier generations, in which all too often the only attitude possible for man was one of a dumb and silent acceptance of his lot. Then there was much in his life which he simply had to accept without question. Above all he was unable even to raise the question as to whether and how he could do something to alter the life to which he was subjected.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Not the least important of the factors contributing to the new situation in which the Church finds herself is the altered structures of contemporary life in the purely profane sphere. It is a situation which provides fresh opportunities for woman to question her own lot. What woman is or should be is a matter for woman herself to decide, and it is better to wait in patience than to provide over-hasty or ill-considered answers. When we do what we can to understand ourselves, and in doing this do not forget that God is greater than our own heart and our own deeds, then in truth, even though we may not always yet know how the future will turn out, still we should trust in the fact that the future in the ultimate and definitive sense holds nothing else for us than the protection and the love of God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[94]

6

ON THE SITUATION OF THE CATHOLIC INTELLECTUAL

The aim which we have set ourselves in the modest essay which follows is to make certain observations about the position of the Catholic 'intellectual' in the world of ideas, and also about the tasks which he has to perform. It is no part of our intention here to look into the problems of the 'intellectuals' in the realms of sociology or political theory. The area which we have set ourselves to investigate is narrower and less complex than this. What we mean by the term 'intellectual' in this context is simply the 'professor' and the 'scientist' in the broadest sense. For this reason all the three designations which we have used are used in the same sense. Theory and science are factors which affect the lives of all men of the present age, but here we are envisaging the kind of Catholic for whom theory and science have an even greater significance. He is one who has dedicated himself to the pursuit of science in one or other of its departments and made it his central interest and the object of his life's work. We are presupposing that the sort of scientist we have in mind is a Christian and a believing Catholic. The subject into which we are enquiring, therefore, is not the relationship which exists between the unbelieving scientist on the one hand and Christianity and the Church on the other, a relationship, therefore, which has certainly undergone a number of changes from the Church's side as a result of the Second Vatican Council. We are enquiring into the situation of a scientist who is at the same time a convinced Christian and into the sort of tasks which confront such an one, and this to the extent that the scientific life of an intellectual is also of significance for his life as a Christian, while conversely the fact that he is a Christian also has its significance for his life in the world of science. If both spheres of his life were completely separated one from the other and simply existed side by side without either of them having any significance for the other then this question [95] would simply not arise at all. Likewise a question of this kind could not be posed if both departments in the life of the Christian intellectual were simply identical one with the other. It is therefore to be taken as axiomatic for our whole approach to the problem that there is both difference and mutual interconnection between both these objective factors in the life of the intellectual. We shall not be making this axiom an object of investigation in its own right here, even though in the course of our considerations it is inevitable that we shall constantly be touching upon it.

I

The first point that must be stated with regard to the situation of the intellectual in the Church and in relation to the Church is the principle that as a result of the Second Vatican Council a wider sphere of intellectual freedom now lies open to him than was formerly the case. We are not, of course, thinking here of an explicit formal declaration to the effect that this sphere of freedom open to the intellectual in the Church has been expanded in this way, but rather of a broadening which has in fact taken place in the concrete, or, to put it another way, of the fact that the Church and her official representatives have been willing boldly to allow that freedom in thought and research which has always been permitted in principle, but which is now a concrete and practical reality as well.

In order correctly to evaluate the real though limited significance of the fact to which we are referring we must first of all recognise that there has been scope for thought and research to be carried on freely in this way. The First Vatican Council itself explicitly taught that the methods of arriving at human knowledge proceeded from a multiplicity of sources, and rejected the idea that revelation was the sole and unique source of the sort of knowledge that was significant for human living. The Church herself (in this opposing in part the findings of Protestant theology) has never presented saving history, revelation and faith in such a way that these realities could from the outset have no points of contact with the secular sciences, or, conversely, that there could be no cases in which secular science could have any contribution to make by being brought into the discussion of the Christian faith. When we ask, therefore, what the relationship is between secular knowledge (including knowledge of God from natural causes) and faith (theology) we must say that each is fundamentally and right from the outset different from the other and [96] possessing its own autonomy, but at the same time that there is a mutual interconnection between them. But we must also recognise that the situation between them is one in which sincere dialogue is possible, and that concrete and positive results may accrue from this. It is also one of conflict, though of a conflict which, while it may not be possible to solve it straightway, is not in principle impossible to solve. All this means that in view of the fact of the relative autonomy of faith, theology and the Church on the one hand, and of profane science on the other, the former must accord to the latter a sphere of freedom for its own thought and action, and that too not merely in questions which are from the outset of no concern to faith and theology, but also in respect of the problems and conclusions of the secular sciences, natural sciences and human sciences which certainly do have a relevance, and perhaps a very vital one, for faith and theology, and therefore for the Church as well. As has been said, in principle the Church and her theologians have always conceded to the secular sciences this scope for freedom. In principle the Church has always allowed questions and challenges to be addressed to her by the exponents of the secular sciences, has been willing to enter into dialogue with science, and has regarded this dialogue as important for her own faith, her life, and the tasks confronting her.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But this attitude has remained at the level of principle alone. It has never been put into practice in the Church's concrete life. Even though this basic principle has never been radically opposed, in the manner in which it is applied in practice it is possible to grant a greater or a lesser degree of freedom, and Christians can bring a greater or lesser degree of courage to bear in coming to grips with the problems, whether real or supposed, raised by the conclusions of the sciences. It can be that in particular instances a dialogue of this kind is broken off too precipitately or that Christians are over-hasty in believing that they have a ready-made answer to some question, some problem raised by the sciences and put to believers to solve. To that extent it can probably be said with some confidence that as a result of the Second Vatican Council courage and readiness to enter into dialogue with the secular sciences has increased in the official Church even with regard to questions which are 'ideologically' important. She is readier now to face up to the questions and conclusions of the modern sciences in all their branches, and not to be too hasty in giving a theological answer to such questions, to give due value to the position of the Christian scientist which in some circumstances can be so [97] full of difficulty and strain, and finally not to underestimate or evade the real problems with which she is confronted. This is already apparent from the Pastoral Constitution, 'On the Church in the World Today', where the Church takes cognizance in a far clearer and more explicit manner than formerly of the existence, extent and significance of the sciences for the modern world, which is also the situation in which the Church herself is placed (cf. Nos. 7, 53f.). She recognises '… the enormous growth of natural, human and social sciences' (No. 54). She recognises that 'The so-called exact sciences sharpen critical judgment to a very fine edge. Recent psychological research explains human activity more profoundly. Historical studies make a signal contribution to bringing men to see things in their changeable and evolutionary aspects' (No.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

54). She clearly acknowledges the autonomy of these sciences, which today are no longer at the level of mere theory, but actually provide the means and incentive for a transformation of the human sphere of existence planned and carried through by man himself and indeed for man to manipulate and re-shape himself according to his own preconceived plan (No. 56 f.). The Church recognises the ethos proper to the scientist: to be scrupulously careful to preserve truth in his scientific investigations, the need for teamwork, which today has become indispensable, the spirit of international solidarity, an awareness of the responsibility of specialists which is becoming ever clearer (No. 57). The Church realises the importance of the secular sciences for theology and of the necessity for theology to enter into dialogue with them (No. 62). 'For recent studies and findings of science, history, and philosophy raise new questions which influence life and demand new theological investigations … In pastoral care too appropriate use must be made not only of theological principles, but also of the findings of the secular sciences, especially of psychology and sociology … Let them (the faithful) blend modern science and its theories and the understanding of the most recent discoveries with Christian morality and doctrine. Thus their religious practice and morality can keep pace with their scientific knowledge and with an ever-advancing technology. Thus too, they (the faithful) will be able to test and interpret all things in a truly Christian spirit … In order that such persons (Christian scientists) may fulfil their proper function let it be recognised that all the faithful, clerical and lay, possess a lawful freedom of enquiry and of thought, and the freedom to express their minds humbly and courageously about those matters in which they enjoy competence' (No. 62).

[98] It is the will of the Church, then, to pay due attention to the secular sciences of today in their whole range. She recognizes the swiftness of their development and their significance for the whole of human life and therefore for Christian living as well, a significance which is still continually increasing. Thus she wishes to grant these sciences genuine scope and freedom for research, for speculation and for the expression of opinion. But this attitude of hers has found expression in the Second Vatican Council not merely in declarations of principle of the kind which we have quoted, but also in the concrete approach adopted by the members of the Council. Thus, for instance, in the preparatory documents made ready before the Council commenced a particular attitude was adopted upon the question of so-called monogenism, the question namely of whether there was a single human couple at the beginning of the history of mankind or whether humanity originated in many human couples appearing independently of one another. But in the actual Council itself a quite different approach to this question was adopted. Previous explanations were abandoned and the Council fathers deliberately avoided pronouncing upon this question, and so left it open so far as the Council itself was concerned. Again on the question of marital ethics the experts have come to be extremely cautious in their approach to the question of what degree of moral responsibility modern man has to bear in this area in view of the modern population explosion and the social situation as a whole into which mankind is moving as it becomes increasingly bound together in a real and effective unity. In the Dogmatic Constitution 'On Divine Revelation' the members of the Council have been prudent indeed, but still far bolder than formerly, in taking cognizance of the findings and methods evolved by the contemporary sciences of history and philosophy as well as by modern exegetes and biblical scholars, and in applying these to the sacred books of Christendom. There is a new desire that in the specialised departments of systematic theology too, the history of dogma shall be explored and the questions of the historical origin and development of the teaching of the faith shall be approached more boldly and clearer conclusions shall be arrived at than has formerly been the case. There is a new and genuine desire to enter effectively into dialogue with the theologians of the non-Catholic Christian bodies in order to establish the conditions necessary for a genuine and unprejudiced study of Orthodox and Evangelical theology. In Catholic theology too, it is explicitly acknowledged that there can be differing schools and differing approaches – indeed that [99] there should be such; that Christian theology should not merely be the product of Western culture, but should have to enter into dialogue with the philosophy and wisdom of non-European cultures as well. In respect both of its theological approach and of the questions it raises the Council has avoided identifying itself simply with the idiom and approach of neo-Scholastic theology as this has been practised almost universally in the Church for the past fifteen hundred years. With regard to the theology of Thomas Aquinas in particular, in spite of the fact that his works have been quoted from time to time in the Council documents and that at one point there is a very brief and cautious recommendation to follow his teaching, he has been given a far less significant place in the theological curriculum than was accorded to him by Roman theologians before the Council. However highly we may prize the teaching of Aquinas, we still have to be realistic enough to face this as a sheer matter of fact. In a word, in practice as well as in theory the Council has subscribed to the principles of autonomy and freedom for the secular sciences, and has thereby shown its readiness to enter into genuine and candid dialogue with them. This would become still clearer if we could examine in detail the Pastoral Constitution 'On the Church in the World Today', especially the second part of this Constitution. Here we find a discussion of such questions as marriage and the family, the just demand for advances in civilisation and culture, human life in its economic and social aspects, the political systems by which communal life is regulated, peace and unity between peoples. The manner in which all these questions are handled is such that it entails a dialogue with those sciences to which these questions are of particular concern as a matter of worldly experience. This becomes all the clearer when it is remembered that the Constitution shows itself aware of the fact that it is quite impossible to find a concrete solution to all these questions on the basis of revelation alone. The only way of arriving at such a conclusion is to provide in all cases a synthesis appropriate to the needs of the particular epoch between an ultimately Christian orientation on the one hand, and that concrete 'this-worldly' experience on the other, which is, today in particular, so largely subject to control by secular science.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It would, however, be both un-Christian and untheological as well as unfair if one were willing to abandon everything for the sake of this increase in the real scope and freedom for thought and research made available to the Christian scientist, and for the sake of friendly dialogue [100] between the Church and the representatives of secular science. If we are to be both Catholic and honest we must add to all that has been said hitherto that the Catholic Church even now never ceases to regard herself as an 'absolute system', and that in a sense every bit as decisive as formerly, although the term 'absolute system' which we have chosen is intentionally a somewhat provocative one, and needs to be taken in the right sense. We may even adopt the jargon of Marxism and say that the Church is not some kind of debating society in which one can say anything, call anything in question and continually introduce radical alterations of every kind. The Church is aware of her role as the absolute and definitive self-bestowal of God in Jesus Christ made present in the here and now, as she who receives the saving deed of God for mankind in faith and proclaims it as a deed so final that the only thing still to come is its own definitive consummation. This will take the form of a direct and immediate confrontation with God in the kingdom of God himself which is without end, and which no longer belongs to the changing course of the history of this world. To this extent the Church will continue to claim the allegiance of her members in just as absolute a sense in the future as she has in the past when she asserts that she is vested with absolute authority as their teacher. But what of those who, in obedience to the dictates of their own consciences with regard to truth, have to refuse this claim of the Church to be the bearer of absolute and binding truth in this sense? For such as these the Church's claim is not in the concrete absolute or binding in duty upon their individual consciences at all. But then they cannot really be Catholic Christians at all either. Basically speaking they have no really compelling reason for wishing to associate themselves with the Church as members of her flock. Conversely, the intellectual, the scientist who is really following the dictates of his own conscience in deciding to be a Catholic Christian cannot set himself up in opposition to the declared teaching of the Church, or to the Church's teaching authority, as though he were nothing more than one party in a dialogue such as might lead to any and every kind of conclusion or to no conclusion at all. This is a kind of dialogue in which one of the partners can, in certain circumstances, draw conclusions that are authoritative and binding in conscience upon the other. The ultimate authority of the Church herself can only be real and effective in its application to a given individual and a Christian if, independently of this authority, he recognises that it is his religious and moral duty to acknowledge the Church herself. But once he has accepted [101] this authority he can no longer refuse the pronouncements of the Church upon specific questions upon the pretext that the grounds adduced by the Church for making this pronouncement are insufficiently cogent so far as he is concerned. In fact in the last analysis it is not for the individual, not even for the individual scientist, to discover what can be believed and thought in the Church. Rather it is for the Church herself, constituted as a society by the Pope and bishops who are her representatives and who embody her teaching authority to discover this. But she does this through them, with the assistance of the Holy Spirit promised to her, by consciously explicitating the content of her own faith and so deciding what is or is not reconcilable with that content in the findings of secular science. Nevertheless the believing Catholic who is a scientist is not afraid on that account that by acknowledging the binding force of the Church's teaching authority he must necessarily arrive at a radical and absolutely irreconcilable conflict. On the one hand, it is true, he has in principle acknowledged the teaching authority of the Church, and the effect of this is that he also gives his interior assent to the concrete decisions of that teaching authority in individual cases, while on the other hand he has to maintain the integrity of his conscience as a scientist with regard to truth, and this obliges him as an intellectual to accept and publicly to uphold any assured scientific conclusions which he has arrived at, and also to conduct his researches without prejudice. But these two factors in his life do not necessarily create an irreconcilable conflict within him. For the Catholic Christian proceeds from the justifiable presupposition (which is necessary in other contexts too), that two recognised and assured truths cannot contradict one another even though they may have been arrived at by quite different processes of reasoning. There is a further principle which the Catholic Christian rightly takes as axiomatic, and which, moreover, is not controverted by history. This is that the Spirit of the Church prevents her from teaching in an absolute or definitive manner, such as requires the assent of faith from the Catholic Christian as a matter of duty, anything which is proved by the subsequent findings of science to be in reality false, and which therefore has to be abandoned. Admittedly in this connection the Catholic Christian recognises that the teaching authority of the Church is justified in sparing no efforts to preserve divine revelation in its fulness and purity, and is, indeed, bound to do this, and he finds no embarrassment in reckoning with the possibility that to this end the Church can produce provisional and non-definitive [102] decisions which are subsequently proved to be either false or exaggerated in their formulation or else too one-sided, measured by the genuine findings of science, which they only seem to deny. There is a further factor which the Catholic Christian, no less than the genuine scientist, can and must take into account. This is that those findings of his science which seem to be assured remain, in the last analysis, always open to future revision when different methods are applied and in the light of new experiences and conclusions. Moreover this revision may be extremely radical in its effects, and may even necessitate that the original formulation of the scientific findings concerned actually has to be abandoned altogether.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is not possible at this point to develop the 'case history' involved in this problem in detail, to provide a fully developed answer to the question of what the attitude of a Catholic scientist should be in order to be both Catholic and at the same time a scientist in the true sense. This becomes a problem in cases in which there seems to be a contradiction between a decision on the part of the teaching authorities of the Church on the one hand, and a scientific conclusion which he has arrived at on the other. The decision of the Church may, indeed, only be provisional. It may be capable of 'revision' by the Church herself. But nevertheless at the time it is, in a true sense, binding in conscience upon him. Again the scientific conclusion may either seem to be assured or be so in real fact. But in any case the effect is that he is faced with a conflict which, though ultimately and basically capable of solution, seems at the time to be irreconcilable. What attitude is he to adopt in such a case? Only a few scattered observations bearing on this problem can be offered here. But we are in a position to confine ourselves to these few observations because, as a matter of concrete fact, it seems that at this particular point in history there is a total absence of any such cases of conflict, at any rate in the realm of the natural sciences (admittedly it is easier to conceive of a concrete instance of conflict even today in the area of the historical sciences. But then again, in view of the fact that historical conclusions remain problematical and always open to further revision, a conflict in this area is less intolerable). But to commence: It is often taken as axiomatic by secular science as well as by the exponents of a kind of Christian apologetics which is too brash and self-assured in its approach, that in every case where a conflict seems to arise between secular science and the teaching of the Church, it must always be possible to find a clear and obvious solution straight away. But this is not so. It is perfectly possible that both the theologian and the [103] scientist (who is, ex hypothesi, a Catholic in this case), are convinced that the seeming conflict is ultimately capable of solution, even though so far they have not been able to discover where the solution lies. In such a case it is necessary for them to have respect for, and patience with one another. In fact similar cases do arise, in which the conclusions of one particular science seem to be in conflict with those of another. Such a situation as is envisaged here, therefore, should not occasion surprise, and does not justify the scientist in every case in bitterly protesting against an allegedly reactionary attitude on the part of the theologian. It is also understandable that the tempo at which the content of the Church's faith becomes consciously explicitated is different from that which is possible in the secular sciences of today. And again even the modern scientist, if he intends to conduct his intellectual life as a Catholic, must today have a certain knowledge and a certain understanding of the 'theological qualifications' as they are called in theological parlance. As in other spheres of human life so too in the theology of the Church the Church herself is aware that it is not always, or necessarily the case that a given statement is either absolutely and certainly true, or else that it has no binding force whatever and can be left to the caprice of the individual to accept or not as he wishes. There are statements which cannot of themselves claim to have an absolute binding force in the realm of theology, and which, nevertheless, have to be respected both in theory and also in the practice of one's life. There are many statements in Catholic teaching which, while they do not in any sense amount to an absolute dogma such as has to be responded to with a totally unconditional assent of faith, still do, on the other hand, have a definite degree of binding force for the Catholic believer. For the intellectual this means that he cannot simply abolish such statements from his mind as matters of indifference which are, from the outset, irrelevant to him and to his work, even though he may find it difficult to reconcile them in any clear sense with his scientific views. Situations may even arise in which it is not altogether clear whether a given statement really is a dogma or merely a doctrine which, though it has a certain degree of binding force, is, nevertheless, capable of revision. On these grounds alone it can be realised how necessary it is for theologians and scientists of all branches to enter into dialogue with each other. This is the only way in which problems still open to discussion can profitably be viewed, in which the real meaning of the Church's teaching can be shielded from misunderstandings (and these can also [104] arise on the side of the theologians), in which the precise degree of binding force which a given theological doctrine may have becomes clearer, and so on.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

II

What we have said up to this point does not, of course, cover every aspect of the situation of the Catholic intellectual in the period following the Second Vatican Council. But we are compelled to break off our attempts to describe this situation at this point because we still have something further to say about the task of the Catholic scientist. To begin with we must enunciate a principle which may seem to be self-evident but is not so in reality, namely that the Catholic intellectual can and must accept the fact that he, just as much as other intellectuals, is a scientist who belongs to the present world. His life, no less than theirs, has this significance. We have said that this seems to be self-evident, and certainly there are many Catholic scientists who do not experience any problem in this. They accept unquestioningly their status as scientists dedicated to their field of enquiry. Side by side with this they have a further status of being sincere Christians and men of religion, in the same sense as they obviously have, in addition to their status as scientists, the further status of being husbands and wives, fathers, men with musical interests, citizens, perhaps sportsmen, etc. But this 'interior pluralism' in the individual in itself entails a problem, especially when it is a question of a pluralism of status involving the individual's religious commitment and task on the one hand, and his worldly calling on the other. It is precisely the sincerely religious man who, faced with this pluralism, can ask himself 'How do all these different aspects of my life fit together? Ought I not, right from the outset, to be directing all my activities and efforts in the world, together with the goals I set myself and the results I achieve in these, to a single supreme goal with which my religion presents me? Ought not all these activities to be permeated and inspired by a religious motivation, to be done for the "honour of God" and the "salvation of my neighbour"? Ought not my whole life to be stamped explicitly and directly with my Christianity?' To these questions it must be replied: A Christian scientist must indeed have present in his heart an ultimate awareness that his life is ultimately orientated to God, and that God himself has made him responsible for the way in which he conducts his life as a whole. But if [105] he really understands his own Christianity in a wholly Christian sense it must be no less clear to him that in his scientific work he not only may, but actually must also live a life that is genuinely 'worldly'. Even the scientist who is a convinced Christian does not need constantly to be asking himself in his scientific work: 'What direct contribution are my researches making to the salvation either of my own soul or of the souls of others?' He needs to be sustained in his work by a spirit of enquiry in the purely worldly sense, a desire for new knowledge. And he should give himself unreservedly to this, even though it has no direct relevance to his beliefs at the ideological level. In other words, even in his science he must help to construct a world that is 'worldly'. It might seem to be Christian and pious to wish to let religion enter directly and explicitly into everything always and every-where, and to be 'religious' even in one's approach to the material realities with which one has to cope in the achievement of one's aims. But in reality this is a measure of the degree to which the finite creature refuses to entrust the ultimate unity of its own life to the mystery of God, choosing instead to retain control of this for itself. Perhaps, therefore, we may be permitted to formulate the matter as follows: The scientist does not need to submit his science to interrogation by the Church as to what contribution it makes in the fields of apologetics and ecclesiastical politics. In the last analysis he has already done enough in this regard if he is a really sound scientist and a convinced Christian at the same time.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

For the Christian scientist of today it is, furthermore, of great importance that he really knows what it is which he believes and lives as a Christian. It is important that he does not continually labour under the impression that his science, both in its individual tenets in the concrete and still more in the general attitude of criticism appropriate to a scientist, exists in a situation more or less of conflict with his Christian faith. And precisely for this reason it is necessary that the idea which he has of his own Christianity is one which does not from the outset come into conflict with the contemporary outlook, characterised as it is by a spirit of scientific investigation. To ensure this it is necessary that the scientist in particular sees clearly that the Christian faith is at basis not a huge amalgam of complicated doctrines and propositions which are in constant and imminent danger of coming into conflict with the questions and findings of the various sciences. Certainly in our introductory remarks we laid emphasis upon the fact that in one's understanding of Catholicism one [106] cannot simply relegate the content of the Christian faith to an 'other-worldly' sphere in such a way that right from the first it has no point of contact whatever, and so no possibility of coming into conflict with that reality with which the sciences are concerned. Nevertheless Christianity, rightly understood, is something very simple. The Second Vatican Council has actually formulated it as follows: Man has to recognise that he who has been withdrawn from a state of sinfulness, encounters the mystery of the love of God imparted to him in Jesus Christ. We can also express the matter by saying: Man is aware of himself as a free and responsible being, as one who can fall into sin. He knows that no science, however sublime and however worth striving for it may be in its results, can ever comprehend or define in any adequate sense what man is as a whole, as he brings himself to his fulness as a whole and single entity in his life. Man knows that the sources of his conscious being are based on an absolute mystery which encompasses him, and that he dwells in this mystery whom we call God. The message of Christianity to this man is that the eternal mystery of his being, which is called God, not only encompasses his existence as the horizon, eternally distant, of all that he can think of or control in his life, but actually gives itself to this spiritual existence of his in the form of grace and eternal life to impart to this existence a value that is eternal, to blot out his sins and to make itself his own. Christianity asserts further that this self-bestowal of God in the Spirit of God has been made manifest in history and has been made firm and irrevocable in Jesus Christ, the man whom we recognise as him in whom God has definitively made himself present in our history. This is the real substance of Christianity, the basis on which the whole complex hierarchy of truths pertaining to the Christian faith rests, that hierarchy of which the Second Vatican Council speaks. All these truths are credible and able to be accepted by the spirit only to the extent that they maintain a constant and living connection with this true kernel of Christianity. Once we have realised this we can then go on to realise that this faith in the self-bestowal of God the grace which achieves its definitive manifestation in history in the person of Jesus Christ constitutes a community of those who believe which can legitimately claim to trace its origins back through history to Jesus Christ himself, and which assembles itself about him. We can further perceive that this community expresses its faith in the form of a credal confession and cult, and that it has a form of leadership which corresponds to the eschatological and indestructible nature of this community [107] of believers considered as the enduring presence of Christ himself. All this becomes, in fact, in a true sense self-evident, once we realise what constitutes the heart and essence of Christianity, and provided we do not misunderstand the nature of man himself by taking it in a sense that is over-individualist and so utterly out of date by contemporary standards. Moreover for a mature and realistic man it no longer occasions any surprise that this community of faith, made up as it is of men, even though it is gathered together about the God-man himself and in his Spirit, nevertheless has to bear the burden of history, of factors which are all too human, and the difficulty of constantly having to adjust the relationship between the individual and the social factors in this community anew. If we take Christianity in this sense, and view it from what is its true heart and essence, and if in so doing we make allowances for human nature in all its dimensions, then there is certainly nothing in the nature of Christianity which could be said to be irreconcilable with the mentality of contemporary man when this is realistic, rational and, in the best sense, critical. All that Christianity demands of modern man is that he shall not restrict himself in his reasoning exclusively to the data of science and to that which can be technically manipulated. It demands of him that he shall recognise that at the centre of his own existence a Mystery lies concealed, and one which ought to be responded to with adoration and love, that he shall have the courage to believe in the self-bestowal of this Mystery made immediately present and close to him, and to direct his life in hope towards a future that is absolute.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We have said at an earlier stage that the Christian precisely as such can and must be bold enough to be thoroughly and unreservedly 'worldly' in his approach to his science, and not to seek to give it a directly religious orientation. But this is not to deny that science as such can and must also be a praeparatio evangelii, a way into what is specifically Christian. An anthropology that is Christian rightly contests the view that human life in its entirety can be regarded as sacralised, and teaches that the explicitly religious and ecclesiastical factors in human life represent one section of it, and not the whole. But precisely this same Christian anthropology does teach that there is a concealed consecration of the whole of human life, in other words that the effect of grace upon human life in all its dimensions causes it to be open to the immediate influence of God, and to have an interior impulse which pushes it towards God's immediate presence, the only proviso here being that the individual concerned has [108] accepted, if only in a quite subconscious and unexplicitated manner, the ultimate Mystery of his existence in a spirit of obedience, hope and love, and has thereby been 'justified'. But for human life in all its dimensions to be open in this way to 'consecration' from above it is not necessary that it shall invariably and in all cases be interpreted in an explicitly religious sense. All dimensions of human life are, from the outset, subsumed, even though, it may be, only in the subconscious, in the unity and ultimate orientation imparted by the radical decision which man himself takes in response to the self-bestowal of God which is offered to him. This of itself is enough. Over and above this there is a basic ethos for the true scientist which has an intrinsic connection with the ultimate attitude of the Christian, and which causes him to exercise this basic attitude again and again in the concrete way in which he conducts his life. The will to truth, the determination to be self-critical, the basic realism which causes him to distinguish between what really is known and what is not, the attitude of reverence towards that which is not, and of its nature cannot be, explored, the attitude of objectivity and of a sense of responsibility, the resolve to serve truth rather than one's own prejudices – these and similar attitudes are indeed not gifts which belong to any and every individual who calls himself a scientist, and who may, perhaps, achieve very noteworthy successes in his special field. But they are attitudes which are certainly demanded by science as such, if one still understands science in a sense that is genuinely human, and they are attitudes which can be practised in the process of 'proving oneself daily in hard service' in the field of science. But such attitudes are not only human but Christian too. In virtue of the grace of God which constantly precedes all human activities such attitudes are always and of themselves open to the ineffable Mystery of God as he imparts himself to us. If then the scientist approaches his science in this way as a genuinely human activity, then the scientific work which he actually accomplishes and the goal which he sets himself to achieve, while remaining fully and uncompromisingly 'this-worldly' in character, are, nevertheless, Christian too, in their significance, even though this may be only implicit and at the subconscious level. And the explicit Christianity of such a scientist is properly speaking

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

nothing else than the true self-realisation of his own humanity, already subconsciously divinised by the grace of God, which he achieves and develops in his actual scientific work.

Over and above this the position of the scientist must be one of genuine [109] dialogue with the Church, and even of active collaboration with her. It may be that references to the 'apostolate of the laity' in the Church and with the Church have connotations which are displeasing to modern man, and most of all to a scientist. They do sound – even though this may be against the genuine basic meaning of such references – as though the mission of God to man may all too easily be interpreted in terms of a brash propaganda, an egoistic self-assertion on the Church's part in the struggle for power in society, of striving for prestige, of intruding upon the privacy of others in the sphere of religion. Of course, such attitudes are most of all repugnant to a scientist. But what the Church really means by the 'apostolate of the laity', and so of the scientist too, can be expressed even without references of this kind. What is really meant by this can, of course, not be developed in its total extent and all its aspects at this point. Here we must confine ourselves to mentioning a few specific points which have a special urgency for today. The scientist should not shrink from a dialogue with the officially established Church. He should put his knowledge and his experience at the Church's disposal. Admittedly more opportunities must be provided for this in the concrete than was formerly the case, even to the point of setting up permanent institutions for the purpose. The established representatives of the Church's authority should be borne up by the conviction that today it is no longer possible for the leadership of the Church to be conducted in a paternalist manner, and solely on the basis of their own abilities and experience of life. At this time, rather, in which human life has achieved an extreme degree of complexity, there is a need to supplement this by systematically planned experiment and research such as can only be achieved by methods which have been scientifically proved. But scientists in every field must be ready to place themselves at the disposal of the established authorities in the Church. They must themselves take the initiative in making the sort of contacts which are necessary for the Church's authorities to be equipped with information of this kind. The situation is not in fact such that every science and every scientific finding has in the concrete the same degree of ideological or ecclesiastical significance, or that the Christian scientist has to evaluate the importance of his own particular science according to the degree of its importance for the Church. Nor should he use such a criterion in determining what lines of investigation to follow in his science, what aims to set himself, etc. But when we survey the chief and basic branches of the natural, social and human sciences, then we are [110] forced to recognise that all of them have a real significance for the Church too, for her official policy and for her preaching of the gospel inasmuch as this is adapted to the special needs of the age. Earlier the Church could help herself in this regard by ensuring that she always had a sufficient number of specialists in the various branches of science, even among the ranks of the clergy. Today, however, there are various factors which render this ever more impossible of attainment. Today the dialogue between Church and science must be a dialogue between her established authorities on the one hand and scientists who are laymen on the other. Indeed it will soon be the case that in many questions there will not be enough Catholic scientists even in the ranks of the laity, and the Church will be forced to seek her information without embarrassment even from those who are not Christians at all. This is not the place to adduce examples showing what the implications of this can be in the concrete. One such example is sufficient to show that the Church is genuinely in earnest in entering into dialogue with science. It is that of the commission summoned by the Pope to prepare an official declaration of the Church on the problems entailed by the increase in population and family problems, including that of legitimate methods of regulating births. Here not only theologians but also physicians, sociologists, psychologists, etc., were brought together to constitute a single commission which often met for weeks at a time. Moreover there was full freedom of discussion, and the findings of these specialists were genuinely not already laid down a priori.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Of course, for the scientist to make a constructive and critical contribution of this kind to the discharge of the Church's task in the contemporary world it is not always necessary to set up an official and institutionalised structure of this kind. Certainly there are many other and simpler forms which such collaboration can take. To a large extent, in fact, the educated man and so the scientist exercises a decisive influence upon public opinion in the Church, errors in which, as Pius XII has actually said, would be damaging to the Church in the highest degree. The scientist should be aware of his own significance and so of his responsibility in shaping public opinion of this kind in the Church, and should take this responsibility seriously. To a large extent the mission and task of the Christian scientist in the present age covers the same ground as the mission and task which every intelligent man of responsibility and good will ascribes to the scientist in general in the sphere of human, social and political life. [111] It can be stated with confidence: If the Catholic scientist of today is true to his duty and task in its human aspects in his science then he has already to a large extent fulfilled his Christian task as a scientist. It can be understood that the officially constituted Church cannot lay down any very concrete directives or rules for the Christian scientist as to how he should fulfil this task of his in its human aspects. This is something which must to a large extent be left to his own specialised knowledge and his personal conscience alone to decide. But the fulfilment of this task, which has to be discharged by the mature Christian as his own personal one, can in the case of the Catholic scientist be inspired by his faith and supported by a specifically Christian attitude on his part. In his case it is not only demanded by merely humanistic considerations but by his responsibility before God and by his awareness that all science must, in the last analysis, serve the interests of humanity, for man has a validity in God's eyes that is eternal, and to serve him represents an absolute value which does not disappear when the finite history of the individual or of mankind comes to an end. In the case of the Christian he is upheld in the fulfilment of the task by the religious conviction that every service of love on man's part is an actualisation of his love for the eternal God. And when he performs a service for his neighbour as part of the service which it is always the duty of all science to perform, it has for him as a Christian this significance of also being an act of love for God.

It has not been possible here, and probably it would not have been desirable either, to provide a detailed presentation of what the Second Vatican Council has to say about the scientist, his value and his task in the Pastoral Constitution 'On the Church in the World Today', or to comment on the individual points in this Constitution. In conclusion let us refer once more to the actual Constitution itself. It may be that the scientist, when he reads the relevant passages in this Constitution, might have the impression that all that it contains is self-evident propositions (here as also elsewhere). But the genuine scientist understands that it is good when he is not overloaded with detailed prescriptions as to how he should live his life, and he knows that that which is most obvious of all in theory with regard to the reverence due to truth and to his fellow men, and with regard to love and service, is in practice the most difficult of all tasks. Yet it is precisely this which is laid upon the scientist no less than upon others.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[112]

7

THE TASK OF THE WRITER IN RELATION TO CHRISTIAN LIVING

The essay which follows is concerned with the role of the creative writer or author. It is permissible to include a discussion of this subject in the present volume only to the extent that we are treating of it strictly from the standpoint of the theologian as such, for certainly, apart from a specialised knowledge of theology, we have no other qualifications to make judgments in this field. If therefore the theologian is asked for his special views on the subject of creative writers and authors then what he has to say will naturally fall under the heading '"Authorship" and Christian Living'.

I

The basic thesis which we have initially to state and to develop here is expressed in the following simple proposition: the author as such stands under the summons of Christ in grace, and his Christianity must be conditioned by this fact. Authorship as a human activity has a special Christian relevance of its own.

Such a proposition may seem abrupt and enigmatic in the extreme, and for this reason certain introductory remarks may be permitted, though admittedly these are incapable of solving all the problems raised in this thesis.[1] Thus we are in a position to set out our thesis in this manner because and to the extent that every man is in a true and decisive sense (even though it may be not in a full and adequate one) 'Christian'. In [113] other words he has been summoned by Christ and has already taken up a permanent attitude in response to this summons. Of course, there must be differences in the way a statement of this sort is applied to particular cases. But the statement that every author is 'Christian' and is so precisely as such is not necessarily or immediately proved false by the assertion that many men are not Christians at all in any sense, and could not therefore become so merely by the fact of being authors. What is being asserted here is not that every man intends to be a Christian, or that every man knows explicitly or in a way that could be formulated propositionally that he is such, still less that every man is a member of the visible Church. But it has to be recognised that human existence as such is inevitably and inescapably subject to certain transcendent conditions or 'existentials', such that, while they may indeed be denied, they do not thereby cease to be so, but simply remain in force even though they are denied and rejected, and continue to be in force whether we recognise them consciously or not, whether we accept them or protest against them. And once this is realised then Christianity itself will, in a radical sense be numbered among these 'existentials', and will not be assigned to the category of those ordinary conditions of life (as for instance one's calling as a citizen, the fact that one is or is not staying at some particular place, etc.) which can be accepted or refused according as the individual concerned wishes.

When, therefore, we have to draw a general distinction between the chance circumstances which affect human living on the one hand and the enduring existentials which condition it on the other, then the state of being summoned by the grace of Christ belongs to the enduring

[1] The concept of 'anonymous Christianity' is one that is very often used in contemporary theological parlance (and also in the actual conclusions arrived at in contemporary theology) in a manner in which the present author would not wish it to be taken. For a right understanding of this concept we may refer to the essay 'Anonymous Christians' in Theological Investigations VI, pp. 390-398.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

existentials which apply absolutely to every man. He can, in fact, be baptised or unbaptised. He can belong in a visible and sociological sense to the Catholic Church or not. Only in this sense and to this extent does Christianity also belong to the chance circumstances of human life, and these factors in Christian existence, freely ordained by God and either accepted or effectively denied by man, must not be underestimated as though they were insignificant or inessential (though at this point we are in no position to treat of their significance for salvation). But all this makes no difference to one essential fact: no man can prevent the fact that he is loved by God with the absolute and unreserved self-offering of the innermost depths of God's own triune life. No man can prevent the fact that he is redeemed, that God has willed the incarnation of the eternal Logos to take effect in his existence. No man can escape the fact – even when his whole life is [114] one great protest against and denial of it - that the grace of God is applied to him permanently and enduringly, and that thereby his existence in all its dimensions is constantly open to the infinite. He cannot escape from the fact that grace is present to him at least as something that appeals to, empowers and invites him, and that, in virtue of this, everything in his life is included in a self-transcendence in which his own free decision is already forseen and provided for. He cannot escape from the fact that the whole of human existence rests upon a single unique basis, namely the immeasurable depths of that mystery which is absolute love.

This reality may be received into man's conscious awareness, may be believed in and loved, or it may not. It remains a reality, and its purpose is, even when it is denied, to support the life of man from within. It wells up from the depths of man's heart in a thousand secret ways, penetrating into all spheres of his life. It makes him restless; makes him doubt whether existence is really finite and restricted to this present world, fills him with a sense of the immeasurability of that claim which can only be fulfilled by the infinity of God. It renders all the experiences which he makes of himself lead on to a further dimension beyond themselves. It reveals further and deeper levels of significance in them and makes them open to the ineffable and the incomprehensible. Man cannot rest. He can no longer be content to take his own finitude as something that is obvious. In the very moment that he becomes conscious of it the movement which carries him on to the incomprehensible, the fall into the infinite depths, is already taking place. Man may protest against this, may seek to suppress it, may employ the most subtle devices in order to hush it up. Even then he is still involved with it, even then it is still there. It (considered as that which he experiences in the very act of fleeing from it) is the ineffable mystery of which we Christians say without embarrassment and almost facilely, as of something that is obvious, that it is not something that repels us but something that is near, protecting, forgiving, 'giving' of itself and forgiving of us.

In one word: no man can escape the fact that he is 'Christian' in this all important sense of being summoned by God, and in the sense that however secret his acceptance of the claims made upon his existence may be, in accepting them he accepts this claim, which permeates his whole existence: the claim that in accepting them he is, in a true sense, a Christian – an anonymous Christian, perhaps, a Christian who denies his own Christianity, a Christian who has not the least suspicion of the significance of what has been achieved in him, a Christian who is constantly running [115] away from himself, one who betrays the fact that he is a Christian in spite of himself, but still precisely a Christian. And even in cases in which an individual becomes a Christian in the usual sense of the term all that is achieved in this (though admittedly this in itself is a miracle of blessing) is that someone accepts in faith what and who he in any case is, and that this loving acceptance is 'manifested' at the historical and social level in the sacramental sign and in the fact that he belongs to the community of those who can say in a definitive sense what they both are and will to be, and what all others too are, even though they may outwardly deny it.

It is in the light of this, then, that we say that the author as such is called by Christ, and has to be a Christian. First it must be recognised that this proposition is not simply a self-evident one. There are indeed realities pertaining to the life of man, without which he cannot exist at all, yet which as such have nothing specifically Christian in them, not even in that sense which we have already adverted to of a Christianity that is still concealed and anonymous. The laws of physics and biology, for instance, of their very nature point to such realities, which in themselves are still at the pre-Christian level and 'neutral'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But the first thing to be recognised is that every human act of writing, just as every human act of speaking, is a free act on man's part, and as such has a moral relevance which is prior to, and independent of the actual content of what is being said. For in such an act, man is exercising control over himself, his spirit, his freedom, and directing himself towards a specific object; he addresses his fellow man indisputably as human even in those cases - indeed precisely in those cases – in which he requires the other to concentrate his attention exclusively upon a limited and no longer fully human subject-matter. But in the very act of saying or writing something, or alternatively of listening to or reading something, our specifically human qualities are engaged at least in virtue of the formal quality of the process, and so the process in itself acquires a moral relevance.

There are several different levels in the responsibility which a speaker assumes for the content of what he says. He is responsible for ensuring that what he says agrees with his own convictions as the speaker (truthfulness). He is responsible for making sincere efforts to ensure that his actual statement corresponds to the reality which it is intended to designate (truth). He is responsible for the effect which he foresees that his statement will make upon those who hear it, those to whom it is addressed. [116] He is responsible for ensuring that his statement is conveyed in the appropriate manner and measure having regard to the general intellectual environment of speaker and hearer alike. He is responsible for doing his utmost to make sure that what he says can be understood and assimilated (this is a duty of love which he owes to the individual, and of respect which he owes to the community in its intellectual and social aspects). He is responsible as a matter of duty for saying what needs to be said because it is urgently relevant and should be said in the here and now. This responsibility is laid upon those who put themselves forward to speak in public life, and who therefore must speak (each according to his particular opportunities and abilities and according to the position he occupies) in order to make their contribution to the general debate considered as a whole, and in the manner appropriate to this kind of situation (even though in this context it is clearly quite impossible to calculate or to foresee what the effect of the word will be, and so the free exercise of the mind leads ultimately to an outcome over which there is no control and the deed returns at last upon the doer's head as that which he has to endure).

The mere fact that his statements have this kind of moral relevance of itself means that the author as such is already drawn into the sphere of the Christian, and there are two basic reasons for this. First it must be remembered that every act, even one which is in the first instance made to conform merely to the norms of natural morality and the natural law, and which is judged by Christendom to be so conformed, is preserved and protected in its essential 'rightness' (its conformity to natural norms), and this in itself gives it a salvific import (at least in a negative sense). It means that the doing of it has an effect upon human existence as a whole, and in this context of the totality of human existence it can only be done aright with the help of God. This help in turn can safely be regarded as a grace bestowed by Christ. The second basic reason is that in the order of salvation as it actually exists in practice and in the concrete every human act which is morally relevant possesses (for reasons which cannot be gone into in greater detail here), a certain intrinsic salvific power within itself such that through it the doer either becomes one with God and filled with his grace, or else guilty in his sight. In other words every such act constitutes a response, either affirmative or negative, to Christianity as such, even though the Christianity involved here may be of the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

unacknowledged and unexplicit kind with which every human being is inescapably confronted.

[117] The moment the author makes man the subject of his assertions he ipso facto passes beyond the limits of the purely natural sciences and the conclusions which they are capable of yielding, and becomes a philosopher, a poet, a visionary, a sage, a committed believer or a prophet. When he takes man as his subject and formulates propositions about him, makes him the theme of his argument as a whole, produces definitions of him or preliminary statements about him, then the very content of what he is asserting as an author necessarily means that he is answering either 'yes' or 'no' to Christianity itself. For a factor which must always be borne in mind is that human nature is realised in a complex multitude of created individuals, and it belongs precisely and by definition to the Catholic attitude towards humanity as a whole that it maintains unreservedly, and accords full value to this complexity and multiplicity in mankind. And it is precisely this multiplicity that makes it possible in speaking about man to assert something which applies only to a part of humanity and not to the whole. In themselves, therefore, statements of this kind are still neutral in content, and, from the ideological aspect, it makes no difference whether they are accepted or denied. But if a part of a given reality really is a part, and if there is indeed a unity in human existence whether actual or, in a true sense, potential, such that this unity constitutes either a fact to be recognised or a goal to be striven for, and if this single all-embracing unity is truly a Christian unity, then it follows that the part of the reality as such (i.e. as a single 'subdivision' of it, for this is an essential specification of what it means to be a part, even if it is not one which is necessarily adverted to) has an objective bearing upon the Christianity inherent in the whole. For this reason such a statement about a part of reality is constantly open to further supplementation when the vision of the whole is arrived at. In that sense the partial statement is already Christian at least in an 'adventist' sense, in the sense namely that it is capable of bringing the one who makes it to the Christianity of the whole. Alternatively, a rejection of this openness is a denial of that Christianity which is already present at least in an implicit and anonymous sense in the whole, and is already making its impact through the partial statement about humanity.

This inescapably Christian dimension in the statements which a human author makes, only really achieves its full force when he forms the intention of isolating and throwing into relief the essential totality of human existence by pointing to the causes which constitute it as one and whole. [118] It can be the case that in pursuing this aim he never arrives at this essential wholeness of humanity at all, and that through no fault of his own, but where and to the extent that he intends to make or actually makes the all-embracing statement about existence, he speaks as a Christian, and either appeals to or denies the Christian message. The Christianity in his statement can be an anonymous Christianity, but it is Christian for all that. He may not understand the full significance of what he is saying. He may be saying more than he intended (as, for instance, if his message is one of love of neighbour and so of fulfilment of the law. This message may be Christian in an Old Testament sense, an expression of adoration for the unknown God. He may perhaps in some dumb and inarticulate way be proclaiming that anguished atheism which is, in reality, a sharing in the desolation of the Cross). But what is quite impossible is that this message should be of a kind that is really irrelevant to Christ. This would only be possible if he were not real. Even in cases in which Christianity is explicitly or implicitly denied, or seems to be so in the course of pursuing this aim to express existence as a totality, caution is required in coming to a judgment on this. A statement such as this, which sounds like a denial and perhaps actually is one, can nevertheless be the expression of a new situation for the Christian and for Christendom as a whole which is unfamiliar and which has not yet been brought under control. Such a statement can be the false or inadequate explanation and interpretation of a quest for the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

fulness of life which is, nevertheless, under God's blessing, which is Christian. It can be the statement of a man who only supposes that he does not believe in God, but does in fact accept with a sort of ultimate inarticulate obedience that absolute mystery which is called God, and that mystery of his own life which is Christ.

Indeed we can go further than this and add the following: in a human statement of this kind it is not mere words that are uttered, but the human reality itself which is expressed and put forward (put forward as something that is representative of the totality of being to which it belongs). For this reason it is necessarily ambiguous, since it is, in the nature of things, impossible to achieve absolute clarity or to eliminate all ambiguity in any objectifying statement of what human freedom means. Otherwise the abiding mystery of how man can exercise a free decision would finally and totally be unveiled, and this is not possible. But there are two sides to this truth. If in explaining what is meant we must still confine our attention more or less to what is actually stated in the writing, then we [119] shall be compelled to say: this writing contains an explicit denial of Christianity, which as such is explicitly false, and constitutes a temptation and a danger.

There is no need to discuss any further at this point the practical norms that should be deduced from this with regard to how far such writings and such creative work should be tolerated, disseminated or read. In this connection the following factors have to be borne in mind: It is a general principle that everything capable of producing false and evil effects depends for its survival on the existence of good. It would not be Christian at all, but rather Manichaean, to forget this in its concrete application to the conduct and attitude of Christians (though this does in fact happen all too often). For this reason, it is true to say, those theories in which Christianity is attacked, and which represent a real danger to it, depend for their very existence upon the fact that there are certain genuine questions which the Christians themselves have not yet sufficiently coped with, and that existential rejection of Christianity which represents a real danger to it can only derive its strength from a genuine love for a genuine reality which the Christians have not yet made their own as warmly and uncompromisingly as they should.

From this it is clear and obvious that in the concrete anyone can be a 'fine fellow' and, in the social sense, a good Christian, while still being a wretchedly bad writer. And yet there is an intrinsic connection between a really great Christianity and really great writing. Certainly they are not to be identified one with another. Great writing is achieved only in those cases in which man achieves a radical self-confrontation, in which he realises what he himself is. But even when he does this he can indeed become ensnared in guilt, perversity, self-hatred and even demonic pride. He can confront himself as a sinner, and identify himself with this, yet even in this case he would still stand to a greater degree in that blessed peril which consists in encountering God than the narrow-minded and superficial bourgeois, who right from the first anxiously evades the imponderable factors in existence, fleeing from them into that attitude of superficiality in which there is admittedly no encounter with doubt, but no encounter with God either. Therefore for those who are still only approaching maturity the question of what sort of reading matter is suitable for their education can be a serious problem in itself. But the mature Christian must be fully and unreservedly free to explore all writings that are truly great, bringing to them an attitude of reverence [120] and sympathetic love, even when this may entail pain for him. He will do this because such writings contain a message about man either as redeemed or else in need of redemption and capable of receiving it. And in any case such writing will give us a deeper insight into the truth than if we simply adopt that attitude of superficiality which has only too often and for too long been regarded as appropriate for so-called good Christians, an attitude namely in which man is regarded as the two-legged animal which has become somewhat craftier than the other animals and therefore less predictable than they.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The further man is led by the message of great writing into the immeasurable depths upon which his existence is founded, the more he is compelled by such writing to face up to the hidden depths which a man can find within himself depths which are dark and obscure, and which are buried in that twilight of ambiguity in which man can no longer say with any ultimate certainty whether he is in a state of grace or one of radical desolation. It is no accident, but rather inherent in the nature of the case, that the great creative writings of mankind are obscure, and for the most part leave us with the unanswered question of whether it is the mystery of grace or that of perdition which takes place and which is described in their pages. How indeed could it be otherwise? Creative or imaginative writing must be concerned with the concrete, and not try to manipulate abstract principles like puppets in a dance. But that which is individual and concrete is a mystery which will only be unveiled by that unique judgment which belongs to God alone, yet which the creative writer makes present in his writing as a mystery. It is not in the least necessary, therefore, that his writing should have that simplicity and clarity of structure which many bad teachers would so much like it to have in their anxiety to protect the minds of their pupils from any harm.

If we are not Manichees then as Christians we recognise that a sin that is truly great is terrible indeed because it is a sin and because it is so great, but that the only possible way in which it can come to be so great is that in it much of the greatness of humanity itself is realised and revealed. For evil as such is nothing. Moreover we know that God allows sin to exist in this world, and to be great and powerful, and yet that for this very reason it is not so easy to confine ourselves to the saints when we seek to find examples in the concrete of the greatness of humanity. Moreover we recall Paul's instruction that we Christians must not withdraw ourselves from [121] the world, but actually can and must, in a certain sense, have fellowship (though admittedly a different kind of fellowship from that which we have with our brethren in the faith) with unbelievers and the unchaste (1 Cor 5:9-13). And in view of all this we Christians are not only not forbidden, but positively commanded to take seriously into consideration and to familiarise ourselves with that creative writing which genuinely is such, even if it is not in conformity with the moral standards of Christianity, though admittedly here we have to distinguish this genuine creative writing from that which conveys a message of sheer unbelief and immorality under the pretence of being creative writing. And in all this we must not judge those who do not share our Christian belief.

There is such a thing as a Christianity that is anonymous. There are men who merely think that they are not Christians when in reality they are so in God's sight and under his grace. Thus it is possible for the individual to be raised to a level of human living which is already imbued with grace even though he does not realise it, and even though he supposes that he is still at the purely human level. We Christians are in a better position to understand this than one who is actually in the state to which we refer. We lay down as part of the teaching of our faith that even human morality at the 'this-worldly' level has need of the grace of God in order to be able to maintain itself in its fulness or for any length of time. It is our belief therefore, precisely as Christians that to achieve this supreme level of human living, wherever it manifests itself in its genuine form, and even when it is found outside the limits of professed and acknowledged Christianity, is a gift of God's grace and a fruit of the redemption itself even though the individual who has attained to this level is not himself yet aware of it. Why should we not love this exalted level of human living when we find it in such an individual? For we would actually be despising the grace of God itself if we were to remain indifferent to it.

II

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The second thesis, which I would present as the development and application of the first, may be stated as follows: an author can justifiably be Christian in various ways. In order to explain this thesis and to establish it I would like to attempt to enumerate the most important of these ways. In doing this I shall be using a nomenclature that is unfamiliar, and for [122] this I apologise. Despite every effort to the contrary, I have not succeeded in avoiding this use of strange and unfamiliar designations.

1. An author can be Christian in that he is and remains one who frankly restricts himself to a limited field. By way of preliminary it should be noticed that every author is free to choose what he wishes to speak and write about. Of course this choice is, in itself, subject to moral, and therefore to Christian considerations too (since we have to render account for every idle word if it really is such). But even allowing for this, it is justifiable to write about anything which is a subject for human discussion, about the weather, therefore, the advantages of the Volkswagen, the absurdities of everyday life – everything, in short, which is an object of investigation for one or other of the particular sciences. Now when a writer takes this course his work can be genuinely human and – precisely because of this – genuinely Christian too, precisely in the modesty of its aims, in that it is restricted in this way to that which is in the immediate foreground, that which has no directly ideological relevance. The reason for this is that this very modesty implies a tacit acknowledgment of the pluralism of creaturehood, and of the fact that the ultimate unity of it remains hidden in ineffable and impenetrable mystery in God and is reserved to him alone to comprehend.

It is here that a truer and more Christian ‘positivism’ than that which is now in vogue might be in place. The ‘positive’ element in such a positivism would have to be evaluated from this standpoint. For a positivism of this sort, which restricts itself to the apprehensible in human life, does not thereby erect itself into an absolute ideology (this would in fact be anti-positivist) by claiming to be either in theory or in the concrete existing situation the only possible right and rational attitude to adopt. And provided it does not make any such claim then it is something for which the modern Christian can have full understanding. For he will understand the attitude of silence, reserve and modesty, of being slow and cautious with regard to all ‘ideological’ assertions as a sign that the statements reflecting these attitudes are genuine and of real value. He too does not like to hear God spoken of as though the speaker imagined that he had actually resolved the mystery of the divine. A Christian of this sort, therefore, does not for one moment expect that the honest positivist, the one who, in all honesty, restricts his field of discourse in this way, will always attain to God in everything that he says. Such a Christian recognises that there really is a pluralism of beings, and that these are precisely [123] not identical with God. Taken in their formal aspect as so many particular things they have no direct reference to God at all. The most genuinely Christian way of speaking of such things, therefore, is the one in which the speaker simply and honestly remains within the limited field of discourse he has set himself and shows himself fully and sincerely aware that it is restricted, even though he does not explicitly refer to that fact in what he says.

2. The man who is overwhelmed by questions, whose statement of his experiences takes the form of an open question. At this point attention must be drawn once more to certain factors which we have already mentioned. Wherever creative writers seek to present word-pictures of man as he is there will always be some whose presentation of him is based upon his radical insufficiency and utter insecurity, who represent man as a question to which there is no answer. A writer of this kind will do this without giving the positive answer to this question which Christianity supplies. For him man constitutes a problem which is insoluble. He will say that it has not been given to him to achieve anything more, that as a creative writer he can put into words only what he experiences, and that he is no preacher or theologian. Can an author write in this vein? Can he take this approach and actually in doing so be a Christian?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

For our present purpose we are abstracting from the special question (which must, however, be taken seriously) of how far statements of this kind can be out of place for specific circles of readers for whom they might be regarded as morally perverted and therefore unChristian. This might be argued on the grounds that these particular readers will predictably be drawn into the false opinion that the particular problem which this author has left unsolved in the here and now is insoluble in itself that there is no solution to it which the reader could in his own right supply in response to the question put to him. Here we are rather considering the question that has been raised in itself, in the absolute.

If the creative writer or thinker who raises this question and leaves it unanswered believes, or intends to assert, that there is no answer, that man constitutes the absurdity of a question launched into the void of nothingness, then he is in error, and an answer of this kind (whether taken in this sense by him or by others) is false or unChristian. Admittedly there is a further question which may be raised in such a case, that namely of whether the very fact of posing the question and of calling man himself in question in this radical sense cannot have a salutary effect upon the [124] complacent and the superficial (a type which is extremely common even among 'believing' Christians) by shaking them out of their complacency in such a way that they can no longer be soothed and quietened by the specious solutions offered by well-meaning 'average' Christians. And then in such a case we could go on to ask a second question, namely whether what is ostensibly a denial that there is any solution to the problem of man, a denial which is more or less expressed as a theory, does not in fact proceed from a deeper, although unexpressed acceptance of the solution constituted by the mystery of the forgiving God, a solution which would be present in the creative writer himself and in his basic attitude – the more so since, in cases of genuine creative inspiration, this basic attitude and impulse often go far beyond the writer's own conscious intuitions.

At all events it is often the case that the Christian reader can take the question, with all the radical despair which it involves, in a way that conduces to his own salvation. He can take it as a summons to him to call up the ultimate resources of faith within him, which he would otherwise never have brought to bear. But there are cases in which the question is genuinely left open, and then it should not be rejected on the grounds that such questions should never be asked unless the answer to them is supplied. Every piece of creative writing and every philosophical position is in fact only one element in a continuous and incessant discussion carried on among men. And it is impossible for the whole discussion to stand revealed in any one such element taken in isolation. What is true of human life as a whole applies in this instance too: the experience of each particular moment must remain open to the greater breadth and fulness of life as a whole. No one moment can be the measure of its own value, nor have we any right to expect of it that it should contain the whole of life within itself. It is a necessary fact of creaturely existence, and one which Christians have to accept, that the moment of fear is not the moment of love, that of desolation is not ipso facto that of consolation, that of death is not also and in itself that of resurrection. He who, whether in life or in creative writing, is unwilling to endure this fact and to bear with it constantly experiences a 'watering down' of life's due fulness. For such a one seizes life before it is ready for him, so that for him it is always flat and insipid. Nothing in it has come to the full ripeness and maturity of its being. This is true alike of the questions which life puts to him and of the answers which it can supply. But where he is humble enough and obedient enough to bear with the question and to allow it to be completely open the answer [125] is already present even though only in a hidden manner, even though it is still buried in silence, just as even before Easter, while Christ was still on the Cross or in the grave on Good Friday, the victory of life had already been won. There is a real need for writers of the type which we are considering here, who are overwhelmed by the magnitude of the questions life puts to them; writers who state what they experience in the form of an open question. There should be

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

such, and even as such they are Christian.

3. The writer who is a full, though anonymous Christian. We have already said that according to Catholic teaching there is a type of man who has been wholly justified in faith, hope and love, and endowed with the grace of the triune life of God, even though, so far as those ideas are concerned which well up from the innermost dynamism of his being to become the expressions of his real self, he is not a Christian and a Catholic in any explicit sense, or as incorporated into the visible society of the Church and governed by her laws. This situation is not only something that was possible in former ages, or is possible in pagan lands. It is also possible among us and in our own time. And in view of the doctrine of God's will to save all men and of the victory of Christ over sin we have every right to assume that the case envisaged is of frequent occurrence among us. But if this is true then it is also perfectly possible to imagine that a man who has received and been touched by the ultimate reality of redemption and been endowed with the Spirit of faith and love in this way may go on to use his powers as an author to express this and to embody it in his words. And let it not be imagined that in cases in which a man does intend to express a reality of this kind about himself he is inescapably confronted by the following dilemma: either to profess himself as a fully committed member of the official Church, and to do this in some sense by a formula already prescribed by the Church as a society, or else to refrain from defining his position in any way at all. No such dilemma need necessarily apply to a man who finds himself in this situation.

Of course the ideal case, both from the personal and social point of view, for such a declaration would be one in which an individual who was explicitly and consciously a Catholic and member of the Church expressed his belief in such a way that it was not merely theologically correct but living, actual, able to be understood and proceeding from his own personal experience and from the innermost grace with which he was endowed. But while this is true, it does not render the other case impossible, namely [126] that precisely this Christian reality can be expressed in ways in which the individual making the statement about himself is totally unconscious in any explicit sense of the Christian significance of what he is saying. And yet in the case supposed a professed Christian can recognise in this statement the same Christianity which he himself professes, and, it may be, expressed in a more cogent and more comprehensible form than it is in merely traditional formulae which, while they may be dogmatically correct, are not really understood or able to make their full impact in the concrete existential situation. Of course statements of an anonymous Christianity of this kind can meet with indifference on our part. We can fail to recognise them as Christian at all (though in fact they are so). We can be deaf to them. Nevertheless we are in contact with authors who are Christian in this sense, and we should train our ears to be ready for statements of this kind from them. For all other considerations apart we could take over the modes of expression and style present in such statements and develop them further so as to make them express a more explicit kind of Christianity for our own salvation and that of many others. And this would fulfil an urgent need.

4. The professedly non-Catholic writer who falls to realise that his position is in fact a Catholic one. What kind of author this description is intended to designate can be deduced from what has just been said. Just as there are authors who profess themselves to be non-Christians but only suppose themselves to be such, so too there are non-Catholic authors who only suppose that their actual position is not a Catholic one. The outcome of four hundred years of division in the Christendom of the West is that we have drawn so far apart in our modes of thought and expression, in the tenour of our ideas and in our attitude and outlook that in addition to the real differences in doctrine and life which do exist between us there is also much else which we believe to be opposed to the teaching of our Church, but which in reality either does belong fully and unreservedly to Catholicism in all its breadth and fulness,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

or else which ought to be introduced into it. Several factors have to be borne in mind here. First let us take the case of the non-Catholic Christian whom I believe to be in good faith and justified by God's grace. With regard to the basic tenets of the Christian faith he holds these in common with me. But what of the points in which he deviates from Catholic teaching? To the extent that he is in fact in good faith he is actually quite incapable of maintaining these with the faith that comes from the Holy Spirit, or with the absolute [127] and basic decision of faith which he personally has made in his concrete existential situation. With regard to those tenets which we both have in common he does indeed do this in real fact, but with regard to the points which are in dispute between us he only seems to do so. Moreover this difference, which cannot be otherwise than real and objective, is one to which we ourselves must pay due heed. A further point for consideration is that often there is not even a real disagreement as to the actual object of belief but rather differences in mode of expression, of perspective or outlook, or at least the difference is about something which has not been perceived, but which if it were perceived would not be denied. The implications of this cannot be developed any further at this point. But at any rate this type of Catholic author too, does exist.

5. The author who is a professed Catholic. It might seem that there is not much to be said about this type. There is, however, a great deal that might be pointed out and yet that is very difficult to express. First we should consider the explicitly Catholic author who does not pretend to be stating the revealed fulness of the divine and human reality in the name of the Church in the manner of a teacher laying down what is her official doctrine or for her members at large. He is not in any sense preaching the Church's official message, or seeking to bring it home to men. Rather he speaks as a 'private' individual, as a layman. As such he is the creative writer, and at the same time always the professed believer too, who expresses the Christian reality as he himself experiences it and lives it, the gospel message as brought home and made actual in his life. The first point to be made is that there both can and must be authors who are Catholics in this explicit and professed sense too. Why indeed should there not be? Should the creative writer and author be ashamed of the gospel merely on the grounds that he does not feel himself called to preach, and because he seeks to express concrete reality and not merely abstract theory? Or is there no such thing as a Christianity that is made actual in the concrete? Or does this process of actualisation take place only in a hidden manner and at so deep a level that even the most exalted of creative writing or poetry could not conjure it up or give it expression? And if this were the case how could it continue to be preached at all? How could it be that God-given reality which is intended to permeate all dimensions of human life with forgiveness and new creation?

Certainly every creative writer must say only what he really has touched upon and understood. But it must be remembered that we have been [128] redeemed. God, and not the devil, has had the last word. And in view of this no-one should be the sort of creative writer who regards only the interior hell within man as a suitable subject for the genuine poet or author. Or do we, in the last analysis, still have to rely on the message of that current of creative writing that comes from the East to teach us that a man can still be a creative writer even when he is bold enough to aim at 'edifying' (using this term in the best biblical sense)? If we are considering statements about the specific achievements of Christianity, about forgiveness and redemption, grace and consolation, eternity and the living God, who is in no sense a figment of man's mind, then of course these have a quality of their own that is unique. The very nature of the subject matter of such statements sets them apart from all others. For this subject matter is present only in that faith which comes as a pure grace of God. And this faith ever-present within us is hidden in the ineffable mystery of God. To this extent, therefore, every explicitly Christian statement shares in the same absolute and unique quality, as also in the same obscurity, indirectness, difficulty and sense of mystery that constantly challenges us anew, for this is unmistakably a quality of the word of faith.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is in no sense to be regretted, therefore, but rather something that is inherent in the very nature of the case, that a message of faith of this kind should come from the lips or from the pen only with the greatest hesitation and reserve, and that it should be expressed in few and modest words. In this connection one might almost say: if the theologians were more cautious and more careful in formulating their theories, and if the laity were bolder in their faith, more open and more trustful in letting the light of the creed they profess shine out, then the message explicitly pertaining to Christianity, that which emanates from God and his Church, and from the event of salvation and new life as actually achieved – that message would be more comprehensible, more penetrating and more convincing.

The point which we have now reached in our considerations would be the appropriate place to speak of the author who is explicitly Christian and Catholic and is so more or less ex professo. In other words his writings are directly theological or religious in character. This, however, would constitute a new and quite distinct subject, and in order to deal with it we would have to return to the fundamentals and begin all over again. Instead of taking this course, let us put forward a third thesis, though one which, [129] admittedly, we cannot spend any further time in establishing here. It is this: the author is wholly – and even, in this last analysis, always – susceptible of being judged and criticised by Christian standards. Such standards are not extrinsic to the special character of the author and his work, but are inherently present in them from the first. If we were explicitly to point out the implications which follow from this statement, then it would be made apparent what we meant by the assertion with which this study opened: the author as such stands under the grace of Christ and has to be a Christian in this sense.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[130]

8

PRAYER FOR CREATIVE THINKERS

Eternal God, Creator of all men and of all things, invisible and visible alike, God of all history, you who are the Lord and the goal, the power and the light of all the activities of the human spirit, today we bring before you our prayer of intercession for all those who have a creative contribution to make in this field.

Lord, who else offers prayers on their behalf? And yet we know that the goal they set themselves, their creative power, their work and their achievements are willed by you. For your will is extended unreservedly to those men who are engaged in constantly producing new expressions of their own nature and spirit, men who are the architects of themselves. You love the sort of man who realises his own being in what he achieves and produces, who discovers and expresses that nature which is an image and likeness of your own glory. That which your will intends them to be, that they can only become with the help of your grace, O Father of poets, eternal source of all light, Spirit of all true inspiration!

It is for this, then, that we entreat you and invoke your Holy Spirit upon them. Raise up among us men endowed with creative powers, thinkers, poets, artists. We have need of them! Remember that saying that man cannot live by the bread of the body alone, that unless the word that proceeds from your mouth becomes his nourishment he will go hungry. That saying applies to them too. Give to these young men the courage to respond to their inner call, to bear the burden and the pain which such a call involves, not to be led into betraying their task in the quest for money and the cheap applause of the superficial, who wish merely to be diverted. In words and in images, in their whole attitude and presentation they express what is in man because they proclaim what they themselves experience. And in expressing this let them express everything! Grant them the experience that man is not merely the frustrated hell of his own nothingness, but also the fair and blessed land over which stretches the [131] heaven of your own infinitude and freedom. They do not need to be constantly bringing you into everything they say. They must make mention of you by name only when they are filled with the spirit of the purest happiness or the deepest pain. For the rest let them honour you with their silence. For the rest let them praise the earth and humanity. But in doing this they must always bear you silently in their hearts, for it is here that their creative work has its source. Then even the slightest song becomes an echo of the rejoicing that takes place in your heaven, and even when they have to tell of the most sombre depths to which man can sink, still their record of this is encompassed by your compassion and permeated by a longing for light, virtue and the eternal love. Then even an attempt to entertain is still a reflection of the gentleness and patience with which you love us in our daily lives. Give them the courage to attain to the light and to the joy in the darkness of this age and in all the hunger and poverty of our hearts. Such courage is a grace that comes from you. But give it to them, for we have need of such high courage. Give them the courage to distinguish and to decide. They do not need to be so very subtle, but their work must manifest the fact that an undivided heart has wrought them, one which, while it is open to everything, still in everything seeks you and seeks everything in you, recognising no craven compromise of peace between the good and the evil, the light and the darkness. Give them the courage constantly to begin anew, because only so do they find their source in that which is true from all eternity. Let them say what your Spirit has given into their hearts, rather than that which would make pleasant hearing to those who represent the forces of all that is average. When they make experience of the fact that all their work is in vain, of the frustration of their creativity and the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

insensitivity of their age, let them believe even then that in your sight what seems to be so futile is not futile, that you have regarded their work with delight, and have gently taken their heart when it was breaking into your own.

Your eternal Word, the effulgence of your nature and the image of your glory has himself come in our flesh. He has taken upon himself all that is human as his own reality. With a power that is greater and more ultimate, and a love that is deeper than that of any other creative worker for the work of his own hands he has set his own heart in the very centre of the image his hands have wrought. He has done this in order that man himself may be the expression and the image of your glory. And therefore, whether [132] we realise it or not, every creative activity of the human spirit has become an element in the personal history of your Word, because everything has come to belong to his own world, the world into which he came in order to share with it in its living experiences, to suffer with it and to glorify it with himself. It is the world from which this Word of yours will never more be separated for all eternity. Let those for whom we pray understand this truth. What they create is inevitably either a part of the Cross to which they nail your Son in guilt, and therefore a condemnation of themselves, or else a factor contributing to the coming of the eternal kingdom of this same Son, and therefore a grace for them. For this kingdom does not only come from without as the end and the final judgment of this present world. It emerges as the hidden grace which has been present in the midst of this earthly reality ever since your own Word descended into his own creation and became the heart of all things. Therefore everything which they create can and must be a promise that your eternal kingdom is already on the way, the kingdom of truth and of love, the kingdom of the glorification of man in his undivided nature, in body and soul, earth and heaven. Therefore grant to them too, that they may be proclaimers and promoters of this kingdom. For everything which man himself has fashioned as sharer in your creative power will be redeemed and taken into this kingdom for all eternity, transferred and glorified. May the Spirit of your Son come upon them in order that your name may be praised now in this time and throughout all eternity, Amen.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[133]

9

ON THE EVANGELICAL COUNSELS

I. STATEMENT OF THE PROBLEM

It is a recognised fact that the Dogmatic Constitution 'On the Church' includes, among other things, one section on life in the religious orders. It is also recognised – and this is equally true of the discussions which have arisen of the decree concerning the orders – that a notable difference of opinion arose in the debate preceding the promulgation of these enactments as to the precise formulations in which they should be expressed.

One point on which there was indeed general agreement was the actual fact that some mention of life in the religious orders (in the broadest sense, i.e. including the secular institutes as well) should be included in this scheme. Now this is not simply a self-evident proposition. The schema on the Church which was prepared for the First Vatican Council (and in substance drawn up by theologians belonging to the religious orders) contained no specific statements with regard to life in the orders. To the authors of the preliminary draft it seemed manifestly unnecessary to include this in so brief a dogmatic exposition of the theology of the Church, which must necessarily confine itself to what is essential. Thus it is not so immediately obvious as in some strange way seems to be generally accepted that today everyone should expect a section dealing with life in the orders to be included in the Constitution on the Church or should accept a subsection dealing with this topic without discussion. In this the desire evinces itself for a realistic presentation of the Church, one which does not merely describe its abstract juridical structure and composition conceived of as the characteristic forms of a 'perfect society'. This is what might have been produced by those who are hostile to reform. What we seek for today is something more than this: a treatment which also takes into account the inward mystery of grace in the Church, [134] her role as the people of God and as the Church of sinners and pilgrims. But yet a further point of interest which manifests itself here is that there is a desire to perceive, in addition to the institutional and juridical structures in the Church, the 'charismatic structure' as well; to see her as a Church of fresh 'breakthrough', a Church which is in constant process of reformation, a Church in which the Spirit operates freely and unrestrainedly. For it is precisely in all this that those committed to the religious life have, or should have, an essential part to play.

In contrast to this disagreements arose in the conciliar debates as to whether a whole section (a chapter) should be set aside to be devoted exclusively to the religious life (as was provided for in a pre-conciliar schema) or whether it should find its proper place in the wider context of a chapter on the holiness of the Church, the calling of all her members to develop to the full that participation in the holiness of Christ and God implanted in the roots of their being in baptism, and to put into practice the spirit of the Sermon on the Mount and the evangelical counsels as constituting the gift and at the same time the task of the Church as a whole (this is, in fact, what the schema actually laid before the Council does). Moreover if we were to listen closely and seriously to the arguments in favour of each of these two different solutions we would find it impossible to deny that both the parties upholding them were influenced by certain secondary considerations. Some of the factors (though certainly not the only ones) by which the defenders of the first solution were motivated were a certain esprit de corps on the part of the orders, a desire to be accorded their due value, a certain anxiety lest their role in the Church should be underestimated, and a preoccupation with the need to recruit sufficient

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

fresh blood. These and similar considerations, though in themselves secondary, did exercise a real influence. Again it would become apparent that the champions of the second solution were not always wholly free from a tendency to undervalue, in theological and practical terms alike, the significance of life in the religious orders both in itself and for the Church of today. The point that they emphasise is that all Christians of all classes and in all situations in life are called to bring Christian living to its full maturity. They also emphasise the ideal of the priesthood, and of the secular priesthood in particular, as a perfect state, and in all this their outlook is coloured here and there with a certain resentment (in view of past history this is understandable) against the [135] members of orders and the importance attached to them in the Church.[1]

But all this is so much 'atmospherics' or the deceptive façade behind which lies a genuine problem, for it is this that really lies concealed behind this strange conflict concerning the manner in which the ecclesiastical schema should be drawn up. And in reality, however much this problem may impinge upon our attention, in the last analysis both sides have been unanimous in arriving at one and the same solution to it. For both sides are in complete agreement on the point that every Christian has a radical vocation to develop to the full, and to prove his being a Christian, which has been given to him by God's own act in baptism. He is called to that maturity of Christian living which is called 'perfection' or 'holiness'. For however much distrust these words may arouse in us today they are, in the last analysis, the words of the bible itself.

In accordance with this the Council itself has acted as a reconciler in arriving at a solution to these problems to the extent that it treats of the two points in two successive chapters of the ecclesiastical schema, the first dealing with the universal call of all Christians in the Church to holiness (Chapter V, Nos. 39-42), and the second dealing with the religious orders (Chapter VI, Nos. 43-47).[2]

Of course it might be said that in terms of biblical theology and so of dogmatic theology too, the proposition we have just referred to is self-evident. It might be said that no real or radical opposition has ever been offered to the actual principle which it embodies. It might be pointed out that in the actual practice of the Church as well this principle has always been upheld, for she has repeatedly canonised Christians who belonged neither to the clergy nor to the religious orders. And yet this unanimity which has arisen in the Church, and which, viewed as a whole, [136] is entirely spontaneous in its demand for a conciliar statement (this too, has to be taken into account), is an astonishing event. For so far as the spontaneous attitude and outlook of the Church throughout almost two centuries is concerned the truth embodied in this proposition has precisely not been self-evident. Of course in point of fact there always are Christians in all situations and walks of life who have been and are holy. But over and above this it has not been so immediately obvious that on God's side there is also a positive vocation and mission to marriage and to a worldly calling, to earthly tasks precisely as the manner positively ordained by God for the individual concerned, in which precisely he is to attain to the fulness of his Christian existence, the maturity of the baptismal grace bestowed upon him and in which he is to bring to their fulness the fruits of the Spirit. Has not

[1] Of course one might take the view that a special chapter devoted to the holiness of the Church and to the fact that all are called to holiness would better meet the case. This could not be argued on the grounds that so important a topic as this must not appear to serve simply as an introduction to a statement about the religious life. But provided that both points – first that all are called universally to Christian perfection and second that one of the ways of attaining to this is that of the evangelical counsels – are clearly stated, and both the difficulties and the common ground between them are brought out, then it is certain that all can approve of the division into two chapters.

[2] For a more detailed explanation of chapters V and VI cf. recently F. Wulf, Das zweite Vatikanische Konzi1. Konstitutionen, Dekrete und Erklärungen. Kommentare, Vol I (Freiburg 1966), pp. 284-313 (with bibliography).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

(Catholic) Christendom always been confronted, in a manner which is quite simple and which already seems to leave no questions unanswered, with a saying of Jesus which has the force of a summons to all in heart and spirit: 'If you will be perfect sell all you have … and follow me?' Have not the Fathers of the Church stated uncompromisingly (and without drawing any further distinctions) that it is the virgins who bring forth the fruit one hundred- or sixty-fold from the field of the gospel, whereas married people only bring forth fruit thirty-fold?[3] Has it not been defined by the Council of Trent (without drawing any further distinctions) in the words of scripture itself that it is 'better and more blessed' to renounce marriage 'for the kingdom of heaven's sake'. Is it not the unassailable teaching of Catholic theology (even if, with Thomas Aquinas, it draws a prudent distinction between the essence of holiness and the means of attaining holiness) that it is precisely the fulfilment of the evangelical counsels in concrete practice (and not merely the 'spirit' of them) that is the better means of attaining to Christian perfection? And even if the phrase 'at least in itself' is added, even if this statement is tempered by the concession that the situation may 'per accidens' be otherwise, even then do we not really mean (even though [137] we may not say so in so many words) that for the majority of men (how otherwise could the complementary 'per se' retain its validity?) these counsels constitute the better means – in other words that if they do not follow these counsels they de facto radically renounce the quest for perfection or at least in the majority of cases do not attain to it in the degree that God's grace had intended for them? In the Middle Ages and later too, has not the distinction often been drawn between two distinct 'perfections', the perfection of the commandments and that of the counsels, and does not this imply a distinction in the goal itself and not merely in the 'means' of attaining to it? In other words does not this imply, precisely with regard to the ultimate and deepest call itself, that Christians are divided into two different classes, and that, so far as holiness is concerned, the religious orders constitute an élite? Is it not significant that in referring to married women who are saints, the liturgy only knows of the designation 'non virgines'? Has not so classic a moralist as Lehmkuhl explained that the summons to follow Christ by practising the evangelical counsels is addressed to all men, and to that extent it is for the individual to show cause why he should not respond to this summons, and not simply to take it for granted that he has a right not to do so? In other words it is the calling to the secular state, and not that to the religious life that needs to be justified. Is not the religious life spoken of even today without reservation or further distinction as a way of following Christ that is closer and more totally committed than life in the world? Is it not held that members of religious orders have made a total oblation, of their lives to God and Christ without any reserve (implying, therefore, that Christians in the world have in principle failed to do this?). Has there so far been any clear explicit or comprehensible statement on the part of the exponents of the theology of the religious life to the effect that there is also such a thing as a God-given vocation (which also represents a gift of grace) to marriage (1 Cor 7:7) and to worldly callings, and that this too, constitutes a factor which contributes positively to the sanctification of man? Or is it rather the case that up till the present the only really intelligible thing that these theologians have said is that when someone marries or devotes himself to a worldly calling he can be sanctified by God's grace in that state (though not, properly speaking, through it)? When we consider all this is not the explanation offered by the ecclesiastical Constitution (an explanation which has been accepted almost without

[3] cf. M. Viller, K. Rahner, Aszese und Mystik in der Väterzeit (Freiburg 1939), pp. 45 f. Thus in Augustine (Serm. 354 Ad Continentes, 9, P. L. 39, 1568) we read: 'Because she is married a mother will be granted a lesser place in the kingdom of heaven than her daughter who is a virgin. But both will be there like a brighter and a darker star which, nevertheless, are both in the heavens.' Distortions of the truth of this kind are not rectified by the fact that Augustine then goes on to warn the virgin against falling into pride, which can still corrupt everything for her.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

celebration or acclamation of any kind) to the effect that every Christian who is in the [138] married state and in a (morally justified) worldly calling is called to Christian perfection – is not this, I say, an event of immense significance in the history of the Church and in the process by which Christianity comes to realise itself? Is it not one that has gone unnoticed only because no-one contradicts it, or (better) because in the practice of their daily lives Christians have already come spontaneously to anticipate this official explanation?

But this very fact means that the question of the nature and the function of the religious life in the Church of today has been set on a new footing. For it is certainly shown precisely in this Constitution that the Church intends neither to contest nor to obscure the fact that the religious life has this part to play in the Church. The very nature of a conciliar schema is such that it can only provide a cautious indication, or else refrain from taking up any position at all on the question of how, in more precise terms, these two doctrines are to be reconciled: on the one hand the doctrine that all Christians are called universally to bring their Christian living to its fulness, and on the other the doctrine that a life governed by the evangelical counsels has a special value and a special function. Here we encounter the same situation as with many other elements in Christian teaching. In the process of consciously explicitating the content of our faith, two propositions are put forward side by side which do not seem to be altogether reconcilable one with the other.[4] Yet for all this the Church does uphold both doctrines with unshakeable firmness in the explicit awareness of her faith, and leaves the task – immensely important though this admittedly is – of reconciling the two to be worked out by her theologians. In the process of doing this they have also to acquire a more precise understanding of the finer shades of meaning involved in each of the two statements. Theology, then, has the task of synthesising these two truths by a process of dialectical confrontation, and in performing this task it may actually be the case that a deepened understanding of each of the two statements is arrived at, one that has been clarified by criticism and purged of the unconscious errors which it has carried along with it. Of course, this degree of precision in an individual's understanding [139] of a statement of this kind (as well as the amount of understanding required to arrive at such precision) can only be expected of one who is capable of taking seriously and effectively into consideration, in theological and human terms alike, that other statement which is dialectically opposed to the first.[5]

II. SOME THESES

The questions with which we are concerned then turn upon the relationship between the calling of all Christians to perfection and the special calling of some to the life of the evangelical counsels. These questions have been resolved in the new theological situation in which the Church stands, but certain observations concerning them must be offered at this point. These are primarily concerned with the nature of the religious state itself, insofar as this is constituted by the evangelical counsels. It is of decisive significance for members of [4] e.g. 'Sacred scripture, as inspired, has God for its author. But it is also a genuinely human document produced by a human author.' Or 'The plenitude of official power in the Church belongs to the Pope alone. But it is also vested in the college of bishops together with the Pope as the head of this college'. Again, 'Jesus is a true and perfect man, yet not a human person'.

[5] For instance how many theologians there may still be even today who either gloss over or minimise the fact that the concept of sin is used in a merely analogous sense in the doctrine of original sin! They do this because they have never attained to a really theological and existential understanding of the free subjectivity of the person. They have never understood that a man can never become a sinner through the deed of Adam 'in the same sense' as he becomes a sinner by his own free decision.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

religious orders and the life they lead that they expose both themselves and their life, unreservedly and in the searching light of reality, to the questions which the contemporary 'age' puts to them both from the point of view of the world and from that of the Church. They must do this even if they are not yet ready with an answer which is sufficient to satisfy all sides. Their life in the Church provides them with an a priori guarantee that such an answer is to be found, but does not dispense them from searching for it, and they will only find these answers, which are of literally vital importance for them, if they really submit themselves to the questions. Today it is easier for a man to lose face by acting as though he always had an answer for everything pat and ready to hand than by calmly conceding that he is at a loss. This simple point does not seem to be realised everywhere throughout all classes of religious. We too shall have answers to supply in the considerations which follow, but these are only meant as statements which, since they are probably far from being universally accepted, cannot constitute anything more than a stimulus to further enquiry. If anyone [140] feels that such statements do in fact constitute a satisfying answer, so much the better.

An attempt must be made to develop, almost in thesis form, an account of what is essential to this subject, i.e. the nature of the evangelical counsels. This must be done in such a way as to include from the outset the treatment of the problems touched upon in the introduction.

1. The Fact that All Are Called to Perfection

Every Christian is called to 'perfection'. The summons of grace, to which man has a moral duty to respond, calls him to love God and his neighbour with his whole heart and with all his strength. Now this love is the perfection and goal of Christian living. One question which, though difficult, needs to be taken seriously, and is rich in implications, is that of whether it is conceivable for a man to have renounced precisely that fulness of perfection intended for him by God, and that too, definitively and in death itself (and not merely during specific phases in his life), and still, in spite of this, to attain to salvation. Or is this quite impossible? In that case even though the second view seems to entail an optimism that is all too bold, it nevertheless does include the full rigour of the doctrine that he who has decided to confine himself merely to avoiding mortal sin, and does not trouble himself or make any effort to strive for a greater love, by that very fact has already imperilled his own salvation.[6] This is the question, then, which must be developed here. It is apparent that God [141] offered to each individual the possibility, and at the same time laid upon him the duty, of loving God and his neighbour with his whole heart. Everyone therefore has the possibility and the duty to attain to perfection in this sense, and apart from this there is no other perfection. The particular circumstances of the individual and of the age, and of the paths by which he is led in the concrete by the grace of God, can cause variations in the manner in which this one perfection is realised in the concrete. But there is no holiness and no perfection apart from it, [6] Nevertheless it does seem certain that he who in principle excludes the will to the greater love (on the pretext that it is enough for him simply to keep the commandments of God whenever in concreto these are binding upon him under pain of grave sin) does sin gravely because he is refusing to submit to the 'commandment' which contains all others within itself, the commandment namely of the love which must ever be greater, the commandment which stems from the inexhaustible dynamism of the Spirit of God. According to Thomas perfection consists essentially in that love which in its entire fulness is 'de praecepto' (S.T. II-II, q. 184, 3). On this basis it is already clear that for a correct Catholic understanding the works of 'supererogation' do not signify a 'supplementary achievement' added onto the 'works of precept' of love as something over and above them. Beyond the fulness of love which is the subject of the gospel commandment there is nothing more. The works of '*super*erogation' fall under that love as the means of attaining it. The element of freedom in these works is present only because the duty that is laid upon us is of a love that tolerates no limits, and it is only in virtue of this fact that it is truly free. On this basis it also becomes immediately clear that the spirit of the Sermon on the Mount (and therefore of the evangelical counsels as well) is necessary for every Christian life, and for salvation as such.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation and every further factor which could be conceived of as belonging to perfection 'in addition to' love as such is, in the last analysis, only intelligible and 'pertaining to perfection' because it is an element in that love[7] (an integral part of it and freely posited by it) to the fulness of which every individual is called. While it is true that not every individual is called to that particular concretisation of the love concerned in which it is brought to its fulness in the life of some other man, still it cannot be concluded from this that the individual is not himself called to achieve the fulness of love in his own life. For this love has in fact to come to its fulness and perfection by being concretised in other works distinct from itself (virtues, trials, etc.), yet is not on that account to be identified with such works. It is not merely the sum total of them all. For this reason it can be the same love even though it is exercised in all these diverse works. Every individual is offered the grace to attain to this consummation of Christian living. But the manner in which he does so varies in each individual case, being unique just as every free human being is himself unique. It may be felt desirable to throw light upon this diversity in personal and individual modes of existence by means of a 'quantitative' concept, by saying that God himself so arranges things that one is called to a greater or lesser degree of perfection, and that too prior to any question of a greater or lesser degree of co-operation with his grace.[8] But the decisive factor in this question of a perfection that varies from individual to individual is that each one is called by God himself, and that this is prior to any position which he freely adopts on his side with regard to his own perfection. It follows that this perfection is not the same with each individual, yet that [142] it still remains unquestionably a fact that all without exception are called to holiness.[9]

2. Man's Concrete Stations in Life Considered as a Calling to Perfection

The perfection to which all are called can be attained in all walks and situations of life which are not morally objectionable. These can constitute not merely the sphere and the 'situation' within which Christian living can be brought to its maturity and its fulness, but are also the means through which and the basis upon which the individual concerned grows towards this fulness of his perfection. And they constitute an intrinsic element in this fulness itself.[10] Hence it is that the actual concrete circumstances of a man's life and calling can themselves be, precisely as such, a factor in his vocation to holiness. The individual is called not merely 'in' a given state of life of this kind to holiness, but actually 'to' a specific state of life. He has to sanctify the state of life itself and himself in it, and this because man is called to holiness

---

[7] cf. K. Rahner, Theological Investigations V, pp. 439-459.

[8] This may be true even though the perfection in question is always his (the individual's) perfection, i.e. the perfection that makes actual the possibilities offered to him as an individual, so that as an individual when he reaches heaven he will not have to be saddened by being brought face to face with what he could and would have been.

[9] It must again be reiterated at this point that the true and effective theological concept of perfection has nothing, or at any rate very little, to do with the concept of quantitative increase. For this perfection is of one and the same nature wherever it is realised. In other words it consists in a boundless love between God and man in Christ. In essence, therefore, it does not admit of any quantitative concept. The possibility of growing in such perfection is primarily a question of how far the individual concerned realises the possibilities offered to him in particular. No comparison is possible in any primary sense between his case and that of another man to whom different possibilities are open, and who realises these in different ways.

[10] This does not, of course, mean in their temporal and physical being, for this passes away. But the concrete situations in life (calling, age, marriage, the spirit of the times, etc.) also constitute something more than the external circumstances 'by reason of' which the appropriate virtue is practised. There is no need to interpret the concrete circumstances of human life, as Hofmannstahl does in his concept of 'everyman', as some kind of arbitrary 'role', by assuming which man proves his ability to play a part regardless of what the part itself is intended to represent. Again these concrete circumstances and occupations should not be thought of as analogous to the rush baskets which the Fathers of the desert used to make, weaving them in the morning only to take them to pieces again in the evening, simply for the sake of occupying their time in a virtuous manner.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and to holiness in the particular form appropriate to him as an individual. In accordance with this, marriage for those who are called to it is not merely 'permitted', but is actually a vocation, a positive contributing factor in that holiness which God has made [143] it possible for them to attain to, and a factor intended by God himself. From this we can and must go on to say that marriage (and, by implication, any kind of 'worldly' state of life) actually constitutes for the vast majority of Christians the better means positively offered to them by God himself to attain to that perfection which God himself intends for them. This assertion, therefore, is not intended to be taken in so obvious a sense as it might sound. Behind it lies the whole group of problems concerning the relationship between the order of creation and that of redemption, between nature and grace, one's earthly state and one's calling to the life beyond. And this statement will have to be evaluated as the outcome of an historical experience which has only gradually emerged, and which in turn shows that a statement of this kind is precisely not self-evident. If Christians had to think of themselves simply as nothing more than the few who have been called out of a world which is in a radically corrupt state, in which everything earthly falls under the curse of sin, in which all 'natural' potentialities invariably lead to hybris and a collapse into sin as soon as they are 'developed', and in which evil with its principalities and powers reigns supreme, then they would not be far from arriving at a position in which they regarded the unmarried state as the 'normal' one for these few Christians. It may well be, they would say, that many fall short of this position (without thereby having ipso facto to be consigned to the great mass of the damned), but still this unmarried state does constitute the true goal and the calling which is intended for all these Christians. And this was, in fact, to a large extent, if not actually the worked out theory of the early and mediaeval Christians (they were preserved from this by scripture and also by the realities of everyday life), still a certain basic attitude on their part which should not be condemned as Platonist, Manichaean, etc., too quickly or before one has one's self been subjected to the tragedy in man's experience of life on this earth and in his activities in this world. (For that matter what else could have been the origin of all Platonism and Manichaeism, the conclusions of which are certainly not foolish or wicked?), or finally before one has really opened one's self to the inalienable 'other-worldliness' of Christianity. But without going into the reasons for this in greater detail at this point the following statement is, nevertheless correct, and the outcome of the historical experience of the Church from which the Church is no longer in a position to withdraw herself: marriage is a positive vocation for the majority of men, addressed to them by the God of creation and of redemption, and not [144] merely an element in the old order tragically perverted by sin, which is tolerated even in the case of the redeemed reason of their weakness and hardness of heart.

Of course marriage as conceived of here has itself in turn a specific history of its own in each individual case. As the married man grows older it can initiate him into an interior disposition and frame of mind which is no longer very different from that which the unmarried have taken upon themselves for the sake of the kingdom of heaven. But even then this outlook is an element in, and a fruit of the marriage as such, and therefore part of the actual summons of grace which constitutes his vocation to marriage. And therefore this attitude of mind precisely does not signify that he who is called to marriage might have been able to attain to the 'more direct' way even without having entered into marriage. What we have still to consider is in what sense the evangelical counsels, and virginity as included in these, constitute the means which are 'in themselves better' for attaining to Christian perfection. But already at this stage it can be stated that the meaning of this theological statement concerning virginity cannot be that for the majority of individuals in the concrete it would have been better if they had chosen virginity. If they did this they would be choosing that 'means' (or better that 'situation', those concrete circumstances in which their Christian life is achieved) which was less fitting for them. Certainly it is quite possible, and even probable, that among those who de facto have entered into marriage a number of men (precisely how many it is impossible to determine) are to be found who have refused to follow the evangelical counsels even though these were offered to them as the means better fitted to their particular cases. But in view of the nature of man in the concrete and the task of humanity as a whole it certainly cannot be maintained that God's creative and redemptive will was such that this applies to the majority of married men. On the contrary they are positively called by God to marriage as that means of attaining to Christian perfection which is better for them. The very fact that scripture regards all as called to perfection, and presents the unmarried state as the exception offered by God to the few – this fact alone is enough to establish that marriage can be and is a positive vocation in this sense. That for the majority marriage is the better means is not controverted by the everyday experience (to the extent that this does prove anything at all) that the great majority of sinful men do not make a very good use of this better means for them, or even make a positively [145] bad use of it. For on this showing it might equally be argued that the shortcomings of the majority of members of religious orders prove that the evangelical counsels are not the better means for them (or indeed for anyone).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

3. The Character of Every Christian Vocation to Perfection as Pertaining to Saving History

In the present order of salvation and the contemporary situation in saving history (i.e. in the post-Christian 'eschatological' age) this perfection of love for God and man, to which every man is called in the particular situation in life proper to him and according to his own particular 'gifts', has in all cases (not merely for members of religious orders) a significance as part of saving history, i.e. a specifically soteriological, ecclesiological and eschatological character. It is a sharing in the destiny of the Cross and the death of Christ himself for the salvation of all. It is a love of that God who in freedom has irrevocably summoned the world in the person and in the fate of Christ to a sharing in his own life, which extends beyond all the possibilities of life in this world, and who has already victoriously made this call, which is his own 'kingdom', effective in Christ and in the Church, even if its full effects are still hidden in faith. That is why all are bound to the 'spirit' of the evangelical counsels and to the basic attitude embodied in the Sermon on the Mount. The message sought to be conveyed here is as follows: In every Christian life we must put into practice, as the characteristic within us of our love for God, that attitude which can be called 'faith' to the extent that in it God is conceived of as the one who cannot simply be attained by the actualisation of the possibilities of human experience in this world, since he intends to bestow himself directly as he is in himself, that is in his absoluteness and unattainability. We shall have more to say on this subject when we come to the question of the nature (and practice) of the evangelical counsels. For this reason this 'definition' of the spirit of the Sermon on the Mount and of the evangelical counsels may suffice for the present. When we speak of 'spirit' and 'attitude' we do not of course refer to a mere abstract theoretical 'feeling' of a merely 'interior' kind. An attitude, if it is to be genuine, must be actualised in real life. It must find expression and concretisation in space and time, in physical and palpable reality. In referring to what is demanded here as 'spirit' and 'attitude' we intend merely to give expression to the fact that [146] this concretisation does not, and need not have that temporal 'permanence', that 'degree of organisation', that state of being conceived of as a class apart, that emphasis, that predominance over all else which is characteristic of the 'life of the practice' of the evangelical counsels as lived in the religious orders.

4. The Duty to Strive for that Perfection which is made possible for us by God

Every Christian has his 'own gift'. However true it may be that man has been accorded a

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

sphere of freedom by God within which he can dispose of his own life and be, to a limited extent, the creator of his own subjective state, still this sphere itself, together with the limited and finite number of possibilities which it entails, is precisely given to him beforehand by God, and is not under his control. And even the true decision of freedom in its uniqueness and autonomy is of its nature and in the very mode in which it is exercised a gift of God which cannot be otherwise. From this it follows that where the 'better means'[11] is offered in the concrete, and really recognised as such as possible in the here and now,[12] this entails not merely a moral possibility but a moral demand for the individual concerned, a demand which is not merely posited but at the same time made possible of achievement, even though the alternative course may in itself have a positive moral value of its own. To refuse the better means offered in the concrete would be an explicit denial of the will to a greater increase in the love of God, and therefore culpable and a sin.

5. The Evangelical Counsels as a Means of Personal Perfection

There is such a thing as a divine vocation to the evangelical counsels which entails the renunciation of marriage 'for the sake of the kingdom of [147] heaven'; and conversely for a life lived by the evangelical counsels a special vocation is required. The 'universal' vocation of all Christians as presented in the gospels has in the first instance simply the force of an explanation that the life of the evangelical counsels constitutes a genuine possibility for Christians in general, and means that a Christian must ask himself in all seriousness whether he may perhaps be called to live that life in the concrete. This light which scripture throws on the question, however, does not simply constitute a direct demand to all, as though the only question remaining was whether one actually 'willed' to respond to it, and if one did not so 'will' one would have refused something that had actually been offered to one in concreto. To take the phrase 'If you will be perfect' (Mt 19:21) in this sense is purely arbitrary, and is an interpretation which overlooks the fact that Jesus utters this phrase to one specific individual, one who 'was able to take it'. Nevertheless when we say that there is a 'universal' call to all Christians this should not be taken in the sense that this call is only transformed into an effective and personally binding call in the exceptional case in the concrete. This would be to contradict what has been stated above in the second subsection. For those who are called in this sense to the evangelical counsels, to whom it 'has been given', this call signifies the 'better means' of attaining that Christian perfection to which they are bound in virtue of the commandment to strive for an ever greater love.

In this connection and at this point there are several questions which we shall not be entering into: the question of what in more precise terms the actual content of the evangelical counsels is, the question of whether they must be conceived of as necessarily interconnected (though, of course, this is not in fact the case), the question of how such a calling can be recognised. Here it is presupposed that answers have already been found to all these questions. But if there is a calling to such a mode of life, then the evangelical counsels are, for those that are called, the 'better means', and in that case what has been said in subsection 3 applies to them. When, therefore, we speak of the evangelical counsels as the 'better means' for the attainment of the maturity of the love of God and man, then our statements [11] This is not to exclude the fact that the basic moral attitude can be realised in the concrete in ways which are materially different, yet which, considered as actualisations of religious and moral potentialities, are of equal value, or at any rate for all practical purposes not distinguishable.

[12] In this it is clear a priori that it is quite impossible to arrive at any absolute theory that provides an all-comprehending clarification of the moral significance in the concrete of a given concrete decision. No attempt at such a theory should be undertaken. For this reason it is a Christian virtue in itself not to try to solve all the questions involved in every decision, a virtue which is the opposite of the erroneous attitude of scrupulosity.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

upon this subject are in the first instance[13] to be taken in a relative sense. In other words they are better in relation to those to whom it has been given to be able to act in this way in freedom. Nor can this [148] 'relative' interpretation of the traditional statements concerning the evangelical counsels be refuted on the grounds that by taking them in this way we shall be reducing these traditional statements to mere self-evident propositions. For this is far from being the case. Certainly upon this interpretation the statement: 'There is such a thing as a vocation to the evangelical counsels' is the fundamental statement, and the further assertion that these counsels are – precisely for those called to them – the better means is a straightforward consequence following from this basic proposition. But precisely this basic proposition is in itself far from being self-evident. For to say that the renunciation of marriage above all can be due not merely to the compulsion of exterior circumstances (like the renunciation of many other things which are positively beneficial to the human individual and his life), but can actually be positively striven for and willed (if only as a means of attaining to and a mode of exercising the love of God and neighbour) – all this is anything but self-evident. It represents a possibility in human existence which is only seriously entertainable as such in the eschatological situation which Christ has inaugurated, a point to which we shall have to give further consideration at later stage. This statement is not self-evident because when it is viewed in its full and basic significance[14] it is not so easy to say why the [13] At a later stage we shall be treating of another sense in which these means are to be regarded as 'better', and one that is 'absolute'.

[14] For with regard to the possibility of renouncing marriage for the sake of Christ and the kingdom of heaven this basic outlook must not, in the nature of the case, reduce this to the banal consideration that within the restricted possibilities available in human existence it can de facto often be the case that one is compelled to renounce one moral and personal aim in order to attain to another. Of course this situation does often arise. A daughter renounces marriage in order to look after her sick mother. A scholar remains single because he is too intensely absorbed in his researches and because these constitute a danger to his life. A man remains single because he fails to find a wife really suited to him. Such cases really are per accidens. Anyone who assigns this as the basic and ultimate reason for the gospel teaching on the unmarried state, or who misunderstands the relevant teaching of Paul in this sense (for Paul only seems to assign reasons of this kind for remaining unmarried) is being excessively superficial, or is, by implication, maintaining something which is radically false, namely that the two loves, the love for God and Christ on the one hand, and human love which finds its fulfilment in marriage on the other, are opposed one to another as rivals, so that as one increases the other diminishes. Now this is simply untrue. Yet the idea involved does lie at the roots of many arguments which are offered in defence of the evangelical counsel of virginity. God is regarded from the outset as one particular being amongst others such that within the finite sphere of human living these others represent further values and goals besides him, or even in competition with him. On this conception, therefore, he had to 'share' this finite sphere of human existence with other beings constituting rival goals and values for the human subject. Now from the standpoint not only of metaphysics but of Christianity too this view is false. It is precisely the 'world' (as that which God has created) that increases or decreases in proportion as God takes a greater or a lesser place in our lives. In all genuine human immanence there is a factor of transcendence, and e converso. Love of God and love of man grow in the same proportion to one another. And it is radically untrue to suggest that married love, as a particular instance of love of neighbour, constitutes an exception to this principle. The true way of raising one's self up to God is to participate actively in the process of the Incarnation by which God came down and entered into the world. True 'spiritualisation' so far as man is concerned (for it is never demanded of man that he should be an angel) is the progressive personalisation of the material element, culminating in the resurrection of the body. All this must be borne in mind and accorded its full weight by anyone who undertakes to give a correct explanation of how Christian virginity is justified. He must not present his case in such a way as to suggest that the renunciation of married love ipso facto and in itself offers a better chance of attaining to love of God, as though one could love God more if one loved one's neighbour less. The defender of Christian virginity must show that in the concrete existing situation with regard to salvation the renunciation of one genuine possibility of loving or learning to love one's neighbour (that namely of marriage) itself provides a genuine possibility of learning to love God. But at the same time he must show that these two loves are not for one moment two rival entities which grow in inverse proportion one to another. He must show that when a man foregoes marriage 'for the kingdom of heaven's sake' he does not thereby renounce the possibility of learning to love God by loving his fellow men, for according to the gospel itself there is no other way whatever of loving renunciation [149] of a human love can be a 'means' of attaining to a greater love of God. When, therefore the tradition of the Church on the basis of scripture explains that the evangelical counsels are the better means of attaining to the fulness of love of God and of man, and when we take this statement – at any rate at first – in a relative sense, namely as applying to those who are called to this state, then in very truth this does not imply that we are in any sense reducing this statement to a mere self-evident proposition. Indeed even when taken in this sense it is precisely a scandal for many. For many imagine that the evangelical counsels cannot be the better means for anyone (except 'per accidens', i.e. in circumstances which in themselves are unfortunate and which one could have wished otherwise, circumstances relating to the social status, the psychology, or the personal history of the individual. Clearly when these circumstances prevail the individual can indeed embrace the religious life precisely in order to make the best of what is possible for him).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[150]

6. Renunciation Considered as the Realisation and the Confirmation of Faith

The essence of the evangelical counsels consists in the fact that they constitute the concrete and comprehensible realisation of belief (reinforced by love and hope) in the grace of God that overcomes the world and our salvation.

It is not possible at this point to examine each of the individual evangelical counsels in turn in order to arrive at the distinctive characteristics of each of them. Certainly the evangelical counsels are distinguished from one another by such characteristics, and the distinction between them is great enough and important enough for one to be able to ask whether they really can be brought under a common heading at all. The history of the way in which they have been practised in the Church likewise points to this difference between them. Major variations appear in the way in which they have been practised and in the estimation in which they have been held. So far as the New Testament is concerned the only one of them which can immediately be understood as a general counsel is the counsel of virginity. Poverty[15] is included in the New Testament primarily in the concrete manner of life followed by those accompanied Jesus. Obedience goes unmentioned. Such major differences appear in the later practices of the religious orders with regard to poverty and obedience that it is not easy to bring everything included in this under a single common denominator such that the concept thus arrived at still retains some real content. For this reason it would be of the utmost importance to perform the necessary task of examining these characteristics and differences in the evangelical counsels taken one by one. But it is not possible to undertake this in the present context. The reason that we take these three counsels as falling under a single concept is that we regard them as exercises in Christian living which, in the last analysis, are of one and the same theological nature As such they are renunciations[16] [151] of supreme benefits in

---

God. The only possible way of learning to love God is to divide one's heart between love of God and love of neighbour.

[15] It is in fact interesting that outside the gospels there is no mention of 'poverty' in the New Testament. The holding of property in common as witnessed in Acts has a different basis.

[16] It is not possible here to analyse the deeper or existential meaning latent in an act of renunciation as such, though this might enable us to unveil the special properties and difficulties inherent in such an act, and so to recognise its true nature and origins. At this point we must confine ourselves to noticing that there is material here for a special epistemological investigation. An act of renunciation in which he had a total and absolute understanding of all the factors involved, and had completely thought them out, would no longer be such at all. The negative aspects of it would have been resolved. This must be borne in mind if the considerations offered here are to be accorded their correct value. In their a priori approach, therefore, they are neither capable of rendering, nor intended to render, superfluous the demand in the gospels that we shall follow Christ by means of such renunciations. They are intended merely to throw light upon that limited measure of insight (it is far from being total comprehension) which must be possessed even by one who listens to the gospel and submits himself in a spirit of unconditional obedience – i.e. by surrendering his own insights – to following Christ crucified. A further factor which must be borne in mind in the considerations which follow is this: There is no possibility human life. This renunciation or self-denial can only be achieved in its true and genuine nature provided that the 'value' of what is renounced is not falsely underestimated, provided that there is no reaction against it whether already present or artificially cultivated. Rather it must be viewed and valued as it really is. Only one who loves the richness of life, one for whom domestic blessings constitute an opportunity and a means for self-expression, only one who possesses the courage of self-responsibility, only one who is capable of genuine personal love, can have a real understanding of what is involved in the renunciation [152] prescribed by the evangelical counsels. If these are not present they become a means for the weak and cowardly to flee from life's realities. The renunciation is only possible for the sake of a higher good.[17] Otherwise it is perverse. But this 'for the sake of' must imply an objective connection between the surrender of the one good and the attainment of the other which is of higher value. This objective connection, however, need not always and in every case be of such a kind that the renunciation is the sole and indispensable means of attaining that which is of higher value. It is sufficient that it is a possible and reasonable means.[18] Now an act of renunciation can only be a means in the sense intended here if the surrender of the good in question actually constitutes the concrete realisation of the subject's will to attain to a higher good. This becomes possible and reasonable in cases in which the will[19] to attain to the higher good either cannot attain to its goal at all without this surrender of the lesser good, or else if it can only attain it with difficulty or with a lack of certainty as to whether it has in fact attained it unless this surrender is made.[20] [153] In the case we are envisaging here, therefore, the whatever of developing the point we wish to make without simultaneously arriving at and bringing to light that factor in the phenomenon of renunciation, flight from the world, etc., which must necessarily be present in the practice of every Christian life. Indeed the evangelical counsels cannot be intended to be anything else than realisations in the concrete (for many Christians) of that spirit of the gospel which is demanded of all Christians, and which must be put into practice by all in one form or another. And finally what we are seeking to achieve in this consideration is not to establish an intrinsic connection either between renunciation and faith as reinforced by hope or between it and love. The reason why we are working out the connection which exists between renunciation and faith at this point is that by these means the specifically Christian element in a renunciation of this kind can more easily be made clear. This does not entail any opposition to that approach to the problem in which the evangelical counsels are taken primarily as actualisations and realizations of the specifically Christian love for God (as we have done in Theological Investigations III, pp. 47-57). For we only understand the essentially Christian character of this love when we see it as love for that God who, in supernaturally bestowing himself in grace and revelation, encounters us in faith, and as a love which is still advancing in hope on the way which will lead to God in his inconceivability and his inaccessible light. In the nature of the case, therefore, the question which we shall be seeking to answer throughout is that of how the Christian attitude of renunciation is related to the complex of faith, hope and love considered as a single entity in which the first two elements of their own intrinsic natures demand to be raised to the level of love, and in which the love of the Christian still journeying towards God necessarily contains faith and hope as intrinsic constitutive elements within it.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

---

[17] This does not exclude, but rather '*in*cludes' the truth that the higher good must be loved for its own sake, and not simply as 'valuable for the individual himself'. This is possible if, and to the extent that this value is attached to the person of the other who is loved. This 'ecstatic' love (a love which draws the individual away from himself and towards the other, regarding that other and not the lover himself) does not, therefore once more, imply the ultimate paradox of a love that is self-annihilating, for the nature of man as capable of free personal love finds its fulfilment precisely in exercising a love that is selfless. For man finds 'himself', his true nature, only in the act of loving, and not, therefore, in the act of self-seeking.

[18] It is precisely as such that it makes possible those acts of obedience and self-commitment to the unknown which are essential for the renunciation of which we are speaking here.

[19] Notice that the words used are not 'If the higher good …' but 'If the will to attain to the higher good …'.

[20] There are cases in which the will to attain to a higher good can be fulfilled and actually achieve this higher good directly, and in which the sincerity of the resolve to attain to it is immediately evident in the very fact that the possibility of attaining to it has been successfully actualised. In such cases the surrender of the one good can only be a means of attaining to the other when it is, in the nature of the case, impossible to possess both goods at the same time. But precisely in the case which we are here envisaging this is not so. To attain to God in love and to entertain a love for one's personal fulfilment in the world are in themselves wholly compatible – indeed the one may actually postulate the other. In the particular case we are envisaging here, therefore, everything

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

higher good is such that (a) it constitutes a free and unmerited act of grace on God's part, one which transcends all the opportunities and potentialities of this world, which is his own personal self-bestowal, and as such can only be received, and cannot be attained to by the subject's own autonomous powers; (b) it stands in contradiction to the sinful corruption of the world, a corruption which, once more, the mind of pilgrim man is incapable of separating off in any sure or adequate sense from the pure state of creaturely reality.[21] Thus man's refusal of the sinful corruption, and his assent to the creaturely reality are mutually interdependent in such a way that within the historical process, still unfolding, by which the two elements are disentangled one from another, man's refusal of the sinful corruption of the world (considered as an assent to God himself) must have a certain pre-eminence over his assent to the goods of the creaturely world (cf. Mt 16:26); (c) the higher good has been bestowed upon us as a future good, i.e. as an object of faith and hope, and therefore the will to attain to it and by which it must be accepted is itself precisely what we call faith and hope. In other words, therefore, it cannot depend for its certainty directly upon the object itself, but must depend on something else apart from the object to prove that it is real and radical. In relation to a good of this kind the renunciation of a supreme 'this-worldly' good is a reasonable and logical outcome of the will to attain to the higher good which takes the form of faith and hope, these in turn being the factors which sustain and specify a truly Christian love for God on the part of the pilgrim Christian.

[154] This faith that is inspired by hope,[22] considered as a reaching out for the future of God who bestows himself without being able to be 'taken by force', can only really achieve its fulness and an assurance that it is truly present in a surrender of 'this-worldly' values. It is not as though these were directly opposed to faith, hope and love, and could not even positively be integrated into the full exercise of these virtues. But how otherwise could this faith turns upon the fact that the higher good is available in such a way that the renunciation of some other benefit can be understood as a possible (if not actually necessary) means of attaining to it, and as an expression of the will to attain to it.

---

[21] The fulness of personal existence can never be attained to in the concrete in any adequate sense solely by a process of reflexion, or the formulation of theories capable of 'distinguishing' between the 'order of creation' (whether in the natural or supernatural dimension) in itself, and the sinful corruption of the world (its state of 'lying helpless in evil'). For in considering the goods which the world has to offer from the Christian standpoint as the objects of a conscious motivation we can never abstract from the fact that the world that is presented to us to choose from, and which represents the sole object which is really available to us to shape and control, is already radically conditioned by sin. Confronted with a world so conditioned, therefore, we can never give our sheer, unconditional and unreserved assent to any one of the goods which it has to offer. To formulate the matter in terms of the categories of moral theology this point might be stated as follows: Viewed in its radical theological significance any object of human choice is invariably presented to man 'cum duplici effectu'. For this reason in every Christian choice, even when it is directed towards (finite) goods, a basic reserve must be maintained and actually practised with regard to the consequences arising from the fact that de facto every good in the world has been conditioned by sin in this way (cf. 1 Cor 7:29-31).

[22] Of course faith too has its elements of 'renunciation' precisely to the extent that it is a cognitive process; the surrender of the cognitive faculty to the mystery, the obedience of one who acknowledges precisely as acknowledging, a renunciation of the demand that that which is accepted by faith should have any intrinsic credentials of its own, a readiness to allow the basic acknowledgment of faith to grow and develop, and to endure the darkness of faith, etc. All these are factors which cannot be treated of in any further detail at this point. But the faith that is precisely saving is always something more than a mere acknowledgment (as the acceptance of knowledge), and the acknowledgment of faith as such is always brought to its fulness in an act which goes beyond that of merely accepting some proposition to be acknowledged, engaging the subject in a movement which at least impels him towards love and can only finally be brought to rest when it achieves its fulness in love. (In spite the distinction which exists between the three theological virtues it is in fact unthinkable that at death man, as a lost sinner, should still possess the 'infused virtue' of faith and yet should finally have lost that of infused love.) It follows that for faith to be real faith it must, in the real, concrete and existential mode of its realization, contain in itself elements of renunciation which apparently belong to a quite different category than that of knowledge.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation and hope be anything more than a mere appendage, a mere supplementary ideology superimposed upon an attitude to the world which as such would be and would remain exactly the same even without this faith and hope? How otherwise could this faith permeate the whole of existence as its determinative form? How could it achieve any assurance of its own reality (at any rate in some of its aspects), and of the fact that it is sincere in the dimension in which a reflexive process of this kind is possible and therefore commanded too? Of course the obedient acceptance of 'passion' as an inevitable factor in human existence does constitute such an actualisation of this faith, permeating and dominating the whole of human life. Indeed it is the only possible absolute,[23] for only in the prolixitas mortis which dominates the whole of life can man be he who surrenders the whole of himself, since in 'passion' he becomes wholly drawn out of himself. And it is in this process that there takes place that exercise of faith and love in which man gives himself wholly [155] over to that which is no longer his own and no longer under his control. But precisely this passion can, nevertheless, only be the highest and ultimate act and so the act of faith and hope in which man gives himself over to God over whom he has no control if man freely goes to meet this event of 'passion' in the absolute by renouncing a positive 'this-worldly' good, one that he can experience, possess and enjoy.[24] Otherwise this faith remains at the level of mere 'theory' formulated in a state of withdrawal from the world, or of ideological consolation which is only entertained when the world is no longer able to console. The 'bird in the bush' is only believed in when one in deed and in truth lets the 'bird in the hand' fly away, and that too before it is taken away from one and before the 'bird in the bush' has yet been laid hold of. If we were only to avoid the evil as such which stands revealed as devoid of value, no act would be posited, so far as the self-realisation of our personal existence is concerned, which need necessarily be more (unless it is to be absurd) than an assent to those 'this-worldly' values with which human existence can and must seek to satisfy itself even when it is not understood as the gift of God's own self-bestowal as an act of free grace. From what has been said it follows (a) that in every Christian life there must be asceticism (taken in this theological sense)[25] because every Christian life is one of faith; (b) that it has not been asserted that the nature of the Christian decision of faith is simply identical with its 'ascetical' aspect and the element of ascetism inherent in its nature;[26] (c) that it is further asserted that while [156] there necessarily must be in every Christian life a certain dialectical opposition between 'flight from the world' and 'assent to the world', both factors being present in their due measure,

---

[23] cf. K. Rahner, 'The Passion and Asceticism', Theological Investigations III pp. 58-85; On the Theology of Death, 'Quaestiones Disputatae' 2nd ed.

[24] Footnote 22 above is also relevant at this point.

[25] In other words precisely not as a 'training' in ethical self-control over one's personal impulses when we have not yet gained the mastery over them, and not as training in mystical experience on the part of a subject who has been spiritually purified.

[26] In fact it belongs to every Christian life (and therefore to those governed by the evangelical counsels and to the most radical forms of the discipleship of Christ crucified as well) to make actual, and to live out in one's own particular concrete circumstances the conviction that it is the grace of God in Christ which comes from beyond the world that establishes the world itself, redeems it and glorifies it. An absolute renunciation, therefore, is in real terms neither possible nor Christian. It would, perhaps, be in conformity with the Buddhist philosophy, and would involve, amongst other things, the heretical conviction that the renunciation is, of its own intrinsic nature, identical with the onset of God's presence in man, or else that of its nature it compels this. From this aspect, too, great caution is required in accepting statements to the effect that members of religious orders renounce 'everything', follow Christ 'totally', or present a 'whole offering' of themselves. The man who becomes a total sacrifice in the obedience of faith is the one who believes to the point where he submits to being totally taken up by death itself; now this is something which will be demanded of everyone, and which is made possible by grace for every Christian. In comparison with this all the evangelical counsels can only be mere timid and cautious attempts to practise in preparation for this ultimate kind of obedience and ultimate kind of poverty.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this measure can vary in the concrete from one case to another according to the particular calling of the individual concerned.[27] This faith which, in the concrete circumstances of the individual, is made real in the sacrifice of 'this worldly' values, now acquires a specific form in the taking over of the evangelica1 counsels. In these that element in the exercise of faith which consists in renunciation, as distinct from that element in faith which consists in laying hold of the sanctification of the 'this worldly' realities and values which are available to human experience, acquires a certain predominance. The renunciation entailed in the evangelical counsels as such is not simply identical with faith as lived out in hope and love. But it is a possible way of concretely exercising that faith, a way in which that faith is made manifest and (to a certain degree) assured. Indeed it entails a renunciation of benefits to renounce which in positive and direct terms is only rational and justified in the act of opening one's self to, and contenting one's self with that grace which comes from above, which is unmerited, and which transcends all the powers proper to man. Only so does this renunciation constitute a concrete form of living one's faith to the full. But this precisely does not mean that this is the sole way in which such a fulness can be achieved. The act of accepting the world as that which can be saved [157] and which needs to be sanctified is just as much a form of living the faith to the full. But it is in the act of renunciation, and in this alone,[28] that the element which specifies this faith, considered as the acceptance of divine grace from above, is made explicit.[29] The reason for this is first that every positive act which is applied to the world and what it contains bears its own intrinsic meaning and justification precisely as positive and 'this worldly', and secondly that pure 'passion' as such, present without any free act being posited, can equally well be a manifestation merely of the experience that existence is absurd, or else can be interpreted and understood in this sense.

In order to provide a comprehensive evaluation of what has been said there is a further point to be considered. It is this: the basic difficulty in interpreting and justifying the evangelical counsels always consists in the fact that even without them the fulness of Christianity, i.e. love for God and man with one's whole heart, can be made real in a way of [27] Here we cannot embark upon an investigation of the fact that presumably this dialectical unity, which nevertheless admits of variation between the two factors mentioned, has undergone an historical process of development in the Church as well as in the lives of individuals. In Protestant Christendom a premium has constantly been set upon worldly callings as opposed to 'monkishness', while in the Catholic Church of the late Middle Ages the rise of the active orders, the development of lay spirituality, etc., undoubtedly took place under the influence of this Protestant revaluation. These factors alone attest the reality of the historical process in the Church, to which we have referred. Again when we consider the protest which arose in non-Catholic circles against the religious life as lived in the orders, we must distinguish the positive factor, the call for a shift in emphasis and a change of proportion between the two elements in the dialectic referred to above, from a factor which is less acceptable, the idea, namely, that this change of emphasis must have an absolute application in the Church as a whole, and must take place in every Christian life.

---

[28] This renunciation is actualised especially, but of course not exclusively, in the evangelical counsels. From this it is clear that this word 'alone' is not intended in any primary sense to separate the life of the evangelical counsels from some other Christian way of life; rather it is intended to draw a distinction between the life of the evangelical counsels and other factors which belong to every Christian life. But it must be remembered that it is the factor of renunciation that does in fact characterise the life of the evangelical counsels, even distinguishing it from a life that is lived according to Christian principles 'in the world'. The term 'alone' here can also be used with the secondary significance of distinguishing the two Christian ways of life.

[29] This is not to imply that this 'explicitation' is absolutely clear and unequivocal, or that it removes at one blow those uncertainties and obscurities which faith (if it is genuine) entails. Those factors in the evangelical counsels which are directly evident to the onlooker might also be ascribed to mere 'human deficiency' or, to put it in biblical terms, they could constitute a 'circumcision' operated by human hands, and devised by a human ideology. Or else they could be due to physical or psychological weaknesses. But despite this the manifest way of life prescribed by the evangelical counsels does constitute the utmost which man can do on his side in order to impart to his faith, or to the factor of transcendence of this world which that faith involves, a palpable form which gives it a greater force of reality.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

life which is not that of the evangelical counsels. And yet a life of this kind is not merely 'tolerated', but is the subject of a positive moral vocation.[30] But [158] this means that every kind of human life, human life as a whole in all its forms and possible variations ('sin only excepted'), can be integrated into the love for God and man, and can be made the means by which these are brought to their true fulness. But we only understand this statement aright when we recognise simultaneously that prior to any such process of integration, by which his love for God is objectified, man finds himself from the first involved in a multiplicity of 'worldly factors', earthly impulses, relationships' etc., and has already arrived at an understanding of himself (prior to this love of God) that is 'worldly'. And, moreover, this world has already all along been conditioned by sin.[31] From this it follows that (a) while all realities of the world in which human life achieves its fulness and enlarges its sphere of influence are indeed capable of being integrated into the love of God, they are not therefore already so integrated, and (b) the world is that in which man has existed right from the first, and which he has freely accepted as the sphere in which to objectify his own nature.[32] But not every element in this world, taken in isolation from the rest, is suitable for objectifying the love of God and neighbour in the same way. Still less is every element suitable as a manifestation either of the fact that this integration has taken place, or of the love which actually operates the integration. This is the existential and ontological background for the simple fact that it is true that normally speaking man does not choose marriage, riches, power, because he loves God, but already finds himself involved in these realities beforehand, or has already laid hold of them prior to experiencing the fact that in them he is explicitly confronted with the love of God. And then the concrete form which his situation in the world assumes acquires a significance which [159] could be called 'infralapsarian'. By reason of these prior orientations in it he experiences it not only as a confrontation with the love of God, but also as a restriction and a hindrance upon him (because of its power to absorb his energies, etc.), holding him back from the integration of his whole life into the love of God.[33] These characteristics of life in the world (not withstanding the fact that they [30] In this connection, as we have already emphasized, it is no use attempting to evade the difficulty by saying that the 'spirit' of the evangelical counsels must be present in those who live 'in the world' as well. This may be true – though great caution is required as to the sense in which it is taken. But what we are concerned with here is precisely not the justification of the evangelical counsels as such or in themselves, but rather the explanation of why it is that so many rightly refuse to content themselves merely with this 'spirit'.

[31] Though this does not necessarily mean that man, as being from the first a creature of this world, must also have sinned and fallen away from God by his own act before he has positively integrated everything into his love for God.

[32] It should be noticed that when an individual adopts, or alternatively decides not to adopt, the evangelical counsels, this always involves a conscious and deliberate choice of the finite and limited freedom which is his. But prior to this a comprehensive 'engagement' of his will has already taken place at the pre-conscious level, and from this it has already acquired a basic orientation in which it has come to a realisation of itself as 'belonging to the world'. On these grounds alone it is impossible that the life of the 'counsels', which belongs to the level of conscious deliberation and explicitation in terms of mental categories, could be, in the strict sense, a 'total offering'. Here too the original and all-comprehending 'engagement' in the world (in theological terms the factor of concupiscence, which is never wholly eliminated) is never totally permeated by the decision taken at the level of conscious thought.

[33] Thus there is a de facto difference, but one which is also inherent in the nature of the case, between marriage as able to be integrated (Eph 5) on the one hand, and the experience of marriage as actually integrated on the other, such that the first does not lead on to the second without a certain process of transition (cf. 1 Cor 7). Moreover this difference does not apply to the unmarried state in the same way. It is this difference, therefore, and the process of transition it involves, which Paul has in mind when he recommends virginity as the 'more blessed' state. But this evaluation of the case must not be taken in an absolute sense, as though marriage were fundamentally 'divisive' in its effects, and not fundamentally designed by the love of God itself, and capable of being integrated into it; for on this view the unmarried state would always be the best one for every single one of us. But neither should we seek to eliminate or smooth out the real differences inherent in the situation. We can be integrated into the love of God) do not apply to the evangelical counsels. These, of their very nature, do not exist at all unless they proceed directly from the love of God. Their very nature is such that they entail a certain withdrawal which is the opposite of that attitude in which one strives to acquire a position in the world without recognising any of the problems which this involves. For this reason the evangelical counsels are, of their very nature, an expression and manifestation of that faith which, in laying hold of the grace of God, at the same time withdraws from this total and unreserved effort to achieve a position in the world.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

7. The Status of Christians Under the Evangelical Counsels and In the World

The evangelical counsels, then, are the expression and the manifestation[34] of a faith that is reinforced by hope and love as well. In this they are [160] distinguished from 'this worldly' goods (those of riches, power and development of the personality), though these two are capable of being integrated into, and subsumed under grace (through they do not make grace manifest in any direct sense). The evangelical counsels also represent an attitude of withdrawal as opposed to an unreserved striving for position in the world, for the world lies prostrate 'in the evil' of infralapsarian sinfulness. Now since the evangelical counsels do constitute an expression and a manifestation of a faith that hopes and loves in this way, the epithets 'better' and 'more blessed' as applied to them in that objective sense which accords them a pre-eminence over the opposite way of life, are altogether appropriate. The truth of this has always been acknowledged by scripture and tradition prior to any application of them to the merely individual case. In this sense, therefore, they have a relatively greater suitability as a means of exercising love for one who has been called to follow them.[35] Objectively speaking, therefore, the evangelical counsels do have a certain general pre-eminence over other ways of life. But this pre-eminence, taken precisely in the sense intended here, does not mean that the actual fact of fulfilling them in practice ipso facto and necessarily means or guarantees that a greater love of God is achieved than is, or can be, achieved even apart from these counsels. It does not mean that for every individual (or even for normal cases) the 'means' which is better for that individual constitutes the most perfect realisation of the love of God that is possible. It does not mean that one who practises the evangelical counsels is ipso facto 'more perfect' than the Christian 'in the world'. But it does mean that the evangelical counsels (considered as a renunciation, though admittedly such renunciation can also be present in other ways of life) constitutes an objectivation and a manifestation of faith in that grace of God which belongs to the realm beyond this present world. And this objectivation and manifestation precisely as such are not [161] achieved in any other way of life. Objectivation means – from the ontological point of view – that in the case of a being should not pretend that the 'worldly state' which we freely accept from the first (and which finds its primary expression in marriage) is also always and ipso facto integrated into the love of God as well, or that it is easy so to integrate it. Nor should we pretend that it is our duty to love God 'together with' everything else, it being taken for granted that 'all else that we do besides God has already sufficient intrinsic justification in its own right, regardless of whether it is integrated into the love of him or not.'

---

[34] In all cases this 'manifestation' can only take the form of 'renunciation'. For grace achieves a 'positive' manifestation only in the word of God and the sacraments. Even here, however, it is manifested only as offered and promised, not as accepted and triumphant.

[35] By this we do not, of course, intend to suggest that only one who is able to carry out this process of rational analysis of why the evangelical counsels should have pre-eminence can understand what this pre-eminence consists in. He who is called in the concrete to follow the evangelical counsels has a positive knowledge of this from scripture, tradition and the practice of the Church, and experiences this pre-eminence in an instinctive and non-speculative manner in the light of the grace of his vocation, when he accepts the evangelical counsels in a spirit of obedience. The emptiness and the pain involved in the renunciation is experienced as the openness of faith to the process by which the life of God becomes present in the death of man. And everything else which it is necessary to know in this connection is implicitly included in this.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

subject to physical and historical modalities certain ultimate and basic orientations have to be achieved, and these can be achieved only in an 'other being', though they are not identical with it. (For this reason this 'other being' can never show quite unambiguously what these basic orientations of the first being are.) This 'other being', therefore, has the value of an 'ontic symbol'[36] and is the expression of these freely adopted orientations. Again from the ethical point of view it is the 'means' by which these orientations are in fact achieved. 'Everything' (sin excepted) can be the 'material' which is integrated into a 'faith' orientation, and is constituted as such by it. But not everything is on that account ipso facto an objectivation and manifestation of faith itself in the sense intended precisely here, though, of course, it is also true that positively to opt for certain 'this worldly' goods as 'material for integration' in this sense can in itself be a 'means' of causing faith to grow.

We have not yet arrived at any clear and universally accepted terminology to give a satisfactory expression to this state of affairs with regard to the 'objective' pre-eminence of the evangelical counsels. If we merely say that the counsels are the 'better means' for achieving a believing love, then this use of the term 'better' immediately raises the question of what this is intended to signify, if the counsels are, nevertheless, not the better means for the majority of men. It also gives rise to the further question of whether a satisfactory answer is arrived at merely by adding that these 'means' are better 'in themselves'. For when we use the term 'means' we imply a relationship not merely to the end in view for which the means are employed, but also to the subject whom these means are intended to help in the attainment of that end. If, therefore, we say that these means are not the 'better way' for the majority of men, what, in that case, can it still mean to say that they are the better means 'in themselves', seeing that we are nevertheless concerned to point out that this 'in themselves' does not apply to the majority of cases even when there is no question of acting contrary to their nature and so sinfully? The term 'means' is valid as an expression of the relationship between counsel and perfection only to the extent that this expression makes it clear that perfection is never formally constituted as such by the counsels, and that the counsels do not constitute a higher form of perfection (one which is [162] inaccessible to the 'ordinary' Christian). Rather it must be taken as signifying that the counsels are ordered to that perfection to which all are called; that the counsels precisely do not of themselves constitute a closer form of following Christ, a more intimate unity with God, but rather are there for these ends. But the term 'means' is inadequate because of its nature it tends to suggest that there is an objective relationship between perfection and counsel (the case is rather as if one were to call the body and its actions the 'means' of the personal fulfilment of the spirit). If we really say that the counsels are the 'objectivation' of faith and love then this easily gives rise to the misunderstanding that they alone, and not every rational activity of the Christian in this world, can be the concrete realisation of faith, that only the renunciation and sacrifice entailed in the counsels are able to constitute faith as lived in the concrete, of being faith 'spiritually', instead of realising that 'everything – including our worldly activities – which we do' is able to become this if only we do it in the name of Christ. We must therefore simply shift by saying that the counsels are the sole mode in which faith achieves its objectivation and manifestation, though when we say this what we mean is that in the counsels alone (in contrast to other forms of renunciation, and especially to that which consists in consciously and explicitly embracing 'passion') faith arrives at a state of objectivation in which it becomes manifest precisely because all forms of objectivation which entail a positive assent to the world also conceal faith (where this is not thought of and practised as a mere ideological superstructure imposed upon one's ordinary life), since even without faith they continue to be meaningful. Since they do constitute an objectivation of the faith in this way, [36] Cf. K. Rahner, Theological Investigations IV, pp. 221-252.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

making it manifest (and thereby bearing witness to it as well), the counsels are, of course, precisely not mere empty manifestations of faith which have nothing to contribute to the actual exercise of it because their nature is such as can only be realised in the act of objectivation and manifestation. On the theory put forward here, therefore, the evangelical counsels are of their nature the historical and sociological manifestation of the faith of the Church for the Church and for the world. But to proceed from this (this point must straightway be added here) to a denial of the fact that the counsels also have an 'ascetical' significance for the individual would be an utter misconception. Admittedly it remains true that this faith also achieves manifestation and objectivation in the freely accepted inescapable 'passion' in the life of every true Christian (not in 'passion' as such, but in the 'death' which we accept [163] in 'obedience' in that 'passion' as in the case of Christ himself). But it is precisely in order to inculcate this attitude of obedience that the counsels are given, to exercise man, by anticipation, and to prepare him for death. They are not intended to be anything more than this. And in freely accepting the element of 'passion' we are, materially speaking, achieving precisely the same effect as appears in the counsels: the free acceptance of a renunciation which, from the point of view of this world, is irrational.

The statement 'the evangelical counsels are the "better way"', therefore, is not an assertion that those who practise them have reached a higher stage of perfection. For the sole measure of the degree of perfection which the individual achieves is in all cases the depths of his love for God and his neighbour. This statement refers rather to the fact that the counsels are 'means' (an objectivation and a making manifest) of faith and love (a) relatively speaking in their reference to the individual called to follow them. Here a contrast is established between his situation under the counsels and the situation which would be his if he as an individual were to refuse them; (b) absolutely speaking to the extent that they alone, considered as a renunciation and a practising of the passion of Christ himself, can be said to have the character of an objectivation and manifestation of faith and love (not only as preached but as assumed and lived). Here there is a contrast between the way of life prescribed by the counsels and the other 'material' for a Christianity that is lived to the full, which is capable of being integrated into this fulness of Christian life because, as having positive existence in this world, it is the material in which the Christian can express his affirmation to the world. But even when it does this it cannot make manifest the 'transcendence' of grace and of faith.

8. The Ecclesiological (Symbolic) Significance of the Evangelical Counsels

The evangelical counsels are distinguished from other forms of renunciation and of accepting in faith the 'passion' of personal existence in that they have a status (in virtue of their unambiguously clear sociological orientation, their permanence, their clearly defined meaning and also the vows which are taken to follow them in the presence of the Church herself). This status which the evangelical counsels impart makes them (and those who practise them) an element in the 'visible' Church. In virtue of this fact they have an essential function to perform in the Church prior to any question of the 'useful works' which the orders perform on the [164] Church's behalf (by giving an example of moral living, by their apostolate, prayers, etc.). The Church is not only the fruit of salvation which springs from a reality hidden within her (the grace of the Spirit which quickens and sanctifies the Church herself). She is also a permanent and quasi-sacramental sign of salvation in her visible manifestations in history. But it is not only in virtue of her preaching of the word and conferring the sacraments that she has this significance of a historical presence. If this were the case she would only be the sign of the grace which is offered by God. But she must be something more than this. She must be the sign of the actual fact that grace has been accepted, that it is already at work eschatologically, and is already in fact triumphant. Now she is a sign in this sense not in her institutional, but rather in her charismatic aspects if, and to the extent that, this fact is objectified and made manifest for all to see on the sociological and historical plane. And this is precisely what is achieved in the life governed by the evangelical counsels insofar as these are visible in the Church's communal life. The evangelical counsels constitute that element in the Church which makes her a sign, a sign of the fact that in her eschatological faith she is reaching out for a goal that lies beyond this present world. They also constitute that element in the Church which makes her a visible sign of the fact (which is the real reason for the foregoing) that she is the community triumphantly possessed by the grace of God. Of course, the mere fact of observing these counsels being practised in the life of the individual for various reasons is not of itself, unequivocally, and in a way that objectifies it beyond all doubt, an existential symbol of the faith that really is present in the Church (which must be so present because the eschatological Church, in contrast to the synagogue, must be, as a whole, she who really is indefectible in her belief). But the reality of the evangelical counsels as lived in the Church taken as a whole does nevertheless constitute a sign in this sense. In terms both of material fact and of epistemological theory the situation here is the same (and in fact ultimately for the same reason) as with martyrdom considered as an objectivation of, and a witness to faith on the part of the Church, whose faith is, in a true sense, indefectible.[37] Like martyrdom[38] the evangelical counsels too are, in their fulness and totality signs in the Church of the [165] fact that God's grace is effectively triumphant in the faith of the Church. Now the Church must be a witness precisely in this sense. But she is a witness in this sense only (cf. above subsections 6 and 7) through the evangelical counsels (we are abstracting here from martyrdom considered as the active acceptance of 'passion' in the absolute, the state in which 'passion' and ascesis are brought together, for it is precisely not simply in 'normal' times alone that martyrdom can represent a rival to the Church's constitution in this function of being the sign of the real and effective faith that is within her). Thus it can be seen that these evangelical counsels belong (even if not in a form which is institutionally defined in any precise sense as a matter of the Church's law) to the essence of the Church because it is not only the official dispensers of the Church's truth and grace who constitute an essential part of her, but the grace that brings about her triumphant acceptance of truth and grace as well – this latter grace as received and as manifesting itself for what it is.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

As witness of the fact that it is precisely the grace of Christ that is accepted in faith (cf. above subsection 3) by the Church this witness has a soteriological character. It attests the fact that the Church (as a whole) freely submits herself to the Passion of Christ to the extent that this constitutes a free acceptance of death in a spirit of obedience, and thereby brings about salvation. It also has an eschatological character, not strictly speaking to the extent that the evangelical counsels already contain the future life of heaven by anticipation already in the here and now. Rightly understood this can be said of grace itself and the fulness of it as attained on this earth. This is in accordance with the fact that in empirical terms it must be said that justification is already achieved 'in the here and now' (notwithstanding the fact that this concept applies primarily to the definitive consummation of salvation). But if this were all we were saying then it would be true of every kind of Christian perfection and every act of striving for such perfection. The counsels themselves as such, to the extent that they are distinct from that which constitutes their basis, the grace of justification and love, do not 'anticipate' eternal life as such. For they are, of their very nature, a renunciation, and this is [37] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Excursus on Martyrdom' in On the Theology of Death, 'Quaestiones Disputatae', 2nd ed.

[38] Which in individual cases it is difficult to distinguish from fanaticism, self-will, self-commitment to active opposition.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

no true characteristic of final perfection.[39] In particular when, according to many [166] Fathers of the Church, virginity in the earthly sphere is conceived of as an anticipation of life in heaven, as vita angelica, a life similar to that of angels, this is the outcome of a pietistic Neoplatonism, in support of which Mt 22:30 cannot be invoked. Marriage does not make a man 'earthly'. But the counsels can and must be understood as an eschatological witness to the extent that they objectify and make manifest that faith which reaches out in hope towards that future state which is the consummation of the grace which is received in this faith. To the extent that this objectivation and manifestation of the triumph of grace and of faith is the objectivation of that grace which embraces the world (even though this is achieved precisely through the Cross) and glorifies it, this 'sign' character of the counsels is essentially focused upon the Church, in which the consecration of the world takes place and the worldly becomes identified with the Christian. It is not only for practical reasons that there must be something [167] more in the Church than the mere practice of the evangelical counsels. Such a thing would actually be unfitting. The fact that some of the members of the Church live a 'worldly' life, that Christianity has also its 'everyday', and therefore almost anonymous aspects in the way in which it is lived, so that Christians act as the 'pagans' also act – this is something that belongs of necessity to the mode in which the Church manifests herself, and is inherent in her nature. The life of Christians in the world has a message for those who live under the evangelical counsels. It tells them that their actions too, do not compel grace, but rather that grace is bestowed upon those actions. The life of the evangelical counsels has a message for Christians 'in the world'. It tells them that they too are pilgrims, to whom grace comes from above and not as a result of their worldly activities (even though it does come in those activities). Both 'states' in the Church mutually contribute to one another according to the gifts which are given to each in particular precisely as proper to itself.

Of course, a further consequence of all that has been said is that the counsels must be lived in a manner (and that too precisely with regard to their sociological and 'institutional' aspects) which makes it clear that they have the force not only of objectivation but of a manifestation too of the faith of the Church. But at this point fresh questions are raised for [39] In the present article we are regarding the evangelical counsels as constituting a renunciation. In doing this we wish to draw attention particularly to the formal element in renunciation, the deliberate letting go of some good. Of course the concrete act in which such renunciation is posited is not simply one of letting go. The very fact that an act of this kind has to be performed is of itself enough to ensure this. A sheer negative act of letting go, without any positive element in it, is not possible. A further point is that if it is right to leave such an empty space in one's human life viewed as a whole (i.e. if one is not motivated in this by an attitude of reaction against the good that is surrendered) the resulting vacuum will inevitably and justifiably come to fill itself up with certain precisely positive modes of behaviour which are intrinsically connected with the good that is relinquished. These in themselves constitute an objectivation of faith and love, for it is for the sake of these that the individual concerned has chosen to make the renunciation. The poor man is in a position to acquire a positive attitude of detachment towards the earthly goods precisely from his position of deprivation, for in fact it is neither possible for him totally to renounce all use of worldly goods, nor would every attitude of withdrawal from them be reasonable. (Industry, a sense of social responsibility, concern for the worldly circumstances of the religious community, etc., are virtues which must be developed positively.) The unmarried man renounces one particular form of love between human beings, but does not absolutely renounce human love in itself. His renunciation is only Christian and is only permitted if it makes it possible for him, and actually demands of him, that he shall have a true love for his fellow men, a will to loving service of them and fraternal relationships with them. Religious obedience is not mere passivity, not a shrinking from self-responsibility and independence in the right sense. It does not entail the surrender of personal initiative and boldness. Rather it is that selflessness with which one places one's self at the disposal of others and subordinates one's self to the achievement of a higher common goal. And in all these positive aspects of renunciation, which constitute the formal essence of the evangelical counsels, there is, once more, a reference to that eschatological state which is the goal of all Christian striving for perfection: a proximity in love to a world in which God is present, because in the freedom bestowed by the Spirit we no longer have to choose between God and the world, a choice from which the man who is still making his way through an unredeemed world cannot remain exempt.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

today. The poverty of the orders seems often to have very little ‘poor’ about it. The evangelical state of virginity all too often vanishes into the vague indefinability and ambiguity of the attitude of contemporary society towards sexual love. Obedience appears as a way of organising the communities on the grand scale such as also occurs in other contexts and with greater severity. All this constitutes a threat today to the ecclesiological function of the evangelical counsels, and raises fresh questions concerning the contemporary forms of religious life.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[168]

10

THE THEOLOGY OF POVERTY

We have here set ourselves the task of examining the poverty practised in the religious life and its nature, in other words the theology of poverty. We shall attempt, therefore, to establish what the theological basis is for what we call poverty and the vow of poverty as taken in the religious life. This means that we have set ourselves an extremely difficult task. I cannot hope, and the reader should not expect, to arrive at any very satisfying answer to the question we have set ourselves in this enquiry. We must content ourselves with throwing some light on the actual question itself and sketching in some partial answers here and there. When I say that I an unable to offer any total answer, such as would be satisfying even to some degree, I do not believe that in holding this opinion I am succumbing to the tendency which is so widespread and predominant today, to see only questions everywhere, and to be unwilling to entertain any kind of factual or down-to-earth answers. The reason why the question posed here, therefore, simply does not admit of any simple answer is that the subject of it, namely poverty, is a concept that can hardly be apprehended in any simple or unambiguous sense. Of course we might adduce doctrines which have a very profound basis in theology, and which, rightly understood, do express the theological significance of poverty. They tell us why, on what basis and for what end the members of religious orders embrace poverty in their religious life. We can, therefore, expound the ‘ideology of poverty’, if I may so express it, in a way that is theologically speaking very well thought out. But however right and important such an enterprise may be, in pursuing it we are attempting to speak of the basis and ultimate purpose of a matter which, in itself, is not clear or unambiguous. For prior to any question of the reasons why a man should commit himself to a life of poverty it is extremely difficult to obtain any one clear idea of what poverty is, viewed simply and straightforwardly as an objective phenomenon in its own right.

[169] In fact this has always been the case. The history of religious life throughout the two millennia of its existence has been, one might almost be justified in saying, a constant record of shifts and variations in the interpretation of poverty in itself. It may perhaps be true that the actual motives and causes which lie behind the practice of poverty have also always been a matter of dispute. If we look into the matter more closely we find that at different epochs and in different religious orders very different motivations have been assigned for the practice of it. But the main point is that the actual ways in which poverty in itself has been practised and defined have been quite different from each other. Poverty considered as a concrete objective phenomenon is different today from what it was yesterday, and different in one order from what it is in another. This fact is recognised and conceded. It is even used as a criterion for distinguishing between the orders and their varying degrees of ‘strictness’. And in canon law and ascetical writings the poverty of the religious orders is spoken of. Of course it is possible to devise a single formula standing for a unified concept of religious poverty such as would cover all these variations in the practice of poverty in the different orders and at different epochs, and which in spite of these variations would be applicable to all. But if we do this then the question still remains whether this formula really expresses what is essential in the poverty of any given order at all, or whether we can in any sense apply to this formalised concept of poverty those theological motivations which are assigned as the basis and the goal of religious poverty; of whether this formalised concept of poverty (it might be expressed as a total dependence upon the assent of superiors in disposing of material goods) in any sense corresponds to what is meant by ‘poverty’ in the bible and in tradition, and in the real

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

motivation which initially inspired the various movements which led to the religious orders.

These problems concerning the reality of poverty have always been, and still are with us. But in addition to these certain quite fresh problems have arisen today. Today we find ourselves in the midst of a process in which an economy is emerging which forces us to alter the material content of what is meant by religious poverty. It is utopian to imagine that in applying the concept of poverty to the material of our concrete lives we can live and practise it in exactly the way in which an Antonius, Pachomius, Benedict, Francis, or, at the beginning of the new age an Ignatius thought that poverty should be practised in the concrete. Anyone who held this opinion would simply be closing his eyes to the realities of [170] the situation, and would thereby precisely be obscuring the real task which awaits us, that namely of arriving at a materially new concept and a materially new concrete application of the essence of what poverty has been understood to mean in the new economic circumstances in which we are inescapably involved. Precisely in the dimension of material values and goods, and more here than in any other sphere, man is, with regard to the shaping of the course of his private life, a subordinate cog in the machine by which the shape of this dimension as a whole is socially and collectively determined. The shaping of this dimension of life takes place almost entirely independently of him, and so far as his individual life is concerned it confronts him as an entity that is already given, and which it is not in his power to determine. Whether one wears a shirt or has none, whether one goes barefoot or wearing shoes, etc. – these are factors which even as practised by the individual change completely from time to time in different epochs and under different economic systems. And the way in which such usages are actually applied in the concrete is almost wholly determined by these circumstances of universal application. And hence it comes about that the rules which determine the way poverty is to be applied in the religious orders, as handed down from earlier ages, which to a certain degree are intended to describe and to lay down the actual material application of poverty in a particular order, are either to a large extent no longer in force at all, or are no longer in any sense applicable to the realities which actually prevail. Hence it comes that poverty as practised has become a reality which is, to a large extent, neither envisaged nor catered for by the rules of religious orders at all. We shall have to return to these matters at a later stage. Our only reason for putting forward this consideration in the present context is that we wish to make it clear that we cannot expect any answer which is really theologically satisfying concerning the religious meaning and the theological significance of these matters, or concerning their religious motivation. For the concept of poverty, so far as what is really meant in the concrete is concerned, is no longer clear at all, and, moreover, is no longer capable of being very clear. Also because we are no longer in any position to obtain a clear insight into the phenomenon in which this is one particular factor, namely the concrete economic situation as it exists today, its nature and the lines along which it tends to develop. If we sought to give the impression that we could provide an accurate and precise theological interpretation, then the only way in which we could convey such an [171] impression would be to immerse ourselves in a sphere of abstract formalism in which everything would be true, beautiful and glorious, but the question of whether the subject of our discourse actually was in fact that poverty which we have to do with in our everyday lives would still remain open. The result of this state of the problem is that we must not expect to find any very clear and distinct arrangement of the materials in this essay. I shall speak first about certain traditional problems connected with the concept of poverty, and then about what can perhaps be said regarding the theological basis for poverty in view of the circumstances actually prevailing, and finally about certain questions which arise from the contemporary situation in the sphere of economics and political theory with regard to religious poverty. By way of reassurance we may reiterate once more that for men who are intelligent and wise a lack of clarity and a failure to solve all the problems at the theoretical

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

level need not necessarily be extended to the sphere of practical action as well. There are thousands upon thousands of factors in human life as lived in the concrete which have proved themselves to be reasonable and valuable, beneficial and sound, by being tried and tested in the actual processes of living, and which, nevertheless, it is extremely difficult to speculate about so as to arrive at any clear theoretical conclusion. The practical knowledge which we gain in the spontaneous and uninhibited process of living our lives is always greater than that which we acquire through speculation, which can never adequately cover life in all its dimensions. And so we know that poverty too as practised in the religious life is reasonable and good because the living practice of it has been proved by the wisdom of the ancients through the experience of many centuries in the Church under the guidance of the Spirit with which she is filled. And we know it even before we have arrived at any theoretical clarity as to what we really are actively living out in this, and why it should be good in this way. This is not to say that there is no necessity for, or meaning in speculation of this kind, but it probably does serve to exclude a restlessness and a destructive force which such speculations might otherwise have.

I. SOME TRADITIONAL PROBLEMS

1. The distinction between the poverty of the individual in an order and that of the community as such is one that is well-known. Such a distinction is not without its significance, for there is no doubt that the [172] poverty of the individual does entail the factor of dependence upon the community in the disposal of material goods, and this factor cannot, in the nature of the case, be true of the poverty of the community as well. But dependence in the disposal of material goods and poverty cannot be identified one with another (however often the attempt may be made to do so on the part of the exponents of ascetical theology and canon law). And if there were no such thing as communal poverty, then it would be impossible to speak of the poverty of an individual either. Again the member who is totally dependent upon a society that is positively rich cannot seriously be called poor if the word poverty is to be allowed to retain any meaning at all. The consequence of this, therefore, is that the problem of religious poverty is primarily a problem of the poverty of the community to the extent that there is such a problem in the order concerned, and to the extent that it is presupposed that the way of life followed by the individual is determined by that of the community itself. This may be a platitude. Yet I have the impression that when the religious communities of today attempt to give new shape to the rule of poverty in the constitutions of their particular order, and one that corresponds to present-day circumstances, they are always tempted to think initially and primarily of the individual, and to allow the question of poverty, insofar as this applies to the community as a whole, to fall into the background. This is understandable. The question of communal poverty today is far more difficult to resolve than that of the poverty of the individual. But it must be solved. Otherwise the prescriptions concerning the poverty of the individual necessarily become mere casuistry designed for a particular set of circumstances, laying down how the juridical dependence of the individual upon the permission of his superiors in disposing of material goods can be maintained, simplified, intensified, etc., in this contemporary age. Such matters then easily degenerate into external formalities, which are still far from necessarily entailing any supernatural meaning designed to form the personality. And in any case dependency and poverty are not the same thing. This is an ancient problem which, nevertheless, still needs to be thought out anew today. In order to put the matter clearly once more: a rich order cannot have any poor members. It may have a well-lined purse even though it is strict in refusing the individual to draw on this at will. It may have members who in a juridical sense have no

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

private possessions of their own. Orders can be poor in different senses. But an order that is really rich cannot have any poor members. At the [173] most such an order can have members who are totally dependent upon the communal property reserved to the community in respect of the material goods which they need. Someone might perhaps say that these statements presuppose an idea of poverty which is at basis Franciscan, and which, for example, would be inappropriate to a rich mediaeval institution (a royal abbey founded by a prince). In reply to such an objection we would have to say that it is precisely this concept of poverty, the Franciscan one if we like to call it so, which is the biblical one, the one envisaged by the ascetical teachings of old, in other words the 'evangelical' one which is also envisaged in the mind of the contemporary Church even among laymen, when the demand is made that members of religious orders should be poor. Theologically speaking too, it is this idea that we must take as our basis. Otherwise poverty degenerates into a mere modality of community life and obedience (no wonder that in the ancient orders no specific vow of poverty was provided for at all). In this situation, therefore, poverty represents neither an evangelical counsel in the true sense, nor, in any effective sense, the material for a specific vow, not any real theological problem. In brief: the poverty of the individual and the poverty of the community are, in the last analysis, one and the same problem. It is because the community is poor, and to the extent that it is so, that the individual participates in the poverty of the community because he is a member of it, and therefore too, a sharer in its way of life. And it is because he intends to be poor that he attaches himself to a community which practises this poverty in its life. In all this it still remains an entirely open question, and one which still awaits our further exploration, what degree of poverty, and what kind of poverty a community has or should have.

2. In this the second point which has to be made here has in reality already been anticipated: What makes a man 'poor' in the sense in question here, where we are conducting a theological and ascetical consideration of the word 'poverty', is neither dependence upon others in the disposal of material goods, nor the juridical concept of the absence of private property. One who has no property of his own can certainly not dispose of material goods of his own power, and at the same time in a way that is legally valid. But if he belongs to a community (e.g. a family, a society, an order) which decides to set him in charge of the whole range of their material goods, and to allow him to control their use (a range which corresponds to that of an individual whom one would describe as [174] 'rich' in relation to the general standard of living) then we cannot describe a member occupying such a position in a community of such a kind as poor. The most we can say is that he is economically speaking, totally dependent. Such a state of dependence may even be felt as thoroughly unpleasant. It may, at any rate in a certain respect (at least as far as outside appearances are concerned), 'deprive the individual concerned of his power'. And this dependence and deprivation of power in relation to others may even be susceptible of a wholly Christian and ascetical interpretation in harmony with the order's ideals. But this cannot be called poverty. If, therefore, the only cases in which we were willing to see offences against the vow of poverty were those in which it was this juridical dependence in respect of poverty that was offended against, then this would constitute a canonical or juridical distortion and diminution of the true concept of poverty, and in accordance with this even in those cases in which a superior has rights over property and is vested with legitimate canonical authority only as the authorised controller and disposer of the property of the community, he can still act in a manner which is absolutely contrary to the spirit of the poverty of the religious life. If, for instance, a superior attempts to employ all the arts of the business man, and to act like a ruthless capitalist in order to increase beyond all measure the resources of the order, he can offend against the spirit of poverty even when he modestly assumes the same 'ascetical' conditions for his private life as so many contemporary managers of great enterprises. In such a case he has not offended against the principle of dependence, because as superior he had a perfect right to dispose of the property as he had done. But he has sinned against poverty itself. When the superioress of a community of nuns exploits the individual sisters by laying excessive burdens of work upon them in order to make the order rich and powerful by establishing new houses, she has offended against poverty even though, precisely because of her acts the individual sisters have to live in an extremely 'poor' manner.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

3. Religious poverty and poverty in one's mode of life should not be confused one with another. Certainly we must not sublimate poverty into a theory in such a way that it can be reconciled with any kind of usage of material goods. Otherwise we should be forced to arrive once more at that concept of poverty which identifies poverty and the relationship of juridical dependence with regard to these material goods. It is incontestable that a certain measure of real deprivation of material goods [175] does belong to poverty, even when we leave on one side the question of precisely what goods (as well as the standards by which we should determine this) poverty should lead us to do without. Poverty, therefore, has a thoroughly material content. Poverty as practised in the orders cannot simply be a 'poverty in spirit'. The subject's attitude to the world of material goods must be made actual in the concrete, and his withdrawal from that world (a point to which we shall be coming later) must likewise be made real in the concrete. Nevertheless we have to distinguish very clearly between poverty and specific modes of practising poverty. This is a point that has always been recognised from the first, and for this reason even those who took the 'Franciscan' concept of poverty as their common working basis still differed widely from one another in their applications of it. This is not the place to analyse the differing modes of poverty which have appeared in history, to describe the physiognomy of each or to define the differences between them. For our present purposes it is sufficient to establish that these differences do exist, because this is an important factor for the considerations which we shall later have to put forward. It is sufficient for us to say that we must recognise that these differences are justified in principle and theologically reasonable by the fact that the Church has recognised as legitimate the various modes of poverty practised in the individual orders. It may be that in earlier times an attempt was made too hastily and too facilely to draw an equation between the categories of the 'more strict' and 'less strict', and therefore a 'more perfect' and 'less perfect' kind of poverty. In this respect we of today are more cautious. We concentrate more upon the differences in mode and practice, and less directly and specifically upon the 'strictness' involved. We have to concede that here (as in many other matters) the differences in point of 'strictness' between the individual orders have largely disappeared, and that a movement has arisen which is still continuing even today, towards a fairly uniform mode throughout all the orders. Perhaps it is simply the fact that all in common are involved in the same economic situation, and the same general way of life in these present times that has to a large extent forced this state of affairs upon them. But if we concede that this difference between poverty (in its essence) and the mode of practising poverty is an already existing historical fact, then we cannot in principle simultaneously close our eyes to the fact that today a point that has to be thought out throughout all the orders and in each individual order is what form the mode of poverty should assume [176] specifically today in order to be really convincing and really livable. Furthermore the man who concedes the initial point cannot simply hold rigidly and conservatively to the idea that the ancient mode of poverty inherited from the Fathers must be preserved, and imagine that this is enough to solve all the problems. In the light of contemporary ideas of social economy this is simply impossible. And if, nevertheless, the individual concerned is so uncreative as to attempt such a thing, what emerges is a lifeless mixture of purely external, but nevertheless unavoidable concessions to the new age (these may, perhaps, be formulated too hastily and with a lack of clarity) and the ancient traditions of the orders, which are no longer really meaningful from the point of view of ascetics, but

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

only survive as relics of the folklore of the religious orders.

