of interest to another, and would make an interdisciplinary discussion between them meaningful. But in response to this it might presumably be objected that even when two sciences are concerned with the same material object, the findings of one science are arrived at by considering a distinctive formal object in it from a distinctive viewpoint. Hence the only way in which the findings of one such science could be of interest to another is for the one to be subalternate to the other, to be a subordinate branch of the other science. And in such a case any dialogue between them would not, properly speaking, be an interdisciplinary dialogue, a discussion, in other words, between two sciences which are regarded as autonomous, and not as already subsumed under a single supreme science which has subsequently branched out into particular areas, and is arrived at by considering a basic conception that is common to all the sciences. We must take into consideration, therefore, something which is nowadays surely taken as established, namely an original pluralism of the sciences. We must not recognize any one science [82] as occupying a position of supremacy or transcendence over the rest, or as assigning the individual sciences their place or their task (as in earlier times philosophy was called the ultimate science), and we must ask ourselves whether there is any such thing as a scientific doctrine prior to the individual disciplines, instead of being merely subsequently educed from the methods employed in these and arrived at by reducing what is common to them all to formal and systematic terms. And it is precisely when we adopt this approach that the interdisciplinary dialogue seems to be reduced to a dialogue between men as such – men, in other words who, while they are engaged in various branches of science, still fortunately take an interest in other matters outside their own particular science. Of course it would be possible to attack the initial postulate on which this finding is based, namely that pluralism between the sciences in virtue of which each is autonomous in its own right and from its very origins. It would be possible to postulate instead a basic science imposing its influence bindingly upon all a priori, and to call this logic, metaphysics, a priori scientific doctrine at an ontological level, or any other name we may choose. But in that case we would merely be setting up a postulate which de facto the individual representatives of the various sciences would find it quite impossible to accept, so that in the concrete it would have nothing to contribute in throwing light upon the nature and special characteristics of interdisciplinary dialogue. In reaction against this we might console ourselves with the assurance that even though the scientists assert their respective autonomies each in his own branch of science, they would still tacitly disavow this autonomy of theirs if they consented to engage in an interdisciplinary dialogue as such, and in the strict sense. Yet this is, after all, only a very slight consolation in view of the blind alley into which we have been led by the problems entailed in the idea of an interdisciplinary dialogue. For even if we are willing to accept this consolation as legitimate, we still have to concede that even if these scientists are willing to forego their own autonomy, which they claim each for his own particular science (anti-metaphysical in outlook as they in fact are nowadays), they do so precisely as men, though admittedly they show themselves wiser and more reasonable in this role than they would if they remained precisely scientists and nothing more.

INTERDISCIPLINARY DIALOGUE AS A FACT

Of course we can take as our starting-point the sheer fact that an interdisciplinary dialogue exists, at least to a modest extent, and, furthermore, [83] even before it is recognized what, on any precise view, the participants are committing themselves to. We might be prepared to acknowledge that this fact has the same significance and the same justification as the individual sciences. After all, these too already exist and are actively engaged in even before they know precisely what the outcome of their activities will be. For while they do indeed

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

know the subject-matter with which they are concerned, they do not know themselves. Their position is similar to that of a man who is already questing about in his everyday life even before he has arrived at any conscious reflection of what his precise purpose is in doing so, or why he ever commits himself to this totally unsystematic everyday life of his, and that too when it leads him in several different directions. Before coming to my real argument, I would like to supplement what I have said with regard to the problems entailed in an interdisciplinary dialogue at least from one further aspect. I believe that any interdisciplinary dialogue will in practice entail something like aggression in the actions and reactions of each particular discipline in its relations with the others. The individual scientist may personally be extremely modest, and have extremely modest ideas about his own science and the particular place it occupies within the total spectrum of human life and of the knowledge which mankind needs. Yet in practice he is secretly, and for the most part unconsciously, impelled by an awareness that he has something to say to all other men which is important for them and, moreover, precisely as the representatives of some other science. His attitude is that one has only to step out boldly enough and far enough from the starting-point of one's own science, to penetrate, in the long run, to all departments of human life while yet remaining within one's own science. Any science, at least as practised in the concrete by the individual scientist, has a tendency to monopolize. Every scientist, therefore, has the tendency to instruct the other sciences and scientists, and is prone to the temptation of failing to listen to the others, or being willing to hear from them only what is confirmed for him in his own science. Hence the strange attitude of aggression which prevails among scientists even when it is concealed by a mask of conventional politeness. But this is still not enough to explain the real grounds for this attitude of aggression on the part of particular sciences, causing them to seek to dominate all departments. Ultimately speaking these grounds are to be found in the paradox that every science as such regards itself as autonomous, and yet, in view of the unity of human knowledge, is secretly convinced of the fact that man has only to pursue his own scientific investigations at a sufficiently radical level to be able to identify them with the totality of human knowledge. [84] This attitude of aggression, therefore, secretly draws its vitality from an awareness that, despite the pluralism of the sciences, each of which regards itself as autonomous, a principle prevails, unacknowledged and yet necessary for the very life of each particular science, that impels it towards the totality of human knowledge; a principle, in other words, which belongs to it and yet is not subject to it and cannot be controlled by the science itself. Each particular science, therefore, taken in itself is in a state of self-alienation, and that too in a positive sense, and it is this, so I believe, which constitutes the grounds for the positive side of the attitude of aggression towards one another which we find among the sciences, and which usually manifests itself with extreme intensity in interdisciplinary dialogue. One is not aggressive towards that which is totally alien. When one is aggressive one is asserting a difference on the surface and yet revealing the presence, albeit unacknowledged, of a hidden relationship with that which one opposes. This interior principle, present within the individual science yet never consciously reflected upon or brought under control by it, is the factor which secretly sustains its attitude of aggression towards the other sciences. And it also manifests itself in the fact that even when a science is intended to be effective in the modern sense of the term, it still always has to allow for the possibility that it not only fastens upon fresh subject-matter at the material level and makes it explicitly subject to its own laws, but also may call its own principles in question, break through its own perspectives and change them. Such a science may, in fact, of its own power, transform itself in its basic understanding of its own nature. Now a process of self-questioning of this kind is, after all, only possible provided that in every science a principle prevails which is not subject to the control of that science, a principle which the science concerned cannot bring into harmony with itself and which, nevertheless, is not subject to it

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

either. And it is precisely this that seems to be the basis for the love-hatred between the disciplines, and for the possibility, necessity, and at the same time difficulty of an interdisciplinary dialogue.

THE HUMAN FACTOR AND SCIENCE

Of course it might be said that in all this we have simply been pointing, and that in very general terms, to the common human factor. Right at the beginning of these considerations of ours we said that it was this that sustained the interdisciplinary dialogue, and at the same time made it a dialogue to which the name of 'interdisciplinary dialogue' could be applied only in a very improper sense, seeing that, in the last analysis, it is not the [85] scientific specialists as such, but the individuals who happen to be scientific specialists, who speak to one another in it. All this remains true. But what is the situation now that some indications have been given, however weak they may appear, pointing to the fact that this human factor as such may belong to each particular science as such, albeit only in a quite peculiar sense of the term 'belonging', such that it is at the same time not under the control of that science. Of course in saying this we also recognize that it belongs to each particular science in a manner quite specific to itself. It is true that in former times this factor common to all sciences which we have pointed to so obscurely, which contributes to their life-force without itself being susceptible to control by them, was called the metaphysical factor, the transcendental factor etc., which was the special concern of philosophy. Now we may seek to explain away this common factor as non-existent on the grounds that, at least to all appearances, philosophy and metaphysics in the derived sense have reached their end, or at any rate are incapable of treating of this factor common to all the sciences in a credible manner, even though it is this that sustains the interdisciplinary dialogue. Here again we may assign two grounds for this: either that it is something which in principle is not susceptible of scientific consideration, or that it cannot be upheld by any philosophy concretely enough or decisively enough to make this common factor a basis for an interdisciplinary dialogue in such a way that in that dialogue we can expect not merely openness and freedom, or in the end, at a secondary level, a mutual interchange of information, but conflict, decision, and the achieving of some genuine common ground as well. But can we really maintain this position? In present conditions will this common factor be sustained by some other 'science' or whatever name we may wish to give to the upholder of this common factor?[3]

THE STANDPOINT OF CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY

At this point we must begin by interpolating a few remarks. We are speaking of Christian theology. Here no distinction is being drawn between Catholic or Protestant theology. We may therefore pass over the problem of whether the two theologies do not differ to some extent in the way in which they regard themselves, and whether this would not also be a conditioning factor, causing each of these two theologies to place a different interpretation upon its particular powers and qualities as contributing to the interdisciplinary dialogue. A further question which we [86] are leaving on one side is whether theology can or should regard itself as a science which can take its place in the interdisciplinary dialogue as one particular science, or alternatively whether, even if it is something quite different, it should [3] cf. W. Pannenberg, Was ist der Mensch? Die Anthropologie der Gegenwart im Lichte der Theologie (Göttingen, 1962).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

nevertheless hold firmly that it has a right to intervene at least at specific points in this dialogue, even though it is not intended to be a science. On this showing, therefore, the interdisciplinary dialogue would become something more, and would be less restricted to the science alone. This is a question which we can leave open, even though in doing so we are in no sense questioning the fact that from the practical and technical point of view theology cannot renounce its task of organizing something which at first sight appears like the systematic investigation of a science in the true sense, and even if we are convinced of the fact that this scientific or quasi-scientific enquiry on the part of theology (whatever interpretation may be placed upon it either by the theologians themselves or by others) both can and should be engaged in within the framework of a university. One third point: provided theology has not tacitly surrendered its role, does not allow its understanding of its own nature or awareness of its own task to depend upon the question of whether it is given a place in an interdisciplinary dialogue, or whether the other sciences have the impression that theology has something to tell them which is of concern or value to them, it is in a position to lead the discussion. Obviously theology too, like any other science, can act as an ancillary science to other disciplines. But if theology were to make its understanding of its own nature dependent upon the question of whether it was welcomed in the symposium of the sciences, if the only way in which theology could establish its position would be through the contribution it makes to the interdisciplinary dialogue (and this seems to me to be approximately the opinion of many of the younger theologians), then at basis theology would already have given up its true role, and would also have to be silent in the interdisciplinary dialogue, because it would then have nothing to say.[4]

THEOLOGY AND THE HUMAN FACTOR

Some may hold the view that in the interdisciplinary dialogue of today theology's role is to take over the defence of that mysterious human factor which is constantly present in the other disciplines, constantly making its [87] impact even when unacknowledged, and prompting these disciplines to transcend their own limits and, going beyond the explicitly methodological concept which they ex professo uphold, to submit themselves to the most radical questioning. Now if we ascribe a role of this kind to theology, critical and at the same time supra-disciplinary, then obviously we are placing it in an extremely hostile and unhappy position. This is not so much because the same role might, and in former times actually has been, ascribed to some philosophical system. If the philosophy of today is still wilting to play this part, and is recognized as having this function by the other sciences, even though these are reluctant to allow philosophy to tell them anything, then certainly theology will not from the outset deny this role to philosophy. Instead, presumably, it will try to achieve agreement with philosophy in a more private discussion on the question of how philosophy and theology, each in its own way, and as the outcome of a decision arrived at only with difficulty, can together take over this task in the interdisciplinary dialogue. Moreover the difficulty which such a role involves consists surely not in the question of whether the other sciences will admit theology to their discussion, and then allow it to make that contribution which it believes it has to make in this dialogue in virtue of its very nature as it understands this. If the other sciences were unwilling to admit theology to their discussion the questions would have to be raised of what right they had a priori to exclude theology as a partner to their discussion, of whether in that case they knew what theology was and whence they

[4] See the symposium volume, Recherche interdisciplinaire et théologie (Paris, 1970), with articles by F. Houtart, H. E. Tödt, G. Palmade, J. Ladrière, M. D. Chenu, A. Astier and M. Faessier,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

derived their knowledge of it, whether it was from their own scientific findings or from some other source, whether this other source ipso facto constituted a criterion so sure that they could undertake to exclude theology in this way with a good conscience. And further questions which we would have to put to these other sciences are these: since their decision to exclude theology in this way would be ex supposito unanimous and common to them all, whether they recognized some authority among themselves common to them all and binding upon them all, and what this was (for instance whether after all it was once more philosophy as such or some system of philosophy). Again the fear of not being admitted to the dialogue at all rules out any possible risk that may be entailed in the part theology plays in the interdisciplinary dialogue. Finally the point to be taken into account in considering what such participation may entail is not the objection which might possibly be raised that every participant in such a dialogue must be personally responsible for bearing in mind the human factor as providing the basis and the ultimate perspective for the dialogue itself. For not only is every individual [88] an upholder of this human factor, and responsible for upholding it, but in addition the human factor itself constitutes a hidden element intrinsic to every science and calling every science in question, compelling it to reach beyond its own limits and impelling it to make contact with all other sciences.[5] Obviously every partner to the dialogue must take responsibility for taking due cognizance of this mysterious human factor. But precisely theology proceeds from the assumption that basically speaking it is quite impossible for any individual to escape from being a theologian, at least implicitly, provided that by theology we understand the consideration of human life as a whole and in itself; over and above all the more restricted outlooks of science, and in its orientation towards the absolute Mystery. But precisely on this account the theologian will say that it is both good and necessary to have, among the participants in the interdisciplinary dialogue, one who has not any other part to play in it than to draw attention to that factor which all the participants have a duty to pay heed to, one who has no special interest in upholding any particular science, but rather has a responsibility to all in common.

THE TASK FOR THEOLOGY

But it is precisely this point that brings us immediately face to face with one particular element in this function of theology and of the theologian in the interdisciplinary dialogue which calls for the most careful consideration. We have seen that the special task of the theologian is not restricted to any one particular aspect of science, and hence, if we like to put it in this way, is not scientific at all. Yet even apart from the dialogue itself; the theologian exercises this function of his in the same way that the practitioner of one particular branch of science would, with all the imperviousness of the specialist, the egoism of the specialist, the attitude of aggression, the impulse to suppress all other considerations, which are actually characteristic of a recognized science. With regard to the mysterious human factor of which we have been speaking, therefore, the Mystery in the absolute which alone renders all science truly human, the theologian must begin by submitting his own science to the most searching criticism in the light of this. And whenever he has only a very imperfect recognition of this task of his, he is forced to be the upholder of this human factor from an attitude of critical detachment and superiority in relation to all other sciences. The theologian cannot be surprised, therefore, if the other [89] sciences adopt an attitude of reserve and mistrust towards him in admitting him to this dialogue. The only way in which he can make this task

[5] From this point of view cf. K. Beck, ‘ “Kritische Theorie” und Theologie’, Theol. Prakt. Quartalschrift 119 (1971), pp. 212-220.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of his acceptable to them is by acting as one who recognizes that even a factor which cannot clearly be discussed still has to be spoken of: that a rational account has to be given even of that Mystery which represents a continuous and radical threat to our rationality, because this does in fact belong to human life, and we do not get rid of a situation by simply refusing to trouble ourselves with it on the grounds that it is too much for us. At the same time it is clear that theology must take an extremely modest attitude in this dialogue, and be ready rather to listen than to speak; in fact that it cannot make any special material contribution of its own to knowledge in the way that the other particular sciences do in interchanging ideas among themselves. At least theology cannot do this so long as it is acting strictly as such and not merely as a science whose stock of knowledge inevitably exceeds that which belongs to it strictly as theology. In this dialogue it will, whenever necessary, prefer to appeal to that element of theology which is already present and active albeit implicitly and, perhaps, actually being repressed, in the other partner to the dialogue. It will gently and modestly put the question to the other partner, whether there is not here and there a blind spot in the eye of this particular science or this particular scientist, which needs to be taken into account, and which the other scientist too can discover, given some degree of methodological skill and some good will, seeing that by a paradox he and his science always constitute something more than that which explicitly characterizes them and distinguishes them from other scientists and other sciences. To this end theology must (provided always that it makes its message authentic and credible by the attitude it adopts towards itself) be the upholder of self-criticism on the part of the sciences. It must persuade them to be modest in outlook, to be aware of their provisional nature and their limited perspective, which they can never wholly overcome, whatever extrapolations, sometimes justified and sometimes not, any given science may inevitably and habitually undertake. In this way theology will become the defender of any given science against any other. As the upholder of the inconceivable Mystery which is uncontrollably but nonetheless really present, and which must be respected as such by every science, it will ward off the temptation to which every science is liable of setting itself up as wholly autonomous and totalitarian in character, and so to subsume all other sciences as subordinate to itself and to submit them to its yoke.[6] It is theology which defends a pluralism among the sciences [90] which is wholly incalculable and incapable of systematization, against a danger which even today, in the age of the so-called end of metaphysics, has still not been banished. For in place of philosophy other individual sciences are beginning to claim a monopoly of authority over the rest.

A SITUATION OF ‘GNOSEOLOGICAL CONCUPISCENCE’

In the old theology ‘concupiscence’ was a key term. It stood for the idea that man, despite the unity of his knowledge, and despite his unity as a being endowed with freedom, is not in any position to regard himself as a single integrated system capable of being controlled and carried through to its consummation from one single point within itself. Thus it is mortally dangerous for him to attempt to grasp to himself this ideal, so lofty as it seems, of radically systematizing his own existence, with all its impulses and instincts. In the same way we might say that theology is the guardian and defender of the situation of ‘gnoseological concupiscence’ in the sphere of the sciences, defending it against that mortal danger, inherent in every science, of according itself an absolute value and of supposing that the key which it

[6] On this cf. W. Weidlich, ‘Zum Begriff Gottes im Felde zwischen Theologie, Philosophie und Naturwissenschaft’, Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche 68 (1971), pp. 381-394.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

carries within itself will fit every door. In those cases in which a science is already relatively mature and, moreover, has undergone a history of bitter disappointments and failures, the danger of over-valuing itself may not be so very great. In such cases the science concerned is satisfied so long as it is allowed to survive and continue. In fact, however, the inevitable situation is that further and new sciences are constantly emerging, and in their case this danger is present, the danger, namely that even though they are only idols, they will claim the adoration of all. Obviously the only way in which theology can fulfil this task of upholding the situation of 'gnoseological concupiscence' is for it itself, while indeed keeping the totality of knowledge in view, still for all that never, even tacitly, to fall into the trap of claiming a universality of scientific knowledge for itself; or of regarding all other sciences merely as its handmaids or as branches springing from its own roots. Certainly it is true that in the course of history theology has sinned often enough against this law, and precisely in doing so has demonstrated that even it is not in itself the immaculate representative of God, presiding over all human affairs. Yet we never rid ourselves of our faults merely by rejecting the very task against which we have sinned. And as I see it in the interdisciplinary dialogue theology too will have to undertake that basic task [91] which we have just ascribed to it. And the less it is recognized as belonging to it in a formal and explicit sense, the better it will have to perform it.[7]

POSSIBLE FACTORS DERIVING FROM THE DIALOGUE WITH THE INTELLECTUAL DISCIPLINES, NATURAL SCIENCES, AND SOCIAL SCIENCES, WHICH MAY BE OF FURTHER ASSISTANCE

Obviously what we have said should not be taken as implying that in the interdisciplinary dialogue theology has no further task or no further possibilities whatever beyond those which we have just mentioned. Theology can again and again offer valuable assistance to all those intellectual disciplines which inevitably have to take historical facts into account in their work. For at least in the West the history of ideas has all along also been a history of theology, and precisely in those areas in which it has not been presented as such in any explicit sense at all. This means that if we are ever to achieve knowledge of the history of ideas belonging to us we must first understand something about theology and the history of theology. It is no disgrace for a non-theologian, working in the field of the intellectual disciplines, to recognize and admit that in certain circumstances he knows too little of theology and the history of theology for him to be able adequately to cope with his own subject-matter even taken in itself; and for him on this account to accept advice from theologians. Now both sides come to recognize that it is both necessary and possible for them to achieve a mutual interchange of information only when they take an interest in one another without any intention of gaining an advantage over one another. In the light of this, therefore, it is in the interests of each party, the intellectual disciplines and theology alike, to embark upon the interdisciplinary dialogue which is so necessary without any idea of gaining advantages over one another. Obviously this also applies to theology itself. The only way in which it can achieve an understanding of its own history is for it to accept instruction on the history of ideas in general – indeed actually on economic and social history in general. For it is within this that the history of the Church and of theology too has been enacted.

The dialogue between theology and the natural sciences[8] (regarding [92] this as extending [7] On this see, from the other point of view, U. Mann, 'Wahrheit in Wissenschaft, Theologie und Religion', Zeitwende (Die neue Furche) 42 (1971), pp. 247-255.

[8] An experiment from the side of natural science which is of interest for this dialogue is to be found in the small

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

beyond that basic function which theology has in the interdisciplinary dialogue which we have been chiefly concerned with in what we have previously said) will be possible, but will differ, in certain very notable respects, from the dialogue between theology and the intellectual disciplines. Certainly the history of the 19th century was chequered with a whole series of conflicts between the natural sciences and theology on particular material questions which had a theological relevance. But surely these conflicts have, in the majority of cases, been resolved. But this does not mean that the task of theology in relation to the natural sciences has been fulfilled, the task, namely, of allowing itself to be instructed by them on their own terms. This is a task, rather, which can only now really be embarked upon. For within theology (which, after all, must be concerned with man as one and whole) it is only gradually that a view is being achieved of man as portrayed by the rationalism of the natural sciences rather than by traditional humanism. After all theology, precisely in those areas in which it is, and is resolved to remain, an ecclesiastical discipline, is to a large extent conditioned by a type of humanism deriving from the early Fathers. And it is still far from having achieved a really adequate knowledge of him to whom its present and future message must be addressed. In this sense it still has a long time to spend in listening to the natural scientists. But conversely it too can and must draw the attention of the particular natural science to certain factors. For these too always and inevitably have a certain anthropological relevance. And to the extent that any given natural science has this, it may have allowed some undue foreshortening to appear in its portrayal of man, which represents a danger from the point of view of the natural science itself. And where this is the case theology can and must remind the scientists concerned of the human responsibility entailed in every finding of natural science. This surely is also an obvious contribution which theology can and must make to the natural sciences, yet one which must be realized ever afresh. In this connection it is also obvious that the task which both the natural sciences and theology have to discharge each for the other can only really be recognized in its true light by both sides if each takes an interest in the other without seeking to gain any advantage over it. And a further obvious point is that such a policy of taking mutual cognizance of one another's findings represents a problem, in view of the methodological difficulties and the material incommensurability of every modern science, a problem [93] such as never existed formerly and which can be coped with only indirectly if at all. But this is a question which cannot be treated of in the present context.

That the modern social sciences and theology can and should enter into discussion with one another is obvious. The history of society has always constituted one of the prior conditions and causes of the history of the Church and of theology. And the converse has likewise always been true, even though this relationship of mutual interdependence has never been reducible to a single system by means of a methodological monism such that the origin of the relationship could be ascribed exclusively to one of the two sides. With regard to the social sciences, these both empirically establish and provide possible models for society, and in some cases these become normative. And it likewise seems to me to be obvious that in respect of both these functions the social sciences must submit to a critical enquiry by theology with regard to the image of man which determines their outlook. The converse is also true, namely that the relevance of theology's own content as constituting a critique of society must also be considered, and this is impossible without the help of the secular social sciences. This point becomes clear the moment we remind ourselves that contemporary volumes by G. Ewald entitled Wirklichkeit, Wissenschaft, Glaube, Die Frage der Wirklichkeit in exakter Wissenschaft and in christlichen Glauben (Wuppertal, 2nd ed. 1965), and G. Ewald, Naturgesetz und Schöpfung. Zum Verhältnis von Naturwissenschaft und Theologie (Wuppertal, 1966).

---

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation theology is beginning to understand itself as 'political theology'[9] (regardless of how in more precise terms we should understand this concept), provided we are really to achieve a right understanding of this 'political theology' and of the nature of theology as such. Finally I believe that the scientific disciplines of today (including theology too among these) must achieve a rapprochement both in order to enquire into the question of which sciences should perhaps exist which do not yet exist in any explicit sense, and also in order to investigate the question of what kind of organizational and institutional footing an interdisciplinary dialogue of this sort should be placed upon so that it does not remain a pious wish or an edifying remark included in devotional Sunday discourses.

[9] On this subject cf. the survey by J. B. Metz, 'Political Theology', Sacramentum Mundi V (New York and London, 1970), pp. 34-38.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[94]

6

ON THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THEOLOGY AND THE CONTEMPORARY SCIENCES

We have here certain observations to offer on the relationship between theology and the sciences, especially the natural sciences, which are intended to bring out as clearly as possible the difference and the autonomy both of theology and of the sciences. But before this certain basic points need to be established.[1]

We shall here be emphasizing the basic and original distinction between theology and the present-day sciences. But this does not mean that the differences between them amount to a total disparity such as to admit of no contact between them, and thereby capable of giving rise to situations of conflict. This is not what we mean if only because, for all the pluralism in human knowledge, there is a certain unity in it, and because theology, albeit in a manner quite peculiar to itself makes assertions the subject of which belongs (still more directly) to that sphere in which the subjects of the natural sciences and the historical sciences too are to be found.

For our present purposes we shall pass over the question of the relationship between theology and philosophy,[2] and the question of the relationship between philosophy and the contemporary sciences. This chiefly because the following problems cannot be treated of or solved within the present context: the question of a transcendental metaphysics in relation to religions which are neutral in character; the question of the relationship between those sciences which nowadays regard themselves as autonomous and are unwilling to accept a position of subalternation to ontology on the one hand and a philosophy on the other which constitutes [95] something more than a mere theory of science which is supplementary to the sciences themselves; finally the question of a pluralism of philosophies which we are nowadays no longer in a position to transcend (and which we still have to recognize even if we assume that these philosophies are not so opposed as to contradict one another).

Likewise, without any exhaustive discussion, we are assuming that the problem of a 'gnoseological concupiscence'[3] is something which still awaits solution after we have dealt with the relationship between theology and the sciences, and therefore something that must be thought out in its own right in order to cope in a more penetrating manner with the problem which we have now to discuss. By the term 'gnoseological concupiscence' I mean the fact that in human awareness there is a pluralism between the various branches of knowledge such that we can never achieve a full or comprehensive view of them all together, and that they can never be integrated in a unified system by man in a way which makes them fully controllable or comprehensible to him. This remains true even though no one branch of knowledge can be regarded as a matter of indifference when it comes to rightly interpreting another. The reason I call this pluralism, which can never fully be transcended,

[1] On the question in general cf. the author's study, 'The Unity of Spirit and Matter in the Christian Understanding of Faith', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 153-177; also O. Spülbeck, Zur Begegnung von Naturwissenschaft und Theologie (Einsiedeln, 1969), and H. Schwarz, 'Das Verhältnis von Theologie und Naturwissenschaft als systematisch-theologisches Problem', Neue Zeitschrift für sytemat. Theol. u. Religionsphilos. 11 (1969), pp. 139-153.

[2] On this cf. in the present volume, 'On the Current Relationship between Philosophy and Theology', pp. 61-79.

[3] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Wandelbares und Unwandelbares in der Kirche' and 'Der Glaube des Christen und die Lehre der Kirche', Schriften zur Theologie X (Einsiedeln, 1972), pp. 241-261 and 262-285 (to be translated in Theological Investigations XIV with provisional titles 'Change and Constancy in the Church' and 'The Faith of Christ and the Teaching of the Church').

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'gnoseological concupiscence' is in order to show that problems arising in the sphere of knowledge are at least analogously the same as those which, in the traditional theology, are accorded close examination merely in the field of voluntary impulses.

THE CONTRAST BETWEEN THEOLOGY AND THE SCIENCES

We are assuming that every science is per definitionem a particular branch of human knowledge, but that this does not apply to divine revelation and theology, at least so long as these do not betray their own true nature, and finally that this fundamental difference must have a decisive influence upon the relationship between theology and the sciences. We must now explain in somewhat greater detail what we mean by this statement.

Every science constitutes, on a contemporary view, a particular branch or category of knowledge. It assembles particular phenomena, which are, and are assumed to be, different from one another. What the connection is [96] between these various phenomena, and what the purpose is of assembling them in this way, is irrelevant to our immediate purpose. In any case, however, a science does not consider the single subjectivity of the scientist as the condition which enables him to take it as axiomatic that the subject-matter he has to consider falls within one particular category. The science as such does not take into consideration the subjectivity of the knowing subject. It does not think about thinking – not even in the case of empirical psychology. For this invariably confines itself simply to establishing a connection between various individual pieces of data so as to constitute a category. Nor do the sciences as such consider that original unity of reality which is prior to the a posteriori experience of individual objects, which never constitutes the mere sum total of individual empirical data, any more than it constitutes a subsequent extrapolation of experience, extending it to fresh possible particular objects which, while they are not yet present, are nevertheless capable of becoming so. For our present question it makes no difference whether or not these sciences are investigating the real roots and essential natures of the individual objects and phenomena falling within their respective fields.

The area with which theological statements are concerned is the transcendence of man as such, that transcendence which is a special characteristic of knowledge and freedom, of the theoretical and practical reason, and to that extent is, once more, realized in the relationship between the two faculties mentioned, and, as an experience of transcendence, implicit in the inalienable difference and unity between them. There is a transcendental experience to the extent that the experience of that prior awareness which comes before any individual object of the two faculties we have mentioned constitutes an inalienable a priori condition of the knowledge of objects assignable to particular categories, and to the extent that the knowledge of these involves, at least implicitly, this prior awareness.[4] This transcendental experience is orientated towards that absolute Mystery (i.e. one which in principle cannot in its turn be apprehended by us) which we call 'God', and which constitutes the true 'subject' of theological statements. It makes no difference to our present argument whether the very process of recognizing this transcendental experience as a subject in its own right, and thereby postulating an explicit relationship to God, ipso facto assumes that relationship of God to man which in Christian terminology we call 'grace', 'the supernatural elevation of man', the 'self-bestowal of God', or whether this process of explicitating the relationship to this Mystery, sustaining and opening up this transcendentality of man, [97] constitutes an a priori condition of human knowledge in the absolute, which in theological terms would be called philosophical in character. This question can be left open, not only for theological [4] On this cf. in the present volume 'Thomas Aquinas on Truth', pp. 13-31.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

reasons which there is no need for us to develop here, but also because at that stage of human reflection which is demanded as necessary by the philosophy of today, and therefore too at the level of the theoretical reason as such, the pluralism of philosophies may perhaps be such that we can no longer transcend or control it, with the result that it surely becomes an extremely difficult question how to make God the subject of any purely philosophical or theoretical investigation. In passing it may be pointed out that this proviso does not involve any conflict with the declaration of the First Vatican Council concerning the possibility of knowing God at the philosophical level. But this too is something which cannot be considered any further at this point.

THE HEART AND CENTRE OF THEOLOGY

Now properly speaking the statements which Christianity makes about this absolute Mystery (called God) are only fairly few in number. But they are of fundamental importance for its dogmatic theology.[5]

We cannot avoid having to concern ourselves with this mystery, whether we explicitly objectify it to ourselves or not, whether we use our freedom to accept it or to reject and suppress it. What Christianity asserts is that its message is concerned precisely with that about which no 'clear' message can be conveyed inasmuch as per definitionem it neither has, nor is capable of having, any one particular place firmly assignable to it within the frame of reference constituted by human knowledge and human freedom. Theological statements, therefore, are, in the sense described above, different from scientific statements in respect both of their quality and their source. Hence theological statements, as thematic and verbal in character (and it is only as such that they constitute 'statements' at all) invariably point, despite the rational structure manifestly belonging to them (for without this they would, once more, not be statements at all), to the original pre-thematic and transcendental experience, and it is only on this condition that they are really comprehensible. Otherwise they would be mere rationalizing statements which would be very quickly unmasked and shown to be meaningless by the modern sciences (formal logic, the philosophy of language etc.).

[98] Concerning this mystery which is made present in the transcendental experience as absolute, Christianity asserts that it is something more than merely the goal, remaining forever remote and asymptotic, towards which the human spirit moves in knowledge and freedom, in theory and practice. Also, and more than this, it has actually bestowed itself as absolute Mystery upon man so as to be the innermost consummation of the movement of his being and a goal to be immediately possessed. This relationship which the absolute Mystery bears to man is a fundamental element in his transcendental experience, albeit not necessarily an element in his reflection upon, and interpretation of this. To that extent every theological statement concerning that which we are accustomed to call grace, justification etc. has its place in a theological statement at the transcendental level. What we are accustomed to call, in Christian terms, the history of revelation is nothing else than the developing process, taking place within history, by which man reflects upon this transcendental experience of the self-bestowal of God, a reflection which, of course, in its process of historical development, cannot be achieved by the individual as such taken in isolation, but is rather sustained by the history of reflexive thought discernible within the history of mankind as a whole right from its origins, and is reflected upon anew at a merely secondary level in that discipline which we call theology. There is a further question, the question, namely, of how the revelation history

[5] On this cf. the author's article, 'Mitte des Glaubens', Hilfe zum Glauben, Theol. Meditationen 27, A. Exeler, J. B. Metz, K. Rahner edd. (Einsiedeln, 1971), pp. 39-56.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of the Old and New Testaments has its special place within this more general revelation history, co-extensive with the history of human ideas as a whole. But this cannot be set forth in the present context. The element in all this which is absolutely indispensable for an understanding of theology will probably be made clear in the statements which follow.

This experience of the absolute self-utterance of God given in the transcendental experience of man achieves its supreme point in Jesus of Nazareth. He is the eschatological climax of the self-utterance of God to mankind, and of the primary history of reflection upon this self-utterance (primary because taking place not at one remove, at the level of theological reflection, but rather in the concrete conditions of human living and in the unity of action, passion, and word) inasmuch as it is in Jesus that this offering of God's self-bestowal becomes something more than a sheer offering. Rather, through the deed of God, it takes place and is revealed as de facto victorious and irreversible. This historical manifestation of the eschatological victoriousness and irreversibility of the self-utterance of God, which is in itself transcendent, does not remove the transcendental character inherent in all theological statements. For first, every transcendental [99] experience as it takes place is invariably accompanied by an element of reflexive thought expressed in verbal form, which does not remove the transcendentality of this experience so long as it is aware of being at once orientated towards, and different from this transcendentality, or so long as – to adopt Anselm's way of expressing the matter – it is aware of the fact that here what is beyond human reason is conceived of as really present and inevitably rational. And there is a further reason why the transcendental character inherent in theological statements, and thereby setting them apart from scientific knowledge of concrete 'this-worldly' realities, is not removed in the case of Christian statements by the fact that they refer to the concrete 'this-worldly' reality of Jesus. In such statements about Jesus the relationship to him which it is intended to express and to make possible is precisely that which we have with him as having died. In other words the relationship with him is in that real event in which absolute transcendence in theory and practice is achieved, bringing us to the absolute mystery in the event which we are accustomed to call death. The statement of faith that Jesus has risen from the dead is merely the justified expression of the fact that our transcendental experience of the self-bestowal of God is attached to the historical event of Jesus, and it is in this that it achieves the fulness of its reality and manifests itself as victorious. And the same statement of faith expresses the truth that the event taking place in the death of Jesus, the event in which an individual man achieves radical transcendence and is brought into the incomprehensibility of the divine Mystery, has in concrete fact achieved its goal. The fact that the statements of Christian theology refer to the concrete 'this-worldly' reality of Jesus does not remove the transcendental character inherent in them as theological statements in virtue of the fact that in these Christian statements a concrete 'this-worldly' historical reality is being touched upon only to the extent that it is precisely the event of absolute transcendentality. In concrete fact the transcendentality belonging to us always takes place as a historical event, and the fact that this does not destroy this dimension of transcendentality is shown by our own experience in which transcendentality is invariably achieved in a specific historical situation without being destroyed as transcendentality thereby. We say that the Christian experience of the victory of transcendentality leading to the mystery of God achieves its full realization precisely in the experience of Jesus. Now this statement obviously involves a fundamental trust in the powers and significance of unique historical events which, in this unaccountable uniqueness of theirs, do not as such constitute subjects falling within the purview of the sciences as [100] understood today, not even that of the historical sciences. For even historical events, considered as subject-matter for the historical sciences, are viewed by these, certainly in their de facto contingency, but not in their character as absolute and as posited 'once and for all', a character which they both bear within themselves and can also impose upon another subject.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Nevertheless historical events as such, and as freely posited, have the character of being absolute and posited 'once and for all' in this sense, even though this cannot ever be authenticated by science, concerned as it is with objectifying concrete 'this-worldly' realities. Rather this character inherent in historical events vanishes the moment we seek to make it a subject for investigation by such sciences.

THEOLOGY AND THE SCIENCES IN THEIR RELATIONSHIP WITH ONE ANOTHER

In the light of what we have said we should now determine the relationship which exists between theology and the modern sciences as they nowadays understand themselves to be. However, in the present context it is possible only to provide a few pointers, somewhat arbitrarily selected.

Before we can undertake to define this relationship, we should of course consider more precisely the connection between the following two factors: on the one hand the original, grace-bestowing experience of, transcendence (faith) and the concrete expression of this, and on the other human reflection upon this, and the further process of reflection at the theoretical level (= theology). For obviously the relationship between the sciences and faith on the one hand and between these sciences and theology on the other, is not simply one and the same.

The difference between concrete 'this-worldly' experience and transcendental experience does indeed imply a fundamental and justified distinction between that which ultimately constitutes the subject-matted of theology, and that which is the subject-matter of the sciences. It is, therefore, in principle legitimate to regard these two entities, theology and the sciences, as irreducibly distinct from one another, and as caught up in the state of gnoseological pluralism, together with the 'concupiscence' which this involves, in the total context of human knowledge. Bu this does not imply any absolute disparity between theology and the sciences. First, theology itself has in its turn a concrete 'this-worldly' history of its own, in which it can be made the subject of historical science in the secular sense, albeit from a point of view which reduces history to the same level and concentrates upon its common factors. But [101] also, and more than this, in its assertion that an event of absolute transcendence has taken place, theology postulates the historicity of Jesus and of his interpretation of himself (whatever more detailed description we may give of this), and thereby achieves an established point of contact with the historical sciences. Theology neither can nor should, therefore, regard itself from the outset as of such a nature that cases of conflict between it and these historical sciences are totally inconceivable. It belongs to the very nature of theology to accept that such cases of conflict are possible, even while it hopes, once more at the eschatological level, that no such case of conflict will be regarded as so radical and so positively insurmountable that the only remaining course is for either theology or the sciences to surrender and submit. Nevertheless any such ultimate reconciliation between theology and the sciences is not a state of affairs actually established once and for all, but rather a subject of eschatological hope, and one which can be conceived of and made real anew stage by stage only as this hope moves towards its ultimate goal.

The sciences can have a certain significance for the investigation of mystagogy into the transcendental experience, in virtue of the fact that these sciences do communicate something like the first intimation of transcendental experience. For these sciences conduct a critique of themselves, and involve a pluralism of methods which can never fully be eliminated or overcome in a higher synthesis. And from this arises a relativism of the methods they employ. Again human life in its totality constitutes a threat to them from without which can never fully be removed, and for all these reasons they themselves impart something like a first intimation of an experience of transcendence.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Theology and the sciences also come into contact with one another (in both a positive and a negative sense) to the extent that the sciences have per definitionem a tendency to achieve the greatest possible rationalization of human life, but in doing this always come up against the freedom, uniqueness, and sheer factualness of life as it exists within the wider sphere of the possible. Thereby, in their rationally conceived demands for the future of man, they encounter the eschatological limits imposed by theology in the name of faith in the incomprehensible God of freedom and of the future alike.

So far as the role of theology in the interdisciplinary dialogue between the sciences is concerned, I may refer to observations which I have offered elsewhere. [6]

[102] Faith and theology are related to the sciences as to all other concrete 'this-worldly' realities in human life. These are already there even before faith and theology realize their own natures. These human realities of a concrete 'this-worldly' kind, and so too the sciences, have their own special meaning for man, a meaning which does not and should not vanish in that insuperable pluralism in human awareness which is necessary for faith even when man himself begins explicitly to orientate himself towards the absolute Mystery as that which is near and all-embracing. For the eschatological integration of all reality in God, and in his knowledge and love, is the deed of God himself, a deed which takes place precisely at the point at which, and in virtue of the fact that, man endures the pluralism of his world, and so too of his knowledge, and does not suppose that he is standing at a point at which all reality, and the knowledge of it, is one. For at this point stands only God himself.

[6] On this cf. 'Theology as Engaged in an Interdisciplinary Dialogue with the Sciences' in the present volume, pp. 80-93.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[103]

PART TWO

Anthropology

[105]

7

INSTITUTION AND FREEDOM

Has the theologian as such any contribution to make on the subject of 'institution and freedom',[1] without ipso facto arrogating to himself the role of a social scientist or an authority on jurisprudence? It must be said that the theologian is concerned with this subject as such, and will from the outset seek for an answer to the question as posed in one specific direction. This will surely be clear in the light of the following consideration: in the history of ideas of the last few decades a phenomenon which appears again and again is an atheism that is postulated in the name of human freedom. Whatever terms it may be expressed in, what it says is that God is to be thought of as nothing else than the great architect of the world, the ultimate principle of order and law, the great institutionalizer. And this being so, he neither can exist, nor should be allowed to exist, if there either should be, or is in fact, such a thing as freedom. Whether freedom and institution are ultimately speaking and in the absolute reconcilable, therefore, is manifestly a theological question right from the first, one which is of immediate concern to the theologian as such, and not merely as a man.

'INSTITUTION AND FREEDOM' AS A QUESTION FOR THE THEOLOGIAN

When we open the pages of the New Testament or study Pauline theology then we perceive that freedom is a key concept occupying a central position in the Christian understanding of human life.[2] For Paul the real gift [106] of God in his Spirit, the fruit of saving history for mankind and for the individual alike, regarded as something which both has already taken place and is to achieve its fulness in the future, is freedom. Certainly this freedom of the redeemed children of God, regarded as a gift of the Spirit in faith and hope, is not ipso facto identical with that freedom which constitutes an ideal of social politics arid is engaged in a constant struggle with self-alienation, enslavement, the lack of freedom, as constituting a constantly renewed threat to man emerging from the concrete forms of history. But while the former kind of freedom, namely the religious one, and the latter kind, namely the social one, are not simply identical, still they are in a very essential sense connected with one another, although this is a point which cannot be developed in detail in the present context. The only way in which we can achieve a spirit of faith and hope in ultimate freedom as a gift of God in [1] On this theme cf. also the author's Freiheit und Manipulation in Gesellschafti und Kirche, Münchener Akademie Schriften (Munich, 1970).

[2] On the concept of 'freedom' see K. Rahner, 'Freedom III. Theological' Sacramentum Mundi II (New York and London, 1968), pp. 361-362, with further bibliography, and also M. Müller and J. B. Hirschmann, 'Freiheit', Staatslexikon III (Freiburg, 1959), cols. 528-548; J. B. Metz, 'Freiheit III. Theologisch', HbThGB I (Munich, 1962), cols. 403-414.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

his Spirit, and as the content of his kingdom, is for us in principle to opt for social freedom and to play our part in striving to make it real. In just the same way there can be no love of God without love of neighbour, and the will to achieve a world worthy of mankind or a better future is intrinsic to the will that hopes for the final coming of the kingdom of God, the will which we call faith.

The real blessing of salvation, then, which Christianity proclaims as the goal of its hope as expressed in concrete action, is that freedom in the theological sense which has an intrinsic connection with social freedom. And this means that this social freedom too must be considered if we are to arrive at true and Christian ideas about God. Now the significance of this can be expressed as follows:

We may think of God as the great architect of the world, as the operator of a universal cybernetics, as the law-giver, as the ultimate guarantor for all structures and orders in reality which we directly experience (all these conceptual models, as applied to that which we call God, are meaningful only provided that we retain our overall awareness that God is the absolute Mystery, and one which we can still never incorporate within some higher system). At the same time we may, by contrast, regard freedom not merely as any kind of factor making itself felt within this world which belongs to God, but as constituting the central blessing of salvation itself. Now if all this is true, then God, as the author of all structures and orders in the world, can be conceived of simply as the provider and the content of this freedom regarded as a blessing of salvation, seeing that all orders and structures of which he is author can themselves be conceived of as the condition making freedom itself possible, and providing it with its context. The point can be expressed in different terms by saying that God can [107] be thought of in this way provided that all orders and structures are themselves ultimately thought of not as opposed to freedom, but as an intrinsic element in it. Only on this showing can we say that a positive option for freedom does not entail any demand for atheism. Only on this showing can God be conceived of as the absolute, single, and original source of freedom and structure and order at the same time.

Now it is undoubtedly true that all institutional factors constitute, in a social sense, the outer periphery and the utterly secondary (although not inessential) realization and concretization of that which is called structure and order in the world, the more so since these institutional factors are to a large extent dependent, in their concrete forms, on the free will of man himself, and so much more liable to change than that which pertains to the structures investigated by the natural sciences and intellectual disciplines inasmuch as these are concerned with what is permanent and enduring. But despite this fact, the institutional factor at the social level still belongs in its own way to those structures and orders of the world which are unavoidable, if only because the institutional factor in the concrete can be brought to an end only by introducing some other institutional factor, though perhaps a better one, and not by simply obliterating it. Now if the institutional factor at the social level is in this sense to be numbered among the enduring structures and orders of the world, at least to the extent that it is a world of man, then it is clear from the outset that the institutional factors in the world of man are of concern to the theologian as such as well. The theologian may indeed say that this institutional factor at the social level, as it exists in concrete reality, belongs only to this world of man as transitory, and that one day this will be dissolved and give way to the kingdom of God as the kingdom of freedom. The theologian may regard precisely this human institutional factor as in an especially pressing sense subject to man’s decision, undertaken in hope, to change the world. For man himself strives for the dominion of perfect freedom. And yet the theologian, with his belief in God as the source of all freedom, and as the source of all structural factors as well, can only concern himself with this world of the institutional – inasmuch as it is the institutional factors that constitute the enabling condition for freedom – if he also includes under this heading the institutional factors at the social level as well.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

I hope that I have given some indication of why this theme of 'institution and freedom' should be of concern to a theologian, and what the direction is in which his ultimate and basic positions will lead him to turn for an answer to the question to which this theme gives rise. If, therefore, [108] little more seems to be said on the subject of theology in what follows, the subject being treated of is, nevertheless, one which a theologian may treat of without being accused of going beyond his brief in an amateurish manner. Admittedly in doing so he will be obliged to confine himself to observations remaining at a relatively general level, since his starting-point must be his own particular discipline.

FREEDOM AS A SLOGAN: A KEY FACTOR IN MODERN LIFE

Every age has its own great and dominant ideals, its slogans (using this term in a wholly positive, or at least a neutral sense) in which it sums up its hopes and its desires. A dominant idea of the kind we have in mind, in which everything is drawn into a synthesis, may on this account be very imprecise, if only because – to put it briefly – man cannot arrive at a definition of the whole when he does not himself stand outside it, or assign what is an ultimate practical goal to a place in a system of coordinates which is different from, and, higher than, itself. Such slogans, key concepts, and all-epitomizing ideals belonging to a particular age may undergo changes. For a man whose awareness is safeguarded against falling into a mere pluralism of totally disparate realities they are both necessary and justified. Slogans of this kind should not be blamed on the grounds that they are not susceptible of any full analysis or exact definition, even though of course this fact again should not wrongly be exploited as a blank cheque to justify us in producing mere phrases where exact answers and precise reflexive thought are possible. Man is in fact a being such that his reflections upon himself and his understanding of his own existence are invariably only approximate, if only because the reflexive thought itself as it develops is subject to intellectual perspectives and motivations which are incapable of being in their turn objectified, reflected upon, or subjected to critical analysis. In this situation slogans play their part. They are intended to sum up the awareness and the aims of a given epoch, without thereby standing for a process of reflection which is total and all-embracing, or capable of being analyzed down to the last detail. A given epoch – it may be precisely the present one – can have several such slogans and dominant ideas. In the present age the term 'freedom' certainly constitutes one such. It is true that for at least two hundred years it has been included among the ideals of all movements in social politics, but even so it has still not lost its power of attraction. It has become a watchword throughout the world, and peoples of very widely differing stages of economic and cultural development have fastened upon it. [109] Precisely on this account it is, of course, almost inevitable that the word 'freedom' has come to stand for an entity which is almost indescribable, and in fact is unknown. The social scientist, with his rational and empiricist approach, would therefore be justified in saying that freedom has become, to such an extent, an indeterminate entity, something which bears a different meaning for every individual, every nation, and every social group, that any social politics capable of giving an account of itself in rational terms will find this concept totally intractable. But even the practitioner of this science of social politics should at any rate concede that such a slogan exists, that it makes its impact in the minds and hearts of individuals, and that therefore, whether it is welcome or not, it does on any showing make itself felt as a force in the field of social politics. We can also understand that the reason why this term should already have made so strong an impact for so long, and should still be making it today, is that freedom has still not become something that can be taken for granted, something no longer capable of stimulating any movement. Presumably it would indeed be perfectly possible for us in all sincerity to uphold the position that at least in the Western industrial countries the degree of social freedom already achieved is greater in relation to the broad mass of men than has been achieved in any previous age. But even though this fact can presumably be adduced, it still does not make freedom something that can be taken for granted, something which, since it already exists for many individuals and in a notable degree, is no longer of concern and no longer capable of serving as a slogan to express the expectations and demands for social change in the future. For in the sphere of society freedom is always a relative concept, related to the sum total of what men value as capable of achievement within a foreseeable space of time. For the men of a particular age, or at least according to their opinion, whether true or false, the sum total of these physical, medical, economic, and social changes which they demand may be very great. And in these circumstances, when these physical, medical, etc. factors in practice remain stable, they feel that their freedom is needlessly restricted by this lack of change, when in principle change is possible. And they feel this even though materially speaking the freedom they enjoy is far greater than that of the men of some former age, who must have regarded the restrictions upon their freedom as in practice more or less unalterable.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now the situation today is that the sum total of economic, social, etc. changes which, at least in the opinion of individuals, might be introduced, is immense, regardless of whether this opinion is altogether correct, or whether further distinctions would have to be drawn in order to make it [110] so. And for this reason the men of today are far from feeling that they enjoy a particular freedom, especially in the case of those who no longer recognize their existing situation as the outcome of free and creative activity on the part of those who overcame conditions of economic and cultural chaos so as to bring it about, and hence regarded it as manifestly praiseworthy. Today many, especially younger men, are reacting against the contemporary social situation by aggressively demanding more freedom. But I believe that we should view this in the way that we have indicated above. Presumably it would not be very meaningful if we sought to explain this aggressive demand simply by saying that in a technological and industrial age and, in conditions in which the population has increased enormously by comparison with earlier ages, the economic, social, political, and legal conditions in which men have to live have become so complex and so difficult to change that even when they are regarded as inevitable, they are still felt to restrict the freedom of the individual in the highest degree. In a certain sense this may be justified. But as an explanation of the aggressive demand for more freedom it is straightway open to the objection that in former ages man, living as he did in simpler situations of life and social conditions, did not in any sense enjoy any more freedom, either for the shaping of his own life, for going where he liked, for choosing his own philosophy of life, forming the sort of social groups he wanted, choosing the goods he thought best, etc. The sole difference between this and former ages is simply this: that the compulsions of former ages, which allowed man less freedom, were felt to be more or less unalterable, and therefore the demand for more freedom could not be regarded as capable of fulfilment in any effective sense. But this brings us back once more to the explanation we have adumbrated at an earlier stage as to why there is so aggressive a demand for greater freedom today, even though, objectively speaking, there has never been more freedom than there is today. Now this enables us to give a certain description of what is meant by freedom as such at the level of social living. On this showing freedom would be a condition in which it is possible to get rid of a situation which is regarded as undesirable and capable of being abolished. In arriving at the judgement that a given social situation is undesirable it is possible that another situation, the one that replaces the previous one, is regarded as desirable. And this view in turn may be justified or unjustified, or may be arrived at with or without the agreement of the majority of one's contemporaries, with or without appealing to this. But it may also be the case that in

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

struggling against the existing situation we do not make any attempt to consider in detail the [111] future situation which is intended to replace it. In other words that it is a matter of indifference to those advocating the change whether they fall out of the frying-pan into the fire. The characterization of freedom in the social sense which we have given is, of course, at a very formal level. But surely the reason for this is to be found in the fact that it actually does take very different forms at the material level as well, this freedom which individuals and groups desire when they put forward their demands for more freedom. We could of course draw a distinction between genuine and merely supposed freedom, and say that a greater freedom is to be found in those cases in which an individual, without being hindered by external factors, can direct his own human and individual nature in general, and the value attached to it, and in which he has greater scope for this in terms of the possibilities and the means at his command. But while in itself such a definition of the nature of social freedom would be justified so far as metaphysical anthropology is concerned, it too would fail to bring us any closer to the answer we are seeking because precisely on this point, of how we should rightly understand the nature of man and his dignity, very different ideas are put forward, and any description of freedom, if it is to be effective at the level of social politics, must take into account the pluralism of anthropologies which exist today and come to terms with it.

REALITY AND INSTITUTION

What then is to be said about the relationship between institution and freedom? Before we attempt to give an answer to this (to the extent that a theologian can give an opinion upon the matter at all), one further word remains to be said as to what is meant by institutions in this context.[3] As with the term ‘freedom’, so in this respect too, we must remain at a very general level. Presumably we shall not meet with any contradiction if we say that by ‘institutions’ in the sphere of human society we mean only those realities which, at least in some sense, are capable of being changed by the exercise of human freedom. Compulsions which are contrary to freedom may derive from those natural laws which fall totally outside the sphere of human freedom, and are to that extent unalterable by it. Certainly no one will want to subsume these under the heading of institutions. [112] Conversely, however, we can, for our present purposes, include under this heading all those realities in the social sphere which are subject to change, and which impose certain compulsions upon human freedom, in other words not merely human laws bearing upon various departments of human life and having juridical effects, but also dominant ideas, customs, taboos (as we are accustomed to call them nowadays), and other realities in such society, which do in fact exist but are capable of being changed. So far as human freedom and decision are concerned these constitute preexisting conditions which exercise a prior influence upon such decisions, canalize them, make them advisable or unwelcome by the attaching of social sanctions of either a positive or a negative kind to them, etc. All this can surely be included in the present context and for our present consideration under the heading ‘institution’, so long as we also remain aware that from many points of view we are expanding the concept to a not inconsiderable extent. For I am, of course, fully aware of the fact that among sociologists the term ‘institution’ has a narrower and (if one likes to express it so) a more precise meaning inasmuch as in these circles the only cases in which the term ‘institution’ is used are those in which a specific system of rules is being put forward and applied by means of some specific equipment operated by a specific [3] On this cf. G. Gundlach, Cl. Bauer, A. Bellebaum, ‘Institution’, Staatslexikon IV (Freiburg, 1959), cols. 324-334; G.Sta venhagen, ‘Institutionalismus’, Staatslexikon IV (Freiburg 1959), cols. 334-338; K. Rahner, ‘Institutionalismus’, LTK V (Freiburg, 1960), cols 714-715.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation personnel.

COMPULSIONS AND CHANGES

Now with regard to the relationship between freedom and institution in the second sense mentioned above, it is correct, first of all, to say that freedom is, and can be felt to be, opposed to institution. All the institutional factors in our lives also imply a certain restriction of our freedom, because in manifold ways they debar us from possible courses which would remain open to us, and could be acted upon, if our freedom were absolute. For the most part we do not feel these compulsions upon us at all. We are accustomed to them. They actually bring us advantages which we are unwilling to forego, and they seem to us to a large extent obvious and unchangeable. In other cases, however, institutional factors of this kind in our lives may be regarded and felt as capable of being changed. At the same time we may regard them as preventing us from acting upon one of the possibilities which freedom entails. And in cases such as these we begin as free creatures to react against them. We feel that our freedom is in some sense oppressed and enslaved, restricted and frustrated by these institutional factors. Obviously this applies chiefly to those cases in which the possibility which freedom offers, and which is then withdrawn by an [113] institutional factor of this kind, seems clearly the more favourable one by comparison with the institution itself, at least as actually applied to the freedom of the particular individual concerned. In this sense there cannot be any doubt that the incalculable multiplicity and complexity of present-day institutions must strike us, to a terrible extent, as restricting and (if we wish so to express it) frustrating. The present age and state of society, with its discoveries and techniques, opens up before our eyes an almost infinite range of real possibilities, which are now brought almost within the grasp of our freedom as such. And at the same time they are withdrawn from us by the institutions of our age and society, institutions which, since they now exist within the wider context of many other real possibilities, strike us as themselves capable of being changed, and so precisely cause us to feel that our freedom is being curtailed. We have already said that this experience of frustrated freedom must manifest itself chiefly, and with the greatest acuteness, precisely in the case of those whose memories are shorter, for these are no longer in the position of having experienced present-day institutions of all kinds in society as they actually emerged, or at a time when they were felt as liberating men from conditions which undoubtedly entailed still more restrictions and frustrations of freedom.

In connection with this experience of freedom being restricted by an already existing institutionalization of society, the following point too must not be overlooked, so as to enable us to arrive at a right judgement on the conflict between the generations which has arisen in this area. The attitude of some who demand freedom is such that change is felt to be desirable for its own sake and precisely as a full exercise of freedom, regardless of whether or not the innovations which it brings can ipso facto be recognized as improvements. Things are different from what they formerly were, and this in itself is very often enough to give a sense of freedom. This is especially the case when this feeling that freedom is to be found in change as such is not counterbalanced by a sense of familiarity with conditions as they have been hitherto. For in the case of the old their anxiety when faced with the unfamiliar and untried elements in the new conditions can give rise to a state of tension which is in part justified and in part due to physiological factors. And this anxiety may take away any joy they might have had in change as such. We can recognize the phenomenon which we are seeking to describe in its plainest and most familiar form in the changes which take place in the so-called fashions, meaning by this not merely fashions in clothes and similar outward customs in everyday life, but also fashions in art or science, in the preference given to certain specific themes etc. All fashions are nothing else than changes [114] made for their own sake, without regard to whether the innovations introduced are or are not improvements as well. They are changes which give rise to a sense of freedom – changes, therefore, which in terms of physiological factors and differences between generations are more acceptable to the young than the old. The former will always find innovations as such to be attractive, whereas in the latter the same innovations will arouse anxiety. The only way in which we can achieve a serious discussion between the young and the old as to the desirability of a given change is to pose the question of whether, taking all aspects into account, the innovation concerned, even by the standards of the younger generation, and on a realistic appraisal, turns out to be worse or better than that which it is intended to replace. Without a discussion of this kind the balance will be tipped in favour of what is new as such in the judgement of the young, and in favour of what is familiar as such in the judgement of the old. Each side will regard its choice as the better institution for ensuring freedom, and the only remaining question will then be whether it is to be the young or the old who have the power to make their judgement prevail and begin to act upon it. It cannot be denied, however, that what is new purely as such does in itself possess a certain value for freedom, and both is, and will continue to be, one of the sources of social change. If what is new is not notably worse than what is old the old too cannot seriously raise many objections against such fashions, but must endure them with the wisdom of those who know that changes are still welcomed even when they do not bring any convincing improvements with them.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

After this brief digression (if in fact it is such), let us begin by recognizing the simple fact that institutions, just because they occur within the context of wider possibilities and are felt to be capable of change, are also held to be restrictions and obstacles to the freedom which men seek. So much is this the case, as we have said, that in some cases we do not even pause to ask, in our quest for freedom, whether our protest against the situations and institutions which curtail freedom actually have some possibility of improvement to offer. And when we refuse to answer this question, and are thereby impelled into an adventure the outcome of which can no longer be foreseen, then obviously our demand for freedom is shown by this refusal to be materially and morally capricious and reprehensible. At the same time, however, the fact that innovation as such does inevitably have a certain intrinsic rightness of its own becomes clear the moment we enquire into the basic reasons underlying such attitudes of capriciousness, and ask ourselves why the danger with which they constantly threaten us is so indefatigable.

[115]

THE AMBIVALENCE OF CREATIVE FREEDOM

We must concede, then, that there is a prima facie opposition between institution and freedom. But this must not be allowed to obscure a deeper unity existing between the two entities and a relationship in which each influences the other. Man, when he has the power, does in fact himself create these institutions of his freedom. They are objectifications of freedom. Indeed this should constitute an intrinsic element in our description of what institution means, distinguishing it from those compulsions which are present within the sphere in which freedom is exercised in virtue of the unchangeable laws of nature. In fact it is only by recognizing that institutions derive from free acts that we are able to see also that the compulsion which they bring to bear is in a real sense capable of being changed or abolished, and it is the recognition of this fact that provokes freedom's protest against the restrictions imposed upon it. We are here faced with the paradox that freedom is protesting against its own creations. Faced with this paradox, we feel it only a slight and partially valid consolation to say that the institution is the creation of one freedom, while it is another freedom that is

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

protesting against it. For first, the freedom of the individual in individual life creates certain conditions, and then, having created them, it itself protests against them as imposing restrictions upon it. But more than this, insofar as it is possible to speak of a single society in a single age we must also say that this same society invokes the principle of freedom to protest against its own institutions, which it has created through its own freedom. In fact there is no lack of examples which we might analyze to show that the individual protests against institutional compulsions upon his freedom within his own society even when, from a different aspect, he freely assents to, and positively wills them. And yet he never notices this contradiction in his attitude. The situation is, in fact, that freedom creates its own compulsion within itself. It objectifies itself, and creates for itself the external conditions for its own fulfilment, shapes them and so opens out a sphere within which it can operate. And everything which freedom thus creates for itself, even though called forth by freedom, nevertheless achieves an autonomy and independence in relation to freedom both in the mind of the individual man and in the society he belongs to. We freely create customs within ourselves, and surround ourselves with institutions in order to be free, in order to disburden ourselves of compulsions which already exist by nature, and what we thereby create in freedom then confronts the subject endowed with freedom as autonomous and, as it were, alienated from him, [116] in the form of a fresh compulsion. But this ambivalence and dialectical character inherent in the forms in which we objectify our freedom should precisely not blind us to the fact that these secondary compulsions are created primarily as objectifications of, and aids to freedom. We submit ourselves to traffic regulations so as to achieve more unhindered conditions of travel. We enact permanent laws which are binding upon us for the regulation of commerce in order to remain unimpeded by others in the disposal of our own property. We produce what are nowadays contemptuously called taboos in the public awareness, even though we may feel restricted by them, but our basic reason for doing so is simply to ensure a greater sphere of individual freedom – for example to guarantee a sphere of intimate privacy which is immediately available simply to oneself. In other words we would ultimately speaking have less freedom without such taboos than we have with them. (Of course this is not to deny that there are taboos of this kind which either are meaningless or have become so in the course of time, but precisely this fact too is merely the outcome of that ambivalence inherent in every form in which freedom is objectified, and which at once makes freedom possible and places limits upon it.) Now in view of this inescapable ambivalence inherent in all the institutions which arise from freedom, are intended to make freedom possible of achievement and to safeguard it, and at the same time restrict its scope and in certain senses frustrate it, there are two points to be made. First, any such objectification of freedom, or of the history of the freedom of the individual or of society, can be for better or for worse in its effect upon this freedom itself. Presumably man is to some extent justified in interpreting more or less everything which has appeared in the course of human history as developed from freedom in order to contribute to freedom. Not only will more or less everything which takes place in society in the course of history actually be presented as a contribution to freedom, to a certain extent it actually is so. Let us consider, for example, the institution of absolute monarchy or of the most totalitarian régime. On close examination it appears that these invariably leave a certain scope for freedom unaffected. The reason is that a society simply cannot exist which is constructed and controlled totally and all-embracingly from one single point. The more so, since the absolute tyrant, in order to be absolutely uninfluenced by anyone else, would have to die in his own state of absolute isolation. But more than this, such systems do in fact, by comparison with other social orders, create elements providing fresh scope for freedom. This factor, which it is impossible to deny, does in fact provide propaganda for the most absurd and tyrannical social [117] systems always and inevitably to have some appearance of justification. And among older

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

individuals it is a factor which has led often enough to the sceptical conclusion that all social orders are at basis equally bad, and that the only difference between them is to be found in the different holders of power and the different ideologies on which they are based. At basis the same old situation remains, it is alleged, despite all these variations, especially since for the majority there is from the outset no prospect of gaining power for themselves within a given society.

But however strong an element of truth lies concealed in all this, the fact still remains that in relation to freedom some institutions are better and some worse, according as they limit and frustrate the legitimate freedom of the many in a greater or lesser degree. And hence there is a genuine history of freedom, a struggle for greater freedom that is genuine and not merely apparent; a legitimate protest against social institutions that unjustifiably restrict freedom, a protest which has a greater significance than a mere selfish clamour for a power hitherto possessed by others. In society institutions really do exist which, for all the ambivalence inherent in them too, serve the interests of freedom better, at least in cases where new and changed conditions have come to prevail affecting the numbers of the population, their level of education, the resources of communication, the quantity of goods which a given economy is now capable of producing, etc. Not all the forms, or even the institutions, in which freedom is objectified have the same restricting and frustrating effect upon freedom itself, quite apart from the fact that, as we have said, a certain preference can be given, with the necessary provisos, to new institutions as such over those which have been in force hitherto.

While we cannot enlarge upon this fact any further in the present context, we must recognize, then, that it makes it both right and necessary to maintain, and constantly renew, the struggle for greater freedom. But to this first factor a second and different one must now be added. It is true that the new and improved forms in which freedom is institutionalized serve the interests of this freedom better, and offer it a wider scope for its fulfilment. But even these new forms remain subject to that law of ambivalence which applies to all institutions, namely the inescapable law that they invariably both make freedom possible and frustrate it at the same time. It is at this point that the theologian raises the question of what the significance of this is. He asks himself whether, on this showing, man is able of his own resources to tolerate this ambivalence inherent in the situation of freedom. The question is whether man, is not constantly exposed to the temptation and the danger of throwing off the oppressive frustrations to [118] his freedom inherent in the situations in which he finds himself, even though they also contribute positively to his freedom. Again he may be tempted to throw them off in this way even though he actually needs these institutions as indispensable for his life, and the innovations which he is not yet willing to trouble himself about, so far from constituting improved forms in which to objectify his freedom, are actually harmful to it. He feels the oppression of the present existing institutions, the even more frustrating character of which weighs upon all except perhaps for a few of those actually holding power. This oppression stimulates his freedom to act against it. He does not yet feel the oppression and frustrations of the future institutions which he will perforce have to go on to create. He falls into a paroxysm of uncontrolled desire for a freedom which is quite un-realizable, destroys more than he can build, comes to a deadlock again and again in the course of history, and finally creates institutions which are not very dissimilar to those against which he was previously struggling. They may perhaps be different, but are only better – at least in certain respects – provided that all turns out well. In view of this question the theologian cannot hold that history as it de facto exists will ever be able to eliminate errors of this kind arising from the will to achieve freedom. They certainly belong to the very roots of history, which, viewed from the loftiest perspectives, are inescapable. But this sceptical view of past and future history as it de facto unfolds does not give the theologian

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

any licence for holding that man has the right to give his support to such paroxysms and upheavals in the cause of a desire for freedom which is ultimately destructive, or to claim that he has a right to support such movements. The fact that world history as it develops always entails sin, error, and bias, does not mean that a morally responsible subject such as man is intended to be has any right to commit such acts as and when he sees that they are in prospect.

Now on this assumption the theologian will ask what sort of interior dispositions man must have in order to avoid being liable to the seduction of such a desire for freedom. And the theologian's reply will be this -ultimately speaking man is only immune to such diabolical temptations to freedom from freedom itself when he recognizes, and accepts in a spirit of hope, a dimension of freedom which transcends this ambivalence inherent in the forms in which freedom is objectified. We mean that dimension of freedom which is the kingdom of God. In this connection it makes little difference, ultimately speaking, whether an individual who in fact actually achieves, and lives by, this state of interior liberation of his freedom, which transcends the ambivalence of the forms in which that freedom is [119] objectified, does in fact explicitate the theological interpretation of this state of liberation in conscious forms of words. Anyone who, having been set free for his freedom to be engaged in infinite hope, accepts the limitations imposed upon his freedom at the social level by all the institutions to which he is subject (and in fact, of course, without making this liberation of his grounds for an unjustifiable conservatism and social petrification), is living for God in a spirit of faith and hope. And this is what the theologian calls the freedom which has been liberated by grace from all earthly powers, and interprets as the true blessing of salvation, regardless of whether the individual concerned consciously recognizes it or not. In this sense the spirit of faith and hope in an absolute future is to be numbered among the prior conditions which alone prevent us from despairing of that freedom which is ever subject to institutional frustrations, and in our despair from destroying it.

THE INSTITUION OF FREEDOM

In speaking of the relationship which exists between institution and freedom there is one further and special secondary kind of institution which calls for special mention. For there are institutions which are created with the special purpose of contributing to freedom by counteracting the effects of other institutions. In earlier ages, when human relationships were, in concrete practice, unalterable, this secondary kind of institution to which we refer, designed to counteract the curtailments of freedom imposed by other institutions, was confined almost exclusively to the sphere of law as such. In this field there were, and still are, officially appointed defending advocates, courts of appeal, and similar institutions. All these are, after all, institutions designed to uphold freedom which are something more than mere forms in which freedom is objectified. Rather they are precisely of a kind designed to defend freedom against other institutions. In other words in them the paradox achieves palpable and explicit form at a secondary level of an institution designed to give freedom. An institution is ex professo set up as a means of counteracting the effects of other institutions as inhibiting freedom. We cannot see why such a thing need necessarily be confined solely to the sphere of the administration of justice as such. Many institutions which do exist might perhaps be better understood in their nature, and improved and made more effective in their functioning, if they were consciously interpreted in the way we have indicated as institutions for safeguarding freedom against the restrictive effects of other institutions. I can only speak in very abstract [120] terms here, but I believe that at the various levels of our society further and new institutions could be created of this kind, which would contribute to freedom in specific areas.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Only an absolute social system, integrating, organizing, and controlling everything within itself, something, therefore, which, in its extreme form would constitute a barefaced tyranny, could prevent legitimate claims to freedom as such from being raised against society itself by groups outside the institutionalized sections of society who felt particularly frustrated in their freedom. It is in these circumstances that the real seeds of a revolution are brought into being. And regardless of the forms in which such a revolution appears or the means which it uses (these may be very different from the ones known from former times), it brings about changes in society which were not previously catered for in it by the relevant institutions which were responsible for bringing such changes about merely by evolutionary methods. Only an absolute tyranny, subsuming and bringing everything under its control, could assert that within its sphere a revolution was from the outset unnecessary and impossible; that it itself constituted the permanent revolution. And because there cannot be any absolute tyranny, it also follows that in any reasonable society, which precisely on this account has never reduced to institutionalized form every conceivable or newly developed possibility for society, it is always possible in principle for a reasonable and justifiable revolution to take place. We older members of society should not in principle deny this merely in order to have the rest we have earned. But although it is impossible already in the here and now to forestall every kind of future claim to a justified revolution by devising institutions within society in its present form, this should not divert our attention from those still unrealized possibilities in a whole range of fields for creating institutions which as such, and as actually acknowledged here and now by society in its existing form, are designed to counteract the effects of other institutions within the same society, and to provide a greater scope for freedom. Such fresh institutions constitute an institutionalized element in social change as such, and thereby are capable of bringing about very much by way of evolution which otherwise would have to be forced upon society by revolution, with all the harm entailed in the use of uncontrollable force. Obviously such institutions, working as they do in favour of freedom to counteract the effects of other institutions, are, or would be, of a secondary order. They are also always liable to succumb to the law of obsolescence, to bureaucratization, to the danger of frustrating their own real purpose in the effort to maintain themselves, to Parkinson's law. And again, [121] institutions of this kind will not bring the kingdom of infinite freedom upon this earth. But we should still ask ourselves where scope can yet be found for such institutions, working for freedom and counterbalancing the other institutions. The representatives and administrators of the primary institutions would be enquired of and appealed to in their wisdom and foresight not to feel that their authority was being limited or inhibited by such secondary institutions. In order to have such wisdom these officials will in turn have to have that spirit of detachment towards the ambivalence and authority of institutions which ultimately speaking is achieved only by that liberation of freedom which comes from God, and which we have sought to point to in what we have said.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[122]

8

EXPERIENCE OF SELF AND EXPERIENCE OF GOD

In view of the magnitude and difficulty of the theme under investigation, it is impossible, within the scope of a brief study such as the present one, to treat of more than a few particular aspects, which have been somewhat arbitrarily chosen. Experience of God and experience of the self each constitute themes in their own right, and in a real and fundamental sense they stand for the totality of human experience and human knowledge, albeit each in its own special way. For when man, the subject, experiences himself as such, he is recognizing himself to be that particular being which is 'quodammodo omnia', not, that is to say, one particular subject among many others at the material level, but that inconceivable being in which the sum total of reality as such achieves realization of itself, so that the only way of fully understanding it would be to achieve an experience and understanding of reality itself. Metaphysical anthropology, therefore, is, on any right understanding of its nature, not one particular department or branch of science among others, but rather that philosophy which is concerned with the being as such, even though it is true that as anthropology this philosophy is attempting to understand the whole of reality from one specific point of departure, namely from that finite subject which is, nevertheless, open to the infinite. Presumably we do not need to justify in any greater detail the proposition that teaching about God does not constitute one particular department or branch of science, but, regarded as teaching about God at the philosophical level, constitutes an ontology as one and total, considered from one particular aspect. But if it is true that a metaphysical anthropology and a philosophical theology constitute, each in its own way, a universal science, then there are still stronger grounds for regarding the question of the mutual interconnection and underlying unity between them once more as a question involving an enquiry into reality in all its aspects.[1] Hence it is [123] obvious that on such a theme, and within the scope of the present study, it is only possible to touch upon it in a few brief and inadequate remarks.

I

Let us begin by drawing attention to the terms in which the subject of this consideration has deliberately been defined: experience of self and experience of God. Thus we have avoided the terms 'knowledge of God' or 'knowledge of self'. This should be enough to indicate from the outset that what we are treating of is that kind of knowledge which is present in every man as belonging essentially to the very roots of cognition in him, and as constituting the starting-point and prior condition for all reflexive knowledge, and for all derived human knowledge in its function of combining and classifying. We are assuming, therefore, that there is such a thing as a passive experience of this kind as a matter of transcendental necessity, an experience so inescapable, in other words, that in its ultimate structures its reality is implicitly asserted in the very act of denying it or calling it in question. In accordance with this, it must be emphasized, with regard to man's experience of himself that we are treating of this here in its initial stages as an unconscious factor in human life, one that

[1] On this cf. the author's 'Reflexions upon Methodology in Theology', Theological Investigations XI (London and New York, 1974), pp. 68-114; also 'Theology and Anthropology', Theological Investigations IX (London, 1972), pp. 28-45, and 'Transzendentaltheo1ogie', Sacramentum Mundi IV (Freiburg, 1969), pp. 986-992.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

is prior to any anthropology (at the philosophical level and as a particular department) in its reflexive and classifying functions, through both of which it exercises the further function of objectifying. Man's experience of himself sustains all such objectifying anthropology, and can never fully be grasped in man's findings as he reflects upon his own nature. Thus it would be justifiable to say that man always experiences more of himself at the non-thematic and non-reflexive levels in the ultimate and fundamental living of his life than he knows about himself by reflecting upon himself whether scientifically or (mainly in his private ideas) non-scientifically. The transcendental orientation of man to the incomprehensible and ineffable Mystery which constitutes the enabling condition for knowledge and freedom, and therefore for subjective life as such, in itself implies a real, albeit a non-thematic experience of God. With regard to this experience of God we must emphasize here above all that it can be so non-thematic, so different from any theology, whether popular or scholarly (whether philosophical or revelational in character) that on the one hand the experience really is present, yet on the other, under certain circumstances, the individual concerned may be ignorant of the very word God. An experience of God of [124] this kind, therefore, is present from the outset in everyday life, even though the individual may be interested in everything else except God. It is also present, although it may be isolated or suppressed, in one who believes himself to be, or wills to be, an atheist. We have drawn a distinction between man's original and non-thematic experience of himself and of God on the one hand, and a knowledge about God and man in which this experience is objectified and interpreted on the other. Obviously in making this distinction we do not dispute that it is both important and inevitable that man must achieve a certain stage of reflexive knowledge (at least of himself as subject). Nor does man's interpretative knowledge of his own experience constitute in its turn an element in the history of man's experience in the concrete. Again when we speak of an experience of man and God we are inevitably using the very abstract term of 'experience', yet what we mean is that concrete developing history of experience in every individual man in his uniqueness and difference from all others, and in the whole length and breadth of an individual human life, different in every case, in which the struggle for conscious knowledge, objectified and explicitated in conscious terms, constitutes only a modest and secondary part of life. And let us further assume for our present purposes that every human experience, and so too that which we are concerned with here, contains within itself a transcendental and a posteriori element of historical development. In this sense it is both subjective and objective at the same time, so that the personal history of life in the concrete is, in virtue of this fact, precisely the personal history of the transcendentality of knowledge and freedom in the individual man. Conversely the only way in which this transcendentality can really achieve its true nature is for it boldly and freely to expose itself to the experience of the undeducible historical development in its a posteriori character, without attempting wholly to detach itself from this history belonging to it by a process of reflecting upon itself.[2]

II

If we are to speak of the experience of self and the experience of God, then the first point to be established is that they constitute a unity. Obviously what we mean by unity here is not simply an absolute identity. For when, [125] in experiencing ourselves as subject, we see ourselves as 'transcendental', even then this 'transcendental' subject is absolutely different

[2] On what follows cf. 'Reflections on the Experience of Grace', Theological Investigations III (London and New York, 1967), pp. 86-90, and, in a different connection, 'The Experience of God Today', Theological Investigations XI (London and New York), pp. 149-165.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

from that which we mean when we speak of 'God'. Even the most radical truth of self-experience recognizes that this subject which we are is finite, even though, precisely as such, and in its sheer transcendentality, it contains an absolute orientation towards the infinite and the inconceivable through which it is this without being identified with it. In other words, therefore, its nature is constituted by something, and experiences itself as so constituted, which it itself must perforce refuse to identify itself with. While, therefore, experience of God and experience of self are not simply identical, still both of them exist within a unity of such a kind that apart from this unity it is quite impossible for there to be any such experiences at all. Constantly both would be lost, each in its own way. This unity implies, of course, not only that every experience of God (like every other knowledge of God) as it exists in the subject is a process in which this subject is at the same time made present to itself and experiences itself. Taken by itself such a unity would in fact still not constitute any characterization of the experience of God as such, for in every spiritual act of knowledge or freedom, whatever it is concerned with, the subject is made present to itself. Or, to put it in Thomas' terms, a 'reditio completa subjecti in seipsum' takes place. The unity between the experience of God and the experience of self is too ultimate and too all-embracing for it to consist solely in the simple fact that, as in every other 'subject' of human knowledge, so too in the knowledge of God, the subject experiences himself at the same time. This unity consists far more in the fact that the original and ultimate experience of God constitutes the enabling condition of, and an intrinsic element in, the experience of self in such a way that without this experience of God no experience of self is possible. In other words the personal history of the experience of God signifies, over and above itself, the personal history of the experience of the self. Of course the point could equally well be formulated the other way round. The experience of self is the condition which makes it possible to experience God. The reason is that an orientation to being in the absolute, and so to God, can be present only when the subject (precisely in the act of reaching out towards being in the absolute) is made present to himself as something distinct from his own act and as the subject of that act. In accordance with this we can then likewise go on to assert: the personal history of experience of the self is the personal history of the experience of God.

All this is certainly something which cannot be said of every 'subject' of experience. It is true that there is no experience of the self without the [126] passive experience of subjects of some kind of an a posteriori character in the personal life of the individual concerned, subjects which are offered to the individual in the course of his life by his environment and his social milieu. To that extent the 'return' to the self necessarily also involves in all cases a 'projection' into the world outside. So much is this the case that true observation of the self at the level of explicit reflection upon oneself (whether scientific or non-scientific) constitutes only a very secondary and supplementary process in the totality of the human experience of the self. Nevertheless the knowledge of a particular individual subject within the world does not constitute the necessary condition enabling man to experience himself or the subject of that projection in which this experience is achieved. Yet without any experience of God, however non-thematic and non-reflexive in character, experience of the self is absolutely impossible. And hence it is, as we have said, that the personal development of experience of the self constitutes the personal development of the experience of God and vice versa.

The unity which exists between experience of God and experience of the self as here understood could of course be made clear in a process of transcendental reflection. Inevitably some of the factors involved in this have already been indicated in what we have said so far. The transcendentality of man in knowledge and freedom, as it reaches up to absolute being, the absolute future, the inconceivable mystery, the ultimate basis enabling absolute love and responsibility to exist, and so genuine fellowship (or whatever other presentation we may like to make in fuller detail of this transcendentality of man) is at the same time the condition

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which makes it possible for the subject strictly as such to experience himself and to have achieved an 'objectification' of himself in this sense all along. But this philosophical argument for the unity between experience of self and experience of God will not be pursued any further in the present context.[3]

In place of this, attention may be drawn to a theological consideration which shows that such apparently remote and abstract lines of thought have, after all, a concrete bearing upon life. The unity between the experience of God and the experience of self is the condition which makes it possible to achieve that unity which theological tradition recognizes as existing between love of God and love of neighbour, and which is of fundamental importance for any right understanding of Christianity.[4] In [127] order to achieve a clearer view of this a preliminary consideration must be included at this point. The only way in which man achieves self-realization is through encounters with his fellow man, a fellow who is rendered present to his experience in knowledge and love in the course of his personal life, one, therefore, who is not a thing or a matter, but a man. Of course an individual experience of self on the part of the subject, taken in isolation and abstracted from the totality of the course of a human life, is conceivable in connection with an individual piece of material 'subject-matter'. In that case 'I come to know something' would be the formal structure of an experience of self of this kind in connection with a piece of 'subject-matter' which, following the custom of the philosophers of old, we conceive of not without reason, as a material object. In reality, however, the situation is different. One's fellow man is not any 'piece of subject-matter', one of many in which the experience of self can be achieved. The true, living, and concrete experience of life which is identical with the experience of self in the concrete has, in relation to its 'pieces of subject-matter', a structure in which not every item has an equal value. Despite the ascendancy nowadays enjoyed by the sciences orientated towards material realities, and which also include man as one such material reality within their area of subject-matter, the experience of life is an experience of one's fellow men, one in which material objects are encountered as elements connected with, and surrounding concrete persons and not otherwise. Life in its full sense is in the concrete achieved in knowledge and freedom in which the 'I' is always related to a 'Thou', arising at the same moment in the 'Thou' as in the 'I', experiencing itself in all cases only in its encounter with the other person by recognizing itself to be different from that other person, and at the same time by identifying itself with that other person. The original objectivity of the experience of self necessarily takes place in the subjectivity of its encounters with other persons in dialogue, in trustful and loving encounter. Man experiences himself by experiencing the other person and not the other thing. Man could not achieve a self-withdrawal from a world consisting exclusively in material objects any more than he could from his own body, the concrete experience of which as it de facto exists also in fact presupposes an encounter with the physicality of other persons. Self-experience is achieved in the unity between it and the experience of other [127] persons. When the latter is harmoniously achieved, the former succeeds as well. He who fails to discover his neighbour has not truly achieved realization of himself either. He is not in any true sense a concrete subject capable of identifying himself with himself, but at most an abstract philosophical subject, and a man who has lost himself. The subject's experience of himself and of the Thou who encounters him, is one and the same experience under two different aspects, and that too not merely in its abstract formal nature, but in its concrete

[3] For a more detailed treatment this cf. 'The Concept of Mystery in Catholic Theology', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 36-73, and also Worte ins Schweigen (Innsbruck, 11th ed., 1972).

[4] On this cf. 'Reflections on the Unity of the Love of Neighbour and the Love of God', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 231-249; The "Commandment" of Love in Relation to the Other Commandments', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 439-459.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

reality as well, in the degree of success or failure with which it is achieved, in its moral quality as an encounter with the real self and with one's fellow in love or hatred. Thus the concrete relationship of the subject to himself is inextricably dependent upon the factor of how a subject encounters his fellow man. Now assuming all this (though this statement of ours constitutes only a cursory adumbration of it) we can now enquire into a further implication of it, one contained in the doctrine of the bible and the Church, namely that love of God and love of neighbour constitute a unity. In other words it follows I from this Christian doctrine that in view of the fact that on the one hand the experience of God and the experience of self are one, and on the other that the experience of self and the encounter with our neighbour are one, that all these three experiences ultimately constitute a single reality with three aspects mutually conditioning one another. Now this also implies the converse, namely that the unity between love of God and love of neighbour is conceivable only on the assumption that the experience of God and the experience of self are one. The unity which exists between experience of self and experience of God, which at first seemed to be formulated and pointed to in purely philosophical terms, is also an implication of that principle, basic to Christianity, that love of God and love of neighbour are one. We must think of these three relationships of the subject to himself, to God, and to his neighbour, not simply as separate from, and existing side by side with one another like the relationships which a single subject bears to another contingent being which he chances to encounter, or to the subject-matter of a posteriori experience. These relationships, on the contrary, are present, as a matter of necessity, all at once, and as mutually conditioning one another, in every act of the subject endowed with intellect and freedom, whatever form this act may assume. Only if we recognize this can we say that the love of neighbour is the fulness of the Law, and that in it the destiny of man as a whole is decided. Only then can we say that man discovers himself or loses himself in his neighbour; that man has already discovered God, even though he may not have any explicit knowledge of it, if only he has truly reached [129] out to his neighbour in an act of unconditional love, and in that neighbour reached out also to his own self. In brief, among many other reasons which might be adduced for the unity of this experience, but which cannot be developed here, there is a theological one too, namely the unity between love of God and love of neighbour. This statement can be maintained in its real and radical significance only if the relationship inherent in every act posited by the subject is extended to God and the neighbour also with the same transcendental necessity as it is to the subject himself, if God and his fellow man (his fellow man in principle and in general, even though this is then concentrated in the concrete other subject whom he encounters as a matter of irreducible contingency in the course of his personal life) constitute not particular factors confined to one area within the total scope of the experience, but are realities present as a matter of transcendental necessity opening up and sustaining the experience in its totality. [5] [5] On attempts to tackle the same question up to 1969 cf. 'Neue Versuche zum Verständnis der Gottesfrage', Herder Korrespondenz 23 (1969), pp. 184-189. The fact that this is a burning issue is shown by the copious literature on the question. Here we can give only a few random references, which, nevertheless, could lead to a work of far greater scope and depths: K. H. Weger, 'Gotteserfahrung in der Glaubensnot', Geist und Leben 39 (1966), pp. 343-354; Kl. Riesenhuber, Existenzerfahrung und Religion (Mainz, 1968); E. Kunz, 'Uberlegungen zur Gotteserkenntnis', Geist und Leben 41 (1969), pp. 86-101; idem, 'Wie kann Gott vom Glaubenden erfahren werden?', ibid., pp. 421-431; W. Kasper, 'Möglichkeiten der Gotteserfahrung heute', ibid., pp. 329-349 R. Egenter, 'Praeambulum fidei. Eine Uberlegung zum christlichen Gotteserlebnis heute', StdZ 185 (1970), pp. 18-26; E. Kunz, Christentum ohne Gott? (Frankfurt, 1971); E. Coreth, 'Weltverständnis und Gottesverständnis', Atheismus kritsch betrachtet, E. Coreth and J. B. Lotz edd. (Freiburg and Munich, 1971).

III

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

A further point, following from what we have said, is that the personal history of the experience of self is in its total extent the history of the ultimate experience of God itself also. The history of knowledge of God at the consciously explicitated level is merely one particular and secondary element in this. But once we go beyond considering the unity of the experience of the self in formal and abstract terms and consider it is its concrete reality, it becomes in itself an anthropological problem of the utmost obscurity. For, in accordance with our basic thesis, it must also have its effect upon the history of the experience of God and its unity. The true and full unity of the history of the experience of self cannot consist [130] merely in the fact that the subject endowed with spiritual faculties experiences himself at every moment in his self-realization as 'subject to time', i.e. as in the abstract orientated towards past and future in general. The unity of the concrete history of the experience of self to which we refer – in other words, therefore, the enduring possession of one's own personal history – cannot have its basis solely in what we call, in a popular and superficial sense, our memory. This cannot be the case seeing that then there would no longer be any abiding unity in the history of the experience of the self, any identity of the subject with his own past in relation to the earlier occurrences in his life. This remains true even though we do not overlook the fact that the potential memory as upheld by the material organism in man (the 'brain') is far greater than the total range of items which we can actualize from it at will. For only if this potential memory in man were present in every part of the material organism in itself alone (in a way similar to that in which the genetic code is present in every cell of the organism), something which it seems impossible to accept, could we think of the identity of the subject with his own past history of experience of the self, and thereby the unity of this history, as having its basis solely in this potential memory. This unity of the history of the experience of self, and the abiding identity of the subject with it, does not in any sense need in principle to be extended to all and every occurrence which has actually taken place in physical concrete fact in such a history. This is something which can never be demanded of a philosophy of the material as such, even abstracting from the question of whether a factor in the history of an individual can and must also have a permanence which cannot be lost even when it has never entered his awareness. A real state of belonging to the past is inherent in the material as such if it is regarded purely in itself, and to the extent that in viewing it in this way we really do see something which objectively belongs to it in itself. To that extent we can confidently conclude that there can be occurrences in man's history of experiencing himself too, which at least as such totally disappear, as such no longer exist, with the result that it would be totally impossible and meaningless to assert any abiding identity of the subject with them. There is a further question, namely, over and above what we have said, how the unity of the history of the experience of self, the abiding nature of this history, and the identification of the subject with his own history, should be thought of in further detail as prior to the freedom inherent in this history. But this is a question with which we shall not concern ourselves any further in the present context.

But there is a further and special question to which we must draw [131] attention, that namely of how the unity of this history of the experience of self is to be conceived of if, and to the extent that, it constitutes a history of freedom, in other words of the free self-interpretation of man. For this question is of special importance in its bearing upon the unity of the history of the experience of God. The freedom in which the history of the experience of self is achieved cannot, it is true, eliminate the identity of man with his own past history, in other words a unity of the history of his experience of self which is not subject to man's own decision. In other words in the decree posited by human freedom man cannot so detach himself from his former history that this no longer affects him in any way whatsoever, even if this freedom of the past (in 'conversion', as repentance, or even as guilt) can undergo very real re-interpretations. Nevertheless freedom does introduce certain radical caesuras into the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

abiding unity of any such history of understanding of the self or experience of the self. So long as the single personal history of freedom belonging to the individual man endures, it is exposed, for all the unity and permanence inherent in it, to the constant possibility of fresh interpretation through the exercise of man's own freedom. At any moment in the here and now past history may be rendered present through the freedom of man in the form of a free identification of the subject with it, in the form of explicit rejection of it, in the form of unconscious yet free suppression of it, in the form of culpable and lying re-interpretation, and so on. This is all a line of argument that cannot be further developed here. But in the light of our basic thesis it is immediately clear that in saying this we are also saying something of decisive importance about the history of the ultimate and basic experience of God, when we conceive of this not at the abstract and formal level but in its concrete reality. The history of the experience of self, i.e. of man's interpretation of himself as achieved in freedom, is eo ipso the history of his experience of God as well, and vice versa. The destruction of false idols, the act of attaining, or failing to attain, a state of transcendence over all reality definable in terms of particular categories and also reality as the necessary starting-point for our knowledge of God, extending up to the Mystery which is beyond all our conceiving or achieving, man's surrender of himself, constant yet ever renewed, to the inconceivable God, or the refusal of such surrender in a lying self-sufficiency – these and many other episodes in the history of the experience of God are eo ipso events directly belonging to the history of the experience of the self as such as well and vice versa.

A complete and exact table might be drawn up of the correspondences between the one history and the other, because what is in question here is [132] simply two aspects of one and the same history of experience. Such a table, which it is of course impossible to set forth here, would be very necessary precisely today. For in this way it might be possible for modern man, for whom all explicit statements about God fall all too easily under ideological distrust, to have it brought home to him that whether he wants it or not, in the changing history of his relationship with himself (whether in trustful acceptance of himself in loss of identity, in hatred towards himself, in love for his fellow man, and only in this for himself, despite all his sceptical experience of the fragility and unreliability of finite man etc.) that he has all along been living through a history of his experience of God. With such a table it would be possible constantly to translate and describe an anthropology at the existential level and also in concrete human life, primarily in the form of teaching about the experience of God and ipso facto in this in a theology. It could be shown that in the history of experience of the self the experience of the loss of identity (to the extent and in the manner in which such a thing is possible, since in fact even that which is lost still always remains present in its own way) is also (in the same sense and with the same provisos) a loss of the experience of God or the refusal to accept the abiding experience of God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[133]

9

DOES TRADITIONAL THEOLOGY REPRESENT GUILT AS INNOCUOUS AS A FACTOR IN HUMAN LIFE?

Nowadays an attempt is being made to unmask the problem of guilt, and to show that in reality it is an apparent, rather than a real, problem.[1] In the present context no attempt will be made either to set forth or to analyze the lines of argument for this process of unmasking the problem which are usually followed today. Again there is a question which in itself is of the utmost interest (and, moreover, one which has hardly been considered within theology itself), namely this: on the hypothesis that these unmasking processes are in fact justified, would it not be quite impossible for any such phenomenon as guilt to exist at all – in other words do not the arguments put forward in these attempts to show guilt to be an unreal problem prove simply too much about something that is a basic phenomenon of human life, and therefore is it not quite impossible for them to be correct, seeing that on any serious view they are wholly incapable of going on to explain how any such 'apparent problems' can arise at all? But the question which we are posing here is both [134] different from, and far more unusual than these. It is a question of whether attempts at showing that guilt is in reality an innocuous phenomenon in this sense are not to be found within classic Christian theology as well, even though it itself is not fully aware of the fact.

At first sight the thesis does not seem a particularly reasonable one. In reply to it it might straightway be objected that it would be impossible for any such attempts seriously to be made within Christian theology. After all Christianity is a religion of Redemption, and is rooted in an event in which the real guilt incurred by man's acts, and from which he cannot escape, is removed by the deed of God alone, So true is it, in fact, that Christianity is the religion which views man as radically subject to guilt, to malice and not merely to evil, that it would have to abandon its own essential nature if it sought itself to deny the reality of malice or in any sense to unmask it as an apparent, rather than a real, problem. Yet the matter is not so simple, if only because of the following factor: there is always a difference between living practical devotion (which invariably includes some elements of which we are not fully aware), and a fully reflexive theology. And because of this difference even when theories are put forward by the upholders of this devotion tending to suggest that guilt is unreal, there is a stage at which such theories are not yet perceived to have this implication. Later, however (after a long period during which they have been at least tolerated by the Church's authorities), such theories can have a devastating effect in the concrete living practice, the devotion, and the life of the Church. In fact such theories have already been taking effect over a long period in contexts outside the Christianity of the Church (for secular heresies can be

[1] The problem of evil, sin, and guilt has been approached in recent times from the most diverse aspects. The following bibliography is intended merely to give some indication of this multiplicity, and so at least provide some idea of the background against which the essay which follows has to be viewed. B. Welte, Über das Böse, Quaestiones Disputatae 6 (Freiburg, 1958); H. Boelaers, 'Ist jede schwere Sünde eine Todsünde?', Theol. der Gegenwart 3 (1963), pp. 142-148; K. Lorenz, On Aggression (trans. by M. Latzke, London, 1966); K. Rahner, 'Guilt and Its Remission: the Borderland Between Theology and Psychotherapy', Theological Investigations II (London, 1963), pp. 265-282; P. Schoonenberg, Theologie der Sünde (Einsiedeln, 1966); M. Adam, Le sentiment du péché, Etude de psychologie (Paris, 1967); B. Schüller, 'Todsünde – Sünde zum Tod?', Theologie und Philosophie 42 (1967), pp. 321-340; K. Hemmerle, 'Evil', Sacramentum Mundi II (London and New York, 1968), pp. 279-283 (with bibliography); K. E. O'Shea, 'The Reality of Sin; A Theological and Pastoral Critique', Theol. Studies 29 (1968), pp. 241-259 M. Oraison, Was ist Sünde? (Frankfurt, 1968); F. Böckle, 'Das Problem der Sünde', Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie IV (Freiburg, 1969), pp. 115-127.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the logical and open outcome in radical form of heresies that secretly propagate themselves within the Church).

In this sense, therefore, the theme we have put forward may perhaps repay consideration after all. But our consideration of it will not proceed from the tacit assumption that such heretical views secretly propagating themselves, in which malice is regarded as apparent rather than real, certainly do exist in the theology of the Church. Throughout our investigation we shall fully be taking into account the possibility that the classical theology of the schoolmen may in itself turn out to be (in a positive sense) more penetrating than the average feeling of the 'devotees' in the Church, and may actually have undertaken a justified 'demythologizing' of ideas of guilt which, as they exist in the average practice of the Church, have never ceased to contain a strongly 'mythical' element. Obviously it is impossible, in brief considerations of this kind, to provide [136] a record of the history of theology involved. All that we can do is to offer a few very basic reflections on what we actually find in the average outlook of the official theology of today.

It seems to me that any considerations we may put forward on the theme we have defined involve one basic difficulty: that the 'factor' being pointed to in the thesis we are seeking to defend is itself precisely lacking in clarity. What is guilt? Under what circumstances is guilt 'rendered innocuous'? Under what circumstances is its 'character as absolute' threatened or overlooked? It is relatively easy to counter any modern attempts to 'do away with' guilt by pointing out that once a relationship to that which is called God, freely entered into by man, is declared by the 'enlightened' to be a misconception (whether on positivist, sociological, existential, or any other grounds) it is evident that there is no such thing as 'guilt' in the sense upheld by Christianity and the Church. And conversely the fact that Christians do dispute this 'declaration by the enlightened' is itself an argument in support of the proposition that there is such a thing as guilt, something which actually exists, from which man does not liberate himself of his own resources (in the form either of enlightenment or progress), something which, on the contrary, if it can be removed from man at all, is removed by being forgiven him. Admittedly in any such argument in defence of the reality of guilt, in which we contest the assumption on which the opponent of guilt bases his case, we must not overlook the fact that in any intellectual position as it exists in the concrete the proposition we 'assume' as our basis is already conditioned by the conclusion we feel justified in drawing from it. To put it in concrete terms, we shall hardly be in a position to understand what is meant by God without freely accepting the attitude that guilt is possible.

But how are we to take the field against the outlook which we presume to exist within Christianity itself and which regards guilt as unreal? Nowhere here do we find any denial either of God or of the existence of a possible guilt in his sight (which at least to this extent has a certain absolute character). What, therefore, is there to contest, apart, perhaps, from a few theologumena of the official theology which do not in any sense touch upon the Christian attitude to guilt as it really exists in the concrete? Admittedly the opposite might equally well be the case. The doctrine of guilt which, taken as a whole, is orthodox, might be the façade behind which lies concealed an attitude of unbelief towards guilt which, though unexplicitated, is nonetheless a real factor in 'concrete life'. (Who nowadays is still subject to the 'Angst' of going to hell?) Is it perhaps possible that precisely this unbelief could betray itself through this or that detail [136] in the orthodox teaching (if we were, so to say, to lay this teaching on the psychoanalyst's couch and pay rather closer attention to the remarks thrown up from time to time in what it then had to say)? Or again, this orthodox teaching might be subjected to questioning with regard to such details in it by those who feel a certain astonishment and doubt, and who would like to ask it why, as a matter of concrete living practice, it has become so ineffective nowadays, and whether the underlying reasons for this might not, after all, be discovered within itself.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Our line of investigation will be as follows: we shall draw elements from certain theories, the orthodoxy of which has either been recognized in officially accepted theology, or at any rate not disputed. With the help of these we shall attempt to present an argument against 'guilt feelings' or in support of the 'demythologizing' of guilt. Thus we shall produce an 'enlightened explanation' of guilt which (at least to all outward appearances) is drawn from within theology itself yet which, when pressed to its radical conclusions, must be pronounced false when it is submitted to the judgement of the Christian conscience. In this way we shall be able to see what consequences follow (at least incipiently) from pressing a genuine theology of guilt to its radical conclusion in this way, or what context such a theology of guilt must be viewed in in order to find an interpretation for it such that we do not have to regard it as a false demythologizing of guilt.

The line of argument adopted in a Christian case for the defence of this kind, supporting the utmost possible exculpation of man, might run as follows: there is no guilt or, if this sounds too imprudent and heretical, guilt is a 'peripheral concept' in the sense that in practice it does not arise or (to put it still more prudently) not in any notable degree or one which is relevant to the world and history as a whole. Rather it is something which, for various reasons (of which we shall have to speak at a later stage) cannot totally be eliminated from human awareness as an idea, a threat, a stimulus, even though the 'poison' of this idea should be used for purposes of a psychological and social hygiene with the utmost prudence and (quite otherwise than in former times) in the very mildest doses. This is the basic thesis put forward in this case for the defence.

What we mean by 'guilt' here is an (in se) definitive state into which man enters of his own freedom, and of which he cannot rid himself of his own resources, yet which sets him in contradiction to his own nature as a whole and (thereby) to God and to the relationship which in itself he has decided to bear to man. This state of contradiction is such that it leads to the final and definitive 'perdition' of man as a whole (or alternatively [137] actually constitutes this perdition). It is as a (fictitious) argument in support of this conception of guilt, therefore, that we have put forward the above thesis.

The first point: we are here assuming the existence of freedom (in a psychologically indeterminate sense), but such freedom is finite. This is a point which the theologian is least of all in a position to deny. But what this finitude of freedom implies in terms of content is becoming clearer today than it formerly was, and the moral theologian nowadays takes this factor freely into account. He recognizes the physiological, psychological, and social factors which condition the choice that is made within the scope of finite freedom. Man as he de facto exists is restricted in his knowledge by these conditioning factors, so that only a finite number of objects[2] is open to him to choose from. It is perfectly conceivable – indeed more that probable – that this limited number of options which it is open to him to know and freely to choose from, is in turn far more restricted by the following circumstance. It is very far from being the case that all the objects impinging in any way upon the awareness of the individual within the total scope of his conscious awareness are ipso facto so 'attractive' to him that they are capable in any real sense of constituting genuine objects of choice. Now in no concrete individual case (whether by the individual concerned reflecting upon himself or by external observation) is it possible to establish in the concrete with any certainty whether precisely in the concrete case this extremely restricted finite number of objects of choice available on any given occasion include among them that which constitutes the 'objective' good (that which is willed by God). This is something which cannot naïvely be taken for [2] Here of course we are speaking only of realities constituting the subject-matter of knowledge and freedom which – as capable of being freely realized – constitute 'options' to the subject endowed with freedom to choose and to decide upon.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

granted without further ado. It is perfectly possible that in specific cases the objects of choice de facto available in the concrete include only those which are objectively bad. Even then the individual will regard one such object of choice as the 'better' one, i.e. as constituting the better choice in comparison with some other possible object from this or that point of view. Again, it is still possible to say in such a case that someone has the moral duty to choose the lesser evil in preference to the greater. But this does not alter the fact that in such cases something which, objectively speaking, does constitute an evil course will be taken in virtue of the fact that in the concrete the individual concerned has no real objective good within his purview. And again it is extremely questionable whether in such a case in [138] the concrete that which constitutes the lesser evil is so distinctive and so important that a moral significance is to be attached to the act of preferring it to all other options. Now if this is so then is the individual really 'responsible' in such cases as these? Can something significant really be taking place here? And even supposing that an 'objective' good is recognized as possible (obviously this is the case in unnumerable instances) still in the concrete instance it remains open whether the individual can freely choose it or whether it is present merely as an object of a 'choice' which is already predetermined (from a physiological, psychological, or sociological aspect). The same applies a fortiori to something that is recognized as evil. In each concrete instance it remains open to question whether a particular option is present to the individual's awareness at all, whether it is present in its moral relevance precisely as evil, and whether as it exists in the concrete (as evil) it is present to the individual as a real object of free choice. It might be argued that after all the question of whether this or that specific object of choice is present to the individual's awareness, and is chosen by him in freedom, is something that can be established beyond doubt simply enough by a straightforward act of self-introspection. But to this we would have to reply that a free choice of one specific individual object at a level beyond all doubt, and as present to the subject's awareness as something actually reflected upon by him, is something that we precisely do not have. The individual act of freedom as such, and precisely as an individual act, is not a direct datum of the individual's awareness, if only for this reason: the fact that no determinative motive (object of choice) is present precisely so far as the subject's own objectifying and reflexive awareness is concerned is still not in itself any proof that no such motive exists. It may still be present and effective even though the subject has not objectified it to himself or reflected upon it. (The philosophically valid 'proof' of the existence of freedom can and must be established in a quite different way, and one which we shall not be entering into here. For this proof we do not need to rely upon the individual act of freedom as such, and as directly present to the subject's awareness as such. Hence in order to prove the existence of freedom we do not have to be able to assert that freedom, together with a specific moral value, is certainly present in any one particular act.) At basis all this is theologically clear. If it were indeed the case that by a simple process of self-reflection (subsequently and finally reinforced by the observations of another too) it were possible to establish the free character and (thereby) the moral quality of a given act with complete certainty, then we would likewise be able to achieve complete certainty about our relationship with [139] God in each concrete individual case with regard to our 'state' of justification or mortal sin (which, as we are told, we incur only when in possession of clear knowledge and full freedom). And a knowledge of this kind is precisely what we do not have. The genuine Christian attitude towards God forbids us to seek a completely sure and fully conscious knowledge of precisely how we stand in God's sight. It prescribes that we shall endure, in a spirit of hope and not otherwise, the uncertainty to which our reflections upon our interior state are subject, even as, in the non-reflective movement of the practical reason (despite the claims of the speculative reason to act as judge), we reach out in hope towards that future which is constituted by the 'compassion' of God. But then we ask precisely, Does not this make guilt an extremely

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

questionable phenomenon? Now there is a certain transcendent awareness of freedom prior to the specific individual act of freedom – prior, that is, in a logical and existential sense, not in a temporal one or as immediately preceding it. But whatever the nature of this knowledge may be, and while recognizing that the question of guilt or lack of guilt is in all concrete cases insoluble, we do hold that every Christian must from the first, without 'judging' himself, flee from himself in a spirit of hope in God's compassion; in fact that every individual must capitulate before God as simul justus et peccator (a formula which retains its justification and its truth throughout the whole of Christendom and beyond all theological controversies and differences of opinion). Now if this is true then is not the question of guilt in the concrete individual case (guilt, let us note, in the theological, and not the' civil' sense), if not actually eliminated, at least left behind from the very outset? On this showing is not guilt reduced to a mere peripheral concept (again in a theological and not in a civil sense), seeing that every individual can and must take into account guilt of this kind at the unreflecting level, and every individual can and must hope for forgiveness to the extent that it really is guilt in God's sight that is in question and not some deed in which he had transgressed the laws of this world and can be called to account by the civil authorities?

Can we not go further and say that the biblical doctrine of the punishment of hell (as presented in the literary genre known as the 'threatening sayings') are nowadays so conceived of that, while they do indeed express a real possibility, they tell us nothing as to whether this final and definitive perdition will truly be realized as a matter of historical fact. It might of course be objected that regarded as a hope in the concrete conditions of human living rather than as a theoretical statement, this does not rule out the de facto incurring of grave guilt (but only its final and definitive [140] outcome). But in reply we in turn might put the question of whether on this showing too such guilt is not rendered innocuous, seeing that it is 'in principle' denied that it will ever arrive at this definitive outcome (even though this is based on the universality of hope and not on any theological principles of the theoretical reason). The question might be raised of what kind of 'possibility' (of eternal loss) this really is, seeing that on the one hand it must be something seriously to be taken into account by man (with the seriousness due to something that affects his entire existence), and which he has to, and indeed must, resist with the no less total and radical resolution of his hope. Is not the situation really that this hope, which is asserted to be so radical and universal (and unless it is this can it be the theological virtue of hope?) has the function of unmasking the 'guilt' in the world (not at the theoretical level but in the concrete practice of life) as a mere façade[3] – something, precisely, which is invariably overcome by hope? Must it not be unmasked as an apparent hopelessness in which we suppose that we know for certain precisely that in many cases history does, despite all, end in the radical contradiction of perdition, a perdition which, nevertheless is, when viewed in the true light of hope, meaningless even in relation to God? For he certainly has no need of this in order to manifest his 'righteousness', as an officially approved seminary theology, prevalent in many Christian denominations, impertinently believes that it can recognize (though it cannot invoke the support of Scripture for this, seeing that for Scripture such a revelation is merely the means of revealing grace, and that in the case supposed it would cease to have this function). Nor yet should we say that freedom in relation to God can only exist if guilt also exists as really incurred in God's sight. This is in fact often asserted in a popular apologetics of God's 'right' to 'tolerate' guilt. But ultimately speaking it is in contradiction to the basic conviction of all theological schools in Christendom, all of which are convinced that God can, in all cases without exception, of [3] What we mean here is a 'transcendental' appearance which is constantly there, and therefore has constantly to be overcome. But we do not mean a misunderstanding to be removed once and for all by explanations, so that it finally and definitely ceases as soon as we become a little more enlightened.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

himself predestine the goodness of the creature as free, if he wills it so, without thereby inhibiting the freedom and responsibility of the creature endowed with intellect and will. Now if this is correct, then it becomes difficult, to say the least, to understand what real (as distinct from merely verbal) distinction should then seriously be drawn between a mere 'tolerating' of freely committed evil (if we are to regard this as really existing!) on God's part and an actual [141] 'willing' of moral goodness and of finite evil in the non-moral sense within the world. For must we not in all honesty say that to 'tolerate' something is actually to 'will' it if it is within one's power to prevent it, and that too without inhibiting the quality of freedom inherent in the action involved? Let us consider the various theories of the traditional theological schools with regard to the relationship between God and human freedom. Where here do we find any real distinction between tolerating and willing, seeing that the entire concrete reality of the human act is also actively brought about by God? Furthermore, let us consider the negative element in this positive and real act. Where do we find any room for a distinction between 'tolerating' and 'willing' here, seeing that the only way in which this negative element can exist is in virtue of the concrete causality of this positive element, seeing that the free act of the man willing this negative element, considered in its positivity as an act, also comes into being only in virtue of an active collaboration on God's part? And the question which then arises is whether the impossibility of this distinction between 'tolerating' and 'willing' which then imposes itself so strongly does not after all permit us to conclude that an evil presumed to be radical is in reality merely an evil which God is capable of willing in, and in collaboration with, a finite world.

But from other aspects too the question can be posed of whether traditional theology does not engage in something like an argument designed to deprive guilt of its force. What we mean is the doctrine that the formal evil of guilt is something 'privative', a privation of being. This is the principle which Augustine used successfully in order to overcome Manichaeism. And this thesis has continued to belong to the common stock of Catholic theology right down to the present day. But do the devout take this thesis seriously, and conversely, if this thesis is in fact taken seriously (i.e. not merely invoked when questions of theodicy arise, but rather accorded an integral place in our conception of guilt as a factor in our concrete lives), does guilt still continue to be guilt? There are certain questions which, though they are certainly not easy to answer, must be wholly set on one side here. The questions namely of what a 'privatio' really and precisely is in ontological and ontic terms, inasmuch as it is different from a simple state of non-being. And even if we recognize this distinction as valid beyond doubt, and take it with all due seriousness (the state of 'having been robbed' cannot as such simply be nothing), still there is a further question with regard to the thesis of the non-being of malitia formalis: whether its ostensible meaning does not conceal a further underlying intention with regard to God and his [142] collaborating with the action of his creature. Since on any showing God does actively collaborate at that point at which the distinction between mere non-being and 'privatio' is constituted as real, an explanation must be found, so it is felt, in which we do not have to attribute to God and his 'active collaboration' with his creature in its action the causing of the evil which the creature commits. In any case, however, in order not to attribute this to God by upholding the thesis of the non-being of malitia formalis, we would have to raise a further question with regard to the real and positive action causing some deficiency which should not be the case to be produced from something which should be the case through something which has been brought about (whether an act or the outcome of an act). The question is, therefore, whether this real and positive action is nothing but good, or whether it itself is ipso facto morally evil because of what it brings about. In the first case the whole matter becomes totally incomprehensible. Something that is good and nothing more brings about something that is morally evil. In the second case the whole question recurs afresh unresolved. On this showing, then, two

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

conclusions may be reached with regard to the thesis itself: It may be (a) an instance of a wrongly applied conceptual model. We recognize the possibility of something that is good in a pre-moral sense yet which might be better. It lacks some further goodness which we can imagine, but which does not belong to it as a reality, as 'existing', though this does not mean that even without it the thing concerned is evil. Now we apply this conceptual model to the question of moral evil. The 'deficiency' then seems to constitute a mere 'non-being' in this case also. But we are overlooking the fact that on this showing only two alternatives are open to us with regard to the moral evil: either it too is as innocuous as the lack of some further goodness in the original conceptual model, or the true evil lies in the objective origins of this deficiency and the question arises afresh. We may, however, take a second line of argument: (b) basically speaking, all that we intend to assert in this thesis is that when a free creature uses its freedom to act culpably it cannot on this account make God ipso facto responsible for its deed on the grounds that he sustains and causes all that exists. And this remains true even though this thesis does not explain why we cannot make God responsible for our faults in this way. With regard to this thesis, all that we are doing is (rightly) to maintain that God's effective activity is present all-pervasively throughout the whole of existence. But even if the thesis is taken in this sense, i.e. as having the function not of explaining evil but merely of maintaining its reality, a further question which can then be raised is whether there can still be any place for evil once we recognize [143] this all-pervasive effectiveness of God's act which brings about everything that exists, and at the same time assigns everything its due limits and boundaries. The situation seems to be such that we must either hold a theism which reduces evil to unreality in view of the all-pervasiveness of God's effective activity, or (conversely) we are driven to a position of hypothetical atheism in order to maintain the reality of evil as a radical factor in existence. Evil seems no longer to be evil if it can be tolerated by a God of absolute moral perfection, even though he can prevent it and, moreover (a point which we have already made and which needs to be carefully noticed!), without withdrawing or diminishing creaturely freedom. For according to all Catholic theories of grace and freedom genuine freedom is both freedom in the fullest sense and at the same time absolutely under God's disposing power (whether through a praemotio physica or by way of scientia media). It might be rejoined that what has just been said means merely that God himself has a radical attitude towards evil proper to him alone, such that, if the creature were to claim it for himself, this would imply the absolute presumption of claiming to be God, and further that this distinction between the two attitudes (of God and of the creature) towards evil is simply a further explicitation, application, and radicalization of the absolute difference which prevails between God and the creature, between his and our attitudes to everything whatsoever (being, time, individual reality etc.). But to this we in turn might reply: precisely this statement in fact confirms that what we are stating about evil is stated with reference to ourselves, and not to God. In other words, evil is radically evil in this sense only because, and to the extent that it is related to ourselves, who are finite, whereas in its relation to God evil is precisely not as evil as this. But if this is true then who can really prevent the creature from knowing precisely this (it actually asserts it!), and thereby ascribing to evil a relative status in relation to itself as well, placing itself in the position of God (there is in fact some echo of this even in Rom. 6: 1) first at the theoretical level and then at the practical level too. i.e. in practice how can we still be afraid when we know that through the evil which we do we are playing a part which fits perfectly into the total symphony which God conducts, at least from his point of view, and which at least to his ears sounds sweet? For does not traditional theology from Paul onwards maintain that God, at least so far as he is concerned, is able to use the evil to initiate something, e.g. he can use it as the prior condition for his grace, for the revelation of his righteousness etc.? With regard to the creature endowed with intellect and will who is able to make this assertion, how can he still be afraid for himself, seeing [144]

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

that after all it is actually asserted that through evil God has performed a kindness? How can evil still be evil in any effective sense?

To this line of argument Paul has only one reply: μη_ γε&νοιτο (Rom. 6:1). But we still do not find any arguments supporting this disclaimer in his writings. But what arguments can be found on which to base it? Is it enough to say this: Constituting as he does a finite spirit which is, nevertheless, open to the infinite, man is precisely such that he knows about God (and therefore too about that relationship to evil which is unique to himself) and nevertheless (nevertheless!) precisely as such man is not God (and so too does not have the same relationship to evil as God has)? Is this answer enough? Is it enough precisely in view of the fact that after all in traditional theology we regard our relationship to evil (if it is a correct one) precisely as a unilinear extension and reproduction of the relationship which God has to evil? If we have to say that we ourselves can have a less 'relativist' relationship to evil than God has (and this is really what is said by Paul and by traditional theology when it recognizes that God can tolerate evil in order to reveal his justice and his mercy), can we then still really maintain the reality of this knowledge if the state of affairs which is expressed here not only exists but is also precisely something of which we ourselves are aware? Does not the fact that we are aware of it at basis reduce evil to unreality? And when a man does evil is he not acting upon this ultimate reduction of evil to unreality when he – so it seems – does evil in the awareness that there is an ultimate reasonableness in so acting? It can still only have a good outcome.

The way in which traditional theology tends to represent evil as innocuous – of course always clean contrary to its own real intention – can be viewed from a completely different aspect. Has it ever occurred to the exponents of this theology to be surprised at the fact that they are ascribing to God the power of forgiving and removing evil? Should not the very, first point to be recognized be that the very nature of human freedom is such that in all cases once a free agent takes a decision, if and to the extent that his freedom is fully exercised in arriving at it, the only way in which it can be rescinded is by himself, always provided that this process of a free decision rescinding a free decision is not itself in turn contrary to the very nature of human freedom as a finite created entity? Tradition theology finds an easy way of answering this question by saying that obviously the agent endowed with finite freedom must himself be converted and 'repent', otherwise any divine forgiveness is of its very nature impossible (incidentally even in this statement we can see that tradition theology is wavering in that to some extent it regards this proposition as [145] valid merely at the de facto level, and not as something that necessarily follows from the very nature of freedom itself). But if the free agent himself must be converted in order to remove the evil he has done, why then is there any need for a distinct and separate act of divine forgiveness? Why can this conversion take place only during earthly life, before or at the moment of death? Can we find an answer to the first question by invoking the example of an injured party who must of his own initiative grant forgiveness even when the offender from his side decides not to continue his offence? For we can at least ask whether an offence against God still continues to be such, and therefore requires to be forgiven by him, when man, by his repentance, removes the offence which (ex supposito) he has committed against God. Those who wish to protest against this general line of argument must allow the question to be put to them of whether they are not falsely transferring from the conceptual model, and introducing into the theological consideration, a concept of time and certain social factors (unconnected with man's intrinsic make-up) which basically speaking either assert or tacitly assume that the offence against God is, as a free act of man, finally and definitively posited and so in itself definitive and irremovable in the sense that it can be removed only by God (precisely as God and not merely as any sort of injured party) for reasons which are quite beyond our conception (and through resources which belong only to God as God), and moreover

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

precisely in that he extends to man the possibility of repentance. And the only way of avoiding an extremely anthropomorphic and decretorial way of thinking about God is to deepen our theology even of biological death, unless we are willing to accept the doctrine of the transmigration of souls as providing a conception of man's moral development and of the history of freedom leading to a final and definitive state as more in accordance with God's nature, the more so since in fact any transmigration of souls must be conceived of as a never-ending process. In the light of these two questions alone it seems that it is only with great difficulty that we can arrive at a position which really lies between asserting that every radical exercise of freedom is absolute and definitive on the one hand, and asserting that every particular fault is simply provisional and to be regarded as a stage which man both can and should pass beyond in his moral development on the other.

Whatever position may in fact be adopted on these two questions, which are far from easy to answer, a further question which must in any case be raised is whether God really can remove evil by an act of forgiveness. This is all too easily assumed to be obvious. Any genuine and radical phenomenology of the human awareness of guilt both can and must bring [146] out clearly the experience of the radical inescapability of guilt. It can and must show how real guilt is experienced as that which can no longer be made good (once there has been any effective betrayal of love how can the former position be restored? etc.). God would, therefore, precisely per definitionem, have to be postulated as he who can in some sense remove an irremovable and inescapable guilt of this kind despite its irremovability. (We may conceive of him either as one who simply adds his forgiveness to the sinner's repentance or as one who alone can make such repentance possible.) In recognizing the phenomenon of guilt and in hoping that it can, in spite of all, be removed, we must not simply take God for granted, but reach out to him, rather, as the factor which makes it possible to have such hope at all. Can we not say that in this respect too traditional theology tends to render the phenomenon of guilt innocuous, seeing that it takes the possibility of its forgiveness far too much for granted?

Let us approach the problems indicated above of regarding evil as a 'privatio' in a somewhat different form. For the same reasons as those which prompt it to conceive of evil as privatio, traditional theology lays down that evil can be willed only sub ratione boni. All evil-doing, therefore, in the concrete conditions of human life, takes place, according to this doctrine, as the outcome of a transcendental willing of the good as such and in general to the extent that the impulse of the human spirit towards good in general takes effect through the medium of the specific concrete exercise of knowledge and freedom (in the form of a concrete free decision), and is prompted by some finite (or conceived to be finite) particular good which precisely should not be aimed at here and now and in the particular circumstances in which it occurs, since to do so constitutes a denial of some higher concrete particular good which should be aimed at here and now, and thereby constitutes a voluntary denial of that good at the universal level and as a whole which we must constantly strive for as a matter of necessity. The will to the good, therefore, is present and active in all human actions, even those in which evil is done. And to the extent that this will to good in general and as a whole is still being exercised even in the free act which is directed towards some concrete particular good or evil (or one conceived of at this level), this will to the good in general and as a whole always still remains a free will. On this basis the evil is properly speaking only a certain misconception (if it exists at all) in the process taking place at the concrete particular level by which the free will to the good as such, for blessedness as such (considered in its formal structure) is mediated. If evil is conceived of somewhat along these lines is it so evil? On this showing is it not ipso facto constantly being corrected by the [147] fact that further effects follow from man's striving in any given case through the necessary alterations in living situations necessarily imposed upon the individual, which make it quite impossible for him to hold firm to this or that particular good (which in the concrete circumstances is interpreted as evil)? Does not life gently withdraw from man that which he eagerly seeks to retain ('But only wait . . .'), and does not man himself in the end (at latest in the moment of death) willingly relinquish that which is thus withdrawn from him, that which, if he either could or would cling fast to it and finally and definitively opt for, could be called evil? Of course we can put forward the postulate that even while ultimately and definitively protesting against something, a man can still use his freedom to cling onto it, and that it is precisely through this that he is brought to a final and definitive state of inner conflict in which he is torn between two goals, that which as free he clings onto obstinately, and that which constitutes his true good. But is it probable that this in fact often happens, in view of the infinitely powerful yet gentle pedagogy of death, regarded as man's farewell to every concrete particular good which he has really possessed? And is that particular good, so perversely clung onto in the individual act (so that it comes to be called evil), of such importance in the economy and history of the world when we compare it with the immense multitude of evils which are not the outcome of free acts, and which constitute the major part of human history? In fact we must not exaggerate the significance of guilt (so the argument might run) in order to eliminate such guilt as far as possible from the world, if only because, as it may be presumed, the total amount of evil de facto arising from such guilt in a world in which this metaphysical and theological interpretation applies will hardly be smaller than in a world which rejects such an interpretation. At least it will not be diminished within the sphere of actual human experience. The total amount of evil in the world arising from guilt seems to remain more or less constant throughout, in the course of history to vary in the forms it assumes rather than in its degree of intensity, and to be held in check by factors arising from the limited resources of human nature, factors, therefore, belonging to the physical and social, rather than to the moral order in any true sense of the term. On this showing, then, is not the concept of final and definitive evil reduced to a peripheral concept? Is that which we really call evil, and experience to be such, not merely a process in which we are temporarily captivated by some good which loses its hold upon us as we develop further, or which can and must voluntarily be subsumed within an integral order of good in the absolute existing at a higher level?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[148] What then are we to suppose? Are we to say, 'Yes, we must press on in the process of "demythologizing" evil along the same lines as have been sketched out, at least incipiently, in traditional theology'? Are we to say what is in fact said by, or at least ascribed to Teilhard, namely that evil is, after all, the mere manifestation of frictions which arise in the process of cosmic development, which are inevitable and are only 'evil' when we cease to view them as a factor in a broader movement, a factor which is itself precisely overtaken by this movement and so eliminated? Are we to say (which would really amount to the same thing as has just been said, only expressed in theological terms) that the evil consisting in that which is willed by God, and conceived of with a good end in view as a good means of achieving it, is only evil in so far as it is viewed in isolation, and apart from this function which it has of being a means to an end. In God's eyes, however, it precisely does not have this absolute status in any sense, and therefore can perfectly well be willed by him, whereas we confine ourselves to saying that it is merely tolerated by him if and because we view it apart from this reference it has to an ultimate goal. Are we to say that evil is only apparent on the grounds that all creaturely good is finite, and, when willed by man as a promise of the infinite good, always carries with it that appearance of being more than it is in itself? Or conversely that to will it would imply over-valuing it in the sense of stopping short at the creaturely good in itself without recognizing its character as pointing on to something beyond itself? Are we to say this: that it is only within the course of the history of our personal freedom that we can (for the time being) falsely identify a particular good with the absolute good and so evoke the appearance of evil, whereas once we have attained the fulness of freedom in the moment of death, and all specific 'this-worldly' goods have passed away, it will be quite impossible for us any longer to will anything except the sheer good in the absolute, and in that sense we shall be liberated in any case from the apparent evil, the appearance of evil? The transcendental appearance of evil will necessarily vanish with death, in which the factors on which such appearance rests themselves disappear. And even if on other grounds we cannot affirm any theory with regard to this redemptive function of death (though as a participation in the death of Christ it need not contradict the doctrine of the Redemption by Christ), still would it not be perfectly possible to hope that death will have this effect at the practical level?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Or do we have to say this: given that it is at least possible to draw these conclusions, and in fact difficult to resist drawing them, from the traditional doctrine of guilt and evil, they show that some false or exaggerated [149] factor must lie concealed in the traditional premises, for these conclusions do follow more or less from the premises concerned, and yet at the same time the Christian conscience, convinced as it is of the radical nature of evil, protests against these conclusions leading to a demythologization of it? But how are we to attack these premises when, after all, they are not only strongly traditional, but seem to be quite inescapable unless we are to make God the cause of guilt or to take the line of Manichaeism or some other dualistic system? Are we to develop an ontology in which the 'reality' of evil is made clearer without thereby falling into a Manichaean dualism or projecting evil into the dimension of God himself?

Presumably – not to develop these points any further – the solution to this entire question must be sought from some different direction, so that we do not have to decide between the two tendencies with which we have been concerned up to now. As a quite general principle is there not, in the individual man and his knowledge, a pluralism of views which is too much for him to overcome, views, therefore, which cannot be brought into harmony in a higher synthesis? In this connection is it actually the case that we cannot even reduce these manifold branches of knowledge of ours, incapable as they are of being synthesized, into a single dialectical synthesis, because even this would still constitute an attempt to overcome their pluralism? If we can give an affirmative answer to this question, then we can go a step further. There are in man two fundamental experiences which provide the basis for two kinds of knowledge, and both are, in a real sense, incapable of being reconciled in a higher synthesis: the experience of the innermost state of being threatened by sin, the experience of the possibility of guilt on the one hand, and the experience of hope in a reality (called God and his grace) which can and will remove this guilt whether as a possibility or as an actuality on the other. These two basic experiences give rise inevitably to different interpretations. But we should not suppose that they are simply to be unified and reduced to a harmony by dialectical methods. This is not possible because both experiences, so far from representing opposite poles within a single order, which still remain static entities, have their place, rather, in a developing personal history of freedom which cannot, in any full or comprehensive sense, be the subject of conscious reflexive examination. It is not the case that everyone has, at every moment in his personal history, the same causes for fear, for trembling, or for hope. The changes in the theory are the necessary consequences of the personal history of both experiences. In those cases in which these experiences are made within the believing community of the Church they are, of course, in some sense brought into [150] a unity and reconciled with one another in their verbal presentation as an impartial dialectical doctrine which avoids all radical one-sidedness. But the moment we look into the matter more closely and examine more closely the terms that are used, it appears precisely that we are far from being able to achieve here a 'reconciliation' of such a kind that now a positive and fully intelligible synthesis is achieved between fear for salvation and hope for salvation. It appears that the traditional theory of guilt is really (at least to a predominant extent) a theology of guilt formulated from the standpoint of guilt. This does not mean that, by a process of conscious separation, this awareness of guilt, based on the experience of hope, can precisely be distinguished from the theology of guilt based on the experience of guilt. This is something that we can precisely not do, even though we can recognize that in this traditional theology of guilt an element of salvific optimism must lie concealed which derives not from the knowledge of guilt in itself but from the experience of hope as instilled by grace. We shall even be able to say that the Church neither can nor should develop any other theology of guilt than one of such a kind that hope has a decisive influence upon it if the Church as a whole and as holy is sustained by this hope and must by no means depart from this situation brought about by God. To this extent too it is not surprising that we have never really succeeded in the least in what we have said above in developing a clear counter-position by any truly theological process of reflection to the classic doctrine of guilt, a position which consists in something more than merely dumbly pointing to the experience of guilt itself and as inescapable. Only the classic theology of guilt must always remain aware of the fact that it cannot be an 'objectively' neutral theology of guilt. Rather it itself ipso facto includes the idea of Redemption from guilt by God even when it seems to be speaking only of guilt as such. And it must constantly remain aware of the fact that it speaks from this basis, and that it only remains valid provided it retains its openness to that desolation and darkness of guilt of which man too must still remain aware when, in a spirit of hope, he turns from it (as he must) so as to understand guilt in that particular light in which it stands when it is viewed in its relation to God and not in its relation to man. In guilt a reality is present which can be understood only on the basis of living practice, in which man hopes for something more than that which his theoretic reason can tell him about it. We should affirm the traditional doctrine of guilt in this sense and in no other, namely that, sustained by the grace of God that arises out of guilt, man lives in hope. Otherwise this traditional doctrine would indeed have the effect of representing guilt as innocuous. Otherwise [151] we would be setting ourselves up wickedly and in mortally sinful arrogance so as to adopt the standpoint of God (whereas it is only the hope created by God, and this only in view of the very real existence of guilt, that enables us to adopt this standpoint). The only two courses open to us are either to live in that hope of forgiveness which we accept in freedom, or in the despair, freely admitted, to which guilt gives rise (even though we may not consciously advert either to the one attitude or to the other, as in fact we are incapable of consciously reflecting upon them in any full sense). We live, then, by either the one or the other basic decision upon which we can never consciously reflect in any full sense. For this reason too we cannot lay bare and examine every possible aspect of it in our theological calculations. And because of this any consciously worked-out theology of guilt must reflect either the one or the other basic decision (together with the process of consciously reflecting upon both attitudes as possible and as attempted). The classic theology of guilt, therefore, will presumably have to be viewed as a conscious reflection upon that hope of forgiveness in which guilt is in principle already overcome by God. For otherwise it would not be able to avoid the suspicion that it was representing guilt as innocuous. This of course is precisely not to say that it is possible for the Christian to develop a theology of guilt in which the factor of hope is eliminated. In theology too we remain those who have been redeemed by God's grace. For even the speculative reason has need of the compassion of God, and it is possible for it to have found this. Now on this showing we should so speak of guilt as the classic theology of guilt speaks of it, so long as in doing so we do nor forget the basis from which we speak, and we must make this standpoint from which we speak clear, seeing that freedom and its final and definitive character can be interpreted in a radical sense to the point of becoming a hypothetical atheism (in this way man can be free and this freedom of his can really create something final and definitive). But

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this radical interpretation may give rise to the impression that Christianity is representing human guilt as innocuous, at least in its consciously explicitated theology.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[152]

10

THEOLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS ON THE CONCEPT OF 'WITNESS'

If we take the data of a Christian theology as a basis for an enquiry into the concept of 'witness', then presumably this approach should throw into relief certain special aspects and factors, even though precisely in this consideration what we have in mind is not an exegetical investigation but one which is based on dogmatics. Admittedly so far as the question of the nature of witness is concerned the data of a systematic Christian theology are (as will shortly appear) not so much the starting-point from which the enquiry will be conducted as the point to which it will lead up. Nevertheless this will not have any effect on the theological character of the considerations which follow.[1]

[153] It is true that 'witness' is a term which involves an intrinsic reference to someone else. Manifestly, however, it is also a term signifying not the imparting of some other thing, but rather that in which someone communicates himself, and, moreover, by the most intense use of his own freedom in so disposing of himself that thereby a corresponding decision is evoked in some other person too.[2] If 'witness' were concerned only with a 'something', then it would amount merely to a piece of information delivered by an expert on some specific topic, or an eye-witness's account of some occurrence which he had observed. In other words

[1] The theological literature on the concept of 'witness' consists almost exclusively in exegesis and biblical theology (but cf. below K. Hemmerle). Alternatively it is concerned with the question of the difference and connection between the New Testament concept of witness and the idea found in early Christianity and in the Church of 'martyrdom'. Considerations of the concept of witness from the side of systematic theology, therefore, have to be sought in treatises on the theology of the word (on this cf. the author's remarks in the article 'Was ist em Sakrament?', Schriften zur Theologie X (Einsiedeln, 1972), pp. 377-391 (to be translated in Theological Investigations XIV). While in Protestant theology an extensive literature is available on this, in Catholic theology there is no very wide coverage. Any attempt at supplying a full and precise list would exceed the limits of the present article. Only a few studies may be mentioned, which are directly concerned with the concept of 'witness' itself, and are either especially important, or have been published very recently. Earlier literature is to be found in N. Brox, Zeuge und Märtyrer. H. Strathmann, 'μα_ρτυφ', ThW IV (Stuttgart, 1942), pp. 477-520; R. Koch, 'Witness', Encyclopaedia of Biblical Theology III (London, 1969), J. B. Bauer ed., pp. 976-985; E. Neuhäusler, 'Zeugnis in der Schrift', LTK X (Freiburg, 1965), cols. 1361 f.; N. Brox, 'Zeugnis', HthG II (Munich, 1963), pp. 903-911; G. Harbsmeier, Ihr werdet meine Zeugen sein!, Theol. Existenz Heute 8 (Munich, 1947); K. Rahner, On the Theology of Death, 2nd ed. (London, 1969); K. H. Rengstorff, Die Auferstehung Jesu (Witten, 4th ed., 1960) (Exkurs 3, Zum Begriff des Zeugen im Osterkerygma), pp. 136-145; N. Brox, Zeuge und Märtyrer. Untersuchungen zur frühchristlichen Zeugnis-Terminologie, Studien zum Alten und Neuen Testament V (Munich, 1961) (Bibliography, pp. 241-243. But the references contain some errors); U. Wilckens, Die Missionsreden der ApG (Neukirchen, 1961) (The 'Twelve' commissioned to act as witnesses, pp. 144-149); G. Stählin, 'Zum Gebrauch von Beteuerungsformeln im NT', Novum Testamentum 5 (1962), pp. 115-145 (The Synoptics and Paul); J. D. M. Derret, 'Law in the New Testament; The Story of the Woman Taken in Adultery', NTS 10 (1963), pp. 1-26 (on the juridical aspects of the concept of witness in the New Testament); R. Schnackenburg, Die Johannesbriefe (Freiburg, 2nd ed., 1963) (Exkurs I: Sinn and Tragweite der 'Zeugen'-Aussagen von 1 Joh. 1:1 ff., pp. 52-58, and Exkurs II: Das Gotteszeugnis und der Glaube, pp. 267-271); H. von Campenhausen, Die Idee des Martyriums in der Alten Kirche (Göttingen, 2nd ed., 1964); W. Bieder, Segnen und Bekennen. Eine biblische und historicche Studie (Basle, 1965); N. Brox, Der Glaube als Zeugnis (Munich, 1966); K. Bornkamm, Wunder und Zeugnis (Tübingen, 1968); H. Fries, Heraufgeforderte Glaube (Munich, 1968); T. Lippert, Leben air Zeugnis, Stuttgarter biblische Monographien 4 (Stuttgart, 1969) (The Pastoral Epistles, I Peter); K. Hemmerle, 'Wahrheit und Zeugnis', Theologie als Wissenschaft, Quaest. Disp. 45 (Freiburg, 1970) (Systematic and Philosophical Aspects of 'Witness' in its Bearing on the Question of Truth).

[2] cf. the ideas of the Second Vatican Council on Revelation as self-communication on God's part in 'Dei Verbum', The Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation No 2, and the ideas of witness, ibid., No. 3.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

it would amount to evidence in a sense which is (ultimately) forensic. Now all this cannot be what is being referred to in any primary sense – at least not taken in isolation – when we speak of a bearing of witness in a religious sense. In this provisional description of witness we have not yet arrived at a stage at which it makes any notable difference whether or not we have already brought out with sufficient clarity that which constitutes the formal specification (the specific difference) of witness. Thus we are aware that our description might, in an extreme case, also be applied to functions of the human person which do not properly constitute witness, as, for instance, a totally committed love for another.

We are assuming straightway that the real factors included in this provisional description of witness do de facto exist: a man endowed with freedom and having power over his own self; the possibility of disposing [154] of himself in an ultimate and 'absolute' sense so far as the concrete conditions of human life are concerned (or at least the power to attempt this in the hope that at any rate within the course of a lifetime the man concerned will actually succeed in achieving it); the significance of an ultimate understanding of himself in freedom for some other man as well; the possibility of so using this power of self-determination as to achieve contact with another, to make himself 'intelligible'; the character which such communication has as a summons or appeal; the understanding of such communication by the other leading to a state in which each party is orientated towards the other, a state which must ultimately be called love. Let us take all this as established for our present purposes, and leave any further consideration to the philosophers to work out in an existential ontology.

Our intention here is to throw light upon a few specifically theological implications of the (provisional) description given above. For once these have been explicitated, they can enable us to understand the specifically theological sense of 'witness' which belongs to it absolutely and necessarily. Nor do we fear, in using this method of arriving at a specifically theological concept, the reproach that philosophy is seeking to produce a specifically theological concept on its own authority, and thereby doing damage to itself and to theology. For by this approach it will also be possible to make clear the point at which a certain reality of human life begins; a reality, namely, in which, as a matter either of hypothesis or of actual experience, an experience accessible at the level of philosophical insight is elevated to a higher level on the basis of a transcendental experience. Now since this reality which we are pointing to is arrived at by a process of transcending and radicalizing man's own experience of himself, it must not be excluded from a philosophical view merely on the grounds that it belongs to theology – in other words that what it stands for is precisely that which Christian faith expresses as a reality graciously bestowed upon man by God, and understands to be supernatural revelation. Theology does not begin only at that point at which we begin to study the scriptural sources of revelation (Scripture and Church tradition). On the contrary, it has already begun at that point at which, prior to any such positive studies, man attains to such de facto realities in his own reflections upon himself, realities which – whether reflected upon or not, or reflected upon precisely as such or not – are already constituted, amongst other things, by that which Christian theology calls grace. The fact that there is a grace of this kind, which modifies the actual awareness of man (and, moreover, as an abiding existential of human life) – this is a [155] point that a Molinist might possibly deny. A genuine Thomist cannot do so. On the contrary he must concede that theology (as the process of reflecting upon realities and experiences which are grace-given and inspired by the Spirit) is already present incipiently and in principle at the very heart of philosophy (considered as the process of reflecting upon man's own experience, which does not allow any external limits to be imposed upon it).

In witness man exercises his freedom at the most ultimate level of which he is capable of directing himself. In doing so it is of course conceivable that this process of directing himself in freedom may, in the individual case, be prior to the act by which it is communicated in the word of witness to another.[3] But if we assume (as we may assume here) that even the truest form of subjectivity as realized in freedom still always consists in an encounter with a being outside oneself (and, moreover, ultimately speaking not a thing outside but a person outside oneself) in which one receives that person and gives oneself to him, if subjectivity essentially consists in intercommunication, then in the last analysis witness is not a subsequent declaration of a basic decision which the subject has previously taken about himself, but rather is in itself the concrete form of this decision. In saying this there is a further question which can remain unresolved for our present purposes, the question namely of whether every decision which a human subject takes about himself, and in which he directs himself towards another, must be called witness, or whether such an act of decision in which he communicates himself should be called witness only provided certain further specific conditions are fulfilled, and the act concerned has certain specific properties. But regarded as a disposing of the subject's own self, and as such a process in which freedom acts upon itself, witness necessarily takes place as an act of self-transcendence in which the subject reaches up to the unsurpassable and sovereign Mystery [156] which we call God.[4] Transcendence as knowledge and freedom is always that openness, deriving from the Mystery itself (we distinguish it, therefore, from the idealism of an autonomous subject) to that Mystery beyond all comprehension which exceeds every experience of a conceivable 'subject', but constitutes the condition enabling knowledge to be achieved of 'classifiable' subjects. It is the openness to this Mystery as the basis of knowledge and reality both at the same time, this Mystery which we call God. Now given that this movement (initially, of course, not consciously reflected upon or explicitated, yet present in any and every act of cognition as that which makes it possible) towards the Mystery is sustained and empowered by that Mystery itself, it is necessarily open to the question of how far this Mystery allows itself to be attained to by the movement it initiates and sustains. Is it merely that which remains forever remote, forever forbidding, the asymptotic point towards which is orientated a movement which, while it does indeed proceed outwards to the infinite, nevertheless remains forever enclosed within the finite? Or does this movement contain the promise in which we hope that this Mystery bestows itself as itself (while remaining incomprehensible to us) to be, in a true sense, a goal which will be attained, and therefore even as itself sustains this movement from within itself? Christianity is a religion which acknowledges precisely this hope, regarded as an explicit theme, as the centre of its faith. It calls this goal, as we have understood it here, the visio beatifica, and that factor which sustains the movement from within and directs it towards this particular goal is called grace (Pneuma). Man can make this hope his own, and for this he finds within himself an inner power and (albeit never as something which he can fully reflect upon or realize) an enlightenment (called the grace of faith), and he seizes upon that in which

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[3] Viewed from a purely temporal aspect, this can actually be accounted the normal state of affairs. But this does not alter the fact that witness is, after all, precisely not a mere subsequent announcement of a pre-existing reality which would still exist even without this announcement, and which has no intrinsic connection with it. The space of time during which an individual comes to his own fulness should not obscure the intrinsic unity of that through which the essence of this fulfilment is, in a real sense, constantly present in all sections of time in which it takes place. We encounter this phenomenon frequently in theology. Baptism is the sacrament of faith in which this faith is itself posited, and yet the baptized person normally comes to baptism with this faith already present in him. The sacrament of penance is the event of metanoia and conversion to God, and yet it presupposes that the metanoia which is made full and declared in the sacrament has already been present prior to it.

[4] This statement, and the considerations which follow, can of course be nothing more than brief indications within the present context. We say that the (human) spirit endowed with knowledge and freedom implies a limitless transcendentality, and that this transcendentality (as opened up from the basis of being regarded as mystery) implies an affirmation of the infinite Mystery which we call God. But this and much else besides can merely be asserted here without our being able to attempt any more precise explanation or justification. On this, however, cf., in the present volume, the observations on the subject of 'Thomas Aquinas on Truth'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this hope is actually fulfilled in exemplary form in the historical experience of Jesus of Nazareth. The experience of the Christ event in Jesus may or may not be achieved at a fully conscious level. But in any case it remains true that where the transcendental movement of the Spirit is unreservedly accepted it constitutes (according to the Christian interpretation of it) a movement sustained by God himself outwards towards the immediacy of [157] God, because it de facto and inescapably has as its intrinsic principle God himself. And this remains true even as we recognize that this state of being sustained, this openness of human transcendence to the immediacy of the absolute Mystery, is to be interpreted as (supernatural) 'grace' and as 'unmerited'. In those cases, therefore, in which 'witness' is achieved in the sense indicated in our provisional description (and so as an act of self-determination in which man positively and unconditionally accepts that which is within himself), there also takes place invariably and in all cases so far as Christianity is concerned the event of grace, the acceptance of this grace, the movement outwards towards the immediacy of God regardless of whether this is explicitly reflected upon or not. Witness is de facto a grace-given event, or it is not really witness at all. In this connection we are assuming that it can be present only in those cases in which man accepts himself in it unconditionally, and so bears witness to himself as he is. We are assuming, therefore, that the attempt, for instance, to attest the absolute absurdity of existence can be one of two things: first it can be regarded as no witness at all, seeing that man cannot introduce himself into his own witness in any way he likes, cannot interpret himself in any way he likes (is not the absolute creator of himself, but always proceeds from something previously offered him, always takes up his attitude towards something which he himself has not posited); or second, his false interpretation of himself is false only on the surface (which is perfectly possible), is merely the mistaken objectification of an original act of self-interpretation which, ultimately speaking and in its innermost depths, is, nevertheless, successful. In other words precisely in it there can be a witness for one who can distinguish between the witness itself and him who bears it. Witness, therefore, is, precisely inasmuch as it seeks to communicate the bearer of witness in his act of self-interpretation to his fellow, a bearing of witness of God himself as him who communicates himself in grace and offers himself as the subject of a direct relationship. Witness is an attestation of the grace of God whether this is consciously realized or not, whether it is objectified and expressed verbally or not. The imparting of oneself in witness to one's fellow constitutes, if it is really achieved (i.e. if it consists in an act of unreserved self-acceptance in the transcendence which is de facto elevated by grace to a higher plane), a witness of God himself. Any explicit statements about God (such as can of course arise in witness, though they do not necessarily have to) are merely the objectification in words of an ultimate depth which is always present in witness. The witness is always a theological one. What is different is simply the degree of conscious objectification of this [158] theological character inherent in every witness, even though, as it has been presented in the provisional description with which we began, it appeared quite untheological and merely anthropological in character. This witness, therefore, can be Christian in an 'anonymous' sense. It can be an 'anonymous' fulfilment of human nature in which man reaches out to God,[5] and so (because sustained by God's self-bestowal = grace) salvific. But it is always (at least at the subconscious level) Christian. It would, of course, be advisable at this point to describe in greater detail the forms of witness of anonymous Christianity as they arise in concrete history, and also their specific content, if we were able to do so. For instance a commitment to sheer self-sacrifice for the sake of social justice; the unreserved championing of truth and one's own genuine personal convictions. With regard to a witness of anonymous Christianity of this kind, we should [5] On this cf. 'Bemerkungen aura Problem des "anonymen Christen"', Scriften zur Theologie X (Einsiedeln, 1972), pp. 531-546 (to be translated in Theological Investigations XIV).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

guard against the criticism that any such Christian and theological interpretation of this kind of witness runs counter to the repeatedly declared intention and the (verbal) self-interpretation of him who bears the witness in this way. But all these are questions which cannot be entered into any further in the present context. Witness is directed towards someone else. The one bearing the witness seeks to communicate himself to him. Is this possible? What this question is concerned with is not the problems in the forefront, of how, and by what means, one person can communicate himself to another, or the question of how any such thing can be possible seeing that after all he who bears witness in this way can only impart, communicate, or bear witness in words about himself and, furthermore, ultimately speaking, can only communicate some objectified message, even if this message which is to be the medium of his self-giving consists in gestures and acts belonging to his own physical nature. Such questions as to the possibility of witness in the sense incipiently described above are certainly important too in enabling us to understand how such communication of self is possible. But we shall not concern ourselves with them here because they are questions concerning the process of imparting or communicating oneself, and not questions concerning witness in itself and the specific and ultimate possibility of this. Here we are assuming the fact that there can be such self-communication, which is realized in witness, or at least (to express it more cautiously) that it is possible to form the purpose, and make the claim of bringing such self-communication to reality. (In this connection, again, it makes no immediate difference here whether such self-imparting [159] is achieved precisely and exclusively in witness, or, for instance, whether it is achieved primarily in the love between two individuals, or whether there are very different kinds and modes of such self-communication. What we are presupposing for our present consideration is simply that such self-communication is achieved at least in witness too, and in this in a specific manner.) Now that we have demarcated the question in this way, it seems that we are justified in arriving at the following conclusion about it: If we are to say that there can in any sense be such self-communication on the part of a person endowed with freedom, unique in each individual case, a self-communication that is of its nature unrepeatable and incapable of being fully realized at the conscious level, then this can be only to the extent that both sides to this relationship have an ultimate bond of love with the one God, who, as the single and selfsame ground of these unique and, in themselves, incommensurable individualities, at once affirms them in their difference, unites them as providing their common basis, and sustains and guarantees the absolute character of their (mutual) self-communication. When an individual commits himself to his fellow absolutely, though in himself, in view of the finitude of his nature and the threats to which he is subject from forces within himself, he cannot guarantee the absolute character of this commitment, then, whether he recognizes it consciously or not, he is ipso facto appealing in hope to the one sustaining and reconciling basis of all free and unique acts. Witness, inasmuch as it is directed to another, and that too in an unconditional commitment[6] to this other, is, whether we realize it consciously or not, theological in character. It is sustained by that which, in Christian terms, is called ‘grace’, i.e. through the self-bestowal of the one God upon both of the two finite individuals who have achieved union

[6] It might be objected that so far as the witness of truth and his claims are concerned, it makes no difference, ultimately speaking, whether he is hearkened to or not. But it is precisely an intrinsic part of his ‘martyrdom’ to maintain his witness, despite contradiction, even to death. This is correct. But a witness which did not involve the hope, despite all disappointments, really to take effect and to be hearkened to, would be giving up its own nature in respect of its truth and its universal claims. The witness must necessarily hope that the contradiction which he encounters will be merely temporary. In him who bears witness, therefore, there is always a tendency, in the expression of the truth which he is bearing witness to in concrete human life, to reach out to a point at which that truth will be accepted by the hearer as well. The one bearing the witness, therefore, seeks himself to be assented to and accepted in the truth he proclaims.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

with one another. And in this way the ultimate union between them, and at the same time the difference between them, are both assured, and God is made the interior [160] principle of their mutual relationship. Of course we can conceive of a relationship between two individuals, and it can be such that it does not have God as its intrinsic constitutive principle. But to the extent that this relationship constantly tends to an absolute proximity and ultimate validity, and hopes to have attained to this at a radical level and as a real fact (precisely through God), God is (whether explicitly or implicitly) incidentally asserted as the intrinsic principle of this relationship. In this respect too witness has a theological character.

Of course witness always has also and necessarily a content 'classifiable in terms of this-worldly categories'.[7] In witness man can commit himself in his ultimate free decision to his fellow only in that he says a 'something' [161] to that fellow. This gives rise to the question of what the nature of this particular and specific content of witness must be in order that it can constitute the content, classifiable in terms of specific categories, of a self-commitment to the other in which on the one hand the individual bearing witness commits himself in the totality of his free existence, while on the other, thereby and therein (whether consciously or unconsciously) he bears witness to the reality of the Mystery which commits itself to man, and which is called God. Manifestly this content, classifiable in terms of specific categories, cannot in any primary sense be an objectification in verbal form of the original transcendentality as opened up by God's grace to an immediate relationship with God, and accepted as such in freedom. Certainly something like this is possible, as, for instance here, in the present consideration, and as in every explicitly religious statement.[8] But this cannot be the first and primary content. For otherwise the only possible forms of witness would be statements which were explicitly and ex professo religious in subject-matter. Up to now we have consistently proceeded from the opposite assumption, because we have been seeking to discover the theological character of witness in a line of investigation which seems to be

[7] It is true that fairly explicit consideration has already been given to these points in the context of different key concepts in Christian theology (e.g. under the heading of 'Proofs of God's existence', in the light of the limitless transcendentality of man, or in the context of the idea of the radical unity between love of God and love of man). At the same time, however, it is probably true that hardly any explicit consideration has been given in Christian theology to the points which follow. Death in general and the death of Christ in particular have hardly been considered at all in the light of an existential ontology. Death in general is first and foremost a biological event, and the standard theology constructs a genuine interpretation of the death of Christ by regarding it from the outset as a moral act on Jesus' part, supposing that this could just as well have been achieved in a different way and still have had a salvific significance. Of course here we can provide no more than an indication of the intrinsic connection between a final and 'eschatological' revelation (and, together with this, its attestation) on the one hand, and the event of the death of him who was essentially the last of the prophets and the bringer of eschatological salvation on the other. When we speak of the 'blessed' death, we are referring to the death which, by the very fact of being undergone, leads to that which in Christian terms we call the 'resurrection'. By this term we are seeking to bring out as clearly as possible the intrinsic unity between death and resurrection, and, moreover, in such a way that death does not appear as a mere misfortune to be made good once more by 'resurrection'. When in what follows we interpret witness as the attestation of God's gracious imparting of himself, and for this purpose determine the content of this witness in terms of specific 'this-worldly' categories as a witness of death, then obviously we have still not arrived at any decision as to whether this bearing witness to death has to present its content explicitly and in so many words as death. The 'anonymous' forms of Christian witness already envisaged above do not, of course, need to bear witness in so explicit and conscious a sense to a blessed death as we would wish to work out in view of the full form of witness in the full realization of its own nature. The absolute and unconditional nature of the resolve, taken in hope, in virtue of which witness is borne even at the cost of endangering one's life can perfectly well take the form of an 'anonymous' (taking place in the hope of some other outcome) attestation to the blessedness of death, even when it has not yet been realized as a matter of conscious historical experience where this blessed death that is hoped for has occurred or will occur.

[8] The necessity of an explicitly religious statement, and precisely the statement here being questioned, does not need to be treated of from different points of view, though of course we are in no sense either disputing it or trifling with it.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

merely at the human level, and which we began by evaluating as a provisional description of witness. But how can the content of a witness of this kind be constituted, classifiable in terms of specific categories, and still not in any sense pertaining to a consciously religious statement? It must (without on this account ipso facto having to constitute a consciously religious statement at the secondary level) point on to that transcendentality which gives a statement the force of witness. If we look at the history of revelation in the Old and New Testaments we might very quickly come to the conclusion that the content of this as assignable to particular categories is related to the deeds of power wrought in history by God, who in them manifests himself as the bringer of salvation. This piece of information may be formally speaking correct, but it does nothing to solve the problem with which we are here confronted. For how is any historical event of this kind, expressible in terms of 'this-worldly' categories, to be recognized precisely as a deed of God? To this question we might seek to reply with the usual answer supplied by traditional theology, namely that it is in virtue of the fact that the salvific deed of power wrought by God in history is a miracle, or is accompanied by a miracle. But this would merely be to shift the question to a different level [162] without solving it. Presumably too such a reply would constitute merely a piece of information applicable to the purely formal and abstract concept of revelation as such, but not capable of working out that which is specific to the New Testament revelation in Christ. A further point is that on these assumptions, and in the face of this reply, it might reasonably be asked whether on this showing there could be any basis at all for an absolute witness in the sense of a genuinely achieved absolute relationship between him who attests and him to whom his message is addressed (even if such a witness can in itself be assumed to have taken place without any such basis). The appeal to some kind of miracle is questionable in view of the difficulty of recognizing it as such (if it is to be regarded as some kind of occurrence assignable to a particular 'this worldly' category), and in view of its function as providing a basis for an absolute[9] witness. It could have significance only in connection with a hope, not yet established on any adequate basis, in a manifestation still to emerge in history, which subsequently enables us to apprehend the basis for an absolute witness of this kind in history as definable in terms of particular categories. The content of a witness classifiable in these terms, which attests the absolute immediacy of God as a grace that is posited in history, is thereby intended to enable man, by an exercise of his own freedom, radically to give himself to his fellow. Now this content of witness can only consist (in the 'order' in which this self-communication on God's part is not of itself simply or absolutely manifest, so that it no longer needs any witness bearing to it) in a reference to an event of this kind, in which an individual, in all the reality of his effective human life (and not merely in some ideological 'interior' dimension and attitude) radically makes himself over to God, and in which this giving of himself is seen to be achieved by God's own acceptance of it. In other words the particular and 'this worldly' content of witness at this radical level can consist only in the proclamation of that death which, as it takes place, leads to the absolute life of God. Only a death of this kind, as 'accepted' by God, can be something more than an event of self-transcendence as sustained by God (though in fact we do intend to express this in witness). Also, and more than this, it consists in the fact that the actual achievement of such self-transcendence is [163] made apprehensible to us.[10] For all the 'this-worldly' positivity of a [9] As used in this context 'absolute' simply means: a witness for a final eschatologically victorious and unsurpassable self-communication on God's part as that which constitutes (albeit 'unmerited' and so grace-given) the radical fulfilment of that transcendentality which man represents, which he possesses, which as freely affirmed in the witness given to his fellow, is itself attested to. Cf. on the whole question the author's study in the present volume, 'Ideas for a Theology of Death'.

[10] Of course in a fuller development of the idea the distinction, and at the same time the connection, would have to be described more precisely. The witness borne to the blessed death which is not itself a death of the one who

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

human event, it can indeed perfectly well (whether explicitated or not) be the process by which such self-transcendence is achieved (because in fact it takes place in the power of that God, that Mystery which human transcendence positively affirms in knowledge and freedom). But precisely because of this positivity and in it, such an event cannot enable it to be made manifest that the process is intended precisely as self-transcendence, and the transcendentality of this event constitutes something more than the enabling condition and the means by which such a process in its free intention seeks merely to achieve a reality definable in 'this-worldly' categories, and to achieve the immanent meaning of this. The acknowledgement of that death which has been blessed with happiness constitutes the content, assignable to a specific category, of a witness which, in respect of God and the individual personhood of him who bears the witness, is intended to be absolute. Of course this transcendental deduction of the content is not a deduction of the death of Jesus at this death which is sought as the source of blessedness. This belongs to the concrete event in which this content is realized, something, therefore, which remains at the historical level, and does not have to be so as a matter of transcendental necessity. Nor do we seek to maintain by this deductive argument that it would de facto take place without the historical encounter with the death of Jesus. But neither of these two factors in any sense changes the insight that a witness at the radical level can have its content as assignable to a specific category only in our acknowledgement of a death that brings us into the immediate presence of God, so long as such a witness needs to have any such content assigned to it at all.

We have said that witness is directed towards one's fellow. Now (in order to simplify the matter) let us make this more precise. Him to whom the witness is addressed is one's fellow not in his private individuality, but one's fellow to the extent that he exists in the life of society, to the extent that he is a 'political' being. Witness has a political character. It is public proclamation. If witness were directed to one's fellow as an individual person, and to the extent that he is, in any given case, that particular, unique, [164] and private individual, or to the extent that he does not represent the whole multitude of society at large, over and above any value we may attach to him as an individual, this self-communication would be that which we call love, or a pairing off at the purely biological level. Witness as such has a public and political character. This statement is initially simply a definition of terms. We call witness simply that which has a public character (and that which, to this extent, has a material affinity with witness in a strictly forensic sense). A transcendental necessity is to be ascribed to this statement (but then in a genuine sense) only to the extent that on the one hand man is in all cases a political and social being, and yet on the other precisely as such one which is no less invariably always unique and different from all the rest in his free individuality. Belonging to a society, and being unique and different from all others in free individuality are not two 'qualities' of man existing side by side with one another, but are present as mutually complementary, as (ontological) transcendentals in the scholastic sense. They are, in their relationship to one another, not one and the same, and yet at the same time they are inconceivable in isolation from one another. And to that extent the subject of the summons which we call witness and the one to whom it is addressed can express themselves and accept each other by listening to its message in a unique decision of freedom, and thereby act precisely as political beings. But then we have precisely that which we call witness, with all the qualities which we have hitherto claimed that witness has, whenever and wherever it really has realized its full nature. The public and social character of this witness is, by a special inter-involvement, that of the 'world' and that of the 'Church'. 'World', because, and bears the witness, and the witness of the assent of him who bears the witness to this death in a spirit of faith and hope. To the extent that the latter element too belongs to witness, even though de facto it may also be lacking in a process which claims to be witness, it can come to be present in the false forms of witness in the individual 'bearer of witness' which still await discussion.

---

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

to the extent that, this witness appears as a 'claimant', i.e. one who demands agreement and who essentially incurs the risk of remaining unheeded and being rejected. In other words it is addressed in public to another who can also be one who rejects this witness and is called the 'world' in the sense usually intended in Christian terminology in that here it is (rightly) assumed that in principle all men can and must be summoned by this witness, i.e. this witness cannot be regarded as having, in the fulness of its nature, a particular application, but constitutes, rather, a universal message. Wherever, by contrast, this witness is expressed and also hearkened to, something is constituted in him who bears the witness and him who hearkens to it (because both attitudes are public ones) which we here call (employing the same terminology) the 'Church'.

To the extent that the content of witness as classifiable in terms of 'this-worldly' categories is in its full nature the historical event of the [165] death of Jesus as blessed and as leading to God, it can, as a factor in concrete human life, only be realized aright when he who bears the witness has in principle decided to accept his own death. The spirit of faith and hope that one's own death will lead blessedly into the freedom and security of God's presence constitutes the mode in which alone witness is possible. To that extent there is a real and effective connection between the act of bearing witness to the truth and 'martyrdom'. For that which (in terms of content) is attested in witness is (from a Christian point of view) nothing else than the belief that this death has, in Jesus, achieved its goal and the hope of the witness himself that in his own death he will be able to follow after the dying Jesus. Now this necessarily involves the will to incur the risk of this death, and, moreover, precisely as something occasioned by the witness itself to take upon oneself the act of 'martyrdom'. The development which takes place, starting from the New Testament idea of witness which does not yet (explicitly) contain the idea of a 'witness of the blood', leading to the concept of witness of the early Church in which death (as freely accepted) is itself regarded as witness, is therefore perfectly legitimate. For the truth which is attested to in the verbal witness of Christianity is precisely the truth of death as constituting salvation.

In Luke a witness is essentially a witness to the 'Resurrection', and, moreover, an 'eye-witness' who as such has an 'official' position and a special function. Now on this showing we must notice this point as something that follows directly from what has been said so far: every (Christian) witness must bear witness not merely to the blessedness of death which we await and hope for (and so the 'resurrection') in general, but must also include in its concrete and specific content precisely the blessedness of the death of Jesus. And to this extent such a witness, whenever it is borne, and whatever authority and power is attached to it, is related to the 'eye-witnesses' of the origins, without whom we could never assign to that blessedness of death which we await and hope for the historical name of Jesus. But in saying this we are not saying at the same time that this witness handed down through history of the Resurrection of Jesus is exclusively, or taken in isolation, the sustaining basis for the witness of faith of subsequent generations and of Christian belief. For the credibility of this historical witness ('the Lord is risen indeed') is itself sustained by the transcendental expectation of resurrection which is inherent in man's basic attitude. It is because (whether he explicitates it to himself or not) he entertains a hope for himself, for his own final and definitive state – in other words for the blessedness of his own death – that he has 'ears' to [166] hear this witness to an historical fact. A further factor is that this transcendental and inalienable hope (albeit either accepted or rejected in freedom) in the possibility of achieving blessedness in human death is always present. Moreover this hope recognizes that sooner or later in history it either has become, or will become, a real fact, and because of this and to this extent too, all such hope and the witness borne to it is 'Jesus-orientated'.

From what has been said it becomes clear what is involved (chiefly in the Johannine theology of the New Testament) in the witness borne from within oneself and in its

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

attestation by the Spirit, The very nature of the reality involved is such as not to admit of any justification or authentication of the witness from without. Witness involves a total human act (albeit one that is specified with reference to the world at large). And this can neither be authenticated by any factor outside itself, nor consist of a combination of individual acts or elements such that this combination could be justified by the individual elements making it up. For the first hypothesis is ruled out by the totality of the act involved inasmuch as it lays claim to the whole man and therefore does not admit of anything 'outside'. The second hypothesis is equally impossible, if only because freedom as the all-embracing self-comprehension of man, constitutes, despite all the plurality of the elements making it up, precisely the original unity and not the final result of the plurality which is in man. We are not maintaining, in what has been said, that this act constitutes sheer self-identity, or that it does not have within it any pluralism of constitutive elements which are irreducible one to another. Hence, of course, there is an intrinsic connection in that they have a common basis, and a mutual reference of the elements of such an act one to another. Hence, we may notice in passing, such a discipline as a fundamental theology is, if rightly understood, perfectly possible even if it does not construct the act of faith from without but makes its subject the intrinsic self-basis of this act in the mutual reference to one another of the elements constituting it. Witness is borne for the attester and the hearer themselves, and there are two reasons for this. First, it constitutes the movement of the spirit in knowledge and freedom in all its limitless, all-embracing, and radicalized breadth, comprising that which is at once self-evident and beyond our apprehension (incomprehensible), and it supplies its own authentication. Second, the content of this witness as assignable to 'this-worldly' categories contains nothing else than precisely the blessed acceptance of this limitless breadth as the salvation of man. The fact that this content is interpreted in Christian terms as Jesus of Nazareth and as his victorious death of course accounts [167] for the factor of 'uncertainty' and of hazardousness which is inherent in every historical event where it is taken as the medium through which freedom reaches out to that which is transcendentally necessary. But on this point the Christian does not really need to say anything more than 'to whom else shall we go?'. And he can point to the fact that according to the witness of many consciences freedom's leap outwards towards the transcendental necessity is achieved in this name, and therefore this name in history can be appealed to in the witness. The breadth of human transcendentality, freed from all limits and radicalized (i.e. vivified by the hope of the immediacy of God), which carries its own authentication within itself because it is, and ex definitione can have no basis outside itself, is called, in Christian terminology, the state of being engraced and sustained by the Holy Spirit. In Christian terms, therefore, we can say that, as a witness affected by the Spirit, a witness is true and authenticated in itself. As such is also renders the specific and concrete content of this witness credible. God himself bears witness to himself in the witness. And only in this selfsame grace can it be hearkened to and accepted.

As a free and autonomous act of the individual bearing witness, the witness calls upon the freedom of the hearer. Because, and to the extent that, this witness has a specific content, classifiable in terms of 'this-worldly' categories, and thereby 'locates' the ultimate autonomous act of man in history, and since too it constitutes an appeal to the freedom of the other, it also brings to concrete and apprehensible form in history the ultimate decision of that other about himself. At the same time, however, it must be admitted that this objectification, as achieved in this sense in specific and historical terms, of a total free decision in accepting or rejecting the message attested to, contains an ultimate ambivalence or ambiguity within it. Thus for instance the concrete historical form in which rejection is manifested does not yield any absolute certainty of the fact that this rejection has also really been made at the heart and centre of the person endowed with freedom. And for this reason we cannot 'judge' him at this point. With this proviso, however, we can say that the effect of the witness is to lay bare the hostility with which the individual appealed to responds to God's self-communication to him, as made known to him in the witness. To that extent the witness has a revelatory character with regard to the 'sins of the world'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

There are two further points to be made about the witness: first that it constitutes the ('one') event of God's self-communication to man, and second that, as an event to which a concrete name can be assigned ('Jesus') it remains related to the historical series of those who bear witness to the [168] 'Resurrection' of Jesus. And for both of these reasons this witness (precisely as it is presented in the Lucan theology) constitutes the bridge between the age of Jesus and his 'return', and at the same time is ipso facto truly eschatological in character. For the eschatological event of the self-communication of God is already present in faith and hope, and already apprehensible in the witness that has been uttered and hearkened to in history. Nevertheless the witness points us on to the future, to the unveiled immediacy of God, at the consummation of the world and of human freedom, which at present is still 'in course of development'.

What has been said about the unveiled form in which the witness is accepted also applies, of course, to the actual process of giving witness as apprehensible at the historical and social levels. Even while preaching to others, we can ourselves become castaways. Admittedly, in this case which Paul emphasizes, the witness too is not such as it is presented to be. For in fact in the very act of uttering the witness man should be surrendering himself to the Mystery of existence which we call God. This surrender can be lacking. The witness pf the individual can be a lie to the extent that this making over of man to the God of grace as an act of concrete human living can de facto be wanting. But in that case this witness too is itself no true witness. The 'objective' validity which the Christian interpretation nevertheless ascribes to it, even when it fails to correspond to the interior attitude of the individual who proclaims it, is intelligible only if we recognize clearly that this witness takes place within a society precisely as a witness of this society which also as a whole effectively fulfils the witness which it bears. 'Holy Church' is, as Christians understand it, that which ensures that its witness (even when borne by an 'unworthy' individual) is a true witness, i.e. makes real that which it attests.

Of course, as in human discourse in general so too with witness, there are not only the full form and the radical realization of the very nature of witness, but also derived and deficient modes of witness. Religious or moral instruction, theological discourse, etc. are derived modes of witness, but still deficient ones, not even coming close to witness itself. This is all the more true since such religious discourses, which, for the most varied reasons, cannot be called witness in the true sense, nevertheless would be deprived of any meaning at all, or become statements belonging to the science of religion at the secular level without any concrete bearing on human life, if every element of witness were to be eliminated from them.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[169]

11

IDEAS FOR A THEOLOGY OF DEATH

If the theologian is to follow the philosopher, the psychologist, and the physician in having something to say about death and dying, he will find himself in great difficulties,[1] and, moreover, for a whole variety of reasons. However normal and everyday an occurrence dying and death may seem to be, no one can have anything to say about them as a result of having actually undergone dying and death, as a matter of his own physical and spiritual experience. For even the experience of being in danger of death, whether from internal or external causes, does not provide any guarantee of the fact that this experience is substantially the same as that which is undergone by one in whom this state of mortal need really does lead to death itself. In this respect the theologian too is no more an expert so far as dying and death are concerned than the rest. A further difficulty, this time affecting the theologian precisely as such, is that what he has to say about death in particular, as distinct from the other specialists, is in any case more withdrawn from everyday experience than what the other experts have to report. For this reason his message is most of all liable to the suspicion of being mythology, a fantasy designed to provide false consolation, and mere empty talk. A further factor in the difficulties with which the theologian finds himself surrounded is the fact that the question of what he has to say about death as such, and the further question of 'survival after death', the 'immortality of the soul', 'eternal life' as attained to through the 'resurrection of the flesh' constitute two questions which in themselves are very different, but which cannot be treated of apart here because otherwise the impression might be given that the theologian is here speaking of death as such and taken in isolation, in [170] order to avoid the question of what, according to his convictions, will become of man 'after' and 'beyond' death.[2] But if he regards it as his task to discuss both questions at once, his subject-matter will become immeasurably obscure and ill-defined. One further and final point is that each of these two questions in its turn involves a whole series of further particular questions, questions of biblical theology, history of dogma, history of theology, philosophy, and existential ontology – questions, therefore, which are, again, totally incapable of being answered directly or unambiguously within the terms of any system of Christian theology or according to the particular interpretation of faith upheld by any Church. The result is that the individual theologian is forced to take personal responsibility for many statements which he makes on such particular questions, even though in himself he is not seeking in any way to go beyond a simple statement of the beliefs of Christianity and of the Church, and, indeed, of an immense tradition in human thinking which, for all the variations introduced by the use of conceptual models drawn from mythology, are ultimately all pointing to one and the same reality.

In this situation, then, beset as he is with difficulties, the theologian has no other course open to him than to seize upon certain aspects of the matter, chosen somewhat arbitrarily. Such a course may involve an intermingling of philosophical and theological propositions, principles which are, in a real sense, held in common by all the Churches as well as individual interpretations of such principles, and all this may take place without always being explicitly adverted to. But there is simply no way of avoiding this, a point which we must

[1] The author has already published earlier studies under similar titles. Cf. On the Theology of Death (2nd ed., Eng. transl., 1969). In the foreword to this work some references will be found to important earlier studies on the question. Cf. also in this volume 'Theological Observations on the Concept of "Witness"'.

[2] For a concise survey cf. the author's article, 'Death', Sacramentum Mundi II (New York and London, 1968), pp. 58-62.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

explicitly emphasize here right at the outset. And a further point, likewise following from the situation as it exists, is that the approach we are adopting cannot be one in which we explicitly quote passages from the writings of the Old and New Testaments, or refer to declarations of the Church's teaching authority. One final proviso: when the sceptic hears the message of faith and hope concerning a definitive finality of human existence which man will arrive at through death as the outcome of the history bf his personal freedom, let him not be too hasty or too prejudiced from the outset in suspecting that the theologian is being moved by some personal egoism of his own, or is being excessively naïve and taking things too much for granted in setting such a value on 'eternal life'. One factor alone which might deter the theologian from doing this is what he finds in the earlier strata of the Old Testament itself. On the one hand it records how a living partnership, [171] finding expression in prayer and trust, was forged between the individual and the God of the covenant of his people. And on the other, despite this fact, any real prospect of a positive fulfilment of individual life after death is as good as totally ruled out for this same individual so far as these earlier stages of Old Testament history are concerned. It may be true that the individual stages in a history of revelation are not interchangeable with one another and, in the unilinear development of sacred history, no one of them ever recurs or is really the same as any other. At the same time, however, the theologian should take warning from the Old Testament not to be excessively triumphalist in his proclaiming of the principle, 'Non omnis moriar'.

With regard to the theology of death, many themes must be set aside from the outset, even though in the traditional and established theology of death they are explicitly treated of. Thus, for instance, we shall be omitting any discussion of the universality of death, even though a whole range of theological problems are implicitly contained even here, in what seems to be a self-evident truth. We shall be compelled to set aside the question of whether what the tradition of Christian faith has to say about death and the last things really applies to every being which we can account as human in a biological sense, and so, for instance, even to one who dies at the embryonic stage, or whether, on the other hand, all this applies only to those endowed with a genuine certainty of faith, who have really used their human freedom to achieve a personal history for which they themselves are responsible. Nor will we be able to enter into the doctrine of the relationship between sin and death, although in itself this is theologically speaking of radical importance.[3] In this connection we must confine ourselves in passing simply to the remark that for Christianity's understanding of existence a point that must in any case be taken into account is that specific interpretations of death are far from having that objectivity which merely confirms further views which they themselves feel that they possess. Rather such interpretations themselves in turn derive from that darkness of death, borne of human guilt, which pervades the whole of life, and so too this interpretation of self, even if the individual interpreter may be personally blameless and honest.

LINGUISTIC FORMS AND REALITY

It seems appropriate to me to exclude from the outset (i.e. before we enter [172] directly into the question of the Christian understanding of death) to clear up certain misunderstandings, especially with regard to the question of the 'continuance of life after death', a question which, in fact, we shall not be attempting to separate from the question of death as such. First, in all Christian statements (as in all other human statements which are not mere signals

[3] On this cf. the studies of one of the author's pupils: L. Boros, 'Strukturen christlicher Vollendung', Strukturen chrstlicher Existenz, H. Schilier, E. von Severus, J Sudbrack, A Pereira edd. (Würzburg, 1968), pp 251-262, and also the well-known study by L. Boros, 'Mysterium Mortis. Der Mensch in der letzten Entscheidung (Olten/Freiburg, 1962).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of biological needs and requirements) a distinction has to be drawn between the form of language and that which is actually signified by it, a distinction such that the sense intended and the conceptual model used are neither identified nor yet fully distinguished from one another in the processes of conscious human thought, nor again can they be totally separated from one another. For there is no such thing as an idea without perception, a concept (as Thomas Aquinas already recognized) without a conversio ad phantasma.[4] And even the process of criticizing a perception at the conceptual level will always be undertaken by means of concepts which themselves in turn have to work with some other apprehension, even though they are not always simultaneously conscious that the perceptual and the conceptual elements in the concept are not identical. Given that human conceptuality and language have this special quality, which cannot be eliminated by any kind of meta-language, nor yet by computers or other technical attempts at a total rationalization of language, we have fully to take this quality into our calculations in the particular case we are considering here.

It may be true, therefore, that Christian statements about death and the 'continuance of life after death' make use of conceptual models of a mythological kind when they use conceptual systems which, in them-selves and in their origins, are spatial or physico-temporal in character in their references to 'heaven', to 'the life beyond', to the 'after-' life, to the 'continuance' of existence after death, to the parting of the soul from the body, etc But the use of such conceptual systems and forms of language does not in any sense invalidate the reality referred to by means of them, even though, by contrast with earlier ages of the human interpretation of existence, the elements of imagery or mythology and the inadequacies inherent in such systems and forms, have now come to be consciously recognized and felt to be such. Perhaps, indeed, those inadequacies are felt with such intensity that it is now totally impossible to use earlier systems and forms, at least if these are not to give rise to fatal misunderstandings [173] in men of a certain level of education, with their knowledge of the natural sciences, their technical and historical equipment, and their new perspectives of thought. On this point it seems that, as a matter of ultimate principle, a difference of this kind, between the perceptual model and the reality to which it relates is present even in modern physics, and even in those conceptual models which, within their own dimension, are contrary to one another, as for instance particles and waves, which at once assert and, by the contradiction between them, at the same time obscure, the reality to which they refer. It is, therefore, perfectly conceivable that at some point in the future men will have learnt once more freely to use conceptual models and images which are now felt to be intolerably mythological and so rejected, because by means of these they perceive and express the reality referred to without incurring the danger of succumbing to the misunderstandings of earlier times thereby evoked. In all this the situation is, as we have said, not such that a reality referred to could be expressed in non-image form and without the aid of such conceptual models, the moment we consciously reflected upon the difference between that which is referred to and the form in which it is expressed in our previous statement of it. The new statement still contains this dualism also; only it is not reflected upon, or at least not so clearly, and it is not felt as so unsatisfactory. The dualism is still present even in a negative statement. It would be eliminated only if the question itself too which such a statement is designed to answer were eliminated, i.e. if it never arose at all. Someone who denies something must have understood that which he believes he has to deny. But even here it is only in a dualism of concept and image of this kind that he can make clear to himself in virtue of his denial precisely what this is that he is denying. And he must constantly ask himself whether what he is really denying is simply the image which he rightly finds to be inadequate or erroneous, or whether he is indeed denying the reality itself signified by this

[4] On this cf. the author's article in this volume, 'Thomas Aquinas on Truth'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

mental picture. The situation is in any case a difficult one, and particularly so in the case of a negative finding. But the only way in which the difficulties could be resolved by a sceptically negative reply would be if the situation itself and the question giving rise to it simply did not exist at all.

THE END OF THE TEMPORAL DIMENSION

On the basis of these assumptions we can now consider the misinterpretations which have to be eliminated from the outset in dealing with our present subject. On these misinterpretations the following must be said: [174] the 'continuance of life' after death is not to be thought of as the self-prolongation of time, or as a further extension in time of acts and experiences following one upon another in a series arising from some neutral substantial entity which impels itself forward through ever fresh epochs, and is forever engaging in some fresh activity within these constantly changing sections of time. On the contrary it is obvious that death is in this sense the absolute end of the temporal dimension of a being of the kind to which man belongs. What takes place after death is not something new in a temporal sense, or something that is constantly changing. Man does not wander through it in a dimension beyond death of a spatial or temporal kind such that between it and our former life a frontier in space and time would be constituted within what was ultimately one and the same dimension of spatiality and temporality. The opposite conception, originating from the traditional conceptual models, and giving rise again and again to the danger of radical misunderstanding and so too of radical rejection, is ruled out if only because otherwise we would have logically to accept something like a transmigration of souls or a radical change in the ultimate basic attitude of an individual in the so-called dimension beyond death, interpretations of existence which the Christian faith radically rejects because it takes seriously the fact that this life is one and single, and is brought to its fulness in a single and definitive historical development. Life 'after death', on the contrary, is something radically withdrawn from the former temporal dimension and the former spatially conceived time, and a state of final and definitive completion and immediacy to God which is absolutely disparate from space and time, and is the end-point of a life lived once and for all in freedom precisely here, the end-point of that personal history which is brought to its completion in itself. Now someone might say that a life after death would be totally inconceivable to him unless it involved other activities and interests, unless it 'went on' after a 'change of horses', as Feuerbach would put it, and, moreover, more joyfully than before. Again someone might object that it would, after all, be terrible if our former life, with all its banalities and questionable aspects were itself to be frozen in a final and definitive state. But to this we should have to answer that it is perfectly possible to conceive of 'eternal life' in some sense, even without having to imagine anything new over and above our former life by a process of mythological fantasizing, and further that the definitive state of our former life in its historical development is far from implying a petrification of its former banalities and questionable factors. For provided that this former life of ours was accepted in the freedom of love (at the moment we do not [175] need to take into consideration the possibility of our culpably having allowed it to be lost) it included sufficient of the content of an eternal life and of infinite freedom for us to have some understanding of what these mean. For even in our present state the infinite Mystery which we call God is experienced in love and adoration; even in our present state we take absolute responsibility for our lives, experience that freedom, give and receive that love which, when they are exercised in that spirit of hope of which we shall have to speak further, are themselves experienced as having a radical validity and as final and definitive. We cannot withdraw ourselves from the absolute claim to validity

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which such freedom and such love have upon us by quietly, each in his own identity, vanishing into nothingness (whether in despair or in joy is ultimately speaking a matter of indifference here).[5] It must be said straight away here that this ultimately speaking entails no objection whatever to him who supposes that he is unable to believe in this 'eternal life' even as rightly understood. Rather it is only addressed to him so that despite the opposite interpretation of existence he may understand and savour the meaning of eternity in this sense as a matter of conscious reflection so long as in his freedom he takes the radical responsibility of loving. Eternal life is not the 'other side' so far as our personal history is concerned, but rather the radical interiority, now liberated and brought to full self-realization, of that personal history of freedom of ours which we are living through even now and which, once it has been fully brought to birth in death, can no longer be lost. The only further development which it can still achieve then is to lose itself in a loving immediacy to the ultimate Mystery of existence called God, and thereby discover its own fulness. We have mentioned above certain misinterpretations of the Christian faith with regard to 'eternal life'. Side by side with these, and subject to certain provisos consisting in more precise theological distinctions which it might perhaps be necessary to draw, we can now go on to make a further statement, even though it may entail a possible crude over-simplification of the theological propositions involved. It is this: statements about the 'continued existence of the soul after death', about its 'separation from the body', and about the 'resurrection of the body' must be accounted, so far as we are concerned, and at least for the purposes of this consideration, not as statements about different objective states of affairs, but as statements about one and the same state of affairs that is being pointed to by means of different conceptual models, statements, that is to say, about the final and [176] definitive state of the personal history of man as brought to its fulness in freedom. In view of this it is neither necessary nor helpful, at least for the range of problems with which we are concerned, to introduce a dichotomy between body and soul as a necessary assumption for the Christian conviction being referred to here. Nor are we absolutely forced to posit a temporal interval between the death of the individual and that which we really mean when we speak of the 'resurrection of the flesh'.

THE HOPE OF ETERNAL LIFE

Up to now we have been indicating how certain misinterpretations can be cleared away concerning the meaning of eternal life, which, precisely according to Christian theology, takes place at the moment of death. We can now apply ourselves to our real subject-matter, namely the hope of eternal life. Certainly so far as a Christian philosophy of belief is concerned, it is far from being so obvious as might perhaps appear at first sight that we can develop our Christian interpretation of death more or less directly from our idea of that eternal life which we hope to achieve through death. It would be just as legitimate a course to proceed in the opposite direction, attempting from a radical acceptance of death to achieve a genuine understanding of that which is meant by eternal life. But without in principle debarring ourselves from arguing in either of these two directions, let us attempt to achieve an understanding of the true nature of death on the basis of hope of eternal life.

The Christian has this hope of eternal life.[6] Such a statement is easy to make. Not only because it is far from being all that clear whether the individual Christian in concrete practice really does hope, really does hope for this eternal life, or merely uses this hope which we

[5] On this cf. the author's article in this volume, 'Experience of Self and Experience of God'.
[6] On this cf. the author's article, 'On the Theology of Hope', Theological Investigations X (London and New York, 1973), pp. 242-259.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

assert to exist as a façade and an analgesic so as to conceal an ultimate despair, this being the real truth of that Christian's existence. It is not only that to a man who is critical of himself and on his guard against his own deep-rooted egoism the word 'hope' all too easily comes to sound like some facile consolation, although in its true sense it implies the most radical exercise of the human spirit when subject to the bitterest pain, and even though hope is present only in him who first and foremost hopes on behalf of others – hopes in the responsibility he takes for them, hopes in that love for him whom we call God, and in the face of whom even authentic hope must in its turn forget its own nature. Over and above this, and on a theological [177] understanding, the word 'hope' in relation to eternal life involves a great gnoseological obscurity. Its significance is very far from having been reflected on in a really adequate sense in the traditional standard theology of the seminaries. Willy nilly the mental picture of hope which we entertain is such that that which is hoped for is something of which we already have a neutral knowledge even beforehand as in principle possible. From this the individual who entertains the hope then has to go on to a further stage because of specific difficulties in attaining the known object in the particular case envisaged, and actually hope for it. But in this view of hope we are ipso facto failing to realize its true nature in a radically theological sense. We are confusing that which is hoped for, that which is only present at all in hope, with that which is planned, that which is undertaken as the outcome of neutral speculation, that which, under certain predetermined conditions and according to certain specific methods, we have to bring to reality in the concrete. On this showing we are no longer in any real position to speak of the 'hope against all hope', of a hope such that it is only within it that that which is hoped for can be discerned at all, of a hope which constitutes the basic dimension of the Christian understanding of existence as such. Instead we have, right from the outset, missed the real theological nature of this hope, and degraded it to a more or less accurate calculation of chances which are entertained even by one who has no hope in the real sense in striving to achieve a still conceivable goal. Theological hope, on the other hand – to speak in wholly general terms – is the free and trustful commitment of love to the 'impossible', i.e. to that which can no longer be constructed from materials already present to the individual himself and at his disposal. It is called the expectation of that which is absolute gift, the giver of which withdraws himself into an unnameable incomprehensibility and can only be encountered in himself by actively engaging in such hope. This is called building on that which is without foundation, self-commitment to that which is beyond one's power to control. Christian hope never for one moment conceals or denies this character which it has. It freely exposes itself to the charge of being 'irrational', It merely declares that it continuously discovers at the basis of existence that an offering is being made at this level of the power freely to commit oneself in such hope, even if it is possible to reject this offer or to suppose that one has rejected it. It says only, in an attitude that is 'inoffensive' and at the same time one of ultimate decision, that it cannot forbid itself to conceive of the inconceivable, because that inconceivable is precisely and inescapably present in existence and Christian hope cannot see why it should not also be spoken of, seeing that in fact it [178] is spoken of by the very ones who condemn such statements or obstinately persist in holding that such statements cannot have any meaning because we cannot represent the reality concerned to ourselves or have any comprehensive knowledge of it.

Christian hope does indeed hold that, in the words of Anselm of Canterbury, it can 'rationabiliter irrationalia cogitare', because the recognition of the inconceivable itself constitutes in its turn a prerogative and a function of reason, which must be unprejudiced in its encounter with reality as it is in itself. Nevertheless this hope also constitutes its own light. It carries its own authentication within itself, and is not the mere outcome of a rational insight which – itself not involving hope – would on this theory generate and release hope. On the contrary it is a primordial exercise of human freedom which commits itself to the unity of that which it cannot synthesize by its own power, the unity which it no longer comprehends, and yet recognizes as valid. It commits itself to the unification of that which has been divided, a unification which cannot be achieved by ourselves in some higher unity which we ourselves perceive and possess as something that we recognize within ourselves. Hope is itself a unique and underived mode of knowledge in which the creative element and the element which accepts from without in an ultimate passivity constitute a paradoxical unity, because that which is hoped for is present to us only within the hope itself, and is otherwise not even present as really conceivable. At the same time it is also that which constitutes pure gift, and which is received as such. We might go on to say much more about the nature of Christian hope in general. One point which should of course be emphasized is that the word 'Christian' as applied to it is not intended to have an exclusive sense such that it could only be engaged in by the kind of individual who considers himself a Christian in an explicit sense and as a matter of Christian and social indoctrination from without. We might go on to develop the gnoseological significance of hope in more precise terms, its place in the sphere of the practical reason which does not merely follow the speculative reason as its simple outcome and as something to be achieved of man's freedom. We might go on to enquire the extent to which it belongs to a subject endowed with intellect and freedom as a matter of transcendental necessity or, over and above this, how far it is sustained (albeit unconsciously) by that which we call Christian grace, in which the goal, namely God himself, sustains the movement even as it reaches out towards this selfsame goal. But these and many other matters cannot be treated of any further at the moment.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[179]

DYING AND DEATH

We shall shortly have to speak of death and the process of dying which actually leads to death.[7] We shall have to say that it constitutes the one situation for this hope, and that in which it is at its most radical, or, to put it better, that it can constitute this. But before going on to explain this we must first say something about death itself. It is precisely to the extent that in his death the Christian has to be he who hopes that it is both possible and necessary for him not to conceal from himself the comfortless absurdity of death. One day he will actually suffer it, and for this reason he should accord it its full significance in his theology of death too, as well as he can. Precisely from the point of view of a Christian theology it would be a failure to recognize the reality of death if we sought to approach it from an attitude of anthropological dichotomy by supposing that death affects only the so-called body of man, while the so-called soul, at least if it boldly resolves upon an attitude of Stoic transcendence, will be able to view the fate of its former partner called the body unaffected and undismayed as from above. Of course we do have to draw a distinction within the single individual between a number of different elements and dimensions. We must do this if we wish to avoid stupidly joining the terribles simplificateurs of anthropology. But however true this may be, still man is one in being and act, and death is something that affects the whole man.

At this point man in all that he is has arrived at a conclusion. It may be questioned whether this conclusion constitutes the consummation or the termination of him, but in any case in death he arrives at a radical conclusion, one which, on any showing, he cannot bring under his own power. Some may, in all calmness, describe this conclusion as absurd and an arch-contradiction. So it is, if only because we may in all calmness say that death is a contradiction to positive and to negative thinking. For the absolute conclusion as such provides neither

[7] 'E. Kübler-Ross, 'On Death and Dying', Amer. Eccl. Rev. 161 (1969), pp. 351 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

thinking of a positive kind with any subject-matter, nor yet thinking of a negative kind, seeing that this latter is in all cases capable of operating only from the basis of a positive subject-matter, and its shift away from this is only partial. Even as the object of thought, death is, in relation to the individual existence of each person, as inconceivable as absolute nothingness in relationship to the sum total of reality. Death as a conclusion is the absolute powerlessness of man, in which we certainly also become too powerless to conceive of death or of God. But the dying man, who of his freedom possesses his [180] own life, nevertheless inescapably confronts death with a demand that it must constitute the sum total of his life as an act of freedom in which the whole of life is gathered up. For the very nature of freedom and its claim to the absolute dignity of responsibility and of love belonging to it cannot give its assent to a mere empty draining away of life. If there is anything that is of concern to man it is death, And it is precisely this that radically repels him. We can say in all calmness that to think about death is as impossible as the thought of death, because, in contrast to all other objects of thought, whether possible or actual, one's own death (incidentally just as God himself) is something that we cannot comprehend in our thoughts, bring under our power, and so manipulate, and hence one who, in his thinking, seeks always to bring that which he is thinking about under his control will be thwarted in the case of death.[8] It is, and remains, a fact that from all the points of view already mentioned and many more besides, death is the absurd arch-contradiction of existence. If it were not both possible and necessary for the Christian too to experience it as such, how could the Christian assert and recognize that death is the manifestation of sin, of that 'no' to the absolute truth and love which dwell in God, which is at once free and overthrows freedom?[9]

In this connection it must be said that we, presumably different in this from animals, cannot refrain from thinking about death, that we cannot 'pigeonhole' the fact of death. That the opinion of Epicurus to the effect that death does not concern us so long as we are alive, and, when we are dead, cannot be of concern to anyone, simply does not correspond to the reality of human existence, because in fact this advice in itself, and in the very act of consigning death to oblivion, gives it a place in life and so betrays the impossibility of putting the advice into practice. Death is not merely any kind of occurrence within our life, or coming at its conclusion. Rather, whether we suppress it or admit it, it is that in virtue of which we are continually discovering the nature of our own existence as finite and so mortal through that supreme apprehension in which we transcend everything assignable to categories within the space-time dimension. Among other factors, this one is of constant concern to us: the absurd arch-contradiction of our life. This is something more than a mere quality or attribute of death belonging to it to the extent that we seek to set ourselves [181] apart from it as those who live. Rather it is something that we ourselves are.

THE EXERCISE OF FREEDOM IN DEATH

We shall now attempt to show that this situation of death constitutes precisely the true and necessary situation of Christian hope. And the first point to emphasize is that the state of hopelessness or (in order to avoid unnecessary verbal conflicts) the radical inescapability of this situation of death constitutes precisely the prior condition which makes hope in the strictly theological sense possible. In other words it is something which the Christian is least of all in a position to conceal from himself. Hope, in contrast to foresight, with its function of [8] Joh. Hofmeier, 'Vom gewussten zum gelebten Tod', StdZ 186 (1970), pp. 338-352 (a survey of the relevant literature).

[9] On the character of death as mystery cf. e.g. Y. Congar, J. Daniélou, H. M. Féret, et. al., Le mystère de la mort et sa célébration (Paris, 1951), and also I. Lepp, Death and its Mysteries (New York, 1968).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

planning and controlling, is possible from the outset only in a situation in which we really are radically at the end; where the possibility of acting for ourselves is really and finally closed to us; where we can find absolutely no further resources whatever within ourselves by which to achieve a higher synthesis between a state of radical powerlessness and the supreme exercise of freedom in death; where we become those who are utterly delivered up to forces from without; where even the possibility of a heroic attitude of faith or a stoic apatheia, or even a wild protest against the absurdity of existence, is withdrawn from us; where we are deprived of even the innermost and ultimate subjectivity of our existence in its absolute depths. This is the situation of Christian hope.

Of course it is open to us to object straightway at this point that if death constitutes the ultimate state of absolute and dreary powerlessness, while Christian hope must still be conceived of as an activity on man's part, then there is no longer any place or any possibility of existence even for Christian hope. Certainly as a matter of sober logic we must assign Christian hope to a place during life, and, as far as it goes, in the process of dying, and not assign it to that point of absolute void which we have to understand death to be. But if we have to do with death even in life, the question both can and must be posed of what attitude we are to take, can take, or ought to take, towards this absolute null point. And it is precisely here that the answer of Christianity comes: hope in eternal life – though admittedly in that sense which we have previously sought to give to the phrase eternal life in order to prevent misunderstandings of it. Of course on a radical view of it this hope does view God and eternal life as one and the same, and the exercise of this hope does not draw upon a reason unthreatened by death or a knowledge of God already acquired from some [182] other source such that from it an innocuous reduplication of the real Christian hope could easily be constructed. Real Christian hope, faced with death, hopes in fact precisely while recognizing to the full the powerlessness of man either in thinking or willing when confronted with the absurd arch-contradiction of existence. And what it hopes for is a unity, a reconciliation of the contradictory elements, a meaning for existence, an eternal validity for love as freely entered into, an assent to absolute truth, so that all this that is hoped for is truly hoped for, i.e. is neither to be manipulated by one's own autonomous thinking, nor controlled by one's own autonomous power. All is hope, even the act of thinking in one who can still only think about the meaning of death, and is no longer in a position to think 'through' it comprehensively.

NOTHINGNESS AND FINALITY

To hope for this, however, since it is and remains hope which cannot be authenticated from any other source, but only in itself, could not be simply an exercise of sheer arbitrary choice, as if someone might hope here and now to become emperor of China tomorrow. This hope draws its life from that finality, as from an element inherent in itself, one of which we have already spoken briefly, that finality with which the individual freely decides for himself what is to constitute the good that he aims at, his personal love, his radical responsibility beyond any considerations of reward. The nature of this moral act is such that unless we are to deny the fact that it is demanded of us in an absolute sense, it cannot be regarded as radically transitory. It itself would surrender its absolute character if it were to recognize the death of itself as its appropriate end and as an element inherent in its own nature. In fact even one who feels death to be the radical and absurd arch-contradiction of existence does also concede this in principle. For what could prompt him to feel that death was so contradictory if in the act of dying everything were, of its very nature, to seek out the finality of finalities and to accept it as appropriate to itself. It might be said that in the very moment in which someone does what is proper to himself, the act of greatness, the total commitment, the act of love or duty in the most radical sense, he should of course not think of this as sheer finality, and should not thereby himself destroy himself in an attitude of ultimate cynicism, the only alternative being that he should, despite all, perform the supreme act open to man in an attitude of inconceivable, indeed absurd, heroism in response to this absurd finality. But if someone were to say this, then we should have to reply along these [183] lines: in a moment of this kind of a free act of love, radical loyalty, etc. there is one reason why man cannot think of the nothingness, in a temporal sense, inherent in this act that is proper to his own nature, namely that it is precisely not subject to time. A further question might be what place there can still be for a protest against the absurdity of the nothingness of existence once we take up the following position: the moment we seek to be honest and truthful we have to accept this same nothingness as having a legitimate place in existence seeing that it is an intrinsic element in that which is proper to it. On this showing we ought to identify ourselves with Paul and ask why the maxim 'Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die' (1 Cor. 15:32) is in that case so meaningless or unworthy, if after all it can be claimed to have the value of sober truth. And if in reply someone made the further rejoinder that it is, after all, precisely the greatness and glory of human existence to maintain this protest against absurdity in the midst, and in view of, the absurdity inherent in human existence itself, and to practise love without recompence, loyalty etc., then such heroism under protest of its very nature excludes at least this finality which renders all meaningless. And then we should have to ask why at least this which is most deeply proper to oneself, namely our protest against the absurdity of being delivered over to death, cannot allow the truth to be borne in upon us as it really is. How too can it be that it is only the appearance of a definitive finality that we encounter, seeing that everything carries within itself from the outset the marks of that death which brings an end to all as the genuine truth?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

All this should not be taken to mean that hope should be generated and built up through some factor which, in the last analysis, is exterior to itself. The very fact that this which is eternally valid is present in and with the absurdity of the experience of death is in itself enough to show that this is not what is meant. But hope is offered a choice. It must choose precisely because that which is valid in this sense on the one hand and death on the other cannot be reconciled on the basis of human nature itself. And hope opts for that which is offered to it as the eternally valid in the midst of an existence in process of dying. It chooses the eternally valid, rejects the death as the final and definitive factor, and gives the name of God to that power which is not its own, yet which removes, by reconciliation, the absurd arch-contradiction present in existence through death. This hope is exercised on behalf of all men, for all men are loved in it and it is not confined merely to the hoping subject himself. And hence the subject of this hope hopes too concerning his fellow men, who suppose that the only realistic interpretation they are able to come to about themselves [184] is that they are the hopeless, that they too, beneath and beyond this supposed hopelessness, are the hopeful. How could hope think otherwise? In fact it experiences these fellow men as those who love and those who are radically loyal and selfless, and it refuses to interpret all this as a mere ideological façade in a world made up only of an egoistic and merciless struggle for existence, an existence which for all ends in the void of death. But if hope discovers itself afresh in the love and loyalty which it encounters in others – because in this hope is brought to its fulness in its protest against the absurdity of a life that is dedicated to death – then it will be giving no offence and doing no injustice to him who supposes that he has, in a spirit of defiant honesty, to interpret existence in a sense that is hopeless. For why should it not be the case that for some individuals their concrete situation is such that the only way in which it is possible for them to achieve a radical acceptance of death in which nothing is veiled (and this, after all, is the condition of true Christian hope) is for them to abandon themselves to the darkness of death even though it brings them despair? Why should it not be the case that many who die can only cry aloud with the dying Jesus: 'My God why hast thou forsaken me?', and in the midst of this abandonment that other word rises up silently in their innermost depths: 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit'? If even we Christians are in constant danger of using the words which, properly speaking, only Christian hope as such should pronounce, as a false consolation, which can never form any true basis for hope but represents an attempt to cover over the darkness and terror of death? Why should it not be possible even for such as these to entertain Christian hope unwittingly in the very depths of their souls. The borderline between real and final despair on the one hand, and illusion with regard to death on the other, is difficult to draw. We could here adapt a saying of Jesus so as to run like this: With men it is impossible, but in the power of God it is possible to draw this borderline, so that man finds his strength neither in despair nor in the illusion of self-sufficiency, but rather, believing and loving in hope, commits himself to the incomprehensible Mystery which comes to him and takes effect upon him in death.'[10] We call this mystery the God of hope (Rom. 15:13).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

FREEDOM AS THE EVENT OF DEFINITIVE FINALITY

Perhaps in conclusion we should return to a difficulty in the Christian [185] interpretation of death to provide a fuller explanation of it. It is one which in my opinion is more covered over than solved in the language of popular theology. In seeking to understand our own basic tenets we inevitably proceed from a basis of ideas drawn from the physical and temporal world. Right from the first we are conditioned by these ideas, and so we constantly think of all reality in terms of space and time extending in a linear prolongation in two opposite directions. We assign all reality to a place in the future as the past or the future as parts of a linear prolongation of time extending to infinitude between two poles. Unless we have learnt to subject this conceptual model to critical questioning (though obviously this does not mean simply to do away with it) the question arises of how on this showing something can continue forever into the future in this linear prolongation when manifestly it only began a short time ago in the past, and its existence does not extend backwards in this direction into infinity at all. It is not surprising that the idea has been seized upon of a transmigration of souls or a pre-earthly existence of 'souls' (an idea which appeared even within Christianity, for instance in Origen). These ideas have been developed in order to eliminate the apparent anomaly that a future extending into infinitude is ascribed to a being which has not had any past extending backwards into infinitude.'[11] So long as we subject ourselves uncritically to this image of time, we will necessarily limit man in both directions as being radically subject to time. Obviously we have no intention here of contesting the fact that the physical man, compelled to seek his own identity from within space and time by relating himself to that which is alien and other to himself, is also a being subject to space and time. But it is not on this basis that we should think of his ultimate and free subjectivity if we are to avoid involving ourselves in this insoluble dilemma. At a level more ultimate than his state of belonging to space and time or time conceived of in spatial terms, he is a being endowed with a freedom which must [10] For the foregoing ideas cf. for instance F. F. Wiplinger, Der personal verstandener Tod (Freiburg, 1970), and E. Jüngel, Tod (Stuttgart, 1971); but also 'Der Treffer aus dem Absoluten. Informationen zu einer Theologie des Todes', Evang. Kommentare 2 (1969), pp. 623-630.

[11] On the problems of time in connection with the question of death cf. also R. Ochs, The Death in Every Now (New York, 1969), and the reports or interpretations of experiences with drugs, N. W. Pahnke, 'The Psychedelic Mystical Experience in the Human Encounter with Death', Harv. Theol. Rev. 62 (1969), pp. 1-20, and the reply by a natural scientist published in the same number (H. K. Beecher, pp. 21-25), as well as a reply by a theologian (G. D. Kaufmann, pp. 26-32).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

achieve its own fulness. Now freedom precisely does not consist in a quest to achieve ever fresh changes at will. Rather it is of its very nature the event of a real and definitive finality which cannot be [186] conceived of otherwise than something that is freely achieved once and for all. And to that extent man is the event of that state of definitive finality which we call eternity, and falsely, or by a misinterpretation, reduce in its turn to the dimension of linear time extending endlessly backwards and forwards. To the extent that this freedom is such that it must achieve its own fulness, it has laws of its own and conditioning factors of its own which are not at its disposal even when it is free precisely in the attitude it adopts towards these, and has in this sense a 'beginning'. This beginning, however, is as such not the mere occurrence of events and circumstances which precede freedom in time. Rather it signifies something which is ultimately and underivably new, and which, therefore, can be allotted to a specific point in the external linear development of time only in a secondary sense.

Now in order to picture to ourselves this modality of the event of freedom, namely the fact that it has a beginning and a definitive end, we have not at our command, of course, any such convenient conceptual scheme as is available to us through the experiences of spatial movement and the kind of time that is ultimately acceptable in this. The only way in which we can objectify in words this free occurrence which we ultimately experience and produce is for us to make use of the conceptual schemes which belong to external time. But even as we use these, and cannot avoid using them, we have also at the same time to adopt a critical attitude to them.

In fact we are gradually educated by the natural sciences rather than by any philosophical critique to realize how cautious we have to be in supposing that reality as it in fact exists can be apprehended by means of these popular conceptual models drawn from everyday life. If, therefore, again and again we feel ourselves oppressed by the real experience that we cannot see beyond death as the true end in a vision which could advance further within the same linear concept of time, then this still does not represent any argument against, or any condemnation of, the Christian hope of eternal life in the real meaning which this has. Where love and loyalty are truly exercised, and where the absolute truth which guides us is accepted, there ipso facto that definitive finality is achieved which we must seek not in some linear development of time after death, but in that state of definitive liberation which is achieved and brought to its fulness in death. This is the Christian hope, this alone, but this in a very true sense.[12]

[12] Two authors approach the question from the basis of the Bible, R. Pesch, 'Zur Theologie des Todes', Bibel und Leben 10 (1969), pp. 9-15, and M. Laconi, 'La morte nei vangeli', Sac. Doc. 13 (1968), pp. 395-426.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[187]

PART THREE

Christology

[189]

12

HUMAN ASPECTS OF THE BIRTH OF CHRIST

The decisive factor in the mystery which we believe in and celebrate at Christmas is, of course, the advent of the eternal word of God as our Redemption in the flesh, and so as something which affects all Christians alike, and is in principle no different in its effect upon the Christian doctor than upon other Christians.[1] Of course Christian faith is also aware of the special factors in the conception and birth of Jesus (something which we shall have to treat of rather more fully at a later stage) precisely from that experience which the disciples subsequently had of Jesus in his acts, his words, his witness to himself, his death, and his Resurrection. This retrospective view, proceeding from Jesus himself to his origins, is legitimate. To the extent that he has proved himself in his life and Resurrection to be the absolute Word of divine grace, addressed to us through the deed of God wrought in him, Christian believers know that he was this Word of God in our flesh right from his origins, and did not merely become so gradually in the course of his life, though this is not to rule out a development of Jesus' human awareness at the level of conscious explicitation in terms of concepts and words, and thereby the character of Jesus' ultimate understanding of himself as mediated. Of course there are certain basic historical data with regard to Jesus' origins, some of which are obvious (e.g. Nazareth as his place of origin, the name of his mother, the existence of a group of relatives still known in the early Christian community etc.), and some of which can be deduced over and above that which we can accept as assured. But we are still forced to conclude that there are some factors acknowledged by believers as belonging to the origins of Jesus' life, which are not properly speaking handed down by historical tradition, factors which, while they are indeed rooted in the [190] actual event concerned, are theologically speaking known to us by a fully justified process of retrospection from what we know about the 'adult' Jesus himself. Thus from our knowledge of him at this stage we deduce what must have been the case 'at the beginning'. Now when retrospective theological deductions to the origins of Jesus are involved in certain of the statements which faith makes about those origins, then we can also go on to say that the content and the limits of such statements are determined by that which really follows compellingly from a retrospective process of this kind and what does not. This retrospective process may yield a legitimate stock of findings with a specific content. But it is possible that in the concrete, in dealing with an event thus arrived at by a process of retrospective deduction, we are unable to recognize where such distinctions should be drawn, even though we would be able to know them if it were a question of a historical datum following from the direct experience of the origin as a [1] On this subject cf. the author's article, 'Virginitas in Partu', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 134-162, and also 'Dogmatische Bemerkungen zur Jungfrauengeburt', Zum Thema Jungfrauengeburt, Frank, Kilian, Knoch. Lattke, and Rahner edd. (Stuttgart, 1970), pp. 121-158.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

phenomenon in itself. What we mean in more precise detail by what has just been said, and why this abstract principle has a practical importance, will appear straightway the moment we apply this principle to the case with which we are concerned in the present study.

When the Christian doctor applies himself to the question of Jesus' birth, he will surely feel especially inclined to concern himself over and above that which is of crucial importance in this Christmas mystery, with the biological aspects of this birth of the Lord. By this we do not mean the conception of Jesus by his mother without the intervention of a human father. This doctrine of Christian tradition raises too many questions for the theologian for it to be capable of being treated of here, within the space of so brief a consideration. What we are referring to here, rather, is the biological aspects of the actual process of the birth itself. At Christmas the Christian doctor may turn his mind to this biological side of Jesus' birth, and if he is theologically well instructed, then what will straightway strike him will be the traditional Christian doctrine of the 'virginity of the Blessed Virgin in the actual moment of the birth'. And so today the question arises for Christians in general, and for the Christian doctor in particular, of what really is meant by this 'virginitas in partu', in which the special factor in the birth of Jesus is represented as consisting in its physical aspect. For after all, once we abstract from this doctrine of 'virginitas in partu', it is obvious that since Jesus is truly man, his birth too is the same as that of all other men.

But how should the Christian and the Christian doctor conceive of what is meant by this 'virginitas in partu'? On the one hand he wants unreservedly to respect the traditional Christian doctrine, yet on the other [191] he does not want to think of the kind of 'miracles' which strike him, conditioned as he is by modern outlooks and the modern environment, as too incredible, or which give him the impression of being too strongly mythological in character.

At this point we do not want to concern ourselves with the question of what theological qualification is to be ascribed to the doctrine of the 'virginitas in partu'. We will also pass over a question which might perhaps be of concern to the discerning biologist, namely whether the word 'virginity' as used in this phrase, 'virginitas in partu', is in its real meaning altogether suitable in its application here, or whether it would not be better to use some other term than 'virginity' to express what is meant, drawing our expressions from a clearer, more accurate, and more informed terminology. For our present purposes we are accepting the traditional understanding of the statement of the 'virginitas in partu'. Those who understand it in this sense explain it as follows: the process of birth takes place without any pain to the mother, and without the hymen virginale being destroyed by the passage of the child as it is born. The question is this: whether the concrete conception of the 'virginitas in partu' is simply identical with the doctrine of such a 'virginitas in partu', and therefore whether this particular conception remains binding so long as the doctrine itself is maintained, or whether alternatively we can maintain and formulate the real content of this doctrine without simply having to assent to this conception in its entirety, which traditional theology uses to explain that which is unique in the birth of Jesus. From the observation of various factors in the development of this doctrine's dogmatic history we can surely feel free to draw the conclusion that the 'virginitas in partu' has come down to us not as a record ultimately deriving from Mary herself and relating what she herself experienced in the birth of Jesus, but that on the contrary it involves a retrospective theological deduction as to how this birth must have taken place for theological reasons based on the unique character of the child himself. We cannot, within the present context, accord a separate presentation to each of these factors as observed, which belong to the category of the history of dogma. We must confine ourselves to pointing out that the New Testament itself contains no record of a 'virginitas in partu', and that it is only a very long time after the origins of belief in Christ that we encounter this doctrine for the first time in recognizable form, and, moreover, primarily in theological circles which are suspected of having been Docetist. But even if we assume that what we have in this doctrine of the 'virginitas in partu' is a retrospective theological deduction to a reality, and not a historical tradition of that [192] reality, deriving from its initial occurrence in itself, this still does not mean that such a retrospective deduction is illegitimate. It is perfectly possible that the conclusion to which it leads constitutes an objective state of affairs. But the meaning and the limitations of what is thus concluded to needs to be tested and subjected to the question of what we can or cannot come to know by a retrospective deduction of this kind in view of its premises.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In any attempt we make to carry out a retrospective deduction of this kind our attempt will be accounted legitimate from a theological point of view provided it concludes to the substance of the traditional doctrine concerning the 'virginitas in partu'. And it will still be legitimate even though it does not in any sense justify us in concluding that this necessarily entails assenting to all the conceptions and mental images which have been employed in the attempt to provide vivid illustrations of what this 'virginitas in partu' signifies. It is true that what we are enquiring into is the human aspect of the birth of Jesus himself. Nevertheless, in accordance with the traditional view of the question we may concentrate more explicitly in our enquiry on the birth of Jesus precisely in its aspect as an event in the life of his mother Mary. For precisely this phrase 'virginitas in partu' is traditionally interpreted first and foremost as a statement about Mary herself. On the basis of dogmatic christology taken as a whole we must say first and foremost that when Mary gave birth to Jesus it was a genuinely human birth. Such a statement is to be understood not as a concession to those who shrink from the miraculous, or as a mere statement of human experience. Rather it is a genuine statement of faith, for the true, genuine, and full humanity of Jesus is a dogma of faith, so that without fear of contradiction we can modify the saying of the teacher of the early Church to the effect that our own birth would not be redeemed unless it had been 'accepted' too in the birth of Jesus. But in interpreting this statement we must invoke a no less obvious theological truth, namely that at the moment of the birth the mother and the child were human beings capable of suffering. And so at least initially we should presume that they were in fact subject to the pains of birth until the contrary is shown to have been the case. In this respect if there is something special, something in the nature of an exception to be asserted about this particular birth, then it must in a real sense be based on theological arguments, and should not ipso facto simply be assumed to be the case as the only fitting conclusion to be drawn in relation to such a birth as this. Jesus is truly man, and it is only as man that he was able to be our Redeemer. And for him and his mother pains are, in the fullest sense, 'fitting'. A [193] doctor is least of all likely to see anything unfitting in the pains of birth. Nor can Gen. 3:16 be invoked as an argument against this, for the Redeemer, and so too his mother, precisely accept a position in which they are subject to the consequences of sin (Gal. 4:4 2 Cor. 5:21). If, and to the extent that Gen. 3: 16 is to be taken, therefore, in the sense that the pains of birth are an expression and a manifestation of the universal situation of sin in mankind, the birth of Jesus from Mary is not in itself such that it needs to be made an exception to this law. So far as the naturalness of Jesus' birth is concerned, it must be emphasized once more that it also includes the fact that Jesus came into the world through the natural processes of human birth. The traditional idea that Jesus came forth from the body of his mother in a manner similar to that in which he came forth from the closed tomb at the Resurrection must, therefore, be understood in the light of this, or else abandoned. Even Rathramnus, the 9th century Benedictine, took his stand against such Docetist or Manichee ideas, which all too easily come to enter into this question.

Now every doctor knows that the concrete processes of birth, in their effect upon mother and child, can vary very greatly from one individual to another despite their overall similarity. For all that the same physiological laws apply, the birth of a human being, at least

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

as first and foremost an act on the mother's part, is an event affecting the whole of human nature, and hence, as it takes place in the concrete, depends to a large extent upon the particular disposition and attitude of the individual mother concerned. Taken even in a purely general sense, pain (regarded as a physiological occurrence) can be experienced in very different ways, according to whether the individual subject is in a position positively to integrate this 'pain' into the totality of his active living or not. Pain as lived through is itself from the outset pain that is interpreted by the free and intelligent subject, and so true is this that under certain circumstances one and the same physiological process, taken subjectively and as affecting the whole of the individual concerned, constitutes a pain (in the popular sense of the term) for one individual and not for another. On this basis when we say that as a matter of general principle Jesus and Mary were liable to pain, and when we presume in principle that in the case of Jesus' birth they were subject to the ordinary birth pangs, these statements must, once more, be subject to a certain crucial proviso. If we are thinking of the sinlessness of the Blessed Virgin, her integrity (i.e. her freedom from concupiscence,[2] taking this to mean a state in which it is impossible fully [194] to integrate the impulses of the physical side of our natures and those deriving from the environment about us within our personal decisions as subjects), then it is clear that that which, in physiological terms, we would call 'pain' would be, and actually was, in her case experienced quite differently than with us. With us this occurrence is experienced as pain. Whether or not we still wish to call it by this name as experienced by Mary is perhaps ultimately speaking a mere question of terminology. For in any case the believing Christian can say this: the birth which took place here was, after all, different from birth as we know it, because she who gave birth and he who was born were different from ourselves in virtue of their sinlessness and their integrity (though this should not be conceived of in a 'paradisal' sense), for all that they made themselves one with us. Now once we recognize this as a starting-point for a true interpretation of the phrase 'virginitas in partu', albeit one that is not decked out in mythological hues, we can surely go onto regard the conception of the 'hymen virginale' being unbroken as one of which we have no historical knowledge at all. Moreover even without this we can continue to maintain a positive meaning for the phrase 'virginitas in partu'. This conception, then, even considered as a theological conclusion, can be shown not to have any compelling force, and therefore is not binding as a matter of faith, the more so since in this respect the theological tradition is not so univocal as is sometimes supposed.

[2] cf. the author's 'The Theological Concept of Concupiscentia', Theological Investigations I (London, 1961), pp. 347-382.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[195]

13

THE QUEST FOR APPROACHES LEADING TO AN UNDERSTANDING OF THE MYSTERY OF THE GOD-MAN JESUS

The situation may possibly be otherwise than I suppose. But I believe that there are three possible approaches to that mysterious relationship with Jesus through which, in the very act of living itself, that is achieved and really comes to be understood ('realized') which the Church's faith recognizes about Jesus. Approaches to a mysterious relationship, I say. What we have to recognize here is both the distinction and the connection between the approach as such and the reference of our whole personal existence to Jesus.

These three approaches are constituted by the following factors: one's fellow man (one's neighbour), death, and the future. They are closely interconnected. But we have to have taken these factors of our neighbour, death (to the extent that we can do this as a matter of 'living' experience) and hope in the future in full and radical seriousness in order that they may point us on to that relationship with Jesus which alone constitutes the basis for an explicit and genuine Christianity.'[1]

Before we go any further, before we proceed to speak of each of these three approaches in turn, one point of concern which we encounter particularly often nowadays requires an answer: we do not really know (at least at the level of conscious reflection) what is properly speaking meant by this Christian relationship with Jesus, and why such a thing constitutes something more than a mere 'ideology' which we 'conjure up' for ourselves in order to escape from the harsh realities of the real world.

[196] What has to be said on this point? First and foremost: Can we really love Jesus? Whatever his fate may have been 'after' death, has he not been withdrawn from us and from any possible relationship of love with us by this death? When the question is put in these terms, then we are really referring to that person who once lived, him himself in his earthly lot, rather than as an ideal to which we have assigned an historical name more or less adventitiously and of our own volition. It is the historical Jesus – not an ideal or an ideology – whom we are referring to when we ask whether we can 'still' love Jesus. In rejoinder it might be asked: Can we love anyone whom we have loved in life and who has died? Must we not go on loving him if our love for him during his life was such that it embraced the individual who was loved unreservedly? Have we not precisely a responsibility for the dead – in other words a radical connection with them? Can we, or should we, simply turn away from them with a shrug of the shoulders, on the grounds that they are precisely no more, or at least that they have been withdrawn by death from any conceivable sphere of life available to us? No! Love and responsibility cannot detach themselves from the beloved once they are dead. They still have a claim upon us. We may, perhaps, forget them, because we do not really know what we can 'do' for them, because, precisely, we are unable really to preserve and integrate our own life in its various sections, from which they cannot be blotted out within the flux of time. But what we cannot say is this: the dead are in principle of no further concern to us. Their abiding claim upon us is such that they are not transformed into an ideal ideological

[1] The considerations here presented are intended as preliminaries leading both to the development of a personal attitude towards Jesus as a matter of one's own faith, and also to a consciously worked out christological process of reflection within theology. But since such approaches actually belong, so far as we are concerned, to the 'reality of Jesus' (in order so to express it) they also have their place – once we have explicitly thought them out – in christology.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

demand upon us which has to be respected for the future (our attitude to those fallen in war or murdered at Auschwitz etc. is often misinterpreted somewhat in this sense, as though a state of affairs belonging to the past remained in force throughout a quite different future to which these dead do not belong). Rather their life, as still laying a constant demand upon us is forever both for them and for us. They do not prolong their existence in a different life, one with which, admittedly, on this hypothesis we could not really have any genuine relationship. They remain as real factors forever, with this life of theirs which we ourselves have experienced. This is why they both can be, and are, loved. The concrete manner in which they enjoyed a real relationship with us during their lives may vary very greatly. But in the last analysis this is not of fundamental importance for our relationship to one who, though he has 'died', is still living. A child too can love his mother and accept that her life still in a real sense continues as a force that lays demands upon him even when this same mother died in giving birth. Nor do any of these [197] genuine possibilities of an abiding relationship of love with those who, though they have died are still living, gainsay the fact that the majority of men have only very rudimentary experiences of this relationship, indeed may perhaps go so far as explicitly to deny it when they are explicitly brought face to face with it. We men are, in fact, beings who realize their ultimate potentialities only gradually and in fragmentary form, and not all epochs necessarily offer equally favourable situations for the realization of such potentialities.[2]

From all this it follows that we can love Jesus too, accept as of radical significance the demands which his life lays upon us, and in accepting these demands affirm this life as an abiding and continuing force, as 'existing'. We have not yet reached a stage at which we can straightway proceed to raise the question of what approach we should adopt so that this love can include precisely those special qualities (in its actual nature and in what we can recognize about it) which belong precisely to it, as distinct from the love we bear to other men. All that we are attempting to establish at this point is that he who regards Jesus and his life as entailing a final and definite demand upon him personally, is in effect affirming that he is living, and has been delivered from death. On any other showing he would not be assenting to Jesus himself in his claims upon us, but assenting to him only as an abstract ideal, an 'idea' which we have conjured up for ourselves at most in connection with the past life of Jesus, but which ultimately speaking would be independent of him.

Now that we have drawn attention to this point we can go on to enquire into the three approaches already mentioned, enabling us to understand what the Christian faith acknowledges about Jesus.

The first approach consists in love of neighbour.[3] Jesus himself shows us what this means in Mt. 25, where he asserts an identity between himself and our neighbour. Every love for one's fellow man has, at least in its nature, the character of an absolute commitment of one's personal existence to that fellow man. Hence where there is real love, it is achieved whether consciously or unconsciously, in the hope that, despite all the questionableness and fragility by reason of which that fellow man cannot in any sense supply a complete justification of the absolute character of [198] the love that is borne to him, such a commitment is reasonable, and need not necessarily meet with ultimate disappointment. Now in Jesus and through him this hope has been confirmed. In his person a man appears in palpable and historical guise for whom and in whom it is manifest (to those who believe) that that love in which man lovingly commits himself to him can, in its absolute character, no longer meet with disappointment. This man, therefore, can enable us to commit ourselves in love to our fellow man too,

[2] On this line of argument cf. the author's ideas as presented in the article immediately following the present one and entitled 'Remarks on the Importance of the History of Jesus for Catholic Dogmatics'.
[3] On this see also the author's article 'Reflections on the Unity Between the Love of Neighbour and the Love of God' in Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 232-249.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

justifying us in this and enabling us to hope in the total and unreserved character of this commitment. But let us imagine a man who, in virtue of his very existence, his human lot, and the final and definitive outcome of this, provides an absolute justification for a total and unreserved love for himself and his brethren, and overcomes all ultimate reserves on the part of himself as the subject of this love with regard to the ultimate questionability of the beloved. Such a man as this is (though this is a point which we cannot develop further here) precisely he whom the Christian faith in its traditional formulation acknowledges as the God-man, as that man who is one with God to such an extent that if we commit ourselves to him unconditionally in the sureness of faith and hope, then the goal of this love of ours, which embraces both the beloved and ourselves, becomes God himself, and no longer solely an individual man in all his radical questionability. But for the same reason the converse is also true: he who loves Jesus as one who lives, with a love that is justified and sure of itself, and in an attitude of absolute trust that recognizes its absolute basis in Jesus himself, such a one has already accepted Jesus as him whom the Christian faith proclaims, whether he does or does not understand the classic and abidingly valid formulae of christology.

A second approach, leading to an understanding of what Jesus is and is for us, can be discovered in the experience of death.[4] This approach is primarily connected with that which has been said with regard to love of neighbour as leading to an understanding of Jesus. The absolute character of such love seems in fact to be threatened in the most radical sense by the very fact of experiencing the death of the beloved. And even if we say that such love is asserting that the beloved survives as a final and definitive force, still this would in its turn lead to the further question of what grounds there can be for so boldly hoping that the beloved does remain as a final and definitive force in this sense, and where that man is whose fate, regarded as brought about by God, enables the victory which such a [199] final and definitive state represents to be manifested to our eyes in historical terms. But even apart from this, the experience of death constitutes an approach enabling us to understand the reality of Jesus and his significance for us. However much each individual may die his own death, it still remains true in the deepest sense that death is the common fate of all men, and that in it they are united among themselves by having to endure that which is most extreme and most ultimate. And no one is justified in adopting an attitude of indifference to his fellow. But at what point in our personal history do we achieve the concrete hope that this that is most ultimate and extreme in our existence, in which we are absolutely torn apart from ourselves, is not the victory of the sheer empty nothingness of man, but in the contrary opens onto the absolute blessedness of the love of God and his eternity? In the end it is only in a man whose 'resurrection' is experienced in faith and hope as the crown and fulfilment of our common death. But if in such a resurrection the final and definitive assent of God to us is recognized as the true reality of the death of Jesus and of our own death, then the risen Lord is believed in as the unsurpassable word of salvation uttered by God to us, and as the bringer of eschatological salvation. And again we can assert this: he who is thus believed in in the power of a hope that overcomes death and as the basis of this hope, is precisely he who is acknowledged in the Christian faith as the incarnate Word In whom God has definitively and victoriously uttered himself to man.

On this basis it becomes, properly speaking, ipso facto intelligible why and how we can designate the factor of hope in the absolute future[5] as an approach enabling us to understand what Jesus is and what he means for us. We are speaking of a hope which hopes on behalf of [4] On this cf. also the author's ideas as presented in this volume in 'Ideas for a Theology of Death', and also in On the Theology of Death (2nd ed., Eng. transl. 1969).

[5] On this see also the author's article, 'On the Theology of Hope', Theological Investigations V (London and New York, 1973), pp. 242-259, and the various studies in which the future is treated of from one point of view or another as an active factor.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

all, and, moreover, hopes for a final and definitive victory as the outcome of the history of mankind, even though it cannot point to any definable goal already filled out with a content which we can recognize (for to do this would be to turn from the inconceivable and mysterious God of the future to make an idol of the future itself fashioned by our own hands). Such a hope as this must necessarily search history to discover how far it has already advanced in its course towards the future. This is not in order to anticipate the absolute future by already formulating it in ideological terms, or in order falsely to transform it into a goal to be constituted as such by man himself. [200] Rather it is because this hope must render an account of itself in the concrete. It should not be prohibited from enquiring into the 'signs of the times', seeing that it is genuinely hoping for its own fulfilment, and that this, after all, is destined to be achieved in and through history. Nor should it restrain itself, from motives of false diffidence, from itself noticing in history that history itself has already entered upon a phase in which the possibility of an ultimate collapse of history into the void of God as its absolute future is already past. Once we have, in a spirit of faith, seized upon the 'Resurrection' of Jesus, then we have grasped the fact that the one and single history of the world as a whole can no longer fail, even though the question of how the personal history of the individual will turn out remains open, and belongs to the absolute future of God which brings blessing indeed, but still at the same time remains at the level of inconceivable and indefinable mystery. But once the word of God's self utterance, in the case of a concrete individual in history, is present never again to be withdrawn, and accepted in faith as the absolute future of history, then that unity between God and man is present and believed in too which Christian faith acknowledges in the 'hypostatic union'.

The question must be asked how we can love our neighbour unreservedly, committing our own lives in a radical sense on his behalf how such a love is not rendered invalid even by death, and whether we can hope in death to discover not the end but the consummation in that absolute future which is called God. And anyone who does ask these questions is seeking thereby, whether he recognizes it or not, for Jesus. He who really keeps alive this threefold question and does not suppress it will not find it in itself so difficult to discover the answer to these questions in history in the person of Jesus, provided Jesus is preached to him aright. And provided he opens himself to the answer to this threefold question, constituted by Jesus and his life in death and Resurrection, then he gains too an approach which will enable him to understand the traditional christology, which at first sight seems so difficult to understand, but ultimately speaking conveys no other message than that in Jesus God has uttered himself to man victoriously and unsurpassably as the blessed response to that threefold question which is not merely something which man may possibly raise within himself but rather which, at basis, he himself is.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[201]

14

REMARKS ON THE IMPORTANCE OF THE HISTORY OF JESUS FOR CATHOLIC DOGMATICS

By way of introduction to my short essay I may be permitted to recall a brief episode, though in itself it is of no great importance. A few years ago, on a visit to the U.S.A., I met a Catholic professor of dogmatics from Europe. In the course of a theological discussion he explained to me that though of course he did not doubt the existence of Jesus of Nazareth, still he felt that even if this were not a historical fact it would make no difference to Christianity as he understood it. However unimportant this little story may be in itself – the more so since this position was put forward with a gentle undertone of doubt and self-criticism – it is, nevertheless, not altogether without significance as a symptom of what is taking place in Catholic theology today. I say Catholic theology because it is well known that in Protestant theology the tendency radically to emancipate the beliefs of Christianity and its 'dogmatics' (to the extent that any such discipline still survives) from history is of far longer standing.[1]

The first thesis which I would put forward here on the complex problems pointed to by this anecdote runs as follows: Catholic faith and its dogmatics as they have been understood up to now, and also as they will have to be understood in the future, remain indissolubly bound up not only with the historical existence of Jesus of Nazareth, but also with the historical events of a specific kind which took place during his life. This thesis, precisely in its universality, has of course become a sheer obvious truism from the earliest times of Christianity onwards (in the struggle against gnostic tendencies which are already discernible in the New Testament itself) right down to the struggle of the Catholic Church [202] against Modernism at the beginning of the twentieth century. But abstracting from the difficulties which this thesis has to face, and to which we shall be returning in our second thesis, it turns out after all, on a more careful and precise presentation, to be less self-evident to our understanding of the Catholic faith and Catholic theology's understanding of its own nature than appears at first sight. For the thesis does in fact become more difficult and more obscure the moment we ask the following question: Is it intended as a dogmatic statement of faith or as a thesis of fundamental theology which (on a right understanding) has the function of supplying a basis for our faith? In putting forward this question we are, of course, not from the outset insinuating that the question as presented in this twofold form has to be answered in precisely the same sense or with the same range in view of the historical events of the life of Jesus that are pointed to. But even if we do not make this insinuation, the question as presented in these two alternative forms remains difficult for us of today. I believe that we have to presume that today not a few Catholic dogmatic theologians and exegetes would answer the question in the affirmative in its dogmatic sense, but in the negative if it is taken as pertaining to fundamental theology.

If we deny from the outset that there is any kind of difference between dogmatics and fundamental theology, or at most are prepared to conceive of a fundamental theology which from the outset has nothing to do with the facts of history, precisely, for instance, the history of Jesus' life, then of course, while it is still open to us on the most favourable view to regard the first thesis as intended in a dogmatic sense, it can no longer possibly be intended from the

[1] A survey of the treatment of the question and the importance accorded to it in the Protestant sphere is provided by H. Zahrnt, Es begann mis Jesus von Nazareth (Gütersloh, 2nd ed., 1968).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

point of view of fundamental theology. But there are many who, even though they would not defend any such radical elimination of fundamental theology in general, or have never entered into a question of this kind very profoundly (for in fact even in theology there are a few strange 'obsessional specialists'), nevertheless in the concrete they will deny the first thesis when taken in a fundamental theological sense, even while they accept it when taken in a dogmatic sense. For instance nowadays even respectable theologians should be subjected to the question: Do you believe that Jesus is risen from the dead, or do you believe also because he has risen from the dead (as, despite Bultmann, Paul was allowed to believe)? And to this not a few among even the Catholic theologians of today will be found to reply: Obviously I believe only that he has risen from the dead. Such theologians, therefore, reject, at least with regard to the Resurrection, an interpretation of the first thesis in a sense pertaining to fundamental theology. It should be noticed [203] that here we are still abstracting from the more general question of which realities and events in the life of Jesus the interpretation of the first thesis in the sense of fundamental theology necessarily has to concern itself with. But allowing for this, the first point to be made is that it seems to me that any absolute denial of the first thesis is thoroughly false and heretical. The proof of this assertion from Scripture, tradition, and declarations of the Church's teaching office, can of course not be adduced here. It is true that in the course of the struggle against Modernism at the beginning of the present century many regrettable wrong judgements were made at the individual level by the official institutions of the Church's teaching authority. Nevertheless, on this crucial point that which it was sought to hold firm to and to defend in this struggle was right, was Catholic, and must endure. (In this connection it is a secondary question what degree of success was achieved in arriving at a correct understanding of Modernism itself considered as an historical entity and in a way that did positive justice to its basic concerns.)[2]

Now that we have established the fundamental theological meaning of our first thesis, which still remains in force even today, we can go on to the more precise question of exactly what the real interrelationship is between dogmatic theology and fundamental theology, faith and the historical experience on which faith is based. This is a question which still remains completely open. Certainly since the apologetics of the 19th century right down to the first few decades of the 20th century an extrinsicist approach has been pursued in fundamental theology which has made itself felt even in many of the individual declarations of the Church's teaching authority against Modernism. This extrinsicism, however, fails to do justice to the realities, or to express aright the true relationship between faith and that which provides the basis for faith.[3] There has been a widespread failure (as, for instance, the charge of heresy made against Rousselot has shown) to recognize how faith and the historical findings of fundamental theology mutually condition one another, and are immanently present within one another, even though they are not to be identified, and to perceive the relationship between the light of faith and the basis for faith as capable of being reflected upon by human reason. In a fundamental theological demonstration of Christian revelation of the kind we [204] are thinking of it was fondly imagined that properly speaking we could only be surprised at how, in that case, men who could not be presumed to be stupid or ill-willed did not embrace Christianity in its Catholic form as soon as they had heard only a little of this fundamental theology. But even if today we no longer accept the idea which has held sway for at least a hundred years of how, in more precise terms, dogmatic theology and fundamental theology are related one to the other (not even if today, once more, a somewhat similar version is seeking to assert itself in a certain current of Protestant theology), then this

[2] On this cf. e.g. K. Rahner and J. Ratzinger, Offenbarung und Uberlieferung (Freiburg, 1965), pp. II ff.
[3] Among many other studies which should be cited on this question, cf. G. Muschalek, Glaubensgewissheit in Freiheit (Freiburg, 1968); E. Kunz, Glaube - Gnade - Geschichte. Die Glaubenstheologie des Pierre Rousselot (Frankfurt, 1970).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

is still, despite all, far from meaning that the Catholic dogmatic theologian, or even the Catholic exegete, should seek to get rid of his difficulties by saying that he rejects the fundamental theological significance of the first thesis totally and from the outset. Even when we have defined this thesis in such precise terms, we are still far from having arrived at any decision as to the full scope of what the Catholic theologian is to regard as indispensable in the life of Jesus as being relevant to fundamental theology. Even when we have interpreted the thesis in this sense, we have still not decided anything on the point of whether the historical findings in fundamental theology of such real events in the life of Jesus are or are not in all cases univocally the same.[4]

This brings us to a second thesis. It runs as follows: Catholic fundamental theology, and also present-day dogmatics (each in its own way) must nowadays take quite new factors into account, affecting points of individual detail. These consist in the findings and problems of present-day exegesis with regard to the historicity, whether asserted or assumed, of the events of the life of Jesus. Fundamental and dogmatic theologians must reckon with the fact that the degree of historicity to be ascribed to these may vary very greatly and in very vital respects. Their approach, therefore, must be quite different from that which it has formerly been. I am aware that so far as the majority of modern Catholic exegetes is concerned, in presenting such a thesis we are merely beating an open door. But I believe that unfortunately even today this thesis is still far from being regarded as established so far as the dogmatic theologians are concerned, and above all in the teaching of dogmatic theology in the seminaries. One point of detail, in itself insignificant, may serve to indicate this. [205] It is intended not as a hostile criticism of the Second Vatican Council, but as a simple statement of fact. Let us take as our example what it means to read the third chapter of 'Lumen Gentium', concerning the hierarchical constitution of the Church, or other passages concerning the priesthood in the Church, through the eyes of a modern exegete, and in the light of the New Testament passages there adduced. Unless we choose to regard these passages as mere pious biblical embellishment of statements of doctrine which could equally well have been expressed without these New Testament quotations, we must come to the following conclusion: a modern exegete would not have had the audacity to produce such naively asserted dicta probantia from the New Testament, and, moreover, would have maintained this attitude even if, with his colleagues from the department of dogmatic theology, he were to hold that such passages should obviously be included in documents of the Church's official teaching and in a context which intrinsically belongs to the modern awareness of faith and tradition. But it must be conceded that nowadays they should not be included in such documents in a way that reduces them to the status of mere pious embellishments devised by those who rejoice in biblical jargon. What we have said here does not, of course, apply to all such Scriptural quotations, but conversely, not all the quotations concerned can be allowed to escape this criticism.

The modern dogmatic theologian needs to adduce arguments from Scripture and to present them seriously as such, instead of merely repeating the Church's doctrines in biblical formulations. And if he is to do this he must take serious and exact cognizance of the findings, and also the problems, of modern exegesis. Nowadays he can precisely not simply present every saying placed upon the lips of Jesus by the evangelists as his ipsissima verba.[5] [4] This is certainly not the case, and these distinctions should be worked out in any fundamental theology. In doing this we should not act as though, for instance, our knowledge that the Eucharist was instituted by the pre-Easter Jesus is arrived at by a process of speculation univocally the same as the experience of his Resurrection and of the reception of this experience on our part.

---

[5] Although this still is a widespread practice in the current textbooks of dogmatic theology. We cannot justify these methods simply by saying that the inspiration and inerrancy of Scripture is presupposed from fundamental theology. For the pupil will rightly recognize who is the immediate author of the statement which is adduced,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

He, the dogmatic theologian, must also allow for the possibility of very early theological developments within the primitive Christian community, dating even from before the earliest writings of the New Testament. Again in drawing theological quotations from the Apostolic writings, he should not simply treat them as though the individual sentence cannot and should not be submitted to further enquiry against the background of the whole of Christian revelation and of its [206] real origins[6] (in accordance with the analogia fidei and the ultimate unity of the New Testament, which, however, is not always immediately apparent, and which the dogmatic theologian must always in principle uphold). The doctrine of a canon within the canon is, in its real content, a sound and ancient principle, of hermeneutics for Catholic dogmatics. But we should not conclude from it that we have the right to set aside certain writings of the New Testament or even individual sentences (though admittedly these have to be interpreted aright) as not being in any sense binding upon us. The Catholic theologian must achieve a genuine understanding of the fact that even in the New Testament itself there are different levels and certain theological developments of the most varied kind, and which are far from admitting any direct or easy harmony between their various parts. Once he has grasped this fact, he has no reason whatever to despair of an argument from Scripture on a right understanding of it, provided he takes with all due seriousness modern exegesis and the refinements of biblical theology. The only prior condition is that he must have sufficient confidence in himself thoroughly to think out and bring to maturity in the context of the Church what he has already in principle observed in the New Testament, namely a living theological development which proceeds from the original experience of revelation, produces further theological developments, and even at the end of the New Testament, despite the division between the New Testament itself and the theological developments which follow (a division which itself has theological relevance) does not cease to advance to further ideas, taking the New Testament as its standard. A further prior condition is, admittedly, that the dogmatic theologian, in his use of arguments from biblical theology, must make clear the true nature of his approach through biblical arguments to his pupils. He must try to avoid giving the impression that all that is needed is to cite some passages from Scripture, perhaps to add a verbal paraphrase, and one has ipso facto proved what a Council has taught on the subject a thousand years later. Of course we can say that the statements just referred to constitute the outward presentation of something which a serious dogmatic theologian has actually achieved at an earlier stage, but when we view the average approach in dogmatic studies from this aspect (not from any other) right down to the present, we see that in fact it has not been such as has been described above, even though much in this approach can be excused on grounds of sheer lack of time. For a seminary teacher in dogmatics too inevitably suffers from this. [207] With regard to former interpretations of the second thesis, we are, once more, still stuck fast at a very general level, so that what has been said up to now must still seem to be nothing very exciting. The situation completely changes once a more precise question is posed. It is a question for the theologian who is not an exegete. What, in more precise terms, is he to hold firm to as historical in the life of Jesus, and as indispensable for him from the point of view of fundamental theology? This means too what he can and must expect from the exegete working in the field of fundamental theology. For whether the exegete notices it or not, he too, whether in a positive or a negative sense, is constantly working in this field. To mention just a few examples chosen at random, and purely for the sake of illustrating what is meant: must such a theologian expect the exegete to present the command to baptize in Mt. 28 as the ipsissimum verbum of Jesus? Must the exegete hand over to him the institution of and, moreover, it is of the utmost importance for the meaning and the theological significance of such a quotation to recognize this.

---

[6] cf. K. Rahner, 'Theology in the New Testament', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 23-41.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the Eucharist, with at least a few words of interpretation and historical reconstruction? Innumerable questions of this and similar kinds are manifestly raised between exegetes and dogmatic theologians, and however true it may be that the dogmatic theologian should not prejudice the methods intrinsic to exegesis and biblical theology as historical disciplines, it is no less true that the dogmatic theologian cannot dispense the exegete from the duty of finding the answer to these questions which he puts to him, provided this exegete himself intends to be a Catholic theologian in the true sense, and not merely a historian of religion who by chance is concerned with the writings which are called the New Testament as mere texts of the history of religion.

I believe that the problem as here presented in more precise terms sharpens into a twofold question for the Catholic dogmatic theologian, with his special interest in the history of Jesus:

(a) According to the findings of historical research, did Jesus, prior to his death, say anything expressive of a messianic awareness in some way that is apprehensible to us, or alternatively are the indications of this such that historical research can be in a position positively and actually to contest them?

(b) Did Jesus rise from the dead in a way that does not simply reduce this event to a mere figure, and to something belonging only to the realm of the disciples' conscious faith? Or alternatively is this conscious faith of theirs based rather upon the Resurrection (however this may be interpreted in more precise terms) as something which is prior to the faith itself albeit only apprehensible in that faith?

In connection with these two questions we must add a few further [208] observations before going on to our third thesis, so as to understand what the two questions mean. So far as the 'messianic' consciousness of Jesus is concerned a question of this kind is ultimately speaking independent of the question of whether Jesus really claimed for himself the title of Messiah in his own words. The same applies to the other titles of dignity ascribed to him. The one point of concern for our present question is whether prior to his death he in some sense understood himself to have a significance of such a kind that he required other men to enter into a state of unity with him (a state to which the name faith, or any other name, may be given) of such a kind that the believer recognizes salvation as objectively and indissolubly bound up with him. If we can say this, then, I believe, we can trace the development of all that the subsequent strata in the New Testament present us with in the way of interpretations of Jesus, and which are found later still in the Church's teaching concerning divine Sonship at the metaphysical level (together with the doctrine of the preexistence of the Logos as rightly interpreted) from Jesus' own understanding of himself as here described. In this connection it still makes no difference whether a particular exegete formulates the point of departure in New Testament and ecclesiastical christology referred to above as historical or merely as being more or less of such a kind as we have just indicated. He may formulate it quite differently. What is essential is that this point of departure, so long as the individual wants to remain a Catholic exegete, is adequate so far as he himself is concerned, and so far as the Church's own conscious faith is concerned, as such a point of departure.

The second observation is this: so far as the question formulated under (b) is concerned, the Catholic dogmatic theologian (and the exegete, who in fact should never cease to be a dogmatic theologian as well) has not only the right but the duty too (generally much neglected) clearly to work out the uniqueness, deriving from the reality itself, of the knowledge of the Resurrection of Jesus achieved in fundamental theology as distinct from all other historical knowledge. This is a point which cannot be developed or rendered more comprehensible any further here, yet it is of crucial importance for a right understanding of the question formulated under (b).

Only at this stage can we proceed to formulate the third thesis, and it is only by so formulating it that we can show how the problems we have developed up to this point come to their full sharpness. The thesis runs as follows: there is one question which Catholic dogmatic theologies have not yet thought out in any explicit sense at all, and so which has not been [209] answered even at the implicit level by them in any clear sense. The question is whether the dogmatic theologian can be satisfied solely with a positive answer from the exegete to the second question (that concerning the Resurrection of Jesus), and whether he can develop the statements of christology concerning Jesus himself solely from faith in the Resurrection as based on the findings of fundamental theology, even when he dispenses with the historical witness which the exegete provides to a 'messianic' awareness of the pre-Easter Jesus as a positive assertion.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The thesis we have stated lays down that there is a question here concerning which the dogmatic theologian still has to make his own position clear. Is it for him still an open question, or alternatively is it one which has already been decided in the affirmative on dogmatic grounds (obviously in collaboration with the exegete)? Obviously no such question is being presented as open so far as Jesus' own messianic awareness is concerned 'in itself', nor even with regard to any dogmatic statement about it. It is a question only of the knowledge of this messianic consciousness as a matter of fundamental theological enquiry into the history of Jesus, and quoad nos. Alternatively, and in more precise terms, it is a question of whether the dogmatic theologian's knowledge of this awareness as derived from fundamental theology constitutes an absolutely indispensable prior condition so far as he is concerned for his dogmatic statements about Jesus. In my opinion it has been sufficiently demonstrated elsewhere[7] that we can so think of the messianic awareness of Jesus, or Jesus' human awareness of his 'metaphysical' divine sonship in the sense of the theological orthodoxy of the Council of Chalcedon, that the exegete will not feel compelled to raise any objection on the basis of his data.

We are asserting, then, that there is here a question which, so far as the specialist in dogmatics or fundamental theology is concerned, is still an open one. It is the question of what demands such a theologian must make upon the exegete from the standpoint of his dogmatic theology with regard to the possibility of knowing about the messianic consciousness of the pre-Easter Jesus (this question is, of course, still independent of the further question of what the exegete's reply will be to this question and this demand from the side of fundamental and dogmatic theology). Again in asserting that the question is open, we are not of course in any [210] sense biased against the fact that this question which is put to the exegete must inevitably, or at least with the utmost historical probability, meet with a negative answer from his side. Nor do we intend in any sense to insinuate by this third thesis that it is exegetically speaking certain, or at least extremely probable, that there was never any point in time in the 'development' of the pre-Easter Jesus (though from the point of view of dogmatics it is perfectly conceivable) in which he claimed for himself certain titles of dignity (it makes no difference which), which of their very nature contained that which we are nowadays able to call a messianic awareness, the awareness of being the eschatological bringer of salvation, the Son of God etc. Again in these questions, which are certainly exegetically speaking difficult, we should not proceed from the tacit assumption that the most sceptical and minimalizing interpretation has the greatest chance of arriving at the truth.

The situation nowadays, however, in exegesis is such not only on the Protestant but on the Catholic side too, that with regard to the pre-Easter Jesus' understanding of himself in so far as this is still historically attainable to us, very difficult and disputed problems arise, and hence the Catholic dogmatist and fundamental theologian must ask himself what he should or

---

[7] cf. K. Rahner, 'Dogmatic Reflections on the Knowledge and Self-consciousness of Christ', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 193-215; A. Vögtle, 'Exegetische Erwägungen über das Wissen und Selbstbewusstsein Jesu', Gott in Welt. Festgabe Rahner I (Freiburg, 1964), pp. 608-667; H. Riedlinger, Geschichtlichkeit und Vollendung des Wissens Christi (Freiburg, 1966).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

should not demand of the exegete from his own standpoint as in this respect unconditionally established. And with regard to this question our third thesis now purports to say that provisionally (at least until the whole problem has been thought out more precisely) it is not impossible from the outset to take the experience of faith of the Resurrection of Jesus as our sole basis, and so to achieve those theological conclusions which are already expressed in the New Testament itself, and then in the later credal pronouncements of the Church in her christology. Admittedly the Resurrection must be understood not as any kind of coming to life of a man, or even as the return of a man to the plane of temporal and biological existence, but rather as a unique event, though one that still takes place within the unfolding of our time, as the seal of God upon the 'reality of Jesus' (if we may avail ourselves of this somewhat obscure phrase) etc. To state the matter in other terms: it is perhaps conceivable (from the aspect of fundamental theology) that the risen Lord (who, of course had a religious mission with regard to the radical closeness of the kingdom of God, which claims our absolute obedience) can, solely on the basis of the Resurrection, be recognized with sufficient sureness as that which the statements of Christianity in its orthodox christology acknowledge him to be. It is true that we cannot at this point adduce the true arguments on which this thesis is based. This would go far beyond [211] the scope of so brief an essay as this. The third thesis is, in fact, ultimately speaking intended merely as a question to be put to the fundamental theologian and the dogmatist as to whether they might possibly come to terms with a thesis of this kind, and thereby could give the Catholic exegete wider scope and greater freedom in his historical researches concerning the pre-Easter Jesus' understanding of himself than they have accorded to that exegete hitherto.

Of course an objection which might be advanced against this hypothetical third thesis might be that whatever reply might be made to it it would be of no real importance for the simple reason that the enquiry into the Resurrection of Jesus from the point of view of fundamental theology is no easier to answer than the question, likewise from the point of view of fundamental theology (not from that of dogmatics!) of the pre-Easter Jesus' understanding of himself. But for reasons which I cannot set forth here, this objection does not seem to me to be really justified. Provided our thought is not conditioned by the Platonist assumption that man is divided into body and soul, each 'part' having its own absolutely disparate destiny, provided we do not think of our Resurrection and Jesus' in the sense of a return to a biological mode of existence such as we experience in the present, or in some similar sense which is in reality mythological, provided we understand, on the basis of both these conditions, that the definitive mode of existence for a being of our kind endowed with freedom, when this definitive state is taken as the object of our hope, implies what we know as 'resurrection', then we are in a position to understand how there can be a 'transcendental' justification for a hope of resurrection (even though in history as it de facto exists this hope is always connected with the 'experience' of the Resurrection of Jesus in a mutually conditioning relationship). And so in the light of this the assured faith of the disciples comes to seem as though they had believed in a strange miracle which no-one nowadays can reproduce. But as we have said it is no part of our task here to provide a justification in terms of fundamental theology for the conviction that Jesus did indeed rise from the dead (regarding this as an element in faith in his Resurrection which comes into force only within this faith, but still as such can also be, in a genuine sense, the basis for this faith).

Even if this third thesis were to be taken as an enquiry into what it means to say that the Resurrection is an adequate point of departure in fundamental theology for christology, it would still always have a certain importance for the question of Jesus' own understanding of himself something which is a matter for historical research. For the exegete who [212] in his own faith reproduces the Easter faith of the disciples (without interpreting it away) must, in his realistic researches into the historical facts, precisely pose the question of how in all

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

seriousness the first disciples could have arrived at their Easter faith if they had known nothing beforehand about Jesus from his own understanding of himself, except that he was a wandering religious preacher preaching a message which was totally independent of his person and his own faith.

It would be a satisfaction to me if this first sketch for a strategic approach to liberate the modern Catholic exegete were to be welcomed by the exegete himself and greeted by the specialists in dogmatic and fundamental theology at least with a certain good will and without immediate protest. Admittedly for this I am assuming that in both camps there is some understanding of such problems. For today it is the fashion to be fideist so far as the Christian faith is concerned and more or less schizophrenic so far as the relationship between faith and reason (taken in a philosophical and historical sense) is concerned. But this state of affairs need not necessarily always remain the same.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[213]

15

THE TWO BASIC TYPES OF CHRISTOLOGY

We shall here be attempting to work out two basic types of christology, and so of christological statements which are put forward with the claim that they are the basic forms – in other words that in principle and taken together, they embrace the entire field of possible christological statements. Before attempting to give an outline of these two types, I shall have to make certain preliminary observations. The two types envisaged are, so far as I know, nowhere explicitly or precisely reflected upon as such, i.e. as distinct from one another. This means that I must take full responsibility for what I shall have to say about them, the special qualities which I shall be ascribing to each type exclusively, and the lines of demarcation by which they will be distinguished from one another. Both of these basic types (and of course from time to time various exceptional forms and hybrids appear), can be expressed in either an orthodox or a heterodox way, so that in the history of dogma as it actually exists both types figure repeatedly and in very many ways. In the christologies which have de facto been developed these basic types figure for the most part in mixed form, so that it is extremely difficult to draw a clear and explicit distinction between the two. I believe that these two forms are already present in the christologies of the New Testament, even if there too they have not been consciously adverted to as clearly distinguishable from one another. It is virtually impossible within the limits we have set ourselves to provide proofs from biblical theology and the history of dogma in support of our proposition. We must confine ourselves to delineating the two basic types envisaged in very abstract terms and without the safeguard of established historical facts. It is extremely difficult even to find names for the types referred to capable of designating them clearly and unmistakably. In fact any concise designation of them inevitably entails the danger of misunderstandings. With this very important proviso, I would like to call the first type the 'saving history' type, a christology viewed from below, and the second [214] type the metaphysical type, a christology developing downwards from above. In saying this it must admittedly be recognized that the concepts of a rising and descending christology do not really cover what is here being pointed to in an unmistakable manner. For a 'saving history' christology, leading upwards from below, can as such obviously be re-expressed in the alternative christology proceeding downwards from above. For it understands, and must understand, this process of 'rising up' as an act proper to God himself. This does not of itself mean, however, that the 'movement downwards from above' here would lead to the same conclusions in terms of content as the 'downwards movement' in a metaphysical or 'descending' type of christology. In distinguishing these two types we are leaving the question open as to whether the second type is not in some sense logically contained in the first all along, and whether it cannot be explicitated from this under certain metaphysical and theological conditions, especially those bearing upon the unity between the history of the natural world and the history of human thought. There is a further question which cannot be treated of here, namely to which of the two types here envisaged the classic christology of Chalcedon properly belongs. Despite the fact that at first sight this christology, which is strongly metaphysical in character, seems to correspond to a descending christology, it appears on closer examination that what we have in this classic christology is rather a mixed type, especially seeing that in it the development of ideas is markedly in terms of particular categories, and it is not the cosmological christology proper that determines the approach. Rather this is at most something that can be derived from it as a conclusion, especially since in a Western Trinitarian doctrine the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

cosmological function of the Logos (who becomes man) has ceased to be regarded as a special property of the Logos as distinct from the Father and the Holy Spirit.[1]

[215]

THE CHRISTOLOGY OF SAVING HISTORY

We must now proceed to delineate the first type, the 'saving history' christology. In it the eye of the believer in his experience of saving history alights first on the man Jesus of Nazareth, and on him in his fully human reality, in his death, in the absolute powerless and in the abidingly definitive state which his reality and his fate have been brought to by God, something which we call his Resurrection, his glorification, his sitting at the right hand of the Father. The eye of faith rests upon this man Jesus. He is, in the concrete sense described, the content of the specifically Christian experience, and the experience of saving history. Through him, as faith sees it, God's ultimate and irrevocable utterance of salvation to man is made. The fact that God is gracious to man despite his attitude of culpable protest, and the fact that this grace imposes itself victoriously – this is something which becomes definitively and unsurpassably clear to the experience of faith in this man Jesus. Jesus of Nazareth is not merely an utterance of God to man which, viewed in the light of the development of the history of salvation and revelation always remains at the level of the provisional and conditional turning of God to man, but rather the definitive, unsurpassable, and victorious – in other words eschatological – utterance of God to man. And because of this, and to the extent that it is true, Jesus cannot be subsumed into the category of prophet and religious reformer.[2] On the contrary, it could be demonstrated, even if we must forego this here for want of time, that from this starting-point of christology which we have just defined, the classic statements of the Chalcedonian christology can be arrived at provided that we interpret these in themselves aright. And for this precisely the starting-point mentioned above has, conversely, an indispensable and crucial importance. The point of departure for this christology, therefore, is the simple experience of the man Jesus, and of the Resurrection in which his fate was brought to its conclusion. It is he whom man encounters in his existential need, in his quest for salvation. And in Jesus he experiences the fact that the mystery of man, which it is not for man himself to control, and which is bound up with the absurdity of guilt and death, is, nevertheless, hidden in the love [216] of God. Where Jesus is present in this sense there is ipso facto present too an orthodox – a Chalcedonian, if we like to express it so – christology, even if through our own limitations, or because of the liability to mis-understanding inherent in the Chalcedonian formula, the explicitation in terms of faith of this basic experience of Jesus and in Jesus in faith is de facto not attained to. We have already said that a basic experience of this kind of the fate of Jesus can be described as the deed of

---

[1] The author has repeatedly made known his views on questions of christology. Cf., for instance: 'Current Problems in Christology', Theological Investigations I (London, 1961), pp. 149-200; 'The Eternal Significance of the Humanity of Jesus for Our Relationship with God', Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 35-46; 'On the Theology of the Incarnation', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 105-120; 'Christology within an Evolutionary View of the World', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 157-192; 'One Mediator and the Many Mediations', Theological Investigations IX (London and New York, 1972), pp. 169-184; 'The Position of Christology in the Church Between Exegesis and Dogmatics', Theological Investigations XI (London and New York, 1974), pp. 185-214. Also in the present volume, 'Remarks on the Importance of the History of Jesus for Catholic Dogmatics'.

[2] Materially speaking, the subject here being treated of is the same as that which the author has sought to throw light upon in the articles entitled 'Mitte des Glaubens', Hilfe zum Glauben, Theol. Meditationen 27, A. Exeler, J. B. Metz, K. Rahner edd. (Einsiedeln, 1971), pp. 39-56. But cf. also in the same series, Ich glaube an Jesus Christus, Theol. Meditationen 21 (Einsiedeln, 1968) with references and bibliography.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

God wrought upon him and upon us, and so too the Chalcedonian interpretation of that fate can be expressed as a descending christology, though this does not mean that this precise descending christology, in contrast to the second basic type of christology, need necessarily be saying more than what was already clearly present at the starting-point: Jesus in his human lot is the (not a!) address of God to man, and as such eschatologically unsurpassable. In this basic type of christology, in which Jesus is from the outset seen within the context of the individual man's quest for salvation in the concrete human conditions of his life, the cosmos as such does not enter into the question.[3] As the creation of God and as the world which is in a fallen state, this is simply there beforehand as the stage on which the event of Jesus in saving history takes place. And properly speaking it makes no difference to this to say that this world has, in the providence of God, been conceived of all along in such a way that its true function is to be the stage for this saving event. This appears above all from the fact that the possibility and actuality of sin, to which this saving event represents the answer, does not itself in turn appear as conditioned, permitted, and mediated by this saving event. Any transition of this christology into the second basic type could at most be arrived at on the basis of the conviction that the promise of the Spirit given through Jesus signifies not merely the salvation of man, which is measured by his own personal need, but rather the self-communication of the absolute God as he is in himself to man.[4] For our present purposes we shall not attempt to show how the various exceptional varieties of this basic type, whether orthodox or heterodox in character, can be derived from it, and also how they make their appearance in history. And a further task which must likewise be foregone is that of devoting a fuller consideration to the question of what [217] may be concluded from this basic starting-point of christology with reference to an orthodox, sober, and prudent theology of the Trinity, and also with regard to the question of the pre-existence of the divine Logos.

METAPHYSICAL CHRISTOLOGY

The second basic type of christology has, with all the necessary provisos, been called the metaphysical type, a descending christology. In this formulation the term 'metaphysical' is taken in its broadest sense – in other words not merely as having that meaning which is familiar to us from the classic Western philosophy of being. If, and to the extent that, a christology clearly goes beyond the original experience of Jesus by the believer (whether justifiably or unjustifiably, this is not the question for the present), then it is metaphysical. This also applies, for instance to a christology which originally, and not merely in a derived sense, speaks of a communication of idiomata from the kenosis and the death of God, and intends such paradoxical statements in their full seriousness. It would in fact be possible to speak in these terms in a derived sense of the conclusions following from the first basic type of christology. In any case the metaphysical christology as intended here clearly finds its point of departure and the possibility of verifying it in the first basic type of christology. But this does not alter the fact that what we are dealing with here is a basic type which is different in its entire conception. It can, of course, be present in various ways more intensively and more clearly. If we want to designate it in its fully characteristic form we can surely isolate two special characteristics in it. First the approach here consists in a markedly 'descending' christology, which, at least formally speaking constitutes something more than a mere

[3] The consideration of these basic forms, and, arising from this, the working out of a programme for the presentation of christology was brought to fruition in the course of a study which the author undertook with his colleague, W. T. Thüsing in the Winter semester of 1970-71 at the University of Munster, Westphalia.

[4] On this cf. the pronouncements of the Second Vatican Council on Revelation in 'Dei Verbum', The Decree on Revelation Nos 2 and 6.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

inversion of the ascending christology found in the first basic type. The pre-existence of the Logos, his divinity, his distinction from the Father, the predicate 'Son of God' ascribed to the divine Logos as him who pre-exists in this christology, are regarded as manifestly belonging to him from the first, and assumed more or less to be statements based upon the verbal assertions and convictions of Jesus himself. This pre-existent Logos who is the Son of God descends from heaven, becomes man, i.e. assumes a human reality as his own, in such a way that this pre-existent Logos also achieves a visibly historical dimension and appears in the very history which as pre-existent he has already shaped and moulded.[5] In this statement of a 'descending' christology we [218] are not at present concerned with the question of whether and how it is covered as implicitly included also in the ascending christology of the first basic type. If we have rightly understood it, this is certainly the case. But the decisive factor in this descending christology is, after all, precisely that it proceeds, as something that is self-evident and does not need any further recourse to the experience of Jesus in saving history, from a doctrine of the Trinity, the Logos, and a pre-existing Son of God. And these assumptions are properly speaking based not upon the experience in saving history of the crucified and risen Jesus, but are made known through verbal teaching by this same Jesus, a teaching which is placed upon his lips and regarded as his ipsissima verba. And in this approach we are abstracting from the question of whether this is historically speaking justified or not. God has become man. For this second type of christology this is, from the point of view of religion and theology, not a justifiable interpretation of a more original experience of saving history, but the supreme and primary axiom of this christology, though of course we are also aware that there is a history behind the revelation of this axiom itself. Hence it comes that the statement of faith that Jesus Christ is God does not need any further explanation so far as this line of thought is concerned, whereas in the first basic type of christology the same statement has an interpretative force – though of course a justified one – and comes as the conclusion of an elaborate argument, since our critical understanding of it has to be acquired from the more original experience of saving history. Secondly this descending christology, as found in the second basic type, implies a doctrine concerning the cosmic and, if the term may be permitted, transcendental significance of the Incarnation. It is the Logos that created the world that becomes man. But from this there follows the further implication that this process of becoming man constitutes something more than a mere isolated event marking a particular point in space and time, and belonging to a particular category, in a world which for the rest is comprehensible even on other grounds, but is rather the supreme point in the relationship of the divine Logos to his world in general. Creation is then regarded as the enabling condition for an element in the self-emptying, self-uttering, and self-communicating of God. Because, and to the extent that, God will not empty himself and bestow himself in an act of love into a void of nothingness, the world becomes that which opens itself to receive its own glory, which is sufficient for it. Man, on this basic conception, is not that which is 'self-evident' in itself, or the empty question waiting to be answered by God, but precisely that which comes to be if and to the extent that, God himself utters himself; that [219] which is precisely contained within a question, and also an answer of God in which God himself expresses himself. World is not simply accepted as that which is already given, but comes to be in that God himself utters himself and in this self-utterance of his in the Word become flesh, imposes the finality and unsurpassability of this self-utterance. The Incarnation is not so much an event in space and time, simply requiring to be accepted in its factualness, but is rather the historical supreme point of a transcendental, albeit free, relationship of God to that which is not divine, in which God, himself positing this non-divine, enters into it in order

[5] At the New Testament level these basic forms seem particularly clear in passages of the christological hymns in the Pauline Captivity Epistles and in the Prologue to the Johannine gospel.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

himself to have his own personal history of love within it. Saving history, as the history of the forgiveness and reconciliation of man in his guilt, is embraced and integrated within a relationship of God to the world which is established prior to guilt with a view to the history of God's own Incarnation within his world, and admits of the presence of guilt in the world only as a possibility of radicalizing this relationship of God to the world, sustaining it always and throughout from the first, the relationship of love in which God lavishes himself upon the world. For this basic type it is ultimately speaking not a decisive factor whether it is developed more in terms of existential ontology or of cosmology – whether, in other words, man is conceived of as belonging to a world or whether the world, together with man, is conceived of as God's self-utterance – provided only that this self-utterance of God is thought of as achieving its point of eschatological irreversibility in Jesus.

ON THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE TWO BASIC TYPES

The fact that these two types are not merely basic types but the two basic types of christology should surely be conceded. If we take sufficiently into account the formal character of the characterization of these two basic types, the two types concerned could, of course, materially speaking, be made to undergo extraordinary variations. And hence the impression may emerge that there are very many other types of christology which can likewise be claimed to be basic types. But if we take the transcendentality and the historicity of man as constituting the two poles of our basic understanding of humanity, then, for our understanding of what is meant by Jesus Christ, there can be only one conception, in which man remains freely within his history, from which in fact he can never be separated so as to achieve a state of total transcendentality, and in which he finds his salvation, and one conception according to which man radically brings to bear his metaphysical powers in order to proceed from the question of [220] what he is as subject and what the whole of reality is in one, and attempts once more to understand what he has initially freely experienced in history as his salvation.

This in itself already provides a starting-point for a more precise definition of the relationship which the two basic types bear to one another. It is clear that the second basic type constantly presupposes that experience of sacred history which is experienced in the first basic type, as its abiding basis and as the necessary criterion for rightly understanding the assertions it contains. Precisely today it is necessary, for an understanding of faith which is appropriate to the modern situation, to make clear whence this second basic type derives. This is not to maintain, even implicitly, that the second basic type is really superfluous, and, especially today, simply makes it more difficult to believe in Jesus as the eschatological bringer of salvation. Even in the New Testament as a whole the frontiers are, after all, crossed, from a statement belonging to the sphere of the first basic type to statements belonging to the second. And in principle this procedure is justifiable even if the titles of dignity attributed to Jesus in the New Testament point to him as man in his function as bringer of salvation without directly or ipso facto consciously reflecting upon his pre-existence as a God who is on the one hand 'in himself' the inconceivable origin, and on the other he who can utter himself in historical terms and so justifies what is really meant in statements about the Trinity.[6] Man as a whole, and in the spiritual development of humanity as such, is always too he who asks questions at a metaphysical and transcendental level. He is always he who cannot have any eschatological hope as a man of this earth unless he affirms that a continuity exists through all the discontinuity between the history of the natural order

[6] On this cf. the author's remarks in the article, 'Theos in the New Testament', Theological Investigations I (London, 1961), pp. 79-148.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and the history of the human spirit. Jesus constitutes the eschatological response of God primarily not in words but in the deliverance of concrete reality. And precisely if this is true, then this response of God is ipso facto an event of this material world, albeit one which brings about eschatological transformations in it. If we conceive of the deed of God as one, for all the freedom in virtue of which the individual realities and events of the world are both connected with one another and distinct from one another, then we should enquire into the intrinsic unity which exists between the creation of the world and that unique event within this world which we recognize in faith in Jesus of Nazareth. All descending christology of the second basic type may have a secondary and interpretative [221] character. It may again and again, in order to achieve intelligibility and to justify its own propositions, be forced to return to the quite simple experience of Jesus of Nazareth. Nevertheless it is legitimate, inevitable, and sanctioned by the fact that the Church, right from the earliest times down to the present day, has discovered Jesus of Nazareth precisely in these statements of a Chalcedonian christology which seem so abstractly metaphysical, almost irreligious, and strangely inquisitive in character. It has discovered him there afresh again and again.

ON THE SIGNIFICANCE AND CREDIBILITY OF THE TWO BASIC TYPES

Surely it is unnecessary to give any prolonged explanation of the fact that in modern times, and on the most different grounds, whether from missionary considerations or considerations of religious pedagogy (or however we like to put it), the first basic type of christology can more easily be understood in its credibility and significance for the concrete conditions of human living than the second, which, if, as is usual, it is presented in isolation and without connection with the first, all too easily gives the impression of mythology, and seems to run counter both to historical experience and to any genuine idea of God. If from considerations of missionary needs and religious pedagogy we set the first basic type in the foreground as our point of departure for christology in general, then a clearer distinction must be drawn between the two basic types than is normally the case in the preaching of the Church. For it is usual for this to present the saving history and soteriological significance of Jesus for us merely as the conclusion of arguments primarily put forward in a descending christology, and not as the point of departure, as an experience of saving history, which we make first and foremost in the true man, Jesus. It is possible of course to take the statement ‘The Word was made flesh’ in the sense of the metaphysical and descending christology of Chalcedon. (This without prejudice to the question of how the statement was intended in its explicit sense in John.) But as understood in this sense it cannot nowadays constitute the point of departure for a preaching of christology which can only find any basis in fundamental theology by invoking the established authority of those who put forward such a statement.

With regard to the relationship which the two basic types bear one to another, a point which should be examined more precisely than has been the case hitherto or is possible here is whether we cannot discern an [222] exaggerated argument in the second or metaphysical basic type of christology, in that it goes beyond anything which can be regarded as an implication or a clear and unambiguous consequence deduced from the first basic type, and capable of being justified on these grounds. It could in fact be the case that an exaggeration of this kind, even when it is assumed to be binding in faith, is nevertheless incapable of being deduced by formal logic from the propositions of the first basic type, but needs other supplementary principles, so that it is only when these are brought together with the propositions of the first basic type that the statement of the second basic type can be arrived at. It might be the case that statements which sound to our Western ears, educated as they are by Chalcedon, as statements of this second or metaphysical basic type, and so contain a

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

supplementary element of this kind, are actually (and above all in their place in Scripture), intended merely as emphatic statements in the sense of the first basic type.

These two basic types and their mutual interrelationship surely enable us to understand that in present-day Christian theology too there is room for a pluralism of christologies. If these christologies respect the Church's credal formulae concerning Christ where these are definitive, and constantly submit afresh to critical reappraisal by standards outside themselves, and provided that at the same time they include, and accord all due respect to, the essential reference to Jesus as the bringer of eschatological salvation, the different christologies can continue to be different, and still be orthodox. Even the approach by way of fundamental theology to the understanding of a certain essential point can assume very different shapes. The point we refer to is that man, whether consciously or not, seeks for a bringer of salvation in the absolute of this kind. Again very different answers can presumably be given to the question of how far we can advance into the second basic type of christology, if we start from the first. For surely very different opinions can be held with regard to the existence, content, and binding force (from the point of view of faith) of the previously mentioned element of exaggeration in the second basic type as compared with the first, and such differences of opinion cannot straightway be eliminated by appealing to the decisions of the Church's teaching authority, or by a discussion merely at the theological level. The point of departure for a decision of faith in concrete human life varies from one individual to another, and from one epoch to another. In practice it invariably and inevitably includes elements which are not the outcome of conscious reflection, and are incapable of being so. Now these different points of departure for a decision of faith for Christ – something [223] which invariably plays its part in determining the christology of a man or a theologian – are quite incapable of being united, in any effective sense, within a higher synthesis. Certainly one can strive to achieve some such thing. It may well be legitimate to tackle such a task ever afresh. But whatever gains may be achieved by christologies of this kind, which reduce a pluralism as far as possible to a synthesis, they are achieved only at the cost of becoming more remote from one particular, but in the concrete conditions of human life essential, point of departure in human understanding, and the only one from which christology can be pursued. Even the two basic types of christology, and their mutual interrelationship, render such a pluralism of christologies both inevitable and legitimate.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[244]

VOLUME 13

LIST OF SOURCES

ON RECOGNIZING THE IMPORTANCE OF THOMAS AQUINAS
A lecture included in a special series broadcast on the Bavarian radio on 29 December 1970; unpublished hitherto.

THOMAS AQUINAS ON TRUTH
A slightly revised version of a lecture given on 26 January 1938 to the Philosophical Society at Neukirch. It is here published for the first time in German. A translation has already been published in Rev. Portuguesa de Philos. 7 (1951), pp. 353-370.

POSSIBLE COURSES FOR THE THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE
First published in Bilanz der Theologie im 20. Jahrhundert III, H. Vorgrimler and R. van der Gucht edd. (Freiburg, 1970), pp. 530, 551. A French translation in Bilan de la théologie de XXe siècle II (Tournai-Paris, 1971), pp. 911-952. Published again in French in Nouvelle Revue Théologique 93 (1971), pp. 3-27, and in Spanish in Arbor 75 (1970), No. 291, pp. 6-29.

ON THE CURRENT RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN PHILOSOPHY AND THEOLOGY
A lecture delivered on 13 November 1971 at the formal opening of the 'Hochschule für Philosophie/München' (The Jesuit Faculty of Philosophy), and published in Theologie und Phiosophie 47 (1972), pp. 1-15.
[225]
THEOLOGY AS ENGAGED IN AN INTERDISCIPLINARY DIALOGUE WITH THE SCIENCES
Lecture delivered at a conference of the Centre for Interdisciplinary Research at the University of Bielefeld on 28 September 1970; published in Die Theologie in der interdisizplinären Forschung, J. B. Metz and Tr. Rendtorff edd. (Düsseldorf, 1971), pp. 27-34.

ON THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THEOLOGY AND THE CONTEMPORARY SCIENCES
A lecture delivered at a conference of the 'Secretariat International des Questions Scientifiques' of the Pax Romana at Rome on 20 March 1971.

INSTITUTION AND FREEDOM
A lecture first delivered on 5 November 1971 in the Institute of Education of the BASF/Mannheim. Published in Die BASF 20 (1970), E1-E8; also published in Internationale Dialogzeitschrift 4 (1971), No. 1, pp. 39-49. A Portuguese translation has appeared in Broteria 93 (Lissabon, 1971), Nos 8-9, pp. 147-161.

EXPERIENCE OF SELF AND EXPERIENCE OF GOD
First published in J. Tenzler (ed.), Urbild und Abglanz. Festschrift für Prof H. Doms (Regensburg, 1971), pp. 201-208.

DOES TRADITIONAL THEOLOGY REPRESENT GUILT AS INNOCUOUS AS A FACTOR IN HUMAN LIFE?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Hitherto unpublished.

THEOLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS ON THE CONCEPT OF 'WITNESS'
Prepared for a symposium at Rome in January 1972. Unpublished in German.
[226]
IDEAS FOR A THEOLOGY OF DEATH
A Lecture delivered at a conference of the Katholische Akademie in Bayern on 15 November 1970 at Regensburg. Hitherto unpublished.

HUMAN ASPECTS OF THE BIRTH OF CHRIST
First published in Tribuna Medica 7 (Madrid, 1970), No. 368, pp. 14-15. Here published for the first time in German.

THE QUEST FOR APPROACHES LEADING TO AN UNDERSTANDING OF THE MYSTERY OF THE GOD-MAN JESUS
Published in Geist und Leben 44 (1971), pp. 404-408

REMARKS ON THE IMPORTANCE OF THE HISTORY OF JESUS FOR CATHOLIC DOGMATICS
First published in Die Zeit Jesu. Festschrift für H. Schlier, G. Bornkamm and K. Rahner edd. (Freiburg, 1970), pp. 273-283.

THE TWO BASIC TYPES OF CHRISTOLOGY
A lecture given at the Katholische Akademie in Bayern on 16 December 1971 at Munich. Hitherto unpublished.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[3]

1

BASIC OBSERVATIONS ON THE SUBJECT OF CHANGEABLE AND UNCHANGEABLE FACTORS IN THE CHURCH

The essay which follows is concerned with the theme of changeable and unchangeable factors in the Church.[1] Right from the outset it must be emphasized that we shall be concerning ourselves only with certain basic observations. This in itself imposes certain clear limits upon our study.

For the most part it is on points of detail that internecine strife arises. Basic observations are, in fact, usually so general that they can be accepted even by groups which will subsequently find themselves vigorously fighting against one another once they come down to those concrete questions and decisions in which the general principles do indeed have to be applied, though even then in very many cases they do not, taken in isolation, yield any very precise conclusions. If, however, we were to seek here and now to draw a distinction between the changeable and unchangeable factors in concrete individual instances we would perforce be drawn into an endless study of cases, such as cannot be the subject of a single brief study.

Nevertheless we may perhaps hope that even very general principles bearing upon the distinction referred to can be of some use in finding one's way somewhat better and more confidently through the life of the Church today.

In treating of this theme we feel that we can count upon very lively interest on the part of any educated Catholic Christian. And surely we do not need to justify this feeling at any length here. As a result of the [4] activities of John XXIII and the Second Vatican Council a great sense of unrest and great changes have been initiated in the Church whether we like it or not, whether we regard this Pope and this Council as the true cause of this process, or merely as the occasion of it and the catalyst which set it in motion. These changes have embraced all departments of the Church's thought and life: the doctrine and theology of the Church, her liturgy, her concrete constitution as affecting both the universal Church and the particular churches, her ecclesiastical law, her pastoral activities, our conception of established authority in the Church, the relationship of the Church's officials and her people to one another, the relationship of the Church to the world, our understanding of her function of service which she has to maintain and perform for the world, the states, international relationships, the various movements and parties, etc. In these and many other respects we can even now recognize that a notable transformation has already taken place. This transformation has not been concluded but is still in process. Some praise it, while others deplore it. For some it is not proceeding fast enough and-is regarded merely as a starting-point for many more radical transformations. Others hope that the position will soon become stable once more. Or they are in despair, believing that the Church, no less than the world, gives the impression of an immense confusion, of contradiction, of opposed tendencies and the uncertainty arising from these as affecting the Church's officials and her people alike. When we attempt to achieve a clear picture of the background factors in terms of psychology and the history of ideas which lie behind such sharply opposed judgements on the significance of these changes, even at a quite general level, then surely we have to say that the progressives' greet this change and seek to accelerate it and press it on to further lengths

[1] The subject has already long been under discussion. We may regard Y. Congar's work, Vraie et fausse réforme dans l'Eglise (Paris, I950) as the first major contribution, though the question has undoubtedly acquired a fresh vitality and breadth as a result of the Second Vatican Council.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

because they regard change, becoming, transformation, and the process of breaking into a future as yet unknown as the true essence of reality and as the special characteristic of our own times, and because on this basis they regard all change in the Church as justified in itself even as applied to the Church's own life, at least to the extent that they take it for granted that that which is new is also that which is true and valuable. And in this they are often extremely naive and lacking in real thought. The 'conservatives', on the other hand, have hitherto experienced the Church precisely as the context of that which abides, of an eternal truth which does not adapt itself to intellectual fashions, of the courage to reach out to eternity, of clear unambiguous meaning and sureness. In many cases they may have become converts to Catholicism precisely on this account, because they envisaged the Catholic Church, and [5] especially the Church since the French Revolution, precisely as the guardian and protector of that which abides and is unchangeable. These conservatives, therefore, feel a sense of shock at the current changes in the Church, and feel that they have been cast headlong by them into a cruel uncertainty. Under certain circumstances they may, as converts, ask themselves why then did we really become Catholics at all? As Catholics they miss the former clear and decisive voice of the Church in theology, morals, and canon law, and in the Church's practice as well as in the Latin liturgy. And they likewise ask themselves where that Church still survives which they once experienced as clarity, lack of ambiguity, sureness, and peace.

Before we enter into the real problems which our subject entails certain firm positions have to be defined with regard to the distinction to be drawn between changeable and unchangeable factors in the Church. These positions are correct, still continue to be valid even today, and are at the same time traditional. We must firmly and clearly define these traditional positions precisely because they remain valid, offer at least a provisional orientation, and must not be forgotten even though, as we shall have to point out at a later stage, they are incapable, of themselves, of supplying the whole answer. On the contrary, it is only with them that the real problems begin. We might formulate these firmly held traditional positions on our subject as follows: there is an abiding corpus of dogma in the Church, an interpretation of basic moral attitudes which has a permanent validity in Christian life (in other words an abiding Christian ethic) and a valid and permanent constitutional law of the Church. The First Vatican Council solemnly promulgated the doctrine that when the Church expresses and articulates, in the form of specific propositions, her awareness of her own faith, then, whether it be through the ordinary doctrinal channels open to her or through solemn and official doctrinal definitions on the part of the Pope or a Council, and as commanding an absolute assent of faith, these propositions are free from error, remain permanently true and binding, and must not, in any subsequent age, be interpreted in a different sense — in other words have a different interpretation placed upon them. Rather that sense must be firmly adhered to in faith for all future time which was intended at that point in the past when this particular proposition of faith was promulgated or defined. The Church has an abiding and permanently valid system of ethics because it has always regarded the ultimate principles of the so-called natural law and of a way of life directed by the light of the gospel as dogmatically binding, and has always taught that these principles have the same value [6] and the same abiding validity as dogmas concerning God, the three Persons in God, the nature of Christ and his significance for salvation etc.[2] The Church also has its own basic constitution as something already predetermined for it and not subject to its own decisions. To this doubtless belong the Petrine office and an episcopal organization (which we shall have to determine in more precise detail at a later stage). The result is that in virtue of these two

[2] It is primarily the well-known idea of the 'hierarchy of truths' put forward at the Second Vatican Council that enables us of today to recognize key dogmas of this kind once more as central and fundamental Cf. 'Unitatis redintegratio' (The Decree on Ecumenism), no. II. See also the further observations which follow in the present article.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

factors (the primacy of the Pope and the episcopal order) the Church exhibits a palpable historical continuity with the Church of the origins even at the level of visible social history.

We might go on to unfold still more precisely the material details of this unchangeable factor in the Church as just described from the three distinct aspects of creed, life, and juridical constitution. We might go on to provide a fuller exposition of the fact that so far as this immutable element is concerned the Church herself does not claim any right to introduce changes. In fact she explicitly denies that she has any such right, and recognizes herself in all this as bound by the single and definitive revelation of God in Jesus Christ. We might go on to provide a more detailed presentation of the fact that according to the Church's own understanding of her faith it is at least true that anyone who consciously and in the public life of the Church denies a dogma of this kind relating to the creed, to Christian life, or to the constitution of the Church, thereby ipso facto ceases to belong to the Church as a social entity. Moreover the Church herself is quite incapable of doing anything to alter this fact, though under certain circumstances she surely is obliged to ascertain that it is a fact even in those cases in which the individual concerned, despite the fact that he still continues at most partially to identify himself with the Church and does not want to separate himself from the Church or her life totally, is nevertheless denying a dogma of the Church of this kind.[3] Here, however, we must forgo the task of developing any further these traditional positions, which constitute firm principles belonging to the very existence of the Church. In what follows, therefore, we shall be applying ourselves more fully to the problems entailed in these firmly held positions. But in doing so we shall in no sense be casting doubt upon the [7] importance of these declarations or their practical applicability in the life of the Church. There is an unchangeable element in the Church in the three respects mentioned. This unchangeable element can be distinguished from much else which is changeable in the theology, the life, the liturgy, and the concrete constitution which we find in the Church, and which, therefore, is, under certain circumstances, capable of being reformed. The possibility of drawing this distinction gives the Christian and the official functionary in the Church the possibility of a discernment of spirits: those spirits, namely who call for changes in the Church. For to the extent that it is possible so to distinguish between the changeable and unchangeable factors in the Church we have a standard enabling us to decide here to concede that reform and change is possible, and there to pronounce an absolute 'no' to any such demand for change.

It is only at this point that we come to the real heart and centre of our subject: in the concrete it is not so simple to decide where the distinction is to be drawn between changeable and unchangeable factors in the Church when it is some specific doctrine, some concrete living practice, some point of the Church's juridical constitution, or some other point of law that is in question – not so simple, that is to say, as has usually been assumed to be the case whether tacitly or explicitly in the traditional theory and practice of the Church. And it is this that gives rise to the practical difficulties which disquiet us today so much within the Church. We must even go so far as to concede the following: we recognize the abiding continuity and identity of the Church in the course of her history and of the change constantly taking place afresh within that history. But however far we may be able to go in verifying this continuity and identity in empirical terms, in the last analysis it is an object of believing hope and of that faithfulness which dares to commit itself on the basis of hope. But it is not simply an object of which we can achieve any empirical assurance with absolute certainty. It follows from this statement that we must assign the changeable and unchangeable factors in the Church to different positions in the scale of verifiability with regard to the possibility of experiencing them in the concrete. The changeable and the unchangeable are not two entities

[3] On this question cf. the author's observations in the article in the present volume entitled 'Congregation of Faith and Theological Commission'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

simply existing side by side as immediately empirically apprehensible each in its own right. That which we immediately experience and make living contact with is that which is in process of change, and it is the more immediate to us and the more apprehensible of the two entities. It is precisely in this – for all that the unchangeable factor is relatively apprehensible to us too – that this unchangeable factor has ever afresh to be believed in, hoped in, and acted upon in a spirit of faithfulness as that [8] which is the more hidden of the two factors. If this thesis is correct, then for the Catholic too it is the experience of change, of being on the way to a goal, of being on pilgrimage, that constitutes the primary task laid upon him and required of him, and it is in this alone that he can genuinely realize his faithfulness to the unchangeable factor. We fully recognize that the experience of the Church as that in which we find an unchangeable divine truth, a rule of life which is always the same, a juridical constitution ordained by God himself is indeed an experience which is possible and legitimate, and in fact one which belongs to the very essence of Christian faith and life. But precisely in that form in which this experience has been made and evaluated in the period of a 'Pianic monolithism' in the Church, it is an experience subject to the conditions of that particular age, and not even a particularly fine one when we look more closely into the matter.

The thesis we have just formulated is very abstract, and therefore, perhaps, not readily understandable. It needs to be illustrated and given firm outlines by means of a more concrete examination of the connection which exists between the changeable and unchangeable factors. In this connection we are deliberately avoiding the process of tracing the question to a deeper level, and embarking upon the examination of a more general range of problems such as might be developed in an existential ontology or a philosophy of history and theology, with regard to the connection between essence, idea and history, truth and history etc.,[4] in other words of a range of problems which in itself should be tackled and coped with if we were seeking to answer the question here raised by tracing it to its ultimate roots.

UNCHANGEABLE DOGMA?

We may begin by considering the unchangeable factor in Christian dogma. In this we are passing over the question, in itself important, of the further and deeper distinction which might be drawn within this unchangeable dogma itself that namely between an ultimate and innermost kernel, a real heart and centre of the gospel on the one hand,[5] and the manifold ways, almost beyond recounting, on the other, in which this kernel has [9] come to be developed into a whole range of individual dogmas as formulated in the course of the history of dogma. A distinction of this kind is justified by the teaching of the Second Vatican Council on the 'hierarchy of truths'. It likewise would, in itself be of great importance for our present question. Here, however, it must be set aside. We are examining, therefore, the individual dogmas as they have been put forward by the ordinary or extraordinary magisterium of the Church as unchangeable propositions in the sense of having the quality of inerrancy. Even in the case of these dogmas we recognize on closer examination that the statement that they are unchangeable is not so simple or clear as appears at first sight. To begin with, in the case of many dogmas, it is only gradually and as the outcome of a long process of reflection, that they have come to be crystallized as such in the Church's conscious faith. It is far from being the case, therefore, that all of them were as such and as dogmas

[4] More recent surveys and bibliographies are easily accessible in the volumes of Sacramentum Mundi under the same key terms as are mentioned here.
[5] On this cf. the author's article, 'Mitte des Glaubens' in Hilfe zum Glauben, A. Exeler, J. B. Metz, K. Rahner eds., Theologische Meditationen 27 (Einsiedeln, 1971), pp. 39-56.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

formulated in this specific manner, present right from the origins of Christianity. They have come to be through a historical process which is inevitably bound up with changes. It would be naive to suppose that once they have actually come to be they are simply unchangeable in every respect and so absolutely withdrawn from that dimension of history in which in fact they initially emerged.

Furthermore, despite the fact that in the formulation of these dogmas there is, in the nature of things, a mutual influence of the original divine revelation and of human language one upon the other, they are nevertheless expressed by means of human concepts deriving from a quite specific cultural and historical situation, and which themselves had, and still continue to have, a history of their own. In this respect it would be naive to suppose that such concepts are raised to a status of absolute immutability in every respect, and so become detached from their former history merely because they have undergone a certain sacral dignity and sanction in virtue of their being used in statements of dogma, or that once used in this ecclesiastical language they justifiably achieve thereby a more durable and tenacious life with less change than they would have undergone in secular usage. But even given that they have been so used in dogmatic formulations, it is still in any case clear that such concepts, which are in origin common to all spheres of human life, or belong to philosophical contexts, continue to develop their own secular history, and that the teaching Church must take due cognizance of this further history of the concepts concerned and draw the necessary consequences from it if its teaching is not to become incomprehensible. For it is no longer in any position to appeal, without further ado, to a secular understanding of [10] these concepts suitable to be used for its own purposes and to convey the meaning of its own teaching. Alternatively there is another possibility open to the Church. A concept of this kind, which is in origin secular, but has been used in dogmatic propositions of the Church, is simply dead, and no longer has any existence in this sphere either if it is totally withdrawn from secular usage. And at this stage it is also unusable or hardly usable for the Church's doctrine either. For this doctrine of the Church must necessarily work with concepts which are in themselves secular in order to become intelligible at all. Against this it might be objected that there are, after all, specifically theological concepts which have application only in a specifically ecclesiastical parlance. But to this it could equally well be rejoined that even though we may recognize the validity of this point, it still does not invalidate the point we have just made. For first such concepts which belong specifically to theology, have at most a quite modest extent of application in the real preaching of the Church to those who are not specialist theologians, and second (and this is the decisive point) such specialist theological concepts have to be explained by means of secular concepts belonging to human life in general of a kind which remain subject to the laws of history, undergo changes, and so introduce the unrest inherent in history into the dogmatic formulations as well.[6] Furthermore an individual human proposition, whether secular or theological, is in all cases only really capable of being understood in the context of human awareness as a whole and in a broader sphere of meaning. Now it inevitably follows from this that even a dogma is necessarily conceived of by means of conceptual models in contexts involving real or presumed insights of a secular kind, with correct or premature conclusions drawn from this dogma, and in combination with emotional attitudes on the part of the concrete individual which may be either justified or not by the dogma itself in a specific age. In other words it is conceived of in combination with factors affecting human awareness, not all of which are, in themselves, identical with the actual dogma formulated. If we may so express it: it is totally impossible for the individual concrete man to conceive of a

[6] On this cf. the author's 'The Historicity of Theology', Theological Investigations IX (London, 1972), pp. 64-82.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

dogma that is 'chemically pure'.[7] His way of conceiving of it inevitably involves an amalgamation of conceptual models. It is arrived at in contexts, and under the influence of emotional factors [11] etc., which do not really belong to the actual dogma itself at all. It is justifiable, under certain circumstances necessary, and in fact indispensable for the individual's own personal understanding of the dogma concerned, for him to attempt to purify the dogma of these concepts which are subject to the conditions of a particular age, these conceptual models and these connected factors which do not essentially belong to the matter itself and so to arrive at the dogma 'in itself' pure and unalloyed. Under certain circumstances such an attempt may succeed. Certain ways of understanding the dogma, which are subject to the conditions of time, are overcome. Earlier misunderstandings, which inevitably influenced the individual's judgement on the dogma concerned, are eliminated, and, moreover, if this attempt really succeeds all this is achieved without any distortion of the dogma which is really intended and its true meaning as binding upon us in faith. And even then this dogma is not arrived at in a state of 'chemical purity' or 'in itself'. Rather it is presented in a new form which is likewise subject to historical conditions, and expressed in different concepts which, no less than the former ones, have a specific place in history. It is presented in contexts and by means of conceptual models which are just as subject to change as those which were formerly used. We may reflect upon those historical factors which have conditioned earlier propositions – propositions which, even though they express an abiding truth, are nevertheless subject to history. But by doing so we do not escape from history. On the contrary we draw the proposition thus reflected upon in its former historical conditions still further into history in the true sense. In other words we make it subject to a whole range of fresh historical conditions which we cannot reflect upon so clearly as the former ones and, moreover, in the conviction that it is to some extent historically and rationally demonstrable that the new proposition constitutes a formulation of what was really meant in the former one which in the present circumstances is justified and authentic as a formulation of it.

What has just been said with regard to the historical conditions to which a dogma is subject can only be rightly understood in the full range of its application if we consider that an individual man in his concrete place in history is in no sense in any position fully and adequately to draw a conscious distinction between the particular historical formulation of the truth he is expressing and that truth in itself and in its abiding validity. This is something which we do to some extent arrive at by reflecting upon earlier dogmatic formulations. In the case of these we can achieve a more precise theological hermeneutics and so to some extent be able to say: [12] 'this is what is really meant by a statement of this kind, and it is this too which is binding upon us, whereas that is only a concrete mode of expression, the outcome of historical conditions for this truth, and as such it is no longer binding in faith upon us of today.' In drawing a distinction of this kind with regard to such a proposition we are doing something which the Christian and theologian who formulated it in the past could not do. Moreover we ourselves could not in any adequate sense arrive at such a distinction today with regard to those new propositions which we ourselves formulate as statements of our own faith. It might be asked whether the Christian and theologian of former times would himself have drawn such a distinction as we ourselves draw between that which he properly intended as binding in faith on the one hand and the concrete historical expression in which what was meant is formulated on the other, supposing he had been confronted with the possibility of drawing such a distinction. But this question, though in itself possible, is an idle one. The fact remains, however, that in many cases at least it is basically impossible to arrive at any one

[7] On this cf. the author's 'Considerations on the Development of Dogma', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 3-35, and also 'The Development of Dogma', Theological Investigations I (London, 1961), pp. 39-76.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

unambiguous decision on this question. In other words that there is one point on which we cannot arrive at any absolutely assured conclusion merely as the outcome of a historical investigation: the point namely that those factors in a previous dogmatic formulation which, as viewed by us of today, constitute mere concomitant effects and are subject to the conditions of time would also have been, or actually were, felt to be such by the Christian of an earlier age supposing that it had been possible to put such a question to him. It is possible to ask whether he would have recognized such factors as in this sense inessential. And the very fact that we can put this question shows, in my opinion, that the continuity and identity of dogma in the Church's awareness of her own faith cannot simply be an object merely of historical investigation. Rather it implies an element of decision at the level of faith and hope such as cannot in any adequate sense be verified merely by the investigation of historical facts as such. For a process of verification at the historical level precisely as such, and taken in isolation cannot draw upon the assurance of faith of the former age concerned to draw a distinction in the earlier statement of faith between that which is changeable and that which is unchangeable, both being present in that earlier formulation. The reason is that this distinction was itself precisely not present in the awareness of faith of those of former times, or at least not in full and absolute clarity.

At this point we should go on to illustrate the statement we have just made concerning dogmatic formulations by means of concrete examples drawn from the history of dogma. But this is something which we are no [13] longer in any position really to do in the present context. Here we must precisely confine ourselves to indicating merely a few examples chosen quite at random. For instance we may ask what the term 'transubstantiation' means for us of today seeing that the 'substance of bread', regarded as the subject of transubstantiation in the Council of Trent, is something which we of today can no longer recognize as having any existence in that sense which this term 'substance of bread' was conceived to have in the Middle Ages.[8] Again how are we to conceive of Adam as the originator and cause of original sin, and thereby of original sin itself, nowadays, seeing that for us who accept polygenesis as an established fact this unique figure Adam, from whom all other men are allegedly descended simply did not exist precisely as an individual at the beginning of the history of the human race? Rather, as we see it, mankind was originally formed by a human population.[9] Obviously in these dogmas of transubstantiation and original sin the essential points intended by the Council of Trent remain in force for us as well. But at the same time the very fact that there is a distinction to be drawn between this essential point in its abiding validity on the one hand and a conceptual model used at that time on the other (that namely of the substance of bread or of an Adam who was numerically one) – this fact does have a modifying effect even upon these abiding dogmas. And this modification cannot be fully justified solely by the Council of Trent's own understanding of its own dogmas. For this distinction, with its modifying effects, is something which the Council of Trent neither knew nor was capable of knowing, seeing that it could not have had any knowledge of modern physics or contemporary palaeontology. We must say, therefore, that the modifications we introduce in our understanding of these dogmas do not destroy the real identity between our understanding and that of Trent – in other words that we abide by the faith of preceding generations 'in eodem dogmate eodem sensu eademque sententia'.[10] And [8] On this see the author's 'The Presence of Christ in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 287-311, and also 'On the Duration of Christ's Presence After Communion', ibid., pp. 312-320.

[9] On this see the author's 'Theological Reflexions on Monogenism', Theological Investigations I (London, 1961), pp. 229-296.
[10] cf. Conc. Vat. I, Const. dogmat. 'Dei Filius', DS 34 3020 (Quotation from Vinc. Lerinensis, Commonitorium primum, c. 23 (PL 50, 668 A)).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the identity and historical continuity we are pointing to here is, in the last analysis, itself in turn a statement of faith and hope which in fact can, to a certain extent, he historically verified, i.e. shown to carry conviction. Nevertheless it is precisely only to a [14] certain extent that we can achieve this, so that we cannot from the outset wholly exclude some element of anxiety and uncertainty as to whether, under certain circumstances we may not after all have lost this identity. The temptation to allow the changeable element to destroy the unchangeable in Christian dogma is to be numbered among the factors belonging intrinsically to the Christian faith in our state of pilgrimage.

AN UNCHANGEABLE ETHIC?

The same applies to the norms of the Christian ethic, and thereby to the Christian way of life. Here precisely the same points apply to these Christian norms (inasmuch as they belong to revelation) which we have already made with regard to the interrelationship between the changeable and unchangeable factors in Christian dogma. This in itself justifies us in extending what we have said to the norms of Christian morality. A further point which must straightway be added to this is the following: apart from wholly universal moral norms of an abstract kind, and apart from a radical orientation of human life towards God as the outcome of a supernatural and grace-given self-commitment, there are hardly any particular or individual norms of Christian morality which could be proclaimed by the ordinary or extraordinary teaching authorities of the Church in such a way that they could be unequivocally and certainly declared to have the force of dogmas. This fact alone justifies us in confidently arriving at the following conclusion: the sum total of the norms of Christian living, together with a specific way of life felt to be binding upon Christians, may once have been developed and held confidently and unquestioningly in a particular age. Nevertheless they contained far more changeable elements than were ever conceived of as a matter of clear and conscious reflection by those belonging to that particular age itself. This is not so very surprising if only because the moral awareness of an individual, a particular society, or a particular epoch is more or less explicitly conscious all along that what it prescribes quite in the concrete here and now applies first and foremost under the conditions of this same here and now, and that thereby there are very many cases in which in practice it can remain an open question whether a norm of this kind also remains in force under different conditions and in different situations, the more so since in the concrete in many cases the very possibility of these future conditions may not have been foreseen. Under these conditions universal statements of principle more or less always include elements which are highly problematical.

The element of the unchangeable in the sphere of moral norms and the [15] Christian way of life becomes a still more potent factor in virtue of the changes – nowadays indeed the swift changes – to which the immediate norm of natural morality is subject, this norm being man himself in his concrete nature. In fact we may go so far as to say that nowadays these changes are directed and controlled by man himself. It is true that we can undoubtedly speak of an enduring ‘eternal nature’ of man and say that from this certain abiding moral maxims, at least at the most universal level, do flow as well with the transcendental necessity of this human nature itself.[11] But this concrete nature of man in all its dimensions (biological, social, etc.) is itself precisely subject to a most far-reaching process of change. It is not so simple as is often supposed, therefore, to distinguish between that which is eternal and abides as a [11] On this cf. the author’s ‘On the Question of a Formal Existential Ethics’, Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore, 1963), pp. 217-234.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

matter of transcendental necessity in human nature on the one hand, and human nature as it exists in the concrete on the other, as subject to historical conditions and capable of change. The reason is that we invariably experience this eternal nature of ours only as it exists in concrete history, and at least up to the present we have not been able to experience much change in this concrete nature 'in our own person' in so brief a space as is constituted by an individual life-span. It would have little meaning to assert that no moral maxims applicable to the here and now flow from the nature of man in the concrete and as subject to the historical conditions prevailing in each particular case as distinct from the nature of man in its meta-physical necessity. For if we were to maintain this we would be reducing the Christian morality developed in any given age, and as such fully binding, to a few universal moral principles at the metaphysical level. Now the history of Christian morality proves that this is something which we neither can nor should do, and if this is the case then human nature in the concrete, as it exists in each particular individual, but at the same time as constantly subject to change, has a moral relevance, sets up moral norms of its own which on the one hand are valid in the present, and yet on the other cannot lay claim to any absolute or permanent validity. This also of its nature involves phases which are to some extent transitional phases, that is, in which maxims which were formerly in force in practice pass through an uneasy stage in which they gradually cease to have this force, though it would be impossible to lay down the precise point in terms of days or years at which they cease to be recognized as valid. Now as we have said it is impossible by any conscious process of reflection to draw a full and adequate distinction between that which [16] belongs to human nature as of metaphysical necessity and that which belongs to human nature as it exists in concrete history. And if this is true then inevitably there emerges in concrete human morality that disquieting interaction which we have spoken of between changeable and unchangeable moral norms which cannot fully be distinguished from each other. We must not therefore, be excessively surprised when the question arises of what is really and actually changeable and what is unchangeable in Christian morality. We should in no sense expect the Church always and in every case to undertake to draw this distinction for us with absolute clarity and at the same time with absolute binding force. Indeed the Church herself must expose herself to the experience of change in human nature as it exists in the concrete, a change which cannot be foreseen with full clarity even by her. A moral requirement which she either relaxes or alternatively reiterates at a particular point in time can thereby, under certain circumstances, also be interpreted either as a norm which, although in process of passing away, can nevertheless still be claimed to be in force, or alternatively as an imperative designed to ensure that the individual or a society, by an act of historical decision, shall so determine and shape precisely this human nature as it exists in concrete history that this norm which is proclaimed to be such can be a norm prevailing over this human nature as thus shaped.

Even in the case of the Church, therefore, we cannot expect of her that her teaching authority either shall draw or shall be capable of drawing a fully adequate distinction in every case and with complete sureness between the metaphysical and unchangeable element on the one hand and that other element which, while it does indeed still remain or has already been valid, is nevertheless subject to change on the other in the moral norms which are proclaimed by that teaching authority. And it follows from this that even with regard to such norms of Christian living a process of interaction between changeable and unchangeable factors which cannot fully be distinguished continues to exist. And this is something which must be sustained and endured in patience. In relation to this concrete situations may arise in which a practical decision is demanded of us which we cannot arrive at in any adequate sense at the theoretical level. In such a case we must rely upon our individual conscience alone to draw the necessary distinctions and arrive at the necessary decision 'according to its best lights and with the utmost sincerity'. And we cannot comfortably shift the responsibility of taking this decision to the teaching authority of the Church or to a moral theology in which full agreement has already been reached on the point concerned.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[17]

HOW FAR IS THE BASIC CONSTITUTION OF THE CHURCH UNCHANGEABLE?

We encounter the same situation in the sphere of the constitution of the Church, one namely of an interaction between changeable and unchangeable factors which itself in turn is subject to historical change. Although this is a point which cannot be proved here or illustrated by examples, we are first able to observe a development taking place in this juridical constitution of the Church in the apostolic age, in other words in the primitive Church in the true sense. Yet it is precisely this juridical constitution which in a later age, and so far as we are concerned, is now claimed to be unchangeable and permanently binding upon us as of 'divine' right. Here, then, we have a juridical constitution, binding upon us now and for ever, which nevertheless has had a past history, a period of development in which it came to be what it is, even though this process of becoming did not take place as a matter of logical necessity. And this fact in itself warns us of how cautious we must be in assuming that among the principles of the Church's juridical constitution now in force we shall find it very easy to distinguish between the changeable and unchangeable factors – in other words between human and divine law. This point becomes far clearer when we reflect upon those juridical structures of the Church as a society which are declared to belong to divine and unchangeable law in theology and the official teaching of the Church on ecclesiology (e.g. that of the Second Vatican Council), and, moreover, in principle perfectly correctly so. I am referring to factors which are beyond dispute so far as Catholic ecclesiology is concerned, namely the primatial power of the Pope and the episcopal structure of the Roman Catholic Church. Since obviously the definition of the First Vatican Council concerning the plenitude of the papal power is still in force even today, and will also continue in the future to belong to the unchangeable juridical constitution of the Church despite the long dogmatic development which lies behind it, it seems at first sight that all we have here is an unchangeable factor. Yet the matter is not so simple. To begin with, the concrete forms in which this papal authority has been exercised have not only varied very greatly in the past, but in the future too can undergo such far-reaching transformations that so far as the average everyday impression of an individual Christian is concerned the directive power of the pope may be encountered in some new form in which it seems to retain only a slight connection with that authority which was once and for all defined in the First Vatican Council as permanently enduring. It is recognized that [18] though the pope has in principle the right to intervene in the lives even of particular Churches, this does not reduce these subordinate Churches to mere administrative departments within a single unified state subject to a monarchic régime or even an authoritarian discipline from above. It is further recognized that the Roman Congregations and nunciatures are in themselves far from necessarily or certainly constituting embodiments of the primatial power of the pope as defined, and further that neither they nor the code of canon law as already embracing almost everything that takes place in the particular Churches are necessarily or certainly valid for all ages. Furthermore, the rights which in principle belong to the pope in relation to all subordinate Churches is still not such as to decide anything beforehand with regard to how often this authority is to be exercised in the concrete. And in view of all this even so far as this unchangeable element in the structures of the Church is concerned, the concrete form which this function assumes is capable of very wide variations. Certainly we do not need to think of a future pope in relation to the bishops as one who is powerless, or in the position of a passive Merovingian king in relation to his maior-domo or a Japanese tenno in the centuries before the beginning of the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Mejii period (1868). In fact in this age of UNO, one namely of a blending and interweaving of all particular cultural spheres in the earth, we can in many respects ascribe fresh and vital tasks to the papacy, contributing to the unity and global effectiveness of the Church, such as hitherto have never needed to be ascribed to it. But all this does not for one moment alter the fact that in the future the papacy, while retaining its basic 'generic form', will be able to present a quite different 'image' (if we may so express it) from that to which we have hitherto been accustomed. Without in any sense in principle either diminishing or calling in question the ex cathedra teaching authority of the pope, it is conceivable that on quite other grounds (pertaining to the stage arrived at in the history of human thought or the situation prevailing in the development of faith and dogma, which precisely does not prolong itself endlessly or indefinitely etc.) the pope will hardly be in a position to define any further 'new' dogmas in the future of the kind which have been defined in the past, and which constitute something more than a mere defensive re-expressing of the ancient and basic substance of the faith which any real Christian has not doubted even before the definition was produced. The theological possibility of a change of this kind, which might take a number of conceivable forms, still does not entail any decision on the question of whether such a change is either necessary or desirable. Still less does it imply any prophecy that such a change will in fact take place. [19] But it does open up scope for the possibility of it and obliges us, in a spirit of obedience towards the demands of the particular age in which we live, to hold ourselves open for such changes.

A similar conclusion applies too to the episcopal structure of the Church. In its reflections upon this the Second Vatican Council showed the same one-sidedness vis-à-vis the people of the Church as the First Vatican Council had shown in its reflections upon the papal power of the Church vis-à-vis the episcopate. Here again, while recognizing the abiding validity for the future of the episcopal structure of the Church, we can also recognize (though this is not something that needs to be explained at length in the present context) that many structures and institutions may be built into the Church which give the people of the Church a more active role than that which they have previously had in the life of the Church itself. In other words, if we like so to express the matter, these new structures and institutions may signify 'democratic' rights within the Church. In fact many changes in this direction have in practice already been achieved within the Church, even though we may hold the opinion that still more changes of the same kind will have to take place in the future.

But perhaps (though this must be on our responsibility and at our own peril) we may go a step further. In constitutional law we speak of a monarchic episcopate and mean by this that the regional Church is governed in each particular case by an individual. This structure of a monarchic episcopate has been in force everywhere throughout the Catholic Church since the beginning of the second century, though it cannot be laid down as a matter of certainty that it has existed at all times and in all places as such even before this, ever since the time of the apostles, where-ever particular Churches have existed. Now on this showing, so I believe, we can at least go so far as to pose the theoretical question of whether it really does belong intrinsically to the unchangeable juridical constitution of the Church not only that there must be, within the particular Churches, an episcopal power such as a present-day bishop enjoys, but also that as a matter of divine law this can be vested in an individual person in the physical sense and not in a moral person consisting of a small central body. The question is, therefore, whether in reality not only the episcopal power but also the necessity of it being borne by an individual person is a matter of divine law, whether, in other words, the constitution of the monarchic episcopate which we have in the Catholic Church is such as to exclude a synodal or presbyteral structuring of the Church jure divino even if the authority of a bishop as understood in the Catholic sense were [20] to be ascribed to a small collegiate body of this kind. Although of course my opinion is quite unauthoritative on this point, I believe that nowadays in Catholic theology we can still leave the question open as to whether the possibility of episcopal power being vested in a collegiate or presbyteral body is really irreconcilable with the principle of episcopal constitution.[12] These indications too will serve to show the extent to which changeable and unchangeable factors in the Church are interconnected.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

To this a further point may now be added: an abiding divine law can never be conceived of as being in itself, or taken in isolation, such a law as can directly, and without any further additions, be capable of being put into practice. On the contrary, in order to be directly capable of being put into practice in this sense it must necessarily be rendered present in the concrete form of a human law. Just as in the secular sphere there are laws which are incapable of taking any practical effect without further practical determinations in the form either of specific legal enactments or of concrete customs, so too it is in the Church. The jus divinum of the Church always and wherever it exists has a concrete embodiment which is not itself juris divini though of course this does not mean that this jus divinum in the Church is not real, i.e. that it cannot be present in any effective sense. What we find ourselves directly confronted with in the constitutional law of the Church either to our joy or to our sorrow is the changeable element. And it is precisely and solely in this that the abiding nature of this constitutional law as given to the Church by God can be made present and effective.

The first and primary quality demanded of the Christian by this relationship between the changeable and unchangeable in the Church is that patience which in the New Testament constitutes the basic virtue of the Christian life, and so too has its application in the attitude of the Christian towards the Church. The unchangeable element in dogma in the Christian understanding of existence in the institutional Church is something which she always encounters in a form which is historically conditioned and necessarily subject to historical change. The Christian cannot simply have and enjoy this unchangeable factor in its pure intrinsic essence. He must grasp it in a form which is changing, and so, under certain circumstances, in a form which has not already been made familiar to him by lifelong custom. This is especially true since those who are contemporaries and fellows in a strictly temporal sense may still be far from contemporaries and fellows in the spirit or in terms of ecclesiastical history. [21] On the contrary, at one and the same period in the Church individuals belonging to the most different ages are to be found living side by side, all of them playing their part in shaping the concrete form of the Church. Hence no one individual can find in the Church simply and exclusively his Church, i.e. a Church of a kind which is shaped exclusively by that particular situation in the history of human development which belongs particularly to him. Again in relation to the unchangeable factor in the Church there is need of that patience which endures what is alien and strange in history, and so is able to recognize in this first and foremost that which is abiding in the Church. The Christian also has need of this concrete synthesis which is always present between the changeable and the unchangeable in the Church in a further respect, namely in relation to the distinction of spirits. It will be noticed that in our considerations we have laid special emphasis upon the interaction between the changeable and unchangeable elements in the Church, which is such that they can never fully or adequately be distinguished from one another. Clearly this does not imply any denial of the necessity of using our utmost resources to draw the necessary distinctions ever afresh between the changeable and unchangeable elements in the Church, and at all levels of its existence, because without this it would be quite impossible for there to be any responsible further historical development of the Church at all. Instead we would have to commit ourselves blindly to a process of change which unfolded at random or (in order to avoid this) we would have to adopt an attitude of false conservatism and proclaim as our ideal [12] On this cf. the author's article in the present volume, 'Aspects of the Episcopal Office'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

a state of absolute unchangeableness of the Church in all matters, even those of only relative importance.

Theology, whether in the form of dogmatics, moral theology or canon law, invariably constitutes, from this point of view, the methodically directed and conscious attempt to distinguish between the unchangeable and the changeable. The theological qualifications introduced in dogma and morals, the distinction between divine and human law, and the question of the jus condendum in these disciplines, are in themselves enough to illustrate this point. While theology is not a merely secular science, but is also sustained by the light of faith and by a special kind of theological charisma, still the scientific work performed in theology exhibits unmistakably a quality of 'distinction of spirits' as this term is understood in traditional religious parlance.

Finally, however, despite this distinction arrived at by scientific reflection between changeable and unchangeable factors – something which is to some extent both possible and necessary – a further factor, which [22] neither the Christian nor the Church herself can dispense with, is nevertheless the courage to experiment. For at least in very many cases it is, for all the reasons already indicated, impossible to establish by the conscious reflection of the theoretical reason where such a distinction is to be drawn between the changeable and the unchangeable. In many cases, therefore, it is quite inevitable that tentative experiments should be made to see whether the Church can discover that which is abiding in her conscious faith, and so herself as identical with her own past, in the specific form of a theological proposition, a way of life, or a juridical institution. Experimentation in this sense is necessary. In fact every theology is the work of a theologian who does not merely confine himself to repeating monotonously the traditional formulae of faith, and thereby ultimately speaking precisely distorting them by expressing them in this form in a new situation. Every theology constitutes an experiment of this kind, one in which an individual with his personal awareness of faith enquires of the Church's awareness of her faith as to whether this can achieve a fresh discovery of its own nature in a new formulation of this kind. New ways of life which individuals attempt constitute modes of questioning the Church in exactly the same way in the whole breadth of her life to see whether she can recognize and accept a life-style of this kind as authentically Christian. These ways of questioning the Church in word and deed have the character of an experiment, first because they have to be expressed in words or actions by an individual on his own responsibility and by his own decision without any preliminary authorization on the part of the Church authorities, and second because in very many cases the favourable or unfavourable reaction of the Church as a whole, or the Church authorities is far from being achieved, or capable of being achieved, at the selfsame moment at which this process of questioning is directed to the Church. On the contrary a fairly long interval has to be endured before the reaction to it comes, whether in the form of acceptance or rejection, positive recognition, toleration, or rejection in a form which can clearly be apprehended.

Experimental stages of this kind are also to be found in the relation between the ideas and life-styles of a particular Church and the ideas and life-style of the universal Church, and so too at the level of ecclesiastical law and pastoral practice. In the process of experimentation in this sense it is often necessary to begin by establishing whether some formulation or practice which is new in historical terms constitutes a concrete embodiment of that which is unchangeable in the Church, or whether it has to be rejected by this as incapable of assimilation. Such stages in the process of [23] experimentation are not always avoidable because it is impossible to draw any full or adequate distinction between changeable and unchangeable factors solely by means of the theoretical reason. A further reason is that the process of experimentation is precisely the manner in which the distinction of spirits is achieved by the practical reason, and also that even if this were not the case a concrete

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

embodiment which was historically speaking new as a form of expression for the unchangeable element in the Church would not ipso facto and unequivocally be authenticated merely by the fact that some earlier form was in a full and unequivocal sense shown to be distinct from this unchangeable factor and to be historically transient.

To return once more to the beginning of these considerations: the underlying purpose of the thoughts we have put forward has been first and foremost to show that we should not oversimplify the task of distinguishing between the changeable and unchangeable elements in the Church, and that for this reason a certain anxiety among the Church's members and a certain antagonism between conservatives and progressives such as cannot immediately be resolved are perfectly understandable. But while recognizing all this, a point which must not be obscured is that in the majority of cases in the practical life of the Church, in her ideas and actions, the open-minded willing and well-instructed Christian can recognize in a manner that is sufficient that in the Church's faith, way of life, and laws, even though this Church undergoes changes, he can still recognize and hold firm to the ancient Church in its abiding nature. In the majority of cases, therefore, the conflict that we find between Christians cannot seriously bear upon the point of whether the unchangeable in the Church has survived, even though obviously cases of such conflict can arise. The only point of real conflict can be whether the new historical form embodying the unchangeable element which does endure, and which has been present all along, is opportune, whether it finds acceptance with the individual and contributes to the task of the Church today and tomorrow better than the forms assumed in the past, or those which precisely it is sought to relegate to the past. Even a conflict of this kind may often be both strenuous and bitter. But however it is decided it does not remove the abidingly unchangeable element for the Christian, and with good will it can be conducted in such a way that the true unity of the Church, her abiding identity through history, and the love between Christians is not diminished.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[24]

2

THE FAITH OF THE CHRISTIAN AND THE DOCTRINE OF THE CHURCH

In view of the current unrest in the Church, no words need be wasted in pointing out the relevance of the subject we have chosen to our present times.[1] It will be developed in three stages. First I would like to make a few points with regard to a traditional key thesis included in the usual presentations of the Church's teaching concerning the relationship between the faith of the individual who is de facto a Christian and the official doctrines of the Church. It is a key thesis which we must respect, yet which at the same time we can also regard as constituting no more than a point of departure for the theme which we are seeking to discuss among ourselves. We shall then go on to speak about the situation in terms of the sociology of ideas within which this thesis, initially considered in its traditional form, has to be understood today. Finally, in a third section, we shall have something to say about the attitude of the Christian of today towards the Church's official teaching on faith.

I. THE POSSIBILITY OF A HERESY THAT SEPARATES MEN FROM THE CHURCH

As a Catholic I am convinced that the traditional doctrine of the Church is correct, though admittedly only as subject to all the points which we shall have to make in what follows. This traditional doctrine lays down that if an individual Catholic Christian explicitly and publicly contradicts any dogma of the Catholic Church as upheld by her official teaching authority, then this Christian is cut off from the Roman Catholic Church. This basic thesis – in other words the proposition that it is possible to be cut off from the Church by heresy – has been expressed innumerable [25] times in the Church's official documents. Even today it is both correct and necessary for the Church's essential nature, just as many explanations and interpretations which were formerly not asserted in so explicit a form may also still be necessary for this basic thesis. We cannot, while remaining within the Church, publicly uphold anything and everything in it as a proposition of which we are absolutely convinced. There are propositions which, if they are upheld in an absolute and public sense, will set the defender of such a statement outside the Church, regardless of whether he recognizes and accepts this outcome or not, or whether this outcome is or is not explicitly laid down as such by the Church's authorities. What such a thesis presupposes is that according to Catholic doctrine revelation is at basis directed, not to the individual as such or taken in isolation, but to the community of the covenant people, that is to the Church. It is the Church as single and in its totality that is the hearer of the word of the living God and (as a single collective entity) that makes the experience of revelation. And it is precisely to this revelation of God, as directed to her, the Church, as the people of God, that she responds with faith. This faith is something that she bears witness to as a community, a community which itself in turn is institutionally structured, constitutes a social and historical entity, and, moreover, does so precisely as the bearer, guardian, proclaimer, and witness to this truth which God has spoken to her. On this basis it is immediately and intrinsically obvious what a dogma of the Church is and is intended to be. We are considering those cases in which the Church as one, and, furthermore, as represented by those bodies in which her institutional structures achieve their

[1] This article is a written version, only lightly revised, of a lecture which the author gave in the Union of Catholic Students at Munster on the 7 July 1971.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

various peaks (these we do not need in the present context to analyse theologically in any greater detail), acknowledges, by an act of total commitment, a given doctrine as an element in the revelation of God in Jesus Christ. In such cases, according to Catholic teaching and Catholic understanding, the truth or the proposition concerned (for all the historical conditions or limitations to which it is subject, and for all the relative factors in the mode of its conception) cannot ultimately speaking be erroneous,[2] i.e. under the Church's laws she cannot give the individual the right to pronounce an unequivocal and definitive 'no' to the proposition concerned, amounting to a total commitment of his own personhood. This is the one point which has to be made with regard to this traditional basic thesis.

This statement needs to be made more precise in one significant respect, one which belongs to the authoritative interpretation of this statement and, moreover, needs to be added even according to the Church's [26] traditional doctrine. It is this: in the case of a concrete individual contradicting the official doctrine of the Church, it is perfectly possible for the action of the individual concerned to be objectively speaking unjustifiable and subjectively speaking justifiable both at the same time. We may express this in other terms. The Catholic Church does not in any sense maintain that when an individual contradicts her doctrine (even assuming that he knows that this is in fact her doctrine) such a contradiction necessarily means that the individual is morally disqualified from membership of the Church. It might of course be said that nowadays this is a mere truism, for who could seriously or honestly regard his opponent in 'questions of the philosophy of life' as stupid or ill-intentioned? But what I mean is that we should first regard the matter from the point of view of earlier ages, for which there are also reasons, and, perhaps, which is still far from being completely dead, and second from the point of view of the situation with which we ourselves now find ourselves confronted. It is in the light of these two approaches that we should consider the doctrine just stated, namely that it is possible for a contradiction of the Church's official teaching to be subjectively speaking justified even though this contradiction cannot be acknowledged as objectively justifiable by the Church as such, since otherwise she would in fact be denying her own truth. We must realize that this position is, after all, precisely not so self-evident as it is sometimes presented to be by well-meaning people. A proposition can be entirely correct and yet misunderstood or misused, if merely from recognizing it as correct we then go on to regard it as self-evident as well. Then it is exposed to the danger of being contested, and, moreover, in the last analysis, more vigorously than if we had regarded it as less self-evident and therefore as in need of more precise justification. Only read the newspapers and other publications of the socialist countries to see how they deal with the opponents of socialism, how they 'execrate' them and regard hatred against them (at least as a group, but also in such a way that ultimately it bears upon their individual opponents too) as justified and a matter of duty. And the attitude tacitly underlying all this is that unless the socialists adopt an aggressive attitude of this kind, which sets their opponents morally beyond the pale, they cannot have the energy and compulsion which they indispensably need in order to achieve their genuine and legitimate goals. In fact they pronounce any tolerance which involves at least a presumption of moral integrity on the part of their opponents as a trick of the establishment, which thereby manages to deprive its opponents from the outset of the single-minded courage they need to promote their aims. Only read the bill-posters [27] which are nowadays being pasted up everywhere by student groups within our society! There you will be able to find irrefutable evidence of an attitude of aggression against their opponents according to which they qualify these in principle as men whose subjective disposition is evil. We can see, then, that such attitudes exist even today – indeed that this attitude, in which one side condemns the other as subjectively stupid or evilly disposed, seems once more to be on

[2] cf. Vatican II, Lumen Gentium, no. 12.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the increase. In the present context I am not attaching any blame for this at all. For the Church has done the same often enough in her past history, regarding every heretic who publicly and objectively contradicted the doctrines of the Church as a villain and treating him accordingly. But today at least it has obviously become a doctrine of the Church, belonging intrinsically and necessarily to the basic thesis mentioned above, that it is possible for a contradiction of the Church's official doctrine to be subjectively speaking justified. The Church recognizes that individuals stand in a specific concrete situation and have certain basic dispositions predetermined for them for which they cannot be blamed. In such a situation they can, in the development of their own individual personhood and ideas, arrive at a judgement through no fault of their own, and in fact be obliged to hold firm to their opinion, which involves a rejection of some doctrine of the Church. And this interpretation of the basic thesis referred to above, which the Church has only learnt to recognize with sufficient clarity through a long historical development, is something which she will hold firm to in the present and future even though a mentality may arise, or even come to predominate, in secular society which seeks to reject this attitude towards one's opponent in theory or in practice.

Despite this it must be said that according to the Church's understanding of her own nature, even in such a case the individual concerned ceases to belong to her. If I deny that there is a triune God, that there can be any sin or redemption at all, if I say that Jesus is at most a religious enthusiast and nothing more, then – all other considerations apart – I am no longer a Roman Catholic Christian in the sense in which the Church regards the attitude of faith of an individual as a condition for true and full membership of her (even at the level of the Church as a society). I believe that a modern man should not take offence at such an attitude on the part of a Church. There are in fact political parties too which – mutatis mutandis – recognize the necessity for expelling individuals from the party where necessary on these or similar grounds, and that too through a decision of an official representative body, and even though the individual thus expelled may protest against this decision and regard himself as the [28] true upholder of the spirit of this party. If it is objected that it is inappropriate to apply this example to the Church, we must reply as follows: Why should we not, seeing that on the one hand the Church is, and must be, and always has been (and, moreover, as it exists in all confessions) a normal social entity as well as a spiritual one, and that on the other the basic thesis and the comparison refer precisely to the social level of the Church's life as such – in other words do not, of themselves, involve any judgement whatever as to how the individual thus expelled stands in relation to the mystery of grace of the Church as such, or as to whether or not he is excluded from this (something which, of course, is possible only through some grave personal fault of his own in God's sight, and through no other factor whatever)?

In all that we have been saying we do not, of course, intend in any sense to deny that in the secular sphere the question of who really represents the true spirit of a social entity in the views he upholds and who does not is ultimately speaking something which cannot be decided by any official decisions within this society, but must be decided rather through that more powerful spirit which can be seen taking effect only through the development of history. This also applies, mutatis mutandis, to that spirit of hope and faith of the Church in which the Church determines herself in her own nature, and rejects other interpretations as inapplicable to her. Even the officially defined faith of the Church is maintained in the hope of not being rejected by the absolute future which is God. It cannot be anything more than this. But to be this, and to draw the necessary consequences from it, is the task and duty of the Church as a social entity.

All this means that in the concrete human situation it is quite impossible to avoid a state of affairs in which a society having a body of doctrine, a party programme, or whatever name we may like to give to it, has to lay down that certain specific denials, erasures, or alterations

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

put forward by a theologian or any other kind of Christian with regard to an official doctrine of the Church are irreconcilable with the manner in which this society understands its own nature. Hence the Church has to ask the individual involved to take due cognizance of this fact. Obviously in saying this I have still not touched upon the real problem in the concrete, the problem namely of how the foregoing remarks are to be applied in a positive and negative sense in the concrete situation of modern man at the sociological level, what further effects it has, or, under certain circumstances, does not have nowadays. There is a further question which we have not touched upon, namely which particular contradictions of official ecclesiastical doctrine have the effect of separating the individual [29] involved from the Church in the manner described or, as the case may be, of precisely not so separating him, what form these contradictions take, which particular doctrines they relate to, and how absolute the contradiction involved is in any given case in the form in which it is asserted. Obviously there are people who pay the Church taxes and at the same time assert apodictically that the papacy should be totally abolished, or maintain similar heterodox doctrines. And there are other people in the Church who contradict points of ecclesiastical teaching which are less central. And here their contradictions are put forward more as an expression of the difficulties they feel, as a ‘questioning’, as a complaint about the difficulty in assimilating the doctrines concerned. Alternatively they may from the outset relate to points of doctrine which are not dogmas at all, and therefore are capable of revision in a totally different sense from the Church’s dogmas in the true sense. Now the conclusions which have to be arrived at, the interpretations which have to be made in the concrete in all these cases – these are points which unhappily we cannot enlarge upon any further here, even though the concrete questions begin only at that point at which, in our present context, we are forced to break off.

II. THE MODERN PLURALISM OF IDEAS AND ITS SIGNIFICANCE FOR THE CONVICTION OF THE BELIEVER

We shall only be in a position to apply the thesis above in practice, and thereby really to understand it to some extent, when we have found an answer to the question: What form does this thesis assume in the present age? First and foremost the following point must be stated: In former times in a given society the truth upheld by the group as a whole was upheld and safeguarded by a few elite individual representatives and, moreover, their influence extended even to the manner in which it was effectively and really accepted by all. The responsibility for deciding and maintaining the convictions within the society concerned was in the hands of a few, and all the rest followed in the footsteps of these few. Right down to the age of the Reformation, for instance, the beliefs prevailing in a specific region were decided by its ruler, perhaps in collaboration with a few theologians or similar elite individuals, or through a few figures equipped with political power. The others unquestioningly accepted their decision, and while individual contradictions and protests did arise, they were socially speaking of no very great importance. In other words a narrowly defined group within a society, sometimes even represented by [30] a single individual, in practice actually determined the principles which were recognized as true in a society and by which it lived. Today this is no longer the case, nor is it any longer possible. It may be true that even today there are still groups who form public opinion and set the course for the rest to follow, and which are different from other groups, though such ‘formers of opinion’ may make their influence felt in more anonymous ways than was formerly the case. But still this does not for one moment alter the fact that in one and the same society, in one and the same geographical region, an abiding pluralism of systems of belief is to be found such that no one specific group within the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

secular world can any longer succeed in bringing all the various systems of belief within society as a whole into harmony with its own ideas. We have de facto a pluralism in the sphere of living human thought. This pluralism is something which all of us of today can experience. Now it follows from this (and here I come to the essential point I am making) that it is no longer possible even for one who firmly and decisively accepts the official teaching of the Church to achieve a completely positive synthesis between that which he believes as a committed Catholic Christian and the other items of knowledge, aspirations, mental outlooks etc. by which, in the midst of which, and on the basis of which he lives his life in such a society. In this situation we do of course arrive at a point at which all those supports for the Christian's personal convictions of faith fall away which formerly, within a homogeneous Christian society, he inevitably had. He no longer finds his faith confirmed by the public opinion of society as a whole. His position is quite the opposite of this. I am not saying here that a modern man need necessarily discover an unequivocal and clearly apprehensible contradiction of an absolute kind between those attitudes of the modern age which are shared by the Christian too on the one hand, and that which he believes as a Catholic Christian on the other if and to the extent that he accepts the Church's doctrine. But the fact that the Catholic Christian does not assert that any such positive absolute and insoluble contradiction exists does not mean on the other hand that he can straightway achieve a positive and harmonious synthesis, such as he himself can readily understand, between his own faith as governed by the official norms of the Church on the one hand and the rest of his attitudes on the other. This pluralism in our mental attitudes, which we can no longer completely reduce to harmony, is to be numbered among the inevitable characteristic features of the current situation in human thought. It means that faith has ceased to be a 'system of ideas' (in a sense which will have to be more precisely explained). On the contrary it is a particular element [31] in the world of ideas to which the man of today belongs. Of course he hopes for an eschatological reconciliation of truths, and, moreover, precisely while maintaining his protest against any kind of ideological totalitarianism. A protest of this kind belongs precisely to the nature of Christianity, and is directed against any attempt at an ideological totalitarianism against a system of human thought which draws everything within its net and reduces everything to a single homogeneous whole, regardless of whether the attempt to achieve this is made by Christians or other 'systems' (examples of both are to be found). When I was young it was perfectly possible for someone who had grown up in a Catholic environment to have the impression that a man could maintain an attitude of openness towards science, could be in sympathy with the world, and at the same time could harmonize and synthesize all this with his Roman Catholic and Christian faith in an absolute and positive manner in such a way that what emerged was something which I would call a 'system of ideas', namely a conception of human reality as a whole in which all the individual elements were (at least approximately) reconciled in a positive sense with one another so that there was a mutual interplay and homogeneity between them. In former times we did in fact entertain a 'system of ideas' or Weltanschauung of this kind. For we simply did not recognize anything which was not in harmony with a mental attitude of this kind which reduced everything to a synthesis, or alternatively we suppressed it. In other words it was still possible right down to the end of the nineteenth century or the beginning of the twentieth to be an 'ideological' Christian, that is to live by a synthesis of all the data arrived at in one's own intellectual awareness, which one had, at least in one's own estimation, achieved.

I believe that such a situation no longer exists. The world we live in is one which is really pluralist even so far as our own interior and individual lives are concerned, one which does not begin only outside and beyond our own personal awareness, but constitutes an intrinsic element in the intellectual situation of each particular individual. We may of course ask what faith signifies in such a situation. I would reply: In contrast to any medieval conception, it precisely does not any longer signify that principle of synthesis which can be brought to bear even at the practical level, and which is capable of synthesizing, integrating within itself, and assigning to a quite specific place within one's intellectual life, all the nonreligious data of Aristotle or of a school of medicine in Palermo. Furthermore such a unified 'outlook upon the world' (taking this in the sense described) no longer exists for the modern believer in this sense even in [32] his own interior life, and to that extent faith constitutes one particular element in our total intellectual lives. Of course this does not mean that we fail to maintain the hope that precisely this unsynthesized pluralism in knowledge and experience will, at some eschatological point in the future completely give place to the one truth. Nor does it mean that we have to tolerate what we can recognize as a clear and certain contradiction between the individual items of knowledge within the totality of our awareness. But even with these two essential provisos, the point we are making remains valid. We no longer have any unified or fully constructed system of ideas by which to live. And for the believer it is precisely an essential task to allow this pluralism to exist, and not to seek to suppress it either from the side of 'science' or from that of faith by evolving some homogeneous and all-embracing system of ideas. Faith, which ever afresh rejects, and gives the lie to, the totalitarian claims of science, must precisely not, on its side, nowadays, seek itself to have the status of an 'all-embracing system of ideas'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

At this point I may allow myself a brief digression. Today a younger generation of theologians is arising, one which finds all that it discovers in the First Vatican Council disagreeable to it. However on a right interpretation of the First Vatican Council we can see that this Council recognizes the pluralism referred to here as true and valid. For it is precisely the First Vatican Council that finds a solution to the problem facing it of the confrontation between the Church and a world that is no longer Christian. And it solves this problem not by explaining that all human and secular knowledge is ideologically or religiously speaking indifferent and neutral in order thereby to be able to save the hegemony of revelation and faith. On the contrary it says that there are such secular truths, born not of the Church or of divine revelation in the narrower sense, yet which, nevertheless, affect human life in the true sense even though they do not simply or exclusively constitute data of faith. The Council precisely does not (in order to create 'peace and order') draw the kind of distinction between the various branches of human knowledge which assigns the secular ones, capable of being used for the manipulation of the world and its resources, to one side, these, therefore, having no significance for the salvation of man, for his 'existence' as one and whole, while assigning the existentially significant religious truths to the other, these then constituting by that very fact truths of pure revelation, and as such subject to the sole authority of the Church. On the contrary the Council speaks of two sources of knowledge which are united with one another only in their origin (God), and in no other area. Moreover (and this is the striking [33] point), knowledge which is of fundamental significance even at the existential level is to be found in the secular source as well: the existence of God and much else besides, which is included or entailed in this. The only further point that we now need to add (and for this the First Vatican Council has at least opened some possible doors) is that these secular truths, which, nevertheless, radically affect human existence, are incapable, so far as we are concerned, of being synthesized in any positive or adequate sense with that which the Christian believes as a Catholic, because they in fact extend from another source which is made available to man in a quite different sense and given over to his history in all its unforeseeable developments. And it is here that we arrive at that which we have called the modern pluralism of ideas which is incapable of synthesis, and at the impossibility of achieving any homogeneous 'all-embracing system of ideas', regarding this as a characteristic feature of the world in which we have to live today.

To that extent, therefore, and in contrast to earlier ages, in this age faith has become in a

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

special sense one particular element in the life of the human spirit, and so become something which historically speaking it was not in former ages. For then an order of enthusiasm prevailed, deriving from the Middle Ages, a will to achieve order, and an attitude of triumphalism which was extremely praiseworthy (conditioned as it was by the situation at that time). And this state of affairs made it possible for faith to synthesize all else within itself and imparted a synthesizing power to it. If faith in this sense has become one particular element in our existence as intellectual beings, then the only way in which it can of itself be that which, theologically speaking, it is intended to be, is for it to recognize its own significance as constituting the hope of that eschatological unification of truth which will take place in that which we call eternal life, the consummation of history. It is here, then, that that synthesis is bestowed upon us in grace which we can neither in fact, nor to outward appearances, achieve in our present-day mode of existence.

Now an eschatological hope of this kind is, of its nature, opposed to every other ideology seeking to impose itself as absolute, and also to itself in this role, i.e. to any misunderstanding or misuse of it. It constitutes a protest against every kind of ideological totalitarianism. For such an attitude does in fact exist precisely in the claim to be able even today to have a system within which everything which can reasonably be conceived of at all, and which can claim to constitute truth, can positively be integrated. Christianity makes no such claim to an ideological totalitarianism, for it recognizes the existence of this pluralism. Obviously it [34] recognizes it today in a conscious manner as something that cannot in any adequate sense be reduced to a synthesis, but this makes no difference whatever to what we have been saying, for thereby it recognizes precisely that it itself is subject to historical conditions, and in doing this it also constitutes a protest against the setting up of any other system as absolute when it claims this status. This is enough to indicate, at least to some extent, the situation in terms of social philosophy, within which the relationship between the faith of the individual Christian and the official teaching of the Church must be conceived of and viewed.

III. THE ATTITUDE OF THE CHRISTIAN TOWARDS THE OFFICIAL TEACHING OF FAITH

1. Accepting the Difference Between One's Own 'Personal' Truth and the Official Teaching of the Church

The genuine Christian, who sees and accepts the situation indicated above, recognizes and endures the difference between his own personal truth and the official teaching of the Church in that he achieves both precisely as open to further development (admittedly each in its own way), and understands that the difference between them is an element in that contemporary pluralism which is no longer capable of being reduced to a complete synthesis, and which is anti-ideological in character. In view of the pluralism which necessarily exists it is obvious that the individual Christian in his awareness neither is nor can be simply the mirror image, the reflection, the echo, the reproduction of the official teaching of the Church. He is far too much under the influence of historical conditions for this to be the case, far too much a concrete individual. He can recognize this difference and he must bear with it.

The Christian no longer possesses any overall awareness in which his secular knowledge, in all its departments, is brought into a positive synthesis with the truths of his faith. On the contrary his mode of existence is subject not only to a 'situation of moral concupiscence', but also to a 'state of intrinsic gnoseological concupiscence'. By 'an intrinsic state of gnoseological concupiscence' we mean precisely that pluralism which exists in the present-day awareness of each individual: his knowledge has various sources yielding within himself branches of knowledge which cannot from the outset be reduced to synthesis or brought into harmony with one another. His conscious capacity for reflection is only limited in scope. As a result, in very many cases the individual does not even have [35] any clear awareness (apart, perhaps, from that which is borne in upon him by a vague general intellectual unease) that it is far from being evident how the various branches of knowledge (and the attitudes formed on the basis of them) can really be integrated with one another. Just as there is a situation of moral concupiscence which cannot adequately be resolved, and which consists in the disparity of the moral impulses to good and evil which continue to exist in their disparity even despite the understanding of himself at which an individual may freely have arrived, so too in the field of knowledge an analogous situation is to be discerned: the heterogeneous pluralism which cannot in any full or adequate sense be resolved of the various branches of knowledge which a man has. It is precisely this that we call the intrinsic state of gnoseological concupiscence in man, and can therefore apply to it (mutatis mutandis) all that is involved in terms of problems and answers in theology in the concept of 'concupiscence'. In response to this state of affairs, just as in response to his moral situation, the individual has the duty and the power to advance one step and to make some attempt at overcoming this situation of pluralism and of disparate forces in the direction of achieving a synthesis of all his various branches of knowledge within a single 'overall harmonized system of ideas'. But he can and must be aware at the same time that this positive process of synthesizing has still not succeeded, and will never fully succeed. This situation of concupiscence in the sphere of knowledge is something which has emerged into clear awareness only in modern times. It compels us in a quite new way to have recourse to a 'reductio in mysterium'. In former times one's task was to pass from a well integrated, well ordered world of knowledge on to the inconceivable mystery. Today it is a disordered world of knowledge which cries out for that light which can only be that eternal light which does not yet shine upon any man here below. Today man knows too much at the level of the concrete categories of this world and its realities for him to be able to cope with it all, or for him to be in a position always and in every case to say how all this fits together. Obviously a theology works constantly and rightly to achieve a position in which it can show, by means of a realistic and bold interpretation of dogma that this must not appear positively and unequivocally irreconcilable with the secular branches of knowledge and (something which is still more important and more difficult) with the whole mentality of the current age. Certainly theology strives explicitly and unhesitatingly to rid itself of those statements, recognized as erroneous, which have been proved to be no longer tenable by the advances of secular knowledge. In this it has had some success and can also show that it is not necessary to [36] reject the true dogma of the Church as an error merely because it must and also can manifestly be interpreted afresh in a new historical situation, though obviously without thereby being destroyed or having its meaning completely changed. Certainly these manifold efforts on the part of contemporary theologians also have their successes, successes which will be underestimated only by those who are too entrapped in an old-fashioned mentality really to feel the present-day insuperable pluralism in our awareness at all, and who therefore find it easy to be 'orthodox'. But all these theological strivings cannot (and, moreover, do not need to) invalidate the fact that the harmonization consisting in a philosophy of life in which everything is synthesized is something which is unattainable so far as we are concerned, and that we actually feel this clearly and acutely.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The official teaching of the Church viewed in itself alone is not simply reiterated in its (relative) intrinsic harmony in the awareness of the individual Christian who assents to this teaching in faith. For secular knowledge too is present in his mind, deriving from quite different sources. And so far as man's finite awareness is concerned this knowledge is not from the outset brought into a synthesis. Moreover nowadays it is no longer capable of being fully synthesized, within the limitations of time, with the message of revelation to us regarded as an interpretation of this same human life. The opposite view will seem to be true only to those who no longer have any real interior attitude to the modern secular understanding of existence. Such people, whether voluntarily or involuntarily, have still made the intellectual situation of Christendom which prevailed in the past and which was once justified into a present-day ghetto in which they stubbornly seek to survive and so threaten to turn the Church into a strange and old-fashioned sect (such as, for instance, that of the Adventists). In doing this they persist in regarding their entire attitude as the courage and intransigence of true Christian faith. The modern Catholic has to recognize and unreservedly to endure this pluralism in his intellectual life, painful and perilous though it may often seem. In view of the insuperable limitations in the subjectivity of his awareness it also implies a difference between his own faith and the official teaching of the Church. Difference in this context does not ipso facto mean a radical or total contradiction, but it does imply a distinction, e.g. in virtue of the fact that it is still far from being the case that everything which is included as dogma in the official teaching of the Church ipso facto also has to be appropriated and understood – by the individual within his own personal existence. It also implies that order and structure as applied to the awareness of the individual and the order of the official teaching of faith are different.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[37] There is one point which the Christian can and must recognize: his own truth, and the personal history of his own achievement of self-identity are still open to further development. We are not people who always and in every case have to uphold all that they actually state with the deep notes of ultimate interior conviction and with an ‘absolute assent’ (as with the dogma of the Church) as though we were convinced of the fact that we are already in absolute and total possession of the truth in its fulness. Precisely so long as we are neither willing nor able to do this, precisely so long as we are, in this sense, humble individual Christians, subject to the influence of historical conditions, there is a difference between the official teaching of the Church and that which concerns the concrete content of the personal faith of each particular individual. And this difference is not only inevitable, but perfectly justified. We do not become good, or even theologically educated Christians only at that point at which we have a precise knowledge of official seminary dogmatics, and so have a precise awareness of where the appropriate numbers in Denzinger are to be found and what they say. There is, in fact, a wholly justified attitude of indifference towards this or that particular doctrine of the Church, an indifference affecting the concrete existence of the individual which constitutes something approximating to a process of ridding oneself of a burden in one’s own personal life. Under certain circumstances such an attitude is in principle justified. We do not in any sense need, so far as our own personal concrete lives are concerned (and, moreover, precisely inasmuch as they have something to do with the absolute God and his final judgement) to act absolutely as though we were in some great chemist’s shop in which we had to watch over all the various doctrines of the Church, drawn off, so to say, into so many bottles.

2. Paying due heed to the hierarchy of truths

Let us attempt to translate the message we have sought to convey into practical terms. The best course for a man who calls himself a Christian would be once and for all really to understand what one thing really means: to pray. For this is anything but easy (‘Lord, teach us to pray!’, Luke 11:1). If he can do this, and perhaps in doing so still notice that this orientation to God has something to do with Jesus Christ and his Cross, then under certain circumstances he may remain in complete ignorance as to the number of the sacraments and still be a better Christian than if he had an exact knowledge of this, or if he could repeat every catechism answer by heart. For even so he might still have understood nothing of [38] the real and vital point, so very simple, so very fundamental, so very radical, and precisely on this account so very difficult as it is, and therefore so easy to replace with a pious or

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

theological verbiage. The fact that there is such a thing as indulgence is (rightly understood!) a defined truth. But this does not necessarily mean that a Catholic Christian (even an educated one) must have some knowledge of it. If Paul VI says that there is a Christian freedom to avail oneself of indulgences or not to do so, then the individual Catholic can confidently apply this Christian freedom to the question of knowing about indulgence also. We should not be too hasty in asserting that we must do one thing and not omit another. For the individual in the concrete (just the same as the pastor of souls) will notice that in view of the restrictions upon his time, his resources etc. there are many cases in which he is actually compelled to omit one thing if he seeks really and whole-heartedly to do another. In relation to the official teaching of the Church such a way of lightening one's burden can, under certain circumstances, be indispensable if a man is to cope with his own life (precisely as a believer). He may (as Scripture itself says) not always 'bear' everything. While 'objectively speaking' there may be no legitimate way of getting rid of a burden by a personal and resolute denial of one of the Church's dogmas, still there is manifestly, at least in the personal life of the individual Christian spirit, a way of 'getting rid of it' by failing to notice it, by 'postponing' a problematic question to a later time, just as this happens, and necessarily must happen, in other departments of life.

When the Second Vatican Council speaks of a 'hierarchy of truths'[3] it is of course clear that the real essence of this total structure of truth (regardless of how it should be described in more precise detail) is of greater importance and, moreover, in the sense that those truths which belong to the periphery within this total hierarchy may be such as the subject is totally unaware of without this being any ground for criticizing him. In this context we can discern not merely an objective structure in this Christian truth taken as a whole, but also (and this is just as important) a subjective 'hierarchy of truths' and, moreover, one that is perfectly justified. What we are seeking to convey is this: the various aspects and perspectives from which any Christian regards his personal life as it unfolds, or alternatively the totality of Christian doctrine from his own individual standpoint, vary very greatly. And this is quite as it should be. In this context we may do something which is also done in other departments [39] of human life with regard to the various areas of knowledge as they are presented to us, namely we may, with full deliberation, go out of our way to avoid this or that theological question because we instinctively feel that we cannot cope with it in the concrete circumstances of our lives. It is also possible to bring a certain subjectivity to bear in selecting certain special and preferred truths of faith to live by, and in this to allow other truths, which are just as valid and important, to recede into the background when we notice that this 'subjective attitude' is healing and liberating in its effect. A man must not in principle struggle against allowing himself to be led by God in his religious and spiritual odyssey into unforeseen depths of truth. But provided he avoids this he can, for instance, confidently live in an untroubled sureness of having been redeemed without having to endure all the darkness of anxiety about his salvation or of being lost in guilt, a state which he may perhaps already have discovered in other great Christians.

A further point which must also be taken into consideration in order to achieve a genuine understanding of this subjective hierarchy of truths is the following: the act of faith is not based upon a capacity which, being in itself neutral, is directed at will in each individual instance as it arises to one or other of the various 'objects of faith'. Rather these objects of faith are grasped in an act which in every particular instance is at basis always directed towards the single and total reality of faith which also constitutes at the same time the sustaining basis for faith as an act. Fides quae and fides qua (the content of faith and the process of the act of faith) are identical in their origins because the fundamental reality which

[3] cf. Vatican II, Unitatis redintegratio (The Decree on Ecumenism), no. 11.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

is believed in, the self-communication of God to man, namely the Holy Spirit, is also the principle of faith itself, its sustaining force, and its active movement.[4] The act of faith is single, underived from any prior act, and in its originality always the same. It constitutes an outwards movement of the spirit towards the immediacy of God in the power of the Spirit of God moving man from within. And in the unfolding development of faith in the individual man it gradually assimilates the various 'objects of faith' and assigns them their place in this single and total movement of the spirit as it yields itself up to God in his self-disclosure. If these individual 'objects of faith' were not taken up in this single and total movement of man in God (grace) to God (eternal life), then, while it is indeed true that we might still be aware of them, that they might be either approved of or called in question etc. at the human level, still they would never constitute [40] elements in faith in the true sense. This process of assimilation which faith of its very nature necessarily entails (the gradual process of being introduced to universal truth), viewed in the perspective of the particular objects in which faith as one and the single reality of faith is articulated, is in fact a process of genuine historical development at the collective and individual levels which never comes to an end. And this too is something of which the believer should be aware. He can experience and freely concede that the development of faith within his own personal life, regarded as a personal appropriation of the reality of faith by him as a concrete individual, is, by comparison with the development of the collective faith of the Church, less advanced. He cannot in principle deny that this personal history of his own faith has still further to go, while at the same time these further developments of it are already given to him at the collective level in the history of faith in the Church, in its theology and the history of its spirituality. If he did deny this, then this would take the form of a positive and committed rejection of the Church's dogmas. At the same time, however (sit venia verbo) the phylogenesis of the faith of the Church and the ontogenesis of personal faith in the individual are not simply identical. The individual believer does not need, in his primary and basic act of faith, ipso facto to have positively assimilated and articulated to himself everything which is objectively included in the faith of the Church. Even without this he still possesses the faith of the Church because this faith too, in and despite all its incalculably complex articulations, lives, no less than the faith of the individual, by this single basic act in which a man surrenders himself in hope and love to God as he reveals himself to him. (Here again we cannot go on to explain precisely how, within this basic conception of the historical process of faith, faith in Jesus Christ, the historical manifestation of God's triumphant turning to man, is incorporated.)

An individual form of faith of the kind we have been describing, articulating itself in a subjective hierarchy of truths, is of course present not only in each individual, but also in particular groups within the Church, in the particular Churches within the Church, at particular epochs in the Church's history, etc. But this too is something which we cannot enlarge upon any further at this point.

3. Awareness of the Historicity of the Truth Officially Proclaimed by the Church

A further point must be recognized: obviously the modern Christian must also have an awareness of the historical 'relativity' of the truth officially [41] proclaimed by the Church. This is, in a true sense, relative in virtue of the conceptual models by means of which these truths are expressed. These conceptual models belong to particular epochs and are subject to change. The truth officially proclaimed by the Church has certainly a further relativity in virtue of the inevitable transformation which takes place again and again in the explosive [4] This identity is something in which H. de Lubac takes a special interest, primarily in his most recent work, La foi chrétienne (Paris, 2nd ed., 1970).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

impact of the particular truths at the individual and social levels. Not every truth has the same revolutionary force in concrete human existence or in society in every age. We are justified in recognizing a relativity in the truth officially proclaimed by the Church, and obviously this also implies an awareness of the fact that truths included in this official teaching of the Church can be obscured. A given truth is not always or necessarily assigned, or capable of being assigned, to its rightful place within the hierarchy of truths, and obviously a further factor included in this relativity which must be recognized is an awareness of the fact that this truth of the Church, even that of the Church's authorized teachers, still belongs to history, and so is itself still seeking for its own definitive consummation, and, moreover, a consummation which does not simply fall from heaven, but is obviously sustained by us ourselves in the unfolding historical development of this truth of the official teaching of the Church. It is we who may perhaps have to bring out some specific truth from the 'treasury' of the Church, dust it off polish it, once more achieve a living understanding of it, realize it in our own concrete lives, and decide to do something more than merely to tolerate it or regard it as a matter of indifference. And to the extent that we do this, this truth of the Church, which, even while being such, never ceases to have a historical relativity, achieves its own place in history, develops, undergoes modifications, and precisely in doing so, and only in doing so, remains the same.

4. Any absolute contradiction of dogma is false and unnecessary

Perhaps it is only at this point that we arrive at the true and difficult outcome of our foregoing considerations. If and to the extent that a person is a Catholic Christian he cannot declare any absolute contradiction in the name of a truth which he recognizes in his own concrete personal existence to the truth officially formulated by the Church's teaching authorities. But besides this, any such absolute contradiction is quite unnecessary for him. This is, of course, the statement of a Catholic Christian. You will remember the initial point which we made, namely that precisely as Catholic Christians we are bound to concede that another [42] may subjectively arrive at the conviction which is absolutely binding so far as we are concerned that we must declare an absolute contradiction to some doctrine of the Church. If someone is convinced that the papacy was instituted by the devil – to use a primitive example – and if this conviction is, in a true sense and so far as he is concerned, absolute within his own personal life, then obviously he has the duty and responsibility of separating himself from the Catholic Church, because otherwise, even according to Catholic teaching, he will go to hell unless he does so. This is a quite basic and obvious truth. Yet despite this, he who really believes and, moreover, is resolved to remain a believer, says that in the light of the truth and the conviction which he has grasped for himself in his own personal existence, he sees no necessity for declaring any absolute contradiction to a truth officially formulated as such by the Church in those cases in which it really is a dogma in the truly ecclesiastical sense that is in question. There are many people who suppose that the Church says such and such, and so gain the impression that it is simply nonsense, it is an assertion our assent to which cannot possibly be demanded, and who on this account contradict what they suppose the Church to have said. In very many cases (I do not say in every case!) such a contradiction is a contradiction not of that which the Church teaches really and in truth, but of that which we suppose to be taught by the Church. You may say: 'Jesus is God' or 'There are three persons in God'. Now among those who make such an assertion as a matter of faith and personal conviction we can assume that there are very many Christians, including even some of the Church's official representatives, who make it only at the cost of a sacrificium intellectus. In other words they are in reality conceiving of something which is anything but a genuinely binding doctrine of the Church, something which is simply nonsense. And when someone else then goes on to deny it, it is because he has falsely identified his own personal understanding of a dogma of this kind with the Church's official teaching, and it is this personal understanding of his that is really unacceptable.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This is something that must be taken into account when we are considering the attitude of the Catholic Christian towards the Catholic Church's official teaching of faith, and when we say that it is quite unnecessary for such a Catholic Christian to assert any absolute contradiction to the Church's official teaching. Why should he go on to make such an assertion? Ultimately speaking I do not know why so many are convinced of their own subjective opinions that they believe that they have resolutely to reject the teaching of the Church or some particular teaching of the Church. I do not know why they have so little mistrust of [43] the capriciousness of their own subjective individualism. Nowadays even among us Westerns an attitude is already re-asserting itself which can be summed up in the axiom: the party is always right. But an attitude of this kind is certainly not identical with the attitude of the Christian towards the Church in assenting to its doctrines even when this teaching seems not immediately to be in conformity with its own subjective feelings. But this 'socialist' attitude towards life should serve to warn us of the danger of too quickly allowing our own subjective feelings and ideas to lead to a determined contradiction of a doctrine of the Church. Can we not in all honesty regard such apparent conflicts between the official teaching of the Church and our own subjectivity as provisional, as a question which does not have to be answered straightway in the present? In the eyes of a man who is self-critical and modest, must that which he fails to understand always straightway be rejected as that which is false? If he did absolutely identify himself with his own subjective feelings at any particular moment, would not such an attitude be the death of all delight in intellectual growth? Would not this be the outcome if an attitude of self-assurance of this kind became the universal law of his own thinking? At least so far as that Christian is concerned who still remains in agreement with the ultimate and basic positions of Christianity, is it not truer, and also subjectively more honest because more modest, for him from this basic position of his at least to keep himself open, despite all still unresolved conflicts, and to avoid drawing any premature conclusions? Is it not the better course for him to wait and see whether a positive solution to such conflicts is not to be found in the course of life by a maturing process applicable both to the interior man and also to his personal theology? Nowadays, however, the temptation to which we find ourselves prone is rather that of an absolute relativism in which we have a certain understanding for every possible position, regard everything as true and false at the same time, view everything as subject to a historical relativity, and therefore allow every possible position to have a certain validity. And if this is so then, after all, we should surely give the Church's teaching too at least the chance of slowly achieving intelligibility, gradually proving itself, in a genuine and true sense, capable of being assimilated. In this connection everyone should also recognize a further obligation, laid upon as a matter of truth and courage in our ordinary lives. When we find ourselves placed in a particular position by life itself we should surrender it only in favour of some better and more liberating position and never in favour of a weary scepticism, an attitude of indifference and neutrality towards all possible positions.

[44]

5. The Ultimate Basis of Faith

Consider further that on a radical view of the Church, however detailed may be the system of doctrines in which its faith is expressed, in reality it says very little. What it tells us is that there is an impenetrable mystery of the most real kind in our lives, namely God, and that this God is near to us; that the absolute self-communication of this God to us has been manifested in history in a manner which is irreversible and valid in Jesus and his fate. This is something that is really quite simple, yet in it we already have, fundamentally speaking, the whole of Christianity – but only provided that in addition to this you also reflect that there is, and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

necessarily must be, a community which confesses and lives by this truth. The community we are speaking of here is one that is sociologically constructed, an institutionalized community because that too is precisely appropriate to our human state. Once these prior assumptions are accepted, we have in a real sense already expressed the whole of Christianity. I do indeed recognize that it is still possible to set oneself up in contradiction to this simple basic truth and, moreover, even on the part of intelligent men. Otherwise I would have found it quite impossible to maintain the modification of my initial basic statement in the first part of this essay. But we are obliged to accept a modification of this kind as Catholic Christians, and not merely as liberal-minded men who recognize that others are no more stupid or ill-willed than ourselves. As Catholics we can, and indeed we must, whole-heartedly concede that there are men who, as a matter of their own conscience, cannot be Christians or Catholics, and therefore should not become such either. But the point that I contest is that we necessarily must entertain the impression that on a right understanding of the basic convictions of the Christian man, there is in them something against which we must assert an absolute contradiction. If we were compelled to assert such a contradiction, then we would no longer be Catholic Christians, and each individual would have the duty of positively deciding not to be such.

But let us try to understand the whole structure of Christianity, with all its detailed implications and explicitations, in the light of this ultimate essence of Christendom. Once we do this then, as Catholic Christians, we have no need to maintain that there is any official doctrine of the Church absolutely binding upon us against which we are compelled to assert an absolute negation as a matter of our own subjective conscience with regard to truth, and of our own intellectual honesty. For all the individual statements in the whole doctrinal structure of Catholic Christianity are [45] capable of being read and interpreted as so many concretizations and variations of that quite simple truth which we have just pointed to as the true substance of the Christian revelation. He who posits a contradiction of this must of course reject the whole of Christianity and the Church. But where are the compelling grounds for such a rejection? And if we experience how freely we can live on the basis of this ultimate substance of Christianity, what reasons can we then have for allowing ourselves to be led astray by the possibility or the fact of a rejection precisely of this kind? To posit it would not make us more prudent, would not reduce the number of propositions which we assented to as true, would not cause us to take any less risks. On the contrary we would, in the last analysis, merely be opting for a total negation, as distinct from a total affirmation (as actually attainable in history). In order to cope with this official teaching of the Church we must precisely live by the truth which is prior to, and transcends, all verbal expression, the truth namely, of the inconceivable God, and we must live by this in participating in the fate of Jesus.

If we do this, then, it is true, we have still not achieved any full, exhaustive, or wholly comprehensible synthesis between an understanding of Catholic doctrine of this kind, and deriving from this essential attitude, and the rest of the realities by which we live in our spiritual and intellectual lives. Nevertheless, provided we accept the possibility of an existential unity of this kind with the truth which is prior to, and above, all verbal expression, that truth which, ultimately speaking, Christianity in all its propositions is seeking to express, then we can endure in hope this pluralism in our concrete personal lives which is nowadays inevitable, and can never wholly be reduced to a synthesis. Obviously in attaching ourselves to the truth of the Church we do not live in a state of utter paradisal harmony such that everything is clear, everything beautiful, and everything agreeable. Obviously this faith, in its bearing upon the personal, intellectual, and social lives of particular individuals, constitutes an element which is far from fitting immediately or smoothly into the totality of our concrete personal existence as intellectual beings. But would we be people who had achieved harmony

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in ourselves and in our apprehension of truth if we were not Christians, not Catholic Christians, and not individuals governed by the official teachings of our Church? We would be just as subject to pluralism, and indeed we would, to a certain extent, be men who were actually in a state of being torn asunder. Even then we would not know how really to synthesize and harmonize this pluralism within the total content of our spirit. We would still always have to advance from truth to truth through every possible kind of obscurity. We [46] must not under-estimate our relationship to the Catholic, official, and institutionalized forms of Christianity, which also act as a standard of truth to us, in favour of some ideal state which does not exist anywhere else. And provided we avoid this, then even today we can, with complete confidence, continue to be Christians. For what has a Christian to believe? Nothing else than that the man who is a Christian precisely does not have the ultimate say in his own existence, but rather that all solutions, all advances in knowledge and free action, are all along already transcended by the absolute mystery, that this mystery itself wills to concern itself in some way with us, that it has addressed itself to us as the ultimate definitive word of our existence in Jesus on the Cross, the crucified and risen Lord.

If we live by this, then while the whole ideological impetus in the Church which is inevitable may still cause us pain in very many respects, we can nevertheless really entertain this hope: that our reason for grappling with this official teaching of the Church in our own personal lives and thoughts, with all the hazards it involves, is always in order that we ourselves may be liberated from our own subjective capriciousness and at the same time may make our own personal contribution to this collective awareness of faith of the Church. Even today we can be Catholics.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[47]

3

DOES THE CHURCH OFFER ANY ULTIMATE CERTAINTIES?

The question which we are here attempting to answer within the compass of a brief article runs: Does the Church offer any ultimate certainties?

The problem is a complex and difficult one. It is in no sense a clear question, then, which we are seeking to answer. For what does the term 'Church' imply in this context? What is meant when we speak of ultimate certainties, and – assuming that any such exist at all – what can it mean to ask whether the Church can 'offer' such certainties? Questions of this kind are raised by the very meaning of the subject under investigation. And if this essential meaning is itself obscure, then obviously it is all the more difficult to find an answer to these particular questions. From this it follows that all that we can say here will remain extremely fragmentary.

One further proviso has to be made: there is a certain connection between the subject of these considerations and Hans Küng's book entitled Unfehlbar? – eine Anfrage.[1] Reduced to plain terms, this publication contests the defined doctrine of the First Vatican Council. In doing this, however, the book does not confine itself merely to the teaching authority of the pope, but rather refers quite in general to all propositions of faith whatsoever, whether contained in Scripture or put forward by the Councils or the teaching authority of the pope, with the intention of making an ultimately binding statement. According to the traditional doctrine such statements of the Church put forward with ultimately binding force are guaranteed to be preserved from any real error by the assistance of the Holy Spirit, even though such statements are of course historically conditioned, constantly capable of, and in need of fresh interpretation, and [48] always too falling short of the mystery they seek to express. Küng, however, takes up the position that while it is true that many such statements are de facto correct, still even statements such as these can, precisely in principle, be erroneous, and may later perhaps come to be recognized and rejected as errors.

This applies a fortiori to those statements which are put forward by the official doctrinal authority of the Church with a certain binding force but precisely not one that is ultimate and irrevocable. In this respect Küng clearly does not depart in his interpretation from the traditional doctrine of the Church and of the theologians. Thus it is immediately clear that our present theme for investigation has a certain connection with Küng's book, for with the publication of this book a certain question has been touched upon and has once more been rendered actual and relevant as a matter of open discussion: the question, namely, of whether there are any ultimate certainties and assurances in the Church for the believer. Nevertheless the considerations put forward in the present essay will not be concerned directly or exclusively with the positions taken up by Küng. These will be touched upon here and there as the subject-matter itself demands. But our theme for investigation is conceived of in broader terms, and intended to have a more radical meaning, for it to be regarded merely as a crossing of swords with Küng's thesis. Küng himself appears to be convinced of the fact that the Holy Spirit, by the power of his grace, constantly preserves the Church in truth even though this state of being preserved bears primarily and properly upon a truth which ultimately speaking lies behind any of those truths which are expressed in propositional form. Moreover the men of today are inclined to doubt even this ultimate assurance, which Küng himself upholds. And to the extent that this is true it is obvious that we both can and should

[1] German publication details: Einsiedeln, 1970; English translation: Infallible, an Inquiry (New York, 1971).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

conceive of our present theme in far broader and more fundamental terms.

In putting the question of whether the Church can offer any ultimate assurances and certainties to the believer we must begin by recognizing that the question itself has many different levels of meaning. Ultimate certainty – what does that really mean? There is a certain basic state or basic attitude (or whatever name we may choose to give to the reality referred to) that is wholly subjected to human freedom and decision: the attitude, namely of an ultimate trust in the meaningfulness of human existence, in the possibility of a full, all-embracing, and definitive salvation (as theologians are accustomed to expressing it). There are individual propositions, consisting of human concepts and words, which are put forward with the claim of being real and true – true and assured beyond [49] any shadow of doubt, and so offering ultimate certainties. If therefore it is asked whether the Church can offer the believer any ultimate certainties this question is ipso facto and in itself ambiguous. For what is it that is being asked? Is it whether and how the Church can offer the believer that attitude of an ultimate calm and assured basic trust in existence and leading to the hope of salvation, or is it an enquiry into specific individual propositions as taught by the Church which as such are intended to offer ultimate certainties? The question is all the more complicated inasmuch as, obviously, that attitude of basic and ultimate trust on the one hand, and these propositional truths which can be conceived of on the other hand, are not simply two entities immediately juxtaposed to one another, but rather mutually condition one another each in its own way, even though the certainty of basic trust and the certainty of propositional truths are not identical with one another. A further distinction has to be drawn, turning the question with which we are concerned in these considerations into a twofold question. For on the one hand we may be asking whether the Church offers the believer ultimate certainties to the extent that he already is such, while on the other we may be asking whether the Church guarantees ultimate certainties to him who seeks to assent to her as the guardian of salvation and truth. For manifestly it means something different for me to ask myself what kind of certainty I can have in accepting the Church and her teaching authority from asking myself what kind of certainties the teaching authority of the Church offers me, assuming that I have already in principle accepted the validity of this teaching authority. Although it is necessary to draw this distinction it itself in turn raises special difficulties because the realities just distinguished from one another are at the same time very closely connected with one another in a way that is difficult to describe.

Assuming the validity of the distinctions we have just drawn within the basic question as such we may now go on to state the following:

First, that radical and all-embracing attitude of basic trust in the meaning of existence, the ultimate hope of salvation referred to above, is not something which can, in any strict or proper sense, be sustained by the authority of the Church or, in that sense, ‘ecclesiastical’. Obviously an individual who already stands within the community of believers will find this ultimate and basic attitude of trust easier, and in this sense he does also have ah ecclesiastical element, if we like to put it so, entering into the concrete circumstances of his life. But this does not alter the fact that in principle this ultimate and basic trust is both logically and psychologically prior to belief in the authority of the Church, and is rather that which [50] sustains, than that which is sustained by, this belief in the teaching authority of the Church. Because this ultimate and basic trust, to which of course other names can be given (ultimate freedom from anxiety, ultimate readiness to believe etc.), embraces and sustains all things, and so too the specifically Christian faith, its contents, and therefore a convinced acceptance of the teaching authority of the Church as well, all assurances and certainties offered to man by this authority of the Church are from the outset incapable of being any surer or more certain than this basic attitude of trust itself. Indeed all assurances and certainties in the life of the Church actually bear within themselves the special quality of this basic attitude of trust on which, in all cases, they themselves are based. But there are two points to be made about this basic attitude of trust. First, as we shall have to explain in greater detail later, it is the most sure and most certain factor, and second that it is at the same time the factor involving the greatest exercise of freedom, that which is made subject to man's own responsibility, that which is constantly threatened, under attack by the ultimate temptation to a radical scepticism and cynicism, a temptation which can gain the upper hand even in one whose life seems to outward appearances to be very normal and governed by moral principle. It is necessary to recognize and understand this special quality of the ultimate and basic attitude of trust; to realize that it imprints its special character upon all else, and so too upon our faith in the teaching authority of the Church. And once we do recognize this it becomes obvious that even as Christians and members of the Church we should not in any sense expect her to hand down to us assurances and certainties such as would simply free us from our burdens or simply and in every respect be obvious and indubitable. No such assurances and certainties are to be found within the Church, because no such assurances and certainties can ever exist in human life at all. For even in the ultimate depths of his existence man is constantly assailed by temptations, constantly called upon to decide between light and darkness. The ultimate clarity and sureness of his own existence is bestowed upon him only in the ultimate and basic movements of his own heart, at a level at which it is no longer possible to distinguish between speculative reason and freedom. At this level, rather, either faculty conditions the other. If we understand the specifically ecclesiastical factors in the thought and action of a Christian we shall realize that it in no sense has the effect of freeing him from the task, the burden, and the secret blessedness of seizing upon the ultimate certainty only in an ultimate self-commitment in love and trust, of realizing that the first and last light that he is given is a reality indwelling the attitude of [51] trusting freedom itself, and cannot be borrowed from any other source. In the light of this it will become clear that the ultimate surenesses and certainties even of a Christian, and, moreover, even according to Christian doctrine itself are far from being so specifically ecclesiastical as we are all too easily prone to insinuate in an incautious apologetic on behalf of the Church and its significance for man. Augustine is quite wrong when he says that he would not believe the gospel if he had not been prompted to do so by the authority of the Church. We should understand the term 'gospel' here as signifying the liberating power of the Spirit of God, who bestows upon us this ultimate trust in existence to combat all ultimate mistrust and all despairing angst. And if we do take the term in this sense, then this statement of Augustine is certainly incorrect. It is the attitude of ultimate trust that sustains the authority of the Church, and not vice versa, even though it is easier for one who belongs to the community of believers to have this ultimate and basic attitude of trust, and even though the experience of the possibility of this ultimate and basic attitude of trust is constantly bestowed upon us Christians afresh in our encounter with all the realities which are imparted to us as Christians through the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We now come to a fresh aspect of our general considerations, once we recognize that this basic attitude of trust sustaining all else, including the Church and her authority, is in fact in all cases achieved in the ultimate basis of our freedom, which is unexpressed and never fully reflected upon at the conscious level. It is only in this ultimate basis of our freedom that the ultimate and most primordial light of truth bums, though at the same time this is always imparted through the medium of an objectified knowledge expressed in propositional form. We cannot in the present context treat of the difficult problem of what the propositions are in which this objectifying knowledge of man can and must be expressed so as to give objective form to this basic attitude of trust on man's part, an attitude in which reason and freedom are one, and in which man finds his ultimate reference to God. Here we shall confine ourselves to making two points: first that such propositions do not necessarily have to have an explicitly metaphysical or religious content. On the contrary, man can achieve this basic and primordial

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation attitude of trust and objectify it to himself in propositions which seem purely secular in character and to belong wholly to this world, provided only that he radically commits himself in his freedom through the medium of these propositions. The second point, however, is that explicitly metaphysical and religious propositions, in which the word of God etc. are expressly applied, are not an unnecessary [52] luxury nor even a mere inevitable stage in that inescapable process by which man comes consciously to reflect upon his ultimate and basic attitudes. On the contrary, for the concrete individual in a concrete situation such specifically religious propositions constitute, under certain circumstances, the necessary medium, obligatory so far as he is concerned, for his basic decisions such that without them as medium in a given concrete situation this particular individual is quite incapable of really achieving that ultimate and basic decision of his freedom without which he would be actually denying this basic decision, thereby incurring his own damnation. To put the matter simply: there are individuals who take their decision for God in the context of their secular everyday life without this decision of their's having anything to do with the word of God explicitly or as a matter of their own conscious objectification. At the same time, however, there are men who, in the course of their personal lives, encounter personal statements about God of a kind which they can really understand. And an individual such as this cannot truly leave this word of God out of account in arriving at his ultimate basic decision. There is – to speak once more in wholly general terms – a kind of consciously objectifying human knowledge which is expressed in terms which present the reality signified as object, and which shares in the special quality of the basic decision of man. In other words it participates in his ultimate sureness and certainty and in the temptations by which these are assailed in virtue of his human freedom. Let us take, for instance, someone who says that we must accord absolute respect to our fellow men in their dignity, and who in making this statement understands what it really means, making it without reserve despite all its questionableness and lack of ultimate precision, which he himself may recognize. Such a one makes his statement with that ultimate sureness, the outcome of a freedom which is exposed to assault, which belongs intrinsically to the attitude of ultimate trust in existence. There are many such statements which share in the nature of this ultimate sureness. Obviously they differ very much among themselves, and so too have very different ways of sharing in the sureness of the free act of basic trust which is under assault – that attitude of trust in which reason and freedom and the divine grace that liberates constitute a unity. We cannot here set forth statements of this kind in all their multiplicity, their various qualities, and their varying connections with this ultimate arch-certainty. But when we say that such statements, in the sureness and certainty belonging to them, draw their life from this ultimate trust in the meaningfulness of existence, this is the most basic statement concerning the original relationship between these two entities. At the same time, however, [53] this assertion is obviously not intended to gainsay the fact that conversely the free acceptance of this basic attitude of trust also in some respects itself draws its life from these statements which give expression to it. For one who assents to such statements and experiences their truth in those concrete ways in which they are proved capable of supporting life in the personal life of a concrete individual and within a concrete society will manifestly also find it easier to achieve that basic attitude of trust from which these statements truly draw their living force. But there is one further point of primary importance to be made about statements of this kind which derive their living certainty from this heart and centre of free human living: such statements may perfectly well have as their content elements of concrete human history. They can perfectly well relate to concrete realities in the personal life of an individual, to which in the end, at least in principle, the whole history of humanity belongs. For instance the statement that this or that man has in his own individual life a quality of absolute reliability, even though in theory we cannot absolutely rely upon any individual man, or the statement that this or that life which is of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

radical moral significance, and of which we have had living experience, cannot simply have been swallowed up in empty nothingness – these and similar statements have a content which is subject to the contingency of history, and yet at the same time draw their living force from that ultimate attitude of basic trust, and so share in the certainty and sureness belonging to it, and throw light upon this attitude of basic trust itself as constituting its concrete objectification.

We are speaking, then, of statements which on the one hand have an historical content, and on the other derive their living force from this ultimate and freely posited basic attitude of trust in the absolute meaning of existence, an attitude brought about by grace. At the same time these same statements give objective form to this attitude. Now for Christians statements about Jesus Christ the crucified and risen Lord as the absolute mediator of salvation are to be numbered among statements of this kind. There is no need for us here to enlarge upon these statements in respect of their content in any more precise detail. But in the message which they convey the believer, from his place in history, is enabled in the concrete to grasp that absolute and irrevocable self-utterance of God to which he assents with hope, albeit without consciously explicitating this in that attitude of ultimate and basic trust which is sustained by grace. 'What we encounter here in the experience of the believer is a relationship of mutual interplay and influence between the two entities, and to that extent in the last analysis a circular process – that ultimate attitude of basic trust [54] sustained by grace and breaking in upon the freedom of God which we call the grace of faith constitutes the enabling condition for recognizing Christ with real faith as the ultimate bringer of salvation, as the manifestation and guarantee in history of God's irrevocable act in turning to man. Conversely the experience of Jesus for the believer as Christian constitutes a living experience within his own personal history in which he finds the courage to accept in freedom this ultimate basic trust through the grace that is offered him. There is, then, a relationship between the historical experience of Jesus on the one hand and the achievement of the ultimate attitude of free and basic trust on the other such that each mutually conditions the other. Nevertheless the two factors involved in this relationship differ slightly in the manner in which each sustains an element of the other. For without entering into any more profound justification of the differences involved in this relationship of mutual conditioning, a Catholic theologian must make two points: first, that an ultimate and salvific acceptance of the basic attitude of trust offered by God's grace can be present in an individual even without any explicit reference to Jesus Christ, and second that we have to hold firmly to the position that it is impossible to have any real faith in Jesus in history without this grace of faith. It is in fact nothing else than precisely this basic attitude of trust, brought about by grace, of which we have just spoken that liberates man and opens the immediacy of God to him, regardless of whether he formulates this explicitly to himself or achieves it only at an implicit level.

But abstracting from this point, we can in all confidence arrive at the following conclusion: for the Christian there is an ultimate unity, consisting in a mutually conditioning relationship, between his experience of Jesus as the crucified and risen Lord who gives him the courage freely to accept the meaning of existence on the one hand, and that ultimate and radical basic attitude of trust in the meaning of existence which, in the full development of its nature, explicates itself in faith, hope, and love. At the same time, however, in this mutually conditioning relationship between the two elements, the second element, namely the attitude of basic trust in the meaning of existence, retains an ultimate priority for the Christian over the experience of the historical Jesus. And because of this, without denying in this matter that there is such a mutually conditioning relationship, we can, even with regard to the Christian, conclude the following: the believer's experience of Jesus Christ is in its sureness and certainty upheld by that ultimate basic attitude of trust in its sureness and certainty, even though, because it is free, it is also liable to the assaults of temptation. One who despairs in an ultimate manner, denying any absolute meaning [55] of existence and failing freely to maintain hope for himself cannot recognize Jesus either as him who by dying entered into the life of God and so as the final and definitive self-utterance of God to man in history. From this it obviously follows ipso facto that from the basic statements of Christianity about Jesus Christ we cannot truly expect any other certainty or sureness than that which is inherent in that ultimate basic attitude of trust: in other words a certainty that is always liable to the assaults of temptation, always to be achieved afresh in freedom and responsibility, one which is not simply given to us beforehand as an achieved reality, but is always too the free act of our own lives, which we ourselves sustain and only so are sustained by it. Indeed, from the points we have already indicated above we can as Christians and Catholics even go so far as to concede freely and confidently that the sureness and certainty relating to Jesus is in a certain respect a sureness that is more derived, more threatened, more fragile than the sureness of this basic attitude of trust in itself. 'While this is, as we have said, correct only in a certain respect, still it is something which we should freely recognize because ultimately speaking it imparts to belief in Jesus Christ a greater sureness and a greater facility than if we were falsely to claim for this faith that it possessed this certainty as an ultimate and intrinsic factor within itself such as no historically contingent fact can ever have. There are in fact countless individuals who find their salvation through Christ, and thereby in a true sense, through his grace and the hope arising from it, have arrived at the historical manifestation of salvation, even though at the level of their conscious and verbal objectification they know nothing of him or even suppose, at this level, that they have to reject him because even this situation can prevail without any fault on their part. But after all that has been said the fact still remains that there is an historical experience in faith of the historical Jesus as the absolute bringer of salvation, and this experience of faith is – at least sensu positivo – upheld and defined by the sureness and certainty attending upon this ultimate and grace-given basic attitude of trust.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We can now proceed a step further in our approach to the question of whether the Church itself can offer the Christian any ultimate certainties. First we must recognize that faith in Jesus Christ as the absolute bringer of salvation, as the ultimate messenger of God's self-utterance to the world from within the world is something which henceforward can never disappear. And this quality of indestructibility in such faith is itself an element in the content of this faith. If the believer failed to understand the content of his faith as enduring finally and definitively in the world in this [56] sense he could not recognize Jesus as the final and definitive Word of God's self-utterance to the world. Alternatively he would have to reckon with the fact that God has once more radically turned away from the world. Faith asserts its own indestructibility as faith in Christ and in the world and mankind in general, even though obviously the individual believer cannot assert that his own personal faith as entertained in the openness of his own life of personal freedom possesses the same quality of indestructibility. Faith as faith in Christ, in the manifestation of the grace of God imposing itself victoriously, involves faith in its own indestructibility in the world as a whole, not as the autonomous achievement of man but as the deed of God's grace which can impose itself within the freedom of man without suppressing it. Christ himself has promised that it will do this, so that faith in Jesus itself participates in the victoriousness of God's grace, which has been addressed to the world in Jesus.

If this is the case, then faith in Jesus Christ also implies faith in the survival of a community of faith gathered about Jesus Christ, which exercises, sustains, and bears witness to this indestructible faith in Jesus Christ. It is true that we cannot say that this community of faith called the Church always has a membership which is increasing in relation to the total number of mankind within the world, that it always has among the nations and within the world that social status which we experience it as having. All this and much else of a similar

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

kind we cannot know, because the Church in history has, and necessarily must have, a future that opens upon the unknown. But that the community of faith gathered about Jesus will not cease throughout history, that Jesus, therefore, will always be acknowledged – these are points that belong to the very content of Christian faith, and which have, even though in a sense that is derived and exposed to danger, that sureness, certainty and liability to assault which shares in the ultimate and basic attitude of trust, a sureness and certainty which belong to Christian faith in general. To the extent that the individual believer shares in the faith of the Church as such, and draws his life force from this community of faith, albeit only as sustained by that basic attitude of trust brought about by grace, we can by all means go on to say also that the sureness and certainty of his Christian faith in general and in the indestructibility of the faith of the Church and therefore of the Church herself, receives a supplementary element from the Church herself even though this does not gainsay the fact that this faith too is ultimately sustained in this part of its content by that basic attitude of trust, the innermost certainty of which we are accustomed to call the grace of faith.

[57] Let us go a step further: faith in the indestructibility of the Church's faith, in the fact that she will abide in the truth of Christ, implies a faith in the fact that there are propositions in which, taken individually, this faith of the Church is articulated, and which at the same time share in the indestructibility of this faith. Christian faith means faith in Jesus Christ expressed in a historical mode and having a historical reference to Jesus Christ over and above the reference to him achieved through grace. Now it is quite impossible for this faith to exist otherwise than as expressed in propositions. For while it may be true that a historical connection with an earlier historical event need not be expressed solely and exclusively through propositions expressing historical tradition, still a connection of this kind can never in any case be established without such propositions. The indestructibility, the historical permanence of faith in Jesus Christ implies that certain propositions about him will endure permanently too, and of course this applies to true propositions, for erroneous ones as such cannot cause faith in him to endure permanently in any true sense. The certain and sure faith in the abidingness of Jesus Christ, of faith in him, and so too in the community of faith belonging to him, implies the abidingness of true propositions about him, and of course also about those realities (such as God etc.) without which Jesus himself cannot in any sense be understood and expressed. Faith in the indestructible permanence of faith and of the community of faith necessarily constitutes faith in the fact that the truth as expressed in propositions about Jesus Christ in the community of faith, the Church, is not destroyed. In this connection it is obvious that the Church must at least recognize certain propositions as belonging to the true and indestructible propositions constitutive of her own faith – that in other words it is impossible for the Church, while having such propositions, to be herself totally incapable of recognizing them as such in the individual concrete case. A point on which there cannot in fact be any doubt is that the Church is convinced that she actually knows of such true and indestructible propositions as such. At least it can be said that the most fundamental assertions about Jesus Christ as the Lord, the bringer of salvation, the unsurpassable presence of God with us, are propositions of this kind, which the Church recognizes as constitutive of her faith and declares to be true and ever-abiding propositions. These assertions are in ecclesiastical parlance called infallible and inerrant propositions. Propositions of this kind the Church expresses as objectifications of her own ultimate Christian basic understanding, and of her basic attitude of trust as brought about in her by the Spirit. She expresses them as belonging to her faith, as sharing in the certainty and [58] sureness with which she asserts her faith in general and as a whole, and she therefore assents to them with an irrevocable commitment of faith. To the extent that the Church believes in and proclaims such propositions as, in the sense described, infallible, she extends to those Christians who have united themselves with, and inserted themselves into the Church's understanding of faith as one and whole, ultimate certainties and surenesses with regard to these propositions in the sense previously ascribed to these terms, 'certainty' and 'sureness'. In this connection, however, two points, arising from the very nature of what has been said, have to be noticed: first, as applied to a specific proposition, this sureness deriving from the authority of the Church's own explicit faith taken as a whole can obviously be applied only to one who has in principle accepted in faith the abidingness of the Church in the truth of Christ, and that abidingness too which is communicated in propositional form. As we have already previously pointed out, this certainty which belongs to the acceptance of the Church herself as a whole comes to the individual believer in the Church primarily and in principle not properly speaking from the Church but from the experience of the Spirit and the encounter with Christ in the basic attitude of trust as brought about by the Spirit. This pre-Christian (if we may so express it) certainty upholds the certainty with regard to the Church in general, and thereby a fortiori that which relates to the individual propositions taught by the Church and not e converso. At the same time, however, the point we have previously made remains true, that namely concerning the mutually conditioning relationship which exists between the basic attitude of trust as brought about by the Spirit on the one hand, and the individual's membership of the Church on the other. There is now a second and further point to be noticed: the formal sureness belonging to a specific proposition taught by the Church (when the Church believes and teaches it with an absolute commitment), and from this communicated to the believer within the Church, does not simply replace that interior and, to a certain extent, material sureness which an individual Christian can have with regard to a particular proposition of this kind when he succeeds in arriving at and realizing for himself the intrinsic connection which exists between his basic attitude of trust as brought about by the Spirit, his grace-given basic Christianity, the ultimate basic statements of the Christian faith on the one hand, and on the other the specific individual proposition at the more derived level which the Church herself teaches. If an individual Christian in the concrete given case does not succeed in arriving at this intrinsic connection, then he will generally be permitted to leave an individual derived proposition [59] of this kind respectfully alone, or to some extent to regard it as a remote goal to be attained in the development of his own personal history of faith, which is still in process of achievement. At the same time, however, he must obviously not on this account ipso facto deny or reject the proposition concerned on the grounds that he himself cannot, or cannot as yet, arrive at it or recognize how it is derived from the original wellsprings of faith which he has attained to.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Before we go on to what is, properly speaking, a fresh and further step in our considerations, one further supplementary explanation remains to be added for a right understanding of what has just been said. An individual man lives not only by ultimate basic convictions which he recognizes as absolutely and permanently binding with an ultimate certainty so far as he is concerned. An individual man, rather, has at the same time many recognized points, convictions, opinions, norms of behaviour, which he regards as right and valid for him here and now. No one can live solely on the basis of ultimate basic convictions assented to as final and definitive. In the concrete decisions taken in human life it is impossible to eliminate from the outset opinions which are merely provisional, conditional, and capable of being revised. It is not only the absolute truths, but also provisional opinions that sustain life and personal development. The former give history its continuity, while the latter give it its movement and its openness to a future still unknown. Indeed the situation is far from being such that we can, in the concrete, press our conscious reflections upon these two kinds of propositions and the difference between them so far that we can in all cases and in concrete detail draw the precise line of distinction between the two kinds of propositions. It can even be the case within an individual man that in the course of the personal development of his own individual recognition of truth a specific proposition which formerly appeared to him as a mere provisional opinion now comes to be recognized and accepted by this same individual as a statement of absolute validity. Now what applies to the individual's life with regard to his quest for truth inevitably applies in a similar sense too to the Church in her conscious awareness of her own faith. She does not live out her Christian faith solely by those propositions which she herself has already recognized at the fully conscious level as belonging absolutely and irreformably to her awareness of her faith. In her life of faith in the concrete she also inevitably and necessarily has propositions which are merely provisional, which, under certain circumstances will later come to be recognized as erroneous. She does not even have any explicit, sure, and unequivocal awareness right from the outset in every case as to whether a specific [60] proposition which she firmly holds and teaches belongs to the class of infallible propositions or to the class of theological opinions and provisional interpretations of her faith. Theology, therefore, draws an obvious distinction between propositions of the Church which are 'dogmas' and others which, while under certain circumstances they are indeed taught with a certain authority and binding force so far as the individual is concerned by the Church, for the protection of dogma in the true sense and for its application in practical life, are not claimed by the Church on this account to be adhered to by the individual with an absolute commitment of faith such as is appropriate to dogma properly so called. A certain respect is due even to propositions of this kind, which are taught by the Church yet which are, in principle, reformable and possibly erroneous. The situation is similar to that of a man who follows the advice of a learned and conscientious doctor acting according to his best lights. This too, under certain circumstances, must be considered a matter of duty, even while recognizing that such medical advice is not infallible and may be rendered out of date by advances in medical knowledge or by a still more detailed examination. The Church has de facto very often made mistakes in the past in propositions of this kind. And obviously even though with the best will in the world it is quite unavoidable, this makes a Christian's life of faith difficult to the extent that such individual erroneous propositions may have very notable consequences for his practical life, while at the same time erroneous sentences of this kind may come so to be amalgamated with dogmas in the true sense that they can cause considerable difficulty too in giving the assent of faith to such dogmas. (Unfortunately it is not possible here actually to adduce examples of this.)

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We can now advance yet a further step. We have made a number of points with regard to the truth and sureness of specific propositions included in the Church's awareness of her faith and as such imparting sureness and certainty to the faith of the individual Christian in the Church. These points must now be given further precision by a process of reflecting upon the structure of the Church herself. The Church is not solely and exclusively the sum total of those who, by their faith in Jesus Christ, are de facto gathered about him. It has actively to bear witness to this faith, and is in this respect a social entity capable of acting positively. In the present context there is one question which we do not need to decide: whether this social unity, organized structure, and constitution of the Church as witness to the truth of Christ flows solely and necessarily from the very nature of Christian faith itself, or whether it constitutes a [61] supplementary property of this community of faith called the Church. In any case it belongs to the conviction of faith, at least of the Catholic Church, that she constitutes a socially structured unity and, moreover, precisely to the extent that she remains abidingly in the truth of Christ and cannot depart from it. Furthermore she remains in that truth as expressed in propositional form. In other words (viewing the matter from the opposite side) she achieves her state of abiding in the truth and also standing by true propositions through her socially structured constitution and so, to put it in more concrete terms, through her established officials. That social constitution which is inevitable for any community – in other words its established officialdom – is, according to Catholic faith, related as an element in the Church not merely to the external social factors in the life of such a believing society but also to its true and proper nature, to its faith as such. The authority vested in officials in the Church, therefore, is also a teaching authority or magisterium, through which the Church's conscious faith realizes its own true nature more and more explicitly and clearly and becomes active in bearing witness to its faith within and without. This teaching authority of the officials in the Church is, it is true, itself upheld by the Spirit and through the activity of God, which preserves not merely those vested with official authority but also and primarily the believers, whether authorized officials or not, in faith in Jesus Christ. This teaching authority of the established officials of the Church can take effect in the lives of the individual believers, and give rise to specific doctrinal propositions in support of this certainty and sureness only if and to the extent that the Church and the teaching authority of the Church make affirmation to these individuals in a decision the sureness and certainty of which derive not from the Church as such but from the sureness and certainty of that ultimate attitude of basic trust, of the Spirit, of the experience of Jesus Christ of which we have already spoken. But assuming this affirmation to have been made, and also unreservedly accepted and applied in concrete Christian practical living, it must be said that according to Catholic faith in the Church there is a genuine teaching authority of the Church's officialdom as concretized in the pope and the college of bishops considered as a unity. Under certain circumstances which we cannot develop in any greater detail here this officialdom can actually teach a specific proposition as infallible, as dogma to be held and maintained by the Church with an absolute commitment of faith. When such a dogma is defined or is capable of being defined (whether it be by the ordinary or extraordinary magisterium of the Church) the individual Christian has a duty to give his assent of faith as already [62] defined in greater detail above. Thereby he also acquires the sureness and certainty that by assenting to such a proposition he is not departing from the truth of Christ. To this extent and in this sense the Church can also offer ultimate surenesses and certainties in virtue of her teaching authority even though on a precise view such certainties are not primary but rather derived, and even though these certainties are obviously liable to those assaults, that state of subordination to the free decision of the conscience which we ourselves must have recognized in our very first and most primary human surenesses and certainties. With these provisos (and a few others which still have to be explained in greater detail at a later stage) we can say that there are ultimate certainties with regard to the dogmatic propositions of the Church and that too as proceeding from her official teaching authority.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We have stated that in her propositions of faith promulgated by her official teaching authority the Church offers the believer an ultimate sureness and certainty. To this statement certain further essential precisions must now be added. We must reiterate once more what we have already said: the sureness of the Church, to the extent that it is intended to be a sureness for the conscience of the individual, is sustained by that sureness with which the Church and her teaching authority are assented to by the believing conscience of the individual without reliance upon the teaching authority of the Church itself, that the assimilation of an individual dogmatic proposition by an individual believer, while involving an acknowledgement of the Church's teaching authority, can take place in very different ways (ways which obviously are continually liable to converge, blend, or pass into one another); these ways of assimilating a specific dogmatic proposition may range from an attitude of leaving the proposition concerned unexplored and accepting it merely on the authority of the Church to an innermost understanding of it proceeding from the heart and centre of the individual's own Christianity as a personal living force; that even the understanding of such dogmatic propositions can be obscured and rendered more difficult in the individual and even for the Church as a whole at a specific point in time by unconsciously amalgamating the dogmatic proposition concerned with other theological opinions which are reformable, capable of error, and far from belonging intrinsically to the dogma itself. So far from this being the case, in fact, there is still more to be said, over and above this, on these dogmatic propositions and the sureness and certainty guaranteed for them by the Church's official teaching authority. Even propositions such as these, ultimately binding and valid as they are, and having an ultimate sureness [63] in them, are always expressed in terms which are conditioned by history from the standpoint of ideas which are historically conditioned and subject to change. The mode of their formulation is embedded in human awareness, which is itself subject to historical change and does not share in the special force of these propositions themselves. Even dogmatic propositions are analogous in character, i.e. they never give full or adequate expression to the reality signified. They view that which is signified from certain quite specific points of view, selecting these, whether consciously or, more often, unconsciously, from a whole range of other aspects which are in themselves also possible but de facto neglected. Such expressions are always, or almost always, bound up with a special parlance or style which is preferred, whether consciously or unconsciously, for the purpose of achieving a common agreement in the Church and a common language to be used by the teaching authorities of the Church even though one and the same dogma might be expressed in a different parlance. In view of the special qualities we have mentioned as belonging to a dogmatic proposition, we may even go so far as freely to concede that it is far from easy for the individual Christian and theologian to recognize clearly and unambiguously where he should draw the line between a proposition which though true is subject to these special limitations and historical conditions, and an erroneous proposition which, however, may depart from the truth only very slightly. And a further point which may also freely be conceded bears upon the awareness of an individual as influenced by his own subjective conditions and the way he comes to recognize the element of untruth (from a Christian point of view) underlying a given mode of expression, and constituting the fons et origo of it. He may find it easier to grasp this in a proposition which the teaching authority of the Church declares to be erroneous, or at least as unacceptable by the standards of its own mode of parlance, than in a proposition which is guaranteed to be true by the Church's doctrinal authority. The infallibility of a proposition promulgated by the teaching authority of the Church does not imply that this may not be replaced at some point in the future within the total development of the Church's awareness of her faith by another and better formulation, more easily assimilable to the men of the epoch concerned. Such a thing has often taken place in the past history of dogma, and obviously this history has not yet come to an end even today. Advances in it will be achieved only lf Christians and theologians, when confronted with such particular dogmatic propositions, make known their conclusions or their feelings as to how a particular dogmatic proposition has proved inadequate or is [64] capable of revision once it is viewed from the intellectual standpoints proper to these Christians and theologians. Dogma, even in its most ultimate and binding form, is open to the future. That which is truly signified in a given dogmatic proposition is open to a further course of development in terms of truth in the Church's awareness of her faith, even after it has been defined. And this course of development extends outwards into a future which it is quite impossible to calculate. In the light of this let us consider, then, a situation in which one man holds that, with the reservations and due distinctions mentioned above, a dogmatic proposition is certainly true and incapable of retrospective revision, and another who regards such a proposition as possibly erroneous while still acknowledging that the Church herself abides in the truth. It would almost be possible to say that judged in the light of our foregoing observations the disagreement between these two amounts to little more than an argument over words, because neither side can define precisely enough where the boundary is to be drawn in such propositions between one that is erroneous and one which all Catholic theologians would concede to be inadequate and capable of subsequent reform. But the very raising of such a question necessarily leads to the raising of a counter-question which will be found difficult to answer. It springs from the fact that some theologians who are, and who intend to remain, Christians, and so who give their absolute assent to the basic substance of Christianity, nevertheless run counter to the teaching of the Church, or at least to her authorized mode of parlance (for after all this too has its importance) in regarding it as possible for her dogmatic propositions to be erroneous. Now in the light of what has been said why should this be so? For after all what they are seeking to assert amounts to no more than what is in fact and in material substance already said by the Church's own theology, even when translated into normal terminology. Those who believe that a formulation such as that propagated by Küng is clearer and more honest must allow a further question to be put to them: when they feel that they must disavow as erroneous propositions which are genuinely dogmatic and not merely theological and subject to revision, is not this a way of avoiding the necessity of having to interpret earlier dogmatic formulations, constantly having to translate them into fresh terms, except on condition of being allowed totally to disregard any continuity in the process of expressing the faith in propositional form, as though the substance of Christianity in its concrete historical mode was something totally outside the statements contained in the New Testament and in the official proclamations of the Church? Unless we took this as our prior assumption we [65] would be able to achieve all that Küng is concerned with in real terms without adopting his thesis of the possibility of error in each and every statement of Scripture, of the Councils, or of the ordinary and extraordinary magisterium of the bishops and the pope.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[66]

4

ON THE CONCEPT OF INFALLIBILITY IN CATHOLIC THEOLOGY

The title of this essay is deliberately, and without any false modesty, intended to cover some aspects bearing upon the concept of infallibility in Catholic ecclesiology.[1] Some aspects only will be treated of, if only because, for lack of competence, it is no part of my purpose to bring the concept of infallibility in Catholic ecclesiology into confrontation with similar concepts to be found in the history of religion, in philosophy, or in other disciplines. Equally it is no part of my purpose here to give an exposition of the traditional Catholic official teaching on the infallibility of the Church's teaching office. This doctrine taken as a whole can be assumed to be already known. So far as our consideration is concerned, therefore, the fact that the pope and the whole episcopate are to be accounted the subject of this doctrinal infallibility represents a secondary element in the content of this doctrine. It is taken as given that these two entities possess this charisma of infallibility only under quite specific conditions; that the charisma itself bears only upon the content of Christian revelation in the interpreting and upholding of it, and does not conduce to any increase of it. On the other hand what we mean is the dogma of infallibility in its traditional sense, in which it actually refers to the truth of the individual defined proposition as such, and so not merely in that sense in which, for instance, H. Küng and W. Kasper seem to interpret it, namely that the indestructibility and infallibility of the Church's faith bears ultimately speaking merely upon the abiding union [67] of the Church with her Lord taken as a single whole, so that even in 'definitions' errors in individual cases can occur again and again, and can exist temporarily. Here, therefore, only a few observations remain to be made, in which a Catholic theologian makes a tentative attempt, without any claims to a systematic treatment, at putting forward ideas concerning that which he has received, believes, presents, and defends as the doctrine of his Church, and of which he now seeks to achieve a better understanding. In this connection it must be recognized that the doctrine itself has a special function of its own, and we must begin by gaining some initial insight into this, realizing that such an approach constitutes a stage in the process of achieving our goal and arriving at a deeper understanding of this doctrine.

At this stage, however, there is only one point to be made by way of introduction. If we take the dogma of infallibility or the claim to doctrinal authority which it entails in isolation, then obviously it appears as though by it a process of arriving at new knowledge were being arbitrarily cut short at a certain point by the intervention of an authority external to itself, and as though thereby specific areas of the believer's convictions were being unlawfully immunized against that critique which belongs to the very essence of human knowledge, especially as achieved through an historical development. It seems too as though this privileged knowledge likewise implied according a social pre-eminence to an individual (because infallibility is subjected in a person), and as though the Church were in consequence ultimately speaking a totalitarian system, on the grounds that the Church (from being initially a system based on faith, and from this becoming a reality at the sociological level) is capable of being definitively fixed and frozen at any time by an individual element within this system. Now let us, with all brevity, indicate a few points bearing on this.

[1] This paper was composed for the conference held at Rome from the 5th to the 10th January 1970 on the occasion of the centenary of the dogma of infallibility, and for inclusion in the Symposium, 'L'Infaillibilité. Son Aspect philosophique et théologique'. On the same subject cf. W. Kasper, Dogma unter dem Wort Gottes (Mainz, 1965); idem, Glaube und Geschichte (Mainz, 1970); Y. Congar, 'Infaillibilité et indéfectibilité', Ministères et communion ecclésiale (Paris, 1971), pp. 141-165.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

First, a point that must not be overlooked is that, as distinct from the state, the Church is a free believing community, which we belong to only as a matter of our own free decision. Even if it were in fact an authoritarian or totalitarian structure, it would still only affect him who freely accepts it. But from the very outset it is surely difficult to describe any such system as 'totalitarian'.

On any existential-ontological approach it could be shown as a matter of general principle that an absolute assent to a proposition and an abiding attitude of criticism with regard to it are not mutually exclusive. This also applies to a dogmatic declaration arrived at on the basis of infallibility, the more so since every defined dogma is objectively open to further [68] development, and even the law of infallibility is (as we shall have to discuss further at a later stage) not self-authenticating, and so is incapable of being immunized by its own nature against critical enquiry.

With regard to a Church endowed with an official doctrinal magisterium of this kind it is obvious that the only kind of conviction which a believer in such a Church can have without viewing it as an authoritarian and totalitarian system is that particular conviction which involves belief in the assistance of the Spirit precisely at this particular point. Once we view the doctrinal laws involved in the constitution of the Church in isolation from this particular belief, it does indeed become in fact totalitarian, because within the dimension of her juridical and constitutional life as such she does not possess any absolute guard against the possibility of misusing her teaching authority in a totalitarian way. Yet the situation here is analogous to that of Christ Jesus the Lord. The Christian believes in him as the absolute mediator of salvation despite the historical dimension belonging to him. In the same way too, in an attitude of hope which is essentially eschatological, and which springs from his faith, he believes that the Church will de facto never fall victim to that danger which is really immanent in her very constitution. For this hope the sole final and definitive ground is simply Jesus Christ. Obviously in appealing in this way to Jesus Christ as the true and ultimate ground of faith, we are not in any sense pretending that the problems of speculative epistemology and sociological epistemology are ipso facto to be regarded as disposed of. On the contrary, even with this appeal to Jesus Christ they still remain. This applies, for instance, to the obvious question of whether this basis of faith does not merely lead us to assent to the content of faith as a whole as infallible, that is precisely to Jesus Christ, but also guarantees the infallibility of the individual defined proposition as such. And it also applies to the further question arising from this of how, in what sense, and in what manner this takes place. But these are questions which cannot be treated of at present. Yet motives can be pointed to which make it easier for the believer to have this hope nowadays, because the dogma of infallibility itself has a history of development of its own, which renders it in a certain sense less endangered and less 'dangerous' than formerly. And it is upon this history that we must concentrate here.

I. THE HISTORICITY OF THE DOGMA OF INFALLIBILITY

What does it mean for our understanding of the Catholic dogma of infallibility – this is the first question which we must pose – if we recognize [69] that element of historicity present in every human recognition of truth as applicable to this dogma too? In posing this question and attempting to find an answer to it we cannot develop the whole range of problems involved, and the whole meaning of, the general proposition of the historicity inherent in all human truth. We are therefore indeed aware of the lack of clarity in the prior assumptions involved in our own question. But we believe that even so we can gain from it certain useful insights into the dogma of infallibility. This is not to dispute the fact that in so far as our particular

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation question is concerned we could achieve far better insights if we could presuppose a more detailed general theory of the historicity of truth.

The Dogma of Infallibility as an Historical Proposition

The Catholic theologian must begin by frankly and explicitly taking cognizance of the fact that the declaration of infallibility is a proposition which has a history and will have a further one, a history which bears both upon the existence of the explicit proposition itself and also upon its content, though this is not ipso facto or necessarily to deny the abiding identity of these within that history.

First and foremost the dogma of infallibility, as applied to the pope, is, regarded as an explicit proposition of faith, a datum of relatively late date. And even if we say that the infallibility of the Church as a whole in her faith, in scripture, in the councils, has been a conviction of the Church right from the first, this still does not make any difference to the point we have just made. This is not only because this later conviction in turn has an historical beginning, but also because of a further point over and above this: the earlier understanding of the infallibility of the Church related less strongly, less explicitly than today, to the infallible correctness of a new decision to be arrived at afresh on a question of truth under dispute. In earlier times it related rather to the possession of the reality of salvation in the Church as handed down and possessed in faith, and in this sense 'ancient', as something already given and abiding within her. And even if we say that the ancient councils too did, after all, arrive at certain decisions and formulated fresh propositions in fresh terms, we must still point out that they did this not with an awareness of having achieved anything fresh or creative within history, but rather with the awareness of merely formulating the ancient content of faith in different terms, and almost while denying that through this fresh formulation anything new had taken place with regard to the recognition of truth itself. So clearly [70] was this taken for granted as a self-evident fact that almost down to the present day the officially authorized theology denied that there was any 'objective' development in the history of dogma.

This official position, into which we cannot enter in any greater detail at this point, does in any case show that one position is far from self-evident, namely an understanding of the fact that a doctrinal decision by council or pope is an event of truth or itself involves a history of truth. It shows that when the Vatican definition of infallibility was arrived at it did not entail any conscious awareness of the fact that this involved an acknowledgement of the historicity of truth; that the only way in which we can come to recognize the possibility of an infallible new decision about the ancient truth is if we ascribe an historical dimension to this (ancient) truth itself. For a fresh definition of this kind is precisely more than merely a formulation in different terms of an unchangeable proposition which remains quite unaltered by the new formulation itself.

There is a further point to be made about the two possible ways of understanding the infallibility of the Church in faith and doctrine. There may indeed be a necessary connection between them, and, moreover, precisely when we consider two points: first we should realize that the inalienable possession of the reality of salvation as a truth that is believed in precisely demands, in view of the historicity of man and his knowledge, a constant fresh appropriation of this reality of salvation in the form of a decision. Second we must not forget that even the modern, juridical, and actualizing interpretation of infallibility does not imply any absolutely assured knowledge of some kind of reality and truth which is quite new to us, but rather has guaranteed nothing else than that we shall abide in the ancient truth.

The two interpretations mentioned above are, nevertheless, still different from one another,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and the development of the second from the first itself in turn demonstrates the historicity of the dogma of infallibility, even if we regard it as bearing upon the Church as a whole and not merely upon the pope in particular. This history, however, is not merely a history inasmuch as the explicit declaration on infallibility has not always existed with the character of a juridical obligation of faith. What we are speaking of, rather, is a history of the actual meaningful content of this proposition in itself. This meaning which it has has itself not always been in existence because it was not conceived of. The meaning which it has could not formerly take effect as it has taken effect, and continues to do so, since its formulation. This meaning appears again and again from ever fresh standpoints and under fresh aspects. The elements of meaning inherent [71] in it are themselves incapable of being fully or adequately defined once and for all. And so that which is consciously apprehended in these elements undergoes a constant and unending process of change. In a word: the meaning of a dogma of this kind has itself a history, and one that is obviously never concluded.

This historicity of the dogma of infallibility appears for instance in the fact that in its definition a hundred years ago no one consciously adverted to the fact that the exercise of an infallible teaching authority is determined not merely by the subject in whom that authority is vested and the content which the declaration is designed to convey, but also by the 'situation' in which the addressee of the declaration is involved, the modes of expression available to those promulgating it which are always restricted, the more immediate historical context (rejection of a heresy etc.), the predominant interests of the time (which can never fully be brought under control) with their special outlooks and limitations etc. These and much else besides are factors which do not appear explicitly in the declaration promulgated at a given point in time, and so serve to demonstrate the historicity of the declaration itself. In fact this proposition has, since 1870 (the point in history at which it appeared), already undergone a further history, though this is something into which we shall enter only in a second section and from a different point of view. But before this there is yet another question to be raised.

Is it Possible to Have 'New' Dogmas in the Future?

Can an approaching section of this history of the declaration of infallibility (together with the reality to which it points) already be indicated or estimated here and now to some extent by 'futurological' methods? It may perhaps be possible to supply a small part of the answer to this question: In the foreseeable future there will be no further really new definitions.[2] [72]

[2] I am conscious of the fact that in drawing a distinction (applying to some extent to the content too) between 'new' dogmas and those which merely repeat a former dogma, a distinction, that is to say, which will be repeatedly used in what follows, we are properly speaking being too hasty in assuming that a solution to a fairly difficult problem has been found, and our arguments in support of this are too sketchy. This is not only because there cannot be any absolutely new dogmas, since even those which are 'new' must have been present from the outset in some sense in the background of faith which has existed all along from apostolic times. A further reason is that any precise classification of dogmas from this questionable point of view is a problem in itself, and one which cannot be solved here. But for all this the distinction we have in mind does have its validity. If the pope were to define that Mary is the 'Queen of the world' (or even merely 'the Mother of the Church') then such a dogma would certainly be 'more new' (even though pious people may already have entertained some such ideas) than if the pope were to define that the resurrection of Jesus is not only an event which takes place within the individual subjectivity of the believer. Here we shall not be prolonging the discussion of how this distinction might be defined in more precise terms at the speculative level. It is possible to say for our present purposes that when we speak of dogma as 'new' in this sense we mean one that will surprise even the Christian believer in its newness, though he has entertained a lively belief in the substance of the faith as hitherto believed in (it would surprise him at least as a dogma). But dogma of the other kind would not surprise him at all. We might also say that 'new' dogma will be felt as in some sense additional, whereas the other kind will be regarded merely as defensive in character and not as 'increasing' the former stock of faith.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The situation lying before us in the future makes it impossible for the Church's teaching authority to produce any further infallible definitions in the manner in which it was conceived to do so formerly. At the time of the First Vatican Council the anti-infallibilists waged an utterly distorted polemic, in which they supposed that a fresh papal definition would be recorded every day in the 'Times'. Not only these, however, but Catholic theologians too entertained the idea that the infallible teaching authority of the pope is (a) a kind of habitual power of such a kind that this power would be meaningless if it were not exercised from time to time and so actually gave demonstrations of its necessity, and (b) that this teaching authority, in the decisions it arrived at, led to a continual process of the formation of constant new individual propositions distinct from one another, so that the original revelation would be progressively unfolded and explicitated in these in a continuous 'process of development' resulting in a quantitative increase in the number of defined, and yet in some sense new, propositions.

Now the idea that the teaching authority will remain active in the (conceivable) future in producing definitions in this sense is one that we can hardly accept. For instance after the dogma of the assumption of Mary into heaven (1950) many theologians supposed that the exercise of the definitorial power of the Church's teaching authority would develop further in the same direction. They were already looking forward to new conceivable statements in Mariology which might be defined. Today no one any longer thinks of such a thing. Nothing was defined at the Second Vatican Council. Today a pluralism exists in regional cultures, philosophies, terminologies, outlooks, theologies, and so on which can no longer be fully reduced to any one synthesis, and so vividly has the Church become aware of this that I can no longer imagine that any specific, and [73] at the same time genuinely new proposition can so be expressed that it can be felt throughout to be an expression of the conscious faith of the whole Church, and so be capable of definition.[3]

To this a further point might be added. Every genuinely new definition, which does not merely repeat or defend an earlier one, requires for its formulation one and the same theology (with the stock of ideas, lines of reasoning etc., belonging to this), and moreover a theology accepted as that of the whole Church herself. This uniformity in theology, which was formerly to be found underlying all the differences between the schools, no longer exists today, and moreover can no longer fully be restored (at least in the foreseeable future). New

[3] When we say that despite the unity of the creed there is a pluralism of theologies in the Church which can no longer be eliminated in any adequate sense this statement is of course of fundamental importance in the present context, and should therefore be developed and justified in greater detail. This is not possible here. I may therefore refer to my article, 'Pluralism in Theology and the Unity of the Creed in the Church', Concilium 5 (1969). But in order to realise the consequences following from this pluralism for our present question we have only to consider that dogma too is always formulated by means of and in terms of a theology, yet that for this purpose it is impossible to choose one theology among many which are in principle equally justified, seeing that a pluralism in theology is now in force. It might be said that in a new definition all that we do is simply and precisely to achieve a fresh grasp of the common and universally acknowledged stock of ideas etc. present in the previous proclamation of faith and the previously formulated dogma, which must in fact be respected by all theologies. But in saying this we are merely expressing in somewhat more veiled form the fact that we do not formulate any 'new' dogmas, but simply repeat the old ones (chiefly to guard against distortions of them). These distinctions are of course fluid and tend to pass into one another, so that no detailed prophecies can be entered into with regard to the more precise boundaries between old and reiterated dogmas and 'new' dogmas. It is of course also conceivable that one particular major individual Church within the universal Church gains control over a general theology which is understood and used chiefly in the subordinate Church in such a way that this subordinate Church could express a point that was binding in faith in terms of this common theology. On this basis it would be conceivable to regard the teaching office of a 'bishops' conference' as of more 'value' than we have been accustomed to think in the last thousand years. On pluralism in theology cf. also K. Rahner, "Pluralism in Theology and the Unity of the Creed in the Church", Theological Investigations, XI, (London & New York 1974) pp. 3-23

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

definitions ('new' in the sense not only of a new approach but also of a new, i.e. expanded, meaning such as is conveyed by 'new' definitions) would have as their prior condition that lack of sophistication which fails to advert to the conditioning factors in history affecting any given language or standpoint, and the indeterminacy of the particular concepts employed etc., without actually denying that such factors are present. Properly speaking we should make use of concrete [74] examples such as can easily be found in contemporary theology in order to clarify our meaning. But unfortunately this is not possible here, although in the second section we shall be approaching the same material factors from the other side, and in somewhat more concrete terms.

We have arrived at a state, then, in which the possibility of any really new definitions being produced by the Church's teaching authority is at an 'end'. And it is now that the historicity of the dogma of infallibility is manifested at its most acute. But this means neither that from now on the dogma hitherto defined will retrospectively dissolve, nor that the infallible teaching office in the future will no longer have any function of its own.

The reason that past dogma does not retrospectively disappear is that it no longer has the same history in the future as it has had in the past, In order to understand this two points must be borne in mind:

(a) Man remains, even today, the historical being par excellence. In his faculty of memory, that is to say (regarding this as providing him with a critical standpoint[4] from which to judge his present in order to create his future) he emerges from his own past.

(b) This Christian memoria, which also embraces and expresses the totality of this past as pregnant of the future and as providing a critique of the future (although not as dominating the future) and of the content of it, is something very simple, which is prior to all future pluralism in conscious thought, namely this: that the ineffable mystery of our existence which we call God has victoriously addressed itself to us in Jesus, the dead and definitively delivered Lord, so as to communicate itself to us and to be our absolute future. Because all previous Christian dogma merely expresses this, it will be able to abide, and will abide, even though it no longer develops in its former manner in the 'development' of further distinctions within it.[5] This does not mean that it will become frozen or petrified, because the process of reducing the dogma handed down, and still abidingly valid, to this true and indissoluble reality of Jesus as the [75] historical and irrevocable self-utterance of God is something that has to be achieved ever anew, and it is this that renders this dogma living and implies an ever-fresh and unforeseeable history for it.

Furthermore the function of the infallible teaching office of the Church does not cease with the end of its history as understood in the sense of producing definitions which are in a true sense 'new'. The solemn delimitation of the ancient body of dogma to protect it against interpretations which would eliminate it is still even today an abiding task of the infallible teaching office of the Church. On the contrary in this connection it will still be able to appeal directly, and in a more enlightening way than in any possible 'new' definitions, to the conscious faith of the Church as a whole. Its function, certainly in itself distinct and autonomous, will thus in a certain sense become a more modest one than was envisaged in [4] On this cf. J. B. Metz,' "Politische Theologie" in der Diskussion', StdZ 184 (1969), pp. 289-308, and esp. 296ff.

[5] This is only to apply to the history of dogma the objections which J. B. Metz has formulated in more general terms against an 'evolutive' and ultimately speaking uncreative conceptual model for history (partly against Teilhard de Chardin). The difference between this and the more general objection against a false understanding of history consists in our case, however, in the fact that here we have to consider that in any eschatologically correct understanding of the 'once and for all-ness' of the event of Christ the rejection of a process of explicitation and evolution which continues endlessly into the future achieves concrete form in the manner which we have attempted to indicate. The fact that this does not mean that dogma is cut off from history as that which is dead or frozen has been (or will be), it is hoped, clear enough.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

earlier times, since it will be brought into alignment with the totality of the Church's conscious faith.

II. THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE DOGMA OF INFALLIBILITY SINCE 1870

We can view the historicity of the dogma of infallibility and the reality signified in it from yet another point of view. During the First Vatican Council the opponents of this dogma had the impression – as non-Catholic opponents still have to this day – that with this dogma the Church, and above all the pope, were being given a sort of blank cheque such as no critical conscience in relation to truth could ever give, seeing that it has a responsibility either to give or to withhold its assent in any given case according to the content of the particular proposition involved. Here we have no intention of repeating the reply which the traditional school theology is accustomed to give to this serious consideration: the reply, namely, that this infallibility constitutes merely the gnoseological aspect of the indestructibility of the believing Church, which itself in turn is the outcome of the unique and eschatologically victorious event of Christ; that in their decisions Church and pope are bound by scripture and tradition, and by the previous decisions of the Church; and that we must not overlook that factor which we call the assistance of the Spirit. Our intention, rather, is to draw attention to an historical process which has already had its effect upon this dogma of infallibility in the developing history of the concrete situation in which it stands, a historical process which also, in a very empirical way, rules out (or at least reduces to a notable extent) the danger of that 'blank cheque', so that it is possible to [76] say, to a certain extent that this dogma has, in the last hundred years, already passed through its danger zone, in which, according to human estimation, that danger signified by the term 'blank cheque' has been at its most acute. In order to understand what is meant several factors have to be weighed in the balance. We must probe somewhat deeper and also not shrink from developing further incipient points which have already been mentioned in the course of our arguments in Section I. For it is obvious that the history of the dogma of infallibility which we have to foresee for the future, and that history which has already run its course since 1870, are intrinsically connected with one another, and ultimately either have emerged or are emerging from the same basis.

The Dogma of Infallibility Within the Totality of the Truths of Faith

So far as logic is concerned as a factor in Catholic theology, the declaration of infallibility is a strange one. Abstracting from the fact that as a consciously explicated proposition it has not always been in existence, we can arrive at the following conclusion: it is a proposition which, if it is assumed to be and accepted as valid, renders the other dogmatic propositions infallibly sure. It itself, however, can in itself not be sure in that manner which applies to those propositions which are guaranteed by it to be infallibly true. We say that a decision taken by the teaching authority of the pope in defining a specific dogma is, under certain specific conditions, infallibly correct. And this is something which it can guarantee, given the necessary subjective and objective conditions, with regard to all other propositions. The only proposition to which this does not apply is that concerning the infallibility of this doctrinal authority itself. The dogma of the First Vatican Council is different from all other dogmatic propositions in that it cannot itself in turn be based upon the infallibility of the pope. And if we say that it invokes the infallibility of a council, or that of the Church, then we are merely shifting the problem a stage further back, for even this proposition can be arrived at only on the basis of other propositions which we already believe in. And our belief in these is not

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

itself in turn based on the validity of the proposition of infallibility. The dogma of infallibility is one individual proposition immanent within a system, and not the foundation of the system itself. The system of the Christian and Catholic truths of faith taken as a whole, and the subjective acceptance of this, are not based upon the statement of infallibility. On the contrary this is objectively and subjectively sustained by the system. From this basis its function is confined to that of a relatively secondary checking-point [77] within the system applicable to secondary cases of conflict, and in this it depends upon the system itself as its prior condition and does not itself call this in question in any direct sense. From this point of view it would be possible to say that this dogma is not itself infallible (i.e. not sustained by the infallible authority of the Church quoad nos), but merely renders other propositions infallible.

We shall not pursue the logical peculiarities of this state of affairs taken in itself any further at this point. But from what we have just said, namely that this proposition can render all other propositions infallible so far as we are concerned, itself only being excluded, we can conclude the following: this proposition is an application of the purely formal principle that that which provides a basis cannot be the basis of itself. Now taking this principle as correct, we must go on to give further precision and clearer lines of demarcation to the proposition as such. The declaration of infallibility can be accepted only if the 'system' (i.e. the real factors and the revealed truths which provide the basis of Christianity) is itself grasped and accepted without any logical appeal properly so called to the declaration of infallibility as such. (The question of whether, as a matter of concrete human psychology a certain mutually conditioning relationship can nevertheless prevail does not affect the point we are making here.) This means that logically speaking one has to be a believing Christian even before, and 'without' ipso facto having to believe in the infallibility of the pope (or the Church, or a council). It means further that the sureness entailed in the expectation that the pope or a council will not produce any false definitions cannot be greater, and subjectively speaking must not be greater, than the sureness with which the dogma of infallibility, without being based on itself, has come to be recognized. (Admittedly this is a statement about the sureness in terms of fundamental theology, and not about that of faith as such. But this latter sureness neither suppresses nor increases the former one.)

This secondary function of the dogma of infallibility, taken as a proposition which is rather sustained than sustaining itself, also makes it possible to ascribe a greater degree of historicity to it than applies to the basic dogmas of Christianity. This appears not merely from the circumstance already mentioned, that this dogma is far from having always been present in the explicit conscious faith of the Church, but chiefly from that history which it has already undergone since its initial proclamation, a historicity which we must gradually proceed to make still clearer. But even before this: if the dogma of infallibility is a proposition which is ultimately sustained by something outside itself rather than one which [78] sustains the system as a whole, then it immediately acquires another subjective 'value' in its significance for a specific subject in that this subject achieves a relationship to the 'system' as a whole which is in some respects different. Formerly the situation could be, and generally was, such (and this is something which is shown by the internal controversies between the Christian confessions) that the system itself, the (general) basic substance of Christianity, did not represent any special problem for human life in the concrete. Then, rather, the question was simply whether, for instance, a specific individual dogma such as that of infallibility did in fact belong to that system. Today the situation, differing in this from that of the First Vatican Council, is quite otherwise. Even for Catholics it is a question of the single whole directly and explicitly as such demanding the ultimate decision of the subject.

From this point of view alone the dogma of infallibility has a different value to the subject from that which it formerly had. It is by no means so 'vital' as in the times of a Pius IX

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

simply because the radical question of whether and how we can be Christians at all nowadays absorbs the (always finite) attention and concentration involved in a radical decision of conscience. Admittedly anyone who has been able positively to arrive at this decision, and at the same time in doing so understands it from the point of view of the modern mentality (as contrasted with an individualistic liberalism of an earlier stamp) will once more return to a position in which he finds it easier to accept the ecclesiastical factor in faith – and that too as applied to the concrete Church – than it might perhaps have appeared to an individual of the nineteenth century. Admittedly precisely an individual of this modern type has a right to achieve an understanding of why and how he must not betray the heritage bequeathed to him from the earlier liberalism, a freedom of faith and a spirit of critical enquiry, a heritage which he too will defend in a 'socialistic' society, and which also raises a question for the Church with regard to the dogma of infallibility.

Teaching Authority as Having an Authorized Language

Every exercise of an infallible teaching authority involves, whether consciously or unconsciously, the use of an authorized language as one of its intrinsic elements. One reason for this is that this authority is addressed to a believing community and is intended to formulate the common creed of that community, indeed derives from and is upheld by the common faith of the Church as a whole. In other words it has, right from the outset and of its very nature, a sociological side; here at any rate truth and [79] society are involved with one another. But there is a further reason apart from this. An element of authorized terminology is involved in the exercise of teaching authority, because the very nature of the reality being taught is such that it is incapable of being expressed otherwise than in inadequate and analogous concepts. Now in relation to the truth being expressed in a proposition analogous concepts differ from univocal ones, which can be strictly defined and verified by directly empirical methods, in that substitute concepts are available which do not necessarily do violence to the truth of propositions capable of being expressed in several different ways, but remain unexpressed, or at any rate are not expressed in that particular way in which the defined proposition is – indeed perhaps even should not be expressed precisely in that way. Concepts such as person, nature, sin, and original sin, transubstantiation, eternity, glorification of the body, infallibility itself and so on are, as analogous, themselves necessarily not fully determined as concepts, so that a proposition in the opposite sense is not necessarily false provided that it is not intended merely as a formal contradiction or negation of the alternative proposition, but rather is taken as a proposition which itself is intended to make a positive statement.

The proposition, for instance, that there is such a thing as original sin, and the proposition that there is not any such thing as original sin can of course not both be true at the same time so long as the one is taken merely as a denial of the other. But it can be the case that each is understood as having a positive content of its own through which one expresses that which the other leaves open, must leave open, yet itself fails to express because of the analogous nature of the concepts used in it. And if this is the situation, then both propositions can be correct. The meaning of the statement 'There is no such thing as original sin' would then be: 'There is no state of guilt in God's sight of that kind which is incurred solely through man's inalienable personal decision taken in freedom.' From the point of view of dogmatics this statement is perfectly correct. It could just as well be the subject of a definition as the statement: 'There is such a thing as original sin.' In this latter case it would still remain a constant task and duty for theology to explain the fact that despite the non-existence of an 'original sin' (in the sense just mentioned) there is nevertheless an 'inherited guilt' (inherited deficiency, a collective situation conditioned by guilt). But this theological explanation would not be expressed in the form of a definition.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In this case, as properly speaking in all others in which concepts are used analogously, the reality signified is expressed in such a way that one [80] aspect is brought into the forefront as a. matter of conscious faith and doctrine, while the other, which would have explicated the merely 'analogous' aspects of the concept, remains in the background. And the fact that the reality is expressed in this way, and that there is a positive directive that it should be so expressed, brings out one factor which is purely the outcome of historical conditions: a particular authorized language or mode of parlance. On a precise view it must be recognized that one inevitable and essential element in the infallible teaching authority of the Church is the right to prefer one mode of parlance, which in itself might have taken a different form, to others in a believing community and a community bound together by a common doctrine. But this does not mean that the question of truth is ipso facto being unequivocally affected.[6] In the last few decades a clearer awareness of this fact has been achieved (as a result of a more explicit recognition of the analogous nature of dogmatic concepts, this in turn being due to the work of historians of dogma on the history of such concepts and the recognition of the inevitable pluralism in theology which prevails today etc.). And this in itself has the force of ushering in a new epoch in the history of the dogma of infallibility since the First Vatican Council.

On the Character of New Dogmatic Formulae

But this is not all. Within the last hundred years we have arrived at a situation in which a new definition can no longer be false because in any such new definition the legitimate range of interpretation is so wide that it no longer leaves any room for error outside it. A question which we may leave open at this point is whether the impossibility we have declared to exist is capable of absolute proof at the theoretical level, or merely a [81] practical one. But in order not to misunderstand from the outset the possibility of holding the thesis we have set forth two points have to be noticed:

(1) Any fresh dogmas which might possibly be conceived of would still in any case continue to relate to the former ones as remaining in force. A pope who altogether failed to recognize this fact in his new definition, and ran counter in it to earlier definitions, would show himself to be a heretic who had lost his doctrinal authority. This in itself is enough to show that the range of any possible dogmas has become very restricted in certain essential respects precisely because hitherto we have had a relatively great 'development of dogma'. This factor, therefore, so far from being an argument in favour of a further prolongation of the same kind of development actually points to the contrary. Any new definitions that are put forward (whether at the practical or the theoretical level) can only be put forward as interpretations and as upholding 'earlier' dogmas in which we already believe, which

[6] An authorized mode of parlance of this kind does not of course imply that theology should merely repeat propositions as thus regulated (in the style of leading arguments in the journals of totalitarian systems). Theology must in fact explain such propositions, enquire critically into their meaning, and make men explicitly aware of the merely analogous and historically conditioned elements in these propositions. Theology must even, under certain circumstances, offer formulations to the Church's conscious faith which are designed to replace the former authorized modes of parlance and gradually eliminate them from the linguistic usage of the Church (whether tacitly or as a matter of official declaration). (We may think of the way which leads from the Council of Ephesus to that of Chalcedon or of that leading from Augustine to the condemnation of Baianism and Jansenism). But on this account such authorized modes of parlance do nevertheless remain officially in force and run counter to such fresh formulations, amounting at least to a theoretical schism (which is then sometimes too hastily regarded as 'heresy'.)

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

themselves in turn are and remain the norm of interpretation. If it is maintained that any conceivable 'new' dogma nowadays inevitably entails so wide a range of possible interpretations that it is no longer in any sense possible for it to be false, this still does not mean that on this showing it will necessarily be devoid of content or tautological, or that it must be in every respect and manner no longer capable of verification. For it remains, or would remain, related to those basic facts of the Christian faith which constitute the content and (on a right understanding) the verifiability of such theologically formulated propositions of faith. But must they then seek to say more than these basic facts? Can they draw upon the basic understanding of the teaching authority of the Church to say anything more at all, seeing that all that this contains is the revelation that has been 'closed'? In this abiding reference to the basic facts of the faith they have a content which is capable of being clarified by a 'fresh' dogma of this kind, and which perhaps needs to be expressed more clearly in the specific situation, even though the new dogmatic formula in itself cannot be counterbalanced by any compelling alternative to the contrary (unless one that amounts to a sheer denial of the basic facts of the faith) in comparison with which it must necessarily be either false or true, even though, in other words, the range of possible interpretations to be placed upon it is in itself so great that it is no longer possible for any proposition to be formulated which can be put forward with the claim of being correct, and at the same time such that it necessarily eliminates the 'new' dogmatic formulae absolutely (abstracting from the question of an authorized mode of parlance).

(2) This situation, in which a 'new' dogmatic formula is no longer [82] capable of being false, is not simply a mere abiding quality present all along in any declaration on the part of the teaching authority of the Church, but is rather a circumstance which has come to prevail in history. Let us take one example. It concerns the relationship between God and the world and the concrete possibilities of understanding this and interpreting it in the Church's conscious awareness of her faith in the concrete. Formerly the only way in which it was possible to define this basic relationship was in terms of 'difference'. It was necessary to entertain the conviction that in this the decisive point, and in fact one which was straightway comprehensible, had been stated (as in a definition, for instance, such as that found in DS 3023). This statement remains true, but nowadays it is inevitably made in the awareness that a process of interpretation is needed which can never be brought to an end. And if today it were to be defined (as a statement with a positive content of its own, and not as the mere empty negation of the definition given above) that God had taken to himself an identity with the world, then this would not necessarily imply (over and above the introduction of a new authorized mode of parlance) any elimination of that other definition, because this too would be arrived at in the awareness that in this case 'identity' is an analogous concept which is subject to the same process of interpretation which is never concluded as the concept of 'difference'. And it is precisely this that would apply if a definition such as that in DS 3023 were arrived at today in its turn as 'new'. The awareness that a process of interpretation is in principle incapable of conclusion, the awareness that all metaphysical and theological statements are limited, is, at least so far as a sociologically effective awareness of faith in the Church is concerned, an event which has only manifested itself, or even is only gradually doing so, within the last hundred years. This awareness makes any 'new' ecclesiastical definition, if it were to be arrived at, ipso facto 'old' from the outset. In other words even as it is formulated it is confronted with such a number of possible or conceivable interpretations that it does not signify any real 'advance' in clarification as compared with former statements of faith (except for introducing a certain perfectly reasonable and respectable authorized parlance and a new reference to the basic historical experiences and basic historical realities of Christianity). And, as we have already pointed out, this does not mean that the function of the teaching office of the Church or the meaning of the earlier dogmas are eliminated or

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

destroyed.

(3) Now it might be objected that what we have said does indeed apply to that particular 'category' of dogmas in which it is sought to express a 'transcendent' (in the popular sense) or 'metaphysical' reality (e.g. the [83] Trinity, the hypostatic union etc.), in which the analogous character of the concepts employed is particularly clear. But there is a quite different 'category' of propositions of faith, to which all that we have said does not apply. And here we may refer above all to propositions of moral theology. Why, for instance, could the pope not define his moral theological teaching, such as that contained in 'Humanae Vitae', without thereby so broadening the range of possible variations and interpretations open to us that it would no longer be possible to find any contrary proposition to it which could be regarded as an error? For our present purposes we must set aside the question of the (logical) 'categories' of propositions of faith even though it is in itself important and has nowhere been radically thought out. But in any such investigation it would emerge that the difference between propositions in moral theology which were apparently signed and sealed and concretely verifiable in their meaning on the one hand, and other 'metaphysical' propositions of faith on the other, is not so great or so clear as we might at first be inclined to suppose. For even propositions in moral theology of the kind we are thinking of must be, and are intended to be, propositions of faith. They imply a relation to God, and only achieve their true nature when our acceptance of them is accompanied by a realization of the relationship they bear to the absolute mystery. They are never merely norms of the natural law. Even as such they themselves in turn have their place in the unfolding history of truth. The concrete reality which they are designed to embody in the form of concrete imperatives is a dynamic one. It is in process of change, and leaves the question open of whether these propositions in their concrete formulation do not themselves presuppose a concrete dimension of reality which is no longer present, or is in process of disappearing, or the further question of whether as norms defining the goal to be aimed at they do not presuppose a reality which has still to emerge in the future. For these and many other reasons they are, at least today, never of such a nature that they cannot be interpreted in many different ways. And since in the case of many of the reasons for such a pluralism of interpretations (above all those belonging to the spheres of sociology, psychology etc.) it is impossible to achieve any full or adequate awareness of them, such a pluralism is not altogether to be excluded even in the case of formulations belonging to moral theology.

Furthermore the following three points about the teaching office of the church cannot be merely accidental:

(a) There are many questions of moral theology which are important for human living in the concrete, yet on which the Church has never [84] taken up any firm position, and so one which would materially speaking be of the highest importance and would serve to clear away controversies.

(b) In cases in which it has taught (though not defined) doctrine, it has often used concepts which, without the fact being noticed by it itself, never signified any unambiguously concrete reality at all (e.g. civic freedom, private property, revolution etc.), though as a matter of moral practice it has absolutely arrived at these realities.

(c) That the teaching office of the Church has hardly ever produced definitions on such questions (not even at the Second Vatican Council or in 'Humanae Vitae').

With regard to the objection with which we are here concerned, therefore, we can confidently reply with the counter-question of where concrete examples are to be found for propositions belonging to the sphere of moral theology in which a definition is conceivable precisely as new which creates a lack of ambiguity such as had not been present formerly.

At the conclusion of these few remarks one anecdote may be added. About eighteen months ago I met a young Catholic priest in Scandinavia, and together with other Christians

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

(the rest being Protestants) I fell into a theological discussion with him. My impression was that the priest had a fairly broad theological conscience. When I put the question to him in a certain context of how this fitted in with the dogma of the First Vatican Council he replied: 'Oh, that is something which we in the Catholic Church must gradually forget.' We neither will nor should forget it! But it has a history of its own. It has already been having it throughout the last hundred years, and will continue to have it in the future. And why not? Identity survives through change. The reality that exists in personal life and in the Church is as mysterious as this. We can in fact not even express the dogma of the Incarnation of the eternal Logos without doing justice to this paradox if we want to avoid distorting one or another aspect of this christological dogma.[7]

[7] cf. K. Rahner, 'On the Theology of the Incarnation', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 105-120.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[85]

5

THE DISPUTE CONCERNING THE CHURCH'S TEACHING OFFICE

On the Problem of Non-Infallible Doctrinal Decisions on the Part of the Church

In 1967, in the course of what may be accounted an initial period following upon the Second Vatican Council, the German bishops undertook to produce a document in which they attempted to apply the claims of the Council to the special circumstances of the German Church. It is not our intention here to examine this document in its entirety. We shall confine ourselves rather to a few observations on a single brief passage in the document, and, moreover, from the standpoint of a particular episode of which we shall shortly have to speak in more detail.

The Document of the German Bishops

In order to avoid imposing upon the reader the wearisome task of having to search out the text referred to for himself,[1] let us repeat the relevant section of the document here:

'17. At this point a difficult problem arises, calling for realistic discussion. It is one which today more than formerly threatens either the faith of many Catholics or their attitude of free and unreserved trust towards the teaching authorities of the Church. We refer to the fact that in the exercise of its official function this teaching authority of the Church can, and on occasion actually does, fall into errors. The fact that such a thing is possible is something of which the Church has always been aware and which she has actually expressed in her theology. Moreover she has [86] evolved rules of conduct to cater for the kind of situations which arise from this. This possibility of error refers not to those statements of doctrine which are proclaimed as propositions to be embraced with the absolute assent of faith, whether by a solemn definition on the part of the Pope, a general council, or by the exercise of the ordinary magisterium. Historically speaking it is also incorrect to maintain that any error has subsequently arisen in such dogmas as proclaimed by the Church. This is of course not to dispute the fact that even in the case of such a dogma, while we must uphold its original meaning, it is always possible and always necessary for a development in our understanding of it to take place, involving a progressive elimination of any misinterpretations which may perhaps have been attached to it hitherto. Nor should we confuse the question which we have raised here with the manifest fact that side by side with the immutable divine law there is also a human law in the Church which is subject to change. Changes in this latter have from the outset nothing to do with error. At most they raise the question of how far some juridical decision in the remote or recent past was opportune.

'18. Now let us consider the possibility or the fact of error in non-defined statements of doctrine on the part of the Church, recognizing that these themselves in turn may differ very widely among themselves in their degree of binding force. The first point to be recognized resolutely and realistically is that human life, even at a wholly general level, must always be lived "by doing one's best according to one's lights" and by recognized principles which,

[1] The text was published by the Secretariat of the Conference of German Bishops in the autumn of 1967 as a semi-private document and disseminated at diocesan level. Hence it is relatively difficult to achieve access to it. cf. Herder-Korrespondenz 21 (1967), col. 549.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

while at the theoretical level they cannot be recognized as absolutely certain, nevertheless command our respect in the "here and now" as valid norms of thinking and acting because in the existing circumstances they are the best that can be found. This is something that everyone recognizes from the concrete experience of his own life. Every doctor in his diagnoses, every statesman in the political judgements he arrives at on particular situations and the decisions he bases on these, is aware of this fact. The Church too in her doctrine and practice cannot always and in every case allow herself to be caught in the dilemma of either arriving at a doctrinal decision which is ultimately binding or simply being silent and leaving everything to the free opinion of the individual. In order to maintain the true and ultimate substance of faith she must, even at the risk of error in points of detail, give expression to doctrinal directives which have a certain degree of binding force and yet, since they are not de fide definitions, involve a certain element of the provisional even to the point of being capable of including error. Otherwise it would be quite impossible for her to preach or interpret her faith as a [87] decisive force in real life or to apply it to each new situation in human life as it arises. In such a case the position of the individual Christian in regard to the Church is analogous to that of a man who knows that he is bound to accept the decision of a specialist even while recognizing that it is not infallible.

'19. At any rate any opinion which runs contrary to a current statement of doctrine on the part of the Church has no place in preaching or catechesis, even though the faithful may, under certain circumstances, have to be instructed as to the nature of, and the limited weight to be attached to, a current doctrinal decision of this kind. This is a point which has already been discussed. Anyone who believes that he is justified in holding, as a matter of his own private opinion, that he has already even now arrived at some better insight which the Church will come to in the future must ask himself in all sober self-criticism before God and his conscience whether he has the necessary breadth and depth of specialized theological knowledge to permit himself in his private theory and practice to depart from the current teaching of the official Church. Such a case is conceivable in principle, but subjective presumptuousness and an unwarranted attitude of knowing better will be called to account before the judgement-seat of God.

'20. It belongs intrinsically to the right attitude of faith of any Catholic seriously to strive to attach a positive value to even a provisional statement of doctrine on the part of the Church, and to make it his own. In secular life too far-reaching decisions have to be taken on the basis of fallible findings on the part of others, which have been arrived at according to their best lights. And it is no less true in Church matters that the individual need not feel any shame or diminishment of his own personality if in his findings he relies upon the Church's teaching even in cases in which it cannot be accounted as definitive from the outset. It is possible that in specific cases the development of the Church's doctrine proceeds too slowly. But even in arriving at a judgement of this kind we must be prudent and humble. For in any such development of doctrine within a Church made up of men subject to historical conditions time is needed. For it cannot proceed any faster than the task permits of preserving the substance of the faith without loss.

'21. We do not need to fear that in adopting the positions of the Church in the manner described we are failing to respond to the claims of our own age. Often enough the serious questions raised for us by our own age, and which we are called upon to answer on the basis of our faith, make it necessary for us to think out the truths of our faith afresh. It is perfectly [88] possible that in this process fresh points will come to be emphasized. But this is not to call the faith itself in question. Rather it contributes to a deeper grasp of the truths of divine revelation and of the Church's teaching. For we are firmly convinced, and we see that experience confirms us in this, that we need neither deny any truth for the Catholic faith, nor deny the Catholic faith for the sake of any truth, provided only that we understand this faith

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in the spirit of the Church and seek always to achieve a deeper grasp of it.'[2]

At a later stage we shall have a few brief remarks to make on the theological importance of this document in general and of the passage quoted in particular. The only observation to be made at this point is that an Italian version of the document appeared in the Osservatore Romano of the 15 December 1967 (in a translation commissioned, so it is reported, by the Secretariat of State). Incidentally I know that the document was read in the refectory in the presence of the learned professors of the Gregorianum and was received most favourably there. (It can hardly be as bad, therefore, as it is judged to be in the text which we are about to quote.) This text is particularly remarkable to the extent that so far as I know this is the first occasion on which this problem has been explicitly tackled at all in a (relatively) official document. Previously it had been left solely to the theologians to discuss.

Critique of the Document

At the current time (and probably for some time previously) a mimeographed paper has been circulating among higher ecclesiastical circles which amounts to a critique of this document. The passage in this text which is of special interest to us here is that which is concerned with the passage in the document of the German bishops cited above. On this it has the following to say:

'The "Document of the German Bishops Addressed to All Members of the Church who are Commissioned to Preach the Faith" of the 22nd September 1967 has made a very favourable impression here. Nevertheless the document is in error in the distinction it draws between the concept of a "provisional" statement of doctrine and an infallible doctrinal decision and when it says on this: "In such a case the position of the individual Christian in regard to the Church is first and foremost analogous to that of a man who knows that he is bound to accept the decision of a specialist [89] even while recognizing that it is not infallible" (p. 13).[3] A statement of doctrine on the part of the Church which does not claim to be infallible can per accidens prove erroneous, but this does not mean that it can be characterized as provisional. Whoever speaks in the name of the Church's teaching authority can speak and should speak only if he is convinced of the fact that the doctrine to be put forward is true. This means that he never meets the individual Christian in the role of a specialist, either "first and foremost" or at all. A specialist is subject to the basic principle: "Tantum valet quantum probat". In any statement of doctrine on the part of the Church the arguments adduced in support of it have in all cases merely the character of aids to the free and voluntary acceptance of the decision concerned, and it is in this again that the radical difference is to be found between the Church's teaching authority and theological science. The wrong estimation of the force of a non-infallible decision of doctrine has led, not least in the question of the acceptance of "Humanae Vitae", to the following journalistic formula appearing even in the Church's own press: "No infallible decision – conscience decides". This represents a complete distortion of the real function of conscience. A point that is overlooked is that in any and every human act the conscience is called upon to play its part, even in the case of accepting an infallible decision of doctrine. And a further point no longer recognized here is that the conscience of the Christian needs to be guided and directed by Christ, and so by her whom the Lord has entrusted with his mission.'

What is to be said of this paper? In a single word I maintain that this critique of the [2] cf. pp. 12-14 of the official text.

[3] We should notice the word 'analogous', which the critic reads as though it were equivalent to 'absolutely the same'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

bishop's document is theologically and practically speaking radically mistaken.

Interior Contradictions Within the Critique

First and primarily: the reader of this critique may ask himself with some amazement how in all logic the writer manages to make the accusation that the document concerned undervalues that very teaching office of the Church which derives exactly and precisely from the bishops and their teaching. After all we cannot, as a matter of sound logic, uphold an authority for the bishops which they themselves authoritatively reject. Of course it is possible to say that an episcopal document is not necessarily either infallible or correct in all its points, and so that one is justified in disagreeing with a document of this kind or with individual points in [90] it provided one has good reasons for doing so and has given full and mature consideration to it. That is perfectly correct. But the critic quoted above is in fact disputing the very conditions which make it possible for a critique to exist, and prescribes a more or less unconditional obedience to such doctrinal declarations even though they themselves make no explicit claim to be infallible, and even though in this particular case the author of the critique we have quoted is in fact contradicting his own general principle in regarding doctrinal pronouncements of this kind as not being beyond dispute. The real situation, however, is in fact this: our present-day Catholic authoritarians are only too ready to uphold pope and bishop so long as they teach what they themselves regard as right. Otherwise they dispense themselves from that very attitude of unconditional obedience to doctrine which they defend indiscriminately against the 'modernists' of today as a sacred principle. One of the points which, so the critique asserts, has been overlooked in the bishops' document is that the doctrinal authority of the bishops and the pope (even in cases in which no definitions are arrived at) is a distinct entity in its own right such that on the one hand we are obliged to assent to it and on the other it has to be distinguished from the material arguments adduced in support of the official doctrinal declaration and has a value of its own independent of these. Now in the authoritative doctrinal statement of the bishops there is no attempt whatever to identify in any sense these two factors: the material theological arguments and the teaching authority of the Church. The comparison which has led the critic to this totally false imputation is precisely one which, in common with all comparisons, has to be taken with a grain of salt. It is actually a sound and intelligible comparison. For when someone finds himself in certain circumstances obliged to submit himself to the (non-infallible) diagnosis of a doctor, then in this situation too he is acting not on the basis of the arguments put to him by the doctor, and which he is quite incapable of understanding, but on the basis of the doctor's authority, albeit this is ultimately speaking different in kind from the teaching authority of the Church. Are we unable to understand a comparison of this kind? After all the true tertium comparationis consists simply in the fact that one individual is presenting another with a decision which is clearly recognized by both parties to be non-infallible and capable of error. Hence while there are indeed solid grounds to support the decision (including, amongst other factors, that of 'authority' of the most varied kinds), still, since it is not infallible, the party addressed retains the right, under certain circumstances (notice we say 'circumstances', not mere capriciousness), to reject the proposal that [91] he shall come to this decision (in doctrinal matters etc.) so long as he believes that his reasons for doing so are good or better than those of the person proposing the decision to him.

Now it might be said that while it is true that formally speaking all this is quite correct it is not applicable to our present case because an individual Catholic theologian, or even a layman, is never in a position here and now (unless the decision concerned is revised by the teaching authorities themselves) to be capable of having good or better reasons to depart

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

from the decision of the teaching authorities even though in principle it is conceded by both sides that this official doctrinal decision on the part of the Church is in itself and at basis capable of being revised. In such cases the position may be compared to that of a stone-breaker who declares that he regards the most recent theory of Professor XY on plasma physics as erroneous, for this professor does in fact admit that his theory is not absolutely certain. It is not for one moment to be denied that there can be, and often are, cases of this kind of dissent from the non-infallible doctrinal decisions of the Church, a dissent which is theoretically false and morally unjustified. Those who wish can confidently and reasonably go beyond this in maintaining that in cases of such dissent it is to be presumed that they are of this kind (whereas the opposite presumption is invalid). The bishops' doctrinal document too leaves no room for doubt that there are such cases and that any Christian who presumptuously or without grave reasons departs from the Church's teaching even when it does not contain any definition will have to answer for it before God.

But the alternative case is precisely possible too, and this is a point which is boldly and honestly expressed in the bishops' document. Cases may perfectly well arise in which a Catholic Christian has a right and, under certain circumstances, a moral duty, to depart from some official doctrine of the Church of this kind. This is something which the critic refuses to recognize yet which is true. This is not the place to give a more detailed exposition of the question of whether a distinction is to be drawn in this principle between the rights and duties of specialist theologians on the one hand and laymen on the other (any such distinction would be strongly dependent upon the nature of the individual case). Nor do we intend here to adopt a casuistic approach in enlarging upon the question of what precise form the attitude of the dissenter should take in such cases according to the traditional principles of fundamental theology and morals. Nor shall we attempt to establish, on the grounds of wholly traditional theology, the point that the principle expressed in the bishops' document is itself traditional. All this would take us too far afield.

[92]

Examples of Erroneous Decisions

I will adopt another approach by putting a simple question, arising from the practice of theologians, to the critic and giving some explanation of this. A brief but true anecdote may serve by way of introduction. During the modernist period the great Dominican exegete Lagrange had to listen to the following reproach from a friend in the course of a private conversation: 'In fact on this point (an anti-modernist declaration on the part of the doctrinal authorities of the Church of that time on a question of exegesis) the only response you can manage is a "silentium obsequiosum" (meaning that while you do indeed hold your tongue, you in fact interiorly reject this declaration).' To this Lagrange replied: 'That is true. But I would actually be committing a mortal sin (against my own conscience with regard to truth) if I were to act in any other way.'

Now let us consider the question itself in fuller detail. I have no time to search through Denzinger for official doctrinal decisions belonging to the last few decades which have proved false, and which virtually no Catholic theologian any longer accepts nowadays. Accordingly I will merely rummage a little through my own memory. For my purpose the fact that my examples are primarily of an exegetical kind makes no very great difference. Not all of them are of this kind however. For it has been explicitly stated at an earlier stage that the same weight is to be attached to such exegetical decisions as to the doctrinal decisions of other Roman authorities. Again we must ask to be excused if our approach is very unsystematic, and I shall not extend my researches further back than our own century. If these doctrinal decisions were all true or still valid for me today (they are never officially taken back with the same degree of explicitness and weight with which they were promulgated) then I would still today have to give my assent to propositions such as the following: Most of the psalms are by David himself; there are no post-exilic psalms; there are no Deutero-Pauline epistles; the discourses of Jesus in John are not theological compositions; the gospels were written in the same sequence in which we enumerate them today; there is no 'Q' Source; there is no Deutero-Isaiah; the Epistle to the Hebrews was written by Paul; the Pentateuch is 'a Mosaic text' (written virtually in its entirety by Moses himself), and not (as a French exegete once maliciously put it) 'une mosaïque de textes'. I must maintain it as certain that the baptismal formula in Mt. 28 was laid down by Jesus himself. I must be convinced that the Lucan gospel was written prior to the destruction of Jerusalem; I should be convinced that it is ipso facto modernism for me to call for any [93] alteration to the Holy Office or to support the abolition of the Index; I would not be allowed to give even a modest support to the idea that so-called polygenism is reconcilable with a right interpretation of the doctrine of original sin; I should regard any participation of clergy and laity in the government of the Church, whatever form it took, as ipso facto modernist. As I have said, I am quoting from memory. But the reader too, even without having to look up any of the numbers in Denzinger, can rely on the fact that these points are valid. Every specialist theologian is aware of them. And over and above these and similar examples we might quote many other propositions in which the condemnation of one implies, in practice, the acceptance of its alternative even though this is far from being much of an improvement upon the condemned proposition, and even though under certain circumstances condemnation may have been just.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In referring to these propositions I have no intention of writing a chronique scandaleuse of the life of the Church during the first half of the twentieth century. Anyone who takes the references I have given in this sense is being foolish, knows nothing of the burden of history upon the Church, is failing to take due cognizance of the context in which such erroneous decisions were taken, a context which also exists even though it cannot be included in our presentation here, is failing to understand how inevitable it is that even in the Church the developing awareness of faith and doctrine must proceed slowly (even though I hold the opinion that sometimes it has proceeded more slowly than was necessary).

Provisional Decisions and the Advance of Doctrine

My intention in this section is to put the following question to the critic of the bishops' document: What is my lord the critic's view, working from his own principles, of the advance which the Church has made in overcoming these erroneous decisions, the advance which has been achieved, at least tacitly on many points, since the decisions were initially promulgated? In terms of his principles I cannot find any place for it at all within my purview. But I certainly can find one according to the principles underlying the bishops' document. For whence can we achieve the insight we need into the erroneousness of such wrong decisions if, at least in practice (if not in theory as well), theologians and layfolk have nothing else to do than to regard these wrong official decisions in matters of doctrine as absolutely binding norms in virtue of the authority of the Church's official teachers as the critic recommends. Anyone at all – and [94] this includes any member of the Catholic Church itself – must, after all, take the initiative in saying that this or that point is simply not true and showing the reasons why. He must take this initiative even though according to Denzinger 2007 an 'interior assent' ('assensus internus') is required of him, and Denzinger 2113 threatens that the exegete incurs 'grave guilt' ('culpa gravis') if he does not submit to the decisions of the Biblical Commission. And all this even though no trouble is taken to draw even a few of the necessary distinctions, and even though it would have been possible even at that time to find from 'approved authors' that on this point those very distinctions have to be drawn which the German bishops have drawn in our own times.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Formerly anyone entertaining such doubts on a doctrinal decision of this kind was advised to keep silent about them even though they were, in the nature of the case, authorized. He was advised simply to be patient, and in the meantime to observe a silentium obsequiosum. One point to be made about this is that in contemporary society the constantly increasing communication of everyone with everyone else, reaching down into the most private spheres of human life, makes any such silentium obsequiosum quite impossible to maintain any longer. But quite apart from this the situation today is such that time is running out too quickly for us to be able to wait patiently in every case until the mental attitudes of the official teachers who set the standards has changed spontaneously and without conscious thought in such a way that they themselves, without noticing it, have, of their own volition, undertaken to bring about this change of views or feel that such a change as put forward by others no longer in any sense constitutes a deviation from earlier doctrines. (I recall an episode from the period of the Council in which a Roman cardinal assured me in all seriousness that in Rome there had never been any objection to the theory that on his physical side man is descended from animals.) Such cases of a gradual and unconscious change in theological views within the Church may still be going on even today. (One such instance can be found in the attitude of optimism of the Second Vatican Council with regard to the possibility of salvation for all men.)

But in general it is no longer possible to proceed by these methods alone. We have become too consciously aware of the factors involved and time is running out too quickly for this. Hence the question to the critic: How in your view is such a change to take place in the Church's awareness (not in the true and ultimate substance of its faith but in opinions which are put forward as matters of official doctrine yet are nevertheless erroneous) if there is never any case in which a Christian [95] has the right to disagree with a doctrine of the Church on well-considered grounds and, moreover, not merely some decades after this doctrine has been promulgated? The fact that the principle relevant to this question and expressed in the bishops' document can be misused does not make any difference to its correctness. Any example of such misuse in relation to such a principle has just as little to do with the question of its truth as if I (with perfect justice and adducing historical proofs which are ready to hand) were to say that the principle of the critic leads to heresy hunting, stagnation in Catholic theology, and the falling away of many from the faith.

Nor is it any argument against this to say that the principle expressed in the bishops' document is not in fact the sole principle, so that the application of it to a particular concrete case leads to delicate situations of conscience for the individual in which each one remains fairly isolated in his relationship with God and with his own conscience. The same might also be said of innumerable other cases in Christian life. For instance my eternal salvation may perhaps to a large extent depend on my choosing the right vocation. Here tool find myself thrown on my own resources by the official Church (apart from very general principles in matters the details of which involve life-and-death decisions) and rightly so. For this is how God has willed it to be. Now according to Catholic doctrine there is in fact no authority in this world constituting an absolute norm for the individual without the personal decision of his own conscience. The existence and justification of the Church's teaching office is something which each individual must in fact recognize and accept as such without being able to base himself on the authority of this teaching office. In other words he must act solely 'at his own risk'. And if this is the case, then why should it be so particularly surprising to concede that even after acknowledging the validity of this teaching office in principle, situations of personal risk of this kind still continue constantly to be present, analogous to those which existed and still exist prior to the individual accepting the validity of the teaching office (for this acceptance in fact constitutes a decision requiring constantly to be renewed)?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Obviously we should not overlook the point that 'the conscience of the Christian needs to be guided by Christ and so by that which the Lord has entrusted with his mission'. But is not this point constantly being reiterated throughout the whole of the bishops' document itself? And is this statement of the necessity of this guidance gainsaid when the document draws the distinction it does, and points out that in particular cases this guidance is, after all, precisely a provisional one and therefore gives [96] the one so guided, under certain circumstances a right and a duty, as a matter of concrete practice and not merely of abstract theory, to take such guidance for what it is and for what it is intended to be and nothing more, namely as provisional? And if the critic maintains that we should not describe a declaration of this kind of the teaching office as provisional on the grounds that in such a doctrine those entrusted with the teaching office are convinced that this doctrine is true, then his position becomes totally incomprehensible to me. Obviously the only doctrines they can teach are those which they are convinced are correct. But can they not be convinced in this way and yet, even in being so, be aware that they are capable of error? Or are they in that case no longer to teach at all? Yet even this course would in fact in its turn fail to measure up to the critic's statement that such a doctrine can be erroneous per accidens. After all a doctor may be convinced that his diagnosis is correct yet at the same time be aware that in this he can be mistaken. And he then has the right to express this diagnosis of his as correct and as something to be followed.

When, therefore, the critic quite explicitly condemns the term 'provisional' as used in the document and as applied to non-infallible doctrines of the Church's teaching office of this kind, then I must once more raise the question: How then are we ever to be in a position to reject doctrines of this kind seeing that they are never at any stage claimed to be irreformable, and have often in the past been shown to be erroneous? Supposing I had been alive when Leo X declared, against Luther, that the practice of burning heretics is fully in accordance with the will of the Holy Spirit, could I not even then have been in a position to think to myself: 'Thank God, this is only a provisional doctrine!'?

By way of conclusion I may be permitted one more earnest observation, even though to many it may sound somewhat pathetic. A few days ago I received the copy of a letter (I accept its genuineness because I myself have often heard similar things from behind the 'iron curtain'). The writer declares that he has spent twelve years in prison and suffered terrible things for his Catholic faith and his loyalty to the pope. He then came to the West only to receive the impression that in the Church here everything which he had suffered for was being squandered in unbelief. He would rather return once more to live in such a prison, for he was happier in it. I can understand this, for I myself have friends of the same kind in the East. It may be that many of the factors included in this condemnation of the West are to be explained on historical and sociological grounds, and that his condemnation of them does not merely reflect the mentality of the saint. It may be true that a Christian of the West views [97] this martyr for Christianity with a holy envy. But if anyone supposes that the problems of the Church of the West are to be solved by an attitude of stubborn conservatism and that the Church is thereby to be confirmed in her faith and unity he is deceiving himself.

Under God's disposing power history has presented us with these present-day problems, and only courage, truthfulness, resolution in the faith and at the same time in positive thinking, can solve them by God's grace. Remembering the theology of the Cross, our attitude to martyrs can be very favourable, whereas our attitude to mere reactionaries who are just as well off as the rest of us prosperous citizens is less so. But if we intend to fulfil the tasks of the future for the Church of the West, then there are elements from the Church's past which must be overcome, and among the methods for overcoming them is to be numbered that principle which the German bishops have expressed in the document we have been discussing. It is to be hoped that they will not let themselves be held back from recognizing it and acting upon it as well. It may be said that the unity of the faith (which does not mean union with the opinion of Mr XY), acknowledgement of Jesus Christ as our Lord and Saviour, loyalty to the Church, and much else besides, are factors which are still more important than the principle we are defending here. But this is something that we neo-modernists (the name which our opponents like to reproach us with) are aware of too. We would be happy not to be put in the position nowadays of having to conduct a special defence of this principle which the German bishops have taught us.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[98]

6

THE CONGREGATION OF THE FAITH AND THE COMMISSION OF THEOLOGIANS

Strictly speaking all I have set myself as a task is to mention a few points calling for treatment by this commission[1] as a matter of priority and with special urgency. But in order to do justice to this task and to choose the sort of themes to which this description would apply certain prior considerations are necessary, for without them the task will not be discharged at all. For if we were to concentrate immediately upon those questions which everyone regards as 'actual and relevant' then nobody could know for sure whether he was pursuing a topic that was of real urgency or a subject which is today on everyone's lips, yet tomorrow will straightway be forgotten.

The Commission of Theologians has close connections with the Congregation of the Faith. These connections are altogether essential to it for without them it would constitute merely some random group of theologians concerning themselves with controversial questions in theology. It would be on the same level as innumerable other groups of the same kind, and would not possess any exclusive function belonging to it of its very nature. It is true that these close connections do not imply that the Commission of Theologians should not develop any special approaches of its own, or have its own spontaneity. It does not imply that it should be merely a subordinate instrument, so that any initiative it took would [99] depend solely on the appropriate directive of the papal Congregation. On the contrary, it is only by having its own spontaneity and responsibility that the Commission can act as an aid to the Roman Congregation. Yet its responsible and active collaboration must be totally ordered to the activity precisely of this Congregation. In itself this is obvious. The Commission is restricted in the number of its members and the choice of them is reserved to the Pope alone. For these reasons alone the group of theologians has neither the capacity nor the intention of being representative of all Catholic theologians throughout the world. Whether a collegiate body of this kind, representative of all theologians and distinct from those representing the bishops, is regarded as legitimate in itself is a different question and one not to be decided upon here. But at any rate there can be no doubt that this group does not constitute such a representative body, and it would be acting in contradiction to its own nature if it did not regard itself as an instrument of the papal Congregation and hence restricted its functions to those matters which really fall within the purview of this Congregation.

But this only makes the question all the more pressing of what the task of this commission is in itself and in particular what it is in the contemporary scene. A reply might be attempted merely in the sense indicated above, namely that it has to serve the Roman Congregation. But this would merely shift the question onto a different ground, for straightway the counter-question would have to be put of what this means and what the task is of the Roman Congregation itself. This is a question to which hardly anyone nowadays has a correct and practical answer to give. It is indeed clear, absolutely speaking, that the Congregation, as an organ of the pope, has the right and the duty to guard and defend the Christian and Catholic

[1] This paper is based on a report by the author to the first session of the International Papal Commission of Theologians of the 6 October 1969. Because of an indiscretion the article was published in a distorted and partly falsified form in IDOC international, no. 13 (of the 1 December 1969), pp. 46-62, and excerpts from it in Informations Catholiques Internationales, no. 350 (of the 15 December 1969), pp. 33-35. The author arranged for the German version to be translated from the Latin original by his colleague, Dr E. Klinger, so as to present an authentic text of the arguments put forward at Rome. cf. also K. Rahner, 'Die Freiheit theologischer Forschung in der Kirche', StdZ 184 (1969), pp. 73-82.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

faith against all errors and dangers to which it is exposed whether from within or from without. But it would be gravely erroneous of us to suppose that we could solve this question as applied to our contemporary world merely by an abstract answer of this kind and thereby imagine that in all other respects we could proceed in the future in the same accustomed manner as formerly. The abstract formulae applied to the Congregation hitherto and the practical activities in which it itself has engaged no longer correspond to the present-day situation with which it finds itself confronted in the concrete and in terms of which its concrete functions should be defined in their greater detail. The basic question concerning this commission, therefore, which has to be solved first and foremost, is the question of the nature and function of the Congregation of the Faith itself. Our answer to this will determine too the [100] special choice of themes to be treated of by the commission. Yet as I see it no full or adequate answer has yet been found to this basic question itself of the function of the Congregation of the Faith in the contemporary world. Hence I cannot refrain from mentioning a few of the obstacles which manifestly bar the way to such an answer.

I. THE NATURE AND FUNCTION OF THE ROMAN CONGREGATION OF THE FAITH

The Situation

Permit me, by way of preliminary, to give a brief outline of the procedures of the Congregation of the Faith as followed hitherto. I readily concede that such an outline can only be very sketchy. If in addition to this deficiency it strikes this or that individual as insufficiently ‘respectful’, I must crave indulgence for this. Up to the present the Congregation has proceeded on the assumption that new ideas and theological theses which have been freshly developed, and do not seem at first sight to be in agreement with the traditions of the faith, derive from one and the same milieu as that of the Congregation itself, and that there are direct contacts between them and theology as handed down and as formulated elsewhere. The result of this would be that the same terminology, the same philosophical assumptions, the same cultural outlooks, could be assumed to exist and could be used on both sides, and that it would be easy enough to establish and discover any fresh differences of opinion that emerged. It was formerly considered that when faced with a new proposition which struck one as suspicious it was easy enough to adduce a definition from Denzinger so that it could be readily seen that this ran counter to the doctrine under attack.

In cases in which it was believed that some fresh doctrinal propositions had been rejected, they were regarded either as already familiar or as readily accessible to the average intelligence, or else were quickly translated into the kind of statements which were in direct contradiction to traditional doctrine. No attention was paid to the fresh outlooks, tacit assumptions, and experiences not yet worked out in terms of conscious theory forming the background from which the new doctrinal opinions emerged. The Roman censors working in the Roman Congregations were in fact undoubtedly acute and learned men in every way. But even they regarded their own mentality and their own intellectual and social milieu as the only one existing, and as accessible from the outset to all others. The historical factors influencing their own mentality and the [101] conditions affecting their own cultural, scientific, or even human milieux were things which they neither consciously recognized nor were able to take into account in the decisions they arrived at.

It is in the light of this that we must explain the fact that while in the Roman condemnations of the last century the true faith was indeed effectively defended, it was so, nevertheless, only in an extremely sterile and almost wholly repressive manner. No positive

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

integration of the new problems was achieved by any such action on the part of Rome, and these problems were solved in other ways, whole decades too late, and generally speaking only by the kind of people who were regarded with particular suspicion by the Roman authorities. Undoubtedly the Catholic truth was defended even though its defence was often combined far too long with obsolete opinions drawn from the theological manuals. Thereby many were lost who would have agreed with this truth and who in themselves were actually ready to do so; yet they were lost to the faith. The reason was first that they lived in an intellectual and social environment far removed from that of the Roman doctors, and second that this doctrine was presented to them in a manner which was quite inappropriate to them. On any honest appraisal of the history of this Congregation over the last century it appears as an historia calamitatum and a history of lost opportunities, a history fashioned by people who, without prejudice to their legitimate authority and their task of defending the Catholic truth, were all too ready to present themselves as the beati possidentes.

Unquestionably the Church cannot escape from the burdens and the cramping effects imposed upon her by history. Unquestionably it is better to defend the Catholic truth in less agreeable ways than simply to surrender this even in its smallest detail. But even taking all this into account it would have been possible to avoid in this history much that is regrettable, many errors, and very many decisions which were objectively false. Let us not suppose that there have not been errors of this kind. Almost all the statements on biblical questions put forward by the Roman bodies in the last century prior to the Second Vatican Council are obsolete, and are no longer heeded by anyone. Modernism, it is true, is rightly evaluated as an amalgam of heresies, but even so it has to be said that the concrete condemnation under Pius X is full of over-hasty assertions which fail to do justice either to the importance of the problems involved or to the mentality of those against whom they are directed. Many of the statements of the popes in our own time on social and economic matters undoubtedly deserve the highest praise. Nevertheless the manner in which they are presented is often such as to suggest that [102] support can be found for all of them in the gospel or the eternal law of nature even though in many cases they were applicable only to a particular period or culture. Let us take, for example, the modern theory of evolution and the attitude of the Church to the modern sciences, psychology and sociology: for whole decades (for almost a whole century) the idea of a development of man from the universal sphere of life was suppressed. Even today the official rejection of polygenism has not been withdrawn. The reaction of the Church to depth psychology and all scientific progress has almost invariably, so far as the Roman authorities are concerned, been inspired by a spirit of conservative mistrust.

Once we consider all these factors honestly and in the light of history we find that nowadays there is a further point to be added: that prescribed attitudes of mind of this kind have become ineffective even within the Church itself. What we are nowadays observing is an immense upheaval in human ideas and society, the nature and consequences of which have been, up to now, to a large extent unknown. In earlier decades, when a decision was issued by the Congregation of the Faith or some other Roman body, any Christian or theologian affected by it had two courses open to him: either he submitted to a decree of this kind or he left the Church. Nowadays, however, cases are proliferating in which the Christian affected takes neither the one nor the other course. He neither accepts the teaching of such a body nor leaves the Church. Instead he continues to take part in the life of the Church, contenting himself with a so-called mere 'partial identification'.[2] To the objection that such a course is dishonest and perhaps even dishonourable he replies that it only seems so from the point of view of the authorities, whose pronouncements on doctrine he precisely rejects. From this it

[2] On the subject of partial identification in its wider aspects cf. the observations of Fr. Roustang, 'Le troisième homme', Christus 13 (1966), pp. 561-567.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

is clear that the procedures and policies customary in the Roman curias hitherto have to a large extent become ineffective. Nevertheless it must be insisted that the Roman Congregations have not only the right and the duty to defend the traditions of the faith, but that over and above this they are also obliged in the same way to seek for the most effective possible policies and procedures to make this defence of theirs really successful.

Now what we have said above is far from amounting in itself to a full or adequate description of the situation in its entirety in which the Congregation of the Faith has to discharge its office nowadays. It seems to me that a radical shift has taken place as compared with former times in our entire conscious attitudes even with regard to the relationship between [103] the theoretical and the practical reason. In the light of this it becomes easy to understand why it should be that, at least according to my modest experience, it is no longer possible to say that the majority of the younger members of the clergy in Germany regard all dogmas promulgated in the Church as absolutely true in every particular. But this does not seem to cause excessive disquiet to the younger generation because as a rule they do not trouble themselves very much about theoretical truth as such once one abstracts from the practical claims it makes upon us in our concrete human lives. In brief: the present-day climate in terms of human ideas and human society is totally different from what it formerly was, and that too in such a way that we cannot expect that the mere formal authority of a Roman Congregation will de facto, or in any effective sense, influence those to whom such decrees are directed. It is not enough to insist against this attitude that the individual involved must either agree to the papal pronouncements concerned or cease to be a Catholic. For first there is a de facto refusal to recognize this principle on the part of the people concerned, and second there is a lack of the concrete means to carry through such an axiom effectively under present-day conditions.

In addition a third reason, distinct from the above, must be explicitly adduced at this point, and one which calls in question the approaches and policies customarily adopted by this Congregation hitherto. Formerly we proceeded from the assumption that the Congregation is in a position to watch over everything affecting the faith within the Catholic Church. It was assumed that we could assign to the Index of Prohibited Books at least all those writings which are of Catholic authorship and represent a threat to the Catholic faith. Hence a watch was kept over all teachers of theology or at least there was a belief that this was being done. It was the custom to send out documents – in a fairly arbitrary manner – with regard to the choice of subject-matter. But the content of these documents seldom touched upon the really basic problems of the time or, when they aimed at doing this, the exclusively negative character of the decisions taken had the effect of leaving these basic problems more or less unresolved. Everything was worked out by a small group of theologians living almost exclusively in Rome, and their specialized knowledge and competence in the relevant fields was not such as to be beyond all question. For the purpose of such decrees the bishops functioned in practice as mere executive instruments or as the sort of officials who denounced to the Roman curias those whose teaching they suspected of being heretical. For many reasons an approach of this kind, after the manner of a ‘doctrinal police’, is unrealistic nowadays.

[104] One reason for this ineffectiveness must be specially emphasized. It is the task of the Congregation of the Faith to defend the Catholic faith and the acknowledgement of it by all. But the ways and methods formerly used for this purpose presuppose a quite specific unity between theology and faith such as de facto no longer exists today, and, moreover, is no longer capable of existing. Certainly there is an essential connection between theology and faith. Not merely has theology, as the scientific interpretation of faith, constantly to keep faith in view, but conversely every statement of faith inevitably and of its very nature contains right from the outset an element of reflection and hence of theology. Despite this this close relationship between the two does not imply an identity. For if theology always consists in a scientific interpretation of the faith, and this interpretation must presuppose much in the way of the philosophy, culture, and scientific experience of the age in which it is promulgated – thus the factors presupposed are subject to change and are not the same for all – then it follows not merely that there is a difference between theology and faith, but also that different theologies are possible, even though all of them refer to the same faith.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This difference is something that we are far more conscious of nowadays than was the case in the past. It is already felt to be insuperable nowadays because the prior assumptions underlying these different theologies of today are such that no one can any longer have a comprehensive view of them all at the same time, and use them to constitute a single theology reducing all the rest to a synthesis. In earlier times the Congregation of the Faith was able to assume and invoke for its work a theology that was common to all and which, moreover, everyone was perfectly well able to view as a comprehensive whole. Today, however, without prejudice to the unity of the faith, that theology which formerly all held in common is more and more being split up into the numerous different theologies which no one can any longer reduce simultaneously to one and the same common denominator.

Hitherto it has been extremely difficult to see how this Congregation, in view of the paucity of its members, can be familiar with, and distinguish, these different theologies or can couch its own doctrinal pronouncements in a language which will be effectively intelligible to all and recognized as appropriate for solving the particular questions arising within the single theology prevailing in any given age. Even today we observe disputes arising from this situation of theological pluralism. Some seek to reject a given proposition as heretical while others declare that this demand arises from a false interpretation of the statement objected to on [105] the grounds that this interpretation is not in conformity with the underlying assumptions in terms of terminology, philosophy, etc. on which such a proposition is based, and without which no true judgement of it can be arrived at. Formerly controversies arose as to the truth of a doctrine when no one had any doubt that the meaning of it was understood in the same sense by both sides. Nowadays each of the two parties to such a dispute argues that his opponent has failed to grasp the true meaning of the doctrine he is putting forward. Hence it comes about that the judgement we arrive at upon such a condemned proposition is often regarded not as a condemnation of the proposition itself but of the false interpretation placed upon it.

Consequences

What consequences are to be drawn from the situation briefly delineated here for the work of the Roman Congregation and the Commission of Theologians? Above all what conclusions are to be drawn for the choice of themes which are particularly pressing?

Before we can proceed with our special theme it seems necessary to make yet a few further remarks at a general level. If we have described the situation aright, then the first conclusion which we can draw from it is a recognition that we do not know what our precise attitude should be. The first mistake we usually commit consists in the conviction that we have a sound grasp of the situation in which we live and already possess the principles and norms which we need to master the situation, so that all that we have to do is rightly to apply them to it. We often suppose that the only oversight we can commit is to neglect the practical applications of principles the nature and value of which are beyond question. De facto, however, there are no cases in which we really penetrate to the roots of the situation in which the Church and her official doctrinal authorities find themselves. We interpret the situation of today and tomorrow in terms of the situation of the yesterday to which we have been accustomed. Yet ultimately speaking we are in no sense achieving any effective or radical view of what the real reasons are for so profound a change in the situation in terms of sociology and human ideas. We take for granted certain norms of behaviour which de facto men no longer observe nowadays. We lay down principles and maxims which may in themselves be very sound, yet which unfortunately have the defect that modern man is precisely refusing to recognize them as applying to him. We suppose that the modes and attitudes of thought, of feeling, and of living customary in a [106] clerical milieu also apply outside this milieu. We invoke in support of our position the universal authority of the Church and her teaching office in order to give assurance that a specific principle has been proclaimed by this authority, whereas in reality this principle might far better – as authenticated by its own content – provide the basis for acknowledging the authority in general.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The first step to be taken is the recognition in all honesty that we do not know the situation in which we ourselves stand in terms of sociology and human ideas. It is true that among ourselves we often say that fresh theological investigations are necessary. In fact, however, we often entertain the tacit conviction that everything that is in any way important for Christian life is undoubtedly already to hand, and only still needs to be defended and translated into practical terms, whereas those things which we do not know affect not merely the manner of presentation and preaching of the Christian truth but the actual content itself which, under present-day conditions, we have to preach. This is, it is true, the faith as revealed once and for all and to be preached in every age. But to the extent that it is precisely today that it has to be preached it is, without prejudice to its ultimate and basic identity with faith in the absolute, itself subject to a far-reaching historical change. The recognition of one's own ignorance undoubtedly signifies the first step towards an effective recognition of the true position and of what has to be done in it.

This point should also be emphasized in its application to recognizing the faith. For with regard to the object of knowledge here we are easily led into the erroneous supposition that we must either already know everything or are absolutely incapable of deciding anything for sure. In the past a developing process of maturity of this kind in our knowledge of matters of faith, i.e. the 'development of dogma', was achieved gradually, so that the individual steps were often hardly perceptible. And as a result of the gradual process of maturity in knowledge of this kind within the Church later generations hardly retained any awareness of the uncertainties of earlier ones. The earlier pronouncements of the official teaching authorities, though they may have run counter to some specific conviction held in more recent times, did not constitute any difficulties for the generation coming after them, if only because there was often a complete lack of awareness of them. Today, however, everything is developing more swiftly, so that the same peaceful maturing process of a doctrinal decision can hardly be expected. Hence the people of the Church, and even the members of the Roman bodies, must accustom themselves to the explicit withdrawing of past decisions. In individual cases these must frankly and [107] honestly be declared no longer to be in force, or even explicitly acknowledged to be mistaken. Unless we have the courage explicitly to withdraw past errors the teaching authorities of the Church of today will retain neither their credibility nor the trust reposed in them.

In all these questions, which need to be tackled afresh, there is much in terms of methodology which should be thought out and applied anew. In former times, when faced with questions calling for decision, it was more or less universal practice to have recourse to the doctrine and practice of the Church in the immediate past. Biblical and historical studies, which might have cast serious doubts upon this tradition of the practice and teaching of the immediate past, were de facto not adduced or applied. The more remote theological past was in practice always regarded as an evolutionary stage already left behind, and as the age of an

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

obscurity which had already given way to something altogether better, clearer, and surer as a result of the efforts of more recent schools of thought. History was not really taken as providing a critical standpoint from which to judge present-day positions, but merely as the description of a way which had already attained its goal and could no longer be called in question.

The Congregation or Commission cannot continue to employ such methods in the future. The methods used must really be open, seeing that they will be used to seek that which is as yet unknown, however true it may be that that which we seek has not merely a theoretical interest but great practical importance as well. Other methods, e.g. the approach of higher criticism in exegesis, must be accorded their due value and given genuine scope to take effect even though the findings thereby arrived at may contradict the ideas of the traditional schools of thought. (In this respect even the exegetical methods of the Second Vatican Council still do not provide a good example for a future methodology. They quote scripture only as a storehouse of dicta probantia in order to give substance to theses already recognized and assured on other grounds.) A methodological 'legalism', devoid of any real regard for the milieu in which a given text emerged or the assumptions tacitly underlying it etc., and interpreting texts as positive juridical norms, is something that we must resolutely overcome. We must never forget that agreement with tradition on a particular question is still far from constituting any proof that the doctrine concerned belongs to divine revelation unless it has been established beyond dispute that such a doctrine has been unanimously accepted as revealed by God and that at the same time the 'more original' revelation necessarily contains all that the text appears to express.[3]

[108] This and many other points in methodology need to be tested afresh and translated into practice if the work of the Congregation and Commission is really to serve the interests of those who live in this situation of ours as it affects human knowledge.

II. TASKS FOR THE COMMISSION OF THEOLOGIANS

From the preliminary remarks which it has been necessary to make here we can now go on to treat of a few special themes which take priority and claim our special attention. We are not proceeding from the assumption that such themes should necessarily be the subject of a public and authoritative declaration addressed to the Church by the Congregation of the Faith. On the contrary it will be assumed that there can be themes which require to be considered and, as it were, pondered upon by the Congregation without such consideration having to lead immediately and ipso facto to a decree needing to be promulgated. All this taken as given, I shall draw a distinction between more general and more particular themes. Under the heading of more general themes I am grouping those which, without being the subject of public official doctrinal declaration, bear particularly upon the Congregation's own interpretation of itself even though such more general considerations may have secondary consequences for the doctrine and practice of the Church.

General Themes

The first theme touches upon the possibility, the limitations, and the methods which today, as [3] The author is drawing a distinction between the 'original' revelation and the concepts in which it is objectified. On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Theology in the New Testament', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 23-41.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

distinct from the past, are used by the Church and her official teachers in the defence and proclamation of the faith. From what has already been said the range and complexity of such a consideration will be clear. What is to be done, for instance, in view of the fact that the attitude of modern man to theoretical truth is manifestly completely different from that of his predecessors so long as this theoretical truth is incapable of direct practical verification? How can the unity of the faith be defended – indeed even assured – in any sense if it cannot now be presented as it formerly was, directly in terms of a single theology using one and the same terminology and based on the same philosophical assumptions etc.? In these circumstances how can we still regard holy [109] Scripture nowadays as norma non normata et omnia normans, seeing that it itself is nowadays recognized as an entity which is in manifold ways conditioned by historical factors, one which depends upon many factors which have either ceased to exist nowadays, or at least seem to us not to be binding? How can the teaching authorities with their doctrines concerning specific subjects aim at making these doctrines effective, seeing that their formal authority itself is called in question and such questioning can with some justice adduce in its support many authentic instances in which these official teaching authorities have in fact erred? What is it which, regarded as the ultimate substance and innermost kernel of the faith, can be preached in such a way first that this basic preaching convinces the hearer of its living truth as a vital force in human living in virtue of the mystery and simplicity combined in it and of its affinity with the innermost will of man, and second that the authority which a truth of this kind carries evokes trust in its hearers? Are we in a position nowadays to distinguish between various fundamental kinds of preaching suitable to proclaim the one truth of faith? When an error against the faith is promulgated by a Catholic how can the official rejection of such an error be rendered effective straightway? Which are the cases in which such rejection is opportune, and which are the ones in which it is not so? Seeing that nowadays men require of even formal authority that it shall give the intrinsic reasons supporting its decision, the question must be raised of whether and how such a demand can be satisfied in the case of the decisions of this Congregation. A distinction which we have often adumbrated is that between the unity of faith and creed on the one hand and the pluralism among the theologies on the other. This is something which requires to be worked out with still greater precision. For first this distinction is far greater than formerly, and second, speaking about faith and creed in a so-called scientific age cannot be allowed to lead to a vague pietism.

In order to formulate such a theory as to the right methods to be used in the teaching of the faith we must also nowadays raise the question of what approach to adopt to the very great number of individuals who, as a consequence of their intellectual formation, in itself very advanced, are psychologically speaking hardly ready to accept the pronouncements of the doctrinal authorities merely in virtue of their formal authority as such so long as they are unable to integrate those pronouncements in a really positive sense with the rest of their ideas. On the other hand, however, in the intellectual and psychological situation in which they stand they themselves are in no position to achieve such a positive integration by their own powers. Such dilemmas as this were less frequent in earlier days [110] because men were either still so uneducated that on the subtler questions they simply left the doctrines of the Church's official teachers to their implicit faith or else were able to cope with the situation with that single common language of the educated classes in which the pronouncements on the faith were themselves couched. So far as we are concerned we have no particular theory to offer on this sociological question of cognition.

A second general theme concerns the question of Church membership. This question seems to a large extent already to have been clarified. For many centuries it has been familiar enough to theologians and seems to have been brought for the most part to a conclusion by the Second Vatican Council. Yet this is true only from certain specific standpoints. There are many other aspects of this question which still remain wholly obscure even today, although in themselves they have been of the utmost importance for the practice of the Church. Formerly every answer to this question was more or less based upon the assumption that it was easy to establish whether belief or unbelief was present in an individual in relation to the doctrines of the Church. Such an assumption, however, is no longer justified. We have already spoken of that peculiar state of merely partial identification with the Church and her faith, of that strange psychological and sociological attitude of mind in which two seemingly incompatible resolves co-exist: on the one hand the resolve to remain in the Church and to take part in her life, and yet on the other to maintain a fairly clear attitude of dissent from her authority and her teaching on many questions. How are we to judge an attitude of this kind in the individual's conscious awareness from the psychological and theological points of view? What attitude should the Church adopt towards such individuals?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is easy to recognize that this question has consequences for ecumenism. For often we look more askance at many men as non-Catholics on the grounds that as a matter of Church sociology they live beyond the bounds of the Roman Church although so far as faith itself is concerned they are Catholics, than at many others who sociologically speaking do belong to the Catholic Church and call themselves Catholics. We are pointing, then, to a distinction between membership of the Church at the sociological level on the one hand and at a truly theological level (to be estimated on the basis of faith) on the other in the contemporary scene. We are suggesting that it is a distinction which in practice cannot be overcome. And even the question of whom we can regard as a believer is far more difficult than was formerly supposed. Now given that such a distinction does to a large extent exist nowadays, what course should the Church and her official teachers pursue in such a situation? Whom is she [111] to recognize as belonging to her? Whom is she to admit to the sacraments? To whom does she extend communio in sacris? Why does she extend this to one individual and not to another when there is no theological difference between them whatever?

The third general theme seems to me to be that concerning the distinction between morality and justice in the Church. One of the schemes projected for the Council was explicitly concerned with the duty of moralists to preserve a strictly defined distinction between the juridical and moral orders within the Church, and this for good reasons. But the basic question of where to draw the line of this distinction in itself and of the practical consequences following from it seems to me to remain unresolved. For we are accustomed tacitly to assume as obvious the view that the moral and juridical standing of a Christian within the Church is such that, at least so long as there is good will on both sides, both departments can so be brought into harmony that there cannot be any opposition between them. And yet such an opposition is possible. There is a kind of failure in morality which does not ipso facto involve a transgression of the law and is in this sense to be pronounced 'illegitimate' (i.e. contrary to a law to the extent that this is enforced by the Church under penalty of juridical or more general sociological consequences). There can be a kind of illegitimate behaviour, or behaviour deviating from the Church's law, which cannot ipso facto be said to constitute any real immorality in God's sight.

To regard the two factors as distinct and to some extent opposed in this way does not create any very great difficulties in secular society. But because the Church as such always has to guard and defend human morality in God's sight as well, the distinction and opposition which we have discerned do of their very nature entail notable difficulties so far as she is concerned. For at times, without any sufficiently exact thought on the principles involved, the juridical and legal claims for a particular course of action are urged without sufficient regard to its morality. There is a failure to admit that this latter factor has any concrete effects in the life of the Church. (For instance we allow a man to contract a Church marriage with one woman even though as a matter of deep personal involvement and for a long period he has united himself with another, albeit without concluding a juridically valid marriage with her.) Conversely we tend to refuse this juridical status to another even though from the standpoint of his moral situation such a status could have been accorded to him merely on the grounds that the legitimacy of this status cannot be established in the forum externum (for instance marriage is denied to a man when he cannot supply juridical proof of his freedom from the [112] marriage bond even though he is in fact free in this sense). There are many instances in canon law in which we can discern confusion and entanglements of this kind between the juridical and moral orders. For instance the idea of a punishment latae sententiae, a fairly strange conception, derives from confusing the two in this way. The effect of allowing the two orders to interact upon each other in this way is that we are all too ready to attach forthwith to any kind of irregularity in the juridical sphere a moral significance in God's sight which does not belong to it in itself at all except in those cases in which such irregularity really endangers the public order in the Church. If this danger were solved in principle and unambiguously then we could establish more easily and more precisely the borderline between the exercise of official authority in the Church and the conscience of the individual. Moreover the whole question is connected, as we can readily perceive, with that other question of whether and to what extent the individual may be pressed by his own conscience publicly to declare his opposition to a doctrine of the teaching authorities which, while it is indeed authoritative and authentic, has nevertheless not been defined. All the theologians regard an internal dissent as possible. The question would be, however, what degree of public, and perhaps even juridical value could be attached to such a withholding of assent without the attitude of the individual expressing it doing damage to the Church herself.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The fourth general theme seems to me to touch upon the concrete constitution of the Church and of the local and regional Churches. It is clear that the Church has of her very nature a constitution which is juris divini (even though it is not so easy as it appears to many to say in what this 'divine right' precisely consists). But many of the factors in the concrete organization and constitution of the Church do not belong to it as of divine right. Many factors may perhaps seem to have this status but in reality do not do so. The concrete constitution of human right or human law, however, which derives from the historical circumstances and the demands of a particular age, can nowadays not be left to the paternalistic discretion of the Church authorities. On the contrary there is need of prior reflection from the aspects of history, psychology, futurology, and sociology, and this is something which it is precisely for theology to achieve. It is true that here again the juridical changes require that the level of concrete organization belong to the sphere of administration of the Church's authorities, but it in no sense follows from this that these authorities can nowadays shape their course solely in accordance with their own 'well-informed' personal 'conscience' and fatherly benevolence. [113] Nowadays all these decisions call for a prior information which has to be acquired in new ways and by scientific methods, information as to tendencies and concerns which are de facto present in the Church. And while it is true that the Church authorities are not mere passive instruments dependent upon these tendencies and existing merely to give effect to them, still they cannot remain totally independent of them either, acting as though they were the overlords and nothing more.

I have deliberately avoided including among these more general themes the most basic questions of Christianity, the questions concerning God, the Incarnation, and similar truths. For while these questions are indeed of fundamental importance, it is not a Congregation or Commission of this kind which can give the answer to them in terms which are really appropriate to our particular age. On the contrary the giving of this answer is a task for the whole of Christian theology. It may indeed be true that in the future too there will be occasions on which the teaching authorities cannot avoid pronouncing an anathema through this Congregation in order to defend the faith. Nevertheless such merely negative decisions

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

generally have a fairly limited effectiveness. And again no official Church institution nowadays can in practice achieve anything more than these purely negative decisions. It might be asked, however, whether and in what way an institution such as the Congregation of the Faith might indirectly call for positive and effective answers to these fundamental questions. This would be quite a different question. Undoubtedly it would militate against any such goal if the Congregation, from an untimely zeal to weed out the tares, were to destroy the good seed as well, as has often happened in the past.

Particular Themes

At this point a few more particular themes must briefly be indicated which primarily call for the attention of the Congregation of the Faith and the Commission of Theologians. These themes will be adduced only briefly, and we shall make no attempt to explain the importance of their subject-matter and the methods of enquiry to be followed in them any further.

(a) The question of mixed marriages still remains to a large extent unsolved today at both the theoretical and the practical level. Many questions bearing upon this theme have still not received sufficient attention. In practice there is often a complete failure to draw the necessary distinction between that which pertains to genuinely divine law and that which pertains merely to ecclesiastical law. Over and above this, it is often [114] wrongly assumed that everything in this sphere depends on the free consent of the Church's authorities, and there is a failure to recognize that the matter itself and the concrete circumstances prevailing today impose their own norms and limitations upon the Church's authorities. It is vital that in this sphere effective, imaginative, and practical laws should he devised, and that the preliminary deliberations leading to this should be embarked upon. These should be exact and detailed indeed, but also brisk and swiftly set in motion, and the laws they lead to should apply to all. Moreover these laws should be effective without innumerable special measures and legalistic procedures. Unless this is done then the only alternative will be that most of the members of the Church, and even the younger clergy, will cease to trouble themselves any longer about these laws.

(b) One question which is recognized to be very urgent is that of communicatio in sacris. There is a danger that in practice people will soon cease to pay any further heed to the prescriptions of both the Catholic and the non-Catholic Church authorities. The rules which have hitherto been in force in this sphere are not simple and imaginative enough and, on the contrary, give the impression of a somewhat illogical compromise. The basic question of what our attitude should be to unity in the sphere of ritual observance seems to me to remain unsolved, the more so since the prior question of what unity of faith can really be achieved, demanded, or looked for in the future still remains obscure.

(c) Infant baptism is also a question which seems likely soon to give rise to great difficulties among us. I believe that here too we must guard against the view, all too easy to fall into, that this question has already been solved in all its aspects.

(d) Another particular question of great practical urgency is concerned with the indissolubility of a Christian marriage which has been sealed and consummated. Even if we assume the basic principle of indissolubility – an assumption which is certainly not altogether free from historical and theoretical difficulties – many concrete and practical questions still always remain, calling for full and adequate answers. At what point, for instance, is that degree of intellectual and moral maturity present really and not merely presumptively, without which that consent which provides the basis for an indissoluble marriage is quite impossible? Can maturity of this kind be the same under any and every sociological and cultural conditions? Even if we accept the objective indissolubility of a Christian marriage,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the question still remains open of whether all men can effectively 'realize' the duty of an objective indissolubility of this kind at the subjective [115] level and in terms of their own concrete human lives. And at least in the light of this the extremely obscure question then arises of what the attitude of the Church should be towards those who are subjectively convinced that it is permissible for them to enter upon a new marriage after civil divorce, and whose attitude on this point cannot easily be contested. This and much else besides seems obscure and still unsolved in relation to the indissolubility of marriage.

(e) I must confess my personal view that many of the factors connected with the law of celibacy call for fresh consideration even at the theoretical level. For not infrequently principles are invoked and urged upon us in defence of celibacy which, while they are indeed asserted as beyond question, can in fact perfectly well be challenged by others as unproved. In this question too, so it seems to me, we have not sufficiently reflected upon the bounds which the Church authorities too must observe. Here again in the eyes of many the legality of a prescription issued with the force of official authority is all too readily regarded as proof of the effectiveness of this prescription also, whereas in reality the converse is equally true. Those issuing the prescription must also have due regard to the question of its effectiveness if it is to be legitimate in every respect.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[116]

7

ON THE THEOLOGY OF A 'PASTORAL SYNOD'

If the science of theology, as understood by Catholics, is to contribute to the preaching of the gospel and the life of the Church, then it has the right and the duty to make its message known in the concrete everyday life of the Church as well, and to play its part in throwing light upon the questions of the moment. It is in this sense that we should listen in particular to the message of theology in the preliminary considerations on the nature and task of a pastoral synod.[1]

It may be that the idea of a twofold teaching office in the Church approximately as maintained by Y. Congar or H. Küng,[2] is somewhat problematical. But at least this much is correct in it, that in an age of science and of growing intellectual and social differences in the Church the theologians have a task calling for their serious attention, and one which – viewed in concrete terms – only they can fulfil, regardless of how their more precise relationship to the official doctrinal authority of the bishops should be conceived of according to Catholic doctrine. In this undertaking the work of the theologians is related, of course, to the concrete [117] practice and decisions of the Church. But while fully recognizing this, we must also recognize that in this task of theirs the theologians have to perform the function of critical reflection, and thereby discharge their special task in the Church in relation alike to the bishops and to the people of God as a whole. Now all this makes the significance of this task for the theologian, as applied to a synod of the kind we are thinking of, not less but on the contrary even greater. For critical theological reflection – even abstracting from the creative freedom required for new charismatic discoveries and decisions – is the sole factor which makes it possible for the Church to avoid becoming entangled in the encumbrances of mere tradition and custom and so clears the ground from which she can develop her future. Indeed it can actually be said that nowadays that factor of the original and the charismatic which abides right from the Church's origins should to a large extent appear in the everyday garb of sober realistic reflection.

There is a further question which cannot be entered into here, that namely of the order in which the representatives of the individual theological disciplines should express themselves on the subject under consideration in view of the way in which these particular disciplines are related to one another as established by a preliminary consideration at the level of scientific theory. It is obvious that a dogmatic theologian, from the very nature of his particular science, can make only very general statements on a synod of the kind we are thinking of in the awareness that it is the concrete particular details which are of really vital importance here.

I would like first to attempt to make a few points on the theology of a particular synod. With regard to the relationship between the individual regional Churches and the one Church

[1] The original context of the ideas here expressed was the group lectures of the faculty of Catholic theology at the university of Munster/Westphalia on Problems in Preparing for the German Pastoral Synod held during the winter semester of 1969/70. The observations there put forward have been lightly revised for purposes of publication.

[2] On this cf. Y. Congar, 'Dogmatische Tatsachen und "Kirchliche Glaube"', Heilige Kirche (Stuttgart, 1966), pp. 371-388; also 'Die Grenzen der kirchlichen Autorität und ihre Ausübung', Die Tradition und die Traditionen I (Mainz, I965), pp. 274-280 (Hist. Material) as well as various articles in the more recent symposium, Ministères et communion ecclésiale (Paris, 1971).
Likewise see H. Küng, 'What Does Infallibility Mean?' Structures of the Church (New York, I965), pp. 305-351 and Theologe und Kirche, Theol. Meditationen 3 (Einsiedeln, 1964) as well as Unfehlbar? – Eine Anfrage (Einsiedeln, 1970) and the controversies included in the appendix to this work.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the Church now finds itself in a quite new situation, so that it is not really so very surprising that it has so far not really been able to cope with this new situation. Ever since the Middle Ages there have always been Churches which were in some respect particular, each having special characteristics of its own, a special history, and a special way of life, and this is of course true, though obviously in a lesser degree even of the Latin Church. There have always been patriarchates, different rites, different theological traditions, particular synods, national synods, gatherings of the clergy of a particular nation, tendencies on the part of national states to absorb and appropriate to themselves in territorial and juridical terms the Churches existing within their dominions. There have been national protests against the claims and practices of the Roman see. In brief, the Church has never constituted a [118] unity of the kind which is constructed from parts which are absolutely homogeneous. But first and foremost it must be recognized that these internal differences have, after all, to a large extent been the outcome of a mere pragmatic and unconscious development. It is something which has rather been accepted as an inescapable fait accompli than positively affirmed. The difficulties and struggles which these differences between the particular Churches have of course entailed throughout the entire history of the Church have been sustained by an attitude which has always been taken for granted yet which is, basically speaking, nevertheless naive. For those living in earlier times have always held that that which is 'given' by their own tradition is also that which must be taken as the standard for everything else. The differences within the Church have been in this sense a rendering present of the past, but not a rendering present of and a task for, the future. A further point is that for all the respect accorded to the Churches of the East, it has been felt by almost all Catholics that 'Church' is identical with the Latin Church of the West. Now this Latin Church of the West has been, and still is, in all dimensions of Church life, homogenized to such an extent that it can hardly be seen how the process can continue any further. The result is that tendencies arise from time to time at the national level, or within particular Churches, which are hostile to this process of homogenization which has been continuously growing and extending ever since the early Middle Ages. And every time they do arise they have invariably ended in heresies and schisms, and thereby merely served to strengthen this tendency to unification within the Catholic Church. Hence this homogenized Church of the Latin West has in practice extended itself everywhere in the world by its missions ever since the beginning of the modern age, and despite the resolve which has repeatedly manifested itself to accommodate itself to the practices of other cultures. Furthermore virtually no attempt has been made in ecclesiology to achieve a serious theological reflection upon internal differences within the Church that are justified. The single overall uniformity within the Church was felt as something to be taken for granted and lived by, even though it involved the danger which is entailed by all those factors which are merely taken for granted whereas in truth they are merely the outcome of historical conditions. In fact men's attitudes have gone beyond even this, and they have come to regard the uniformity which exists in liturgy, law, Church practice, and the organization of the Church after the pattern of a modern state with a single centralized government as to a large extent an inevitable consequence of the dogma of the papal primacy. Again it is quite impossible to deny that right down to [119] the present day any tendencies which run counter to this uniformity are all too easily regarded by Rome as an opposition to the primatial function of the pope and are resisted as such. Now this situation has gradually begun to change. At the Second Vatican Council conciliar ecclesiology has for the first time entered upon a process of theological reflection as to the justification for having a pluralism of Churches within the one Church. The importance of the bishops in dogmatic developments, and thereby too the autonomy of dioceses, are becoming clearer. The latter are something more than mere administrative departments within a single centralized state. The de facto abolition (apart from minor remnants) of Latin as the language of worship in place of living

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation languages, the growing importance of the national conferences of bishops which the Council has recognized, the higher regard paid to the Eastern Churches, the autonomy of many Churches which has inevitably developed here and there through external political circumstances – these and many similar symptoms show that the age in which the uniformity prevailing within the Latin Church was taken for granted is over. Admittedly on an honest appraisal this is still no very great gain. For it has to be recognized first and foremost that at the dogmatic level and as a matter of ecclesiology no more precise and generally recognized interpretation has really been arrived at yet which can provide the basis for a more concrete relationship between the unity of the Church as represented by her primate on the one hand, and the justified, and indeed necessary, pluralism of the Churches within the one Church on the other. In this matter the Second Vatican Council has, after all, advanced only to the extent of asserting the possibility and justification in principle of such a pluralism without thereby ipso facto making it clear precisely how, in practical and concrete terms, this is to be reconciled with the authority of the pope and the unity of the Church. Juridically speaking we still do not know whether the new code of canon law which must come will give sufficient scope to the autonomy and self-responsibility of the national Churches. The 'schema' of the extraordinary synod of bishops of 1969 put forward by the Roman curia as a working paper hardly goes beyond a vague and uncommitted statement on the kind of pluralism within the Church that is justified. The schema either cannot or will not say anything whatsoever which brings this question any nearer to a solution conceived of at the juridical level. But the decisive point is, after all, surely this: that apart from a few hostile reactions to Rome, which seem to be the outcome of 'allergies' to it, the individual Churches have still not in any sense come to recognize that in which their concrete character and function consists or should consist as particular Churches [120] within the one Church. It is certainly true that the ultimate individuality of an historical reality achieving its fulness through the exercise of freedom does not emerge in the test-tube of speculative theory and critique. But it is equally true that the individuality of a social entity of our time cannot take shape and live without decisions being arrived at at the conscious and reflective level and being institutionalized at the collective level. The individuality of a social reality of today is not a flower which blooms in a dreamlike and unconscious manner. But what the distinctive character of a given particular Church could and should be in fact and in the concrete is something which we do not know even so far as our own German Church is concerned. For this it is not sufficient to have the dogmatic thesis as expressed in 'Lumen Gentium', the thesis namely that a distinction between the Churches of this kind is both justified and necessary, or that it does not run counter to the unity of the Church but rather represents a blessing for the whole Church. All that this achieves is to give expression to an abstract principle which does little to advance our enquiry. There is a lack of certainty, then, in recognizing the distinctive identity of any given particular Church on the basis of abstract theory or by pointing to a past in which greater uniformity prevailed. But there is an additional circumstance making the question still more difficult. It is this: today, in the age of a world civilization which is one at the rational and technical level, the age of UNO and the age in which the destinies of all peoples are becoming ever more closely interwoven, there is certainly no lack of factors and influences at work which from many points of view must necessarily cause the unity of the Church, and inevitably thereby a certain uniformity within her as well, to increase. There can be no escaping this tendency if the Church is to be able effectively to fulfil its task for the world, quite abstracting from the question and the problem entailed in the fact that today too a unity of the Church which is necessary on the basis of faith is being threatened, and that the Church has to ward off such threats and has to allow this basic unity of hers to take form in the concrete at the historical and social level as well. It would be terrible – and after all this is no mere imaginary danger – if the Church were now to do something which she omitted to do

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in earlier times even though then it was reasonable and necessary, yet which would nowadays signify nothing else than an anachronism if we were at this stage to make it a 'compensatory requirement'.

The assertion of the principle of autonomy for the regional Churches should not be put forward nowadays within the universal Church in such a way as to sound somewhat like the programme of a Bavarian Nationalist [121] Party. Once we recognize this the following point becomes clearer: what the concrete individuality of our German Church should really be, and how it should differ from, and at the same time be united with, the Church as a whole, is something which, if we are completely honest, we basically speaking precisely do not know. But what we are saying is that the theoretical principle, at the level of dogmatic theology, that there is a plurality of Churches within the one Church, represents something more than a mere attitude of tolerance towards something that de facto exists. It also implies a positive task of achieving that which has still to be brought into being. And if this is true then the German Church cannot stick fast in an attitude of naive ignorance as to its own individual character. Can a regional or national synod recognize that there is a task for it here? I believe that we must answer this question in the affirmative. Obviously not in the sense that a pastoral synod of this kind constitutes a sort of mirror image of such a Church at the speculative level, indulging in idle disquisitions concerning the special character of this Church. But this task of the synod might be approached in such a way that the synod recognizes on quite concrete questions the right and the duty of this Church to a specific solution, even though this solution is not that of any other particular Church. This would have the effect that the synod would be championing the right of the German Church to arrive at a particular solution of this kind while remaining within the one Church. Why must the mixed marriage law, assuming perhaps that it may be appropriate to Spaniards, take exactly the same form in Germany? Why must a parish community among us be constructed on more or less exactly the same lines as in Sicily? Why must the relationship between bishop and clergy even at the purely juridical level be organized in exactly the same way as in a Latin country or in Indonesia. In taking action on behalf of the Third World, has not a country which is economically rich quite different tasks and duties from the Church in Portugal or Jugoslavia? If practical theology includes that element which it has been found possible with a certain justification to call 'political theology', without thereby falling into a clerical exercise of power in relation to the secular world, then a political theology in Germany must assume a different form from that which it takes in any other country, and can contribute towards a concrete process of self-discovery on the part of the German Church. The synod of a particular region has of its very nature precisely as belonging to that particular region a task which is proper to it alone, and which cannot be taken over from the regional Church which it represents by any other authority in the Church. Despite the current tendency towards [122] uniformity in the world, it is neither necessary nor desirable that the distinctive character of the individual nations in terms of civilization and even of institutions should simply disappear. On the contrary among the peoples of the world each must discover its own individuality, and this represents a fresh task for the future (regardless of whether it is taken seriously or merely played at). And if all this is true, then the discovery of the special character of a particular regional Church is a task for the Church concerned, and so for the synod which represents it as particular and regional. The most pressing and spectacular part of this task may be the justifiable defence of this character against attack from Rome. But it does not constitute the decisive factor or the most difficult one. The living concrete form which Christianity assumes in the future situation and conditions in which a given concrete nation has to live, and the special character which it thereby acquires as a national Church, is, from the formal point of view, the task of a particular synod at the national level.

Secondly I would like to make a few quite brief observations on the theology of a pastoral

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

synod. The synod envisaged and planned for is called a pastoral synod. Hence we should also devote some theological consideration to the true meaning of the term 'pastoral' in all its ramifications. We might take this term as applying merely to the task of the clergy and other official functionaries of the Church. Or we might suppose that this term implies from the outset and in principle either a prohibition or a dispensation bearing upon the process of reflecting upon the gospel to be preached as to its content and the manner in which it should be preached, factors which mutually condition one another. But this would be to misunderstand the term 'pastoral'. A pastoral theology which is pursued with a view to arriving at practical decisions as to the nature of a pastoral synod is 'practical theology', which has to consider the concrete modes in which the Church as a whole has to achieve its own fulness in all of its members and in all its dimensions, and, moreover, in the light of the situation of the Church in the world as reflected upon theologically. Hence the theme and the task of the coming synod, if it is really to deserve the name of a pastoral synod, is this: to discover how the entire Catholic Church of Germany in all its members and in all its dimensions can achieve the fulness of its own nature by reflecting theologically on the situation of the Church and the world with a view to the future. This is of course not to deny that a synod of this kind must in practice, in its initial session, actually choose its themes for investigation. But if we take what has been said with all due seriousness, then we shall conclude that even the discovery of the concrete themes for discussion is an extremely difficult [123] task, that there is a danger that those taking part will be too self-assured and too self-willed, and so that they will overlook the most important and the most crucial themes because these will have remained quite undiscovered throughout their considerations. Certainly a further point is that a pastoral synod should not seek to present itself in any direct sense as having doctrinal authority. Certainly it should not seek officially and authoritatively to promulgate any new doctrinal decisions or declarations. But it might concern itself for instance, with the necessities of preaching in the pulpit and in schools. It might seek to define the task of the priest for today and tomorrow and to cater for this in special juridical enactments and pastoral directives. It might seek to formulate practical directives for the task of the people as a whole in the Church. Such directives and enactments would, moreover, be concrete, at least to some little extent while being at the same time taken in a spirit of responsibility for maintaining the Church's faith. But in the very process of undertaking all such tasks as these – and after all they certainly are the tasks of a pastoral synod – the synod will find itself inescapably confronted by theological questions which are anything but simple or already long since fully explained. This means that the synod will have to engage in theology. Why, for instance, should a pastoral synod, precisely as the synod of a particular region, in principle avoid the question of whether an age-limit should not be laid down from the outset for every bishop in the German Church, or whether a part-time priesthood is conceivable or desirable in our case? But such questions presuppose considerations of a theological kind, which still need to be clarified first, and in order to answer such questions and arrive at concrete decisions upon them we may perhaps first have to fight for the individual Church to have a place within the Church as a whole. Questions such as these must be considered in their theological aspects at a synod which is intended both to represent a particular region and to be pastoral in character.

A third theme on which certain observations have to be made is constituted by the question of what resolutions the synod as such should have legal powers to make. It is a known fact that in the projected plan for a statute for synods, despite many alterations and objections even at the development stages, the legal powers of decision ascribed to the synod have no higher status than that of mere recommendations to the conference of bishops or to individual bishops, according to whether, in any given case, the material under consideration is such as to be subject to a decision binding upon all the bishops of the bishops' conference or to the decision of an individual bishop. In the nature of the case, therefore, [124] although the bishops are included in the synod to help in advising it and in arriving at its decisions, the synod itself is merely an advisory organ of the bishops, at least so far as the juridical aspects of the synod as such are concerned. This small degree of competence ascribed to the synod as such obviously raises many questions: the question of whether another synodal constitution could have found any favour at all with Rome on this point; the question of whether, given sufficient boldness and sufficiently skilful tactics, such acceptance could not after all have been achieved; the question of how the public in the Church and in secular society would react to the synodal constitution on this point; the question of whether the expansion of the legal powers of decision of the synod in any essential respects would not lead inescapably to changes in many other prescriptions contained in the statute; the first and fundamental question of what is desirable at all in this matter; the question of what, on this assumption, the attitude of the members of the synod should be towards the synod; the question of whether the position of the synod will not be, to a certain extent, paracanonical, and whether it cannot in practice achieve a greater significance than that juridically accorded to it in virtue of the importance of the personalities taking part in it, the publicity attached to it, the power of its arguments, and the pressure of public opinion; the question of whether a different juridical status cannot and should not be striven for for later synods which must in fact come than is envisaged for this first one. To these and similar questions many more might be added concerning those prescriptions in the statute which, next to the paragraphs on the actual composition of the synod in itself, are surely the most important in the entire statute. In this present consideration on the part of a dogmatic theologian only one from among all such questions will be considered, yet one which is, after all, surely basic: the question of whether in view of the primatial and episcopal constitution of the Church regarded as juris divini such a synod can in principle have any greater juridical power of decision at all than that ascribed to it here by the proposed statute.[3] For it might be considered that the powers and authorities of the pope, the episcopate, and the individual bishop which, according to Catholic ecclesiology, belong to them inalienably and jure divino, cannot admit of [125] other authoritative institutions, and so for example a synod, to have any further rights whatever than those of recommending and advising, especially when the members of the synod consist principally of priests and laymen. It is this dogmatic question of whether this really is the case that will occupy our exclusive attention here. What we are concerned with at the moment, therefore, is not whether a greater participation of all members of the Church in her authentic decisions is desirable – in other words a greater 'democratization' in view of our contemporary social situation, nor the question of how such a thing can be achieved in the concrete without thereby endangering the true substance of the Church and her unity. All that we are concerned with here is the simple preliminary question of whether and in what sense any such thing is possible at all from the point of view of dogmatic theology.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We believe that it is possible from the dogmatic point of view for the synod as such to have a true right of decision which would in principle also be binding upon the conference of bishops and upon the individual bishop. In saying this, however, we are not taking any prior decision at this stage as to whether it is opportune to accord such rights to the synod or as to the concrete forms in which such rights might be granted to it. Furthermore certain important points still have to be made with regard to the intrinsic limitations of such rights.

In order to make the thesis we have put forward intelligible and to justify it we must enlarge a little on what we have said. We are assuming as recognized the distinction between [3] We find a prise de position representing the viewpoints of the specialist in Church law and the historian in the following articles: J. G. Gerhartz, 'Keine Mitentscheidung von Laien auf der Synode? Erwägungen zum Beschlussrechts der Gemeinsamen Synode der deutschen Bistümer', StdZ 184 (1969), pp. 145-159, and R. Kottje, 'Probleme der deutschen Synode in historischer Sicht', StdZ 185 (1970), pp. 27-33.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

divine and merely human right in the Church. We are passing over the difficult question of what jus divinum really means if we are not to fall into an unjustified simplification of this concept. We are setting on one side the questions of whether this so-called jus divinum has itself undergone a process of development in the Church, at least in the apostolic age, and so at least down to the first decades of the second century; whether it is not conceivable that a further development of the jus divinum, still within its own true bounds, may not have taken place, extending beyond this point in history, precisely because the ultimately abiding nature of the Church demands urgently a change in the definition of right in accordance with a new historical situation, and this new conception of right can perhaps then with justice be called jus divinum. Let us set all these questions aside here. But surely one point can be laid down: once we recognize precisely and accurately the true nature of human right in the Church, we will see that it is not merely a supplementary right simply added on ab externo to the immutable principles of the jus divinum enclosed upon themselves; rather this human [126] right constitutes – at least in many cases – the concretization of the jus divinum such that without it this would have no reality at all. This means that on a right understanding this jus divinum, so far from constituting a concrete law capable of being put into practice solely in its own right, properly speaking serves merely to bring out the aspect of continuity of law in the Church's law, which according to a Catholic understanding of the Church must be ascribed to it as a society in its abiding identity and indestructibility. In order to throw some further light on what we mean by this let us begin by introducing a large-scale example. The First Vatican Council produced a dogma concerning the primacy of the pope, and the Second Vatican Council has reiterated this binding doctrine. Now at least at first sight it may strike us as surprising that a dogmatic ecclesiology, and even 'Lumen Gentium' at the Second Vatican Council, should be totally silent concerning the legally valid modes for instituting a pope or concerning the election of a pope, as we are accustomed to express it, already even here indulging in a naive concretization. And yet the real existence of the primatial power belonging to a pope depends totally on this mode of institution. Every theologian and every canonist will say that the law governing the choice of a pope as in force in the concrete is merely human law in the Church, if only because it has undergone certain very vital changes in the course of history. There is a further question, still totally unconsidered, of how we can say that everything in the way of juridical powers in the Church depends upon the agreement or tolerance of the pope, when the Church manages the appointment of her supreme juridical head – in other words a most crucial act of decision – without the collaboration of a pope. But abstracting from this question, the point which we have come to recognize from what has been said still always retains its force, namely that so-called human Church law constitutes the concretization of a jus divinum such that without it this cannot have any reality at all. It is totally untenable to object to this recognition on the grounds that the human law for the election of a pope is laid down by the pope using his executive power and promulgating these prescriptions as binding on the basis of the primatial power which he holds juris divini. For we have only to envisage the case (which is absurd but not impossible) of the college of cardinals being totally destroyed by physical power after the death of the pope and before it has chosen a new pope. In such a case the Church could certainly choose itself a pope, for instance through its united episcopate, and the mode of selection would fall under human 'law' and, moreover, law of such a kind that according to the positive law actually in force it would not exist at all. Such a law, since it [127] would not be laid down by any human juridical authority, would properly speaking constitute divine law or a homogeneous consequence flowing from it. Alternatively, if someone finds that too much to say, it would be a new concretization of the jus divinum of the primatial power such as had not existed previously. After all a simple example of this kind surely shows that divine and human law in the Church are one and continuous and interwoven with one another to an extent which is far greater and more complex than is generally recognized. If we were to analyse such an example in still closer detail it would become even clearer that divine law in the Church always and necessarily has a mode of concretization in so-called human law which is conditioned by history and subject to change, and that that which we customarily call jus divinum is not of itself, or taken in isolation, a law that can straightway be applied in practice. What the term stands for, rather, is the expression of an indestructible continuity of law in the Church. Yet at the unreflecting level of concrete practice and, it may be, even at that of explicitated theory, we proceed from the tacit assumption that the norms of divine law are, even taken in isolation, the kind of norms which can immediately be applied in practice. Every modification ('narrower application', if we like to put it so) ipso facto constitutes a violation of these sacrosanct norms.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now let us apply our findings on this point as indicated above to our present question. The law of the bishops in the Church is not simply a law which can be formulated in abstract terms once and for all, and as such ipso facto a law that can straightway be applied in practice. It has always and inevitably a mode of concretization which is historically conditioned and subject to change. This mode of concretization as it de facto exists today has certainly a validity of its own such that it cannot be altered simply at will. But it is not immutable, and it is in principle perfectly possible for situations to arise in history which demand such change as a matter of moral principle and in the light of the gospel. If due heed is paid to such a demand of the particular moment in history, then in the concrete this means that, for instance, the bishops extend to others, their clergy and the people of God, the right to share in the process of decision-making as a human right within the Church and one which they will then recognize as binding upon themselves too in the concrete individual case. The fact that it is necessary juridically speaking for the pope and the bishops to give their assent to such new human law does not rule out a duty which may, under certain circumstances, exist at the moral level for the pope and the bishops to give such agreement. In the same way the fact that under certain circumstances such assent may be revoked does not [128] derogate from the binding character of such a right. There are innumerable legal decisions in the Church which are capable of being radically changed, for instance by the pope, and yet by which he is juridically or at least morally bound in the concrete. If we want to explain what we have just sought to convey in a different way, one that is less dependent upon the assumptions expressed above, we can also put it in this way: an arrangement which is immediately intelligible, for instance in the case of concordats, could also perfectly well be applied to the rights and powers of the pope and the episcopate. These rights and powers are partly juris divini and partly, as they de facto exist, juris humani. And it is perfectly possible for those vested with them so to restrict their application by human law that others can in concrete fact share in the exercise of them in arriving at binding decisions. It might of course be said that a right which was conceded in this sense would always and constantly be kept alive merely by the grace of those vested with official authority jure divino. And an abiding suspicion might remain that, to the extent that such human law within the Church would necessarily be devised by those vested with official authority jure divino, it would after all remain subject to the arbitrary decisions of the official authorities so that the people of the Church would have no abidingly stable role in the process of decision-making on the part of the bishops. It is, of course, true that in such an arrangement a certain element of uncertainty is constantly present. But in practice a law of this kind in the Church, even a merely human one, has, despite its dependence on those who are officials jure divino, an immense stability deriving from the historical situation, public opinion, and the power of custom, factors which still have their influence even upon the minds of popes. For centuries at a time the law of the Spanish kings relating to the nomination of bishops was less threatened – even though it was human law and as such capable of revision – than many of the norms of divine law within the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Church. And over and above this, even in principle this attitude of mistrust towards such human law in the Church is unjustified. In a specific historical situation affecting mankind and the Church merely 'human' law of this kind within the Church can have the force of an absolute moral requirement or even be authenticated as a demand of the jus divinum of the Church. It can have the force of an absolute moral demand, arising from the very nature of the Church, that the abiding character of the Church as the community of free faith, hope, and love shall assume a form appropriate to a particular age precisely in this age and for it. In fact there are innumerable possibilities of juridical pronouncements and decisions by the official authorities of the Church which, though [129] conceivable in terms of the abstract nature of the authority ascribed to the Church's officials, have in fact never been realized because they were not justified even from the moral point of view by the concrete situation and the basic attitudes of the individuals within the Church. Conversely many structures and institutions have imposed themselves even despite any arbitrary decisions – in themselves conceivable – which might have been taken by individuals vested with official authority, even though in themselves such institutions did or do belong merely to the sphere of human law. 1f therefore, we conceive of the clergy and the people of the Church being accorded a more active role and one which is more strongly rooted in law in collaborating with the bishops in arriving at binding decisions, we should not seek to discredit efforts made towards this end from the outset by considering that such collaboration ultimately remains at the mercy of the free arbitrary decision of those in the Church vested with official authority jure divino. Conversely we should not maintain that such collaboration is irreconcilable with the concept of an official authority which is juris divini. This is just as incorrect as it is false to maintain that the choice of a bishop by the people of the Church is necessarily in contradiction to that constitution which belongs to the Church jure divino.

The resistance to such ideas which is fairly clearly being shown by Rome and by the bishops surely stems not so much from an undeclared and ultimately unchristian desire for power, or from some naive attitude of self-assertion, but rather from the fear that the result of such 'democratization' in the Church will be that among the people of the Church as they de facto exist the purity of faith, the truth of the gospel, and the abiding nature of the Church would be exposed to danger. In rejoinder we might of course recall the simple faith and hope that God's grace can ultimately speaking just as well preserve the people of God in the truth of the gospel as popes or bishops, and in fact that it will so preserve them because the people of God belong to the true Church just as vitally as those who hold official positions in it. But even apart from this we still must, on any showing, maintain this: the thesis we have formulated is that from the point of view of dogmatic theology it is perfectly possible for the people of God to have an active part to play, which belongs to them jure humano and as of right, in the decision-making of the bishops (just as in the actual choosing of these). This thesis does not exclude the fact that the bishops ultimately speaking continue to have a right recognized as binding to object to such decisions arrived at in common when they are outvoted in those cases in which the dictates of their consciences warn them that such a decision would damage the purity and integrity of the Christian [130] truth, that unity of the Church which is necessary even at the institutional level, and the union of particular and regional Churches with the pope. A conscience clause of this kind does not from the outset reduce such a decision once more to the level of a mere recommendation. For first there will be many cases of such decisions which in themselves will not be acceptable to a particular bishop or even to the majority of the conference of bishops, yet which nevertheless cannot be rejected by a conscience clause of this kind and so are binding in human law even for the bishops. And a further point which we will be able to make is that even in the secular sphere such cases of conflict can take the form of 'constitutional conflicts', cases of conscience, or emergencies, and can be subject to an ultimate right of veto. And this does not mean that such decisions, arrived at democratically and through parliamentary procedures etc., would from the outset or in all cases, cease to be binding in law. If for instance a law were passed in the parliament of the Federal Republic of Germany and by its government, and, moreover, without any objection on the part of the national constitutional courts, such that this law represented an encroachment on the basic rights of man in some essential respect, then unless we choose to adopt an attitude of absolute juridical positivism, we shall have to say that the individual nevertheless has the moral duty to resist, that such a law would be invalid, and that the true Germany would continue to exist among those participating in this protest. A protest of conscience of this kind on the part of the bishops (at least in those cases in which the entire episcopate came forward in union with the pope) would, on our assumptions, certainly not ipso facto constitute positive law solely in virtue of the decisions of these authorities since in fact ex supposito such law should be enacted by the episcopate and the people of the Church together, and the collaboration of the people of God belongs or can belong to the concrete modes in which the jus divinum of the Church's official authority is realized. But in the eyes of a Catholic ecclesiology a protest of conscience of this kind on the part of the episcopate would constitute an unambiguous sign of the fact that in the concrete case the authoritative body empowered to take the decision, and ex supposito made up of the episcopate and people together, no longer had in any sense that institutional and juridical continuity and identity with the Church which is necessary in order that such a decision may be the legal decision of the Church itself and as such binding in conscience. Thus with the above-mentioned provisos we can surely unreservedly commit ourselves to the following position: with regard to the arrangement whereby all members of a synod are given an active voice in the taking of [131] decisions, these decisions being themselves of their nature decisions of the German Church and not mere recommendations to the episcopate, this arrangement is perfectly reconcilable with the rights which belong to the episcopate jure divino, and might constitute the mode which does most justice to the contemporary situation for realizing in the concrete the rights attached to the episcopal office. We are declaring then without reserve at the level of dogmatic theology that the statute should be formulated in such a way as to give the synod as such the right to take part in the decision-making, and not merely to have an advisory function. But obviously even when we have said this we have still not answered the questions of whether such a formulation is opportune, whether really practicable ways can be found of carrying it out, and of whether it will not possibly turn out to be desirable to describe in more precise detail the subject-matter to be covered by juridical decisions of this kind. Likewise a further question would become still more pressing, that namely of what forms should be used in the election of members of the synod such that they would be chosen 'from below', and in order that these forms clearly would correspond to the nature of the Church, and would not contribute to the synod being composed in a way which would represent a threat to the nature of the Church or the purity of the gospel over and above that threat which all that is human constantly represents for the gospel. If we had really radically Christian and 'integrated' communities which knew who belonged to them, then the question of the forms of election to the synod would probably raise no particular problem. As matters stand today, however, such a problem does exist.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

All these questions belong, however, not to the department of the dogmatic theologian but rather to that of the individual man and Christian of today as such, to that of the pastoral theologian and the canonist, to that presided over by those who have drawn their wisdom from scripture and the history of the Church and yet still remain bold and courageous in outlook. This contribution could only serve as a green light, ensuring that the Church is neither dispensed from nor hindered in the task of creatively shaping its future anew by dogmatic theology and the law actually in force.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[133]

PART TWO

Questions in the Church

[135]

8

WHAT IS A SACRAMENT?

The attempt to answer the question 'What is a sacrament?' within the compass of a brief article will inevitably occasion us some embarrassment. This question has almost two thousand years of history behind it in which fresh answers have constantly been put forward. It has been the subject of controversy among the Christian confessions for many centuries. In view of this, then, what new points shall we have to make about it? We need not go beyond the pages of A. Skowronek's book on the Protestant theology of the sacraments today in order to realize how many different points of view have to be allowed for in treating of this question.[1] E. Schillebeeckx's major work on the sacramental theology of Thomas Aquinas shows clearly that on the Catholic side too we have anything but an official theology of the sacraments which is uniform and accepted on all hands.[2] This means that if we are to attempt in any sense to make a useful contribution to the discussion on the question we have posed it can in the nature of things only take the form of a few observations, chosen somewhat at random. There can never be any question of a comprehensive reply according due weight to all aspects of it.

When we compare the age of the Reformation and the controversial [136] theology ensuing from it with the age of the Fathers and of the Medieval theologians we notice that in the former greater weight was attached to the question of the institution of the sacraments by Christ. One of the arguments used to support the rejection of several sacraments of the Catholic Church was that it could not be established from Scripture that they were instituted by Jesus Christ. The Council of Trent, on the other hand, laid down that all seven sacraments were instituted by Jesus Christ in this sense, and according to established and orthodox ideas in post-Tridentine theology each of the seven sacraments was regarded as having been instituted by the explicit words of Jesus. The situation today, as I see it, so far as the historical question of the institution of the sacraments is concerned, is that both confessions have drawn together to the extent that even the Protestant exegete and theologian will no longer assert with such boldness and apodictic certainty that the institution of baptism and the eucharist in the New Testament goes back to explicit words of institution on the part of the historical Jesus. For the Protestant exegete and theologian, therefore, the situation with regard to the sacraments recognized in the Protestant Churches seems to be in principle no longer so radically different from the situation at which the Catholic exegete and systematic theologian

---

[1] A. Skowronek, Sakrament in der evangelische Theologie der Gegenwart (Munich, 1971). But cf. also the discussion initiated from the Protestant side, with the Catholic viewpoint being put, in M. Köhnlein, Was bringt das Sakrament? Disputation mit Karl Rahner (Göttingen, 1971).

[2] cf. E. Schillebeeckx, De sacramentele heilseconomie. Theologische bezinning op S. Thomas' sacramentenleer in het licht van de traditie en van de hedendaagse sacraments problematiek (Antwerp, 1952). But see also the numerous suggestions by the author, especially The Church and the Sacraments, Quaestiones Disputatae 9 (Edinburgh/London, 1963) and also, in the present volume, 'Considerations on the Active Role of the Person in the Sacramental Event' and 'Introductory Observations on Thomas Aquinas' Theology of the Sacraments in General'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

had previously arrived from his own standpoint with regard to the institution of the other sacraments.[3] My only reason for referring to the new common ground which has thus been gained is in order to make it clear that the theologians of both confessions can and must seek afresh for a common point of departure in investigating the question of the institution and the existence of sacraments in the Christian Church. I believe that this point of departure is the distinctive theological character of the word uttered in the Church as the eschatological presence of God.

[137]

WORD OF GOD AND SACRAMENT

It is in fact correct to say that in Catholic theology, if we abstract from a few attempts in recent years, there has been hardly any developed theology of the word at all. The usual and officially accepted theology does, it is true, include among the various ramifications of fundamental theology, a doctrine of the word of divine revelation. Right down to the Second Vatican Council the approach of fundamental theologians, as upheld in the official and established theology, was to regard this word as the bearer of truths which were 'objective' and correct. Properly speaking it was taken into consideration only to the extent that this word proceeds from the original bearer of revelation. On this showing, then, this fundamental theology of the word can certainly not be regarded as that theology of the word in the absolute which is both necessary and possible today. This is not to deny that the membra disjecta of such a theology are not to be discovered at the most varied points within Catholic theology where they have been latent all along.[4]

A theology of the word in this sense could perfectly well become the basis for a theology of the sacraments in which the sacrament figures as the supreme human and ecclesiastical stage of the word in all its dimensions which has been uttered in the Church as such. One has the impression that in the past word and sacrament have been regarded as two different entities right from the origins, so that the only task for theology is to work out the difference between sacrament and word as clearly as possible.[5] This view has prevailed presumably since Augustine. It then appears chiefly in the controversies between Catholic and Reformation theologians, and even figures not infrequently in Protestant theology. The real position, however, seems to me to be this: we must first recognize clearly what happens to words between men as a result of factors in history and in concrete human living. They are liable to great variations. Furthermore we must work out the essential character of the word uttered in the Church and through the Church as event of grace – in other words as the word which is in principle exhibitive, and, moreover, [138] exists in the Church as the

[3] G. Ebeling, 'Erwägungen zum evangelischen Sakramentenverständnis', Wort Gottes und Tradition (Göttingen, 1964), p. 225, where we find: 'It is peculiar to the sacraments that they draw attention with absolutely penetrating insistence to the basic situation from which the gospel emerged. To suppose that the sacraments necessarily must have had their origins in some explicit act of institution on Christ's part is to interpret the fact that they are rooted in Christ in a sense that is short-sighted and over-rigid. For instance in order to maintain that Jesus is the foundation of the Church it is not absolutely necessary to say that Jesus founded the Church by some explicit act . . . It is the same with the sacraments too. They derive from Jesus in the sense that they bear witness to himself as the summa et compendium evangelii'. cf. also E. Jüngel and K. Rahner, Was ist ein Sakrament?, Kleine ökumenische Schriften 6 (Freiburg, 1971); Das Sakrament — Was ist das? By E. Jüngel, pp. 9-61.

[4] cf. for instance the author's article, 'Priest and Poet', Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 294-317; 'The Word and the Eucharist', ibid. IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 253-286; 'Poetry and the Christian', ibid., pp. 357-367; 'Gottes Wort, den Menschen aufgetragen', Knechte Christi (Freiburg, 1967), pp. 45-56, and also the summarizing presentation on the proclamation of the word in Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie I (Freiburg, 2nd ed. 1970), pp. 237-317.

[5] cf. in this connection H. Fries, Wort und Sakrament (Munich, 1966).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

eschatological presence of God's salvation in the world. We must also recognize that the variability of the human word in general, as due to factors in history and in concrete human living, also applies to this word of the Church and in the Church. Now if we recognize all these factors then we can arrive at a concept of the sacraments in which the sacrament is understood as one quite specific word-event within a theology of the word. Nevertheless such a concept does not reduce the sacrament in its own specific character to the level of any other kind of words, the uttering of which has a justified place within the Church.

It is precisely the Catholic theology of the sacraments which should least of all dispute the fact that the word constitutes the basic essence of the sacrament and that by comparison with the word the 'matter', the elementum has at basis the merely secondary function of providing an illustration of the significance of the word. For the Catholic theology of the sacraments recognizes seven sacraments such that, however strongly we may have to emphasize the intrinsic differences between them, they have a common nature at least in an analogous sense. And yet in the case of matrimony and penance this theology of the sacraments recognizes two sacraments which consist merely in the word. All the speculations of medieval or modern times aimed at preserving a sacramental hylomorphism of matter and form, element and word, even in these two instances fail to escape from a needless splitting of hairs. According to Catholic teaching there are sacraments which are enacted in words alone, and it follows that the true nature of sacrament as such must consist in the word. In no sense, however, does this imply anything against the binding prescriptions governing the use of the element, the matter, in the case of other sacraments for the very reason that as a matter of quite general principle the validity and effectiveness of a word in a social dimension can be dependent upon conditions which are positively laid down to accompany or to be combined with the pronouncing of this word.[6]

A Protestant theology of the sacraments should on a true view really have the fewest objections of all to raise to taking the theology of the word as a point of departure in this sense for the theology of the sacraments. The most recent Catholic theology is actually orientated towards such a point of departure from several different points of view.

From among all such factors prompting us to take the theology of the word as a starting-point in this sense for our theology of the sacraments [139] we may confine ourselves to mentioning three in particular: the question already mentioned in our opening remarks of how we can give an intelligible account of the institution of the sacraments, and above all of those sacraments which are matters of dispute in theology, without coming into conflict with the findings of modern exegesis;[7] the doctrine made explicit in Catholic theology during and since the Second Vatican Council that already in the word itself the proclamation of a genuine presence of the Lord as bringing about salvation is achieved,[8] in other words the word pronounced at the behest of the Church always and in principle has an event character, an exhibitive character; the doctrine of the Church as the basic sacrament of salvation. I would like to enlarge a little on the two last-named ideas in order thereby to indicate at least [6] The thesis that the material element of the sacrament is not the decisive factor is treated of and established at length by the author in 'The Word and the Eucharist', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 253-286.

[7] On this cf. the author's The Church and the Sacraments, Quaestiones Disputatae 9 (Edinburgh/London, 1963).

[8] cf. Conc. Vat. II 'Sacrosanctum Concilium' (Constitution on the Liturgy) no. 7, where we find: '. . . Christ is always present in his Church . . . In the sacrifice of the Mass . . . under the Eucharistic species . . . in the sacraments . . . in his word'; and 'Dei Verbum' (The Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation) no. 2: 'This plan of revelation is realized by deeds and words having an inner unity: the deeds wrought by God in the history of salvation manifest and confirm the teaching and realities signified by the words, while the words proclaim the deeds and clarify the mystery contained in them.' Finally 'Lumen Gentium' (The Dogmatic Constitution on the Church) no. 19, 23 etc., where the proclamation of the gospel assumes pride of place throughout in the teaching of the Church's officials.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the source from which we could probably arrive at a description of the nature of sacrament as such at the level of abstract theory.

THE SAVING CHARACTER OF THE WORD

I believe that it is a conviction common to all Christians, and in the last analysis transcending the differences between the confessions, that the word pronounced in the Church in the name and at the behest of God and Christ has in principle an exhibitive character, that it effects what it signifies, to express it straightway in the formula which is classic to the theology of the sacraments.[9] Obviously this character which the word has in the Church as event and as exhibitive can and must have been instituted at some specific point, and it would be possible to insist that what is involved in this act of institution, in which the character referred [140] to was imparted to the sacrament, is not merely some purely gradual process by which the distinctive qualities were introduced into it. But this would not contradict the thesis enunciated above. On the contrary, the overall 'event' character of the word in the Church regarded as word of God fully admits of further essential distinctions existing between different words which have this status.

This is in fact the case even at the level of secular terminology. Words conveying mere information, words properly belonging to the sphere of human intercommunication, words expressing personal and ultimate decision and imparting it to others etc., share in the single common nature of the human word and yet at the same time differ essentially from one another. But the difference involved here is after all one of degree. The words used have a greater or lesser depth in terms of concrete human living and of radical importance in their implications for society, and so in the various levels of significance which speaker and hearer alike are called upon to enter into when such a word is used. Hence the same can unreservedly be said of that word which the Church utters. The word conveying catechetical information has certainly not the same character as word as that which proclaims the death of the Lord or that which assures the individual in his concrete situation of the forgiveness of his sins. But in any case, so I believe, a point on which Catholic and Protestant theology could agree is that the truly kerygmatic and ecclesiastical word achieves the full realization of its own nature in those cases in which it has an exhibitive character, in which that which it expresses is actually brought about through it, or in which it is addressed to the hearer in ways that bring salvation to him. But what of those cases in which the word used does not have this true character of the Christian word? In such cases, while we can and should speak of a truly Christian word, what is in fact involved is a form of the Christian word which, while it is perfectly legitimate, is nevertheless of a deficient mode. And all such words have the function of preparing for, surrounding, or following from this true word, the exhibitive word of grace, and are orientated to it.[10]

---

[9] On this cf. the author's The Church and the Sacraments, Quaestiones Disputae 9 (Edinburgh/London, 1963), the explanations on the opus operatum. See also O. Semmelroth, 'Opus operatum – opus operantis', LTK VII (Freiburg, 1962), cols. 1184-1186.

[10] The word of God in its full and original sense is not to be conceived of as belonging to the level of instruction in propositional form 'about something', nor merely as pointing in an intentional sense to a state of affairs which for its part is totally independent of this instructional reference. Rather it is to be conceived of as an exhibitive word, a word that renders present. It is in it and through it that the reality designated is first and foremost given, and, moreover, in a relationship of mutual conditioning of such a kind that the word is constituted by the reality which thereby comes to be, and the reality comes to be in that, and because, it reveals itself in this way. All these are points which are established by the author in his article, 'The Word and the Eucharist', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 253-286; but see also Conc. Vat. II 'Dei Verbum' (The Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation), no. 2.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The following point may be noticed in passing: If and to the extent that [141] the Christian community is something more than the mere sum total of the individual Christians who hearken in a spirit of grace and respond to the justifying grace of God, then it must be conceivable at least in principle that a word of God which is, in the strictest sense, exhibitive, and has an 'event' character in this way, is addressed to this single community as such. This consideration could open the way for, and actually lead to, an understanding of the fact that the eucharist can and must be called a sacramental 'word' event not merely or exclusively to the extent that the individual receives the body of the Lord for his own personal salvation, but also to the extent that the proclamation of the presence of the Lord's death as bringing about salvation takes place within the community as such and for it as such. But this is merely in parenthesis.

Evidently it cannot be our task here to establish this 'event' character – in other words this character which the Christian word in the strict sense has as being at basis and essentially sacramental from the theological sources. All that we need say in order to define in the most general terms the general area within Catholic theology where such a proof might be given is this: that apart from grace (at least as offered, albeit perhaps continuing to exist in conditions in which it has been rejected) the word of God as revelation would not really be, or continue to be, the word of God in any true sense at all. Rather it would be degraded to the level of a human word about God, albeit one which might perhaps have been caused by God.'[11] The word of God in the strictest and truest sense, therefore, can exist at all only as an event of grace. Hence it must have an exhibitive character. It must be a saving event. For that grace in which alone it can be hearkened to is at the same time itself the reality of salvation. As we have said, this is not to exclude the fact that there are specific degrees of sharing in the power of this word according to the way in which it is hearkened to in the concrete conditions of human living. To that extent too there are varying ways and varying degrees in which this word itself achieves its own true nature. In the light of this we can understand and take seriously what we are told in the theology of Paul VI too when he speaks boldly and uncompromisingly of a true presence of Christ in the word of preaching.

[142]

THE FUNCTION OF THE CHURCH AS SIGN

We have been speaking of a theology of the word which includes as intrinsic to itself and as its own proper supreme point a theology of the sacraments. A second approach to a theology of this kind is the doctrine of the Church as the basic sacrament of the salvation of the world.[12] For the moment we are not concerned with the relationship in terms of connection, distinction, and subordination in which the Church as basic sacrament stands to Christ as the historical arch-sacrament in whom God's self-utterance as forgiveness and divinization comes to its historical manifestation and its irrevocable fulness, It is in any case an explicit word of the Second Vatican Council, which itself in turn is connected with the patristic theology with its more comprehensive concept of the mysterion and sacramentum, the 'sacrament of unity', the 'sacrament, i.e. sign and instrument of intimate union with God and of the unity of all mankind' (Lumen Gentium no. 1). The Second Vatican Council never [11] On this cf. the author's article, 'Wort Gottes', LTK X (Freiburg, 1965), cols. 1235—1238.

[12] On this cf. O. Semmelroth, Die Kirche als Ursakrament (Frankfurt, 1953); P, Smulders, 'Die Kirche als Sakrament des Heils', De Ecclesia I, G. Baraúna ed. (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 289-321; J. L. Witte, 'Die Kirche "Sacramentum unitatis" für die ganze Welt', ibid., pp. 420-452; E. Schillebeeckx, 'Die Kirche als Dialogsakrament', Gott – Die Zukunft des Menschen (Mainz, 1969), pp. 100-118; idem, 'Die Kirche "Sakrament der Welt"', Gott – Kirche – Welt (Mainz, 1970), pp. 263-269; J. Groot, "The Church as Sacrament of the World" Concilium I/u, (January 1968), pp. 27-34.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

developed in any truly systematic or explicit way the concept of the sacrament of the salvation of the world which is the Church. For this reason it is not very easy to say what precisely is being expressed by this term in the mind of the Council. At best we will have to take as our starting-point the fact that ultimately speaking it is in virtue of her entire reality, and so above all through those factors which belong to her very nature as determinative and constitutive, that the Church constitutes this basic sacrament, and at the same time we shall have to apply to the Church precisely those basic properties which are familiar to us from the official and established theology of the individual sacraments. This latter approach is justifiable if only because the Church is in fact intended to be the sacrament of the salvation of the world and of the unity of mankind as a unity in God which brings about salvation – in other words between the Church on the one hand and salvation and unity on the other a distinction is drawn and at the same time a connection is established which is characterized as 'sacramental', signifying that in the concrete it can consist only in the fact that the Church is the sign in history which brings to manifestation at the [143] historical level, and thereby also 'effects', that will of God towards the world which creates salvation and unity.

This becomes still clearer when we take as our basis the nature of the Church and regard her as fulfilling two roles in one. She is both the proclaiming bearer of the revealing word of God as his utterance of salvation to the world, and at the same time she is the subject, hearkening and believing, to whom that word of salvation of God in Christ is addressed. Thus we regard the Church as the believing one who preaches and as the proclaiming one who believes both in one. In this view of the Church two aspects must be borne in mind. This word of revelation from God sustained by the Church both as proclaimer and as hearer is that which imposes itself as eschatologically irrevocable, unsurpassable and victorious. For it is the word which has not gone forth provisionally and in a manner which can be surpassed on the lips of some prophet, but is rather the ultimate and definitive word which God has pronounced in his own Son as his victorious self-utterance. At an earlier stage we said that for a Catholic theology of the word this word should be understood simply as that which is sustained in grace as the self-communication of God. To this we must now add a further point (to express it in the same scholastic terminology): the word of the gospel is always sustained by a grace which is de facto effective by the power of God and not merely by good will on man's part, at least so far as the world as a whole is concerned, a world to which in Christ not merely an offering of the grace of God is given so as to be simply subject to and made over to the capricious exercise of freedom in this world; rather a grace is bestowed which, however unconscious the individual may be of salvation, predestines the world as a whole to salvation and not to perdition. Finally this word of salvation in the mouth of the believing and proclaiming Church, regarded as a word that is eschatologically victorious, is directed not to the Church but to the world. In the documents of the Second Vatican Council the Church is in fact called the sacrament of the salvation of the world and of the unity of mankind as brought about by grace. The Church neither is nor needs to be conceived of as the holy remnant, consisting exclusively of those predestined to salvation. Rather she is the bearer of that eschatologically victorious word that creates salvation, of the self-utterance of God to the world. And with the Second Vatican Council we can at least say that this eschatological word of grace addressed to the world and sustained by the Church can still be victorious in ways known to God even in those cases in which the individual becomes a believer through this grace of God as proclaimed in this way, despite the fact that throughout his lifetime at the [144] conscious and empirical level this faith of his has not brought him through baptism into union with the Christian Church or Churches as constituting a visible society.

Our findings, therefore, can be stated as follows: in virtue of her faith, which she herself hearkens to in faith and proclaims in the grace of God as eschatologically victorious in Christ, the Church is the sacrament of salvation for the world because she points to and renders

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

present that grace in the world as eschatologically victorious which will never more disappear from the world, and which is insuperable in impelling this world towards the consummation of the kingdom of God, whatever the pitfalls which may lie in its path. This sacramental sign of grace is an effective sign not inasmuch as it would call forth a resolve of God to bestow grace which would not exist without it, but inasmuch as through it precisely this will of God to bestow grace manifests itself at the historical level, and thereby at the same time also renders itself historically irreversible. The general effectiveness of the Church as sacrament, therefore, can be conceived of in the same way as we can reasonably conceive of the effectiveness of the individual sacraments precisely as signs of this kind (though obviously even in officially accepted Catholic theology there are many other theories with regard to the effectiveness of the individual sacraments than that which I have just indicated above, and which, if we want to have a term in which to express it, we might call the real and symbolic effectiveness of the individual sacraments). This means that we can attain to a theology of the exhibitive character of the Christian word from a theology of the Church as sacrament as well, just as, of course, a corresponding line of thought can be developed in the opposite direction.

CONCERNING THE NATURE OF THE SACRAMENTS

On the basis of the considerations put forward above concerning the theology of the word and the Church as sacrament of the salvation of the world we can now surely go on to achieve an understanding of the special quality of the sacraments themselves. They constitute the highest stages in the word of grace in the Church in its character as exhibitive and as event. A word of this kind (this is in fact a point which we have already adumbrated in our foregoing remarks) can be pronounced as the word of grace to the community as such, in other words as that proclamation of the death and resurrection of the Lord which renders present in the community the reality of salvation. It is then called eucharist or Last Supper. [145] This word can be uttered to the individual by the Church and in the Church in situations which are, in the existing conditions, of radical importance in concrete human living. Then – though this is a point which we do not have to develop in detail here – we have the rest of the sacraments which are recognized by the Catholic Church and, moreover, in a sense which we must now go on to say something more about under the heading of the institution of the sacraments by Christ. Such a word has an exhibitive character. It is that word which, from God's point of view, he does not repent of, that word which is effective in itself, which is the manifestation of that effective grace which, from God's standpoint, predestines men to salvation, which is bestowed victoriously upon the world and in principle transcends its resistance. It should therefore be characterized as capable of being refused only to the extent that its nature as eschatologically victorious from God's point of view should not simply or undialectically be thought of as a denial of the possibility of a spirit of lovelessness and unbelief in the individual. In saying this we have ipso facto also expressed that which, in the theology of the sacraments, is signified by the Catholic doctrine of the sacrament as opus operatum. Basically speaking this doctrine expresses nothing else whatever than the victorious power which belongs, from the standpoint of God, to the exhibitive word of faith, which in fact achieves the true fulness of its own nature precisely in the word[13] of the sacrament.

[13] The Mystery of the word (sacramentum) consists, indeed, precisely in the fact that it is effective. The Church as creatura Verbi is based upon its opus operatum. On this cf. the author's article, 'Ekklesiologische Grundlegung', Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie I (Freiburg, 2nd ed. 1970), pp. 121-157, and also ibid., 'Die Sakramente als Grundfunktionen der Kirche', pp. 356-366. A further work which may be found helpful in this connection is A. Winklhofer, Kirche in den Sakramenten (Frankfurt, 1968).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The impression is borne in upon me that by taking the starting-point for a theology of the sacraments indicated above we could also arrive at a solution of the old problem of the institution of the sacraments by Christ in a manner which avoids any great speculative subtleties or any historical improbabilities.[14] With regard to the theory that specific sacraments have [146] a direct historical connection with the pre-Easter Jesus and his words, this is a theory which, for our present purposes, we must neither accept nor deny prematurely. But we can adopt the following simple conclusion: the sacraments in general have been instituted by Christ because and to the extent that the Church as such derives from him.

In my opinion this statement can and must be taken as applying also to those sacraments which, as for instance in the case of the eucharist or even perhaps baptism, have a palpable historical connection with Jesus himself and his explicit words or deeds. For even in the case of sacraments such as these their ultimate nature as opus operatum, as effective, exhibitive word, can be rendered intelligible only in the light of the more general theological considerations indicated above concerning the nature of the Christian word and the Church. Only in a Church of the eschatological [147] word of Christ can the sacraments, which also held a special promise of grace for early Protestantism, be rendered intelligible in a genuinely theological sense precisely in this character which they have as promise. But if we then go on to the further consideration of what great difficulties present-day exegesis, whether from the Catholic or the Protestant side, meets with even with regard to these sacraments, then I cannot really see why we should deny this sacramental and exhibitive character to the rest of the sacraments acknowledged by the Catholic Church so long as there are sacraments in the Church at all. But this is, after all, a conviction common to all Christians.

If I were permitted to formulate one further hypothesis in this connection it would be this one: despite all the numerous difficulties and obscurities in the fields of dogma and the history of theology which go right back to the High Middle Ages and affect the Catholic [14] Right down to the present day theology has failed to come to any unequivocal conclusion as to the precise significance of the expression 'institution by Jesus Christ'. On this cf. H. Lennerz, De Sacramentis Novae Legis in genere (Rome, 3rd ed. 1950); A. Vanneste, 'De instelling van de sacramenten door Christus', Collationes Brugensis et Gandavensis 1(1950), pp. 433-448; K. Rahner, The Church and the Sacraments, Quaestiones Disputatae 9 (Edinburgh and London, 1963), pp. 41-74; M. Schmaus, Der Glaube der Kirche II (Munich, 1970), pp. 279-280. It maybe noticed that both the Council of Treat and the medieval theologians who are the standard witnesses for this are thinking, when they use this term, not of the history but of the effectiveness of the sacraments, and this in itself is enough to show that an historicizing interpretation of the term is unnecessary. On this cf., amongst others, F. Scholz, Die Lehre von der Einsetzung der Sakramente nach Alexander von Hales (Breslau, 1940). There we find on p. 125, with reference to the Council of Trent: 'On the basis of the records which were kept there can be no room for doubt that the Council was confining its attention within the framework of the declarations provoked by the Protestants, and that what it sought to define, and in fact did define, when it spoke of the sacraments being instituted by Christ was intended in the sense of the sacraments being given their force by Christ.' The support of Lugo is invoked in the following further considerations on the subject on p. 126: 'The institution attributed to Christ by the Council, therefore, consists in an interior decree of the Lord whereby the statement of the conditions expressing the causal connection between the enacting of the rite and the imparting of grace achieves its validity. This connection established by the act of institution is valid in itself independently of whether it is in fact posited or recognized at all, if only Christ has effectively caused it. We would therefore actually be justified in saying that the sacraments were instituted by Christ even supposing that the fact that Christ actually had brought them into a conditional mode of existence (causatio in esse condicionato) had never been known to anyone, and supposing no individual sacrament had been conferred, i.e. caused actually to come into concrete existence. We find a similar view in Thomas Aquinas, namely that the sacraments, in virtue of their institution, have the power of conferring grace: 'It seems, therefore, that a sacrament is instituted at that point at which it receives the power to bring about its effect', Summa Theologica III, Q.66 a.2. On the question of the 'historical' institution of matter and form there were different interpretations both before and after Trent. The school of Löwen explicitly invoked the authority of the Council in steadfastly maintaining the thesis of an institutio immediata sed generalis. Word and spirit are ordered to one another to the extent that both have their same historical point of departure in Jesus. Where this can be discerned from our view of the basic living situations actually mentioned in Scripture, there we speak of a sacrament.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Church's awareness of her faith, she has at the Council of Trent defined that there are precisely seven sacraments and no more.[15] It is true that the two sacraments which for Catholics are the sacraments of initiation, namely baptism and confirmation, are, even for the most orthodox Catholic theology, more closely interconnected than the rest of the sacraments. In other words even from this point of view there is a certain lack of precision intrinsic to the doctrine that there are seven sacraments. But let us abstract from this particular difficulty. A further point concerns the sacrament of order. This subsumes within itself a multiplicity of sacramental conferments of office, and it has not even clearly been laid down about these that the Church has not the power to decide what their number and content should be. In other words from this point of view too considerable problems arise in the average officially accepted theology with regard to the number seven. But again let us abstract from this. But apart from all these points we can perhaps even go so far as to say this: without denying that the sacraments derive from Christ the fact that there are seven such radical and exhibitive words of grace in the Church is not simply laid down as given by the authority of the Church alone, but implies an historical decision on the part of the Church herself (albeit one that was arrived at at a very unreflecting level), a decision in which the Church ascribed to these [148] words and to no others that absolute commitment of the Church which is necessary from the very nature of the case for a radical and exhibitive word of grace of this kind called a sacrament. Such a conception does not necessarily imply that the Church either now, later, or from some specific point in the past, could actually have created either more or less such words of grace called sacraments, in which she could actualize her own nature as basic sacrament, applying it to situations in the concrete life of the individual which were crucially important. For it is perfectly conceivable, as I have attempted to explain elsewhere, that the Church, in the linear advance of her history, arrives at irreversible decisions such that she can no longer turn back to her former state prior to taking them.[16] If we assume that what has been merely sketched out above is theologically speaking at least possible, then, I believe, we might achieve a juster and more impartial view of the de facto historical development both of the sacraments and also of the theology of the sacraments than is the case in Catholic theology and history of dogma, which hitherto has had to regard the sacraments as deriving from Christ in a manner which (except in the case of baptism and the eucharist) involves very great historical difficulties. It might perhaps be possible on this basis gradually to resolve and to bury the controversy between the confessions as to the number of the sacraments. A Catholic theology of the sacraments not merely does not need to – it actually must not – deny, as a result of the Council of Trent's decision, that the sacraments when compared with one another differ very essentially in importance among themselves.[17] And a modern Protestant theology which respects its own exegesis and is convinced of the exhibitive character of the word of God in the Church, and of the fact that humanly speaking it is necessarily subject to variations, does not need after all in principle to oppose the idea that in the Church there can be words of the Church to the individual which vary very greatly among themselves and yet have an exhibitive and 'event' character. The existence, meaning, and range of these are naturally to a large extent dependent on the will of the Church which utters them. All these points are, of course, merely indications by which we are attempting to show that in the [15] How in more precise detail we conceive of the number of the sacraments is always dependent on the point of how we define the concept itself. On the various possibilities cf. J. Finkenzeller, 'Die Zählung und die Zahl der Sakramente', Wahrheit und Verkündigung II, Festschrjft M. Schmaus (Munich, 1967), pp. 1005-1033. On the symbolic interpretation of the number seven cf. J. Dournes, 'Why Are There Seven Sacraments?, Concilium I/4 (January 1968), pp. 35-44.

[16] cf. the author's article, 'Reflection on the Concept of "Jus Divinum" in Catholic Thought', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 219-243.

[17] cf. Y. Congar, 'The Idea of "Major" or "Principal" Sacraments', Concilium 1/4 (January 1968), pp. 12-17.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

discussion between the theologies it is by no means so necessary to remain stuck fast in those controversial blind alleys in which we nowadays seem at first sight to find ourselves trapped.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[149]

9

INTRODUCTORY OBSERVATIONS ON THOMAS AQUINAS' THEOLOGY OF THE SACRAMENTS IN GENERAL

Thomas Aquinas has devoted five questions of his Summa Theologica to the doctrine of the sacraments in general.[1] Even from a purely formal point of view the structure of this small treatise appears extremely simple and clear. It opens with the question of the nature of a sacrament. From this it goes on to treat of the reality and necessity of the sacraments in the various sections of saving history. Only then does he come to consider the New Testament sacraments proper, above all under the aspect of the relationship they bear to the grace imparted by them. Thomas speaks here of the instrumental causality of the sacraments in imparting grace, and of the manner in which this instrumental causality is related to God and Christ. In addition to the grace which they cause some of the sacraments also confer a further special effect, that namely of sacramental character, a question to which Aquinas devotes a special exposition at this point. Finally there are certain further causes and conditions to be discussed which are necessary for a sacramental sign to be brought about, whether in its initial institution or in the specific act of conferring it in the concrete. In conclusion one more question has to be investigated, that concerning the number of the New Testament sacraments, as also the way in which they are interconnected. Since Thomas regards the effectiveness of the sacraments as a distinct question in its own right, the doctrine of the sacraments in general, as he approaches it, gives rise to five main themes. Following upon this he then presents his [150] considerations of the individual sacraments in the sequence which he himself has established.[2]

After this general view of Aquinas's presentation of the doctrine of the sacraments in general, and bearing in mind the difficulty of the subject-matter involved, it cannot be regarded as any criticism of Thomas if we feel bound to conclude first and foremost that this initial impression of simplicity and clarity in the structure of the treatise is after all not altogether correct. Indeed the order in which the individual themes are developed, and above all the internal arrangement of them into a series of articles, turns out to be problematical. Nor does it make any difference to this fact to find that the beginning of the treatise, represented by the first two questions, is wholly convincing. For here the sacraments are presented in a context of general anthropology (as we might call it). Yet the first point that is spoken of is the character of the sacraments as signs and, as a concomitant of this, their setting in saving history (we might almost speak of a general perspective of history of religion). For in fact such signs, in their nature and existence, are not confined to the New Testament age of salvation.

Admittedly as the exposition continues from this point onwards the development of ideas in it becomes less clear. For one thing the place assigned to many of the articles is far from convincing. And again the overall context within which this or that individual subject is treated of seems disproportionately broad. Moreover ideas which are quite disparate are set

[1] cf. Summa Theologica III, Qq. 60-65. But see also St Thomas Aquinas, Opusculum 5 (De articulis fidei et Ecclesiae sacramentis). [It subsequently served as a model for the 'Decretum pro Arrneniis' at the Council of Florence; cf. DS[34] 1310-1328.] We should notice A. Ferland's work, Commentarius in Summam D. Thomae – 'De Gratia. De sacramentis in communi' (Montreal, 1938).
[2] cf. Summa Theologica III, Q. 65, art. 2.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

side by side.[3] But surely the ultimate reason for this lack of clarity, over and above all these others, is the fact that the relationship between the 'sign' function[4] and the instrumental causality[5] of the sacraments as Thomas presents them is not fully thought out in its ultimate significance. Yet it is emphasized that both aspects belong to the sacrament. The first represents a further extension of the ancient theological tradition of Augustine, and the second – probably developed more by Aquinas himself – is designed to overcome a danger which – it is evident – Thomas himself clearly recognized, the danger, namely, that the sacraments themselves might be regarded merely as sheer external manifestations of an event of grace which in itself is totally independent of these signs.

[151] These, then, according to Aquinas, are the two basic aspects under which we have to view the sacraments. Yet in his own treatment the precise connection between them has still not been conveyed in an adequate manner. Hence his presentation of the duality of these two aspects has subsequently led to the most varied interpretations of his doctrine as to the nature and effectiveness of the sacraments. These variations in interpreting Thomas' doctrine have followed almost perforce according to whether the one aspect or the other has been regarded as the predominant one. But this is a point which cannot be entered into in any greater detail here.[6]

It is true that even on this doctrine of the sacraments in general a modern theologian will derive great profit from the work of Thomas Aquinas.[7] But there is no need for him to refuse to recognize that in this work much remains unsaid which nowadays calls for explicit and extensive consideration in the doctrine of the sacraments. In the present context we must take up some of these points and throw them into stronger relief.

It must be remembered that the Summa Theologica of Thomas Aquinas does not include any developed ecclesiology, and that the treatise on the sacraments follows immediately upon that of christology, which is itself included only at relatively late stage. In view of these facts it is of course impossible for there to be any really effective treatment of the Church as [152] 'basic sacrament'[8] as a distinct theme. This inevitably has a damaging effect on the doctrine of the sacraments in general too, for the connecting member, so to say, is missing. Or to put it in other terms: the truly ecclesiological dimension of the sacraments is not taken into consideration. Even at those points at which Thomas interprets sacramental character as

[3] We might, for instance, conceive of art. 4 of Q. 65 equally well as an article of Q. 61. For instance the fact that the treatment of sacramental character occupies six articles seems disproportionate. We may also compare the very disparate themes discussed in Q. 64 etc.

[4] On this above all Q. 60.

[5] On this above all Q. 62.

[6] On this cf. E. Schillebeeckx, De sacramentele heilseconomie. Theologische bezinning op S. Thomas' sacramentenleer in het licht van de traditie en van de hedendaagse sacramentsproblematiek (Antwerp, 1952); idem, De Christusontmoeting als sacrament van de Godsmoeting (Antwerp, 1957); E. Fritsaert, 'La definition du sacrement dans S. Thomas', Nouv.Rev. Th.. 55 (1928), pp. 401-409; J. Menessier, 'Les réalités sacrées dans le culte chrétien d'après S. Thomas', Rev. Sc.Ph. Th. 20 (1931), pp. 276-286, 453-471; M. Gierens, 'Zur Lehre des hl. Thomas über die Kausalität der Sakramente', Scholastik 9 (134), pp. 321-345; A. M. Hoffmann, 'Der Begriff des Mysteriums bei Thomas von Aquin', Div.Th. (Fribourg, Switzerland) 17 (1939), pp. 30-60; B. Brazzarola, La natura della grazia sacramentale nella dottrina di S. Tommaso (Grottaferrata, 1941); H. Dondaine, 'La définition des sacrements dans la Somme théologique', Rev.Sc.Ph.Th. 31 (1947), pp. 213-218; P. B. Garland, The Definition of Sacrament According to St Thomas (Ottawa, 1959); O. Semmelroth, Vom Sinn der Sakramente (Frankfurt, 1960); J. M. R. Tillard, 'La triple dimension du signe sacramentel. A propos de Summ. Theol. III, 6o, 3', Nouv.Rev.Th. 83 (1961), pp. 225-254. But see also the various studies by the author, especially in the present volume, 'What is a Sacrament?' and 'Considerations on the Active Role of the Person in the Sacramental Event'.

[7] On this cf. merely the studies of the author in Vol. XJII of this series, 'Homage to Thomas Aquinas' and the attempt at a dialogue on material points in 'The Truth in Thomas Aquinas'.

[8] On this cf. Conc. Vat. II, 'Sacrosanctum concilium' (The Constitution on the Liturgy), nos. 5 and 26.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

deputing the subject concerned to the Christian cult,[9] and at which, as a result, there is a suggestion of an ecclesiological view of the sacraments, the Church is still not clearly included as a vital factor. For as Aquinas presents it this Christian cult is precisely viewed too much as a task of the individual functionary officially appointed in each case.

Obviously the theological tradition of the Church has right from the outset included many statements about the word of God as proclaimed by the Church and its effectiveness in imparting grace. But this is still far from saying that there is any explicit or systematic theology on the subject. Hence in the theology of the sacraments too the unity and the distinction between word and sacrament remain ultimately obscure.[10] It would do no harm if we were to regard the doctrine of the sacraments in general as one quite specific section of the theology of the word of God and its exhibitive force.[11] For then we would understand the sacraments as those words in which that which is expressed by them is rendered present by this expression itself when these words are addressed by the Church as basic sacrament to the individual man with a radical commitment as the irreversible and historical presence of the grace of God to him. But so far as Thomas Aquinas is concerned this connection between a theology of the word and a theology of the sacraments still remains wholly in the background. In drawing attention in this way to the limitations of a great theologian such as Thomas we are not in any sense detracting from his greatness or his relevance for today.[12] All we are doing, rather, is to point out that there is something further, extending beyond the works of Aquinas, which should not simply be forgotten: the still greater riches of the whole theological tradition as well as the tasks which confront the [153] theology of today, and which could not possibly have emerged into relevance in the thirteenth century.

Introductory observations such as these cannot have the function of providing a direct commentary on the text of Aquinas. Such a commentary would have to present first and foremost in the form of explanations everything which can be gleaned from the text itself. As we have already said above, the purpose of these observations is quite different, They are intended to draw attention to certain points, aspects, and dimensions in Thomas Aquinas' teaching on the sacraments in general which would not be recognized clearly enough on a simple reading, but which must not be overlooked by any modern theologian in the use he makes of the teachings of Aquinas. In this connection what we are concerned with is not so much to provide a full or comprehensive treatment as to present a few random examples and starting-points, and so to afford fresh insights and to habituate our readers to an approach which is indispensable if we are to take due account of the work both of Thomas Aquinas and of tradition in general in a way which is necessary and fruitful even today.

Right at the beginning of these observations[13] Aquinas makes it clear that according to his convictions the primary and most radical point of departure for our understanding of the sacraments is to be found in the concept of 'sign' and so of 'symbol'. This is a point which must not be forgotten precisely when in his subsequent treatment of the New Testament sacraments Thomas goes on to emphasize their instrumental causality.[14] This causality, which is described only in very formal terms, is not to be interpreted as a causality added on ab externo to the (eschatological) signs of the New Testament, but rather as a power of [9] cf. Q. 63.

[10] This remains valid despite some isolated indications to the contrary in Thomas. cf. e.g. Q. 60, art. 6.
[11] On this cf. the author's study in the present volume, 'What is a Sacrament?' and also 'Considerations on the Active Role of the Person in the Sacramental Event'.
[12] On this cf. the author's study in Theological Investigations XIII, 'Homage to Thomas Aquinas'.
[13] cf. Q. 60, art. I. From this point onwards we shall normally be following the development of ideas as presented by Thomas Aquinas in the five questions. From time to time we shall include notes to contribute to a wider orientation for those interested.
[14] On this cf. Q. 62.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

originating which belongs to these signs as radical acts of self-realization on the part of the Church as being of her very nature (as sign) the eschatological basic sacrament.

It is noteworthy that right from the outset St Thomas presents the seven sacraments (in the proper sense) within a broader context of religiously symbolic realities, and thereby from the outset prevents them from being isolated in a sense which would be unjustified both from the point of view of Christian religious practice and from that of the history of religion. Man is in principle always he who achieves his innermost relationship with God in and through the religious symbol.

[154] A further point which is of basic theological importance is the threefold orientation of the sacramental sign. The sacrament of the New Covenant is signum rememorativum, demonstrativum, and prognosticum. Here the modern theology of the future, of promise, of hope, might find a starting-point in Thomas Aquinas in its aim to integrate within itself the idea of the sacraments precisely as signs of eschatological promise and hope.

But this would also serve to bring to light the task of evaluating the sacraments still more effectively in their special quality from the point of view of the unity of man's nature as composed of body and spirit.[15] Yet at the same time we would have to pay due heed too to the human word as res sensibilis, if only so as to achieve a true appreciation of specific sacraments, such as those of penance and matrimony, within the general framework of this conception. These sacraments are in fact conferred through words alone without any 'element' distinct from and supplementary to the words themselves.

A further point which might be re-expressed in terms of present-day problems,[16] and which would call for consideration here, would be the historical contingency of the concrete sacramental signs, which despite the fact that they are mere representations, are nevertheless binding for each individual according to the particular stage of development in the history of mankind to which he belongs.

Following the development of Aquinas' ideas, we should then emphasize the intrinsic mutual interrelationship which exists between the ritual actions and the word, for it is in virtue of this that the factor of ritual is from the outset inserted into the dimension of history as well, and does not merely belong to that of nature.

The unity of word and sacramental 'element' (including gestures) is made particularly plain in Thomas by means of a sacramental 'hylomorphism'. Yet this conception also has all the disadvantages which have arisen in the course of time and which are entailed in an excessively physical understanding of such a hylomorphism. In the light of this a certain reserve is advisable for the modern theologian, though in the same connection he will certainly gladly take cognizance of certain points of departure for an approach through linguistic philosophy.[17]

The following considerations of Thomas might be taken as a starting-point [155] for a theology of the history of the Church which might serve to enable us to understand the factors of continuity and distinction in the history of the sacraments. As a matter of historical fact the sacraments have in the past undergone an extraordinary number of changes in their rites, the place they occupy in Christian life, and the theological interpretations placed upon them, so that precisely today there are many who feel themselves disquieted and deprived of their security when they discover this fact.

The anthropological arguments for the necessity of the sacraments as seen by Thomas should serve to warn us not to be too one-sided in regarding these as depending solely on a positive act of institution by Christ. Such an act of institution itself in turn presupposes those [15] On this cf. the author's study in Theological Investigations XIII, 'The Truth in Thomas Aquinas', where he treats explicitly of the body-spirit constitution of man and its significance for knowledge.

[16] On this cf. Q. 60, art. 5.
[17] On this cf. Q. 60, art. 7 ad 2 and ad 3.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

grounds which Thomas sets forth in their own right.[18]

The force of the arguments in the ensuing development of ideas[19] is somewhat questionable when compared with the first ratio which Thomas had previously presented. But in any case a more significant effect of Aquinas' presentation is to suggest that we should view the sacraments within the totality of the history of religion in general as well as within the universal history of salvation, the central point of which is Christ himself. This naturally suggests the idea that in other places too and at other periods within the history of religion, i.e. outside the New Testament revelation, analogates to the Christian sacraments may be discovered. But to return to the Christian sacraments proper. They are interpreted as signa protestantia fidem, i.e. a unity becomes discernible within the duality such that – as early as the writings of St Paul – justification is attributed sometimes to faith and sometimes to baptism. Faith is the deciding factor. The sacrament is the proclamation (obviously in an exhibitive sense) of this faith.

The article which now follows is, in Aquinas' conception, one of the most important ones.[20] Thomas is right when on the one hand he presents the sacraments as being 'in a certain manner' a cause of grace and on the other simultaneously qualifies this causality, which he cautiously accepts as affirmed by tradition, as merely instrumental in character. But this instrumental causality is not interpreted on the basis of the sign itself, and the instrumental causality as such also remains at a very formal level. As the subsequent history of theology shows, it is still open to the most varied interpretations. The axiom that Thomas formulates in this [156] connection, efficiunt quod figurant, is a fine one, but one which surely calls for considerable further thinking out.

In this connection in Thomas' presentation[21] a good point of departure is offered from which we could cease to regard the individual sacraments merely as designed to meet particular situations in Christian living, but would also interpret them precisely as manifestations ('signs') of basic acts in which the fulness of Christian existence is achieved in the visible and manifest life of the Church. For the grace which they signify is no abstract grace, but rather the human radicality and the divine depths of those acts in which the fulness of human existence itself is achieved.

What follows basically speaking represents merely a translation of the ideas of Hugo of St Victor according to which the sacraments contain grace as in a 'vessel' into the demythologizing language, so to say, of Aquinas.

In this connection the concept of instrumental causality is still further developed, though on a true reading there is still a failure to reach beyond the formal abstraction of the concept of instrumental causality. We must guard against an excessively 'physical' interpretation of the 'virtus' together with its 'esse transiens' which is conferred in the sacrament by God as the true cause of grace. But the question now arises of how the Christian sacraments impart 'objective redemption', i.e. render it present in the achievement of the fulness of existence on man's part as sustained by grace. The key word here is the humanitas Christi as the instrument of redemption which is united with the Godhead. Yet this should not be interpreted as though it were merely the 'glorified Lord' who was referred to, or as though we did not also at the same moment have to think of the crucified and risen Lord in his place in concrete history. Only so long as we keep clearly in mind the identity between the historical and the glorified Lord can the instrumental causality of the humanity of Christ be conceived of as an effective element for communicating grace through the mediation of the sacraments, and only so can we avoid falling into an incomprehensible 'ideology'.

[18] On this and on what follows cf. Q. 61, art. 1ff.
[19] Here we are treating of Q. 61, art. 2.
[20] On this cf. Q. 62, art. 1ff.
[21] cf. Q. 62, art. 2.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But this in itself indicates an expansion leading to a whole theology of the history of salvation with its unity, with the essential difference between its various sections, with the special eschatological quality of the 'new and eternal covenant' in which alone, in virtue of this special quality which it has, the sacraments can constitute an opus operatum (i.e. a promise of his grace on God's part which from his point of view is eschatological, and of which he will not 'repent').

[157] Sacramental character was subsequently defined at the Council of Trent, and the interpretation of it as a deputatio ad cultum is reasonable and has, moreover, come to a large extent to win general acceptance in the theology subsequent to Thomas. But we should still avoid any excessive separation of this sign in the 'soul' from the sensibile sacramentum. For unless we do this, according to Thomas Aquinas too it would in fact no longer have any 'sign' character. In the same way, in order to do justice to the earliest theological tradition concerning sacramental character we should not overlook the ecclesiological dimension of this sign. Character in fact imparts a quite specific place and function to its subject in the visible Church as worshipping community. Properly speaking, character is 'invisible' only in the sense in which other social relationships too are not simply visible in a direct sense and capable of being verified by our eyes.

If sacramental character is interpreted as a commissioning to divine worship according to the rites of Christianity, then obviously it also implies a 'spiritual power'. Admittedly it is noteworthy that Thomas uncompromisingly regards this divine cult itself in turn as consisting either in the reception of a gift from God or as the further transmission of such gifts to other men – in other words as itself in turn an act of God in relation to us.

The development of ideas which follows can be interpreted as a doctrine of the universal priesthood of all Christians as consisting in a participation in the eternal priesthood of Jesus Christ. In this way the universal priesthood of the Lord will not have to be interpreted as something that is derived in a weakened form from the priesthood of the official ministry of the clergy.

This will lead to emphasis being laid on the dynamic, 'operative', and functional characteristics of the sacraments, as well as on the grace bestowed in them, and upon the sacramental character in relation to these characteristics. As a general approach for our understanding of the further arguments developed by St Thomas we may recommend the recognition that the freedom of man as an historical factor still in process of achievement in time is already comprehended by the eschatologically definitive decree of God for man. This will lead on to a further and connected idea concerning the more recent theology of marriage. It regards the indissolubility of the marriage bond as an abiding promise of divine grace, and recognizes in this that marriage bears a certain resemblance to those sacraments which imprint a character.

After these very particular developments the next line of argument [158] returns once more to the central point. Here Thomas throws into relief the absolute sovereignty of God's grace even in the sacraments, and rejects in unmistakable terms any kind of magical interpretation of this sign as misconceived, as well as any kind of clericalism such as might represent a threat to the immediacy of man to God. Thomas does in fact again and again pose questions to himself even though his answers frequently – and in this case too – remain at a very formal level. So far as the historical question is concerned of the institution of the sacraments by Jesus Christ (as the Council of Trent has defined it for all the sacraments), and of the precise form and manner in which this would have taken place, obviously no such answer can be adduced even in broad outline. If we come to speak, in connection with this question, of the rejection of Donatism, then we should avoid any ill-considered transition from the dispenser of the sacrament to its recipient. For the true effect of the sacraments as conferring grace is achieved in the case of the adult only in a genuine personal belief and in an actual disposition of love on the recipient's part. The doctrine that the personal dispositions of the conferrer of a sacrament too should be in conformity with his sacramental act does in fact ultimately show too that the Church taken as a whole, in which, under certain circumstances, sacraments can be conferred even by sinners, not only should be, but actually is holy, i.e. taken as a whole it never lacks that grace, the basic sacrament of which is the Church itself in the world.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

St Thomas then goes on to remind us of a principle[22] which it is all too easy to overlook again and again, and which may remain unheeded both in theory and practice: God has not attached his power to the sacraments in such a way that he could not also impart the effects of sacramental grace even without the sacraments themselves. Now taking this as our starting-point we can adopt an approach to the entire theology of the sacraments which is the opposite of that usually envisaged. According to this, what is brought to effective manifestation in the dimension of the Church in the sacraments is precisely that grace which, in virtue of God's universal will to save, is effective everywhere in the world where man does not react to it with an absolute denial.[23] Thomas is further concerned to reconcile the objectivity of the sacrament as opus operatum with the recognition that if ever the sacrament ceased to constitute a personal [159] act and at the same time (which does not imply any opposition) an act of the Church as society, and, moreover, in relation to its conferrer as well, it would be reduced to mere magic. He then takes up once more his anti-Donatist defence of the objective validity of the sacrament, and it is here that we find the statement that the conferrer of a sacrament 'acts in the person of the Church as a whole'. In this it is the nature of the sacraments precisely as factors in the life of the Church as a society that achieves clear and forcible expression, still more clearly than if Thomas was speaking only of the fact that the conferrer acts as an instrument of Jesus Christ. It is noteworthy too that Thomas envisages only the case of heretical baptism in which the sacrament is valid indeed but does not impart any grace. Today we would surely regard the other case as the normal one.

In his considerations Thomas Aquinas can assume as already given the development, in the history of dogma within the Church, which had led to the conscious distinguishing of the true sacraments as contrasted precisely with other ecclesiastical rites, and thereby too to the fact that they are seven in number. Against this background he finds ready to hand a speculative argument ex convenientia in support of this idea. Yet it cannot be denied that the place thereby assigned to the Eucharist among the other sacraments is such as to reduce it too much to the same level as they, and that an unbalanced view of the importance of marriage is arrived at whereby it is regarded merely as a means to counter concupiscence and to promote human reproduction. But even of Thomas it must be said on the one hand that he cannot really transcend his age or his environment, while on the other that he cannot say everything whatsoever that deserves mention.

For the rest the further points to be found in the text of Aquinas are wholly convincing only if we have already taken as established beyond question the traditional sequence of the sacraments. In any case Thomas is fully aware of the problems arising from the fact that we subsume, and reduce to a single uniform level, under the concept of 'sacrament' ways in which the Church achieves the fulness of her own nature which essentially differ from one another.[24] It may be observed that in the case of [160] baptism Thomas says that it is

[22] cf. Q. 64, art. 7.

[23] cf. on this the various studies by the author including in their titles the key term 'anonymous christian', and in the present volume, 'Observations on the Problem of the "Anonymous Christian"' and the literature there adduced.

[24] Obviously the only case in which the concept of 'sacrament' can justifiably be described as reducing all to the same level is if it is regarded and used in an explicitly univocal and horizontal sense and reduced to a few purely formal characteristics. But if we include in our view of it a reference to its origins and its history, then we arrive at the idea that the manifestation of Jesus Christ was itself a sacrament, that the Church as a whole is a

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

necessary for salvation only in a conditional sense when he is treating of the baptism of adults, even though he holds the opinion (which is nowadays disputed) that for the immature it is necessary for their salvation in an absolute sense.

These brief and almost catalogue-like observations arising from a reading of Thomas Aquinas' arguments on the doctrine of the sacraments in general provide, it is true, no more than indications, and do little to complete the picture. Yet we can perhaps precisely on this account offer a useful key and a line of approach which promises to be fruitful – not merely for the text of Aquinas but also for the questions which have been mentioned.

---

sacrament in the sense of a sign effecting salvation. Since the Second Vatican Council an explanation seems to have been arrived at even in conceptual terms which it is helpful to keep firmly before our eyes in order to retain a more comprehensive and more appropriate view of the sacrament as such and of the concrete sacraments in particular. According to this Jesus Christ is to be appealed to as the 'arch-sacrament' while the Church is to be characterized as the 'basic sacrament', so that its derived character is made clear. But the idea of the Church as sacrament is of basic importance in its turn for the individual sacraments conferred within the Church, which hitherto have constituted the almost exclusive, and in many ways isolated, subject-matter of the doctrine of the sacraments in dogmatic theology. For the indications provided by the Second Vatican Council see n. 8.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[161]

10

CONSIDERATIONS ON THE ACTIVE ROLE OF THE PERSON IN THE SACRAMENTAL EVENT

In the considerations which follow we shall be examining the active role of the person in the conferring of the sacraments. We shall, of course, be including within our purview all those sacraments in which the full consciousness and living faith of the subject is engaged in his act of receiving them. In practice, therefore, only infant baptism will remain outside the scope of our present considerations. However, since the theme is so broad in scope, we shall concentrate chiefly on the Eucharist. Here the distinction between the sacrificial act and the reception of the sacrament will be left in the background. Yet for our present purposes the Eucharist is taken as representative of all the sacraments. One who is theologically educated can easily apply our statements about the Eucharist and the points which apply first and foremost to it to the other sacraments, each according to its special character, and there is no necessity to provide a special exposition of this in each particular case. While, therefore, we are treating explicitly of the Eucharist, our remarks are intended to apply to all the sacraments.

We have set ourselves to state, to justify, and to elucidate certain principles, and to show them to be orthodox in terms of dogmatic theology. This implies something like an application of a Copernican approach[1] to the general conception of the sacraments, consisting in an [162] intellectual and spiritual movement of the sacramental event outwards to take effect in the 'world', and backwards in a spiritual movement leading from the world to the sacrament. This way of putting it may sound somewhat grandiose, and is presumably still not wholly comprehensible. The whole of the considerations which follow are intended to contribute towards an elucidation of this initial statement. Only so can the religious significance of this 'Copernican application' effectively be rendered intelligible. In this connection we are of course aware that in order to clarify our special concern we must in some respects simplify, and must separate and draw contrasts between realities which in concrete life always exist in unison, albeit in varying proportions and with some more apparent than others.

THE OLD MODEL: SACRAMENT AS ISOLATED ENCOUNTER WITH GOD

How does the average Catholic Christian feel about a sacrament as he customarily receives it? We might describe this act of receiving (though of course with the provisos already mentioned) as follows: the Christian feels that he lives in a secular world. He is aware that his life in this world is subject to commandments of God which are difficult to fulfil. He is aware of being summoned by God and set upon a course which leads him out of this present life through the gates of death and beyond into the eternity of God. He has to maintain union with [1] This special approach has to be applied within the context of a distinction which is fundamental for any sacramental theology, the distinction namely between the sacrament itself and the effectiveness of grace in personal life. To clarify this cf. also, therefore, the following articles by the author: 'Personal and Sacramental Piety', Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore, 1963), pp. 109-133; 'The Eucharist and Suffering', ibid. III (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 161-170; 'Formale Grundstrukturen der Heilsvermittlung', Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie 11/I (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1966), pp. 55-79. Similarly E. Schillebeeckx, De sacramentele heilseconomie (Antwerp, 1952); idem, Christus – Sakrament der Gottbegegnung (Mainz, 1960).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

God, his true future and the law-giver presiding over his life even in the present. He passes to and fro from this secular world into a sacral sphere a 'fanum' or 'temple'. It is only here (and in a true sense exclusively here, so far as his personal feelings are concerned, whatever his head may tell him from its stock of theological knowledge) that it is possible to achieve any real encounter with God in which this God meets him not merely as making moral demands upon him but as sanctifying him and bestowing grace and strength upon him. This is achieved precisely in the sacraments and above all by holy Mass in the Eucharist. In these sacraments God's actions upon humanity touch the individual as it were from without, penetrate him, sanctify him, and transform him (at least carrying these processes a stage further, although for the most part the effects are experienced as very transitory and in a sense peripheral). Here man encounters God and Jesus [163] the Lord so that afterwards he can (ideally speaking) be sent by him to go forth once more into a secular world, there to pursue his monotonous everyday duties in a certain sense remote from God. Here in the sacrament (as in no other circumstances) man achieves closeness and union with God. Here he has left the secular world behind him. Here, and in a true sense here alone, that takes place which renders life meaningful and 'religious' (i.e. united to God).

In the achievement of Christian living is such a viewpoint really the only possible one in the light of our understanding of the Christian faith – a viewpoint in which the sacramental event constitutes the true apogee of Christian living? This can be doubted and indeed denied. But in denying it we are not rejecting the legitimacy of this common conceptual model of the place which the Eucharist and the sacraments have in general in our lives. What we are rejecting, rather, is the idea that we are compelled to accept this viewpoint as the only possible one. We can also 'experience' the sacraments in a quite different way.

We may begin by stating quite freely that the earlier conceptual model we have described is nowadays much under attack. Modern man's awareness of reality is such (it makes no difference whether this in itself should be subjected to critical questioning or whether it is anything but an absolute norm) that the sacraments as taken in this sense are all too easily thought of as religious rites which bypass the dimension of 'real reality' or 'real life'. The sacraments fall under the suspicion of being empty ritualism, so that it is only in terms of an ideology which is nowadays difficult to achieve or to maintain that they can be felt as important or as an effective force in human life. In this conceptual model we all too easily receive the impression that the sacraments, the Mass, are 'useless', that they are incapable of bringing about any real effects in human life, that after Mass everything goes on as before and as it would go on even without Mass. If the 'religious man' attributes 'consolation' and strengthening to his religious experiences, which after all he undergoes in receiving the sacraments, then the less 'religious' man will reflect that the other is fleeing from the harsh realities of life into an ideological world of unreality, albeit one of a psychic unburdening, and that this world of unreality on the one hand does nothing to alter the 'realities' of life while on the other it endures only so long as we fail to see through the psychic mechanisms and techniques involved in such 'consolation'. And if we are then called upon to 'take out with us into our everyday life' the sacrifice of Christ, to let the sacraments take effect in our lives, then this is merely to set up a moral norm and obligation the powerlessness of which is something [164] from which it is sought to flee precisely through the sacraments. For (on this view) it is not the sacraments which carry the individual out into life by their power, but rather the individual himself who must carry them out into life by his own new moral strivings to meet and so to fulfil the claims of morality which they make upon him. That which we experience as their power is in reality the, special new moral striving which we regard as required of us in order to fulfil their ideals. More acutely than in former times we have the feeling that the numerical frequency of our reception of the sacraments does not ipso facto have any true religious significance (even when it is undertaken with good will) unless

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

we regard the reception of the sacraments as being itself in turn a 'good work', the value of which increases ipso facto according to the number of times it is repeated, in which case we are running counter to the intrinsic meaning of the sacraments themselves.[2] The present-day tendencies, even within the Catholic sphere, towards a 'desacralization' of Christianity and of Christian living may in many respects be false or questionable. But in any case they do produce unease with regard to sacral and sacramental activities. With regard to the statement of the Second Vatican Council that the Mass constitutes the supreme point of Christian living it may be doubted whether, even if we confine ourselves to serious Christians only, this ipso facto expresses their real attitude of mind.[3]

It is not only fashionable tendencies towards 'secularization' of one kind or another that nowadays represent a threat to the free use of the sacraments. A far more basic danger is represented by that recognition, which is nowadays becoming clearer, of the difference between a genuine and authentic achievement of human living on the one hand and our conceptual models of, and reflections upon it at a secondary level on the other. What do we mean by this? If, for instance, someone prays: 'O God I will love you with my whole heart. This is my conscious, free, and unconditional decision', then surely everyone will admit that even in any genuine and well-intentioned declaration (in prayer etc.) of this kind the individual concerned is still far from really loving God 'with his whole heart'. By a process of objectification he has, in his own conscious reflections, constructed a conceptual or verbal model of a whole-hearted love [165] of this kind, and has also in some sense affirmed it. But this replica of whole-hearted love is not the whole-hearted love itself. For this latter (if it is present at all) is achieved at a more basic level seeing that freedom is more basic than the reflective concept of it by which we name it (even when we may be seeking to achieve it). A further point is that even at its more basic level freedom is far from being empowered at every moment of the individual's personal history to achieve that towards which it is of its very nature orientated: radically to control the total and ultimate reality of the person in all dimensions in such a way as to determine its final and irrevocable state. Now of their very nature the acts in which we receive the sacraments are attempts, as a matter of the radical decision of our freedom, in a spirit of love and from our whole hearts to orientate ourselves irrevocably to God. Yet precisely in the light of his experience of the nature of freedom, which always remains ultimately beyond the scope of any conscious manipulation on the part of the subject, modern man feels himself beset by problems in his reception of the sacraments precisely when this takes place very frequently and without any special reference to the unfolding process of freedom in the true sense and the kairos it contains, which it is not given to the subject to decide upon at will. Modern man all too easily has the impression of acting ungenuinely and even dishonestly, and precisely in those cases in which this reception of the sacraments is related excessively and exclusively from the outset to the individual's own personal saving history taken in isolation. For in this act of receiving the sacraments it is not always possible for something particularly decisive to take place such as can be readily brought to fruition through the ritual celebration of a sacrament. Evidently such problems are not fully disposed of by that factor which we are seeking to treat of here, namely the broadening of the awareness of the recipient of the sacraments so as to view saving history within world history as a whole or by relating them in faith to that grace which constitutes the dynamic force and the entelecheia of this whole saving history, drawing the individual man

[2] The author has already discussed this question at length elsewhere. Cf. Die vielen Messen und das eine Opfer, Quaestiones Disputatae 31 (Freiburg im Breisgau, 2nd ed., 1966); 'Messopfer und Jugendaskese', Sendung und Gnade (Innsbruck, 4th ed., 1966), pp. 148-183; 'The Meaning of Frequent Confession of Devotion', Theological Investigations m (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 177-189.

[3] On this cf. the author's article, 'Das Gebet des Einzelnen und die Liturgie der Kirche' in Gnade als Freiheit (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1968), pp. 101-112.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

into this history and shaping its own manifestation in the sacramental sign within the individual life. Nevertheless these problems are diminished and made easier to solve if the recipient of the sacrament is conscious from the outset of being drawn into this 'cosmic' history of grace.

[166]

A NEW MODEL: USING THE WHOLE OF LIFE TO BRING THE SACRAMENT TO ITS FULNESS

But is there another view of the Eucharist and of the sacraments? Yes there is. It is based upon the simple fact of dogmatics that that which we call sanctifying grace and divine life is present everywhere where the individual does not close himself to God who creates salvation by a real and culpable denial, and further on the fact that in a real sense, albeit to some extent unconsciously, this grace is brought about and made manifest in the concrete conditions of history and of human life wherever men live and die so long as this life of theirs has not come to imply mortal guilt. We have no intention here of developing, justifying, or defending this fact of dogmatics in any greater detail here.[4] All that we shall do is to elucidate it in its further implications for an understanding of the sacraments that either has been, or is to be transformed, and that too as concretely as possible.

GOD'S GRACE AS CREATING SALVATION AT THE ROOTS OF HUMAN EXISTENCE

The world is permeated by the grace of God. The sacraments are specific events of God's grace as forgiving, sanctifying, and imparting the divine nature. But while they have this significance this does not mean that it is solely in the moment of the sacramental act that the grace of God impinges upon a world that is secular and devoid of grace as from without, as though it sought to penetrate this world and, in the very act of so seeking, gradually lost its pristine force and receded until a fresh act of the same kind renewed it once more. The world is constantly and ceaselessly possessed by grace from its innermost roots, from the innermost personal centre of the spiritual subject. It is constantly and ceaselessly sustained and moved by God's self-bestowal even prior to the question (admittedly always crucial) of how creaturely freedom reacts to this 'engracing' of the world and of the spiritual creature as already given and 'offered', the question, in other words, of whether this creaturely freedom accepts the grace to its salvation or closes itself to it to its perdition. Whether the world gives the impression, so far as our superficial everyday experience is concerned, of being imbued with grace in this way, or whether it constantly seems to give the lie to this state of being permeated by God's [167] grace which it has, this in no sense alters the fact that it is so. And without this belief and hope that the world has been endowed with grace in precisely this sense, the appeal to the sacraments as almost intermittent moments when such 'engracing' takes place would seem to modern man unworthy of belief. He would be unable to avoid the impression that what is involved in the doctrine of the sacraments is an ideological elevation of a world that is hideously secular, and one which conceals the truth without really changing the world itself.

At the present moment the time is not ripe to enquire what meaning the sacraments can then have, if they are not to be thought of as the particular moments in which God

[4] On this cf. the author's article in the present volume, 'Observations on the Problem of the "Anonymous Christian" ', and the further literature there adduced.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'intervenes' in his world from without. If we say that grace has all along possessed reality from the innermost heart and centre of the world and of persons as spiritual, then this too is still to express the matter in terms which are far too abstract. It is true that we can speak of God as the nameless and incomprehensible mystery only in very abstract terms. And for this reason too the reference of man to God, the fact that his existence is open to and orientated towards the mystery of God has of its very nature something unnameable in it. How could it be so easy to describe the path, seeing that it leads into the pathlessness of the inconceivable God? How could we find it easy to describe in words the ultimate act of man in which, surrendering himself, hoping, loving, adoring – in a word believing, he allows himself to fall into this ineffable mystery which constitutes the innermost basis, and at the same time the infinite remoteness of his existence that draws him out of himself? And if grace constitutes precisely that power which enabled him to achieve this making over of himself to the absolute mystery and that most special quality given by God enabling him to achieve this, how then can it be easy to speak about it in 'intelligible' terms?

But one point must be emphasized about this grace precisely to the extent that it proceeds from the innermost heart and centre of the world and of man: it takes place not as a special phenomenon, as one particular process apart from the rest of human life. Rather it is quite simply the ultimate depths and the radical dimension of all that which the spiritual creature experiences, achieves and suffers in all those areas in which it achieves its own fulness, and so in its laughter and its tears, in its taking of responsibility, in its loving, living, and dying, whenever man keeps faith with the truth, breaks through his own egoism in his relationships with his fellows, whenever he hopes against all hope, whenever he smiles and refuses to be disquieted or embittered by the folly of everyday pursuits, whenever he is able to be silent, and whenever within this silence of the [168] heart that evil which a man has engendered against another in his heart does not develop any further into external action, but rather dies within this heart as its grave – whenever, in a word, life is lived as man would seek to live it, in such a way as to overcome his own egoism and the despair of the heart which constantly assails him. There grace has the force of an event, because all this of its very nature (i.e. precisely through God's grace which has all along broken open mere 'nature', leading it beyond itself and into the infinitude of God) no longer has any limits or any end but (as willingly accepted) loses itself in the silent infinitude of God, is hidden in his absolute unconditionality in the future of the fulness of victory which in turn is God himself.

And precisely here one further point must be made concerning this grace which constitutes the innermost depths and the mystery of human life at its average and everyday level: this innermost dynamism of the normal 'secular' life of man as it exists always and everywhere has found in Jesus of Nazareth its clearest manifestation, and in him has proved itself as real, victorious and attaining to God. And it has done this precisely in a life of this kind, in which he has become like us in all things, in other words in a life which is completely everyday in character, a life bound up with birth, toil, courage, hope, failure and death. Something which cannot be set forth here (though in itself it is perfectly possible to do so) is this: anyone who believes in the fact that in the human life of Jesus (and so in his death and in his resurrection as the radical dimension of his own everyday life) the victory of his personal life has irrevocably and definitively been promised him, and that in this (not in any other fact) the ultimate and definitive, the unsurpassable word of God has been promised him, this man also ipso facto (with greater or lesser degree of explicitness or implicitness) affirms in faith that which is stated about Jesus in the classic and traditional christology. A further factor ipso facto given in this is that anyone who seizes upon the grace of God as the radical dimension of his own personal life, as its ultimate and definitive hope, has ipso facto posited an assent to the historical manifestation of the definitive nature of this grace in Jesus Christ, whether or not he explicitly recognizes this definitive assent as having been posited in the dimension of his own personal history.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

And finally: this grace unites us to one another in love and participation in the common lot of all. Abstracting from all more profound considerations, this is something that we recognize once we recognize that grace constitutes the innermost meaning and the holiness of the secular dimension, and this in virtue of the fact that this life, provided only that [169] our acceptance of it is genuine, true, and loving, itself mysteriously unites us in that each one in his own personal destiny experiences and accepts that of all the rest, and conversely each one recognizes and discovers himself once he directs his gaze into the life and death of the rest.

SACRAMENT AS A SYMBOLIC MANIFESTATION OF THE LITURGY OF THE WORLD

On the basis we have defined above the sacraments constitute the manifestation of the holiness and the redeemed state of the secular dimension of human life and of the world. Man does not enter a temple, a fane which encloses the holy and cuts it off from a godless and secular world which remains outside. Rather in the free breadth of a divine world he erects a landmark, a sign of the fact that this entire world belongs to God, a sign precisely of the fact that God is adored, experienced and accepted everywhere as he who, through his 'grace', has himself set all things free to attain to himself and a sign that this adoration of him takes place not in Jerusalem alone but everywhere in spirit and in truth. The sacrament constitutes a small sign, necessary, reasonable and indispensable, within the infinitude of the world as permeated by God. It is the sign which reminds us of this limitlessness of the presence of divine grace, and in this sense and in no other, precisely in this particular kind of anamnesis, is intended to be an event of grace. Now it is a lasting and tragic misunderstanding for us to turn these sacramental signs once more into a circumscribed enclave, such that it is in this alone that God is present, and that the event of his grace takes place.

Let us attempt to clarify what has been expressed in abstract terms by re-stating it in somewhat more concrete ones, and moreover concentrating especially upon the Eucharist. The world and its history are the terrible and sublime liturgy, breathing of death and sacrifice,[5] which God celebrates and causes to be celebrated in and through human history in its freedom, this being something which he in turn sustains in grace by his sovereign disposition. In the entire length and breadth of this immense history of birth and death, complete superficiality, folly, inadequacy and hatred (all of which 'crucify') on the one hand, and silent submission, responsibility even to death in dying and in joyfulness, in attaining the heights and plumbing the depths, on the other, the true liturgy of the world is present – present in such a way that the liturgy which the Son [170] has brought to its absolute fulness on his Cross belongs intrinsically to it, emerges from it, i.e. from the ultimate source of the grace of the world, and constitutes the supreme point of this liturgy from which all else draws its life, because everything else is always dependent upon the supreme point as upon its goal and at the same time sustained by it. This liturgy of the world is as it were veiled to the darkened eyes and the dulled heart of man which fails to understand its own true nature. This liturgy, therefore must, if the individual is really to share in the celebration of it in all freedom and self-commitment even to death, be interpreted, 'reflected upon' in its ultimate depths in the celebration of that which we are accustomed to call liturgy in the more usual sense. This 'must' primarily expresses simply that necessity in virtue of which man must accept such manifestations when they are present and when they confront him, otherwise he [5] On this subject cf. chiefly the world of ideas of Teilhard de Chardin, e.g. Hymn of the Universe (London and Glasgow, 1965).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

himself is denying and giving the lie to those existential modalities which thereby manifest themselves to his own perdition (unless he eliminates these too).

But there is a further point, just as valid and indeed still more radical: we are understanding this liturgy only in the usual sense of the term. We can only achieve a genuine enactment of it, without causing it to degenerate into an empty ritual attitudinizing, full of unbelief (so far as our participation in it is concerned) if we draw our strength from this liturgy of the world, from the liturgy of faith as expressed in concrete 'this worldly' terms, which is identical with the history of the world as rightly enacted.

THE EUCHARISTIC MEAL

It is in this spirit, then, that the individual goes to Mass. He is filled with the knowledge of that drama into which his life is constantly being drawn: the drama of the world, the divine tragedy and comedy. He thinks of the dying who face death with the death rattle in their throats and with glazed eyes, and he knows that even now this fate has its roots within his own being. He senses within himself the sighing of creaturehood, of the world, as it yearns for a brighter future. He entertains a feeling for the responsibility of statesmen with their decisions, which call for all their courage, and yet have to be launched into an unknown future, something of the laughter of children in their unclouded joy in the future, of the tears of hungry children, of the pains of the sick, of the disappointment of love betrayed, of the dedicated realism of scientists in their laboratories, of the dedicated austerities of those who struggle for a liberated humanity – something of all these is in him. He is also aware; even though he may [171] be living day after day with a heart full of withered superficiality, that he cannot give pride of place here and now to this entire history of mankind, that even this primitive and uncultivated crudity of a dried-up heart still demands in its turn, and with anguish, to be filled with all that which moves the world. And he is not surprised when the secret essence of world history, something as it were numbing and stimulating at the same time, rises up from the depths of his own inner life and floods over the dry land of his heart. He is not surprised to find that all this too is the experience of the grace of the world, which permeates the whole of history as judgement when it is denied, as a blessed future when it is accepted, and that precisely in the Cross of Jesus it has achieved its supreme point, the point at which it is no longer possible for victory to be lost to it. In his faith the Mass attender experiences the fact that this Cross still constantly is and remains a present fact right to the end of all history. He knows that those who mourn weep the tears of Jesus, those in prison sit in the cell of the Lord, those who rejoice share in the joy of Jesus, those who are lonely share his lonely nights, and so on. He knows that it is only in this indissoluble polarity between man and the Son of man that mankind and he can be understood, because it is only in him that the mystery of mankind can be grasped in its inconceivability and the hope for the future which it contains, and because it is only in the light of the meaning of humanity and in sharing in its lot that we can avoid degrading the presence of Jesus in us to the level of a mere abstract ideology. The attender at Mass, even before he has arrived at it, has already been drawn into the drama of Golgotha that was, that is, and that shall be, the drama that is world-wide, the drama that has all along taken him up in its unfolding process even before he explicitly adverts to it, that embraces 'head and members' alike, Jesus and all men in the same measure and in a relationship of mutual conditioning (albeit one that is special to each individual). For the Son of man too is willed by God 'for our salvation' because God wills a humanity consisting of 'divine beings', because a firstborn among many brethren is conceivable only among these many, so that the Spirit of Jesus is from the outset the Spirit of the world as it has been willed by God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

And so the individual goes to Mass. What is initiated there is not something which does not exist anywhere else in the world, but something which is there brought to manifestation at a conscious level and celebrated in a cultic enactment, something which really takes place in the world as God's deed of salvation and pertains to the redeemed freedom of mankind. The Cross of Jesus is not, properly speaking, set up afresh, but [172] rather its mysterious presence in the world is proclaimed. This individual allows something which is already alive in his heart to come to the fore, to proclaim itself. For this he himself posits his explicit assent (even if he knows that the most real assent – something that God and life decide and not he through his liturgical calendar – may perhaps be posited outside the context of cultic celebration in the compassion he shows in his average everyday life or in those hours in which life reaches its ultimate extremity). Under the forms of bread and wine he offers the world in that he knows that it itself is already ceaselessly offering itself up into the inconceivability of God in rejoicing, tears and blood. He looks with praise at the ineffable light of God for he knows that this looking of his only really takes place at that point at which man's eyes see death drawing near. He knows that he is proclaiming the death of the Lord because and in that this death, as that which was died once and for all, is constantly present in the world and has already been inserted into the innermost centre of the world and in a true sense continues to be died in everyone who, whether he explicitly recognizes it or not, 'dies in the Lord'. He knows that in the Mass he is proclaiming the coming of the Lord because the Lord actually is in the process of coming in the world in everything which impels the world forwards towards its goal. In the holy sign he receives the true body of the Lord in that he knows that this would be useless if he were not in communion with that body of God which is the world itself with its destiny, that he is receiving the former body so that in the reality of his own life he may stand in an abiding communion with the latter body. He hears and utters the word of God who reveals himself in the Mass in the awareness that this word constitutes the verbal expression of that word which God himself utters in that he utters the world as his word and eternally utters himself to this world itself in his Word. He hears this word in the 'liturgy of the word' in order that it, together with the world, may become that other word, may utter it, hearken to it and accept it, that word which, though it is uttered everywhere (as nature and grace) so often falls only upon deaf ears, and 'strengthened' and in turn reflected upon in this word, seeks to make its impact in this way too at the human level.

A man goes to Mass. In doing so he is not necessarily called upon always or exclusively to fulfil in an explicit sense the claims of his oneness in destiny with the world and history as a whole. It can also be enough that in his conscious mind he opens himself to the depths of grace contained in that life which is his in a narrower sense. For this life too is in itself, and as part of the great drama of the world, broken into by the [173] grace of God and orientated towards the inconceivability and absoluteness of God. In fact provided this man seizes upon this seemingly everyday life in a spirit of faith (that is in a willing and unreserved acceptance of the movement of this everyday life in itself) he experiences every day in it that this everyday life is sustained by the movement towards God. This is what takes place when someone loves unconditionally and even in situations in which his love is exploited and not returned, in which someone really forgives without 'gaining anything' from it (not even the feeling of being the better man) when someone experiences the miracle of love which is bestowed upon him, he does not know why, when a man is suddenly struck with fear by some insight into the majestic inexorability of truth, when someone remains faithful to the claims of his conscience even though this faithfulness of his is exploited and used against him, and so on. In innumerable occurrences of this kind in everyday life there is always something more mysteriously present than the data yielded by direct experience. There is always a sum which defies all reckoning, an account which cannot be brought into balance by the addition of any one specific assignable item. Always in this there is a tacit reference to God who by his grace frees us in our everyday life, admitting us to his own freedom, assuming that we recognize and acknowledge this claim in our everyday life, and do so through that death which egoism can die unnoticed in our everyday lives, and assuming too that we allow ourselves to be set free for the life of God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The individual concerned need not fear that his basic conviction of faith is under assault if he suddenly finds himself tempted to regard the sacramental rites as 'empty ceremonies', if he experiences that which takes place at the altar as a 'game' which, while it may be touching, initially makes the same impression upon him as the sacrificial ceremony of a Vedic priest who feeds the gods and believes that by his actions he is keeping the world in harmony with them. Faced with such temptations a Christian of this kind does not need merely to formulate an additional ideological postulate by which, so to say, he adds on to these rites which he seeks to keep a divine event which would not take place apart from such ritual (though in that case, surely, the divine event would not freely and personally be appropriated!). But there is something which he has to 'add on in his mind', something in the light of which he must view these rites. Yet it is something which he does not have to create from his own ideology. In other words he does not, in any true sense, have to add it on in his mind at all (though he certainly can and should consciously reflect upon it). This extra 'something' is the divine depths inherent in real life, [174] which are constituted always and everywhere through the grace of God with Christ as its focal point and in the self-bestowal of God upon the world. It is from this that these rites derive, to this that they point back, and without this 'something' whence they derive and towards which they tend they would truly be empty, and any other content would indeed merely be added on in the mind. He who is assailed by the fear of engaging in a ritualism which is at basis empty, which is merely filled out with ideological notions conjured up at will, must have recourse to the experience of God and of grace in his seemingly secular life, and so must say: 'This experience and the "subject matter" precisely of it are made apprehensible at the cultic and ritual level.' Obviously this presupposes that we have actually made an experience of this kind in our everyday life of the divine depths inherent precisely in this 'secularity' and of the grace they bring. Anyone who says that he fails to find any such experience in his life (an experience which always comes through faith, but a faith which really is 'experienced') should be answered as follows: So long as he really has experienced nothing of this, the sacraments must inevitably seem to him to be mere magical ritual, and according to Christian doctrine he should not even receive them, because this doctrine unequivocally forbids anyone to receive the sacraments without faith (that is without a believing experience). It would be necessary to provide such an one with instruction and mystagogy in the religious experience of grace in this sense, such as cannot of course be provided in the present context. (In this connection a point which should admittedly be taken into account is that such an individual is all along making this experience in itself, but is incapable of reflecting upon it and objectifying it in sufficient measure, and it is at this process of reflection and objectification that all instruction and mystagogy is aimed, and not at a process of indoctrination ab initio.)

THE EUCHARIST AND THE LITURGY OF THE WORLD

If this individual sees the Mass simply as a sign in miniature of the Mass of the world, to which obviously Christ himself belongs, then it follows that the Mass is after all not so unimportant to this individual. Only in a very conditional sense can he regard it as the 'supreme moment' of his life and the source of his life. It is a 'supreme moment' only to the extent that he allows God to determine which particular moment of his life, and under which particular 'forms', whether sacred or profane, he will encounter in his life that decisive

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

moment, that sidereal hour, in which his [175] ultimate self-surrender to God is really achieved for him – that self-surrender which definitively determines what is to be for him for all eternity. It is a 'source' only to the extent that he is aware in all this that this source is only derived from the real source of God who creates salvation in his supra-worldly and absolute primacy, and of the unique and definitive event of the death of the Lord that creates salvation. Furthermore it is a source only to the extent that in all this he knows that provided only he opens his heart in faith, hope, and love, the whole of his existence will be permeated throughout as a land from the depths of which flow the waters of eternal life. And if the objection were put to him that after all it is only at Mass that he receives the Body of the Lord really and substantially, then he would rejoin that while he gratefully acknowledges this unique gift of grace of Christ within his Church, still in responding to this substantial presence of Christ the only way in which he can avoid occupying the seat of a Judas next to the physical presence of Christ at the Last Supper is for this Lord to rise up, together with the whole yearning of the entire world and together with its destiny from the midst of his own personal life, and to bestow his grace from this (a grace that is called love for God and for mankind). This is what must take place before he can say that he is physically near to him and also bears witness to him in such a way that he loves him to the end.

But all this does not make the sacrament superfluous or meaningless. It bears witness to a truth which is otherwise so much hidden in the darkness of the world and the depths of one's conscience. It gives a better opportunity to look outwards from the harmonious recollection of a cultic event into the world, and there to recognize what threatens again and again to disappear from the flagging spirit and the despondent heart within its midst. The sacrament does not dispense us from striving in the night of the world as Jacob strove by night with the angel until he had blessed him. Rather it brings home to us the fact that this struggle of life is a striving like Jacob's. It paves the way for, and is the promise of the same victorious outcome. If the sacrament is the sign of the res sacramenti, the reality designated, which is identical with the whole unfolding history of the world (because it is a signum commemorativum, exhibitivum and prognosticum, as we may express it in the terms of Aquinas, for everything which takes place in saving history from the beginning to the end which has still to come), does it follow from this that the significance of the sacrament becomes smaller and less important than if it were a procedure of a bare individualistic pastoral care in which it was no longer possible really to believe that anything was taking place there that could really and [176] seriously be believed in as significant for salvation? In other words could such a thing really be believed in as something which is in God's sight the definitive and irrevocable outcome of freedom, abiding and never more able to be overthrown?

Let it not be said that to celebrate the sacrament in this sense implies any denial or obscuring of its sacramental 'causality'. It is no denial or obscuring of the significance of the baptism of an adult either if we say that even as he enters upon it he is acting in accordance with the just claims of faith and love, and so is already justified as he comes to receive the baptism of water. Nor are we denying or obscuring the significance of the sacrament of penance when in accordance with the whole of traditional theology we say that in the normal instance the Christian approaches this sacrament of reconciliation as one who has already been justified through charity – indeed that, as Thomas Aquinas held, he must approach it in this state. Obviously Peter in no sense underestimated baptism when he conferred baptism upon Cornelius precisely because he had already received the Holy Spirit and not because he had not yet experienced it. In accordance with traditional theology we hold firm to the position that it is far from being necessarily the case that the recipient of the sacraments does not yet have that which the sacrament confers upon him and declares to have been conferred upon him. In this traditional formulation of the question we also really understand what is properly meant by this grace which the recipient of the sacraments already possesses, namely a state of having been drawn into the dynamic process which holds the world together, impelling it towards its goal, the inconceivability of God, uniting all earthly realities and spirits and blending them into a single history of the world as the coming of God through his self-bestowal. And it cannot be said that the approach to the sacraments suggested here in any sense tells against their significance or necessity. It may be that it is not easy or even possible to explain down to the last detail the harmony between these two truths: that of the grace which is always already present and effective from within, and that of the sacramental sign as posited from without at a particular point in time. But any theology in any case is faced with the task of showing that such a harmony exists. It is not a special difficulty arising only from the approach to the reception of the sacraments suggested here.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[177]

THE EFFECTIVENESS OF THE SACRAMENT IN THE SIGN

But in still more precise terms: What, in terms of this basic conception, is to be made of the 'effectiveness' of the sacraments?[6] If we emphasize the 'sign' character of the sacraments, then we are straightway in line with the best and earliest theological traditions. If we are to speak of an effectiveness belonging to the sacramental sign, then it is in accordance with this tradition that the effectiveness referred to is not to be conceived of as something added on to its 'sign' function from without, but rather is to be envisaged as an effectiveness inherent in the sign precisely as such. The development of the modern theology of the sacraments likewise tends in this direction even in those areas in which it is in no sense concerned with the special points which are of interest to us here.[7]

This effectiveness of the sign as such (the sign of that grace of God which is already taking effect always and everywhere throughout the world right from its very roots!) can be explained in several stages. First the concrete process by which man in his physical exteriority brings himself to his fulness in his own personal history always has from the first the character of a sign, a physical expression of that which is already present in the basic attitude of a man, and at the same time of the fact that there is a counter influence proceeding from the sign and affecting the basic attitude. Thus this concrete process of self-fulfilment is itself all along and in all cases a 'real symbol' under which the individual brings to fruition this basic attitude of his, his option fondamentale. Precisely in the fact that he expresses himself man posits that which is expressed. In the gesture that he makes the interior disposition of the individual asserts itself. This is not simply (at least not in all cases) the mere subsequent promulgation such that in itself it would be unimportant for the existence of the reality promulgated. The real symbol[8] is the sign which [178] promulgates in the unity of the body-spirit compositum which is man, and at the same time is the 'cause' of that which is promulgated. It is not a cause which acts ab externo to posit something subsequent to and quite different from itself. Rather it is a cause to the extent that the true cause, the interior

[6] cf. the author's article 'Sakrament' V in LTK IX (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1964), cols. 227-230, and also in the present volume, 'What is a Sacrament?'

[7] cf. R. Schulte's summarizing article 'Sacrament', Sacramentum Mundi V (London and New York, 1970), pp. 378-384; also A. Winkelhofer, Kirche in den Sakramenten (Frankfurt, 1968). The relevant enactments, to which the Eucharist belongs, nowadays also have a decisive bearing on our understanding of the Eucharistic presence of the Lord. On this cf. the relevant studies by B. Welte, E. Schillebeeckx and J. Ratzinger. The Constitution on the Liturgy of the Second Vatican Council likewise points in this direction. Cf. the author's article, 'The Presence of the Lord in the Christian Community at Worship', Theological Investigations X (London and New York, 1973), pp. 75-83.

[8] cf. the author's 'The Theology of the Symbol', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 221-252, and P. de Jong, Die Eucharistie als Symbolwirklichkeit (Regensburg, 1969).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

decision of freedom, can posit itself only in that it brings itself to its fulness by issuing in this its promulgation.

From this basic standpoint it is now easy to advance a step further: first all what has just been said also applies to the act of the free individual as brought to its fulness in grace. This free individual brings himself to his fulness as an event of grace in this sense in that he expresses himself and this expression is, in the sense explained, the cause of the act imbued with grace and of the grace itself. (In the light of this the point made by the traditional established teaching of the Church is perfectly reasonable, namely that in the case of one who has already been justified receiving the sacraments, this grace – which produces a fruitful reception of the sacraments! – is always still further 'increased'.)

And finally: this grace is bestowed upon the world as such from its heart and centre. It is constantly offered as the innermost finality of the world's history. It unfolds itself in the history of salvation and revelation, and brings to manifestation, and precisely in virtue of this, that which we call the sacraments when it brings to fruition this decision, taken in its power at decisive moments in the individual human life, and, moreover, in a manifestation which is posited by the Church as the basic sacrament of grace, her own nature being fully engaged in this.[9] On this showing, then, a manifestation of this kind is not merely a subsequent promulgation of something which is in any case present even without such promulgation. Rather it is something in which the reality promulgated brings its own individual history to its fulness and so extends its own real nature in that it integrates within its own individual history more 'material'. In this sense, then, the manifestation is the 'cause' of that which is manifesting. Now it follows from all this that in terms of our basic conception too a true causality, precisely a causality in signifying (that of the 'real symbol') can be ascribed to the sacramental sign.

[179]

THE CHURCH AS THE BASIC SACRAMENT OF THE SALVATION OF THE WORLD

We shall understand this whole approach still better if we reflect upon the relationship between the world and the Church. According to what probably is both the most relevant and the most original statement in the ecclesiology of the Second Vatican Council the Church is the 'sacrament of salvation' for the world.[10] What does this mean? The earlier view was that the Church is the sign of salvation for those who already positively belong to her, the sheltering ark in the Flood of the world the sheepfold which protects the flock of Christ and that which points the way of salvation to those who are gathered in this ark or in this fold. On this view the world constituted the sphere of perdition which was set over against the Church as the realm of the evil one. Now this view is certainly not regarded as simply false. There is a world which is in an evil state, a world dominated over by those principalities and powers which are hostile to God, a world made up of spirits and of men. [11] But today it is recognized more clearly that as an historical and social entity the Church is precisely not in any possible sense simply or primarily the promise of salvation for those who are 'within' her. Rather she [9] Apart from the well-known studies by O. Semmelroth, E. Schillebeeckx and others, cf. also the author's The Church and the Sacraments, Quaestiones Disputatae 9 (Edinburgh and London, 1963), as well as 'Ekklesiologische Grundlegung der Pastoraltheologie als praktischer Theologie', Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie I (Freiburg im Breisgau, 2nd ed., 1970).

[10] On this cf., amongst others, E. Schillebeeckx, 'De ecclesia ut sacramentum mundi', Acta congressus internationalis de theologia Concilii Vaticani II, E. Dhanis, A. Schönmetzer edd. (Rome, 1968), pp. 48-53.

[11] Of course this 'world' is also constantly present within the sphere which we call in an empirical and social sense, the Church. This in itself should make us cautious in drawing this traditional distinction between the realm of God and that of sin.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

is this for those who are 'still' without, and those who are perhaps destined never to belong to her in this present age in a sociological or empirical sense. For there are men who have been sanctified and redeemed by grace who have never belonged to the Church in an empirical sense, and the reason is that God never denies salvation in his grace to anyone who follows his own conscience, not even when he has not yet explicitly come to recognize the existence of God. For these men who have been sanctified and saved at an anonymous level, for these redeemed ones (there is no need whatever to use the term 'anonymous Christians' if it is found unsatisfactory) the Church is the social and historical sign of salvation, the basic sacrament of that promise which applies to such as these, because she constitutes the visible community of those who acknowledge that in the deed of God salvation is victoriously present for the whole world through the death and resurrection of his Christ. Those who explicitly belong to the visible [180] Church are not so much those who are called and predestined to salvation, as though there could not be any others similarly called and predestined. Rather they are those who, through their life, their confessing, their membership of the Church, have to make salvation manifest sacramentally to those others within the solidarity which embraces all men within a human race which has been redeemed by Christ. The members of the Church in the true sense work out their salvation precisely in that they fulfil to the full this function which they have to the rest. This does not exclude the fact that in principle all men are called to such a function, i.e. that it cannot in principle, or from the outset, be said of anyone that this particular concrete individual certainly does not enter a situation in which he develops his own individual saving history to the point at which he cannot only receive salvation, but also, precisely in order to receive it and to maintain it, must proclaim it too as an element in this basic sacrament called the Church.

In the light of this the relationship between world and Church is not one between the sphere of the godless and the sphere of the holy, between the Flood and the ark, but resembles rather a relationship between a hidden reality on the one hand, which is still seeking to express itself to the full in history, and on the other the full historical manifestation of this, in which that reality which, though hidden, was already present in the world achieves its own fulness in history, expresses itself and so enters upon that mode of existence towards which it has been orientated from the outset.

The true entelecheia of the Church is present in the world at its innermost heart and centre, but in a manner which is already recognizable to her believers in the light of her own nature. This is not to contest the fact that this hidden entelecheia of the Church within the world is not the 'natural' dynamism of the world or of history, but rather is constituted by the grace of God – indeed ultimately by God himself in his self-bestowal upon the world. Nor is it contested that the Church is an extremely imperfect manifestation of this ultimate and victorious entelecheia of world history such that it is still guilty of selfishness, still precisely of such a nature that it is only gradually that it can fulfil its task of integrating within itself the particular elements in this manifestation which are constituted 'outside' the Church by this grace-given entelecheia present within the history of the world and the history of salvation.[12]

[181]

SACRAMENT AS SELF-FULFILMENT OF THE CHURCH

It is on this basis that we now have to view the individual sacraments: they are nothing else than acts in a process of concrete self-fulfilment on the part of the Church as the basic [12] The 'adaptation' of the Church to the world is at basis the recognition of the factor of 'anonymous Christianity' and of the Church as a factor in the world and in its history, not the condescension of the divine power stooping to a godless world.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

sacrament of salvation for the world as applicable to the individual and to the specific situation of his own personal life.[13] The abiding union of the Church with Christ, which cannot be destroyed, achieves a further projection in the individual sacraments as positive concretizations of the basic sacrament. At this level it is called opus operatum, which properly speaking does not imply any opposition to the opus operantis, but is rather a quality inherent in a specific opus operantis (which is in fact posited both in the conferrer and the recipient of the sacraments), the fact namely that this opus operantis ecclesiae (and of her minister) is posited with the full involvement of the Church as such, and so of its very nature cannot fall outside the sphere of Christ's grace.[14] If therefore the sacraments are projections and actualizations of the 'sign' function of the Church as the basic sacrament, then it follows from this that the sacraments designate and promulgate at the level of society and history that grace which is designated and borne witness to by the basic sacrament of the Church. In other words they constitute signs of the grace of the world, that grace which is present and effective within the world constantly and from the first. That grace of God which is implanted in the world also sustains the Church and her sacraments. In the reception of the sacraments this too is precisely something which must be 'realized'. If that is realized or made real, then the sacraments are no 'extrinsic' processes touching upon an unhallowed world from 'without', but rather the pro-cesses (in the etymological sense!) of the grace of the world which even within the world is perceived by him who, through word and sacrament, has experienced the fact that the life of himself and of the world has all along been sanctified and opened up to the inconceivability of God as no longer concealed.

[182]

THE APPLICATION OF THE SACRAMENT IN THE CONCRETE CIRCUMSTANCES OF HUMAN LIFE (THE FREQUENCY OF THE SACRAMENTS)

This conception, though not strictly speaking new, is intended to bring out more clearly a point which is of special importance today. Against the entire conception, however, it might be objected that it lays excessive demands upon the average recipient of the sacraments. In rejoinder it must first be said that every conception of the sacraments demands too much of the recipient. For each individual has, in the concrete circumstances of his personal life, to achieve a personal encounter with God. Yet in attempting such a thing how can he escape from having too much demanded of him on any conceivable interpretation of the sacraments? The fact that this is perhaps less clearly borne in upon us in our usual way of receiving the sacraments comes from sheer custom, which causes us to suppose that we understand and fully go through with the realities expressed by terms such as grace, means of grace, causality of the sign of grace etc. We can freely assert that the way of approaching the sacraments put forward and recommended here demands nothing more than what is always demanded in any such approach: to realize in concrete personal terms what is meant by the grace of God, and to realize it in such a way that the idea of receiving such grace is also really credible. Properly speaking all that we are attempting in this interpretation is to convey a concept of grace which modern man can feel to be verifiable because it proceeds from everyday experience and regards an individualistic narrowing down of the idea of grace as something to be avoided. Of course it may be asked whether in the concrete practice of life it is possible

[13] The utterance of salvation is the concretization of the basic sacrament in the life of the individual. A point constantly to be borne in mind in this connection is that this individual, even within the Church in which he is an element in the constitution of the basic sacrament, always remains at once a recipient of salvation and a seeker for salvation just as much as he who is still 'outside' it.

[14] cf. O. Semmelroth, 'Opus operatum – Opus operantis', L TK VII (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1962), cols. 1184-1186.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation to achieve a reception of the sacraments such as we are attempting to describe here so frequently as has been regarded as genuinely possible and worth striving for by traditional piety over many centuries (especially in the case of the Eucharist and penance). But what we are concerned with is the question of a genuine reception of the sacraments in their fulness in the concrete personal circumstances of our lives, without which any mere numerical accumulation of such receptions of the sacraments becomes meaningless. In no conceivable sense does it really increase grace, and it leads merely to a legalistic and mechanical approach to the sacramental event. But whatever interpretation we may put upon the sacrament in the concrete, this question has to be posed, and no one will find it very easy to answer. It does no harm whatever if in our devotion we avoid deciding how frequently we ought to receive the sacraments simply on the basis of [183] the almost magical idea that the more often we receive them the better provided only that a right intention and a certain amount of good will is present, to increase the 'treasury of grace' through the sacraments. Moreover, according to the way of receiving the sacraments which we are suggesting here, it is manifestly far from desirable to receive them so often as to demand too much of the recipient in the sense of over-straining his capacity to realize the significance of his act in the concrete circumstances of his personal life. But this tells against receiving the sacraments too often for us fully to realize their significance, and not against the conception we are putting forward here.[15] Each of the two factors involved must be taken as a criterion for determining the other: frequency of reception on the one hand, and genuine realization of what is involved on the other. But obviously a further factor constantly to be taken into account is the due claims of everyday life. Again the supreme point which, when it is fully achieved, can and will enable us to orientate our lives as a whole towards their final consummation is first of all exceptional and at the same time needs to be fitted into the claims of our everyday life in such a way that it acts upon us as though it were actually being achieved in the here and now. Our everyday living must very broadly approximate to that which constitutes its true significance, the supremely decisive factor in our lives, in such a way as in a certain measure creatively to anticipate such moments of radical fulness. Only in this way shall we really achieve them aright and avoid wasting the kairos for them, the crucial moment at which it is possible really to receive them. The phrase 'I love you' can also be uttered in our everyday lives and moreover should be, even though it is a phrase which properly speaking applies to the fulness of those crucial moments in life, And this can also be said of the sacraments, even though when we do so we have not once more any intention of denying what has just been said with regard to adopting a critical attitude towards an indiscrete frequency in receiving them. Presumably there are 'styles' conditioned by the particular epochs to which they belong, and determining where we strike the balance between the supreme demand which the sacraments in their fulness represent and so which they make upon man on the one hand, and the tribute which the individual can freely and willingly pay to his everyday conditions, which also still plays its part in characterizing that which is supreme in his own life. In fact we have no objection to make either to the individual intercessions which we formulate in the liturgy: on behalf of the hungry, the dying, those subjected to political persecution etc., even though such intercessions often seem to [184] come 'from the heart' only to a small extent so far as we are concerned. Should we on this account omit them, or should we not rather allow ourselves to be warned by them ever afresh to make sure that our hearts do not stick fast in a primitive form of egoism (albeit perhaps a religious one)?

RELIGIOUS AND SECULAR

[15] On this see n. 2.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now that we have put forward our theory on the basis of the usual data of traditional theology, with all the circumstantial details inevitably entailed in this, we should now once more develop this theory quite simply and independently of this our starting-point. In this way it should be possible to make it clear far more effectively how possible it is to 'realize' it and to verify it in religious terms. Man is not in any explicit sense endowed with religious instincts of his very nature. He easily feels all that is explicitly religious as almost impudent, and in any case excessively burdensome. Yet once we have so made clear our thesis we should be in a position to say: What is here being achieved is simply a plainer and more explicit awareness of what takes place in my life, and what precisely need not after all be suppressed or denied expression, that to which I must give my explicit adherence, however much I may be tempted to venerate all this merely silently, and however much I may be justified in claiming that there is a limit to the saving efficacy in certain forms of religious expression of this sort or in the frequency with which they are repeated. And he who is already 'devout' would notice that his 'spiritual life' does not constitute any dispensation from the responsibilities of his secular life, or even, properly and ultimately speaking, a point of transcendence in relation to this. Rather it is precisely the explicit taking over of this life which only seems to be secular. But it is no longer possible to set forth the conception of the sacraments we have in mind here without 'taking the long way round' with the traditional form as our starting-point for the kerygmatic statement itself. This is no longer possible however desirable it may be, however true it may be that only thus would it become effective in our religious lives. In theology proper it is something else. For this always has to answer precisely for its doctrine to the earlier history of faith.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[185]

11

ASPECTS OF THE EPISCOPAL OFFICE

In the ideas which follow we shall be assuming as accepted the Catholic doctrine concerning the episcopal office, on a balanced view of it in which all elements in it are taken into account. In this approach it is admittedly no part of our intention to put forward objections from the point of view of pastoral theology,[1] for instance as to what kind of image the bishop of today ought to present, which are the crucial points for our present age within the total scope of a bishop's task, what form ought nowadays to be given to those institutions on which he has to rely for the fulfilment of his task, etc. As against this a point we shall seek to demonstrate in this study is how broad a scope is still left, from the point of view of pastoral theology, for considerations and decisions with regard to the concrete form which the episcopal office ought to assume in our own times, even while we recognize the doctrine of the Catholic Church on this point which is effectively and dogmatically binding. The scope still left by this is far greater than is commonly assumed, and hence offers the pastoral theologian, provided he understands his task and includes within it the jus condendum, great opportunities but at the same time corresponding responsibilities too, which are likewise greater than is supposed on the common view.

For when we speak of office, of a bishop, of episcopal authority, a monarchical episcopate etc. in doctrinal statements, we are unconsciously filling these formal and very broad concepts with a concrete content which is de facto bound up with these concepts in our own experience of the Church. We do this even though we should have learnt from the history of the Church from the New Testament onwards how wide the variations [186] can be in the concrete forms in which these concepts are realized, and so too possible from the point of view of dogmatic theology. This should be enough to tell us that for the future too we are offered a broad scope for creatively re-shaping this office, and that this is a task which we must tackle genuinely and seriously. The study which follows is intended to help in laying bare still more the further and unexplored areas for the reshaping of these ideas. What we are concerned with here is not the task of presenting possible models for the office, the different content of which has already been determined by historical factors or at the theoretical level For this would precisely be the task of the historian who may perhaps discover such different concrete forms of the office already present at earlier stages in history – forms which, even though now forgotten and having fallen into desuetude, could nowadays perhaps once more be revived and renovated.

The pastoral theologian and canonist, on the other hand, has the special task of creatively filling out with new concrete ideas those formal and, to some extent, empty concepts which the dogmatic theologian supplies him with when he shows on dogmatic grounds that this factor of the empty and the unexplored in his concepts is dogmatically justified, and by doing so also makes it right for the Church to provide scope for creative freedom for her pastoral theologians, canonists, and also those vested with her offices. In this negative task of the dogmatic theologian (one, that is, which creates scope in theory and practice for the pastoral theologians), we have a longer path to tread, for there are many factors and circumstances to be considered, so that a considerable degree of patience is called for. For in such

[1] The considerations put forward in this study were prepared for a conference of pastoral theologians. It is from this that the ideas it contains acquire their theological bearing and their special character, something which belongs essentially to the present considerations.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

considerations there is much that must remain problematical and uncertain. The ultimate certainty that a future measure is legitimate can be achieved only in the free decision to embark upon this future measure, and not in the preliminary considerations leading up to it. If we sought to achieve a certainty of this kind, assuring us that these unexplored areas for further development were present and doctrinally justified even prior to any such decision on the part of the Church, then it would be clear from the outset that we had totally failed to discover any such areas for a true and effective future, and that we were only projecting forwards into the future in an innocuous manner the already justified present as modified for that future. The considerations are prior only in the sense that on the basis of the different approaches, which are in no sense all brought under a single overall system, we feel our way towards the existence of the free scope for further development of the kind we are speaking of for the future concrete realization of the episcopal office. [187] Hence it is also superfluous to enumerate these different approaches by way of preliminary. After these introductory remarks, let us now proceed directly to tackle the question itself.

It is of immediate and primary importance for our entire question to be clear upon one point: the sense in which, on the basis of the exegesis and biblical theology of the New Testament, and of the earlier history of the Church, we can nowadays assert that the historical Jesus did found a Church. The fact that this question is of radical importance for our entire theme hardly calls for any special explanation. It is also obvious that all that need be stated here is a quite simple and summary answer, without any special justifying arguments. While it is true that 'Lumen Gentium', the document of the Second Vatican Council, has said nothing in this context that is false concerning the hierarchical structure of the Church, provided that we interpret its doctrines in broad outline (which is perfectly justifiable from the point of view of dogmatics), still even this doctrine of the Council does not provide a really positive picture of the present position on the question of the founding of the Church by Jesus with all the problems this entails and the possibility of their solution.[2] When we ask 'Did Jesus found the Church?' it may be that this is a somewhat inappropriate way of framing the question in view of the matters to be found here, and which we now have in mind. Alternatively we must achieve a clear recognition of what is meant by 'founding' here, and the special kind of variability involved in it, and we need not presume that the only way of applying this idea in practice in the case we are considering is precisely that way which we ourselves quite arbitrarily associate with it. For it is possible to conceive of the founding of a society as signifying that way of bringing it into being that necessarily involves a conscious and clear idea of the constitution of that society, together with the will to bring it to reality in the human awareness of the 'founder'. Now it cannot be established as a matter of historical fact that the historical Jesus either willed or carried through the founding of the Church as understood here. Even at this early stage we may draw attention to something which we shall have to enlarge upon later in these considerations of ours, namely that something like a revealed constitutional law of the Church – in other words a jus divinum of a juridical and constitutional kind – is conceivable. Later we shall have to show how this can be. [188] Obviously Jesus did have a group of disciples about him. It is perfectly possible that this group also had, in the broadest sense, a juridical structure in conformity with Jesus' own will, one which accorded a special place within this group of disciples to Peter. As a matter of their experience the disciples of Jesus knew him as the crucified and risen Lord, and so recognized him and his message (or his new message, and in this himself also) as the unsurpassable word of the living God, of the ultimate freedom. And to the extent that they did so experience him

[2] On the subject of the institution or founding of the Church by Jesus cf. the author's study, Inspiration in the Bible (Edinburgh and London, 1961), pp. 39-42, and also, in the present volume, 'Considerations on the Role of the Person in the Sacramental Event'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

it was obviously also the case that this group of disciples, which as a society of persons necessarily must have had a social and juridical constitution, must also remain, right to the end of history, as a community of faith in Jesus and as the upholder of his message. In the light of this it is absolutely possible and necessary to assert that the Church derives from Jesus, is in this sense founded by him, even though he himself in his genuinely human awareness presumably never formulated any clear or conscious idea of what kind of social constitution the community of his message would have, how it would achieve it, or under what forms it would continue to exist, that community made up of those who believe in the liberating proximity of God and of those who lay hold of this message as something eternally inseparable from himself and his fate. On these grounds alone it is evident that it is only in a very limited and indirect way if at all that the office of the bishops in the Church can be traced back to any decision to found this office on the part of Jesus himself. In any case the episcopal office is not to be authenticated by claiming that Jesus founded it in the sense of explicitly and consciously adverting to it in itself, for this is something which cannot be established as a matter of historical fact. The existence of this office is justified, rather, on the grounds that in the concrete it constitutes the legitimate and, in the long run historically speaking, indispensable way of ensuring the necessary continuity of the community of Jesus with its origins. It is in the light of this that we have to allow for the wide range of possible variations we have spoken of, in which such a factor as the episcopal office can be given concrete embodiment.

If we assume that the foregoing points are correct, can we then still speak of a jus divinum for the basic constitutional structures of the Catholic Church?[3] This question arises directly from what we have said above, and is also of vital importance for any interpretation of the episcopal [189] office with a view to finding concrete models for its embodiment in concrete reality. I believe that this question can be answered along the following lines: the episcopal office derives from the will of Jesus to found the Church as interpreted above in a process which, while in the eyes of modern theologians it seems to be conditioned by historical factors, is nevertheless in terms of its meaning perfectly reasonable and irreversible. Now to the extent that this is true there is a perfectly sound and valid sense in which we can speak of a jus divinum of the episcopal office. In this statement we are assuming two principles: First according to the witness of history it seems that at one time the monarchic episcopate existed side by side with other community structures in the apostolic age, and that at the time these were not regarded either as illegitimate or as embryonic or provisional. The monarchical episcopate, then, seems to have imposed itself and to have rendered these other structures obsolete, though of course this took place at a very early stage. A further factor to be taken into account, of course, in all this is that the concept of a monarchic episcopate is abstract in the extreme and was given concrete embodiment in early times in the most varied forms. The result is that in the constitution of any given local Church it is after all only particular elements which are brought to the fore by means of such a concept. Other elements of very great importance were de facto implicit in it side by side with these, and these other elements modify this absolute concept very greatly when compared with the form which the present-day monarchic episcopate assumes.[4] The second point which our statement about the jus divinum inherent in the monarchical episcopate asserts is this: without prejudice to the historical contingency of this episcopate which we have just established, this jus divinum can and indeed must nevertheless be regarded as an abiding element in the constitution of the [3] On what follows cf. the author's article, 'Reflection on the Concept of the "Jus Divinum" in Catholic Thought', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 219-243.

[4] The doctrine of the monarchic episcopate is accounted as fully worked out by the beginning of the second century in the Letters of Ignatius of Antioch. Nevertheless it is disputed how far the general situation of the contemporary Church is reflected in these.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Church. The reason is that the concept of a reality that is contingent and brought about in historical freedom is far from necessarily implying that that reality can once more be withdrawn from the stage of history. On the contrary, under certain circumstances it is in principle perfectly consistent with a contingency of origin of this kind for such a contingent reality to be permanent and irreversible. This is not the place to demonstrate how or why a reality emerging from the free course of history in this sense, the history of human decision, may in principle have this character of being [190] permanent and irreversible. This would lead us too far afield. Yet it would be naive and ultimately less than human to suppose that we have to deny the true nature of historical freedom by saying that it is impossible for the Church to recognize in her faith that a given decision can have an eternal validity in this sense once that decision has been freely posited. For even though it cannot be perceived that that decision follows necessarily from the very nature of the case, still it is in harmony with the nature of the case. The historical decision of the Church that her own constitution should include a monarchic episcopate was arrived at towards the end of the apostolic age, albeit as the outcome of a long process of development, and in the Church's conscious faith this decision can perfectly well be irreversible and, because in conformity with her own nature, albeit not in any demonstrable way following necessarily from that nature, can still justifiably be regarded as a jus divinum and as intrinsically involving the factors of authentic derivation from a Church that has been willed by God and of the irreversibility and permanence that belong to the institution of this. A further point that is of course likewise clear from all this is that the dogmatic concept of the episcopate can have a wide range of variations in the forms in which it is realized in practice. For the criterion by which its concrete form can and must be measured is whether it actually and effectively has fulfilled and is capable of fulfilling those dispositions and functions which are entailed by the origin of the episcopate as thus determined. In any case it is clear that we cannot use the concept of the jus divinum to justify and defend any and every factor which is present in the concrete in the present-day form of the episcopate. On the other hand there is no need to cast doubt upon the monarchic episcopate as an abiding factor in the Church by reason of its having emerged as a free and contingent phenomenon. Two points must be borne in mind here: first, regardless of whatever forms the concrete juridical constitution of a given society may assume, the powers vested in that society must be borne by individuals; second, even a monarchic episcopate, as it exists within a community, must be, and de facto in the Catholic Church actually is – surrounded by collegiate organs. Now in the light of these two points there is properly speaking no valid meaning any longer in casting doubt on the monarchic form of episcopate. In terms of its actual meaning the only question which still remains open – though in practice it is not an unimportant one – is how we should devise rules in greater detail to ensure the necessary collaboration between the primary holder of the office within a community, who is quite indispensable, and the collegiate bodies which are also inevitably present within it. We have [191] to devise rules for this collaboration in such a way that taken together as a single whole the bearers of the office in the Church are really capable of discharging the functions pertaining to that office. At most the question might be posed of whether it might not be possible to recognize such collegiate ('presbyteral') elements in the constitution of a community as covered by the jus divinum when, in a given concrete situation, they are felt to be here and now indispensable, even though this indispensability which is binding upon us is clearly present only at a later epoch of the Church's history and not already at the end of the apostolic age, and even though it emerged from the concrete historical and social situation of the community.[5]

[5] On the basis of historical researches Y. Congar concerns himself with various aspects of the relationship of the episcopal office to the pope, Church, and communities in several studies in his most recent work, Ministères et

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

As I see it, we could in principle and as a matter of abstract speculation even go a step further and put the hypothesis that it would not be unequivocally contrary to the Catholic doctrine of the episcopal office to say that this episcopal authority could be borne by a collegium. What is asserted in the doctrinal declarations of the Church with regard to the episcopal office refers to the nature, the origin and the scope of this office. In these declarations it is indeed tacitly assumed as self-evident, in view of the de facto conditions prevailing in the Church, that at times this office is vested in an individual person. But whether this fact of history, that the office is vested in individuals, is necessarily identical with the episcopal office as such and of its very nature – this is a point on which, so it seems to me, no ultimately binding statement has been made. Surely too it is at least conceivable that it is possible from the point of view of dogmatic theology for the episcopal office to be vested in a collegiate body. The difference between the presbyteral constitution of some non-Catholic Churches of the Reformation on the one hand, and the monarchic constitution of the Catholic Church on the other points (if we abstract from the question of the papacy) not so much to a difference in the conception of the office holder, but rather to a difference as to the nature of this office itself. (Merely in passing it may be remarked that at the Council of Trent many factors which were legitimately present in the Church, but which had emerged as a result of free decisions on the Church's part, are presented as though they had been directly posited jure divino by divine revelation itself. This is a point that must also be borne in mind in our case by anyone who seeks to invoke the authority of Trent.) The fact [192] that we should not be too hasty in assuming that it would be contrary to the very nature of the Church according to a Catholic understanding for the episcopal office to be vested in a collegiate body in this way becomes apparent once we recognize the fact that a collegiate entity, namely the college of bishops in union with the pope as the head of this college, is as such the bearer of the powers of the Church in their fulness.[6] Now this consideration should not give the impression that we are seeking to imply that it is opportune for individual Churches to have a presbyteral constitution of this kind, one in which the bearer of the episcopal office as Catholics understand it should be a collegium (which in the nature of things would be small). All that we are seeking to make clear by this consideration is that at least at first sight the relationship of a bishop to the directive bodies subordinate to him and collaborating with him within a local Church can be conceived of in very varied ways, seeing that it is not simply or certainly contrary to Catholic doctrine to conceive of a local Church having a truly collegiate form of leadership at its head. The importance of directive bodies which are collegiate in character working with and under the bishop can certainly be greater than it de facto is nowadays according to the valid juridical norms without the dogmatically valid juridical constitution of the Church necessarily being threatened thereby.

This brings us to a further consideration. The relationship of the bishop to those other bodies who share in the direction of a local Church could juridically speaking assume more precise and more intelligible forms without the prerogatives certainly or probably belonging to the bishop as a matter of dogmatic theology being threatened or diminished thereby. In order to throw light upon this statement let us begin by pointing to an analogous case in which the example intended to throw light upon the question actually constitutes the higher analogate. In 1970 the International Commission of Theologians at Rome unanimously declared that it was desirable for the pope himself juridically and as a matter of principle, though obviously jure humano, to devise rules for the way in which he might collaborate communion ecclésiale (Paris, 1971).

---

[6] On the subject of the relationship between the episcopate and the primate cf. the volume published by the author in collaboration with J. Ratzinger: Episkopat und Primat, Quaestiones Disputatae II (Freiburg, 2nd ed., 1963), and the article, 'On the Relationship between the Pope and the College of Bishops', Theological Investigations X (London and New York, 1973), pp. 50-70.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

with the college of bishops rather than for him to decide the forms which this collaboration should take intermittently and according to the particular case involved. They declared that so far from [193] being in contradiction to the prerogatives certainly belonging to the pope as a matter of doctrine, this would actually be opportune nowadays, and would conduce to the efficiency and credibility of his office. Just as a pope can draw up rules in collaboration with a secular sovereign for the nomination of a bishop by means of a general concordat (and not a fresh concordat for each individual case), and just as these rules are in principle binding upon him, so too he can a fortiori arrive at a juridically speaking more precise set of rules governing his collaboration with the episcopate, and of course such rules would also be binding upon him (as in the case of a concordat with secular powers) even when in particular cases he found this less agreeable, or when it led to consequences in which he did not find himself involved when such general rules did not exist. As we have said, the International Commission of Theologians declared that such a course was not only doctrinally possible but was actually opportune for present-day conditions because through it the rule of the pope would achieve a higher intelligibility and effectiveness, and thereby too this office would acquire a greater credibility. Now a fortiori the same applies to the bishop in his office in relation to those other directive bodies and the rest of the institutions within his diocese. And this remains true even if we assume that the episcopal office is monarchic in character. The decisions which a bishop arrives at in virtue of those powers attributed to him alone within his Church are bound by the nature of the matters involved. It is true that according to the Church's laws as at present in force, apart from the pope there is no higher authority to test whether a given decision on the part of a bishop is in conformity with the nature of the matter involved so far as the practical validity of such a decision is concerned. At the same time when we say this we have no intention of disputing the fact that it is possible for bishops to take decisions which a Christian can and must refuse to obey as a matter of his conscience. But since in any case the decisions of a bishop are objectively bound by the nature of the matter involved and cannot be arrived at arbitrarily, it is necessary for the bishop to arrive at a preliminary judgement before taking any such decision. Now it is certain that included among the factors which a bishop must first take into consideration before arriving at such a decision are those various bodies which exist within a diocese and which can contribute their specialist knowledge and counsel in the process of arriving at the prior judgement. Obviously such counsels are, and always have been, available to him. But the point we are concerned with here is the recognition of the fact that it is perfectly consistent with the nature of the monarchic episcopate, and actually opportune for the [194] effectiveness, intelligibility and credibility of the bishop's office, for the collaboration between these consultative bodies and the bishop to be juridically regulated, and moreover in general terms, not in a way that is always dependent from case to case upon the prudent estimate of the bishop alone. To put the matter in blunter and more general terms: it is not contrary to the nature of the episcopal office for the bishop, in specific cases governed by general rules, to be dependent in his decisions upon a votum deliberativum over and above a votum consultativum. In such a case the right of recourse to the Holy See would still always remain open to him, and even, in extreme cases, the right of reserving his conscience in virtue of which he could refuse his consent to a decision by which he would otherwise be juridically bound, thereby rendering the decision invalid. But these two possibilities, which leave intact the power of decision belonging to a monarchic episcopate, still do not rule out the possibility of formulating juridical rules of a general kind governing that collaboration between a bishop and his official bodies which he needs in order to arrive at decisions which do due justice to the matters involved. The precise form which such regulations should assume in terms of diocesan laws or general laws applicable to all dioceses cannot be set forth here by a dogmatic theologian. Diocesan synods should apply themselves to such questions, and should not be too hasty in

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

allowing themselves to be frustrated in decisions on this question by assertions (such for instance as that put forward against the Synod of Meissen) that such rules derogate from the inalienable rights of the bishop. Rules of this kind could for instance perfectly well include the setting up of a court of appeal such that even a bishop, at least in normal cases, would be bound by its decisions.

By means of such rules it would be possible gradually to eliminate from the Church and her officials a certain paternalism which certainly does not belong to the jus divinum in the Church, yet which is nevertheless very often present and, moreover, still present even in the Church of today and in her official ministers. I believe that instances of such paternalism are to be found when the official concerned is too hasty in having recourse merely to his formal authority, and in which he makes it impossible to achieve any insight into the reasons justifying his decision or feels that his formal authority is being attacked and is unwilling to submit his judgement to a critical examination by some other authoritative body (whether in a theoretical or a juridical sense). Paternalism arises in those cases in which the chief shepherd of the flock feels himself to be in the position of a 'father' who, in virtue of his own 'experience' or of the Holy Spirit, knows better in all matters than his immature children, even though in [195] the case we are supposing we are concerned neither with children nor with those who certainly do not recognize the Holy Spirit. Paternalism arises in those cases in which the decision and the formulation of it lack that intelligibility which they might have. To counteract paternalism of this kind the framing of positive juridical rules governing the relationship and collaboration between bishop and other authoritative bodies in the diocese would be very valuable, though of course only provided that these juridical rules did not make the opinion and judgement of these other authoritative bodies once more answerable merely to the prudent estimation of the bishop alone. In this connection what we have in mind is obviously not the kind of rules which merely generate a sort of bureaucracy by some kind of Parkinson's law, frustrating the freedom and personal initiative of all, or even merely the personal charism of a bishop. Rightly framed rules can perfectly well be means of setting freedom itself free, and act precisely as a guard against any regimentation of it.

Many further dogmatic considerations could certainly be put forward, which would still further promote a creative re-shaping of the episcopal office for today. For instance a point which might be considered in greater detail is that the election of the pope at least emerges from a collegiate body which arrives at a juridical decision of supreme importance. Again in this connection we may consider that not all the problems entailed are solved merely by saying that it is the designation of the person that is in question and not the handing over of an authority possessed by the elective body itself. And if we bear these points in mind then we shall at any rate recognize that an election from below need not necessarily be in principle inconsistent with the nature of the Church seeing that the creation of the supreme official in the Church takes place in no other way whatever than by election from below.[7] Furthermore there are very many dogmatic questions which still remain completely open and which need to be thought out concerning the precise relationship between the episcopal office and the priesthood. And the answers to these questions would also be important for our present-day understanding of the episcopal office. Thus for instance the usual distinction between potestas ordinis and potestas jurisdictionis is far from being unambiguously clear and fully able to be applied, and the problems involved in it were to some extent recognized even at the Second Vatican Council. For instance the power of the priest to celebrate the Eucharist, which, according to the traditional theory can never wholly be withdrawn from him, eo ipso, on a [196] right understanding of the Eucharist constitutes the power of presiding over the [7] cf. the author's observations on the principles involved in 'The Episcopal Office', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 313-360.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

supreme celebration of a community. And if this is the case how can the usual theological teaching deny to a priest any kind of fundamental potestas jurisdictionis unless he holds it as a power that is totally distinct from the potestas ordinis as a result of a special act on the part of the bishop? On this showing the question would then arise, for instance, of whether the formation of a Christian community under the direction of a priest can be conceived of altogether in these terms as the formation of a further extension of the sphere of authority by an act of the bishop from above, as after all it is commonly conceived of. These and similar questions which the dogmatic theologian poses to himself could be pursued further, and the answers we find to them could presumably also bring us a more enlightened understanding of that doctrine which really is dogmatically binding of the episcopate and of the scope which remains open to us for a future re-shaping of it. But we cannot enter in any greater detail into such questions at this point.

The problem can also be used from a quite different theological aspect. The question can be posed of whence we can really adduce a valid criterion for the concrete shaping of ecclesiastical office. Here we are proceeding from an assumption which, it is true, is not universally accepted by all theologians, yet which is perfectly sustainable, the assumption, namely, that the Church herself has been given the power to articulate the Church's own official ministry, which is ultimately one, and to break it down into specific offices of various kinds and degrees according to the demands of the time. The triad which is current among us of bishop, priest and deacon, therefore, is regarded as jus divinum to the extent that the one office in the Church which she must have of her very nature has such a hierarchical structure, but it is not assumed that the dividing up of this one office into these three offices is the only possible way in which it could be divided. If we take this assumption as our starting-point – and in itself it does not imply any prejudice against this triad as inopportune for today – then the theological question arises of what the criterion is for dividing up this office in a way that is appropriate to the particular conditions. Of course it is possible to reply to this question that it is the fulfilling of the function of the Church that constitutes this criterion; that the official ministry must be divided up and formulated in positive terms among the particular officials in such a way that this function of the Church can be fulfilled in the most effective way possible. And we might add to this reply that the function of the Church is rightly to preach the gospel and to dispense the sacraments throughout the ages, that faith, hope and charity may be [197] present in as many individuals as possible and in the most radical forms possible, and that this may be manifested even at the social level and in the constitution of the Church herself. This statement, together with the further precisions which can be made within it, is certainly correct. Yet we must after all be conscious of how formal and abstract, and of how ineffectual this reply is, factors which are still present even if we assume that we know in quite precise terms what is meant by preaching the gospel and administering the sacraments. We should ask ourselves whether it is clear that the present-day forms in which the official ministry of the Church is structured as they de facto exist at a quite concrete level, together with all the offices and institutions they entail, are really capable of being traced back to so formal a principle as this. And we have only to put this question to ourselves for it to become clear to us that we must reply to it in the negative, that this principle is inadequate to determine the concrete forms which the episcopal office should assume, even if we take into account that in such matters there is much that is matter for human estimation and which in no sense needs to be based on profound arguments. Perhaps, therefore, without seeking to provide any more precise justification for the point we are making, we might formulate the 'principle' we are seeking in the following terms: the principle and criterion for arriving at the concrete forms in which the Church's official ministry is to be articulated, and so too for the episcopal office, are to be deduced from the encounter at the empirical level which this official ministry makes with the concrete general social conditions, and, on this basis, the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ecclesiastical conditions too affecting the preaching of the gospel.[8]

All that can still be attempted here is to give some little explanation of the meaning and possible effectiveness of this principle, without claiming to provide any precise justification for it in theological terms, or to pursue it in its concrete consequences, the more so since this latter course is precisely the concern of the pastoral rather than the dogmatic theologian. In the principle we have formulated we have spoken of an empirical encounter. Here we are proceeding from the conviction that the practical application (and so too the ways in which we institutionalize the official ministry in practice) is not the mere application of prior general principles, but is rather an event of freedom, and thereby of a future which is unique in each particular case and as such has an autonomy of its own, being something more than merely the handmaid of theory. If this is correct, [198] then in order for the concrete forms in which the Church's office is institutionalized to be right the discovery of them can be arrived at only at the level of concrete experience and by experimentation. In this process we are of course right from the outset working from an enlightening awareness of what the Church is and what the preaching of the gospel is. But even this knowledge, which guides us in our experimentation, is merely present to us in its special historical concretion, which is constituted by the concrete situation of the present, yet constantly open to the future; a situation which, as the situation of the Church herself, of a society, is obviously in a primary sense a social situation. In consequence of this, in its concrete modalities and in the conceptual models and models for action which it contains this knowledge too is constantly subject to change in its encounter with the concrete social situation of the Church. And precisely on this account the discovery of the principles for the concrete forms in which the official ministry of the Church is institutionalized, forms which have to be continuously arrived at afresh, consists not merely in the application of an a priori theological knowledge of ecclesiology which we already have, but is matter for a process of experimentation in which theological ecclesiology itself without being deprived of its own nature, is subjected ever afresh to the pressures of the social situation in which the gospel has to be preached. This situation, therefore, is not one which exists over against the Church's awareness of her own nature as a concrete exterior reality upon which the Church acts from within itself. Rather it constitutes an intrinsic element in the Church's own concrete understanding of its own nature as it continuously discovers this afresh in a process of experimentation, an understanding which is discovered afresh only in a living process of experimentation of this kind, the outcome of which cannot be established beforehand.

We may now in a quite incidental way provide a few indications intended to show what is entailed in the principle we have just developed, which inevitably always remains at a still very abstract level. The exterior and interior situation of the Church is a situation which no longer needs to be monocultural, European or Western, one which albeit in varying degrees, survives in a diaspora situation in the midst of a pluralist environment or one which is in principle and in its institutions hostile to the Church itself. For the Church itself has either lost or not yet gained for itself not merely individuals but broad social groups. Everywhere it encounters a secular society which tolerates large marginal elements, i.e. groups with a notable range of variation which are not integrated into the society. Here we should surely discover and give an intelligible account [199] of an intrinsic connection which exists between those groups which are peripheral in a social sense and those which are so in an ecclesiastical sense. (It would be possible and important for the preaching strategy of the Church if those groups which have become alienated from the Church or have never really had any connections with her were also shown to be the groups which are socially

[8] cf. the author's 'Pastoral-Theological Observations on Episcopacy in the Teaching of Vatican II', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 361-368.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

disintegrated, if it could be established that the Church can only seriously come close to these groups and render itself credible to them for the preaching of the gospel if it seriously and effectively achieves solidarity with their social situation and their struggle, albeit in a manner appropriate to the Church as such.)

If any clear analysis of the social situation of the Church were arrived at with a view to its preaching and as an intrinsic element in its own understanding of itself, then surely it would become clear that the Church as it exists in its communities can only live in solidarity with those groups which are marginal in an ecclesiastical and social sense, and can only make its mission effective as a missionary Church. From being a national Church the Church either is or is of necessity becoming in the situation of today and tomorrow a Church of free believers in the midst of a diaspora situation. (Obviously this does not mean that the Church should not strive to awaken the greatest possible number of individuals to the faith in order to avoid becoming a sect in a defeatist sense.) The focal point for the Church to discharge its function, to achieve credibility and to perform its task of preaching the gospel, therefore, is now to be found in the local community at the roots of society, for it is here that its encounter with the special social situation is achieved, here that faith must emerge ever afresh, that faith which is no longer sustained by a homogeneous Christian public opinion or a socially homogeneous society. Here is achieved that solidarity with the struggle of the socially marginal groups. In the light of this it cannot be the case that the normal parish, i.e. the living community of the faith as based upon society and the Church, can continue to remain an extension of the administrative authority of a bishop as organized from above. If this way of putting it had not already been applied to a quite specific concrete attempt at forming such a community, and hence were not capable of provoking misunderstandings, we could say in all confidence: the life of the Church today is primarily lived in an ‘integrated community’. At this point we may permit ourselves a digression. The relationship between the bishop and the kind of priest, generally called a parish priest, who presides over a genuine, living, and fraternal community of the faith in fact remains theologically and historically speaking unexplained right down to the present day. This much can [200] confidently be asserted: in the old days the leader of such a community would have been called a bishop. And the question may be raised whether present-day bishops, by the standards of the patristic theology of the episcopate, are not somewhat in the position of supreme bishops or metropolitans or similar higher officials. This is no idle question of terminology. For behind this terminology a crucial fact might under certain circumstances lie concealed, the fact, namely, that by our use of this term ‘bishop’ we have deprived the leader of the concrete community, who, for the theology of the early Church is a bishop, of those tasks, powers and liberties which should really belong to him. The further question might then arise of whether what is asserted in theology of the college of bishops should not properly speaking apply, from a theological point of view to the college of parish priests, and whether that which we nowadays call the college of bishops is not after all at basis simply the inevitable organizational body representing the college of the parish priests = bishops. This question should not be regarded from the outset as heretical. We may for instance remember the many hundreds of Italian bishops who, by our standards, are after all simply parish priests of so many larger parishes. This digression acquires a practical significance the moment the basic community in the Church achieves a new importance, the moment that such a community, for all its union with the universal Church, forms itself from below by charismatic forces. For it has to be a ‘parish of persons’. It must be the kind of community in which it is a far more crucial question whether it has the power to win over afresh an individual from the secularized world than to preserve ten individuals from the remnants of the traditionally Christian society which still remain. Once a community of this kind has come to be the normal type of parish (and presumably it must so become), then the concrete reality of a diocese and of the episcopal office must alter too. In the case

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

supposed the diocese is made up of such communities of free believers in a secularized world, of communities, that is to say which acquire very varied structures in the way in which they find themselves socially committed as the concretizations of the fraternal love of Christians, communities which differ very notably from one another in their relationship to the ordained leader of the Eucharistic celebration, and so too to the leader of their community (assuming that these two personages are and are intended to remain identical). As a result the institution of them by the bishop, to the extent that any such institution is demanded by the unity of the Church, is in any case achieved in quite different forms of collaboration with the community itself than has formerly been the case. A diocese [201] composed of such communities of its very nature implies a different kind of bishop than that to which we have hitherto been accustomed. He will be one who has proved himself through the power of his charismatic personality, in virtue of which he has won fresh ground in the missionary field and has not merely presided over traditional territories inherited from the past. Presumably in the future the individual community will have a greater autonomy, and on this showing it would actually be conceivable that the bishop, as representing the unity of such communities, would be one of the (episcopal) parish priests presiding over one such community. And this in itself would be enough to ensure a fraternal union with his fellow parish priests. Perhaps – this is something which appears to follow from what has been said – we should conduct real experiments among ourselves as well and not for instance merely in Latin America or in the missionary countries in the usual sense of the term. Perhaps the attempt should be made to found new communities existing in genuine solidarity with those groups which are marginal in a social and ecclesiastical sense even though these might initially cut across the normal territorial boundaries of the local parishes. We should in all confidence put up with the resulting mixture between the two. Such communities, which we would be attempting to integrate in a quite new way in an ecclesiastical and social sense with the groups which are socially and ecclesiastically marginal should in this respect develop their structures from within themselves in a manner appropriate to this task. It would then ipso facto emerge at the empirical level (obviously in combination with a theological process of reflection, which is indispensable) what structures, what offices a community of this kind needs, how it can live in a vital and fraternal union with other communities both of the new and the old kind, and what supra-communal juridical structures are necessary for such a union to be achieved. A form of diocese and a form of episcopal office of a new kind would gradually be developed without the historical continuity with the earlier form of diocese and episcopal office having to be lost. It would surely appear that the true theological nature of the episcopal office continues to be maintained by the ultimate identity of the Church through all ages, though this does not mean that the concrete form of the episcopal office, in which this true nature is concretized, simply has to maintain itself in petrified form with the result that the fulfilment of the functions which a bishop of today and tomorrow has would be frustrated. But, as we recognize, the dogmatic theologian is already going beyond his brief and entering upon an area in which it is the task of the practical theologian to operate.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[202]

12

HOW THE PRIEST SHOULD VIEW HIS OFFICIAL MINISTRY

What we are concerned with here is the dogmatic principles in thee light of which a priest of the Catholic Church should view his official ministry. Obviously within the limited setting of an article these will not be expounded as systematically or as fully as would be necessary in a treatise on the sacramental theology involved. Our present intention, rather, is simply to bring out a few aspects which are commonly less clearly recognized, and which, therefore, may also be accounted as of special interest.[1]

It is probably possible appropriately to define this narrower theme from two aspects which, in a manner that is strange and far from self-evident, converge so as to demarcate the question. The first aspect consists in the fact that the social image of the priest of today has come to be a problem, although one that arises in different ways and in different degrees according to the differences prevailing from country to country. The priest of today is prompted by theoretical and practical considerations arising from within the Church as well as by others arising from the conditions of secular society, to ask himself afresh, and with a certain insecurity, what function he can still credit himself with in a Church in which the laity have become mature, and what role he can still regard himself as playing in a society which has become secular.

[203] The second aspect which can contribute to a precise demarcation of the theme lies in the sphere of biblical theology and the history of dogma. The findings of modern theology here – though admittedly they had not yet emerged so clearly at the Second Vatican Council – show us, namely, that down to the first few decades of the second century the official ministry of the Church had not yet acquired that clear and firm shape and place in the Church as a whole and in the individual community, nor yet that threefold articulation into diaconate, priesthood and episcopate, which we have become accustomed to in the Church from the second century onwards. Yet hitherto we have more or less taken it for granted that this goes back to the very origins of the Church. As we have said: these two viewpoints converge.

The position of the priest today within the Church and also in secular society seems to make it advisable or necessary to introduce wider possibilities of change in the outward form of the priesthood. At the same time, as we see it, the recent insights afforded by biblical theology and the history of dogma into the development of the official ministry in the Church during the apostolic age justify us, from the point of view of dogmatic theology, in allowing for a wider variation in the outward form of the priesthood without on this account calling in question its abiding nature, its genetic constitution or genotype (if we may express it so). It is from these considerations that the subject of our present brief remarks arises.

In a first section we intend briefly to indicate the findings and the scope in terms of doctrine (at least within Catholic theology) of these recent insights arising from the study of biblical theology and the history of dogma. In a second section certain consequences will be drawn from this with regard to possible variations in the concrete form of the official

[1] The author has put forward similar attempts from a theological point of view in the following studies: ‘The Point of Departure in Theology for Determining the Nature of the Priestly Office’, Theological Investigations XII (London and New York, 1974), pp. 35-38; ‘Theological Reflections on the Priestly Image of Today and Tomorrow’, ibid., pp. 39-60; from the spiritual and intellectual point of view the following of the author’s works should be mentioned: ‘Priestly Existence’, Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 239-262, and Knechte Christi. Meditationen zum Priestertum (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1967); also, Einübung priesterliche Existenz (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1970).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

priesthood, consequences which admittedly we shall here be stating merely as doctrinally possible (a point which we shall have to emphasize still more strongly at a later stage). This is not ipso facto intended to imply any decision on the question of whether such variations are or are not opportune on ecclesiastical, pastoral or spiritual grounds, or from the point of view of secular society.

We have said that biblical theology and the history of dogma have yielded fresh insights into the history of the priestly ministry in the apostolic age. Admittedly it is important to understand aright what the 'new features' here consist in. Protestant biblical theology and history of dogma has already long been emphasizing these findings, though in a manner which makes them appear irreconcilably opposed to Catholic [204] doctrine on the official priesthood. Probably it is partly for this very reason that it is only in the most recent times that Catholic exegesis and history of dogma for its part has come explicitly to uphold these findings and also to maintain that they are wholly reconcilable with the Catholic doctrine of the priesthood as rightly understood. Obviously we cannot here provide any proof of the assertions we are putting forward in terms of exegesis and the history of dogma. To attempt any such proof from the sources of the New Testament and of history would take too much time.

For our present considerations it is unimportant whether the theses we are putting forward are fully developed as they stand, whether they call for further precisions etc. Nevertheless for the study we propose in the second section of our considerations it is important firmly to recognize that the theses we have in mind are not inconceivable from the point of view of dogmatic theology. In other words we can take them as our starting-point for our practical considerations.

In order to understand the statements which we shall have to make explicitly and directly concerning the priesthood in the apostolic age certain preparatory investigations would be advisable. In itself a presentation of the so-called jus divinum[2] in Catholic ecclesiology should be adduced. Here, however, we can make only a few brief statements on this point. The jus divinum in the Church does not necessarily have to be traced back to any explicit declaration on the part of Jesus or of an apostle as one endowed with revelation (any more than many propositions which doctrinally speaking are absolutely binding). The jus divinum can also be implicitly present in other realities of revelation or in propositions relating to these, and may emerge from such realities or propositions in the conscious awareness of the Church only by a gradual process. The realities which we nowadays declare to be juris divini within the Church were not necessarily all present right from the origins in the primitive Church. We say that revelation closed only 'with the death of the last apostle', and by the same token not all the realities which are juris divini need necessarily have been present from the origins. At least within the apostolic age (and we should avoid naively identifying the end of this with the physical death of Paul or the last of the Twelve),[3] such realities could appear for the first time, could acquire firm form and then come to belong to the irreversible and eternally valid stock of realities belonging to the Church [205] throughout all ages. They do not on this account forfeit their character as being of divine right. It cannot in fact be proved that a reality of the kind we are speaking of was present in all areas or in all the decades of the apostolic age, nor is it possible in any way to prove the contrary as a matter of more or less certain historical fact. Here we are passing over the question of whether, and in what sense, it may even be possible or conceivable to speak of a development of the jus divinum (and not merely of our conscious awareness of it) in the post-apostolic Church.

---

[2] On this cf. the author's article, 'Reflection on the Concept of "Jus Divinum" in Catholic Thought', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 219-243.
[3] On this cf. the author's Inspiration in the Bible (Edinburgh and London, 1961).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

These then are the preliminary remarks we need to make concerning the historicity of the jus divinum in the Church. This in itself makes it possible to conceive of a degree of variation in the official ministry which is not inconsiderable. But following upon these preliminary remarks we may now put forward a few theses with regard to the official ministry in the Church of the apostolic age. As we have said we are doing this without presenting the arguments from biblical theology and the history of dogma supporting these theses.[4]

If we want to achieve a right understanding of the official priesthood, one that does justice to its nature and is historically credible, we should not simply assume as self-evident the position that right from the very origins of the apostolic age there were three offices in the Church, namely bishop, priest and deacon, and that these and only these were always present within her as clearly distinguished and defined. Even abstracting for the time being from the question of whether there were not yet other offices in the Church at the end of the apostolic age, such as for instance that of the didaskolos, abstracting too from the further question of how on this showing any place is left for the Petrine office, whether as included in or as presiding over this triad, it is in any case uncertain that this triad existed in all parts of the apostolic Church or in all decades of the apostolic age in such a way that we should regard the episcopate as an official leadership, monarchic in character and presiding over the presbyteroi within the Church. This, it is true, is the picture which seems to be reflected in Ignatius of Antioch, though here it applies primarily to the Syrian Church. We wish to authenticate the nature of the Church's official ministry, and especially of the priesthood as doctrinally [206] defined, on the basis of scripture and the apostolic age. And precisely because of this we must first proceed from the single ministry found in the local Church in the concrete, for it is here that the Church as such achieves its manifestation. By comparison with this single official ministry we can regard as secondary the ways in which it is subdivided and articulated into several possible higher or lower offices regarded as subordinate functions within the single supreme official ministry in the Church or in a given local Church. At the same time, as we have already pointed out in our introductory remarks, this position does not necessarily imply that we cannot any longer regard this way of subdividing the official ministry as of jus divinum. This single official ministry, i.e. the single power of direction within an ecclesiastical community in all its dimensions does, it is true imply an apostolic succession to the extent that even according to the very earliest tenets to be found in the records of the Church she must have had an official leadership of this kind, and to the extent that the Church relies eternally upon the witness of the apostles and upon that which she herself was right from the origins in the apostles and through them. It is also clear that when we say that this necessary and ultimately single official ministry within the Church has authority to claim allegiance in faith and conscience from the individual, this authority is based not upon the will of the officially appointed leader, but upon the authority of the Church as one and whole which was brought into being by the Christ-event, and upon the fact of being authentically derived from her. This means that this authority must be called apostolic and deriving from Christ in the fullest sense. Scripture bears witness to the uniqueness of the apostolic office, though it is not something which constitutes merely the first stage, in a temporal sense, of the official ministry in the Church. Yet with regard to this apostolic office we should be cautious in calling the bishops the successors of the apostles in a sense which goes beyond what has just been said. After the apostles the officially appointed ministers in the Church (however they may figure, whatever names they may be called by in [4] In this context attention should also be drawn to the Letter of the German Bishops on the Priestly Office – a Biblical and Doctrinal Aid. This document was issued on the 11 November 1969, and a special printing of it was disseminated (Treves, 1969). In the following period the subject emerged at the level of the universal Church with the preparations for the Synod of Bishops of 1975 at Rome, and was brought increasingly to the fore. Here we need only to remind ourselves of this discussion.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the New Testament itself) did not simply receive the powers of the apostles (only a few special privileges being withheld). What they received, rather, was an official ministry which was necessary and which carried the apostolic Church forwards, one which, even though deriving from the apostolate and of its nature closely similar to it, nevertheless represents a new official ministry with a line of succession of its own. The situation here is precisely parallel to that of the post-apostolic Church which is not simply the apostolic Church itself as projected into a subsequent age, even though it is permanently based upon this apostolic [207] Church. As a matter of principle, and precisely in its bearing upon our later considerations, it is important to recognize that the articulation of the single official leadership in the Church into several distinct offices with distinct functions of their own is secondary. In this sense it seems that in the apostolic Church as it existed in various regions and in various decades there were variations of constitution among its communities, some being more presbyteral and collegiate in character, while in others a monarchic form of episcopate was more prevalent. Here we can set aside the question of what the various national and cultural backgrounds and origins of these variations of constitutions in the different communities may have been, how far, for instance, the characteristics they display are in part Judaeo-Christian and in part Hellenistic. A further question which must remain undiscussed here is how these communities, with their sharp divergencies of structure, gave expression in historical, social and institutional ways to that unity of the Church which is, on any showing, conferred upon them by Christ himself, and which, according to the tenets of the apostolic age, must also be given concrete manifestation. As we have already said, yet a further question which must remain unexplored for our present purposes is how far and in what way this ministry was articulated and subdivided according to the special needs of a given community to cater for further functions over and above those which in a later sense are called the episcopate, presbyterate, and diaconate. In the situation as we have presented it it is also obvious that we cannot establish any firm or definable boundaries, as consciously recognized at that time, between the official ministry and ministers in the strictly juridical sense of the term on the one hand, and the free charisms which existed in the Church on the other, which were recognized as a necessary part of her life, and which under certain circumstances were not immune to a certain process of institutionalization. It is important to notice also that on any realistic view of biblical theology we are not in any position to establish that in New Testament times a special power was recognized with regard to the celebration of the Eucharist such that it was reserved only to a few and conferred by the laying on of hands. All that we can establish from this is that at the Last Supper the Lord entrusted his Church with the anamnesis of his death. This is obviously not to dispute the fact that it must have been borne in upon the Church's conscious awareness ever more clearly that the normal celebration of the supreme mystery had to take place under the direction of her officially appointed leaders, and that the recognition of this as it developed can perfectly well be conceived of as having been achieved even within the apostolic stage of the history of [208] the jus divinum in the Church.[5] At the end of the apostolic age, in the Deutero-Pauline epistles, we see that the normal way of appointing an individual to the leadership of a community was through the laying on of hands. There is no difficulty in conceiving of the conferring of this official ministry by the laying on of hands and as accompanied by prayer as a sacrament and also as having been instituted by the Lord. For undoubtedly in virtue of its content and its function within the Church founded by Christ an official ministry of this kind does imply an irrevocable promise of grace by God such that, by the assistance which God causes to be imparted to the official ministry, he continuously assists his Church and [5] On this cf. in the present volume 'What is a Sacrament?' and also the earlier study, The Church and the Sacraments, Quaestiones Disputatae 9 (Edinburgh/ London, 1963).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

guarantees her effectiveness to save and her indefectibility. Again the sacramentality of order is based upon the Church as derived from Christ and upon her special quality as the eschatologically victorious sign of God's will to save.

If therefore we seek to determine the task of the priest as official minister on the basis of the New Testament, we should not take as our starting-point the power to celebrate the Eucharist, even though since the apostolic age this has, at least in normal cases, been reserved to the priesthood. The legitimate starting-point in the New Testament for determining the nature of the official priesthood is to be found, rather in the function of official leadership of a Christian community. A further factor, corresponding to this, is that the lines of demarcation between episcopate and presbyterate in the New Testament are still very fluid and indeterminate. 'Leadership of a community' still includes both. It is obvious that leadership of a community is not to be conceived of according to the model of leadership functions in a secular society, but rather must be conceived of on the basis of the nature of the Church itself as the fruit of salvation and as mediating salvation. On this basis – and this also means on the basis of the Church as the single community of the faith and of avowed missionary commitment – the preaching of the gospel cannot be excluded from this function of leadership. The 'ministry of the word', as an official commission, is certainly to be numbered among the functions of any such official leadership in spite of what we find, for instance, in Ephesians 4. Here the relationship between the 'shepherds' and the 'teachers' is still not sufficiently clearly defined, and hence we have to allow for the possibility that in the theology of some later writings of the New Testament a certain basic autonomy is ascribed to the teachers as [209] compared with the shepherds, the bishops. (These 'teachers' and 'shepherds' belong to the beginning of the post-apostolic age, as distinct from the apostolic age in the strict sense.) We must consider the nature of the word of preaching and of faith uttered on the basis of Christ's commission, i.e. the radical 'event' character and exhibitive character of the word of preaching in general. In the light of this the connection between the power to preach and the power to dispense the sacraments as vested in the official leaders of the Church is relatively easy to understand. The word that is effective ex opere operato, that which is uttered in the sacraments, is the word of preaching in general in its most intense form. It is the word which the Church utters with an absolute commitment to the individual in significant situations in the concrete circumstances of his life as emanating from the Church's own irrevocable promise of grace. A further point, arising from what has been said, bears upon that conception of the priesthood which was put forward at the Council of Trent, and which throws into relief the Eucharistic and reconciliatory power attached to it. While in its positive content this is in no sense disputed, it probably does need to be freed from that one-sidedness which is the outcome of the Counter-Reformation bias, and to be set in a broader context, one which is attested not only by the New Testament but also by tradition as a whole. Hence it is unnecessary here to provide a further special interpretation on the basis of the official teaching of the Church of these theses formulated on the basis of the New Testament concerning the doctrinally binding quality of the official priesthood. Such interpretations have already explicitly been made, chiefly at the Fourth Lateran Council, at Trent, and also in more recent papal encyclicals and at the Second Vatican Council.[6]

The precise point we are concerned with in these brief remarks, largely unsupported as they are by justifying arguments, is this: the Church has at her disposal an extremely wide scope for developing variations within her necessary and ultimately single official ministry, in accordance with the needs of a particular age, the variations of cultural milieu etc., and of [6] Obviously the discussion contained in the preparatory documents for the Synod of Bishops at Rome, 1971, as also the debates on this compilation itself, should be noticed for a fuller treatment of this point. Nevertheless they themselves for their part could not achieve any further progress on the most essential and important aspects of the question.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

subdividing that official ministry into various individual offices, regulating the relationships between these offices, establishing and defining the functions of the particular officials, and, without prejudice to the sacramentality of the process by which offices are conferred, defining [210] the concrete conditions under which they are to be handed on. Perhaps even it is open to the Church to distinguish between a normal way of conferring its official ministry and an extraordinary way, justifiable in cases of need. Possibly too it might arrange that the selection of an official minister should be by election on the part of the members of the Church or other bodies having the right to vote. All this remains fully within the scope of what is doctrinally possible, even though the justifiable concrete forms which all these matters assume in a given age or a given situation are to be decided not merely on the basis of what is doctrinally possible, but also on the basis of the jus humanum of the particular age involved and in accordance with its special conditions. Even if we say that the threefold division of the official ministry into episcopate, diaconate and presbyterate is binding upon the Church, and as a prescription is irrevocable and juris divini, something which has been developed in the apostolic age and is already abidingly present at the outset of the post-apostolic age – even then, the following point still always remains to be borne in mind: even on this showing the precise content of these three offices is still far from clear, and is surely capable of modification by the Church. Incidentally the same thing also appears in connection with other factors in the theology of order. For instance priests can confirm, and there is nothing against the position that they have a positive, albeit restricted, power to ordain others as priests. Properly speaking, therefore, the prerogatives of the episcopate can be regarded as consisting merely in a potestas jurisdictionis and not in a potestas ordinis. But the one point that cannot seriously be disputed is that such a division of the potestas ordinis, introducing wide variations of form and degree into it, is possible and to a large extent at least is subject to the judgement of the Church itself.[7]

A further way in which it can be shown that this single official ministry within the Church can admit of variations in the way in which it is subdivided, despite the existence of this triad of offices, is this: it is doctrinally speaking not inconceivable to suppose that the Church might consciously act in the same way as it presumably did at the end of the Patristic age and in the Middle Ages, in devising subdivisions of sacramental order. Today too the Church could create new subordinate degrees of its official ministry such as would correspond to the needs of the age without our having to deny from the outset or perforce that these had the character of [211] a sacrament. In the case of the episcopate, despite its sacramental character and its derivation from Christ, the appointment of a bishop can be conceived of as taking place in the most varied ways without thereby derogating from its doctrinal nature or denying that every such appointment must take place in a spirit of harmony with the entire Church and so too with the pope. In the same way also the relationship of a bishop to the presbyterium is subject to wide variations, for it falls virtually completely within the sphere of the potestas jurisdictionis. It is true that the episcopate (taken in the sense of an official power belonging to specific individuals rather than all the bishops collectively) is juris divini, i.e. an episcopal power consisting of an official teaching authority, an official priesthood, and an official pastoral position must exist in the Church. But however true this may be, I still do not believe that it is unequivocally certain that this episcopal power as such necessarily has to be vested in a single individual, and could not be vested in a collegium. If we envisage the possibility of an episcopal power having a collegiate subject then the possibility of variations in the relationship which the episcopate bears to the presbyterate becomes still clearer. Even in the [7] The prerogatives of a bishop, in virtue of which only a bishop can consecrate other bishops, is relatively unimportant the moment we realize in principle that all other episcopal powers in respect both of the potestas ordinis and the potestas jurisdictionis can also be found in the so-called simple priest.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

case supposed there would always be a difference between bishops and priests, and yet an 'episcopate' of the kind we are thinking of as it existed in a particular Church, would have a 'presbyteral', i.e. a collegiate, structure. Although we weigh up all these doctrinal possibilities this does not ipso facto mean that we are recommending that they should be put into practice. Other aspects have to be taken into consideration so that not everything that is doctrinally possible is ipso facto advisable. It is important to ensure the continuity of a tradition which, although it may not be doctrinally compelling, is nevertheless historical. Because of this, because of pastoral requirements, because of conditions within the Church or in secular society, certain possible courses which are doctrinally conceivable may be wholly ruled out as practical measures in the concrete. Indeed the conditions of a particular age may perhaps make them morally impermissible because of the evil consequences which would ensue if they were put into practice. Thus though we are now about to draw further consequences for the re-shaping of the priesthood in our own times from the theses put forward in the first section of these considerations of ours, still we are in no sense ipso facto coming to any particular decision as to whether such possible courses are opportune in the concrete. On the other hand, so it seems to me, our present-day situation within the Church and in secular society is such that it is no mere futile playing with ideas for us to raise such questions concerning these possible ways of re-shaping [212] the priesthood as an official ministry which are doctrinally possible and yet widely different from one another in their outward aspect compared with the form the priesthood has taken up to the present. Nowadays many circles and groups of priests in the most widely contrasting lands are in fact engaging in considerations of this kind. Hence it is reasonable for us to put these theses contained in our first section to the test to see whether, they are doctrinally possible, even though we are still in no sense arriving at a decision from the pastoral point of view, and even though we must unquestionably guard against the temptation of concluding that a given course is advisable merely on the grounds that it is new. It is also obvious that changes in the concrete form of the priesthood, to the extent that this form has been established by juridical decisions which are juris humani, can take place only with the assent of the competent representatives of this human law. (In this connection, admittedly, the question of the formation of a legitimate consuetudo contra legem has to remain open.) But considerations of this kind with regard to the doctrinal possibility of new forms of the priesthood are reasonable even if they can be brought to realization only in a future epoch. Even the priest of today in his life and his official ministry has a certain scope for freedom and thereby for responsibility. Realities of the future must be prepared for, and moreover they must be prepared for 'from below' because it is in no sense the case that they can be brought to realization solely by a sheer sudden decree 'from above'. The affairs of the future call for preliminaries in the present. New 'phanotypes' are prepared for by micromutations in the present. This also applies to the priesthood. And hence the priest of today must positively assume responsibility for the priesthood of tomorrow and the forms which it will assume in the concrete. This is why we are enquiring into some of the characteristics which may perhaps be conceivable in the: future, which are fully within the scope of the nature of the priesthood as doctrinally defined, because this has a far greater degree of flexibility than is commonly supposed. For we are all too ready unreflectingly to identify the nature of the priesthood with the concrete forms of it to which we ourselves are accustomed in our own lives. But this will suffice by way of introduction to this second section. In what follows we shall now proceed to mention, though not in any systematic order, some of the possible: variations of this kind which seem to us at least worth considering for the future of the priesthood.

Probably it would be possible to have many more specialized priests and types of priests who were more clearly distinguished from one another. The tasks, functions and ministries within the Church which its [213] priests have de facto fulfilled in the course of Church history have all along varied very greatly. The priest has figured as the pastor of a concrete local community, as an expert in theology, as a contemplative monk, as a missionary among pagans, as a travelling preacher, chiefly in the apostolic orders, as an administrative official, as a politician or a poet. These and many other concrete forms of the priestly office are already to be found throughout the course of history. Yet it has been left more or less to the Church's powers of improvisation or to chance and the random changes of history to produce them. These differentiations have not been institutionalized and it has remained to a large extent obscure whether forms of this kind as they exist in concrete life have constituted variations of the priesthood as such or merely external supplementary functions in the life of the priest such that properly speaking they have nothing to do with his priesthood even though not irreconcilable with his priestly office. Today and in the future there is a question which we may perhaps have to raise precisely in view of the abundance of functions and ministries in the Church of the New Testament which mutually condition one another and which we are still far from having been fully defined. The question is whether we should not plainly reflect upon and actually institutionalize quite specific types of functions and ways of life which, while clearly different from one another, nevertheless constitute variations of the single essence of the priesthood. This question has a wholly practical bearing. In view of the social, cultural and individual differences between the men of today we may ask ourselves whether entry into the priesthood could not be opened to younger, and especially to older Christians, even when they are incapable or unwilling to undertake in principle the whole spectrum of priestly duties which we of today still regard as belonging to or concomitant with the priesthood. Perhaps side by side with the 'all-rounder' priest as we think of him we can imagine a type of priest for the future who from the outset is deputed only to a much more narrowly defined function and who has received a correspondingly more specialized formation. Such a one would be able to perform still more as a specialist in this more narrowly defined function than the priest of today is able to since the latter still has to be able to do everything that falls within the scope of his functions (at least according to the official theory). These new and more limited types of priesthood would not need simply to coincide with the earlier specialist types already recognized and put into practice though not in any proper sense institutionalized. Possible examples of such new types of priest would be the priest as artist, as a man of secular learning, as a psychotherapist, as a journalist, as a social worker, [214] as the leader of specific forms of Christian communities developed from below which would not be identical with the local parish communities etc. There is no need to object to all this that the powers of celebrating the Eucharist and forgiving sins are powers which cannot be eliminated from our idea of the essence of the priesthood. For obviously a priest of this kind would likewise have these powers. But even while these general priestly powers would be conferred upon him he would in normal cases be ordained by an ordination which was, in a certain sense, relative, with a view to the particular human groups which his specialized task was designed to cater for. Obviously the existence of many such specialized types of priesthood would give rise to the question of whether the special functions to which they were deputed could not just as well be exercised by laymen. But while we do not intend to discuss this question in any greater detail at this point, this much at least should be said: this problem is already present in many concrete types of the priesthood as it exists today in which the assigning of such specific functions to priests excludes laymen from the same functions. In any case the priesthood as it exists in the concrete today and tomorrow cannot be restricted exclusively to those tasks which, on a doctrinal interpretation (at least in normal cases) are ascribed to the priest alone. For otherwise we would in fact have to withdraw even the office of preaching from the realm of priestly functions.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In this context we may at least make mention of the problem of combining the priestly office with a specifically secular calling which is not integrated into the priestly function as an intrinsic element in it but is exercised rather on other grounds by an individual who is at the same time a priest. Since Paul the tent-maker such ways of combining the priesthood with a secular calling have constantly recurred for reasons of necessity, because of particularly strong and unsuppressible gifts in a specialist field, or on grounds which turn out in the end to be missionary in character. Surely we do not need to explain at any length the fact that in the concrete circumstances of human life, albeit not from the viewpoint of working skills, in such a case the priestly calling must be the truly decisive and determinative factor, the true entelecheia of a life of this kind despite the twofold calling. To this extent in normal cases no individual should become a priest unless he is willing to engage his whole life in this priestly function, and this remains true however many specialist forms of the priesthood there may be which are consistent with this principle. Yet in view of the ever-increasing lack of priests we should boldly raise the question of whether it would not also be possible to have one or other of the above-mentioned specialist types of priest, one who in [215] his mature years might take over the direction of a small local Christian community which would otherwise remain without a priest, and who would be ordained priest after a theological and religious formation sufficient for this purpose. For such a one would not have any further priestly functions taking him outside this small group. In such a case it would after all be conceivable that a priest might also exercise, i.e. retain, a secular calling as well.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The functions of leader of the community and itinerant preacher-instructor appear to have been combined as the outcome of a historical development at the end of the apostolic age. (It is reflected, for instance, in the Didache.) Thus the proclaimer of the word, despite the eminently priestly function bound up with his task, was in no sense attached exclusively to a particular region or a particular community. Nowadays we are faced with a great lack of priests in general and a great need of specialist priests. And in view of all this changes may be introduced in the future into parishes as they have existed hitherto. Up to now they have often covered small areas in which all the more important ecclesiastical functions were performed and were able to be performed by one priest. In the future such parishes will no longer necessarily remain simply the basic type for the organization of pastoral care in the same way as hitherto. We might conceive of teams of priests living together, their members specializing in particular fields in the manner already described and having a wider area deputed to them as their ‘Church’. In any case no objection can be raised against a pastoral strategy of this kind on the grounds of the nature of the priesthood itself.

The kind of priest we are accustomed to is in a position analogous to that of a state official. He receives an academic formation as a social functionary from the leaders of the society as a whole, and is then appointed from above to a specific position as a functionary of this kind. Yet all this has properly speaking nothing to do with the doctrinal nature of the priesthood. On the basis of the New Testament and the doctrinal nature of the priesthood we can however conceive of the priestly leader of a community in quite different terms. It is true that for the due exercise of his office he needs the approval of the leader of a wider regional Church called a bishop, who for his part must once more live in union and harmony with the universal Church and so with the pope. This basic approval granted by the individual leader of the community is granted by the sacramental laying on of hands, which certainly in its turn requires specific prior conditions in the individual to be ordained. But the more integrated an individual community was from within itself, i.e. from below, [216] in terms of faith, communal Christian love, the energy of neighbourly love, and common responsibility for the world, the more it would in a true sense have the right to present from within itself an individual Christian known to it, living with it, integrated within it for the office of leadership, a Christian who had the necessary qualities for this position of priestly leadership and who would be recognized as such a leader by the sacramental laying on of hands on the part of the authorized bishop. Perhaps it will come about that the lack of priests which is becoming ever greater will compel us to admit the need for priests of this special kind and to allow them to be ordained, priests who come from the specific community concerned and 'from below'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

A further point must be mentioned concerning the doctrinal possibility or impossibility of a priesthood 'for a limited period', for this is a question which has been raised in very recent times. The meaning of this question might be to enquire whether someone might be ordained to the priesthood with the explicit proviso made from the outset that he would place himself at the disposal of the Church in the priestly office only for a specific period. Alternatively it might be a question as to whether an individual could of his own initiative ask to be relieved of the priestly ministry with a certain right to have this request granted on the part of the Church even though no such time limit to his ministry had been paid down beforehand. There is an inclination to answer such a question in the negative on the basis of the defined doctrine of the Council of Trent concerning the indelibility of the priestly character. Yet it appears to me that this question cannot be answered on the basis of the character indelebilis, for this doctrine, on a precise view, is concerned merely with the impossibility of ordination being repeated. In my opinion it does not even include for certain any statement that it would be absolutely impossible for the Church, even if she wished it, so to restrict all priestly powers on justified grounds that any exercise of them would be not only unlawful but actually invalid. Furthermore on any unprejudiced evaluation of practices of de facto dispensing from office by degradation, secularization etc., practices which have always been in force, we shall find it impossible to assert that the Church can undertake such a course of dispensing a priest from his official ministry only when serious moral or religious offences against the priesthood and the Church have been laid before the Church. There are no clear or apparent reasons why there should not be other grounds, and moreover not merely those connected with priestly celibacy, grounds which do not presuppose any faults, and yet morally justify the priest concerned in petitioning the Church to grant him a dispensation from the [217] priestly ministry. Already at various points in the past history of the Church such laicizations have certainly occurred. Thus we may ask, at least without having to fear a veto from the outset from the point of view of dogma, whether such cases might not become more frequent in the future on the most varied social, cultural, and psychological grounds, and whether it would not even be possible to devise juridical forms for the granting of such dispensations which would be laid down from the outset and as of general application. All this is not of course intended to dispute the fact that it is at least doctrinally conceivable that the free decision of an individual to answer God's call to the priesthood is in itself intended to be an unreserved commitment of his whole life to God and to the priestly ministry. Yet we should bear in mind the temporary vows, by means of which, according to the mind of the Church, the individual binds himself to the evangelical counsels for a time even though this can certainly not be the ultimate meaning of the evangelical counsels. And in view of this we should exercise caution when we find ourselves inclined not to allow that something analogous may be involved in the decision to embrace the priesthood.

A further point which surely arises from the considerations we have put forward in the first section is that on doctrinal grounds it is possible to conceive of the relationship between bishop and priests as subject to a greater variability than we are nowadays normally accustomed to suppose. The Second Vatican Council has developed a theology of the episcopate, and that too quite independently of the narrower question of the significance of the universal episcopate in the direction of the universal Church, which actually goes against the medieval theology of a Thomas Aquinas when he regards the episcopate as the truest and fullest mode of realization as the primum analogatum of order and of the priesthood in general, so that by comparison with the episcopate the presbyterate appears almost a little one-sided, as a mere instrument for the assistance of it. I believe that this view of the relationship between episcopate and presbyterate is devoid of any possible theological justification, and is determined by a certain 'episcopal-ideological' one-sidedness. Certainly we can conceive of the priests of a diocese as a senate, and the bishop as monarch. According to the laws currently in force this presbyteral senate of a bishop has certainly a subordinate position in relation to him just as the universal episcopate has a subordinate position in relation to the pope. For this universal episcopate, working with and under the pope, constitutes the subject of the supreme and full power in the Church, something which we certainly cannot say of the presbyterium of a diocese according to the [218] prevailing laws. But all this is still not enough to express any clear and absolutely unchangeable relationship of the presbyterium of a diocese to its bishop. In concrete terms this relationship can again be conceived of in very different forms. In the concrete attitude of bishop and priests and in conformity with a possible human law in the Church it could perfectly well be the case that the bishop acts as, and is felt to be, the head of a presbyterium, who holds this collegium together, represents it, and makes it effective. This in turn would not necessarily have to imply that even at the level of some possible jus humanum the bishop would merely be primus inter pares and the executive instrument of the presbyteral college. It is possible to conceive of a temporal limitation of the office of a bishop. We may also weigh up how many functions and tasks are de facto gradually transferred from individual bishops to conferences of bishops. We may also consider the increasing importance of auxiliary bishops and subordinate bishops of local areas. And a further point which should not be overlooked is how variable the individual episcopal sees are in terms of size and importance for the Church in general. Nor should we forget those other questions of doctrine which remain open between bishops and priests which have already been spoken of in the first section, and which make it difficult to establish any clear lines of demarcation between the episcopate and the presbyterate. And if all these points are borne in mind then, so I believe, we are left with a broad scope for re-shaping this relationship in a manner appropriate to the times, the more so since the election of a bishop by the clergy of the diocese concerned is not doctrinally speaking impossible even though it is not provided for in the canon law now in force. No legal formula, taken by itself alone, is sufficient to express the entire human and Christian relationship between bishop and priests in all its fulness. Not everything which is not juridically institutionalized is on this account ipso facto secondary or unimportant. Not everything which the law prescribes is ipso facto also enjoined upon us by love and genuine humanity. Much that was formerly entrusted to the Christian and human resources of the bishop alone could and should be institutionalized today as a legally enforceable right of the priests. And this does not of itself imply any assault upon the doctrinal essence of the episcopate. It is possible to envisage the presbyterium in two distinct roles: on the one hand as a consultative senate of a monarchic bishop and as an instrument to assist him, on the other as a collegiate presbyterium as the bearer of the office in the diocese in union with an episcopal 'head' having the special rights proper to himself. These are not conceptual models which in practice need necessarily exclude one another. The very [219] fact that the relationships within the communities had already assumed very varied forms even in the apostolic age should serve to warn us against any rigidity in raising either one of these conceptual models to the status of an absolute norm.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We have put forward a whole range of hypothetical points concerning the priesthood, its history, its future, and even its nature as well. Such questions, hypotheses and differences of opinion are inevitable in an age in which the social changes everywhere also make it necessary to have a fresh appraisal of the abiding elements in the priesthood and the elements which are subject to change. But in all these questions, which seem so urgent to us and render us insecure and threatened even in our understanding of our own priesthood, we priests should not forget that ultimately speaking we do after all know what we are and what we have to do. Jesus Christ the crucified and risen Lord, his grace, the inconceivable mystery which pervades our life, imparts himself to us as our goal and as the strength of our life which we call God. It is these factors which always remain, yesterday, today and tomorrow, the living force by which we live. If we believe this with our whole hearts then we can also utter it in the name of the community and with the commitment of our whole life to our brothers and sisters with an effective word, a word that embodies the presence that we preach. Now if we do this then we are priests. There are many further questions concerning the priesthood, but the first and last of these questions is after all that concerning our faith in Jesus Christ as the Lord, in whom the infinite Mystery has uttered itself to us in forgiveness and so as to endow us with divinity.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[220]

13

THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN PERSONAL AND COMMUNAL SPIRITUALITY AND WORK IN THE ORDERS

Our treatment of this subject will take the form of an enquiry into life in the religious orders as such from the standpoint of Catholicism and the Church in general.

In principle such an approach implicitly contains a generation problem. Obviously the question of the precise relationship between personal and communal spirituality[1] and work in the orders is with us in all ages and in every sphere. Nevertheless our only reason for applying ourselves to this subject here and now is the special relevance which it has for us. What I mean when I say that it involves a generation problem is that the question we are concerned with is one of special urgency and importance nowadays as between the younger and older members of the orders. A further reason, however, is that this relevance arises not merely from factors present in every age between the generations within a community, but is conditioned by the development of personal attitudes and outlooks such as have precisely not always existed as they now manifest themselves on the contemporary scene.

In other words that generation problem in the narrower and commonly accepted sense of the term – i.e. the abiding tension between old and young – is rendered essentially more acute because in the development of our ideas and attitudes we find ourselves in a period of transition which perhaps we may characterize with all due provisos as a transition between an epoch of nineteenth-century individualism on the one hand and one of socialism on the other. Precisely in this situation the two generations respectively become the representatives of these two epochs. The result [221] is that the problem assumes the same radical proportions as are always involved in the process of transformation and transition from one major epoch to another. But all this is something which cannot be entered into in any very explicit way here. In the light of this alone, and abstracting from many other considerations, it is obvious – to put it briefly – that our present-day situation viewed as a whole is specified by conflicting tendencies: the single situation in which we all live is specified by the contrasts between young and old, between individualism and socialism (taking both in a very general sense, and no value judgements being implied). The result is that each of these two entities possesses in its turn its own interior dialectic within itself while each generation is faced with a task which it genuinely has the capacity to accomplish, yet at the same time at which it can fail, the task namely of responding aright to the claims which the future makes upon it by maintaining in a way that endures and yet is ever new those elements concealed within the past which validly demand to survive and to persist.

In all this I am aware that I am viewing the matter from the standpoint of one who is old. Obviously too one of the older generation should view a problem of this kind as objectively as possible. He should strive to do justice to the other side. Yet something that is precisely involved in this objectivity which has to be striven for in this particular case is the awareness that we are incapable of experiencing in our own intimate personal feelings the fact that we are old; that that which an old man finds himself faced with as the outcome of tradition can very easily be apprehended by him as that which is new; that the only way in which he can arrive at an understanding and due respect for that which is new is invariably by a certain

[1] At a different level the author has defined his position on this question in his article, 'Das Gebet des Einzelnen und die Liturgie der Kirche', Strukturen christlicher Existenz, H. Schlier, E. v. Severus, J. Subdrack, A. Pereira edd. (Würzburg, 1968), pp. 189-198.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

process of intellectual self-denial. From this it follows that in principle the same subject-matter should also be treated of by a young man, to whom that which is traditional and old is in a certain sense alien, whereas that which is new is self-evident. Only then, by bringing the old and the young face to face in this sense, by each of them voluntarily conceding to the other that which still remains insuperably alien on grounds of ultimate freedom – only then could this theme be treated of in an objectively adequate manner.

In speaking of the young and the old in this sense I am of course aware that these two concepts are very obscure. There is a biological sense of being young or old; there is a young-ness or old-ness which is a matter of one's own personal development. There are sociological grades of 'oldness' based on the milieu from which an individual may stem. This may either belong to, and be orientated towards, the more traditional factors [222] of the past, or alternatively may imply the kind of social grouping which strives for a better future. And all these possible shades of meaning which may be attached to the terms 'young' or 'old' are in their turn combined in the individual in the most varied and even paradoxical ways. When therefore we simply use the terms 'young' or 'old' we are speaking very imprecisely.

In the present context when we speak of 'the orders' the realities subsumed under this heading vary very greatly among themselves. As they exist in the concrete the orders exhibit the widest variations. Despite the tendency of modern canon law to reduce all to the same level, and despite the influence of the (economic, intellectual etc.) necessities of modern life, which affect all in common, the distinguishing features of the orders are still very different in each case so that we may ask whether anything more than a vague and analogous concept can be found capable of covering them all. Yet if we take a concept of this kind as our starting-point we all too easily incur the danger of failing to realize the character of the individual order as a concrete reality. This is a state of affairs which must be recognized. It bears upon the judgements which we have to arrive at in the present study. There may be individual orders to which they are far from applying in any real sense. If this is the case then it is something which must be understood and excused in the light of the state of affairs described above.

NINETEENTH-CENTURY INDIVIDUALISM AND SOCIALISM

One last preliminary point: we are proceeding from the assumption that the situation of a modern kind of individualism prevailing in the nineteenth and the first half of the twentieth centuries was the situation which most of all left its mark upon the orders, their spirituality and their work. This is not to dispute the fact that the degree and depths to which it did leave its mark upon the individual orders varied very greatly according to their histories, their geographical regions, their functions and tasks, and above all the social milieu from which they drew their members. Nevertheless all of them shared, each in its own way, in this common lot, even in those cases – indeed precisely in those cases – in which they sought to adopt a critical attitude towards their own times or even rejected them. Obviously I am aware that the concept of 'nineteenth-century individualism' is imprecise and obscure to a degree for the very reason that it is almost always impossible to sum up in a single term that which characterizes oneself in one's historical development and in terms of special [223] qualities which it is impossible ever to realize consciously in their fulness. The modern individualist is a man who is convinced of the special qualities of his own individuality, who attempts to reflect upon them, feels them to be of positive value and as something which he has to cultivate. The modern individualist, therefore, feels that the rest of society, apart from a small circle of relations and friends, is that which is extra, alienating and threatening. To him the population at large constitutes the masses which he is inclined to despise. Hence he seeks to be free, first in his thinking to the extent that he feels that his convictions are not identical with the convictions of society as a whole, though obviously he cannot be excused from interpreting these for himself. They are not the intelligent reproduction of the collective convictions of society. On the contrary, they are opposed to these and constantly threatened by them. He seeks also, therefore, free scope for the exercise of his powers as the sphere for his own personal and individual decisions. He is convinced of the importance of the great personalities whom he honours for the history of society as a whole. He is elitist in outlook. He lives in a world in which unconsciously and unquestioningly the necessary conditions are already provided ensuring that he is able to live individualistically in this sense. There is a society which is ready to serve the needs of this particular individual. The modern individualist is... We could prolong our description much further, but in doing so would always be open to the objection that the individual we are constructing is one who either does not or should not exist, one who we ourselves would never wish to be, even those of us who belong in the fullest sense to this age. But I believe that despite this there is such a figure as a modern individualist. He is an historical reality and can be such precisely because despite their common nature men are not always and everywhere the same.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now let us turn to a further assumption from which we are simultaneously proceeding. It is this: much that is observable nowadays in society, and that is beginning to stamp social living and also, to an increasing extent, the spirituality and the work of the particular orders, is such that without injustice it both can and should – albeit with many provisos – be brought under the heading of the socialistic factor. Obviously the modern individualistic factor can, as it were, be metaphysically purified to a point at which only that element of the personal remains which exists, or should exist, always and everywhere, where that which is human in the true sense is to some extent achieved in its undiminished fulness. Again we can metaphysically sublimate the socialist factor to a point at which only that remains which, considered as an orientation [224] towards the social and the communal in human living, belongs precisely to the very nature of the finite personal spirit which is in man. But in this context we are using the term ‘personal’ in a sense belonging to modern individualism, and obviously too in a sense which is morally and metaphysically entirely neutral and involves no hostile judgement. Again we are using the term ‘communal’ as characterizing the coming age, and again one which does not imply any hostile judgement or any glorification either. Yet in using these terms we are assuming from the outset two points: first that the basic metaphysical substance inherent in these two terms has an abiding validity in every epoch of human history, second that at the same time within the individual epochs the historically conditioned form of these two essential structures of human living and development can vary very greatly. And if all this is true then surely we are in a position to say that from the nineteenth century onwards the presentation of the orders in terms of spirituality and work was ‘individualistic’ in character, whereas in the coming ages the presentation of the orders in terms of spirituality and work will rather bear a ‘socialistic’ stamp. This of is course not to deny that this ‘socialistic’ factor in the approaching epochs will assume a very different guise from that which far-seeing people and prophets envisaged for it when they began to speak of it in the nineteenth century.

REALITY IN THE ORDERS

We older members of the orders are at basis nineteenth-century individualists. Obviously we have maintained community life and still willingly do maintain it. Perhaps even in a sense that is yet more obvious than among the younger members of the orders we have accepted a common task, a common work of collaboration, and have carried it out uncomplainingly and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

without raising many problems. Certainly too there are orders which from the very nature of their traditions have made this common task part of their lives and have carried it out in a way that is obvious to them and belongs very closely to their most intimate personal lives. And certainly, from the very nature of the Church itself, and as heirs to an ancient past, the orders have not merely been societies made up of nineteenth-century individualists, but also in this respect a complexio oppositorum. But this mixture of mutually opposed elements which is present in all human life did nevertheless have a specific form, a particular balance between the opposite qualities involved which does not remain in force for all ages or binding upon them. Hence I still believe that it is [225] justifiable for us older members of the religious orders to say that we have all been nineteenth-century individualists. It might be asserted, albeit with a certain element of exaggeration, that we have even existed in our large communities somewhat as institutionalized hermits. In fact we have been individuals who as such have lived and worked together. Particular friendships were frowned upon. On the whole it was not usual for individuals to open their hearts to one another. Each man stood on his own feet in coping with his own life. Alone he met his own interior needs and arrived at his own decisions of conscience, or at most he discussed them with a spiritual director, and even in these cases there was a certain impression of an official advisory board. The communal 'rule' which we strictly observed in the orders was at basis not so much the social institutionalization of the community as such, but the rational order within which it was possible at once to maintain the due rights of many individualists and at the same time their common work. Abstracting for the moment from the human factor, something which always exists among normal men, we could say that our community was primarily functional in character but was not concerned with men as such or with their personal union as distinct from their merely functional one. Even the kinds of work which we performed in common were clear in themselves, so that they did not require much discussion, at any rate not once the basic decisions had been arrived at so that all that still remained to be carried Out was already fixed and clear beforehand in the plan devised for such work.[2] Obviously in practice other factors were always present at the same time: the emotional factor, friendships possibly of a very individualistic stamp, traces of inculpable eroticism, and as a matter of practical experience a sense of belonging together which went beyond that which was prescribed on the basis of our common concerns and of a somewhat aseptic interpretation of what love of neighbour should mean. Nevertheless all this was, after all, not in principle catered for in religious life as stamped by the nineteenth-century individualism. It was not consciously reflected upon. In fact the conscious realization of it was rather suppressed, and in any case it was hardly institutionalized or reduced to forms and modes of conduct which as such belonged to the religious life which it sought to develop. In accordance with this the relationship which individual members of religious orders bore to their superiors likewise always contained a strong element of officialdom and remoteness even in [226] those orders in which the superiors were frequently changed. What has been sketched in here as the mode of life of us older men really amounts only to a quite vague approximation, and should not be taken as a condemnation of it. All that we are seeking to achieve is to sketch in a mode of living conditioned by a particular age, which is, or has been, at least as legitimate and capable of fulfilment for its own times as any other which may be lived by today or tomorrow and which is justified in its own right. It was a harder more masculine mode of living, which had its greatnesses, its limitations, and not infrequently too its tragic elements in the form of petrification and lack of real warm-heartedness (this often being wrongly interpreted as the fulfilment of duty). It has in fact the same limited scope as in fact is inherent in all that is

[2] cf. the author's articles on the situation and the viewpoints involved, 'Die Zukunft der Orden in Welt und Kirche von heute', Geist und Leben 43 (1970), pp. 338-354.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

human. We older members have a life to live in common with younger ones, who bring their own special qualities into the common life and have the right to do so. This is the context in which we live and of which we must take cognizance. Yet in this context we for our part have the right to continue to live in our former mode even though, from an objective historical point of view, this can be designated as a nineteenth-century individualistic mode. We can freely concede – always taking into account the demands which common life makes upon old and young alike – that we do not view concelebrations with the same favour as the young, that we are less inclined than the younger generation to engage in long discussions and conferences,[3] that we prefer to be by ourselves, to meditate alone, than to engage in group religious discussions; that this experience of ours of a sound old tradition that has been tried and proved is not mere illusion or something that has merely seized upon factors belonging exclusively to the past. We must bring this personal outlook of ours – though obviously without any reactionary or intransigent hardening of attitudes – into the life of the religious orders of today in which we are and remain unreservedly involved. We must bring to them that which we have become through our own personal history. Only so can we ensure that on the one hand the true heritage of the more recent past continues to be maintained in our orders, these too being constantly and rightly bound by their own history, while on the other hand that which is abidingly valid, which was developed in a form belonging particularly to us and conditioned by our age remains alive in the future of the orders, albeit in new and altered forms.

[227]
TRANSITION

Nevertheless we are living in a period of transition in which the socialistic factor or, to formulate it more cautiously, the communal factor in the orders is also seeking to achieve formal expression. This statement might perhaps be regarded as paradoxical, for it is in fact religious communities that are being treated of, and this makes it difficult to understand how the communal factor in such groups can seek to achieve a new significance special to the particular epoch. Yet this is in fact the case. What is being sought for is a fraternal community formed from below and constantly undergoing fresh creative formation to a greater extent than is provided for at the individual level simply by canon law. It is obvious that a stronger sense of community cannot simply be achieved by reviving the social modes of earlier communities. Rather it seeks to introduce the greater maturity, education and individuality of the person into the new forms of community life, and to have a 'democratic' form of community at the level of its social institutionalization. This does not gainsay the assertion that there is a shift of emphasis in the life of the orders towards the communal. There is a tendency to favour small communes either as wholly, autonomous or as the sort of units into which a more large-scale community is subdivided so as to achieve a fully human way of life. In the decisions which have to be arrived at in the religious life and in the work of religious communities it is sought to aim at processes of collective counselling in which all participate, each in his own way, and in which the democratic and collegiate structures still surviving from the earlier histories of the orders are effectively brought to life once more, and moreover in a way that is meaningful for modern times. These, it is felt, must be something more than mere façades designed to conceal authoritative decisions arrived at exclusively

[3] On this cf. in general the author's article, 'Alte und neue Frommigkeit', Theologische Akademie IV, K. Rahner and O. Semmelroth edd., (Frankfurt, 1967), pp. 9-28, and also 'Dialogue in the Church', Theological Investigations X (London and New York, 1973), pp. 103-121.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

from above.[4] Here and there groupings of members of religious orders are to be discerned which are to some extent paracanonical. In this way they seek more readily to bring home to the official authorities in the orders what their aims are. There is pressure for a greater degree of intelligibility for all elements in the regime of religious orders, right down to their economic workings. The younger members of the orders, who are still undergoing their formation, are nowadays unwilling any longer to be treated as mere subjects for the older generation to educate. Instead they want to contribute positively to the life and activities of the order. When and if the liturgy as such is still taken [228] seriously it is in principle and obviously an affair of the community, not merely in theory but in its concrete forms as well. In the orders an attempt is made to achieve a community which is sustained by a more personal commitment of the individuals to one another. Where the work is being done in common it should on this account be sustained to the widest possible extent by a sense of charismatic vocation and personal inclination on the part of the individuals, it should as fully as possible spring from spontaneous creativeness and invention, and should be not so much the dutiful carrying out of a plan and a task which are already laid down as such beforehand and may not be called in question. The teamwork itself should then be sustained by a conception of creative work of this kind. It is for the team to produce the plan, and for it and only it to authorize it and put it into practice. The team should not merely consist in the sum total of those engaged in the work who merely carry out a project designed independently of the team itself. Admittedly on this showing it becomes a far more difficult question how the concept of a common function can still take into account the fact that for whole decades or still longer the same task was carried out by the same order and its members. Discussions are favoured and long communal sessions. Religious conversations with an individual stamp are nowadays more frequent and more taken for granted than solitary meditation, just as in general (at least at present among us) human fellowship is in the eyes of the young, if not the only factor then at least the one which alone renders intelligible and justifiable everything else in the religious life and in the life of the order. It is no longer the official juridical structure of an order which sustains the personal life of the community at the practical level, for the younger members view these official structures and laws with a certain coldness, and do not have the impression that such things must always remain the same. The converse is true: it is the personal community life which renders the official social forms justified and bearable if and to the extent that this community life is felt to be liberating and demanding in a human sense. These juridical and official forms of social living are not laid down beforehand without question on the basis of the Church and as valid in all cases, such that they are responded to in an attitude of loyalty, this in itself being the attitude and the decision of a religious individualist and being felt to be valid and binding even when his relationship to the rest of the members of the order has become extremely questionable. Instead we are living in a kind of community which produces certain juridical structures of its own. Where therefore the sense of community as such has been lost the juridical factor is no longer felt to be binding in any [229] true sense. On this basis (and of course on many other grounds, as for instance a far more functional interpretation of the religious life as compared with former times) we can also explain the fact that the attitude of the younger members to their order is far more subject to conditions. It is an attitude which often shocks us older men. An individual who leaves the order is no longer regarded as having failed or fallen by the way, nor is his act felt to be the outcome of an unsuitability for this order. On the contrary, it is felt to be a failure of the order itself to meet the just claims of this individual who departs from it.

[4] On this cf. H. J. Walraff, 'Mitgliedschaft und Mitverantwortung in den Orden heute', Geist und Leben 41 (1968), pp. 47-59.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

THE INTERPLAY BETWEEN THE PERSONAL AND THE COMMUNAL ASPECTS

On the basis of these assumptions we are seeking to speak of the relationship between personal and communal spirituality and work in the religious orders. In doing so we are not concerned with the approach or the findings of a metaphysical or theological anthropology in relation to these two factors. For basically speaking all that would still remain to be said is something which for any Christian anthropology is obvious: ultimately speaking the personal and the communal are not factors which are in conflict with one another or exclude one another. On the contrary they mutually condition one another and grow or diminish in interplay with one another. All that could then be said is that communal living in the true sense can only grow and remain vital as the outcome of a decision and a responsibility on the part of the individual which is wholly personal in each case, and that the truly personal factor consists at basis in a loving orientation of oneself to others, i.e. to one's neighbour and to God. Admittedly the physical side of human nature is such that any community among men also implies those prior conditions and further effects which are entailed in the social forms of communal living, and these in turn can assume the most varied forms according to the particular human grouping of which they are the expression. Of course in a metaphysical and theological anthropology many difficult questions would have to be considered with regard to the attitudes involved in the personal and social factors in the individual, and the answers to these would have to be applied to the life of the religious orders. But all this will not be discussed in the present context. Here rather we shall be considering from the point of view of an older member who is individualistic precisely why it should be that today even in the orders a shift of emphasis from the personal to the communal is justified in terms of the particular epoch even when we older [230] members feel it rather as fairly inappropriate to ourselves and as a threat to us; even when in the religious orders there is a further question which still remains to a large extent unsolved, that namely of the actual forms in the concrete which this communal factor is to assume, so necessary and pressing as it is today, and when this new mode of living, in itself justified, also carries with it a threat to that which properly speaking must constitute the life of an order and which implicitly contains its function in the Church for mankind.

An initial reason for a more intense and a new kind of communal living in the orders is to be found in the essentially more complex realities in which even the orders have to live and work nowadays. Formerly we had clear principles to guide us. The concrete conceptual models which we used in expressing these principles to ourselves, and which we made our own, were likewise stable even though in our particular case this society was merely that of the Catholicism of the nineteenth century, easily falling into a defensive ghetto-like attitude and being somewhat bourgeois. In that setting it was in fact possible to maintain a mentality of this kind more or less homogeneously because this kind of Catholicism was intellectually, socially and politically screened off from the rest of the world, and even as such could still command large numbers of adherents. In such a context life in the orders was relatively simple. We knew quite precisely what we should believe and think and the positions taken up by friend or foe. We had our principles and also very concrete patterns for putting them into practice. All that we had to do was already set forth clearly and beyond all question beforehand in the principles and the concrete conceptual models for applying them in practice. Today all this is different. Even for those who preserve an unconditional loyalty to the principles of the faith, and also to genuine Christian tradition, over and above that which is binding in a strictly dogmatic sense, it is often no longer so unequivocally clear what these principles imply and what under certain circumstances they do not imply. This is the outcome of the fact that the Church, if she is not to degenerate into a minor agglomeration without

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

significance (something quite different from the 'little flock' that the Church should be, is, and will be), must apply herself in fresh and courageous ways to the social and intellectual situation as it actually confronts her today, and must not screen herself off in an artificial world which she has thought out as right for herself.[5] Christianity and the Church must not conform to 'the world'. Under certain circumstances they must take up a radically [231] critical attitude towards the tendencies and fashions and factors which are presumed to be self-evident in the current age. But this is precisely something that is possible only if we really commit ourselves to the world. The prolongation of the ways of earlier times in the life and work of the Church, together with its assumed clarity, uniformity and sureness, is simply no longer possible nowadays. Even when and where the Church has to be the sign of contradiction towards a sinful and straying world, we must proclaim her contradiction in such a way that it is really hearkened to. She must adapt her message to the perspectives and outlooks of the world of today. This does not mean any strained, artificial or pedagogic transition from the world that is proper to her into that of the others, but, at least in principle, an unreserved acceptance of the world in which we Christians and members of orders inescapably have to live from the outset. On the basis of this situation it is not so clear and obvious what we mean by our principles of dogma and of Christian morality even though this is not to say that we can no longer have any global understanding of them or any ultimate loyalty in faith towards them.

The concrete models for applying these Christian principles in practice have become still more lacking in clarity. Questions must arise as to precisely what inescapable compulsion and the kind of freedom that there ought to be signify in their relationship to one another in life and in society; precisely how personal power freely to decide one's material values is related to social theories precisely of these values, or how we of today can communicate to an individual who has become secularized a pristine experience of God;[6] what in a true sense constitutes Christian education; how the sacraments should be conferred today in such a way as to avoid the impression that we are practising magic or empty ceremonies of an almost folklorist kind; how we can boldly accept the factor of sexuality without falling into a shallow libertinism. To these and a thousand other questions of human and Christian living we can, it is true, still to some extent readily formulate certain answers of principle as a normative framework. But precisely how we should answer these questions in the concrete, or what form the concrete models of application should assume today in which these principles are put into practice – in a world that has become interiorly and exteriorly dynamic – these are human questions which do not really have any one clear answer even though it is questions of fact and questions of morality both at once that [232] we are faced with. In such a world, in which that which is signified in the principles, and still more the concrete models for applying those principles in practice have become less clear, it is impossible for the life of the orders to proceed from the assumption that the norms governing their lives at any rate are clear and unequivocal, that they have already been tried and tested countless times in tradition, and that we should merely loyally continue to follow them. We members of religious orders too have to accept and endure the uncertainty and fluidity of our age as it progresses into a future that has still not clearly been recognized. That is the initial postulate if we are gradually to develop and to provide for other Christians a credible model of Christian living in the future. Precisely within the religious life, however, considered as a communal form of life, such a task calls for a far more intensive collaboration, and so too a

[5] Here cf. the author's article, 'Konziliare Lehre der Kirche und künftige Wirklichkeit christlichen Lebens', Sckriften zur Theologie VI (Einsiedeln, 2nd ed., 1968), pp. 479-498; 'Christian Living Formerly and Today', Theological Investigations VII (London and New York, 1971), pp. 3-24.

[6] cf. the author's article, 'Theological Considerations on Secularization and Atheism', Theological Investigations XI (London and New York, 1974), pp. 166-184.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

dialogue among the members of the orders, than was formerly necessary. If the religious life is to remain intact experiments must be taken in it in common. If we are to undertake such experiments in common, i.e. if new concrete models are to be tested out as a matter of practical experience in the life and apostolic work of the orders, then we must first and foremost discuss with one another and so consciously reflect upon the possibilities for the future. Some may suppose that they can confine themselves to directives from above, albeit assuming a mature consideration on the part of superiors. They may regard such a procedure as still effective even for today. They may proceed on the basis that all principles and concrete models for applying them in practice are already clearly and unequivocally present, and so need only to be carried out by those who are specifically selected for the task precisely by the command of the superior. What is called for is the most active collaboration possible on the part of as many members of the order as possible in the decisions which are necessary for life and work. This is not in the first instance a postulate emanating from some romantically thought-out democratic ideal, but rather something demanded by the very nature of the case which can be discovered only if as many individuals as possible who are to bring it to reality collaborate in this process of new discovery. Orders too must avoid becoming a mere minor agglomeration through their own fault, becoming societies, that is to say, which still manage to sustain themselves at a cost of being reduced to a pitiful number of individuals deriving from a socially and intellectually backward milieu, and so still ready to appropriate these ideals in their outmoded form.

[233] We must guard against taking spirituality in too ideological a sense. Rather we must understand it as the Christian element and the ultimate depths of life as it exists quite normally and in the concrete. And if we do this then what has just been said will also be accounted as spirituality. Nowadays this too stands in need of experimentation, of discussion, of the community and its collaboration more than in former times. What we are seeking to express in all these rough indications is simply this: life in the religious orders of today and tomorrow is different from what it formerly was in that it calls for a greater sense of community. This can become a living force only in the personal responsibility and active commitment of every individual. And it cannot be brought about by force solely by institutions. But this deeper sense of community is necessary because it is called for by the special qualities of our own age. Obviously it is not prescribed by the contemporary situation as something which cannot fail. The situation which calls for this deeper sense of community on the part of the orders at the same time raises threats and obstacles to this sense of community. The reason is that today, by comparison with former times, there is a far greater number of different tendencies and possibilities, and in view of this this community sense is precisely not something already given that can be taken for granted, but something rather that has to be established by conscious effort with sacrifices and renunciations.

There is a quite different second aspect from which the sense of community in religious life appears more urgent nowadays than was formerly the case. The interior world of the individual is far wider, more complex and more subject to threat. Now this manifestly calls for a greater sense of community between members of religious orders as an aid for coping with this threatened interior world. We older men in the orders do in fact experience how the younger ones draw closer to one another, open their hearts to one another and, when taking the most intimate personal decisions, seek to arrive at them in community intercourse of this kind. Yet this phenomenon is manifestly not to be explained simply as sentimentality, helplessness or lack of self-sufficiency. In earlier times we had the impression (though naturally this is to put it in a somewhat simplified form) that the individual depended in his life on the force of reason and the principles embodied in this as propositionally formulated, as well as on a formal free will which either did or did not put these principles into practice. A very clear example of this approach is to be found in the unmistakable conviction of the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

usual moral theology that a man who is more or less normal can certainly fulfil a duty once he has undertaken it even [234] throughout his whole life, provided only that he wills to do so, the more so since the grace for fulfilling such a duty can never be lacking to him (through the prayer necessary for this).[7]

Today, however, the individual, and even the member of a religious order, has a quite different experience. The powers of reason or of freedom seem to him to be only very incomplete elements in his life. He feels himself as one exposed to conditions and forces of which he can never be aware, or at any rate of which he can never have any adequate conscious knowledge. For him his personal history is something more than merely the history of his autonomous freedom. Even abstracting from the external circumstances which he cannot control, he feels his future not as something planned and realized merely by himself of his freedom, but at least equally as the fate which rises up from the unfathomable depths within his being, and which he has to endure. He has no impression that so long as normal conditions in civic life endure it is clear that the individual can always perform what is prescribed by a duty once undertaken or by a law imposed from without. The man of today feels himself as one who is threatened by himself, not as one who has sovereign control over himself. His own reality and life strike him not as a reality fully open to his understanding and possessed by him from the outset, but rather as that which gradually unveils itself to him only in the course of an unfolding development which he can never in any full sense whatever guide and direct. He feels that he can see through us older men. For him our loyalty to principles is not due to any moral excellence or real maturity on our part, but is to a large extent the outcome of the fact that we have matured and grown old in a milieu that is intellectually and socially homogeneous. And truly not everything in this evaluation is false. We older men are also the product of a milieu which the young neither have nor desire. It cannot be our task here to interpret this experience which man has of himself in its truth or in its limitations, or to assign it its rightful place within the total scope of human life. This experience will be taken as given. Our purpose is simply to explain from a new aspect why man embarks on a new and urgent quest for community life, for community discussion even to the point of psychotherapy. He flees from his inner state of threatenedness and obscurity to his fellow man. In the encounter with his fellow he [235] comes a stage nearer to achieving clarity about himself. The fact that the same thing happens to his fellow gives him the courage to accept the inscrutable factors in his own life. Prescriptions for life and work seem more effective as guards against the innermost uncertainty and obscurity with regard to the future even within man's own soul when they are arrived at and approved in common as the outcome of discussion with others. The fact that it happens to others as to himself gives him the courage to accept himself.

WHAT REMAINS AND WHAT FOLLOWS

We have been considering two of the reasons (certainly two among many others) for placing the chief emphasis on the communal rather the individual and personal at this particular epoch. Before proceeding to draw certain practical consequences from this it remains to be said that the member of a religious order must always – and so today and tomorrow too – be the man who is capable of living in personal responsibility as an individual and in solitude with God. Christianity is the religion of man's personal relationship with God, and it can [7] On the duties of the members of orders cf. the ideas put forward by the author, 'On the Evangelical Counsels', Theological Investigations VIII (London and New York, 1971), pp. 133-167, and also the earlier remarks in 'Laie und Ordensleben. Überlegungen zur Theologie der Säkularinstitute', Sendung und Gnade (Innsbruck, 4th ed., 1966), pp. 359-391.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

never be reduced to merely human relationships. Christianity is the religion of dying in solitude with Jesus into one's own radical weakness and into the mystery of God as utterly outside our control. As a religion of this kind Christianity is not an ideological supplement to a life which in itself could certainly be rounded off even without this ideology. It is this rather because this solitariness and inalienable uniqueness in the life of man are factors which are inescapable. They may indeed be suppressed through faults or suffering, but they can never be eliminated even though there is a constant temptation and danger of excluding this solitariness and inalienable uniqueness from human life. If the life of the religious orders is intended to be a pattern of Christian living,[8] then it cannot be dispensed from the task of enduring the inalienable uniqueness of man and the solitariness of death which pervades life. Only so can it really come to know what is meant by 'God' and how we can have a personal relationship with him. Only where a Christian attitude of this kind succeeds will something more emerge from the communion between men than the putting into practice of a herd drive and the flight of man from himself into the anonymity of mankind in the mass. This is not to say that there cannot be a genuine sense of human community even without any explicit reference to God. [236] But to present such a thing is certainly not the sole task of the sense of community of a religious order. Even a human fellowship which is at first 'this-worldly' and 'secular' – and it is to such a community that men seek to reduce Christianity in a process of 'horizontalism' – either penetrates to the ultimate depths of its own nature and so attains to God (although, it may be, only in a very unconscious sense), or alternatively it perishes in its own tragedy, the impossibility of all human love attaining its consummation. From this it follows that that which at first seems merely to be the transitory form of religious life in the nineteenth century is nevertheless something more. For all the natural and inevitable process of change in its concrete form, in its truest essence it is something which must be introduced as redemptive and salvific into that sense of human community which is to be the sign manual belonging to the particular epoch of the religious life of the future. Even in the life and work of the orders of today and tomorrow the mentality of the older members, who have hitherto been willing to live as institutionalized hermits, has an abiding function. If Christianity has to be something more than merely the due recognition of a specific mode of life belonging to a particular age, if it is also and always to provide a critique of this and to be its redemption, if it is always true that any genuine community can be truly itself only if those belonging to it can accept themselves and endure themselves in their solitariness (with God), without which all human community would become merely a sheepfold, or would necessarily imply excessive demands of a false and worldly kind, then it follows that the old ways of religious life too in terms of life and work have an abiding importance despite their conditional and transitory character in virtue of the essence that is brought to reality in this conditional state. This function of handing on an abidingly Christian element to the future would constitute an especially urgent task for the older men of the orders. Admittedly the only way in which it can be fulfilled by these older men is on condition that the personal solitariness of the individual as he finds his self-sufficiency in God alone is not misused so as to withdraw himself from an attitude of loving openness to community with his fellow. On the contrary this solitariness and self-sufficiency of his must serve as a prior condition enabling him really to give himself selflessly to his fellows. Only if the younger members notice that the heritage which we older men are seeking to hand on serves precisely to provide a basis for that genuine community which the younger members seek will we succeed in introducing into the future of the religious orders the ancient heritage in an altered form. Only so shall we be able to apply the name 'religious order' in any Christian [237] sense at all to the future communities historically descended from the present-day orders.

[8] On this cf. 'Theological Observations on the Concept of "Witness"', Theological Investigations XIII.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Inevitably the foregoing observations have been at a very abstract level. In conclusion, therefore, certain further consequences following from what has been said must be put forward. While these cannot rid our earlier remarks of their abstract character, they should nevertheless do something to mitigate it.

In the religious life the way is undoubtedly being paved for a shift in the relationship between the individual and personal factor in its concrete form and the communal factor. This remains true even though, it may be, precisely in the orders of the future the personal factor, unique in each case, will be, in its character as inalienable and as isolated, that which is destined to become an ever-fresh task and in a sense a mark distinguishing these orders from other secular forms of society. It is in fact not the case that history must necessarily or always constitute a continuous ascending process to the higher good or the higher beauty. It could equally well be that over what might be a long period the socialistic factor might really come to predominate over all else in the form of a humanity that is manipulated in the mass, of the higher grade of domesticated animal, leading to a destruction of human freedom in the interests of a smoothly running system. It could be the case that the Christians must precisely be numbered among those who have remained pent up in the citadels of refuge of their own personal spirit of freedom and of inalienable responsibility, those who can still sustain their individuality as freedom and a state of being brought face to face with the mystery of God.[9] But even viewed in this light the communal factor in the orders of the future remains that which gives them their special quality as compared with the orders of the past. In saying this it must be admitted that our statement is to be understood in very divers ways according to whether in any given case the communal factor too in the various orders has hitherto already had a different degree of value ascribed to it. The result of this is that there are different degrees of clarity in the way in which the individual orders of the future will be distinguished from those of the past in respect of this communal factor which they will have.

The process of discovering the concrete forms which this communal factor will assume in the life and work of the orders will necessarily be gradual. Indeed it may be presumed that in a world that is dynamic and [238] will continue to be so this process of discovery cannot be understood in any sense as the discovery of a fixed form of life and work for the orders, which will then in its turn remain fixed over a long period. On the contrary, since the situation will continue to remain changeable in- the extreme, we may presume that there will be a continuous process of fresh improvisation in the life and work of the orders. Viewed from without, and in a spirit of unbelief, this process of improvisation which never wholly ceases will perhaps strike some as the mere prolongation of the vegetable life of an institution which was in the past so gloriously clear, unequivocal, powerful and aware of itself but which now can neither live nor die. Nevertheless for him who believes and hopes, and does not regard himself as the lord of history, this process of improvisation making ever-fresh advances into a future that is unknown can perfectly well be accounted a mode of life which is specifically Christian in character.

Even though we constantly regard our way of life and our activities as that which is provisional and transitory, still this is not to say that the way of life which we are at present following does not, in many areas and many respects, lag behind the way of life and work prescribed for the orders of today. This is of course too generalized a conclusion, and great variations should be allowed for before we can apply it to the individual orders. The discovery of new ways for the orders in their life and work cannot be achieved without the courage to experiment. It is true of many human affairs that it is quite impossible to achieve a [9] The ideas put forward by the author in the following article should also be understood in this sense: 'The Function of the Church as a Critic of Society', Theological Investigations XII (London and New York, 1974), pp. 229-249.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

sufficiently clear knowledge of them merely by theoretical consideration. An indispensable factor is concrete experiment in life itself and that too even at the risk of failure and of recognizing only too late that we have taken a wrong path. Superiors in the orders should have the courage, if not actually to inaugurate such experiments for themselves, still at least to allow them. Only so can fresh forms of communal living and communal work be discovered in an order. Initially such new forms will obviously be paracanonical, and will exist side by side with the traditional and officially institutionalized forms of life and work of the orders. This cannot be avoided. But we should also have the courage not to delay too long before officially sanctioning and institutionalizing such fresh forms of community life and work. We cannot at once be convinced of the value for human life of the juridical and institutional and yet at the same time hold out for a long time before allowing the new forms of religious life to be sanctioned and institutionalised. Otherwise we cannot with any justice be shocked to find that such new forms, which the younger members inaugurate [239] and maintain, very quickly vanish once more as mere expressions of a passing fashion and so undergo a fate which they are far from having deserved and which might have been avoided for them if they had been responded to more helpfully by the official authorities in the orders. We cannot let a little plant wither by refusing to water and care for it and then sarcastically use the fact that it has so withered as an argument to show that this plant was never worth anything. This is not to dispute the fact that such processes of fresh institutionalization, which follow more swiftly than in former times upon life and its developments, are more improvised and more swift to pass away than was formerly entertained in our thinking or way of life. A further point is admittedly that a fresh attitude towards law and institution is also necessary, one which does not treat of the institutional factor as a mere trifle on the grounds that it is more improvised and more transitory than formerly, and at the same time does not erect it into a petrified idol either, as though it were absolutely final and definitive.[10]

However noteworthy the reforms of the liturgy up to the present may be, I do not believe that in them we have yet discovered that form of the liturgy, able to be brought to practical reality, which will bring the liturgy to its fulness as an activity of the community and at the same time as a radically personal event. Fresh forms of the liturgy as they have been and will be prescribed, however sublime and beautiful they may be, still do not remove the radical dilemma that as a matter of general principle forms which have become firmly fixed constitute a threat to the genuineness and spontaneity both of the communal and of the personal factors, if indeed they do not actually make these impossible. On the other hand forms which are absolutely free are in danger of giving free reign to arbitrariness, capriciousness and subjectivity on the part of the individual. Nevertheless if we cannot leave the concrete shaping of the liturgy (over and above its ultimate and essential structures) to chance, to the mood of the moment, to the crudity and one-sidedness of a liturgist devising free forms, still the only way out of this dilemma would surely be an intensive theological and spiritual formation of liturgists, to whom we could confidently leave the free shaping of the concrete forms of the liturgy within the framework of its essential structures. Whether such a thing is possible, whether and how religious communities might carry out creative experiments in this field – these are all questions which must remain open. But [240] we should at least recognize in the liturgy the need to bring the personal and the communal factors in it to their fulness, and despite all the changes in the liturgy since the Second Vatican Council these have lagged behind. Can we not discover fresh forms of religious life apart from the liturgy? I do in fact believe that meditation, as a private activity of the individual, must at all costs remain as a factor in the religious life even though such a [10] Attention should also be drawn to the considerations put forward by the author in the present volume, 'Basic Observations on the Subject of Changeable and Unchangeable Factors in the Church'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

postulate is still far from having determined the question of how such private meditation and solitary prayer to God is to be achieved in the concrete, and how it should be rooted in the totality of human activity on the part of the individual religious. But over and above this there are certainly new forms of religious activity as well, which are or would be in keeping with the times, and which have not yet been sufficiently developed in the average life of the orders. The older members adopt a sceptical attitude which is fully justified on rational grounds from the point of view of Christianity towards certain phenomena in contemporary religious communities especially in the USA. These appear sometimes after the fashion of New Testament glossolalia, sometimes in the form of group dynamics which are insufficiently guided by reason. But in adopting such an attitude we should still remind ourselves that we are not doing justice to the need expressed in such phenomena merely by a rigid and conservative adherence to what is old. The only right attitude towards them is to have the courage to accept new forms which measure up to the justified demands for a religious life sustained by the spirit of community. Have we already seen the after effects (in concrete and tested form) of group dynamic experience, or of those experiences which have been achieved through psychotherapeutic discussion? Would it not be possible to have a 'religious exercise' which consists neither in liturgy nor in private meditation but is sustained by a group as such? If there were such proved and to some extent institutionalized 'religious exercises' carried on by smaller groups it might be possible to avoid a misunderstanding which according to my observations often arises in the orders. Many wrong tendencies and mistaken developments occur among the members of orders which, because they do not occur in the canon of traditional moral theology, are not resisted in the orders either, and against these the religious community is powerless. It would be possible to resist such mistaken human tendencies and wrong developments without having forthwith to condemn them as sinful on moral grounds by the reaction of a group in a communal religious exercise of this kind. It might be possible to avoid much that is 'less than human' in the orders which is now present either simply because it has come to be accepted as inevitable, or [241] which has forthwith to be resisted by means of a moral condemnation which for the most part remains ineffective.

New forms could certainly also be devised for an order to perform its apostolic work in the outside world on a new community basis. Obviously such communal work in the apostolic field has always been carried on in the orders. Conversely there will always be types of work and tasks in the orders which the individual can take upon himself without entering into any teamwork in the true sense with his own religious brethren. We may accept two points here. Religious communities in the sense of the orders properly so called, as distinct from the secular institutes, can probably not in the long run survive and cohere without also having a common task, a common work, even though not absolutely every individual member must take part in this. Second, for many reasons nowadays community must develop fresh forms for itself. And if these two points are true then what we have said also applies to the necessary community work of the individual orders. It cannot simply be carried on absolutely in the same style as is traditionally the rule. It is for instance conceivable that within a communal grouping of an order (not simply an individual abbey but one that embraces a broader region with several houses) the individual houses will each have its own distinctive character, different from the rest, and that these differences will in some sense be institutionalized. In practice something of this kind has in fact existed all along through force of circumstances. But it should be more consciously recognized, accepted and institutionalized. A house of the order lying in a poor quarter can and should have a different character, consciously institutionalized as such, from a house of the same grouping within the order which is for instance devoted to higher studies or is a house of typical intellectuals. As we have already pointed out, the concrete modes of discovering work and devising forms for

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

it nowadays in the light of the contemporary situation requires an essentially more organized and more institutionalized form of collaboration on the part of all the members of the order concerned, and in this sense needs to acquire a more 'democratic' form.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[243]

PART THREE

The Church in the World

[245]

14

SOME PROBLEMS IN CONTEMPORARY ECUMENISM

The subject of this chapter is headed 'Problems in Contemporary Ecumenism'. Many times in the past we have concerned ourselves with special questions in ecumenism,[1] and it would be possible here too to seize upon questions with a theological content from the range of connected subjects, and thereby to show by means of one or several concrete examples what current ideas are on the subject of the problems of ecumenism at the present day.

Yet nowadays it seems more important to concentrate upon the nature of ecumenical theology itself, albeit in an abstract and formal manner. By this method we may perhaps remain excessively pent-up at the level of generalizations and principles, and may expose ourselves to the objection that the real difficulties begin precisely at that point at which we come down to the concrete details. And yet the other and more general way of posing the question may perhaps be neither false nor inappropriate. What I mean by this is that particular questions in ecumenism often become difficult and even insoluble precisely because we have not achieved a sufficiently deep realization of what ecumenical theology really is, its starting-point and its aims. Thus we shall probably be in a better position [246] to solve particular questions of this kind once we theologians have clarified our ideas as to what ecumenical dialogue is truly and ultimately concerned with. I will now attempt to give my answer to this question in the form of two theses. The first thesis will be concerned with the ultimate assumption on which ecumenical theology is based; the second, by contrast, will be concerned with its future form.[2] But let us begin with a few simple remarks on the problems of ecumenical theology today in general, and at the same time by attempting to strike a personal balance in judging of the possibly critical situation in which this dialogue stands.

THE CRISIS OF ECUMENICAL THEOLOGY

One who has taken part over many years in ecumenical discussion among the specialist theologians of the various separated Churches will find it somewhat difficult to take a hopeful view with regard to the outcome of such ecumenical theology. Whereas ecumenical

[1] Cf. 'On Conversions in the Church', Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 373-3 84; 'Questions of Controversial Theology on Justification', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 189-218; 'The Presence of Christ in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 287-311; 'Some Remarks on the Question of Conversions', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 315-335 'What is Heresy?', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 468-512; 'Justified and Sinner at the Same Time', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 218-230; 'On the Theology of the Ecumenical Discussion', Theological Investigations XI (London and New York, 1974), pp. 24-67.

[2] The author has given a still fuller account of his position on the future form of ecumenical theology in the present volume in the article entitled 'Ecumenical Theology of the Future'. Here the basic theme of the present considerations is developed further and on somewhat different lines.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

discussions among everyday Christians all too easily fall into the error of confessional relativism, and tend over-hastily and over-facilely to bypass the doctrinal differences between the confessions, ecumenical discussion among specialist theologians, by contrast, generally relates to the classical differences of doctrine already established by tradition. Generally speaking such discussions do not achieve any advance on the problems involved, even though nowadays the theological assumptions presupposed in formulating these doctrinal differences are concerned with modern exegesis, the historical sciences, and the differences between philosophical modes of expression and ideas which have now become almost insuperable. Certainly in the last few decades we have spoken with one another more than formerly. The separated Churches have taken an interest in one another's theology. A greater exchange of subject-matter, viewpoints, methods etc. has been and is being achieved. But when we enquire as to the end-product of this ecumenical dialogue so far as the unification of the Churches is concerned we will after all be compelled in all realism to admit this end-product is very slight. Certainly this is not merely due to the fact that we have not yet come much closer to agreement on the traditionally controversial doctrines. The main reason for the paucity of results may well lie in this: on the one hand the orthodox Roman theology is on the whole still a long [247] way from having made the dogmas of this Church really intelligible to the average Protestant Christian. On the other hand within the Protestant Churches differences are to be found as to the most basic interpretation of Christianity, and the leaders of these Churches cannot, or perhaps merely will not overcome this state of affairs (perhaps because they regard such a course as in itself contrary to the principles of Protestant freedom of belief). And these differences are so great that on these grounds alone any unification between these Churches collectively as they now stand and the Roman Church is impossible. For the latter is compelled to reject many interpretations of Christianity as heretical on the basis of her understanding of her own faith even though the same interpretations are tolerated in the Protestant Churches, and indeed to a certain extent recognized as legitimate.[3]

Obviously there are other and more general grounds for the current crisis in ecumenical theology. There are for instance those questions which now confront the whole of Christian theology and all Christian Churches, the questions of secularization, atheism, pluralism of ideas in Church and society, the osmosis between the Church and the world, the process by which to an increasing extent the national Church is being transformed into smaller communities of believers living in a diaspora situation on the basis of their own personal faith etc.[4] It is not our purpose here to treat of these questions. Rather we seek to draw attention to a certain immobility in the internal life of the Churches, a lack of movement which represents an obstacle to any ecumenical progress, and an impasse for ecumenical theology.

What we have said in abstract terms with regard to the limits of ecumenical theology is repeatedly confirmed by our experience of ecumenical work. Indeed it is a strange phenomenon. All speak of unity, declare their will to achieve unity between the Churches and their conviction [248] of the duty to work for this unity. Nor have we any right, at least in principle, to cast doubts upon the genuineness of this attitude and this resolve to work for unification. And yet as a matter of historical fact nothing or almost nothing ever happens. For [3] On this, however, cf. also the author's remarks concerning the lack of certainty in the Catholic Church as to what heresy is. Cf. 'What is Heresy?', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 468-512, and in the present volume, 'Does the Church Offer Any Ultimate Certainties?' Cf. also 'Schism in the Catholic Church' and 'Heresies in the Church Today?', Theological Investigations XII (London and New York, 1974), pp. 98-115, 116-141.

[4] In other passages the author has fully defined his position on such questions as the diaspora situation, secularization etc. Cf. 'Theological Considerations on Secularization and Atheism', Theological Investigations XI (London and New York, 1974), pp. 166-184; 'Church, Churches and Religions', Theological Investigations X (London, 1973), pp. 30-49; 'On the Presence of Christ in the Diaspora Community according to the Teaching of the Second Vatican Council', Theological Investigations X (London, 1973), pp. 84-102.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the overall organization of the World Council of Churches neither is nor seeks to be a Church in its own right, and the situation is that for all the friendly contacts and discussions between the World Council of Churches and the Roman Catholic Church these have not only failed to produce any real unification – something which in fact we could still understand – but have not even brought them discernibly closer to one another. Despite all ecumenical resolves the real frontiers still remain stiff and immovable.[5]

The two theses put forward quite simply represent an attempt to discover a deeper starting-point for ecumenical theology today, and so a way of helping to escape from the impasse with which the dialogue is threatened.

THE ULTIMATE BASIS FOR ECUMENICAL THEOLOGY

I am enquiring into the ultimate basis for ecumenical theology. My initial answer to this question takes the form of a brief thesis which I will then try to explain in greater detail. The thesis runs as follows: the ultimate basis for ecumenical theology is the unity, apprehended in hope, of a belief in justifying grace which already exists and is identical on both sides, yet which, so far as theology is concerned together with the credal formula which gives it conceptual expression, is still in process of being achieved.

What is the force of this thesis in more precise detail? First it must unreservedly be conceded that for ecumenical dialogue and ecumenical theology in their contemporary form a liberal humanism, with its defence of freedom of opinion and freedom of belief within a pluralistic society has been and continues to be the only possible occasion and setting such that without it present-day ecumenical theology as it actually exists would be quite inconceivable. When we conduct an ecumenical dialogue or pursue ecumenical theology with one another despite the fact that we are divided among many Churches, then the ultimate basis for this is after all that we mutually recognize one another as Christians. But what precisely and in genuinely theological terms does this mean? Certainly it means not [249] only that we take into account the fact that the other partner to the dialogue regards himself as a Christian. It does not only mean that we mutually credit one another with the fact that all have been validly baptized – supposing that in this we regard baptism first and foremost in its empirical reality as an external cultic act. Nor does it merely mean that despite all credal differences we empirically establish that we agree upon certain convictions more or less in the sense of the basic formula of the World Council of Churches. What it means rather is that in hope if not in an act of recognition which can be ultimately expressed in theoretical form we are convinced of the fact that the partners to the dialogue on both sides live in the grace of God, are truly justified by the Holy Pneuma of God, and are sharers in the divine nature.[6]

This conviction has not been self-evident for Christians of every age. It is only very gradually and with great toil that it has matured in the Church's understanding of her own faith to the point – so far as the Catholic Church is concerned – of achieving clear expression in the Second Vatican Council. But this conviction is now actually present on both sides.

We must now proceed straightway to discuss the question of how on a Catholic understanding of faith the significance of the Catholic creed as conducing to and necessary

[5] cf. also, however, the author's observations concerning the difference between the official representatives of the Churches and the simple believers in the article entitled 'Ecumenical Theology of the Future' in the present volume.

[6] Some years ago the author attempted to work out the significance of hope for faith and theology. Cf. 'On the Theology of Hope', Theological Investigations X (London, 1973), pp. 260-272. See also his remarks on 'Salvation optimism' in the article 'Considerations on the Problem of the "Anonymous Christian"' in the present volume.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

for salvation can be reconciled with the simultaneous conviction that some who do not share this faith nevertheless possess salvation. All that we are asking here is what this conviction means on both sides for the possibility of ecumenical dialogue and ecumenical theology. And this is something to which the thesis formulated above supplies an answer. This dialogue is possible because despite the difference in the creed as objectified and verbally formulated – in other words despite the differences of faith in this sense – we are not merely seeking for a unity of faith but are mutually crediting one another with already having it; for each of us is aware in faith, hope and love that the other is possessed by the Spirit of God, without whom there can be no belief and with whom there can be no unbelief. This statement obviously compels us to draw a distinction within that which faith signifies in the true sense. Yet while we seek neither to overlook nor to impugn the differences in the credal formulae of the faith, nevertheless each of us [250] recognizes the presence in the other of the divine Spirit of unity with the truth of God, of enlightenment and of faith. Each of us acknowledges in the other the interior witness of the Holy Spirit. And if all this is true then it becomes inescapable to draw a distinction of this kind if we are to avoid simply entertaining two contradictory positions side by side. All sorts of different interpretations may be placed upon the reality which we Catholics call sanctifying grace and which Protestant theology calls justification and salvation. It is in any case a deed of God upon us of his grace, which truly transforms us from sinners into justified men regardless of how in more precise detail we may interpret this saving event of justification, or what forms of expression of varying provenance we may use to express it.

The postulate thus arrived at of a true and common faith underlying the differences of faith between various groups of Christians as expressed verbally in their creeds is not a factor which cannot be used as a basis for any of their ideas merely on the grounds that it must manifestly lie under and beyond any process of formulating ideas in doctrinal statements. If we Christians are to overcome the confessional boundaries to the extent of mutually crediting one another with having the Holy Spirit of grace, then manifestly we must still say that the ultimate and innermost testimonium spiritus is present in all or must at least be presumed to be so, that the illustratio et inspiratio – concepts by means of which tradition seeks to clarify the movement of grace – that the wordless weeping and uttering of Abba by the Spirit in the depths of our hearts,[7] that the Johannine anointing which instructs us,[8] is present in us all even though this innermost reality of Spirit and faith is objectified and set forth verbally and conceptually in different forms in the individual confessions. We may then go on to add to this that for any anthropology of human thought or freedom which takes a somewhat deeper view, a difference always prevails (one which can never fully be overcome or eliminated) between an ultimate and basic state of mind, i.e. an unconscious self-possession on the part of the free subject, an understanding of himself on man's part which is never fully reflected upon on the one hand, and man's objectified awareness of himself, his subjectivity and his free decisions as an object on the other.[9] And if this is true, then we can see what the postulate we have formulated on theological grounds implies, the postulate namely of a general but true faith on the part of the separated Christians through and [251] beyond that objectified faith which they formulate in concepts and words. It does not signify merely something which could not provide the basis for any explicit understanding. In the Spirit of God all of us 'know' something more simple, more true and more real than we can know or express at the level of our theological concepts. Here of course we must pass over the question of why even a true faith of this kind, pre-conceptual and present in the midst of our human lives in the

[7] See Rom. 8:15.
[8] See 1 Jn. 2:20, 27.
[9] On this cf. the author's article, 'Thomas Aquinas on Truth', Theological Investigations XIII.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

power of the Spirit of God, does not render the faith that is objectified in concepts meaningless. This common faith at the heart and centre of human life through the power of God's grace, which is the same in all and true beyond all distortion, constitutes the true basis and the ultimate condition for ecumenical dialogue and an ecumenical theology. Given this basis the ecumenical dialogue is not a discussion in which one or other or both of the two parties involved seeks to communicate some point of doctrine to his partner for the time purely ab externo, such as that partner had formerly absolutely failed or refused to recognize and had rejected as an error of faith. It is not this even in those cases in which it is conducted on one or both sides with an absolute agreement of faith on the particular propositions of faith being upheld at the time. Rather it is the attempt to render comprehensible to one's partner in the dialogue that that which is put to him in terms of concepts is merely a more correct, a fuller, and a more precisely defined expression of something which that partner has already grasped as his own faith through the power of the Spirit at the ultimate depths of his own human existence as justified, and which he has laid hold of as his own truth. Thus our consideration of ecumenical theology returns to that answer to the question which constitutes its true and ultimate theological basis. This is that faith which is prior to any kind of theological reflection or theoretical and social objectification, being already present in all Christians of good will through justifying grace. On this basis ecumenical theology can and must say this: the reason that we must arrive at unity of faith at the level of conscious reflection and social living as well is that we already possess this unity at the level of God's justifying grace. The unity of faith which exists at this level implies both the possibility and the necessity of ecumenical theology. For of course we cannot say this: Because we already possess the unity of faith in the basic state in which Christians stand through grace, we no longer need the unity of faith at the level of theological objectification and social living. On the contrary we must say this: Because we possess the former kind of unity we must also strive for the latter kind, which constitutes the incarnatorial consummation of that former and more basic unity. On this basis [252] the Catholic will understand the Lutheran at the heart and centre of his existence as one who is already an anonymous Catholic, while the Lutheran will regard the Catholic as an anonymous Lutheran at the centre of his existence. Which of the two of us is right is a point on which we are not at one, a point which ecumenical theology considers in a genuine dialogue between the Christians. But the fact that we can so understand ourselves, that we do not seek to pass from an absolute division to unity but rather that we can and must strive, from that unity already achieved in grace and that truth of God already possessed, for the unity of the truth within the one Church – it is this that constitutes the value and the hope of ecumenical theology.

THE FUTURE OF ECUMENICAL THEOLOGY

This brings us back to the danger which threatens the ecumenical dialogue, and the need to reflect more deeply upon that which specifies ecumenical theology and its future task or tasks. In this connection we have a second thesis to propose: that which most of all constitutes ecumenical theology is the theology of the future, which has to be worked out by all the Churches each from its own point of departure as already laid down by its past history.

In the present context what I mean by my use of the term 'theology of the future' is not a theology of the futuricity of man, the hope and the making valid of the 'apocalyptic factor' in Christian faith, of political commitment etc. By theology of the future I mean far more simply that theology which is necessary as a prior condition for any preaching of the gospel in order that the gospel may appear credible in a future characterized by science, technology,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

cybernetics, social unity among men or on a global scale, a future which has already begun.[10]

In the ecumenical situation of today there is after all, over and above that hope against all hope which has been offered to the Christian, only one real chance. Only when the theologies of the separated Churches devote themselves intensively to the task of creating the theology of the future is there any hope or prospect that the theologies in the future will achieve an encounter at one and the same point. This is not to say that direct and face-to-face discussion of controversial theology should be broken off. This is necessary and does in fact yield certain partial results in the 'public opinion' of the theologians, even though it has produced [253] virtually no change at all in the immobility of the Church leaders over and above eirenic words and friendly gestures. But still it seems to me that a greater chance for ecumenical theology lies in working for the Christian theology of the future. All theologies and Churches must learn, each on its own account, to bear witness to the gospel of Jesus Christ in a way that is credible and intelligible to the man of the future which has already begun. If that man is to be a believer they must avoid imposing any further unnecessary difficulties upon him or demanding more of him than the necessary metanoia which involves the whole man. At the same time these theologies of the future must not betray the true gospel by any fashionable accommodations. And if they do all this then, so I hope, these theologies of the future as they exist in the separated Churches will become more assimilated to one another and draw closer to one another than the traditional theologies which are immediately and decisively shaped by the controversial questions of the past. I like to think, therefore, that the most important work of ecumenical theology, so far from consisting in a theology which is conducted in the form of an explicit dialogue side by side with the rest of theology in the separated Churches, will be developed within their theology as a whole and in all the disciplines belonging to it. For after all, ultimately speaking when viewed as a whole it has no other task than to investigate the question of how the gospel can be preached in a way that awakens, and claims the allegiance of faith, and that too not merely for a traditional remnant of individuals who still continue to survive for historical reasons, but for men who are to become Christians in the future from the basis of their own future situation. Viewed in this light ecumenical theology coincides with theology in general. Ecumenical theology, therefore, is to be taken as the theology of the future. This theology of the future must be pursued in the closest possible collaboration between the theologians of all confessions. If this is done, then this will of itself become ecumenical theology.

[10] Perspectives on and conclusions from this are developed in greater detail in the present volume in 'Ecumenical Theology of the Future'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[254]

15

ECUMENICAL THEOLOGY IN THE FUTURE

The question of an ecumenical theology of the future is focused upon ecumenical theology[1] as such, and so not upon that which constitutes first and last the basic task of all ecumenical concern, namely unity between the Churches. Thus it presupposes that there will be Churches that are separated from one another at least for the foreseeable future, and that in the immediate future there will still also be ecumenical theology, i.e. the discussion which the theologies of the separated Churches pursue with one another.

In setting myself to speak of the ecumenical theology of the future my underlying conviction is that this ecumenical theology does not simply remain the same as that which has been pursued in the past, for otherwise it would be possible to speak of an ecumenical theology of the present and one of the future simply in the same breath. On the other hand this theme cannot be taken in a sense which implies that the ecumenical theology of today and that of tomorrow no longer have very much in common. On the contrary that which they have in common is of the utmost importance, Hence it is manifest that my purpose in undertaking this task can only be as follows: I shall take as given those essential traits of any ecumenical theology of any period which always remain the same, and shall [255] not treat of them explicitly here. Here rather I intend to set forth some of those special characteristics which distinguish the ecumenical theology of the future from that of the present day. In real human history the border-lines marking the transitions between present and future are of course fluid, and it follows that the same also applies to the ecumenical theology of today and tomorrow.

DIALOGUE WITH A SECULARIZED WORLD

An initial distinction between ecumenical theology up to the present and that of the future will consist in the fact that the ecumenical theology of the future will proceed not so much from those themes which, on the basis of the past and of the classical credal formulae of the individual Churches, have emerged from themes of controversial theology. Rather this new theology will proceed from the common task of the separated Churches and their theologies and will be concerned with the theological study of the common substance of the Christian faith and with preaching it in such a way that it can be assimilated afresh and in more effective ways by men in the so-called Christian countries even when either explicitly or tacitly they have become remote from the gospel message despite the fact of still outwardly and publicly retaining their membership of these Churches.

This first thesis calls for some clarification. I regard it as obvious that in his work an

[1] The author has long been treating of questions of ecumenical theology. Here only a few of the more significant articles may be mentioned by way of illustration. Cf. 'Membership of the Church According to the Teaching of Pius XlI's Encyclical, "Mystici Corporis"', Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore, 1963), pp. 1-88; 'On Conversions in the Church', Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 373-384; 'Questions of Controversial Theology on Justification', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 189-218; 'What is Heresy?', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 468-512; 'Zur "Situationsethik" aus ökumenischer Sicht', Schriften zur Theologie VI (Einsiedeln, und ed., 1968), pp. 537-544; 'On the Theology of the Ecumenical Discussion', Theological Investigations Xl (London and New York, 1974), pp. 24-67.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ecumenical theologian must always proceed from two starting-points: not only ecumenism but also the more or less official convictions of faith of his Church; that ecumenical theology as a whole will always also be thinking out afresh the classic questions of controversial theology; in other words that in addition to the fresh ecumenical ground it breaks it must also achieve progress along the same lines as formerly. The fact remains, however, that the situation for this ecumenical theology has changed precisely as the general situation of the Churches and their theologies has changed. Formerly the churches and their theologies had only each other as partners and 'opponents' in the discussions at least so far as Europe was concerned. Today it is different. Although the majority of Europeans still adhere in a public and official sense to the Christian Churches, nevertheless all the Churches and their theologies today, individually and collectively, find themselves in a diaspora. Society at large is to a great extent secularized. The majority of the population of Europe has divested itself of any Church influence and, so far as its 'philosophy of life' is concerned, cannot be described as Christian in any real sense. Hence the first and decisive partner to the discussion for the [256] Churches of today must be the 'post-Christian' pagan. If Christianity and the Churches are not forever more to be reduced to a ghetto-like form which can be viewed as a historical relic from former ages continuing to live a sort of vegetable existence in the shadows of real history and ever waning in strength,[2] the Churches must take a fresh stand towards this present age as it really is. It is an age of culture of the masses, of increasing unification of spheres of human history in the world which were formerly separated, of rationalism and enlightenment, of the technology of the mass media, and whatever terms we may choose to characterize still further along these lines this age which is our own. Theology consists in conscious reflection upon the message of the gospel in a quite specific situation in terms of the history of the human spirit, in coming to terms with a quite specific Zeitgeist. It must view that message in the light of perspectives, and with a view to achieving perspectives, which are prescribed by a specific age. In terms of the history of the human spirit, therefore, and in terms of social life our age is a post-Christian one; one, that is, in which Christianity no longer constitutes a decisive force in society as a whole. It follows that any Christian theology must be post-Christian precisely in the sense described, i.e. it must make this secularized world which is already confronting it its partner in discussion.

The process of forming a theology which is post-Christian in this sense has of course been continuing ever since the Enlightenment – perhaps too slowly and too timidly, perhaps with too little success, perhaps with too little courage really to commit itself to the new situation of the secularized world. Perhaps too it has met with failures and not infrequently attempts to smear it on the part of Christianity itself, though true Christianity cannot endure such attempts and the contemporary world does not at basis expect them either on any true understanding of itself. This process of developing a Christian theology that is post-Christian has however been accelerated in a way that we can understand within the last few decades, and it must also be still further increased very notably. What we mean is this: the process of intelligent reflection called theology, in which Christianity attempts to understand its own nature in relation to a world that is secular, indeed post-Christian and anti-Christian, and to address itself to this world is undoubtedly nowadays the chief task and the crucial characteristic [257] of the theology of the Christian Churches. Their primary and crucial partner in discussion is no longer the particular theology of any other Church at any particular time. The theologies of the Christian Churches have now not so much to discuss with one another as to speak together with a partner common to them all who is different from them

[2] The author has given his opinion on these problems – admittedly under different headings – in 'Theological Reflections on the Problem of Secularization', Theological Investigations X (London, 1973), pp. 318-348, and 'Theological Considerations on Secularization and Atheism', Theological Investigations XI (London and New York, 1974), pp. 166-184.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and the same for both Catholic and Protestant. This is the world that has become worldly, which is itself actively steering its own course towards its future, the world which is no longer primarily the subject of philosophical contemplation but of active forces of change, the world whose sciences are methodically atheistic.[3] In the selfsame moment in which the theologians of the individual Churches have discovered a quite new partner, one who at times is in conflict with them, the ecumenical theology of the past has perforce obtained another and lesser status within theology as a whole. The stagnation to be observed in ecumenical theology in very recent times finds at least a partial explanation in this fact and it makes this phenomenon less grievous and easier to understand than it may seem at first sight.[4] The theologies of the various Churches must simply speak to a greater extent than formerly with the world of today, and hence have inevitably less time to discuss directly with one another. We might perhaps be able to establish in detail that those theologians of all confessions who have pressed forward with the dialogue with the contemporary world (albeit when compared with one another in varying ways and with varying degrees of success) were not ecumenical theologians in any explicit sense. Again we may probably be able to establish the converse of this as well, that those theologians who are concerned with a direct ecumenical dialogue between the Christian theologies have in general achieved less for an interpretation of Christianity which is really capable of assimilation by the secular world of today. But – and this is now the crucial point – if the Christian theologies in general speak boldly and far more intensively than in former times with their new partner the secularized world so as to achieve a fresh formulation of Christianity within the perspectives and viewpoints belonging to that world, if in other words they pursue a theology which appears to be not an ecumenical theology at all, then such a discussion with the secular world is precisely the ecumenical theology of the future. For then the [258] various theologies of the individual Churches will discover that when they enter into discussion with this new partner of theirs concerning the basic substance of Christianity they will be speaking to him in the same way and with the same content, the more so since the themes under discussion which are necessary here have hardly any direct points of contact with the earlier themes of controversial theology. Among themselves these theologies will view the old disputed questions in quite new lights from new standpoints, and thereby, while never ceasing to uphold their standards on the question of truth, will learn a fresh reappraisal of these themes also, the importance of which has greatly diminished by comparison with former times. Thus new theologies may emerge within the various Churches which are identical with one another or at least converge in a far clearer manner than was formerly the case.

An additional point is that the common application of contemporary scientific methods, especially of the historical sciences in exegesis, and a common terminology which is achieved as a result of coming to terms with modern philosophy, will likewise contribute to such new points of convergence. Of course this is a development which has already long since begun. Thus it is already clear that on many theological questions the frontiers themselves are no longer in any sense identical with those 'official' boundary lines which separate the confessions, but rather cut across them.[5]

What has just been said should not be misunderstood in the sense of supposing that there is a unified theology to be found in every Church, or that these unified theologies will come to be more in harmony with one another. On the contrary, in every confession the pluralism

[3] On this cf. 'Christianity and the "New Man"', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 135-153, and also 'Kirche und Welt', Zehn Jahre Kath. Akademie in Bayern (Würzburg, 1967), pp. 9-27.
[4] On this see also the author's ideas in the present volume, 'Some Problems of Ecumenism Today'.
[5] On this cf. also the author's remarks in the present volume entitled 'The Church's Commission to Bring Salvation and the Humanization of the World', but also the article, 'Possible Courses for the Theology of the Future', Theological Investigations XIII. Here the author treats explicitly of the ecumenical aspect.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

among the theologies has become greater. This applies not only to the Protestant Churches but to the Catholic Church as well. But even so these manifold theologies as they exist in every Church have even now more or less clearly found their points of agreement in the other Churches. Even among us, for instance, there are theologies which are developed on the basis of exegesis or biblical theology to a greater extent than was formerly the case in scholastic theology. And this manifestation obviously finds a theology corresponding to it within the Protestant Church. Nowadays in Germany there exists in both Churches a 'political theology'. It would be possible to find in both Churches theologians in agreement with one [259] another who, more clearly than in earlier times, have commonly found a certain partnership in developing a philosophical reappraisal of the Christian message with the help of modern philosophies since Kant. Commentaries on biblical books written in collaboration already exist, and these do not have an ecumenical purpose in any direct sense but are simply written from the feeling that the exegetical methods and assumptions are the same from the outset, so that it is possible on these grounds alone to arrive at the same results, at least to a very notable extent. Similar tendencies are to be noticed in the field of Church history writing. In this connection too we can mention at least in summary form all those efforts which are conducive to a co-ordination or at least partial identification of theological work and theological instruction in the organizational and institutional areas, efforts which in America have already achieved more far-reaching progress than among us and have already found a certain acceptance in the decisions of Rome concerning theological studies and their organization. The point I am concerned with here is simply this: the new and urgent task for a theology directed towards the secular world and based on its requirements leads in all the Churches to what might be called an indirectly ecumenical theology, and it may be presumed that this can be more effective than the former ecumenical theology even though this, as has already been emphasized at the outset, must of course continue and progress as well.

'NON-THEOLOGICAL' ASPECTS OF AN ECUMENICAL THEOLOGY

Of its very nature what-we have just said concerning this new indirect ecumenical theology of the future includes a second point which must now be developed and clarified in its own right. The former kind of ecumenical theology, working in terms of controversial theology, had in view at least by and large the doctrinal differences between the confessions in their theological content and the opposition between them, the only further point which it took into consideration being at most the origin and history of these doctrinal differences as developed within theology itself. This view of ecumenical theology is of course justified and must remain as long as it continues to be a mistaken view that theology has to resolve itself into other sciences.[6] Nevertheless it might be a [260] useful and valuable task to view the theses of controversial theology in their difference and opposition from new and non-theological standpoints, and to consider the non-theological origins, conditions and consequences of this kind which lie behind such theses. We might call these fresh aspects under which an ecumenical theology is to consider the controversial themes among the Churches 'non-theological' aspects. But in doing so I am very conscious of the problems entailed in the term 'non-theological', for it could very well precisely be the case that at an unconscious and hidden level such aspects are in fact far more 'theological', i.e. for instance conditioned by grace or as a matter of history of specifically Christian origin, though they are now present in

[6] On these ideas cf. the author's article in Theological Investigations XIII, 'Theology as Engaged in an Interdisciplinary Dialogue With the Sciences' and also 'On the Relationship Between Theology and the Contemporary Sciences'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

a Christianity which has become anonymous so that we are simply failing to discern at first sight the Christian element which has become anonymous in such aspects. When therefore we say that a new ecumenical theology has to consider the theses belonging to controversial theology between the confessions from 'non-theological' aspects the term 'non-theological' as used here is intended in a very provisional and deliberately marginal sense, and signifies everything which is not explicitly affirmed to be Christian. Probably there are many such aspects and they could be more clearly apprehended if the interdisciplinary discussion of theology with the contemporary sciences, the arts, the natural sciences and the social sciences were more energetically pursued, and also more effectively planned from an organizational point of view than is commonly the case. Here, therefore, we shall be referring simply by way of example to this or that non-theological aspect which might be significant for ecumenical theology.

Thus for instance we might investigate the secular causes, in terms of the history of thought and the development of society,[7] leading to the divisions between the Churches of East and West, and subsequently within the Western Church itself. Obviously such causes, belonging as they do to the history of human thought and society, have already all along been taken into account as incidental factors, especially in secular history and the history of the Church. But by and large the only ways in which they have been taken into account have been such that the recognition of them has never been accorded any special importance in [261] controversial theology or ecumenical theology. Obviously all such secular causal factors belonging to the history of human thought, politics or society, and so leading first to the divisions between the Churches, and as a result continuing to take further effect within the separated theologies, would be contributing factors, prior conditions etc. such that these opinions in controversial theology could not be resolved into them by bypassing the true and essential question of theological truth. Yet we may for instance take the case of the doctrine of the First Vatican Council. The fact that it did achieve its existing formulation and that it was de facto decided upon presupposes a quite specific situation in terms of the history of ideas, and without this it would in real terms be totally inconceivable even though this does not of itself imply any decision whatever with regard to its claim to truth. Now if we recognize this then a point for investigation in an ecumenical theology too (by means of individual examples or in more basic terms) would be whether, in what ways, and perhaps through what further historical developments this explicit doctrinal decision might affect and claim the allegiance of those Christians who have not yet, or perhaps never in any sense, experienced that particular situation in the history of human thought in the light of which alone this doctrinal decision is really conceivable as their own particular historical situation. When we take this into account it could in fact be the case that, for instance, a doctrinal decision of the kind promulgated at the First Vatican Council need not explicitly be denied by the Churches of the East. The reason is that by such a denial, just as much as by the contrary affirmation, the Churches of the East would be entering into a situation in terms of the development of ideas, whether really or in an unrealistic theorizing, which is in truth in no sense their own, while at the same time, so far as these Churches are concerned, this doctrine would not be presented in the concrete form in which it actually appears or with the practical [7] The author has explained his position still more fully on the importance of the interpretation of history for his own special field in three articles under the general heading 'History of Theology' in Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966). Cf. 'History of the World and Salvation History', ibid., pp. 97-114, 'Christianity and the Non-Christian Religions', ibid., pp. 115-134, 'Christianity and the "New Man" ', ibid., pp. 135-153. Here this aspect is still further entered into.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

consequences which it rightly has for Western Catholicism.[8] There is much affecting concrete life, laws and liturgy which the Roman Church, whether willingly or reluctantly, does in fact concede to the uniate Churches of the East, and which it is ready to concede also to the other Eastern Churches. Now in considerations of the kind we are speaking of, and within an ecumenical theology working with the methods indicated, such factors as these could be interpreted in a notably deeper [262] manner and also with certain practical consequences. This is of course only a single small example, and only an indication of the task for an ecumenical theology in enquiring into the theses of controversial theology as to their origins and preconditioning factors in secular and social history.

Another aspect from which the theses of controversial theology might be presented in a new ecumenical theology would be their social relevance.[9] Ever since Max Weber attention has been drawn – whether rightly or wrongly, we do not need to investigate here – to connections between the spirit and social structure of capitalism and Calvinism. Whatever positions we may adopt with regard to this particular example, there is an interchange of influences, which pass to and fro between religious and social movements. Attitudes which are objectified in terms of theology have also a social relevance, and under certain circumstances may be clearer and more capable of critical appraisal from the point of view of this than if they are viewed solely at the level of theology. Now this can be important for an ecumenical theology. It can come to achieve a better recognition of its own subject-matter by considering the social relevance of this. In the majority of cases such an approach will presumably not be able to lead to any decision on the question of truth, but nevertheless under certain circumstances it can lead very clearly to a recognition of the deficiencies, omissions and obscurities in a particular theological statement put forward by a particular confession. Now when confessional theses of this kind are exposed in the manner suggested, and their one-sidedness, omissions etc. are recognized and then remedied, such an approach can also demand that the confessional theologies shall be drawn together. We may take, for instance, the example of the strange and still certainly problematical union of the Catholic Church with conservative and reactionary forces since the French Revolution at the end of the eighteenth century almost down to the present day (and, moreover with theological motivations as well). Could not an investigation of all this assist in discovering the biases, dangerous shifts of emphasis, and indeed errors even within the official doctrine of the Church? Could it not be the case that the changes thereby attainable within Catholic theology might make even this more comprehensible and more capable of assimilation for non-Catholic theologies? Could not something similar take place with regard to the Lutheran doctrine of the two kingdoms, with regard to their social and political relevance, or in the light of this relevance? [263] Thus union might emerge from this, so I believe, for ecumenical theology itself as well once we enquire into the disputed theses of controversial theology from the point of view of their social relevance. A further point to be noticed is that this approach can probably also be applied to theses and disputed treatises in controversial theology of a kind to which it might not be supposed at first sight to apply because of their 'lack of worldly relevance'. This remains true even if we leave the question open of whether every theological doctrine should have a relevance of this kind or else not be regarded as theologically serious at all.

The third 'non-theological' aspect from which the doctrines which are controversial

[8] On the subject of doctrinal differences cf. the author's articles in the present volume, 'On the Concept of Infallibility in Catholic Theology', 'The Faith of the Christian and the Doctrine of the Church', 'The Doctrinal Authority of the Church as a Subject of Dispute' etc.

[9] With reference to the sociological relevance cf. the author's article in Theological Investigations XIII, 'Institution and Freedom', and also Freiheit und Manipulation in Gesellschaft und Kirche, Münch. Akad. Schriften 53 (Munich, 2nd ed., 1971).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

between the confessions might be viewed is perhaps the aspect of the languages involved,[10] in which these confessionally distinct doctrines were originally conceived, even if the first fathers of the oppositions which grew up in the Reformation in the sixteenth century in all the Churches formulated their ideas more or less in 'two languages'. Thus for instance as a theologian Luther wrote in German and Latin, Calvin in French and Latin, and their Catholic opponents of course did not confine themselves to Latin either in their writings. While recognizing this point we may perhaps recognize also that in many cases at least the whole distinctive genius of a particular language may have a special affinity with a particular confession. On this point, it is true, we shall have to exercise great caution. We shall not be able to decide the ultimate question of truth even by an approach such as this, nor may we reduce it to a relative status any more than we can invoke the evidence of history to prove that the religion of one of the higher cultures can be the most appropriate one for a particular ethnic group. Nevertheless if for instance we say that [264] Catholic Church life in its concrete historical form has a special affinity with Latin, with the objectivity and juridical qualities inherent in that language, if the German of a Luther and his theology may perhaps have, at least in part, a mutually conditioning relationship one to the other, if a similar point can be made about the theology and the French tongue of Calvin, then the study of the theological languages with their special characteristics in the original formulations of the individual confessions could be very fruitful, at least so far as the special character of the thought is concerned, in establishing the limits and the deficiencies of the theology of any given period, and it could be helpful to each particular confession in arriving at an attitude of self-criticism towards its own historical form. This in turn could have the effect of promoting the convergence between the confessional theologies which we are striving for in ecumenical theology. Again this is merely an indication, which once more implicitly demands an interdisciplinary discussion between theology and the science of linguistics, a discussion which presumably already exists in its incipient stages, although I have no information to impart on this from my own knowledge. We are pointing, then, to a 'non-theological' aspect from which ecumenical theology might be approached. We are not concerned, therefore, with asserting that no such thing exists at all in ecumenical theology in the history of the Churches or the public utterances of the confessions. What we are concerned with, rather, here is the opinion that such a method might be developed in fuller detail in ecumenical theology and applied in greater measure than in fact is the case.

CHURCH CHRISTIANS WITHOUT ANY CONFESSIONAL AWARENESS

Yet a third question might in my opinion produce notable changes in the ecumenical theology of the future. I refer to the question of the theological relevance of the fact, surely indisputable, that far the greatest part of the Christians who have grown up in the various [10] The author has frequently treated of the importance of linguistic forms for theological and religious statements from various aspects. We may recall the articles on the development of doctrine as for instance 'The Development of Dogma', Theological Investigations I (London, 1961), pp. 39-76; 'Considerations on the Development of Dogma', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 3-35, or works such as 'The Word and the Eucharist', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 253-286; 'Priest and Poet', Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 294-317; also 'Poetry and the Christian', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 253-286. Here it is a direct theology of the word that is in question; or more technical studies may be mentioned such as 'The Hermeneutics of Eschatological Assertions', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 323-346. Reference may also not least be made to the manifold expositions on prayer and forms of expression of devotion. The reader will readily find further expositions for all these areas of enquiry among the articles of the present volume.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ecclesiastical groupings do not have any real knowledge of the differences constituting the confessions,[11] or if they do have such knowledge do not attach any very great importance to those differences, and furthermore that where such Christians outside the circle of ecclesiastical officials and theologians do know of the differences between the confessions and regard them as important to themselves what is in question is often those differences to which the [265] official theologies of the Churches do not ascribe any crucial importance for justifying the divisions between the Churches. I cannot enter into any greater detail in establishing a fact which is here formulated only in very abstract terms. From my own experience it seems to me that it is a fact recognized by all and would probably be easy to establish demographically. In any case in my view if, as we have said, we abstract from the ecclesiastical officials and the theologians, it does seem to apply to the vast majority of Christians belonging to different confessions. It also seems to me that the situation is not that there are Christians who, as a matter of personal decision profess themselves adherents of different confessionally formulated creeds as expressing their own personal convictions (as properly speaking might after all be expected in view of the relationship between faith and Church), but rather that there are Christians differing from one another confessionally because there are confessionally different Churches.

This fact, in itself very noteworthy and far from being self-evident, manifests itself in historical and social terms and (if we like to put it so) in terms of secular psychology in the fact that these different ecclesiastical groupings in earlier history came into being through the decisions of a few individuals, the territorial overlords, small leading groups and classes, without which at that time it would of course have been to a large extent quite impossible for the members of a given Church in their broad masses to arrive at any personal decision of their own. It is also to be explained by the fact that such decisions have had a diminishing effect right down to the present day. Even today the great mass of the members of the Churches have still been born into these Churches and do not give their adherence to any particular Church as the outcome of a specifically confessional decision of faith. Historically speaking this fact that the members of a Church are constituted as such in the sense indicated in all the Churches is intelligible in view of the force of social tradition and the fact that to a large extent it would inevitably be to demand too much of the average individual to enter into controversial theological doctrines. It is psychologically speaking not very surprising either. On no account should it be maintained that there is anything new or surprising in this fact as it has been established, but I do believe that ecumenical theology has not really concerned itself theologically with this fact, or at any rate not in sufficient measure, perhaps precisely because it is historically, socially and psychologically obvious.

Yet it is a theological question too: what are the implications for a theological, as distinct from a psychological and social-empirical, sense of [266] creed[12] and Church with regard to their differences, if it is quite impossible to say that the majority of Christians formed in a particular Church tradition know of the doctrinal differences dividing the Churches or have made them their own? What does it mean once we recognize with regard to the different

[11] cf. the author's study, 'On the Structure of the People of the Church Today', Theological Investigations XII (London and New York, 1974), pp. 218-228.

[12] On the question of the creed or the confession of faith cf. chiefly the author's studies on a basic formula of the faith. In the nature of things the problem of confessional formulae too is touched upon in this context. Cf. 'The Need for a "Short Formula" of Christian Faith', Theological Investigations IX (London and New York, 1972), pp. 117-126, and also 'Reflections on the Problems Involved in Devising a Short Formula of the Faith', Theological Investigations XI (London and New York, 1974), pp. 230-244 (together with the further literature there adduced). But the following should also be noticed: 'Pluralism in Theology and the Unity of the Creed in the Church', Theological Investigations XI (London and New York, 1974) pp. 3-23. Here the problems are approached from a different standpoint. For an overall survey cf. a study by one of the author's collaborators, R. Bleistein, Kurzformel des Glaubens, Prinzip einer modernen Religionspädagogik (Würzburg, 2nd ed., 1972).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Churches to the extent that they signify not institutions but men that they are constituted by men and Christians of this kind who in a theological sense are in no possible sense confessionally divided from one another? Obviously I do not deny that in every confessionally divided Church there are individuals who have in fact grasped the distinctive doctrines of their own particular Church and made them their own. In fact I presume that I myself am to be numbered among them, and so that I am in a sense that is theological and not merely pertaining to the sociology of religion a Catholic. But this does not dispose of the question of what the significance of this fact is: that the vast majority of the members of all Christian Churches are, from the point of view of the sociology of religion, members each of one such Church on specifically historical and psychological grounds, but not properly on theological grounds, even though despite this fact, recognized by everyone, ecumenical theology as practised on all sides properly speaking proceeds from the opposite position, i.e. acts as though within the individual Churches it were imparting its message to a great number of men who were confessional Christians in a specifically theological sense. I believe that any ecumenical theology in any Church must take a far deeper and fuller cognizance of the simple fact we have mentioned as a subject of extremely disturbing, and properly theological, enquiry.[13]

[267] How this question is to be answered, what conclusions will emerge from a theologically bold and exact attempt at answering this question, it is difficult to say. And obviously it is not possible within so brief a compass as is available to us here even to sketch out an answer to such a question. Thus for instance the question would have to be posed of what status within the faith of a given Church and for the justification of a Church a doctrine could have which on the one hand is declared to be constitutive of that particular confession, while on the other it never so much as comes to the fore in the conscious faith of the vast majority of the members of such a Church on any realistic view of the matter from the aspect of the theology of faith. In this connection these individuals as they exist in the concrete circumstances of their lives and in history can no longer be regarded as represented by a territorial overlord or a small leading group, a sociological elite as may perhaps have been possible in earlier centuries not merely at the sociological level but at the theological one as well. Theological considerations of this state of affairs which belongs primarily to the sociology and psychology of religion could lead to consequences which might contribute to finding the answer to different and more practical ecumenical questions. We might think, for instance, of the question of religious instruction in common for children of different confessions, of the question of an ecumenical form of marriage, of the question of so-called intercommunion, i.e. a fellowship at the altar going beyond that which is even now already admitted, or beginning to be admitted, in this respect in the separated Churches. Such questions will certainly not be able to be answered solely on the basis of the initiative here indicated. But abstracting from minor and marginal considerations with regard to a common viewpoint as to the nature of the Eucharist, we are in my opinion far from having devoted sufficient thought to what is implied for the questions we have mentioned by the fact that the majority of Christians in the separated Churches, while they are indeed separated from one another institutionally and at the level of religious sociology, are not so in a properly theological sense, i.e. in relation to the faith which they have de facto made real to themselves in their heads and hearts. This is a faith which in practice does not include

[13] Among the disquieting aspects we should also include a question which, though much discussed, has surely not yet been thought out aright, that namely of intercommunion with all the difficult problems it entails. A few brief remarks on this are to be found in what follows. For the present we may confine ourselves to noticing two studies together with a relevant bibliography: H. Bacht, 'Zum Problem der Interkommunion', Catholica 24 (1970), pp. 270-291, and also, amongst other works, K. H. Neufeld, 'Abendmahlsgemeinschaft – für und wider', Der grosse Entschluss 24 (1969), pp. 421-424.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

confessional differences, at least in those areas in which, according to the theologies of these Churches themselves, it could justify any separation between the Churches. Yet it is clear that these questions, together with their possible implications, [268] cannot be thought out any further in the present context, the questions namely touching upon the difference between the kind of separation that is the outcome of religious sociology on the one hand, and the unity at the level of faith and theology of the majority of Christians within the different Churches on the other.

IS IT POSSIBLE TO ACHIEVE A CHURCH THAT IS INSTITUTIONALLY ONE?

Only one last question must be appended to what we have said in pointing out this noteworthy difference. To put it in a somewhat simplified and over-generalized form: we have Churches which are separated from one another institutionally and in terms of religious sociology. In this respect they are wholly separated from one another, whereas in terms of faith the same Churches are at one so far as the majority of their members are concerned, and in this connection are separated only so far as minor groups within them are concerned, groups with a higher degree of theological awareness, and so constituted particularly by officials and theologians.[14] Could we not make the converse true without thereby harming the conscious faith either of the majority of Christians or of those Christians who are aware of the theological differences involved? In other words could we not form a Church which was single in institutional terms and in terms of religious sociology in which of course the plurality of creeds upheld by those maintaining theologically distinct doctrines would be recognized as legitimate within this institutional unity? Against this it might be objected that the conscious faith of those Christians divided on theological grounds does in fact demand precisely specific institutions within their Church or alternatively excludes such institutions on grounds of faith. This would mean that a Church that was institutionally one in this sense would perforce run counter to the conscious faith of such individuals divided on theological grounds. For instance some would feel obliged to demand a pope while others would reject any such authority. [269] But in response to this a counter-question might be put: would it not be possible, while according a place to such Church institutions (e.g. pope and bishops, a multiplicity of sacramental rites etc.) within the unity of this Church at the level of religious sociology still so to apply them in concrete practice that they would not do violence to the conscious faith of those who formally rejected such institutions while for the rest who formally demanded them they could be provided and so be interpreted by these according to their conscious faith with regard to the concrete application of such institutions that they were also in accordance with their tenets.

All this is intended merely as a question which we might go on precisely to point to in fuller detail. Yet a question still remains which has not been sufficiently clearly raised so far in ecumenical theology: the question of what conclusions arise from the fact that all Christian Churches must ascribe the fact of being separated, as distinct from any conscious faith at the theoretical level, to circumstances in the past, circumstances to which, according to their own doctrines, they should not accord any influence bearing upon the question of unity or [14] Even in the case of the structures of institutional leadership there is surely still a wider scope available for new forms and conceptions than we are accustomed to suppose. Consequently not every possibility is yet cut off from this aspect either. This is a point which arises from the author's article in the present volume, 'Aspects of the Episcopal Office'. The proposal put forward here, therefore, is to be taken as a conceptual model. No definitive value judgement is necessarily intended either in a positive or in a negative sense. What the author was primarily concerned with was to point out lines of development and possibilities which should not simply be overlooked or forgotten.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

separation, and that the separation that is truly based on faith, which should correspond to the institutional separation, is in no sense present in the great majority of the members of all these Churches. The reasons for these members still belonging to either this or that Church even today are, it is true, the outcome of a long historical line of succession. But properly speaking these reasons are not covered by those decisions of faith which could justify a separation between the Churches. Clearly this third path of renewal in ecumenical theology has been indicated in a very over-simplified and unguarded form.

The ecumenical theology of the future will be different and more comprehensive if it consists not merely in discussion between the two theologies, but actually draws new partners into the discussion: the world of today, the secular sciences, the fact that the ecumenical dialogue, from a theological point of view, is far from being such that it can ipso facto be conducted by the theologians in the name of the rest of Christians.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[270]

16

THE UNREADINESS OF THE CHURCH'S MEMBERS TO ACCEPT POVERTY

Ever since the Second Vatican Council we have been talking freely and at length about the 'poor Church' or the 'Church of the poor', a Church, that is, which by its poverty must show the world that its message is worthy of belief.[1] It has a duty to range itself on the side of the poor, the oppressed, the under-developed peoples. It must bring the rich face to face with the sorrows of Jesus and so fight against the contemporary structures and the dominance of capitalism and imperialism, and in so fighting against these structures with their unjust dominance it must of course begin with itself. The religious communities in the Church, the orders, are exhorted to give a new and modern sense, and a new importance to that poverty which in fact they have vowed themselves to all along.

Obviously only very little can be said here, within the compass of a brief article, on all these questions of poverty[2] as a problem for the Church. Anyone who fails to discover here what he believes that he is justified in seeking should bear in mind the difficulties entailed in this question. Precisely on this account too we have no intention of developing the question 'systematically'. Only a few observations are possible. Perhaps in spite of that we shall be able to make a contribution to the evaluation which the most recent Synod of Bishops (Autumn 1971) has [271] undertaken, or at any rate has sought to undertake.[3] For the general theme of how the Church can contribute to bringing justice in the world to reality must surely include a consideration of what chances there are for actually carrying out this task of the Church.

Even in the New Testament itself we can discover a strange dualism: poverty is that which men seek to strive against in their fellows with the help of love of neighbour, a love which must not be taken as confined to one's private circle. At the same time it is that living context, voluntarily created, which is intended to make it possible for one's own life to be truly Christian. Of course it may be said that the two senses of 'poverty' are far from having the same meaning. But is that altogether true? And are the social conditions presupposed in this biblical message concerning poverty still present today as well? Whatever answers we feel we must give to these difficult questions, the situation today is at least such that a connection does exist between these two kinds of 'poverty', the 'voluntary' poverty regarded as a moral or ascetic ideal for Christians is intended to contribute to helping our fellows in their poverty. The 'coat' which one man forgoes is intended to warm his fellow.

There are poor even today who should not be such. There are underdeveloped peoples among whom poor of this kind are to be counted in millions, and because – at least first and foremost in principle – something can be altered in this, it follows that something must be altered in it. The Lazarus before the gates of the rich reveller is nowadays represented first and foremost by the under-developed peoples. The boundary line between Lazarus and the

[1] On this cf. Y. Congar, 'The Place of Poverty in Christian Life in an Affluent Society', Concilium 5/2 (1966), pp. 28-39, with extensive bibliography for the French-speaking sphere, for which this subject has a special prominence. A series of significant passages in this discussion is to be found in P. Henrici ed., Die christliche Armut (Frankfurt, 1966).

[2] On the theme of poverty cf. the following articles by the author: 'Reflections on the Theology of Renunciation', Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 47-57, and also 'On the Theology of Poverty', Theological Investigations VIII (London and New York, 1971), pp. 168-124. A further work which should be mentioned here is J. B. Metz, Armut im Geiste (Munich, 1962).

[3] On the problems involved in the theme of 'social justice' as treated of at the Synod of Bishops at Rome see the reports in Herder Korrespondenz 25 (1971), pp. 457-460; 472-478.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

reveller is the north-south line encircling the entire world. In addition there are of course poor people enough even in the highly industrialized and privileged nations, people who sheerly and simply have not enough to eat, people who have been squeezed out of the work force against their will after forty years, victims of racial discrimination or unjust political persecution, people prevented from achieving a reasonable and possible rise in living standards, people living on small fixed incomes and scraping a wretched living throughout their lives, sick people who might be helped if the will to help them was there, people who cannot help themselves in life because right from the outset they have never been given the possibility of a start in human or economic terms, and so on – people who are genuinely poor. And even if we dislike criticisms of society in the form of lyrical laments, still we, who cannot [272] number ourselves among these poor, are rich (by some standards, however varied these may be), and rich, moreover because (notice the 'moreover' and the 'because' here!) those poor people are poor. As for 'alms' in the biblical sense, which should still be being given today and should conduce to greater justice as producing changes either of an evolutionary or revolutionary kind in the social structures, we either fail to give them or do not give them in sufficient measure. And here the Church quite certainly should have – indeed has – the task of preaching justice for the poor to herself, her members and the world, of recognizing and searching out these contemporary poor everywhere where the conditions and structures of wealth and power make some wretched and pitiful while according unjust privileges to others, regardless of whether this wretchedness is the direct outcome of withdrawing economic benefits or consists in other injuries. What is primarily in question nowadays, therefore, is the will to eliminate this poverty as rightly understood, and not directly the will to be poor. This latter kind of will is relevant – at least primarily and under existing conditions – only to the extent that the will to eliminate the poverty of others implies the renunciation of goods for oneself, and to that extent one's own 'poverty'. (It might be asked whether if there were no poor in any true sense the will to accept personal poverty, consumer ascesis, voluntary restraint in the fact of an uncontrolled emphasis on the enjoyment of goods, would not still always be reasonable and necessary for men and Christians. But this is a question which does not need to be raised for our present purposes.)

It is here that we begin to encounter the problem which in the following study will be restricted to the conflict between north and south. In our treatment of it we shall be assuming, without actually producing an array of statistics, that the 'world' is de facto failing to do what should be done to overcome this conflict; that the 'aids to development' (whatever the form they should take or whatever name should be given them) are totally inadequate. Now precisely how should the Church be a credible witness to this message that is necessary to will the struggle against poverty as understood here? The actual situation is this: a form of preaching which remains more or less socially ineffectual over a long period loses its credibility. For when the demand that something should be believed in remains on the whole ineffectual, men refuse to believe in its credibility. This may or may not be justified, but in any case we do not need here to investigate when it is right to adopt such an attitude and when not. In any case it actually is so. And this leads to a vicious circle. The Church preaches that it is necessary actively to will the elimination [273] of poverty in the world, but its message is more or less ineffectual for reasons which we are just about to consider. And the ineffectualness of the Church's preaching renders her message unworthy of belief and so in its turn still more ineffectual.

Why is the exhortation to this resolve by and large ineffectual? The reasons most often adduced for this are generally speaking very superficial and emotional ones. The Church, it is alleged, does not herself practise what she preaches. She is rich. Those within her who set the standards, the pope, bishops and priests, themselves have standards of living which are too high in the advanced countries. They fail to achieve any really firm social awareness. They prefer to adhere to the rich, to the establishment in the capitalist and imperialist countries, and so on. And, so the accusation continues, even if much that we might demand or expect of these people would not make any very great difference so far as real poverty is concerned throughout the whole world, still it should be demanded as a sign and protest, as a manifestation of good will. It should not be dismissed as trivial on the grounds that after all it would not be of any use. Abstracting from those particular grounds which we shall straightway be showing to be valid in relation to the members of the Church in general, and which to that extent obviously also apply to the clergy of the Church, the arguments customarily adduced for the ineffectualness of the Church's preaching of poverty do not seem to be very convincing. Despite all the outcry against them the riches of the Vatican are not very great, granted the legitimate aims which it has to strive to achieve. If the pope were to sell his art treasures a fresh outcry would be raised against papal philistinism, just as it is now raised against papal riches. The clergy in our countries, priests and bishops alike (at least among us Germans, though in other countries, France for instance, it straight-way becomes a different matter), certainly share far too much in the standards of the modern consumer society. They live too expensively. The story of the German bishop who either used to drive or still drives a large car, yet sought to have his episcopal standard mounted on a more modest one is perhaps after all not wholly untypical. But in all this the clergy are, after all, merely sharing in that deafness to the preaching of poverty which is universal. It might of course be said that the clergy should precisely take the lead in setting a good example. They may perhaps be exercising consumer restraint but they should be somewhat readier to let their light shine before men in this respect as a sign of what our attitude in the Church really ought to be. The situation is, however, that nowadays it is taken as a sign of the maturity of the laity that they [274] are constantly seeking to enlarge upon the unimportance of the example set them by the clergy. And finally in the present context what is in question is precisely not a sign, but the far more real question of how we can bring effective help to the 'poor'. And on this showing it must after all be said that if anyone is to help it is not the Church as represented by the clergy, but the Church of all Christians, the Church of the laity that should provide this help. This brings us to a simple question: will it be possible for the Church (in the sense of the clergy) really to mobilize the Church of the laity in this resolve and this struggle against the poverty of the world?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If we are to find an answer to this true and practical question one point must be made from the outset. The actual attempt to achieve this mobilization, this change of awareness and attitude in the Church, must be made by individuals in the Church (clergy and laymen alike) who are aware of the situation and of this objective duty on the Church's part. This remains true even if it has to be said that the question as posed will have to be answered (by and large) in the negative. There are precisely human and Christian situations in which a course of action is demanded of one even though, on any realistic view, it is condemned to failure. (Otherwise Jesus too would not have died on the Cross.)

This is a point to which we shall be returning at a later stage. But assuming it as correct for the present, we must say this: the prospects are that the Church will not succeed in leading the struggle against poverty by means of her own 'poverty', even though in itself she has a duty to do this. The Church will not, in any adequate sense, succeed in mobilizing the Church. There is an unreadiness to accept poverty.

The first point to be made on this thesis is one that is intended to explain how in general terms it is possible to arrive at such a judgement. If we take Church history into consideration, and take serious cognizance of the teaching that the Church is a Church of sinners, then we cannot say that it is impossible from the outset for the Church to be capable of failing in major historical situations, or alternatively that such a thing is unforeseeable

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

under certain circumstances.[4] A failure of this kind is not impossible [275] because on any human estimation it has de facto taken place often enough in the past. Or are we to say that, for instance in the case of her confrontation with the cultures of Eastern Asia, in the dispute on rites, the Church really emerged successfully (to consider merely the more recent history of the Church)? Has she really 'coped' adequately in any positive sense with the Enlightenment? Has she reacted against modern nationalistic movements in the manner really demanded of her? Has she managed to reject the movement towards the Church state at the right time? Is it not through her own fault (her historical fault!) that she has in large measure lost the 'proletariat' in many countries? And so on. The case with the Church as with other societies is mutatis mutandis the same as with the individual man. He fails to meet the demands of a particular situation, even though it cannot and should not be said (in order to create an alibi from the outset for this failure) that he did not already have 'within himself' and from the outset the possibility of meeting this demand which his situation made upon him. Thus the Church too, as a great mass of average individuals, finds herself again and again in situations in which the requirements of the gospel, in their concrete application as determined by the particular situation, simply 'can' not be recognized with sufficient clarity and force. (The theologians would perhaps have to use the term necessitas consequens at this point, but it remains a 'must' pertaining to the opposite of saving history really to take that course of action which properly speaking should be taken.) We recognize an obligation and at the same time fail to recognize it. We respond to a demand, but in such a way that our response is so weak as to have no result at all, or at any rate very little. The borderline between the duty which in itself does exist and its opposite are so fluid and obscure that we can hardly ever see the situation in which the individual stands so clearly that we can say to him, 'For a Christian that is absolutely ruled out.' Again and again we find ideological justifications to give the Christian a good conscience for doing the opposite of his duty (in a given situation). (We may recall the theological justifications adduced for the apartheid policy.) The obligation is divided up among everyone in such a way that no one can be held responsible for discharging it. The preaching of high ideals is made an alibi for real deeds. Those individuals who do fulfil radical demands of the situation of this kind, at least in so far as they recognize them or are able to fulfil them, are held up as an excuse for the rest. (We may think of a Peter Claver or a Martin Luther King and similar [276] figures in Church history.) Even today we are still setting up monuments to the prophets in order to avoid having to obey what they preached. There is a tendency to feel that we have established that something is impossible even with the best will in the world before we have really tried every possible course. The doctrine of original sin is invoked, or that of the inescapable dialectic of all human realities, or the statement that the poor are always with us, the doctrine of the sublime meaning of suffering and misfortune (even when, at basis, it is solely the outcome of our own fault), or the doctrine of eternal life, the recognition that absolute social equality is neither beneficial nor possible, these and a thousand other reasons are adduced merely to avoid having to take the course of action which a given situation really prescribes. We are exhorted to advance very slowly and cautiously. The praises of evolution in preference to revolution are sung. We are reluctant to make mortgage payments which will only benefit the [4] It may seem that some will seek to use this as ammunition against the Church in an anti-apologetic sense. To these it may simply be pointed out that according to this thesis of a possibility in principle the Church is merely sharing in the common lot of mankind and of the rest of society. In any case she is no worse in this respect than the rest of individuals or societies. Thus from a theological standpoint the question can be at most whether we can establish how far the Church should be better than the 'rest'. When we speak of failure and the possibility of this two questions still remain quite open: the question of how it is judged in God's sight and the further question of its bearing on the decision for salvation. What we are treating of here is that which is customarily called 'historic guilt'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

next generation. We say we cannot when what we really mean is we will not. Our way of formulating this may seem too 'moralizing' in tone, though this is no part of our intention, although those who describe the historical guilt of the Church in earlier ages and condemn it are all too eager to step forward with aggressive accusations and moral condemnations. Yet the fact remains: even in the Church and despite the Church's existence historical faults of the greatest magnitude are possible. Why should not the same situations apply in the case of epochs and peoples as apply in the history of individuals, situations, that is, which can only rightly be responded to by an act of 'heroic virtue'? And on this showing why should not epochs, peoples, and societies too be such that for the most part they fail to rise above these situations? After all these too are made up of very average individuals. Should we not then expect such failure from them still more than from individuals, though admittedly this fact is far from being any firm reason for excusing such failure in situations of the kind we are speaking of? (Any more than the Church in times of persecution can simply permit an average Christian to apostatize in order to preserve his life or his wellbeing.) The great mass of mankind is in fact seldom or never ready for heroic deeds (even when such are necessary, and even men who are not Christian are still subject to the impulses of the Holy Spirit). And if this is true how can we expect any such thing within the Church at all times, seeing that she is made up precisely of these individuals, who also constitute secular societies? There have always been heroic individuals in the Church. But does this ipso facto mean that there has been a heroic Church? The ecclesiologists should see how they can solve this dilemma. The fact we [277] are pointing to is still far from having been adequately thought out at the theological level even though there are people enough nowadays who regard the Church as discredited by it to such an extent that for them it has become totally unworthy of belief in its claim to have been founded by God.

A case of the kind we are speaking of now seems to be in prospect, a failure, namely, of the Church with regard to the will to personal poverty undertaken to eliminate the poverty of the under-developed world. We have to say that all the prospects are that the will that is really required of the Church in this respect will not be brought to bear any more than that of secular society in the same field. The Church will act more or less in exactly the same way as secular society, perhaps very slightly better but by and large just the same. We see and yet we do not see, we will and yet we do not will, we do something and it is too little. Our unreadiness to accept poverty remains. The necessary process of changing our basic attitudes is simply too slow to meet the necessities or to ensure that what is really required will be achieved in the foreseeable future so long as it is not forced by the sheer physical facts, so long as it is subjected merely to moral appeals. The creative imagination is not there. The utopian ideal has (still) no strength behind it. The influence which the Church can bring to bear on such changes of attitude is dependent not merely upon the intrinsic power of the gospel, but also upon the general historical and social milieu. Certainly this influence of the Church – as a partial cause which takes effect at what may be a very invisible level – constantly works within history to change the intellectual and social situation of the secular world. But the converse is equally true. It is only when this situation has come to coincide with what the Church demands, and that too through a whole range of causes not under the control of explicit Christianity or the Church, are Christians in a position really to recognize precisely and effectively what course of action they should truly adopt and should long since have been adopting. Now for the most part changes of this kind in secular attitudes take place slowly, all too slowly. And because of this we cannot seriously expect that this process will be accelerated in the Church. It is much in itself if the Church does not simply form the rearguard in this action, a role which, after all, it has in many respects adopted since the Enlightenment and the French Revolution. For during this period it recognized the signs of the times only when these had already become more than signs, hard simple facts which no one in the Church could any longer evade, moreover no longer wished to evade, and which made it obvious that there was no longer any necessity to evade them. The present day is still a time in which the Church is unready to accept poverty. [278] The only way in which the Church's members could be induced to be poor and to embrace poverty would be for them to recognize this 'poverty' as a condition for eliminating poverty in the under-developed world. Now in practice, though in itself this inducement to personal poverty does exist it is not recognized in the Church regarded as the great mass of believers to the extent that would be necessary in order to eliminate poverty in the under-developed world. We do not see, we will not see, we cannot see. How precisely the position should be defined may remain an open question. The end result remains the same. Despite all the discussion, all the heroic efforts on the part of individuals both within and without the Church we remain indifferent towards the poverty of the world, unready to accept personal poverty. The prospects are that we will stick fast at the level of small instalment payments, the executing of half-hearted manoeuvres which serve to evade the problem, not to overcome it in any genuine sense. This will be the line of action in the Church and in secular society, each depending upon the other in this question too. Nothing more can be expected in practice even from those forced to accept what is, by our standards, a more modest way of life, any more than it is from the rich and prosperous. For no one among us likes to pay enough for a banana to ensure that the banana picker can be given a really just reward for his labour. The student who campaigns against capitalism and imperialism still enjoys his holiday trip to Tunis. The theology professor sees nothing wrong in having a house of his own (or in some circumstances two) for the pursuit of his profound studies. And so on. And it is also very difficult to say how the individual could seriously rise above the economic and social forces which are impregnated by sin – forces which can rarely actually be said simply to be sinful in themselves and of their very nature, even though they belong intrinsically to the 'acquisitive' constitution of the world, impel us to sin, are born of sin, and are there to put us to the test (ad agonem) in a struggle in which all of us are only too prone to succumb, falling into personal sin or making our personal contribution to the 'sins of the world' in other ways. For man is precisely a sinner both in his private and in his public life, both within and without the Church. How far this objective state of sinfulness in God's sight can be brought home to him personally or in an ultimate sense – this is in turn another question. In any case he is a being in process of becoming. He is meant to be something more than he in fact is. He recognizes this deficiency and must accept (in order to advance at all) that it is greater than can really be justified even on 'moral' grounds. And this precise point also applies to the question of the rich and the poor in the [279] world. This is why in practice there is, even within the Church, an unreadiness to accept poverty so as to make others rich. Anyone seeking to analyse this state of affairs with greater theological precision needs only to recall the traditional theological teaching that it is impossible to avoid all sins, an impossibility that is dialectically coexistent in man with the possibility of avoiding them. Such a one needs only to transpose this teaching onto the social plane and to apply it to our special problem.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Let no one say that these terrible conclusions of ours are such as to ennervate or to kill all will to embrace poverty so as to eliminate poverty. For when we stand before the judgement-seat of God no one of us will be able to offer as a sure defence of his conduct that he was simply going along with the herd. Everyone must struggle even when he foresees that he will be defeated. And it can even be the case that God may perhaps spare this present-day world of ours taken as a whole (obviously we can, if we like, put this in secular terms) so long as he can find among its inhabitants the few just men whom he failed to find among the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah. Thus the question is thrown back from the Church to the individual of whether he too – and perhaps through a real fault in God's sight – is too rich really to help the poor.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

OBSERVATIONS ON THE PROBLEM OF THE 'ANONYMOUS CHRISTIAN'

THE central theme of the remarks which follow will be that summed up in the key phrase 'anonymous Christian'. It is recognized that the subject being treated of here is first and foremost a controversy internal to Catholic theology. I myself have given my opinions on this theme several times.[1] A. Roper has made this phrase the title of a book which has appeared in German, English, Italian and Spanish.[2] Klaus Riesenhuber has presented a comprehensive survey on this question.[3] In Japan Hans Waldenfels reacted favourably to my thesis,[4] whereas other European missionaries in the same area took up an emphatically hostile attitude to this thesis of the 'anonymous Christian'.[5] Hans Urs von Balthasar[6] and Henri de Lubac[7] likewise expressed their opposition to it, [281] while E. Schillebeeckx too expressed certain objections to it.[8] These references are intended not to provide any exhaustive bibliography on the controversy, but rather to make it clear that it will perhaps be worth while to present a few further observations on the theme. Admittedly in doing so we cannot have any intention of repeating in precise or explicit terms everything which has already been said on the subject. A somewhat random selection from among the various possible aspects must be permitted.

By way of preliminary it may be pointed out that a distinction should be drawn between the question of what constitutes the best possible terminology from every point of view, and the further question of the actual reality signified by the phrases 'anonymous Christian' or 'anonymous Christianity'. So far as the terminology is concerned I do not deny that this too has a certain importance, and that not every opinion to the effect that the terminology 'anonymous Christian' or 'anonymous Christianity' are to be rejected on the grounds that many find it misleading ipso facto or necessarily implies a rejection of the actual reality signified thereby. But anyone who holds that the reality signified by the above phrases, or the material content they point to are of such great importance that they must be condensed within a precisely formulated terminology of this kind in order to be used in other theological considerations must, if he merely rejects the above terminology, suggest some other terminology which according to his opinion is less misleading. Now this will probably prove very difficult. I know of no convincing suggestions which have been put forward in this respect. We may concede to de Lubac that with regard to the justification of the terms which have been called in question there is a certain distinction to be drawn between 'anonymous Christian' and 'anonymous Christianity', that the term 'anonymous Christian' may more readily be admitted than that of 'anonymous Christianity'. Some therefore may prefer to avoid the term 'anonymous Christianity', while being ready to use the term 'anonymous Christian' etc. They can count on my agreement on this point. All I would draw their attention to in this

---

[1] On this subject cf. the earlier publications by the author: 'Anonymous Christians', Theological Investigations I (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 390-398, and also 'Anonymous Christianity and the Missionary Task of the Church', Theological Investigations XII (London and New York, 1974), pp. 161-178.

[2] A. Roper, Die anonymen Christen (Mainz, 1963); but see also on this the critical review by H. Vorgrimler, 'Ober die 'anonymen Christen' ', Hochland 56 (1963/64), pp. 363-364.

[3] K. Riesenhuber, 'Der anonyme Christ, nach K. Rahner', Zeitschr. f. Kath. Theol. 86 (1964), pp. 276-303. Riesenhuber attempts to give a comprehensive and co-ordinated presentation of all the Various statements Ly Rahner on rhe question.

[4] H. Waldenfels, ' '. . . omnes homines vult salvos fieri . . .' (i Tim. 2:4). De sententia P. Caroli Rahner SJ. circa voluntatem salvificam Dei universalem', Shin-gaku Kenkyu (Tokio, 1962), no. 12. Cf. also idem, Theologische Akkomodation', Hochland 58 (1965/66), pp. 189-204.

[5] cf. e.g. L. Elders, 'Die Taufe der Weltreligionen. Bemerkungen zu einer Theorie Karl Rahners', Theol. u. Glaube 55 (1965), pp. 124-131, and also H. Kruse, 'Die 'anonymen Christen' exegetisch gesehen', Munch. Theol. Zeitschrift 18 (1967), pp. 2-29.

[6] See H. U. von Balthasar's observations in Cordula oder der Ernstfall (Einsiedeln, 1966).

[7] cf. H. de Lubac, ParaJoxe et Mys&re de VEglise (Paris, 1967), pp. 153-156-

[8] cf. E. Schillebeeckx, Glaulensinterpretation (Mainz, 1971), pp. io8f.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk
Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

respect is that 'Christianity' can have two meanings: not merely that of 'Christendom', i.e. the sum total of Christians, and so for practical purposes the Church, but also the meaning of the 'being Christian' of an individual Christian. In this sense, then, we can speak of 'anonymous Christianity' so long as we are willing to speak of an anonymous Christian. But this is as far as we shall go in concerning ourselves with the purely terminological problem.

[282] The Reality of the 'Anonymous Christian'

The actual subject-matter with which we are properly and ultimately speaking concerned here is such that, as I believe, it neither can nor should be contested by any Catholic Christian or theologian. But two points are involved in this subject-matter:

There are men who stand outside the social unity of the Church or of the Christian Churches, who have not been reached by the explicitly Christian message, or at any rate not in such a way that their failure to embrace Christianity in any explicit sense signifies any serious personal fault in God's sight so far as they are concerned. At the same time, however, these same individuals stand in a positive and salvific relationship to God. In other words to put it in the usual theological terminology and in a somewhat abbreviated form, they are justified. They are living in the state of grace. Even those who at the level of their conscious thought interpret themselves as atheist may be numbered among such individuals, although the concept of the 'anonymous theist' who regards himself as an atheist and the concept of the 'anonymous Christian' are not identical.[9]

But the thesis of the 'anonymous Christian' includes a second point as well, and it is this that primarily and properly speaking gives it its importance and at the same time its difficulty. This individual who is justified even though he is a non-Christian is justified through the grace of Christ and through a faith, hope and love for God and mankind which are to be qualified as specifically Christian in a special sense, even though this triad, constituting the single way to salvation and possession of salvation, is something of which they are not objectively aware in the sense of having consciously explicitated their specifically Christian dimension to themselves. Merely in passing it may be remarked that we might actually apply the term 'anonymous Christian' to every individual who, in virtue of Goers universal will to save, and thereby in virtue of the 'supernatural existential',[10] is inescapably confronted with the offering of God's self-bestowal and is totally unable to escape from this situation. In other words according to this terminology absolutely every man is also an 'anonymous [283] Christian'. But we prefer the terminology according to which that man is called an 'anonymous Christian' who on the one hand has de facto accepted of his freedom this gracious self-offering on God's part through faith, hope, and love, while on the other he is absolutely not yet a Christian at the social level (through baptism and membership of the Church) or in the sense of having consciously objectified his Christianity to himself in his own mind (by explicit Christian faith resulting from having hearkened to the explicit Christian message). We might therefore put it as follows: the 'anonymous Christian' in our sense of the term is the pagan after the beginning of the Christian mission, who lives in the state of Christ's grace through faith, hope and love, yet who has no explicit knowledge of the fact that his life is orientated in grace-given salvation to Jesus Christ.

The Theological Meaning of the Reality Signified by the Term 'Anonymous Christian'

So far as the first element is concerned I believe that there should be no room for doubt

---

[9] cf. also the author's article, 'Atheism and Implicit Christianity', Theological Investigations IX (London and New York, 1972), pp. 145-164.

[10] On these earlier ideas of the author's see 'Concerning the Relationship Between Nature and Grace', Theological Investigations I (London, 1961), pp. 297-317, and also 'The Dignity and Freedom of Man', Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore, 1963), pp. 235-263.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk
Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

among Catholic theologians or Christians. There can be, and actually are, individuals who are justified in the grace of God, who attain to supernatural salvation in God's sight (and, moreover, to Christ as well), yet who do not belong to the Church or to Christendom as a visible historical reality as a result of having been touched by the preaching of the gospel in any concrete 'this worldly' sense at any point in their lives. No truly theological demonstration of this thesis can be supplied here from scripture or tradition. Such a demonstration would not be easy to make, because the optimism of universal salvation entailed in this thesis has only gradually become clear and asserted itself in the conscious faith of the Church. We can trace a course of development from the optimism concerning salvation for unbaptized catechumens in Ambrose, through the doctrine of the baptismus flaminis and the votum ecclesiae in the Middle Ages and at the Council uf Trent, down to the explicit teaching in the writings of Pius XII to the effect that even a merely implicit votum for the Church and baptism can suffice. From this we can trace a further and more arduous course of development of the emergence of conscious faith in this regard which was even more difficult than the development of the conviction that there can be heretics and schismatics who are in good faith even outside the Church, and whose salvation cannot be doubted. Whatever may be the course of this development, whatever theological grounds there may be for justifying it, it can at all events be said that at least since the Second Vatican Council there can no longer be any room [284] for doubt that the Catholic Church, as a matter of her conscious faith, regards it as established that it is possible even for such men of good will to be justified and to attain to supernatural salvation even though at the level of their concrete 'this worldly' circumstances, and at the level of personal history and of the kerygmatic and institutional Church, they are not Christians at all. In this connection it should be noticed that this possibility is positively asserted by the Second Vatican Council. It is not merely that in presenting a theology of the necessity of the gospel and of baptism for salvation it has been added on as a negative point that in emphasizing this necessity of the gospel and of baptism we are nevertheless imposing no limits to the sovereign freedom of God's grace. The Second Vatican Council positively asserts that it is possible for the non-Christian to attain salvation, though at the same time it declares that such salvation is achieved in ways that are known to God alone. In a tacit but noteworthy correction to the officially received theology which had hitherto been more or less unanimous on this point, it was declared at the Second Vatican Council that atheists too are not excluded from this possibility of salvation, though here the distinctions between positive and negative atheism, between atheism of greater or lesser duration, usually accepted up to that point were not applied at the Second Vatican Council. The only necessary condition which is recognized here is the necessity of faithfulness and obedience to the individual's own personal conscience. This optimism concerning salvation appears to me one of the most noteworthy results of the Second Vatican Council. For when we consider the officially received theology concerning all these questions, which was more or less traditional right down to the Second Vatican Council, we can only wonder how few controversies arose during the Council with regard to these assertions of optimism concerning salvation, and wonder too at how little opposition the conservative wing of the Council brought to bear on this point, how all this took place without any setting of the Stage ur any great stir even though this doctrine marked a far more decisive phase in the development of the Church's conscious awareness of her faith than, for instance, the doctrine of collegiality in the Church, the relationship between scripture and tradition, the acceptance of the new exegesis etc.[11]

We now come to the second element which we have previously pointed [285] out in the doctrine of the anonymous Christian. This salvation of the non-Christian is achieved through an act of faith in the true sense. The doctrine of the anonymous Christian as it is nowadays presented precisely does not involve the belief that anyone can attain to justification and final [11] On the whole cf. Cone. Vat. II, 'Nostra aetate' (Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions); 'Gaudium et spes' (Pastoral Constitution) (above all the first main section: The Church and Man's Calling), and also 'Ad gentes' (The Decree on the Missions).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk
Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation salvation even without faith in a strictly theological sense merely because he does not act against his own moral conscience. It is true that the theory of a 'faith', a fides late dicta, which at basis amounted merely to a recognition of God at the philosophical level was sufficient for justification was rejected by Innocent XL[12] But this has certainly no very great theological importance for our present consideration, especially since the theory of A. Straub at the beginning of the present century concerning the justifying power of a readiness to believe in principle, a fides virtualis,[13] never incurred the official censure of the Church. But both in Pius XII's declaration against the rigorism of Feeney[14] and in the doctrine of the Second Vatican Council it is after all clearly assumed that even in these cases of a justified pagan a fides supernaturalis is necessary. What is not stated in these official doctrinal declarations is how a truly supernatural faith of this kind in the strictly theological sense can come to be in the cases which concern us here. In the document of the Second Vatican Council, 'Ad gentes' No. 7, it is stated (albeit merely in an aside) that God can bring men who are ignorant of the gospel through no fault of their own to faith by ways which he knows, and that without this faith it is impossible to be pleasing to him. And in this formula what we chiefly sense is a scepticism as to whether it is possible at all, even in the most formal way, to find an answer to the question of how such a faith could ever be present in a man when this man has no contact whatever with the gospel. This sense of scepticism also finds expression in a further document of the Second Vatican Council, 'Gaudium et Spes', and moreover in almost the same words (No. 22). This then is concerned with finding the answer to the questicn of how it is possible apart from the preaching of the gospel for a true and supernatural faith to be present in a 'pagan' of this kind, i.e. an assent to God as he imparts himself in freedom and in a way which transcends any certainty which the world can offer. But the fact that we cannot find the answer to this question should not prevent the theologian from pondering it more deeply. For if he simply renounces any attempt to find an answer at all however formal, then [286] either the universality of God's will to save towards non-Christian humanity or the necessity of personal faith for this becomes incredible. Yet we cannot invoke either a natural knowledge of God or a primitive and ultimate kind of revelation to answer this question, for such answers will fail to solve it. The first course has already been rejected by Innocent XI and Pius XIE as well as by the declarations of the Second Vatican Council. With regard to the second course, i.e. the invoking of a primitive and ultimate revelation, the way in which this has customarily been presented hitherto is in the form of a handing down of an original revelation of this kind from paradisal sources. Nowadays this is impossible both because of the findings of modern palaeontology and anthropology and also because of the findings of modern exegesis, which regards the narrative of Genesis neither as an eye-witness account of God himself as having participated in the events concerned nor simply as a record that has been transmitted through the centuries of human history. But the converse can be stated. The more we can make intelligible the possibility of a personal faith even in a 'pagan', and moreover on the basis of the normal data of theology as self-evident in other contexts, and so without any supplementary arguments constructed arbitrarily, such as have not infrequently been adduced in the past (special enlightenment at death etc.), the better can the doctrine of the possibility of justification and salvation for a 'pagan' be fitted into the totality of the Christian faith, and the clearer and more intelligible too will the doctrine become of a real, effective, and infralapsarian universal will to save on God's part. Admittedly any such theology of the possibility of a true and saving faith even in the 'pagan' must be so formulated as to avoid obscuring the importance of an explicit Christianity, with its concomitants of gospel and Church, and the necessity of the missionary preaching of this Christianity to all nations and all men. Even when all this is successfully achieved one fact remains, so I believe,

[12] cf. DS[34] 2123.
[13] See A. Straub, De anafysi fidel (Innsbruck, 1922). Some of the studies here published go very far back in time.
[14] DS[31] 3872.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk
Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

concerning the breakthrough of this optimism concerning salvation for all men which (so far as our present question goes) can be prevented only by the grave personal guilt of the individual, and which at the same time regards all salvation, wherever it is present, as specifically Christian. This optimism with regard to salvation remains one of the most astonishing phenomena in the development of the Church's conscious awareness of her faith in this development as it applies to the secular and non-Christian world, the awareness of the difference between saving history as a whole and the history of explicit Christianity and of the Church. For it is true that we must not say that the Old or the New Testament simply rule out any such optimistic interpretation of universal [287] salvation, which in the power of the Holy Spirit can hope to find a near brother even in one who is apparently most far removed. But we shall not be able to say either that this development of the conscious awareness of faith is already very clearly set forth in the New Testament or that it does not have to overcome very great obstacles which are inherent in the New Testament statements concerning the necessity of salvation coming through the gospel which is preached in its power.

How Could It Be Possible for there to Be an 'Anonymous Christian'?

Now how can we conceive of this possibility of faith in the 'pagan'? In attempting—nothing more than an attempt is intended—to answer this question some anthropological insights may surely be taken as given which should be explained and established more fully elsewhere: the difference and the unity between objective knowledge and that which is known on the one hand, and a non-objective, non-thematic awareness and the reality thus known on the other—in other words between 'this worldly' knowledge and transcendental knowledge, between that which is expressed in conceptual form and the further levels of significance not consciously adverted to of a given statement, between the material object and an a priori formal object concomitantly present with the capacity to know, between the object of knowledge and the further perspectives of knowledge—or whatever name we may choose to apply to the distinction we are seeking to draw, though in this it remains unimportant for our present purposes whether the concepts we have adduced historically speaking, and in the application of them here intended, mean precisely the same, or whether further and more precise distinctions should be introduced into them in their turn.[15] For our present purposes what we are chiefly concerned with is of course the distinction between the pairs of concepts we have mentioned. Yet it is net disputed that between them there always remains also a certain unity (not identity!). That which is capable of being expressed in 'this worldly' categories mediates the transcendental and e converse, although this mutually conditioning relationship is itself to be thought of not as a fixed entity, but rather as having a history of its own so that this relationship and its history are quite incapable of being expressed thematically in any full sense. If we take these [288] concepts of formal anthropology as read the theory of the possibility of personal faith in a 'pagan' makes two assumptions: (i) The supernatural grace of faith and justification offered by God to men does not need to be conceived of as an isolated intervention on God's part at a particular point in a world which is itself profane. On the contrary it can perfectly well be interpreted on the basis of God's universal will to save as a grace which, as offered (!), is a constantly present existential of the creature endowed with spiritual faculties and of the world in general, which orientates these to the immediacy of God as their final end, though of course in saying this the question still remains wholly open of whether an individual freely gives himself to, or alternatively rejects, this existential which constitutes the innermost dynamism of his being and its history, an existential which is and remains continually present.[16] God's universal will to save objectifies itself in that communication of himself which we call grace. It does this effectively at all times and in all

[15] On these observations by the author cf. 'Thomas Aquinas on Truth', Theological Investigations XIII, and the basic studies: Gelst in Welt (Munich, 3rd ed., 1964) and Horer des Wortes (Munich, 2nd ed., 1963).
[16] cf. n. 10.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk
Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

places in the form of the offering and the enabling power of acting in a way that leads to salvation. And even though it is unmerited and 'supernatural' in character, it constitutes the innermost entelecheia and dynamism of the world considered as the historical dimension of the creature endowed with spiritual faculties. It does not need to be consciously and objectively known as a dynamism of this kind, and even without such knowledge it is still present. (2) This grace constantly implanted in the nature of the creature and the historical dimension belonging to it as the dynamism and finali-zation of the history of man is, however, something of which man is aware in the manner in which such a reality does impinge upon human awareness. This awareness does not ipso facto or necessarily imply an objective awareness; it is present in the a priori formal objects, in the further levels of significance in the spiritual and intentional capacities of knowledge and freedom. Whether man explicitly recognizes it or not, whether he can or cannot reflect upon it in itself and in isolation, man is, in virtue of the grace offered him and implanted in him as his freedom in the mode of a formal object and of a spiritual perspective of an a priori kind, orientated towards the immediacy of God as his final end.[17] He brings his spiritual life to its fulness in knowledge and freedom in such a way that God in himself constitutes the ultimate point of orientation of his whole historical development in knowledge and freedom, and that too not as the God of metaphysical knowledge, as the God of infinite remoteness, but as the [289] God who in himself and of himself, in his own unique reality and sovereignty, constitutes the goal, as the God of eternal life.

This orientation of the spiritual dynamism of man towards the immediacy of God, which is both known and unknown, is, it is true, in order to be known at all (which does not mean reflected upon as an object or capable of being adequately reflected upon by the individual) mediated through the realities of his world assignable to 'this worldly' categories. But this mediation does not necessarily need to be an explicit object of revelation. All those forms of mediation belonging to the dimension of 'this worldly' categories are sufficient for this which confront the individual in himself as a subject endowed with intellect and freedom. We are suggesting that grace brings about a change of awareness through a new a priori formal object, even though this change of awareness cannot be reflected upon directly or certainly by the individual as such. Now this is not a thesis discovered ad hoc, but a view which has always been upheld in Thomist theology even though hitherto it has probably hardly been applied to our present question—simply because we have regarded the prevenient and elevating grace too much as an isolated event taking place at a particular point, and only under specific circumstances. But if we regard the self-communication of God (considered as that which is offered to man in his freedom) as an abiding existential of the creature endowed with spiritual faculties, and thereby as the innermost dynamism of the world in general, then, assuming the validity of the above-mentioned Thomist thesis, it is clear from the outset that the total process by which man brings his intellectual nature to its fulness, in which he comes to be in act as spiritual and in his totality, is orientated by grace towards the immediacy of God in a dimension of a priori awareness. On any right understanding of the relationship between the dimension of transcendental a priority and that of categorial historicity in man it is clear that this supernaturally elevated transcendentality of man, of which he is aware but WiiiCii is not ipso jwcto Known in itsciA as sn c^cct, \^ocs no*, ^svc a specie history apart, or does not persist in any sense in a non-historical state of fixity, but rather has a history of its own within the concrete history of the individual as its innermost form and dynamism in a manner similar to that of logic, which has its initial history not in the history of the logic that is the subject of conscious philosophical reflection, but in the history of the active spirit of man himself as he shapes his world.

In the light of this we can then go on to say that the total history of mankind is nothing else than the historical mediation, in terms of historical and 'this-worldly' categories, of the supernaturally elevated spirituality [290] of man to man himself. And at that stage at which [17] On this cf. the author's article, 'Concerning the Relationship Between Nature and Grace, Theological Investigations I (London, 1961), pp. 297-317.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk
Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this history comes explicitly to exhibit this supernatural dynamism, so that its presence is consciously recognized within the history—at that stage it is revelation history and the history of faith. But this is a point which cannot be entered into in any more precise detail here. What can on any showing be said, however, is this: this grace-given elevation of the transcendentality of man, i.e. the orientation of this to the immediacy of God as its final end, gives reality to the concept of revelation already at the stage of an a priori awareness. And it does this even though this awareness (the supernatural formal object, as the Thomist would say) has not yet been objectively apprehended at the level of conscious thought or expressed in words. And when man of his freedom accepts himself together with this a priori awareness which is already revelation, then that is present which can in the true and proper sense be called faith, even though this faith has not yet been objectively explicitated or conceptualized as the absolute openness of man to the immediacy of God in his act of self-imparting. Yet this a priori awareness of man (called revelation) is always accepted in faith wherever and whenever an individual in unreserved faithfulness to his own moral conscience accepts himself in freedom as he is, and so too iii the as yet unrecognizable implications of the dynamism underlying the movement of his own spirit. It is only in the light of this that we can achieve a full theological understanding of what the Second Vatican Council says in 'Lumen Gentium' No. 16: 'Those also can attain to everlasting salvation who, through no fault of their own, do not know the gospel of Christ or his Church, yet sincerely seek God and, moved by grace, strive by their deeds to do his will as it is known to them through the dictates of conscience.' A point expressly to be noticed here is that in the following sentence this doctrine is declared to apply also to those who are inculpable atheists. And the same point is likewise made in 'Gaudium et Spes'.

On a first simple reading of this declaration we might receive the impression that what the 'pagan' is being promised here in the statement concerning the fulfilment of the dictates of conscience is a salvation which comes to be even without faith. Moreover, the emphasis on divine grace, by means of which alone obedience to the dictates of conscience can be achieved, still does nothing of itself to alter this impression. Yet salvation of this kind without true faith is ruled out by the declaration of Pius XIC and the Missionary Decree of the Second Vatican Council, as we have already mentioned above.

> This grace, therefore, must produce faith, and that too even in cases [291] where no knowledge of the gospel exists. It follows that theology has an obligation to explain how such a faith is conceivable in the conditions described. We have attempted to give such an explanation and the theological data we have adduced for this purpose are only such as are already recognized in other contexts: the universal will of God to save, the supernatural specification of man entailed in this and constantly present in him, in virtue of which God's act of self-communication implanted in the innermost being of man (as offered to his freedom), that a priori transcendental change of awareness which is concomitantly given with this grace, and which is present even when it is not yet or not at all consciously adverted to. Anyone who rejects this theory of a possible faith in God as revealing himself and communicating himself, on whatever grounds, then incurs the task as a Catholic theologian of explaining in other ways how true supernatural faith in revelation can be present in an individual without any contact with the explicit preaching of the gospel. For the fact that such a thing is possible is explicitly declared in the official doctrinal statements of the Church cited above, even though they themselves refrain from making any theological declaration on this fact.

Further Implications of a Thesis

The theory of the 'anonymous Christian', therefore, states (though we do not insist upon the term 'anonymous Christian') diat even outside the Christian body there are individuals—and they are to be found even in the ranks of atheists—who are justified by God's grace and possess the Holy Spirit. The theory further states that the difference between this state of salvation and that of those who are Christians in an explicit sense is not such that these 'pagans' are acceptable in God's sight even without any true faith (together with hope and love) as it were in virtue of a merely natural morality which they possess, whereas the Christians and only they achieve their justification through a faith in salvation. On the contrary the theory ascribes to these justified pagans also a real, albeit enexplicitated or, if we like to put it so, rudimentary faith. This is of course not to deny that this faith as it exists in the pagan is properly speaking designed to follow its own inherent dynamism in such a way as to develop into that faith which is objectified and articulated through the gospel, that faith which we simply call the Christian faith. The seed has no right to seek not to grow into a plant. But the fact that it is not yet developed into a plant is no reason for refusing to give the name which we give to die plant destined to grow from it to the seed as well.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk
Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[292] It is possible, then, to envisage a man who is in possession of that self-imparting of God called grace as the innermost heart and centre of his existence, one who has accepted this in unreserved faithfulness to his own conscience, one who is thereby constituted as a believer in a form which, while it is not objectified in words, is nonetheless real, a man, in other words, who even as a 'pagan' already possesses the blessing of salvation, that blessing which ultimately speaking is the sole point of concern for Christianity together with the gospel belonging to it and all its institutions, and in relation to which everything else is merely a means, a historical objectification, a sacramental sign, a social manifestation. Now if this is true, then I cannot see why we should not call such a man an anonymous Christian, seeing that as Catholic theologians we may not doubt that such men both can and actually do exist. For after all he does possess, even though in a way hidden to himself and to others, that which constitutes the essence of what it is to be a Christian: the grace of God which is laid hold of in faith. If we are unwilling to go on from this, and to speak of an anonymous Christianity then I will raise no protest against this refusal. All that is involved here is simply a question of what constitutes the terminology that best suits the purpose and so a question of judgement on which I have no fixed opinion whatever. Admittedly I do regard the term 'anonymous Christian' as inescapable so long as no one suggests a better term to me.

Perspectives

Obviously many further questions would still remain to be treated which cannot be resolved here. We should have to enquire how all those new perspectives of saving history and the history of faith entailed in the theory we have put forward are to be reconciled with the viewpoint from which the New Testament regards the process by which salvation is gained and also saving history itself, alheit with very notable variations. A further point which should be discussed is the question already mentioned above as to the meaning and necessity of the mission of Christianity, a question in the light of which it is very often believed that this theory should be rejected. Admittedly in this connection there is actually a particular example to be mentioned: a Japanese who is a student chaplain in Japan has told me that the theory put forward here constitutes the indispensable condition for him such that it is only on this condition that he can perform his missionary work, precisely because he can then appeal to the anonymous Christian in the pagan and not simply seek to indoc-[293]trinate him with a teaching ab externo. A further question which would have to be resolved is what aspects (on the basis of the theory we have put forward) are brought to light for the appraisal of the non-Christian religions, even though this question cannot be answered solely on the basis of the theory of the anonymous Christian. This theory, therefore, remains ultimately speaking neutral in relation even to such controversies as have, for instance, very recently arisen between Schlette and Seckler.[18]

[18] Both authors have stated tfwir respective positions on the problems involved several times. Cf. H. R. Schlette, Die Religionen als Thema der Theologie, Quaestiones Disputatae 22 (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1964} and the review of this work: M. Seckler, 'Eine Theologie der Religionen', Hochland 57 (1964/65), pp. 588-590. But see also H. R. Schlette, 'Einige Theses zum Selbstverstandnis der Theologie angesichts der Religionen', Gott in Welt II (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1964), pp. 306-316 and Colloquium Salutis - Christen und Nichtchristen heute (Cologne, 1965). On the other hand cf. M. Seckler, 'Das Heil der Nicht-

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk
Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The question might be raised of whether a new conception of the primordial revelation cannot be developed precisely in the light of the theory put forward here, a conception which avoids those elements which are either improbable or impossible from an anthropological and historical point of view, yet which are entailed in the usual conception of the primordial revelation. It is obvious that the assumptions, in terms of existential ontology which this theory works with call for further clarification and explanation. A distinction is drawn between two factors: an original event of revelation consisting in the self-communication of God as addressed to all in virtue of his universal will to save and taking place at a preconceptual level in the roots of man's spiritual faculties on the one hand, and the objectification at the historical and conceptual level of this revelatory self-communication of God in that which we call revelation and the history of revelation in a more normal sense on the other. This distinction, which it has been necessary to draw here, could be the occasion of fruitful considerations for many other problems of theology. But, as has been said, these and many other points cannot be discussed any further in the present context. The man of today is first and foremost a man who feels himself at one (at that point at which he truly achieves the fulness of self-realization) with mankind as a whole. For all his harsh experiences of what it is to be a historical being and of history itself, whenever it is the ultimate in man, man as a whole and as final and definitive that is in [294] question, he feels himself at one with all. He does not seek any heaven from which some other man is excluded from the outset. If at the same time he still seeks to uphold nowadays the claims of Christianity to be absolute, its universal significance for each and for all, if he wills to recognize, and as a Christian must recognize a single meaning and a single dynamism running through the whole history of mankind, then he must simply have a single answer as to how and in what way he can recognize in every one of his fellows a brother in the sense in which Christianity recognizes every individual as a brother, a sense, that is, which is not merely humanist but truly Christian. There must be a Christian theory to account for the fact that every individual who does not in any absolute or ultimate sense act against his own conscience can say and does say in faith, hope, and love, Abba within his own spirit, and is on these grounds in all truth a brother to Christians in God's sight. This is what the theory of the anonymous Christian seeks to say, and, in so far as it is valid, what it implies.

---

evangelisierten in thomistischer Sicht', Theol. Quart. Schrift, 140 (1960), pp. 38-69, and also 'Nichtchristen III. Systematisch', HThG II (Munich, 1963), pp. 239-242 and 'Sind Religionen Heilswege?', StdZ 186 (1970), pp. 187-194. A. Darlap has presented a general survey on the whole area of 'the Theology of Religions' in Sacramentum Mundi V (London and New York, 1970), pp. 284-287.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[295]

18

THE CHURCH'S COMMISSION TO BRING SALVATION AND THE HUMANIZATION OF THE WORLD 'HORIZONTALISM' IN CHRISTIANITY AND IN THE CONTEMPORARY CHURCH

There have always been heresies which threaten Christianity, the Christian life, and a right understanding of the Church's task. They constitute a danger which has always accompanied the earthly life of faith and of the Church. In earlier times such heresies emerged, as the word 'heresy' = 'division' implies, within the Church herself and were chiefly related to specific and particular points of Christian doctrine and Christian life with the result that even at the conceptual level it was customary to distinguish heresy from apostasy, meaning a falling away from Christianity as a whole. Today Christianity and the Church are threatened by a form of teaching and a way of life which, while they have indeed emerged from the Church, are far from being explicitly presented as a rejection of Christianity or as seeking to draw men out of the Church, and yet which in reality already imply in a true sense something far more than heresy. For in reality they take a course which leads to an elimination of Christianity. In other words they constitute that which, in the traditional terminology, should be called apostasy. In this connection one question which does of course remain quite open is that of the subjective dispositions of those who uphold such tendencies in the doctrine and life of the Church. We mean here the view that that which constitutes the true essence of Christianity, the true heart and centre which alone is signified in all its doctrines, the true task of the Church, consists in something which can simply be called 'love of neighbour' or (because this term has perhaps too individualistic or pietistic a ring for the upholders of this movement) 'commitment at the level of social politics and criticism of society', 'responsibility for the world'. This tendency has already been designated by the term pure 'horizontalism'.

[296] It makes no difference for our immediate purposes where or in how many individuals or individual Churches within the totality of the Church this movement finds its support, or whether it is really supported in all its radical one-sidedness or more as a matter of emphasizing one tendency without excluding more orthodox ones. This question of the current position in Church history and Church politics is one with which we shall not be concerned in the present study. What we are referring to here is a radical horizontalism. In other words that doctrine and that interpretation of life which regards Christianity, its doctrines and in truth the task of the Church as properly speaking consisting in one thing alone: a responsibility for mankind, for the human society. 'God' is reduced to a mere cipher (old-fashioned and replaceable or for various reasons not indispensable). It stands for mankind itself, its unassailable dignity, the future which it still has to strive to achieve for itself. What we are referring to here is that doctrine and that way of life in terms of which all theological concepts, all cult and all prayer are merely things which have gradually to be replaced or perhaps things which may even have an abiding usefulness, key terms and practices which precisely bring this active responsibility to reality, a responsibility which each individual accepts for his fellows. In terms of a movement of this kind, then, Jesus is simply the most fruitful and perhaps (whatever the reasons which may be adduced, for these are not altogether clear) indispensable example of this commitment on behalf of one's neighbour and of a better society in what may even amount to a life-and-death struggle against the ruling forces in religion and politics. For this movement prayer is nothing else than a self-critical examination in which we remind ourselves of our neighbour and of our duty towards him. The Eucharist is the celebration of the true spirit of community in the light of Jesus as its most fruitful example and in its ultimate essence nothing beyond this. Correspondingly the other propositions of faith belonging to Christianity have also to be reinterpreted in the same sense, though this is something which cannot be set forth in detail here.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Obviously the activity of the Church as such, so long as she is not acting against her own true nature in belonging or seeking to belong, to those forces which defend their own position, which are established and oppressive, consists in a progressive education of men leading to an individual and collective commitment of this kind on behalf of their fellows, and in the concrete taking over of such social commitments on behalf of the poor, the oppressed, the exploited, the suffering within particular nations and on the international plane. The function of the Church which does justice to this interpretation of Christianity can only consist in the humanization [297] of the world, otherwise it will, at least today, come perforce to stand for a turning away of men from their true task to a defence of oppressive forces in society, to being an opium of the people which is no longer necessary because nowadays it is really possible to deliver man from the multiplicity of his enslavements and factors leading to self-alienation so that there is no longer any need for any algesic against the pain of that self-alienation which existed in former times, and which could not be overcome in any other way.

For our immediate purposes it makes no difference whether, or to what extent, a horizontalism of this kind in doctrine or life manifests itself in its true chemical purity and absolute radicality, or whether in this respect the conditions within the individual Christian Churches are exactly the same, or whether the upholders of a horizontalism of this kind regard it rather, and perhaps with a happy illogicality, as a mere shifting of emphasis within Christianity as a whole which is demanded by the conditions of the present times, they themselves being still always ready to accept Christianity as a whole in this sense. Even if we were here prepared to assume that a horizontalism of this kind was justified, a horizontalism which, in the radicality intended, is far from being frequent in any consciously recognizable form within the Church, a consideration of this kind still has its importance. For it cannot be doubted that among Catholic and Protestant Christians alike, i.e. among those who belong to the Church right from the outset and are unwilling to withdraw from it, this radical horizontalism does exist, so that to pronounce a decided ‘no’ to it is not to campaign against an opponent who does not exist at all. Furthermore it is useful to make clear the further consequences which lie latent and hidden at an unconscious level in attitudes and customs of life which still bear too much of the imprint of the Church’s doctrine of earlier times for them straightway or explicitly to be able to agree to a radical horizontalism of this kind.

In order to prevent any misunderstandings arising from this it must be explicitly emphasized that the serious upholders of a so-called ‘political theology’ have nothing to do with this radical horizontalism, and are therefore in no sense being pointed to in our present remarks. In our present thesis, as its heading explicitly suggests, we are concerned with the function of the Church as such of bringing salvation to men. The question we are asking, therefore, is whether this task of the Church as such is concerned merely with the humanization of the world and nothing beyond this. But in order to cope with this theme in a way that really goes to the roots of the matter this radical horizontalism itself has to be [298] considered precisely in its very roots, and it has to be asked what a Christianity that is genuinely and totally understood really has to say to it. For only then does the question arise of the content and the ultimate and true orientation of the task of the Church as such, which belongs to her of her very nature.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

WHAT ARE THE REASONS FOR THE SUDDEN APPEARANCE OF 'HORIZONTALISM'?

We shall first be enquiring into the reasons for the sudden appearance of this radical horizontalism in the Church. We might in fact immediately consider that what is in question here is simply that non-religious love of neighbour, that secular humanism, that ethically based socialism that has already long been in existence outside Christianity and the Church, and this might lead us to wonder why and how such a thing should suddenly become the teaching which now manifests itself within the Church herself and as the most recent and the only true interpretation of Christianity and of the task of the Christian and of the Church. To explain the fact that a secularized interpretation of human existence of this kind should now suddenly be presented as true Christianity in itself there must be reasons to be found such as did not exist in earlier times, and, moreover, as a force that is effective upon the Church herself. I believe that three such reasons might be pointed to, which in their interaction upon one another, and of course not as taken in isolation, can be held to account for this secularized horizontalism.

1. The Tendency Towards Demythologizing

The first of these reasons to be pointed to is that which might be called the tendency to 'demythologizing'.[1] Obviously this is not the place to set forth the causes, meaning, limits, overstepping of the limits or historical development of this demythologizing movement within Christian theology, in exegesis, or in the Church. The only point that needs to be made here is quite a simple one. In this movement all historical realities are consciously regarded as subject to historical change and conditional. In other words this is a kind of historicism. And a further factor has been that process, which lasted, of course, over several centuries, by which an ancient image of the world which still dominated the Middle Ages has [299] gradually been changed into the modern image of the world, the outcome of a rational approach to the natural sciences, of a modern psychology and of the modern social sciences. And in the light of all these factors in their bearing on the totality of the Christian faith it must be asked what the special content of each of them really means within the overall perspectives of modern ideas and outlooks, where and how the boundary lines must be drawn between that which is really intended and permanently binding in faith on the one hand, and conceptual models on the other, which obviously have been helpful for understanding the faith but are no longer valid now. Again it has to be asked where these conceptual models should still be retained, or where they merely make it more difficult or even impossible for us to understand what is really meant as binding in faith. To that extent, of course, some kind of 'demythologizing' is necessary and urgent today, and will be recognized as necessary by the Church's theologians, although at the same time it must be said that all theology throughout all the centuries has always been concerned with what is the essential point of such demythologizing to the extent that by it we understand nothing else than an encounter which it is necessary to achieve ever anew: an encounter between the faith which inevitably has to express itself in concepts subject to the conditions of the particular age concerned on the one hand, and the secular interpretation of existence which is constantly subject to change on the other. Yet it must be recognized that this task of demythologizing as thus understood has

[1] The term 'demythologizing' was first used in 1941 by R. Bultmann in the context of exegesis. But it quickly won general recognition as a theological category. Cf. R. Malé, 'Demythologization', Sacramentum Mundi II (London and New York, 1968), pp. 65-69.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

become more all-embracing, more urgent and more swiftly developing nowadays. And because of this a temptation and a danger has increased too, that namely of coming into opposition to those truths of Christianity which must not be surrendered by maintaining that they do not belong to what is true and essential to the meaning and the life of Christianity at all, but are merely old and now outworn modes in which an earlier age of Christianity sought to bring home to itself what the true meaning and purpose of Christianity really is. In the light of this a first cause of the movement towards a radical horizontalism becomes apparent. For this movement God too is to be numbered among those old and outworn terms by means of which Christianity objectifies to itself its innermost essence, precisely a loving responsibility for one's neighbour, finding it possible in this way to achieve a more intelligible mode of presenting it. God, therefore, is one of the ideas which must be demythologized, just as in principle the critique of religion of a Feuerbach or a Marx[2] had already demanded. Once [300] we demythologize the idea of God only man remains. Because it was believed impossible in former times really to take man in this sense seriously in his infinite claims he came to be made a mythologem himself and called God, though admittedly only at the cost of thereby alienating man from himself also and in his claims upon us.

2. The Experience of God in a World Coloured by the Natural Sciences

A second cause of this radical horizontalism in the Church of our times, and no longer merely as it exists outside Christianity as embodied in the Church, is to be found in the fact that a man of today can no longer experience God so easily or so directly as a man of former ages believed to be possible. The man of today is a man who is above all influenced by the rationalism of the natural sciences, by approaches to experience and to knowledge in which every phenomenon which can be experienced is reduced to some other one in the closest possible functional interconnection. To the scientific learning of the modern age, but also so far as the direct feelings of the rational man are concerned, it is clear that in such a world God is not to be met with as one particular phenomenon among others. When within the context of our various experiences we fail to find an explanation for a particular phenomenon, i.e. when we cannot so account for it as to co-ordinate it with other phenomena already known to us, then we put a question-mark against it. We hope that in time some possible way of explaining it by the exact sciences may yet emerge. But what we do not say is this: 'Here God is at work in a special way.' We do not say: 'Here we find a special intervention of his in the world's course.' Nowadays we no longer want in any sense to have a God who has to be invoked as a stopper of the gaps so as to illumine to ourselves some point which still remains obscure, and to show its connection with the particular phenomena of our experience. The modern natural sciences work – and, moreover, entirely justifiably with a methodological a-theism, and while this does not assert that God does not exist, it does make it impossible for the exact sciences to invoke God as an explanation of that which is still unexplained, or of 'this worldly' phenomena which are capable of explanation. But then it is all too easy to go on from this mental attitude, which primarily belongs to the exact sciences, and to regard it as the only legitimate mental attitude for modern man in any sense. From this it can readily be understood how an individual comes to receive the impression that while he cannot positively assert that God does not exist – since we [301] must be very cautious in making such assertions on a purely negative point – still such a thing as God does not figure in his own

[2] L. Feuerbach presented his programme, 'Auflösung der Theologie' in Das Wesen des Christentums and Das Wesen der Religion (1845). On the programme of K. Marx cf. Thesen über Feuerbach (1845) and Die Deutsche Ideologie (1846) (written in collaboration with Fr. Engels).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

personal life; it is an idea which cannot be verified. He feels that life still goes on as before even without it, as the example of the atheists shows, and theists are in no sense different from them when we come to examine their lives apart from this difference of opinion which remains at the level of pure theory. Now here it is neither possible nor any part of our intention to demonstrate in positive terms how a genuine, and even inescapable experience of God can be made even today, although one which we can, and very often do, suppress. The only point to be recognized here is how this basic outlook, which is at least apparently a-theistic, on man's part leads to that radical horizontalism which is so much a force today. The Christians who uphold this horizontalism have the impression that they cannot overcome the experience in themselves, and even more in others, that God is not there so far as they are concerned. Yet for the most divers reasons, which cannot be analysed here, they still want to remain Christians and members of the Church. From this it is natural to lay hold of the theory of demythologizing, to make a virtue of necessity, and to explain that the true essence of Christianity, so far from being the true and full relationship of man to God which has been bestowed upon him by God himself in Jesus Christ in forgiveness and in raising him to a divine level, is simply the dignity and the task and goal of man himself which we, hopeless in the face of the experience of man's suffering, have projected onto an unknown 'X' in the hope that from that we shall actually return to man himself once he has put himself in a position to realize his own future and to win back for himself that glory which he has ascribed to a God. We then say not only that God is now dead, but that precisely this 'death-of-God' theology is the true secret doctrine of Christianity itself which is only now coming to light in our present-day situation at the intellectual and social level, and which must now boldly be proclaimed. Obviously on this showing, and for a Christianity thus interpreted, Jesus becomes the first a-theist. It is only that he was not yet in a position to say precisely what he really thought and achieved in his own life.[3]

3. The New Responsibility for the World as the Meaning of Human Life

The third cause, which, together with the two already mentioned, contributes to the shaping of this radical horizontalism and exercises an influence precisely on those who view an a-theistic position with no very great [302] enthusiasm, and are at most regretful a-theists, those who fear that the 'death of God' will shortly be followed by the death of man as well, consists in the fact that the active self-responsibility of man and of humanity today has increased to an extent which could never really have been dreamt of even a hundred years ago, in other words prior to the new stage which has been ushered in within the totality of human history. Nowadays mankind is no longer living in an environment already pre-determined for it such that it can change only the smallest details within that environment. It has begun to plan its own environment and to determine its goals, to subject it wholly to the human genius. It has made the world in which formerly it simply lived into a quarry for building a world which man is prepared to recognize only as his own world. Furthermore man has begun to alter, to plan and to reshape his own nature genetically, psychologically and socially. This new phenomenon may yet stick fast in its incipient stages. We may have to fear catastrophes in this Promethean undertaking. But this active alteration of man and of his environment by man himself has already been initiated, and in principle it can no longer be halted. This obviously lays an immense burden of responsibility upon man, such as formerly he never had to recognize or to assume. For manifestly something we are already noticing today is that this development does not simply imply an unhindered triumphal progress into a [3] This interpretation is put forward e.g. in F. Jeanson, Vom wahren Unglauben (Munich, 1966).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

glorious future of freedom and carefree happiness. This development can just as easily become a gateway to fresh tyrannies, absurdities or ruin. The new burden of responsibility now laid upon man, which he partly lays claim to and is partly forced upon him so that the unity between these two aspects is impossible to analyse, now so preoccupies the public awareness and the attention of the individual that society and the individual receive the impression that with the best will in the world we can no longer concern ourselves with anything else except this task which man constitutes for man himself, and with the almost overpowering responsibility which it entails. Prayer, worship, and in general the intercourse with realities such as God, grace, the forgiveness of sins, salvation in the next world etc. are foreign to this view as so many childish preoccupations which carry us into a dream world and must be rejected by that man who faces up to the reality of his world as it really is. Thus we receive the impression that the old attitude to religion, if it still survives, is at most a matter for old people who are already excluded from this responsibility for the world and need some consolation in their old age. From this it is a natural step to yield to the temptation of making a virtue even of this necessity, reinterpreting Christianity (for the most divers reasons, connected either [303] with its intrinsic message or with tactical considerations, there is a reluctance explicitly to pronounce it defunct) and declaring that Christianity consists in nothing else than this responsibility which man has for the world, which has come to be recognized only in these present times and which must now be his sole remaining concern.

THE RESPONSE OF FAITH TO THE CHALLENGE OF 'HORIZONTALISM'

In so brief a study as this we have surely devoted enough consideration now to the meaning and origins of that radical horizontalism which seeks to reinterpret the salvific task of the Church, and even to assign it new practical functions, by reducing it to a mere responsibility for the world. The question we have now to ask ourselves is what response is to be made to a radical horizontalism of this kind in the name of Christianity and of the Church. In the answer we give to this question we must not content ourselves with any cheap 'not only but also'. We must not simply set horizontalism and verticalism side by side as the two dimensions of Christian living. It would also be too cheap and over-facile to regard love of neighbour simply as a moral duty and nothing more, arising from man's religious attitude to God as the simple consequence of this and as something imposed upon man by God as the Lord of all men and of the world, and as the guardian of the world order created by him. We must not think of it as a duty in this sense which has to be discharged if man seeks to live in peace with God and to attain to him as his goal. In the very nature of the case, and in the light of a deeper understanding of Christian tradition, and finally too in view of the necessity really to do justice to the elements of truth in a modern radical horizontalism, it must be said that a far greater unity exists between man's relationship to God and that which he bears to his fellow men. Jesus himself conceives of love of God and love of neighbour as a unity[4] into which the whole nature of man and his task is concentrated. And in the teaching of 1 John this unity is given a radically theological dimension and depth. And these in themselves are enough to demonstrate the fact that Christian tradition knows far too much about love of neighbour for it to be a mere moral demand upon man which God has made as a condition of his favour towards man. The doctrinal tradition of Christianity has always emphasized that there is no [304] experience of God for pilgrim man on this earth which has not been mediated through [4] On this cf. the author's article, 'Reflections on the Unity of the Love of Neighbour and the Love of God', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 231-249.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

an experience of the world. Even the immediacy of man to God as constituted by God's self-bestowal in grace, in which man becomes a child of God and can truly call upon him by the name of Father, and truly has to do with him as such in prayer and worship and in the hidden sphere of his own personal love, is always mediated through the experience of the world which man finds already about him, and in which, right from the outset he has to act and be acted upon when he assumes his personal reference to God and necessarily brings his relationship to the world into this.

Now this relationship to the world, which acts as a medium in this sense, as Christian philosophy and theology consciously recognize with increasing clarity, does not consist primarily or originally in a relationship to a material environment in which, among many other factors, men are to be found also. Rather it is primarily a relationship to a society, the human Thou which constitutes not merely any kind of object in the experiential world of man, but is rather an original and constitutive element for his self-understanding as subject and for his relationship to the world. It is only in terms of this personal, social environment that man can be brought to a realization of himself as subject, and it is only in terms of this that those transcendental experiences of freedom, responsibility, absolute truth, love and personal trust are borne in upon man in which alone it can be made intelligible to him what is meant by God. For this God is not any kind of particular object side by side with many others (albeit of a peculiar excellence) which impinge upon him, but rather is present to him as the ground, the horizon, and the ultimate goal of man's own personal movement outwards towards his social environment in all its complexity. It is true that this God, in the movement of his gracious self-bestowal upon man and in verbal revelation, has assumed a relationship to man in which he functions on man's behalf not merely indirectly as an ultimate ambience of his encounter with the world, remaining forever outside his conscious awareness, but a relationship in which he himself, in a verbal revelation that is personal, in a covenant that belongs to saving history, in the implanting of his divine Spirit in the innermost heart and centre of man, becomes a direct partner of man himself. But this in no sense alters the basic fact that man can be a partner of God in this sense in a relationship that is immediate only as he who, in his relationship to his social environment, is always basically and inalienably orientated to God. Once this is recognized it is obvious that the relationship to God which is basically and inalienably mediated through man's relationship to [305] his social environment can be achieved aright, and can accept and sustain the grace-given elevation precisely of this relationship by God himself only if the relationship of man to his social environment is such as it must be, i.e. if it is a relationship of ultimately unreserved trust towards his fellow man, a relationship of self-commitment to him, a relationship of responsibility for him, a relationship of love. Only on this condition can man truly realize what is meant by God to whom he is really committing himself when he begins to love God. We must go a step further. Man's total relationship in knowledge and freedom to his environment is sustained by the achievement of his transcendence over any given particular factor within this experience, and it is in this transcendence that his orientation to God is already concomitantly given and concomitantly achieved. The free achievement of a right understanding of man to his social environment, to the Thou who is his fellow, is right from the first a right understanding of God, albeit one that he may not consciously have explicitated to himself, a relationship which, as sustained by grace, also has a salvific import even when the man concerned does not explicitly or consciously recognize this and does not specifically or consciously objectify to himself in a form that can be put into words that he has already entered into relationship with God in a form that has not been expressed. In other words: where someone, by recognizing the absolute claims of his conscience in real and selfless love, is able really to rise above himself in reaching out to his neighbour, a movement towards God is already in process and has been accepted in very truth, albeit unconsciously, a movement which is

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

initiated and elevated by grace. And this signifies a salvific event in the strictest sense of the term, and moreover even in those cases in which the man concerned, through no fault of his own, has not yet arrived at any explicit recognition of the first ground and ultimate goal of this movement which proceeds horizontally and vertically at the same time. This remains true even if, so far as his conscious awareness is concerned, he still believes that he is an a-theist. Of course all this does not mean that once a man has arrived at conscious knowledge of the ultimate implications of his positive and loving relationship to his social environment through revelation and grace, and therefore knows that in it he is inescapably in contact with God, he can justifiably allow this relationship to God, already implicit and inescapably present in his relationship with the world, to fall back into the level of the unconscious and unobserved. To take such a course really, seriously, and in full freedom would be to deny, if not actually to break off, even the implicit and subconscious relationship to God in freedom, and would thereby also be to break off [306] the loving relationship to the Thou of one's fellow men by using one's freedom to deny the ultimate ground and goal of this relationship. For all this, however, the fact remains: there is a mutually conditioning relationship between our relationship to our neighbour and our relationship to that which we call God. Either of these two relationships can be more or less explicitly reflected upon and objectified in words. In the connection between the two the most manifold combinations and variations can be conceived of or actually exist. But both relationships mutually condition one another. It is true that horizontalism and verticalism can be present in man in the form of a free acceptance of love or in the form of a rejection, of hatred. But whichever form they assume both are mutually and inescapably dependent upon one another. Hence it can even be the case that the presence of God as explicitated in words and upheld by the consensus of public opinion can appear so obvious that love of neighbour appears merely as a secondary moral consequence following from this presence of God. And the converse can also be the case, that because of the absence of any theism in public opinion the individual arrives at an experience of God only or seemingly as a secondary factor when he rises above himself in committing himself to the Thou of his fellow men, in assuming a responsibility in which ultimately he stands alone without reward and as it were without any withdrawal to his own egoistical 'I'. Whatever historical changes the relationship may undergo between the vertical and the horizontal element in the self-transcendence of man, the basic relationship between horizontalism and verticalism remains the same.

Here, then, we have an ultimate, original, and indissoluble interpenetration in the reference to God and to his neighbour inherent in man's nature. And it is only within this that we can understand what God really is and also what one's neighbour really is. And it is this that constitutes Christianity's basic understanding of man. This means that Christianity does not add on the vertical dimension in man as something new and supplementary to the horizontal dimension. It does not impose two separate duties upon him so as to divide him. Rather it lays bare the ultimate radicality, the ultimate dignity, and the ultimate hiddenness of the relationship which man bears to the Thou of his fellow men only when speaking of God in that which, in a very imprecise and misleading image, we may call the vertical dimension, verticalism. A point that must be explicitly emphasized is that God is not thereby reduced to a cipher standing for the dignity and the future of man, so that basically speaking after all all that remains is man alone and the horizontalism of his nature. Man is, once and for all, that being which only possesses, discovers and [307] consummates itself when it transcends itself in reaching out to that without which this being would stick fast in finitude, that being which is itself infinitely more than man. We can or could of course say with Pascal that even man himself is infinitely more than mere man, and on this basis we could also say that in the term horizontalism everything in man is expressed that is to be expressed about him, provided only that we really take this saying of Pascal's concerning man who is infinitely more than man with all due seriousness. And the seriousness with which we take this remains clear and is realized only if man precisely recognizes that he has discovered himself and accepted himself in his ultimate truth only if, in a spirit of adoration, thankfulness, and indeed blessed joyfulness, he surrenders himself to that which is infinitely more than man, and precisely as such has willed to become in grace the innermost and definitive life of man himself.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Finally then, after all, if we are to avoid misunderstandings and radical and fatal distortions in man's understanding of himself, we must stand by the unity and the mutually conditioning relationship of horizontalism and verticalism. And in the unity which we recognize here it is obvious that the verticalism which orientates us towards God, in so far as it can and must be distinguished from the horizontalism that orientates us towards man, has a higher dignity and of itself implies a more radical duty on man's part. Now if we say this we must straightway add once more that both dimensions are absolutely mutually conditioning, and that we cannot discover God except in our neighbour, that there cannot be any true love for God – especially in virtue of the fact that God has become man – which has not shared its utter radicality in love by extending it to man. He therefore who seeks to emphasize the higher dignity and the more radical duty of love of God, and in principle is right in doing this, should not thereby suppose that he has two entities which are in competition with one another in such a way that he can only give everything to one of the two by taking something from the other. Christianity, on any true understanding, upholds verticalism because it recognizes that without it horizontalism cannot in the long run endure, or at most will survive in a blessed illogicality in which God is explicitly denied or neglected by it in order once more implicitly to assent to him precisely in the absoluteness of love of neighbour. He who seeks to uphold a logical horizontalism must ask himself, and render account of his findings on this point to others, how much remains of man if he is not the man of God. Such a man would, after all, precisely be the mere shortlived product of a blind nature, a being brought face to face with its own misfortune, with an [308] awareness of its own finitude, ultimately condemned in itself and in its works to ruin. Yet it is possible for one to take this man, caught as he is in an attitude of heroism for which no grounds can be adduced, with absolute seriousness. Yet the question can be put to him of why he really does this, why he does not simply regard his fellow man as a particular individual to whom he is ultimately indifferent, one particular example of a transitory human species caught up in a state of conflict which is far from being avoidable in all cases. Such a man must also allow the question to be put to him of why he strives so obstinately and despairingly against the implications which basically and ultimately speaking he has after all assented to in his absolute love of neighbour, implications in which God is included, why he does not have the still greater courage in hoping against all hope that his radical love of neighbour will issue into blessedness and, in the midst of the absurdity of existence, to believe.

THE NEW RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN 'HORIZONTALISM' AND 'VERTICALISM' WHICH HAS EMERGED IN OUR PARTICULAR EPOCH

On the basis, then, of Christianity's abiding understanding of its own nature as this has existed right from the origins it holds firm to the indissoluble unity in the midst of distinction between love of God and love of neighbour. But this is not to deny that in our own times a new relationship has emerged between horizontalism and verticalism, one that is proper to this particular epoch. Many times already in the course of our earlier considerations we have delineated this new relationship between the two abiding and mutually conditioning dimensions in man. This is an age in which, so far as society and public opinion are concerned, the existence of God and a right understanding of what is meant by this term at all

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

are no longer self-evident factors. In such an age the mystery of that love for a Thou, in reaching out to which man irrevocably transcends himself in a certain measure, constitutes the ever new and indispensable generative spark at which the faith of the individual in God is kindled, a faith that is now lonely, no longer sustained and protected by public opinion, a faith that must emerge ever anew. For this love of neighbour, then, an eternal validity is claimed. It is in this love of neighbour that the outward movement of man from himself is achieved most radically in knowledge and freedom. And it is only in the love of neighbour as thus conceived that it becomes clear for the man of today what is meant by God and the existence of God – clear in a sense in which it never needed [309] to be made clear at all in earlier ages. Now it follows than an experience of God that has emerged in this way has a clarity and radical depths in the life of man such as it did not have in earlier times, when, after all, there was a constant temptation to make a mere external indoctrination concerning the existence of God a substitute for this authentic experience of God. In this sense horizontalism nowadays takes a certain priority over verticalism. But this must not be allowed to contradict the basic truths of Christianity's understanding of its own nature. Nowadays in its preaching to man the Church should cry out to him 'Love thy neighbour! Love him with a love that transcends the immediate circumstances of your own private life which are constantly suspected of being tainted by egoism! Love him even when this love, in its ultimate consequences, appears to you to amount to a fatal surrender of yourself! Only then will you keep peace with the times in learning deeply what is meant by God and love for God! For this you have to surrender yourself in an act of unreserved trust to this single movement of your existence.' And if the Church were to cry this message out to modern man, then she would simply be preaching that ultimate and essential truth which she has all along been attempting to bring home to man.

A factor which we have already pointed out in connection with the third cause for the threat which horizontalism represents for us nowadays is that there is a need for a shift of emphasis of this kind in the preaching of the Church of today such as did not exist in former times. Nowadays man acquires a quite new responsibility in a world that has become dynamic. This responsibility has not yet come to be self-evident and is not yet being acted upon to a sufficient extent. And in these circumstances it must be especially emphasized and brought into the foreground even though other factors are thereby thrust into the background for a long period in view of the finitude of human awareness at the individual and collective levels. The situation in the light of the Church, therefore, is no different from that prevailing in the life of the individual. That which is most urgent and most of all demanded in the immediate circumstances of any given time, that which has to be preferred before all else and has to be acted upon even at the cost of neglecting other factors for the time being, does not always or necessarily have to be that which is objectively speaking the most important and the most valuable. If a Christian finds his house ablaze on a Sunday then he can quench the fire in his house precisely on Sunday even at the cost of neglecting his duty to worship God in the Eucharist on that day. When faced with the danger of a general conflagration of our world the Church too can, under certain circumstances, [310] emphasize the duty of love of neighbour more radically than she has done in earlier ages, because the Christian's responsibility for the world now includes quite fresh tasks and duties such as simply did not exist in former times. If a horizontalism were to seek nothing else than to awaken and disseminate the conviction that Christians must recognize and put into effect their responsibility for the world in a far more radical manner than formerly, taking this at last as the task for the hour, then a horizontalism of this kind can only be praised as a characteristic of this particular epoch, this particular age of the Church. Obviously, however, even while putting into practice a new horizontalism of this kind, the one Church with all her complexity cannot simply lay up her cult, her theology, the cultivation of an interior religious orientation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation to God, as some naively idealistic souls suppose. Even in wartime the function of society is not simply to produce cannon fodder to be shot down. Even the most radical protagonists of a secularized form of responsibility for the world, for the under-developed peoples, even the most radical campaigners who take up arms against the injustice in the world sometimes go for walks, take recreation, enjoy life etc. Even a Christianity that is radically aware of its responsibility for the world should still pray, still pursue theology, still rejoice in God and his peace, thank God and praise him. And on a closer examination of all these matters it can be noticed that in the long run they are very necessary precisely for those who seek with all due seriousness their radical responsibility for the world.

WHAT HAS THE CHURCH TO CONTRIBUTE TO THE HUMANIZATION OF THE WORLD?

At this point we can apply ourselves directly to the subject of our considerations as formulated at the outset. What is the position with regard to the salvific task of the Church precisely as such in its attitude to the humanization of the world? We have to observe all due brevity and to be aware of the fact that any exhaustive answer to this question would have to be far more complex and include far more distinctions than is possible within the scope of this present study of ours. But before attempting to find an answer to this question one further preliminary observation must first be made.

Love of neighbour means not merely an attitude but concrete action in which the individual comes to the help of his fellow in a way that is selfless and involves personal sacrifice, and moreover is realistic as well. The giving of realistic help, in which love of neighbour must be made real, is to a [311] large extent a matter which calls for human experience, one in which collaboration between individuals who interpret human life in the most divers ways is both possible and necessary. In other words it is a matter which, in the concrete forms it assumes, is by no means subject to, or capable of being subject to the guiding power of the Church as vested in her officials. This remains true however much this task may be and may remain a matter for the Christians of the Church. Even to this extent the humanization of the world, the concrete forms in which responsibility for the world is put into practice and organized, are far from being directly or even exclusively a matter for the official Church or for social organizations. There is a good sense in which the world is secular, the world as it exists with its possibilities and its self-elected goals, with its institutions and organizations, with its pluralism and the antagonism which this inevitably entails. This is a world which is not (either in fact or in principle) subject to the direct guidance of the official Church. It is a world which, on the contrary, is autonomous. And all this is explicitly recognized as a fact by the Church herself. This in itself ipso facto implies that that in which the humanization of the world is immediately subjected, in other words the process in which the horizontal task of man is in a direct and immediate sense undertaken, put into concrete practice and carried through is far from being identified with or capable of being identified with the Church. In other words to identify this subject with the Church in the sense supposed would basically speaking amount to a marked clericalism and sacralism. We cannot seriously demand of the Church, therefore, that she should feel herself to be the subject most directly responsible for the task of modern humanity in relation to the world. The Church can and must bring home to modern man, to the extent that this is possible at all, his responsibility for the world, the ultimate depths of this responsibility, with its implications of eternal salvation or perdition for man. She has the function of laying bare and disclosing these to the man of today. The Church can repeatedly stir up groups from among the Christians belonging to her and organize them in the service of this humanization of the world, and in this she can allow herself to be inspired by ultimately Christian motivations. In this process she can invoke these Christian motivations still more powerfully when her right to take this course is disputed by other Christians or Christian groups. In her official life the Church can even go on to give help to secular institutions in their efforts when this seems desirable or profitable, and when the immediate goals of these are unequivocally designed to serve the dignity and freedom of man, and can on these grounds be recognized as Christian [312] too. The Church as an official Church, however, is not the immediate or proper subject for realizing in the concrete the humanization of the world. She must be ready to declare that she is not qualified in this respect, yet at the same time she must live by and represent respect for the freedom and dignity of man in an exemplary manner in her own life in ways that are appropriate to our own times. And precisely if she does this she can act as a body empowered to criticize, partly through her officials, partly through her other members in relation to the social conditions which prevail, together with all that needs to be changed in these either in an evolutionary or a revolutionary way.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Only if the Church recognizes the world's right in this sense to enter upon its own responsibility, which the Church in no sense seeks to deprive the world of, will she herself be free to undertake what is her own true saving function which she alone can fulfil. It is true that salvation itself is achieved by man in the whole scope of his life as pervaded throughout by the moving power of God's spirit. It is true that there is in this sense no sphere marked off as sacral, such that this is the only area in which man has to do with God. But it must be recognized that the whole of human existence, and so the entire world in all its dimensions, ultimately reaches out to the life of God; that there is no horizontal dimension which is entirely whole and complete in itself without a vertical one; that it is only through God's grace that we are set free in such a way as to be able to use and enjoy the world, and open ourselves unreservedly to our neighbour without becoming enslaved by this social and material environment of ours, without having to idolize it in order to be able to endure it. All this is a message which must be preached to the world ever anew. All this must itself be offered and communicated to the world ceaselessly in the physical sign of God also, in the power of his grace as the innermost entelecheia of the world itself. And over and above all this God himself must be adored in spirit and in truth. The historical embodiment of his self-utterance in the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ must be accepted and celebrated ever anew precisely because this self-utterance of God takes place in the world as such. All this is included in the salvific function of the Church.

Let it not be said that this is merely to setup an impotent and ineffectual ideology which does nothing to alter the real course of the world in its horizontal dimension. Even a realistic Marxism recognizes that the ideological superstructure has effects which redound upon that which constitutes its real basis. Any realistic estimate of the meaning of human life which is based on a really broad view in terms of space and time recognizes [313] that the so-called ideological factor is itself a part of reality such that without it even the other factors in man could not exist. Because even in his so-called natural state he is incapable of existing without culture. Ideology is not a luxury which man can actually dispense with. Thus the salvific function of the Church, even in its vertical orientation to God, has a direct significance for the task of man in his own sphere. If the sun of God were ever really to set, if man ever really exhausted the resources of his past history in terms of 'ideology' to a point at which nothing was left of it, if the Church were no longer to exercise her salvific function, which seems so useless and precisely in virtue of so doing is indispensable – only then would it appear that man had actually lost himself, that that which he was formerly tempted sceptically to reject as illusion is absolutely necessary to life itself that he possesses and is able to endure himself only if he reaches out beyond himself in faith, hope and love to that mystery which we call God. It is that mystery which constitutes the supra-human mystery of man himself, and it is that mystery that it is the function of the Church to serve. The better she fulfils this salvific function of hers the more uncalculating she is, the more she seems to forget man in his needs, the more she protects and preserves man even in his worldly task, the humanization of his own world.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[314]

19

ON THE THEOLOGY OF REVOLUTION

We cannot initiate a theology of revolution in response to a transitory fashion of the modern world or of contemporary theology with the aim of making theology modern, making contact with those who otherwise have no interest in theology, nor can we attempt to develop a theology of revolution on the grounds that today theology is rightly or wrongly producing a feeling of frustration, and it is supposed that its ineffectualness in present-day society can be compensated for by transforming it into a theology of revolution or interpreting it along these lines.[1] For if we took as our basis this factor of a modern demand, then nothing more would emerge than a supplement to moral theology in a particular sphere, and the whole problem could basically speaking be reduced merely to the question of whether or not it is permissible to use physical force, possibly amounting even to bloodshed, in order to bring about social changes. It would be reduced to the question of the 'killing of a tyrant' or something similar. An additional danger which would arise if we took this as our basis would be to suppose that revolution is at most a question that concerns Africa, Latin America, or central Asia, but not one for Europe or North America.

Nor should a theology of revolution proceed from the assumption that there must in all circumstances be such a thing as a theology of revolution. For if we assume this as self-evident from the outset it will lead to an over-hasty identification of religion with so-called 'positive theology' ('God's action in history'), and so too to a false identification of religion with a kind of 'orthodoxy of the left'.

Nor again should we suppose that the necessity for a revolution, or even for a revolution that is permanent, can be deduced directly or solely [315] from the data of Christian revelation. On the contrary it must be shown in later arguments that a theology of revolution, to the extent that such a discipline exists at all, must proceed from the concrete experience of the situation with which we Christians and the Church as a whole are simply confronted nowadays, and which must produce its effects nowadays everywhere throughout the whole of theology, so that it should not be regarded as a supplement to a special department of moral theology.

At the same time, however, it must be emphasized that the concept of revolution is precisely not to be regarded as, for instance, the sole key concept of theology, or the fons et origo of it all, as not a few appear to suppose nowadays. We say that God's action upon man is the most effective and the most radical act of all, and that on the one hand it belongs totally to God, while on the other it is nevertheless brought to its fulness in and through the activity of man himself. But this does not mean that we can call this action of God 'revolution', for this would be a misuse of the term, and would merely have the effect of obscuring or even distorting the true nature of revolution properly so called. Again we should not call Jesus a revolutionary on the grounds that he was unmistakably opposed to the religious and political strivings of the Pharisees and Zealots. Precisely because, and to the extent that, Jesus distinguished his own mission from any directly political involvement, the work of Jesus acquires and retains a supreme social effectiveness of its own, and that too even in its effects upon secular society. What we have in mind here is a theology which includes within its

[1] On this subject cf. E. Feil and R. Weth edd., Diskussion zur 'Theologie der Revolution' (Munich/Mainz, 1969) and the bibliography there assembled by W. Darschin, 'Bibliographische Hinweise zur "Theologie der Revolution" ', pp. 365-373.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

purview the social and political implications of the whole of revelation in all its parts, and in this sense is intended to be a 'political theology'. Now precisely a theology of this kind must, ultimately speaking, resist any attempt to identify it with a theology of revolution. In no circumstances can a theology of revolution be regarded as the true heart and centre or the supreme point within theology as a whole. Any true and genuine theology must always be, in, all its parts, a theology of eschatological hope, and it is only indirectly, and through the medium of political ethics, that a theology of this kind can determine and provide the basis for norms of human action at the secular level. To expand the concept of 'revolution' so as to cover this would merely be to render it ineffective, and could contribute nothing to the true inspiration and guidance of human activities. Obviously much that might provide a basis for a theology of revolution must be passed over here, as for instance a more detailed investigation of the relationship between the speculative and the practical reason, of the mutually conditioning relationship between reason and freedom, of the relationship [316] between society and the individual, of the relationship which various societies of different degrees of development bear to one another, of the theology of power in general and that of the kind of power to be found in the social order as it exists in the concrete and as influenced by original sin, and so a society which, among other characteristics, always bears the stamp of sinfulness.

CONCEPTS

I would like to begin by indicating a few factors bearing on a function to which the Church is committed in general, that namely of acting as a critic of society. I am assuming that any radical horizontalism is not and cannot be a true interpretation of Christianity. Christianity has of its very nature something to do with the living God as such, and the name God is once and for all not an old-fashioned cipher standing for man, his dignity, and the task which man has in relation to his fellows and the society in which he lives.[2] Obviously I cannot here enter into the mutually conditioning relationship between horizontalism and verticalism, nor can I set forth the reasons for holding that these two terms in themselves, representing as they do an attempt to interpret the different dimensions in man, are capable of misunderstanding and do not rightly express the true nature both of the unity and of the distinction between God and man or of the relationship between God and man. There is on the one hand a relationship to the world, a responsibility for the world, a love of neighbour, an orientation towards one's neighbour, which constitutes the absolutely necessary and ever-abiding condition and medium for the relationship which man bears to God. On the other hand this relationship to God, even as expressed in the cult or in prayer, is not simply an old-fashioned term which, once demythologized and re-interpreted, would at basis express nothing more than 'man' and 'the relationship of man to man'.

There is a further point. Given that man has a responsibility for the world of this kind, such as in earlier times was called – perhaps quite naively – 'love of neighbour', and which must be understood as the absolutely indispensable medium for our relationship to God,[3] then there [317] is nowadays a love of neighbour that is socially orientated. It is not enough to say that man is a social being. On the contrary society itself is in a true sense always something more than the mere sum total of its individual members. And this also applies in the dimension of salvation and of the communicating of salvation. It also applies in the dimension of the Church. To that extent love of neighbour, regarded as the indispensable medium and

[2] On this cf. the author's article in the present volume, 'The Church's Commission to Bring Salvation and the Humanization of the World'.
[3] On this cf. the author's article, 'Reflections on the Unity Between the Love of Neighbour and the Love of God', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 231-249.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

condition enabling us to have a relationship to God, must not be misinterpreted as a mere personal, or perhaps even sentimental, reference of the individual to the individual. Rather in the fluid society of a world that has become dynamic love of neighbour as applied to the Christian and as the medium of his relationship to God necessarily implies a responsibility for, and a commitment to society as such. And in the light of this it becomes possible to formulate or to envisage such a thing as – if we like to call it so – a 'theology of revolution'. This can be admitted if and to the extent that revolution means nothing else whatever than a specific way (one which still awaits more precise definition) of changing social conditions, structures and institutions to man's advantage – in other words a factor which manifestly must of its very nature be present in any social commitment, which must be undertaken first and foremost by the man of Christian hope, the man committed to striving for a future that is absolute, the man inspired by love of neighbour in the true sense.

We now have something to say concerning the concept of revolution[4] itself. In saying it I would like once more to emphasize a point which I have already made at the outset: a study of this kind can offer nothing else whatever than a few modest considerations presented with all due provisos, and aimed at some degree of further clarification of the concept so as to achieve an understanding of all that is expressed in it. This means two things: first, we are not concerned with any revolutionary enthusiasm; second, I cannot, in order to avoid raising a middle-class bogey, disguise the fact that there may also be a legitimate possibility – indeed a duty – to undertake such a thing as a revolution in life, in society and in the world, and even for Christians, and that it is possible for this to be covered over by the narrow-minded or the bourgeois. I shall have something further to say on this latter point at a later stage.

Before we come to the concept of revolution itself I would like to emphasize one further point: in treating of the concept it would be wrong [318] for us to proceed from the outset from the concept or the reality of force.[5] Obviously the history of revolution as it de facto exists has always had something to do with force. But the concept of revolution should not in the first instance ipso facto be interpreted on the basis of the concept of force or even of violence as that through which, under certain conditions, social or political change will be, or should be introduced into a society. Unless we make this proviso we should have right from the outset an exact knowledge of what 'force' in the theological sense truly signifies, and this is by no means all that easy to define. To adopt this approach would also obscure the fact that at least today and in the future a revolution can take many forms such as cannot be brought into line with any of the usual senses in which force was used in former times. Now the difference between social and political 'evolution' and revolution is that revolution arises in those cases in which change is brought about in a political, social and cultural system by means of forces which exist outside this system as such and so proceed according to principles which are not recognized in this society itself as such either in the sense of being embodied in laws or catered for by means of other social institutions. Obviously any revolution invariably draws upon evolutive means as well such as are present in a society on the basis of the industrial and technical tendencies and forces present within it, and which are actually recognized as belonging to the very nature of the society concerned. But this does not alter the fact that the decisive forces which a revolution brings to bear are such as are not immanent within the system.

In describing the concept of revolution in these terms one point has been abstracted from: the precise goal aimed at, in view of which this changing of a society through means which are not immanent within its system takes place. But if we are to adopt a terminology

[4] For a comprehensive survey on this see K. Hecker, 'Revolution', Sacramentum Mundi V (London and New York, 1970), pp. 359-365, and the literature there adduced.
[5] On this cf. the author's article, 'The Theology of Power', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 391-409.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

nowadays accepted by the average man we may call such a process of changing a society revolutionary only provided that subjectively and objectively it is aimed at a greater scope for freedom and an increase in justice and harmony among all.

Even then it is obvious that the term 'revolution' cannot be applied if the forces and the protagonists involved in a social change are not merely such as are not immanent within the system but such as belong to a foreign power – in other words if what they bring to bear is not revolution but invasion.

The revolutionary process has a negative aspect: a critique or an attempt [319] to eliminate conditions which are socially unjust or repressive; and it has a positive aspect: the introduction of social relationships and conditions of a kind in which men can be given the widest possible scope for freedom in which to be able to live out their social relationships. A critique and an attempt to eliminate earlier social conditions without any new and effective alternatives for the setting up of a more just and more free society cannot be called revolution either. On the contrary it often implies danger and injury for any true revolutionary struggle.

We now come to the potentialities for social change present within a society yet not immanent within its system. They are sustained by a group of individuals within the society concerned which is numerically not wholly in a minority. Such a group will have two characteristics: first it will not be integrated into this society in such a way that it can exercise a real and recognizable influence upon the society as a whole so as to achieve its purpose or to be able to achieve its own aims within the society concerned as such; second, the group will be of such a kind that despite its usefulness for society as a whole in terms of economic benefits, freedom for the society, other cultural benefits etc., it will not have an adequate share in the shaping of the society. Unless the group concerned is of this kind the changes it brings about can only be such as are immanent within the system itself. The human group we are envisaging here is then compelled, in order really to be able to survive, to struggle for the elimination of the conditions of life actually prevailing, and in this sense becomes the subject in which the revolution is vested. Hence we can and must arrive at a concept of revolution such that physical or even violent force does not enter into this concept of its very nature. And despite this fact we can still distinguish revolution as conceived of here from any kind of social evolution.

In any revolution we can surely distinguish three dimensions:

The dimension of original motivation: the revolution is raised against injustice that is laid upon the oppressed until their frustration is such as to stir up a revolutionary movement.

The dimension of the recognition of certain norms: the original motivation becomes an occasion for recognizing the possibility of changing the social conditions within a given society. A new structure comes to be conceived of capable of producing a better society, and in the light of this and in its 'feedback' effects the original motivation becomes clearer and more concrete.

The dimension of the general and particular revolutionary strategy: [320] various methods are conceived of through which the new society can be brought to reality. These various methods are examined as to their effectiveness in the actual situation prevailing, and the selected methods are brought to a stage at which they are capable of being applied in practice. Finally the new structures of society are given concrete reality by the specifically revolutionary procedures.

In this connection something more should be said concerning the concept of the so-called 'permanent revolution'. This has been put forward in the most varied forms, e.g. by Herbert Marcuse and by the Maoists of China. But simply in the light of the points we have made above it follows that the concept of a permanent revolution cannot be accepted. For if and to the extent that the actual principle of a social change that is continuous within a society were to become institutionalized as such, and to the extent that any such thing is possible at all,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

what is actually involved in an institution of this kind, a dynamic factor of this kind becoming embodied as an effective force in society so that it belongs to society itself, constitutes in our terms something that is from the outset precisely not a revolution but an evolution. For in fact the principle of change comes to be conceived of as immanent within the system of the society thus affected.[6] And there is a further point. For the most varied reasons, sociological, futurological and even theological, it is impossible for the principle of change within a concrete society as such to become fully institutionalized so as to affect all its aspects and to become recognized as an absolute principle of this society. The concept of an absolutely totalitarian state such as integrates everything within itself is ultimately absurd and cannot be carried out in practice. Yet only a state of this kind, which would imply the diametrical opposite of freedom, could bring such a thing as a permanent revolution to reality. Yet precisely because, for reasons which I will not mention here, there cannot be any such thing as a truly absolute totalitarian system,[7] there cannot be such a thing as a permanent revolution in the true sense either, for precisely the principle of a continuous social change and transformation cannot ultimately speaking in any full or adequate sense be immanent within the system. Even Trotsky recognized that there would be periods of calm within a permanent revolution of this kind, periods in which development [321] would take evolutionary forms. Even according to him, therefore, there is no really permanent revolution in any true sense.

This is not to deny that by accelerating the development of sciences and technology social changes too will develop more swiftly in the present and future than in former times, but these are still evolutionary in character even though the forms in which they manifest themselves are almost such as were formerly achieved only in revolutions. But the converse of this must also be insisted upon here: we are assuming two things: first that no society can integrate within itself all the forces of progress and change by institutionalizing them as such. Hence too authentic revolutions become necessary again and again, proceeding from forces which transcend the system itself. Secondly, we can regard the alternating evolutionary and revolutionary phases in the history of a society taken together as so many unified major social processes. Assuming the validity of these two points, and on this approach, it is also possible under certain circumstances to speak of a permanent revolution.

What is presupposed is the position, regarded as a tenet of faith, that in the course of the phases of her history the Church preserves an essential identity, and hence it would be possible to describe the permanent revolution as a sociological analogate in which the history of the Church might find a certain model in terms of which to interpret her own nature. For a Church can never always remain, or seek to remain, at the same level within society. This remains valid so long as she constitutes the people of God on pilgrimage and so long as she is not merely the institution which, as remaining always the same, fixed or frozen, as it were, confines herself to delivering that which is produced by souls who have already been saved and are in heaven. The Church, then, is always on the way, and tending towards a kingdom of God, an absolute future, which can never wholly be established within history, and which despite this constitutes the goal of this people of God so that the Church as always in need or reform has phases within her history which can be compared to evolutions.[8] The evidence of history shows that revolutionary phases in the past history of the Church coincided with revolutionary phases in the past history of secular society – indeed that they even emerge from these. And to that extent a comparison between a secular permanent revolution in the [6] In this connection the function of a 'political theology' should be noticed. Cf. J. B. Metz, 'Political Theology', Sacramentum Mundi V (London and New York, 1970), pp. 34-38.

[7] On this cf. the author's observations in Freiheit und Manipulation in Gesellschaft und Kirche, Münch. Akad.-Schriften 53 (Munich, 2nd ed., 1971).
[8] On this cf. the author's article, 'Immanent and Transcendent Consummation of the World', Theological Investigations X (London and New York, 1973), pp. 273-289.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

sense which I have just set forth as conceivable and that permanent revolution which the Church herself is is something more than simply an [322] artificial comparison. It actually makes clear to some extent the close mutual relationship which exists between the fate of the Church and that of the world. Precisely as the outcome of the experience which the Church has in the midst of secular revolutions, she conceives, in forms which are new and relevant, of that which in itself has all along been known to her as the outcome of divine revelation, and yet which at the same time she has to learn ever anew. And to the extent that the Church hearkens to divine revelation and to the call of the particular age both at the same time, she can through her doctrine and through her life supply the world and its societies ever afresh with that motivation which these need for the attainment of their goal and for the changes which are necessary for this.[9] This is admittedly true only provided that the Church does not think of herself as one called to be a merely conservative force. For ultimately and basically speaking she least of all is this. She must really believe that God himself constitutes her absolute future and at the same time she must recognize that she can only effectively make real this faith of hers and this hope in the absolute future – and moreover at the level of society also – provided that this absolute hope is mediated through the daring, the readiness, under certain circumstances, to undergo change herself within the course of 'this worldly' history to the extent that the summons to undergo change of this kind reaches her from the times through which she is passing. How are we as Christians credibly to demonstrate and to live out what it means to say that the Church is advancing towards a goal which transcends all these earthly realities if we seek merely to cling onto the current state of society? To do so would be to render the eschatological hope of the Church in a true sense unworthy of belief. He alone is truly a Christian who so bears witness to his hope that under certain conditions he can let go the sparrow in his hand in favour of the dove on the roof, even though for the most part worldly prudence seems to prescribe the opposite course.[10]

I must now say something about the concept of the revolutionary situation. A revolutionary situation exists when firstly a sufficiently large group within a society exists which, nevertheless, is not integrated into it; secondly when a revolutionary potential exists; thirdly if this group has become sufficiently aware of its situation; fourthly if it has a sufficient [323] social organization. To express it in other terms: a revolutionary situation of this kind – though not one that necessarily signifies revolution itself – can exist either in a specific individual society taken in isolation or in a multiplicity of societies which are in a certain sense dependent upon one another, or even in the world as a whole, to the extent that these societies are so mutually interdependent in their existence and their prosperity that the revolutionary situation of one of these societies inevitably affects all the other societies as well. When we say in this sense that a revolutionary situation can become global, this obviously does not mean that such a situation is homogeneously present in all parts of the world. Despite the universality of a global revolutionary situation, such a situation can be absent in a particular society taken purely in isolation. Hence a revolutionary situation, to the extent that it exists so far as one particular society is concerned purely as an external factor, i.e. in other societies throughout the world, is not simply the same as when it is present in those societies affected by this global situation.

On any just and unprejudiced view of the present-day state of the world we must say that a global revolutionary situation does exist. In asserting this I must of course emphasize once more that this statement is valid only if we assume the concept of revolution I have just [9] On this cf. the author's ideas in 'The Function of the Church as Critic of Society', Theological Investigations XII (London and New York, 1974), pp. 229-249, and the literature there adduced.

[10] On this cf. the author's article, 'On the Theology of Hope', Theological Investigations X (London and New York, 1973), pp. 260-272.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

described, and only if we assume the concept of the revolutionary situation as global, which can nevertheless arise in this world as the outcome of societies in which a particular revolutionary situation is present such as does not exist in some other society taken in and for itself.

The thesis that a global revolutionary situation does exist is put forward on the assumption of the ideas developed above based on an evaluation of the economic and social situation prevailing in the southern hemisphere, i.e. in the under-developed nations. This thesis is put forward independently of and prior to the question of whether a revolution of this kind – as distinct from the revolutionary situation – already exists or is shortly to break out everywhere or in many countries of the world, and it is totally independent of the question of what means or methods will be used or should be used in order to carry out a revolution of this kind in itself. However, this global revolutionary situation does exist today because in the first place there is so close an interdependence between all the countries of the world that it is no longer possible for one part of the world to exist as a social entity without the other, and second because in many areas, and precisely in the under-developed countries, at least as applied to the country concerned itself, a revolutionary situation, or even an actual revolution already exists, and third because in this world [324] there is an extremely explosive tension between the northern hemisphere and the southern, in other words, therefore, between the part containing the developed nations and that containing the under-developed ones, so that this contradiction really should be called global.

By way of summary, therefore, the following must be laid down: if a revolutionary situation does objectively exist in one part of the world, and if all of us in the world of today are necessarily and inevitably in the same boat (even though we egoistic Europeans of the western industrialized countries are not really willing to recognize it), and the fact that we are in one boat in this sense is becoming still more plainly manifested, then a global revolutionary situation does exist in the world of today even though this revolutionary situation may perhaps not derive from the internal structure of our particular society.

CHURCH AND REVOLUTION

We now come to the question of Church and Revolution. From the nature and the vocation of the Church, and from the means at her disposal, in view of her relative smallness measured by the world as a whole, it may be concluded that the Church cannot be the proper protagonist of the revolution which can legitimately emerge from the global revolutionary situation as universal revolution, though this is not to say anything on the question of what form such a revolution must take in itself precisely so as to supply an appropriate response to this revolutionary situation of the world.

The Church as such is not the primary or proper subject of that revolution which in itself could and should provide the answer to this global revolutionary situation in the world. Nevertheless the Church can and must act as follows: first she must recognize the justification for a revolution of this kind at least in general terms, for this revolution, the point of departure for which we have said already exists, is necessary if the underdeveloped world is really to obtain a share in the benefits they justifiably demand. The process of arriving at a just balance of this kind between the northern and the southern hemispheres cannot properly be called evolution, for the attainment of this just balance is at least in practice, i.e. in view of the outlook actually prevailing in society, a process which cannot be described as immanent within the system. How those forces which transcend the system can and should conduce to the striking of such a balance, what means can be used in order to arrive at it – this is another question. Because and to the extent that in the developed industrial [325] countries of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

America and Europe those who seek to achieve this just balance and the resources for carrying it through are de facto not really immanent within the system, we must according to our terms call the process of arriving at a just and necessary balance of this kind a revolution.

One possible position is that a global change of this kind in the world should be carried out without force, and those who hold this opinion may feel themselves obliged, as a matter of duty, to use peaceful methods of revolution of this kind. But even so they cannot deny that what is in question here is a revolution. And it seems that even a peaceful revolutionary of this kind should boldly give the name of revolution to the position he is advocating, for if he appeals merely to good will and to principles which in practice are already recognized in this society, then he will achieve nothing.

Under Pius XI the Church has explicitly recognized that a social situation, at least within a particular country, can be so unjust and so contrary to the basic rights of man that it is possible for it to be right to use physical force against it.[11] According to Paul VI's encyclical, 'Populorum Progressio' a right to revolution exists, and moreover for Christians also, in the case of grave corruption in a state. It is true that in any theological ethics we have to examine what principles should be invoked in order to answer the question of when and under what conditions we may in practice claim the right to initiate a revolution. It may be true that the utmost prudence is called for here. Yet the fact remains that the concrete application of these principles to a revolution which may possibly be morally justified is no longer the task of theology or of the teaching authorities of the Church proper, and at the theoretical level, but is rather a matter for secular sociology, a matter of the practical reason, which admittedly is enlightened by faith and even guided by charismatic inspiration. In other words ultimately speaking it is a matter for free decision such as can no longer be theoretically reflected upon in any full sense, even though this is not to give free reign to any and every kind of frenzied primitive aggressivity on the part of the individual, without reason, without plan, without responsibility, without reflection. But a further point following from this is that a retrospective ideological justification for a concrete revolution of this kind once it has been carried through is not the task of theology either, for thereby it would be reduced to a mere cringing lickspittle fawning upon a revolution once it had succeeded. It has no need of any such theological justification and it is not the function of theology for its part to give its approval in this sense.

[326] If and to the extent that physical force in the proper sense can legitimately be used in order to safeguard or to restore fundamental human rights, if and to the extent that the use of such force on the part of groups transcending the system in order to achieve fundamental rights is likewise justified, the use of such force can also justifiably be called revolution. And conversely if the use of force is morally justified, then it also follows that the revolution carried through by means of it can be pronounced morally justified, and indeed under certain circumstances obligatory to the extent or in the degree that this use of force is morally justified or obligatory for one who avails himself of this use of force with sufficient prospect of success for the achievement, the defence or the restoration of fundamental human rights of freedom. A point which must always clearly be recognized in this connection is that the concrete forms which such fundamental rights to freedom assume are obviously influenced by temporal and historical factors and the conditions prevailing in a particular age. Hence under certain circumstances nowadays man's basic rights and his right to freedom can include factors which they did not include in the immediate or more distant past. The Church must exhort and arouse Christians to take part in this global revolution in a way appropriate to their position in society and the possibilities open to them as a duty of Christian conscience, for this is not restricted in its function to catering for the salvation of the [11] The encyclical, 'Firmissimam constantiam' v. 28. III, 1937; cf. DS[34] 3775-3776.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

individual. This is not to say that participation of this kind by the Christian in the global revolution as thus defined is merely a matter of his own private conscience or his own individual ethics. Precisely because this is not the case a theology of revolution or a theological theory of revolution must in fact be developed such as does not yet exist as manifestly or clearly as is necessary. If the Church too in her official authorities does not constitute the direct subject for carrying out a revolution, still she can nevertheless as a subordinate society be the upholder of a certain Christian motivation for such a revolutionary movement, and moreover in such a way that through her way of acting in the sphere interior to herself she manifests herself as a fruitful example in which the effectiveness of such motivations can be recognized, while conversely she can arrive at such ever-fresh courses of action as a result of her contact with the contemporary social situation.

In order to achieve a still better understanding of the theological connection which exists between the Church and the contemporary global revolutionary situation the following point must also be considered: a mutually conditioning relationship exists between the recognition of the situation in which Christian life has to be led in the concrete [327] and those principles and motives deriving from revelation which determine this Christian life and give it its motive force. It is not merely that the Church applies revelation to a specific historical situation in which she is living at any given time. It is also true that from the situation itself the Church develops a new theoretical and above all practical recognition for this life as shaped and motivated by Christian revelation. Otherwise a group history would, for instance, be totally inconceivable and the life of the Church would be reduced to a mere uniform application of Christian principles to human courses of action as a material which properly speaking would remain permanently external to this life. From her own nature and for the sake of her own goal the Church seeks, therefore, to achieve a close contact with her worldly situation. I say from her own nature as most proper to her. She does this in order to realize her own self in the manner demanded of her in a specific situation. The Church must learn ever afresh from her situation as constantly subject to history in this sense and never static how the word of God must be preached and the sacraments administered in the concrete, how she herself has to strive for that kingdom of God which constitutes the eschatological salvation of mankind as such and as a whole, and how she must do this as a society and not merely as an agglomeration of individuals in a purely material sense. There is a mutual interdependence a mutually conditioning relationship between love of God and love of neighbour. These two factors are neither wholly identical one with the other nor capable of being living forces independently of one another. Neither in theory nor in practice can Christianity and the Church be understood solely in terms of a sociological horizontalism or a spiritualistic verticalism. This applies not merely to the individual Christians but also to the Church as such.[12] The Church herself cannot serve God without this worship of God in adoration and love being mediated through her service of man.

This function of the Church as serving man, through which the true and genuine cult of God is mediated and made real, demands ever-fresh experiments in concrete social living because only through the experience of these can the Church be made aware of the ever-fresh forms in which this service of man can and must be fulfilled, the more so since it is a service of society as such that is in question, and, moreover, nowadays of a society which is changing very quickly. Through her gospel the Church deputes the Christian to a worldly task which both in terms of its material content and also in its immediate motivation remains worldly, and so in [328] terms both of this material content in itself and of the immediate motivation is common to Christian and non-Christian alike, or at least could and should be common to [12] On this cf. the author's article in the present volume, 'The Church's Commission to Bring Salvation and the Humanization of the World'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

them both. This worldliness becomes apparent from two factors taken together: first the distinction between the natural and supernatural orders and second the impossibility of working out a concrete normative world order for a Christian motivation as such in a world that is never totally freed from every consequence of sin.[13] Correspondingly the task of the Christian as such for the world is not subject to the immediate jurisdiction of the Church's official authorities nor even to the immediate or direct guidance of these. Nevertheless this task for the world does have something specifically and properly Christian in it, and it should not be concluded from what has been said that the Church herself does not have any task for the world of this kind. Work undertaken for the world in this sense, and giving practical expression to responsibility for the world, can be attributed to the Church herself from the most varied points of view: first in as much as this task for the world is engaged in by individuals belonging to the Church whose ultimate and deepest motivations are expressly Christian because and to the extent that these Christians are instructed by the official teaching of the Church in the general norms and principles of social behaviour, principles which, despite their universality, do have or can have in the fullest sense a social effectiveness; further to the extent that the Christians of the Church can form groups which together take upon themselves a task for the world of this kind as something demanded by their Christian conscience, and, in so far as they are still able to do this – as is explicitly stated in 'Gaudium et spes' – even if the Christian dimension in their work is disputed by other groups of Christians. A Christian motivation, a declaration of the Christian element in a concrete social task is not dependent upon the recognition or approbation of this Christian element by all Christians or all authorities in the Church (cf. 'Gaudium et spes', Nos. 41, 43, 75), finally to the extent that the official authorities of the Church can also be under certain circumstances the ones who involve themselves in interventions of a Christian, charismatic and practical kind which cannot be deduced in any compelling sense from the Christian principles at the level of official doctrine, and yet are responses to the demands of the time and the situation to the extent that this situation is interpreted by a practical and creative intelligence.

[329] This experience of the world, then, is one through which the Church interprets ever afresh her own insights into revelation in the Spirit which, precisely in this way, introduces them in all truth. Through them the Church must learn and must reform the activities required of her in her own sphere ever afresh in order in this way to provide an effective motivation for the world in its development and in its revolution. Thus the Church learns that she has to help the poor in their present-day social situation in a way which must be quite different from that which formerly prevailed and was followed in the Church. She learns that the poor must be set free from their self-alienation, and so not have merely to be given alms. If the Church understands this today she is recognizing that she has to manifest herself as the Church of the poor in a different way from that which was formerly the case.[14] If she presents herself in this way she is offering a fresh motivation for, and fresh examples of the attitudes and policies which secular society should adopt in relation to the poor today. In similar ways the Church learns afresh from contemporary history what concrete consequences follow for men from the so-called human rights in their general formulation. The Church must make real these human rights within her own sphere in a way which corresponds to our contemporary age. When she does this genuinely and honestly she is offering an example of how such rights are to be safeguarded and put into practice in the world as well. Without this process of a mutual interinfluence between world and Church, in which the Church too changes herself in fulfilling her task in and for the contemporary world, without this congruence between the [13] Here we should notice the author's observations in his article, 'Theological Considerations on Secularization and Atheism', Theological Investigations XI (London and New York, 1974), pp. 166-184.

[14] On this see the author's article in the present volume, 'The Unreadiness of the Church's Members to Accept Poverty'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

task of the Church within her own sphere and that which is directed outwards to the world, her credibility would suffer and she would be reduced to a sect surviving in the backwaters of history and no longer playing her part in shaping the course of the secular world.

Finally – and in order to bring this study to an end – I would like to add the following point: it is true that the Church has no need to set up any great lament over her past. At the same time, however, she should not be silent about her historical guilt which she has incurred in the course of time by an unjust defence of social conditions under which men in the most divers social groups have had to suffer the most divers forms of injustice and severe hardship. Only through this attitude of self-criticism towards her own past and present on the Church's part can she hope to achieve credibility in any adequate sense, when she ranges herself, as is her right and duty, among those who criticize and condemn the social conditions [330] through which a revolutionary situation has been provoked in the most varied regions of the world. The Church as a whole must also be bold and unequivocal in loosing all those ties of mutual protection and defence which still exist even today between the Church's authority and structures on the one hand and rulers and oligarchical and feudalistic social structures on the other. Such ties are to be surrendered not from considerations of sheer expediency or on the grounds that the Church sees advantages for herself in such a course, namely when the oligarchic social structures are finally overthrown by a revolution. On the contrary the Church must do this because she is obliged to do so of her very nature and in terms of her divine vocation to bring salvation to men.[15] And finally: everything which still in any sense is subject to the Church's authority must be performed in such a way that murder and torture on political grounds is eliminated from the world even though the perpetration of such terrors has hitherto not infrequently been at least tolerated by the Church or, shall we say, individuals within the Church.

Obviously all that I have said so far contains little that has any bearing upon a theology of revolution. I have sought neither to set up a revolutionary programme nor to condemn a revolution which, under certain conditions and in specific situations may be necessary on Christian principles. I have sought to present only a few considerations which, after all, must be put forward if ever any really clear and well thought out theology of revolution is to be developed, a theology which, by and large, and despite all the contributions from South America, still does not exist today, and for which, obviously, any revolutionary mood or revolutionary enthusiasm can never be a substitute.

[15] cf. also the author's article, 'Institution and Freedom', Theological Investigations XIII.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ABBREVIATIONS

Antonianum	Antonianum. Rome 1926 ff.
Bijdragen	Bijdragen. Tijdschrift voor Filosofie en Theologie. Nijmegen 1938 ff.
CCHL	Corpus Christianorum seu nova Patrum collectio. Turnhout/Paris 1953 ff.
CSL	Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum. Vienna l866 ff.
D	H. Denziger, Enchiridion Symbolorum, Definitionum et Declarationum de rebus fidei et morum. Freiburg/Br. ^{30}1955.
DACL	Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. Chabrol and H. Leclercq. Paris 1924-53.
DS	H. Denziger and A. Schönmetzer, Enchiridion Symbolorum, Definitionum et Declarationum de rebus fidei et morum. Freiburg/Br. ^{34}1967.
DThC	Dictionnaire de théologie carholique, ed. A. Vacant and E. Mangenot, cont. by E. Amann. Paris 1903 ff.
Duchesne LP	Liber Pontificalis, ed. L. Duchesne. 2 vol. Paris 1886-92. Reprinted Paris 1955. Vol. 3, ed. C. Vogel, Paris, 1957.
EThL	Ephemerides Theologicae Lovanienses. Bruges 1924 ff.
Fischer	J. A. Fischer, Die Apostolischen Väter. Munich 1956.
FlorPatr	Florilegium Patristicum, ed. J. Zellinger and B. Geyer. Bonn 1904 ff.
FStud	Frankiskanische Studien (Münster). Werl 1914 ff.
GCS	Die Griechischen christlichen Schrifsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte. Leipzig (since the Second World War, Berlin) 1897 ff.
Gr	Gregorianum. Rome 1920 ff.
GuL	Geist und Leben. (See ZAM.)
HDG	Handbuch der Dogmengeschichte, ed. M. Schmaus, J. Geiselmann, A. Grillmeier. Freiburg/Br. 1951 ff.
HdKG	Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte, ed. H. Jedin. 6 vols. Freiburg/ Br., Basel, Vienna 1962 ff.
Hennecke	Neutestamentliche Apokryphen in deutscher Übersetzung, ed. E. Hennecke. Tübingen ^{2}1924.
HPTh	Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie, ed. F. X. Arnold, K. Rahner, V. Schurr, L. M. Weber. 5 vols. Freiburg/Br. 1964-72.
HThG	Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe, ed. H. Fries. 2 vols. Munich 1962-3.
IER	The Irish Ecclesiastical Record. Dublin 1864 ff.
JThS	The Journal of Theological Studies. London 1899 ff.
König W	Religionswissenschaftliches Wörterbuch, ed. Fr König. Freiburg/Br. 1956.
LThK	Lexicon für Theologie and Kirche. 2nd fully rev. edn ed. J. Höfer, K. Rahner. 10 vols. Freiburg/Br. 1957-67.
Mansi	J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio. 31 vols. Florence/Venice 1757-98. Reprinted and ed. L. Petit, J.-B. Martin. 60 vols. Paris 1899-1927.
Meyers Kom.	Kritisch-exegetischer Kommentar über das Neue Testament, founded by H. A. W. Meyer. 16 vols. Göttingen 1832 ff. (several edns).
MThZ	Münchener Theologische Zeitschrift. Munich 1950 ff.
NTD	Das Neue Testament Deutsch. ed. P. Althaus, J. Behm (Neues Göttinger Bibelwerk), Göttingen, 1932 ff. (several edns).
PG	Patrologia Graeca, ed. J.-P. Migne. 161 vols. Paris 1857-66
PL	Patrologia Latina, ed. J.-P. Migne. 217 vols. and 4 vols. index. Paris 1844-55
QD	Quaestiones Disputatae, ed. K. Rahner, H. Schlier. Freiburg/Br. 1958 ff.
QS	J. Maier, Die Texte vom Toten Meer. 2 vols. Munich/Basel 1960.
RAC	Reallexicon für Antike und Christentum, ed. T. Klauser. Stuttgart 1941, 1950 ff.
RBén	Revue bénédictine. Maredsous 1884 ff.
RET	Revista Española de teologia. Madrid 1941 ff.
RHE	Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique. Lyon 1900 ff.
RHLR	Revue d'histoire et de littérature religieuse. Paris 1896-1907, 1910 ff.
RHR	Revue de l'histoire des religions. Paris 1880 ff.
RNT	Regensburger Neues Testament, ed. A. Wikenhauser, O. Kuss. 10 vols. Regensburg 1938 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

RQH	Revue de questions historiques. Paris 1866 ff.
RSR	Recherches de science religieuse. Paris 1910 ff.
RThAM	Recherches de Théologie ancienne et médiévale. Louvain 1929 ff.
Sacramentum Mundi	Sacramentum Mundi. Theologisches Lexicon für die Praxis, ed. K. Rahner, A. Darlap et al. 4 vols. Freiburg/Br. 1967-9.
SC	Sources Chretiennes, ed. H. de Lubac and J. Daniélou. Paris/Lyon 1941 ff.
Scholastik	Scholastik. Freiburg/Br. 1926 ff. (Since 1966 Theologie und Philosophie = ThPh.)
Strack-Billerbeck	H. L. Strack and P. Billerbeck, Kommentar zum Neuen Testament aus Talmud and Midrasch, I-IV. Munich 1922-8, reprinted 1956. V (Rabbinischer Index), ed. J. Jeremias, K. Adolph. Munich 1956.
ThGl	Theologie und Glaube. Paderborn 1909 ff.
ThPh	Theologie und Philosophie. (See Scholastik.)
ThQ	Theologische Quartalschrift. Tübingen 1819 ff., Stuttgart 1946 ff.
ThRv	Theologische Revue. Münster 1902 ff.
ThSt	Theological Studies. Baltimore 1940 ff.
ThW	Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament, ed. N. G. Kittel, cont. by G. Friedrich. Stuttgart 1933 ff.
TU	Teste and Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur. Archiv für die griechisch-christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte. Lepzig/Berlin 1882 ff.
VS	Verbum Salutis. Commentaire du Nouveau Testament, ed. J. Huby, S. Lyonnet. Paris 1924 ff. (several edns).
WA	M. Luther, Werke. Kritische Gesamtausgabe (‘Weimarer Ausgabe’). 1883 ff.
Wasserschleben	H. Wasserschleben, Die Bussordnungen der abendländischen Kirche. Halle 1851 (reprinted Graz 1947).
ZAM	Zeitschrift für Aszese und Mystik (Innsbruck, Munich). Würzburg 1926 ff. (Since 1947 Geist und Leben = GuL.)
ZKG	Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschicte (Gotha). Stuttgart 1876 ff.
ZKTh	Zeitschrift für Katholische Theologie (Innsbruck). Vienna 1877 ff.
ZNW	Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche. Giessen 1900 ff., Berlin 1934 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

PREFACE

In this book the reader will find gathered together the studies which I have made on the history of the practice and of the theology of penance in the early Church. It is true that these essays hail from an earlier period of my theological work; but I do not think that they have been outdated. For, on the one hand, historical work on the questions considered in this volume has hardly made any progress in the last two decades. (It is remarkable, for instance, that J. Grotz's major study, which appeared in 1955, has not been anywhere critically examined on the matter of its theses which represent a radical challenge to the notion of the history of penance which has become traditional since Poschmann.) On the other hand, the essays in their present form have been thoroughly revised, and the reader is made conversant with the literature which has appeared up to today on the history of penance. The essays in this book are on the history of penance. Systematic studies on the theology of penance are not included here, especially since a large number of them have already appeared in previous volumes of Theological Investigations (cf. 'Forgotten Truths Concerning the Sacrament of Penance', II, 135-74; 'Guilt and Its Remission: The Borderland between Theology and Psychotherapy', II, 265-81; 'The Meaning of Frequent Confession of Devotion', III, 177-89; 'Problems concerning Confession', III, 190-206; 'Guilt-Responsibility-Punishment Within the View of Catholic Theology', VI, 197-217; 'Justified and Sinner at the Same Time', VI, 218-30; 'Penance as an Additional Act of Reconciliation within the Church', X, 125-41 – to mention but a few of the studies which deal with these questions directly and explicitly) or are easily accessible in my other works (for example, in Sendung und Gnade: Handbuch der [viii] Pastoraltheologie, etc.). This fifteenth volume of Theological Investigations obviously differs very basically, therefore, from the previous volumes: whereas the previous volumes contained explicitly only systematic studies, this fifteenth volume contains only studies on the history of dogma and of theology. Nevertheless, I think that it is justified to present these historical researches together as a volume of Theological Investigations, because all the volumes of these writings are collections of my brief researches on specific points and they all bear a sub-title which marks them off from one another and thus makes each individual volume into a self-contained unit. I consider, therefore, that this collection of individual studies, Penance in the Early Church, can form a volume in the whole series.

The introduction of the volume into this series has, however – I must 'confess' – yet another reason. I am suspected by many people of being only a speculative theologian who works without reference to history and who, in some circumstances, attempts to dispel difficulties which arise in understanding statements of the Church's magisterium by the merely speculative interpretation of such statements. I am absolutely convinced that genuine Catholic theology must always proceed on the basis both of exegesis and of the history of dogmas and theology, even if it must be the free choice of the individual theologian whether, in a study of a particular point, he wishes to work 'speculatively' or 'historically'. It is possible, therefore, that the present volume will dispel the suspicion that I have no appreciation of historical theology.

In fact the themes of this volume show that today's theory and practice of church penance will not make any progress without a continually new confrontation with their own history. For example, questions concerning the nature of the mortal sins which must necessarily be submitted to the sacrament of penance in the form of a detailed confession, concerning the ecclesial aspect of penance and the sacrament of penance, concerning the nature of the so-called penitential service, etc. (cf., for example, my essay 'Bussandacht und Einzelbeichte': StdZ 190 (1972) 363-72), cannot be answered without a thorough study of the history of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

church penance. It is for this reason that the patristic studies in this volume are preceded by a brief survey of the history of penance as a whole. This context serves to clarify the significance and the distinctiveness of the view of each of the Fathers considered.

[ix] The revision of these essays is due to the necessary previous help of several friends and pupils. I wish to name expressly here: Herrn Dr Leo Karrer (Münster), Frau Dr Helga Modesto (München) and Fraulein Marlies Mugge (Hannover). My special obligation to P. K.-H. Neufeld is evident from the title of the book. Finally, I wish also to thank most sincerely Herrn Professor Dr Paul Mikat, who, as director of the Görres-Gesellschaft, energetically expedited the publication of this volume.

Karl Rahner

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[1]

PART ONE

Introduction

[3]

1

THE HISTORY OF PENANCE

At first sight, the notion of the 'history of penance' appears to be clear and comprehensible. Upon closer examination, however, its meaning becomes increasingly complicated. This is because penance itself, and when it is properly considered, is always essentially a historical phenomenon, since it implies alteration and change. Although there are other kinds of penance, the one with which we are concerned here is the Christian penance which we have frequently attempted to survey in contributions to various dictionaries.[1] For this reason it is obvious that very little new material is offered here. Indeed it would be useful and desirable for the reader of the present volume to have ready access to such a comprehensive treatment. It is only in the wider theological and historical context that the meaning of these studies will be fully understood and that they will be able to produce an impact far beyond that of a particular theme of the history of dogma, capable of interesting only a small number of specialists.

I. EXPLANATION OF THE NOTION AND OUTLINE OF THE PROBLEM

Penance is primarily and generally speaking man's moral and religious attitude in reaction to sin, given by Christ's grace. It is conversion to God and aversion from sin. Its specific and central act is sorrow, but, in addition, in its various forms it includes essentially absolutely all the interior and exterior attitudes of the Christian towards [4] what is called sin. It is evident, therefore, that a more precise notion of penance will correspond to the notion of sin and the [1] Cf. the following comprehensive articles by the author. They are partially repetitive. They also contain references to further literature:

'Busse, christl.' in: König, F., Religions-Wissenschaftliches Wörterbuch – Die Grundbegriffe (Freiburg/Br. 1956), pp. 142-44.
'Das katholische Verständnis von Sünde und Sündenvergebung im Neuen Testament und in der Busspraxis der alten Kirche' in: Die Sündenvergebung in der Kirche (Evgl. Akademie, Bad Boll – Akademie der Diözese, Rottenburg, 1958), pp. 33-50.
'Bussdisziplin, altkirchliche', pp. 805-15; 'Busse', pp. 815-18; 'Bussakrament', p. 826, in: LThK vol. II (Freiburg/Br. 1958).
'Die Busse' in: Kirche und Sakramente (QD 10) (Freiburg/Br. 1960), pp. 83-5.
'Penance' in: Sacramentum Mundi 4 (New York/London 1969), pp. 385-99.
'Pastoraltheologie des Busssacramentes' in: Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie vol. IV (Freiburg/Br. 1969), pp. 128-44 (this article includes references to the author's treatment of systematic and practical questions concerning penance which are not considered in the present volume).
'Penance' and 'Penance, Sacrament of' in Rahner/Vorgrimler, Dictionary of Theology, 2nd edn (New York 1981 [= Concise Theological Dictionary, London]), pp. 370-75.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

nature of justification. In the Christian view both sin and justification presuppose the effective revealing word of God himself. For his part, man must respond to his word with a zeal both for the fear of God and for his own authentic existence, despite all 'suppression'. This zeal, in its turn, is due to previous grace. It is only in this way that man can have the right attitude towards his past and with a willingness which is itself a gratuitous gift allow God's revealing word to destroy in him pharisaic self-righteousness and convince him of sin. As for the future, this experience produces the decision to renounce the permanent menace of sin and the determination to fight against it with the biblical means of prayer, fasting, almsgiving, etc.[2] In the effort to change his ways man places his confidence in God's grace which proves itself victorious in human weakness but is opposed by the desire and the world that is concupiscence. All this is naturally accompanied by the readiness to receive the sacrament of the forgiveness of sins as well as to suffer the consequences of sin. Likewise, it calls for cooperation in the fight against sin in the Church and the world, sharing in the burden of sin as it becomes manifest in misfortune and need and the intention to make satisfaction and expiation.

As all other Christian activity, this response to God's revealing word derives from God's unmerited grace and it is a tangible accomplishment of justifying faith and a participation in Christ's cross. The fact that, in the Christian view, sin is a free act of man and is guilt before God and that, conversely, penance is also man's freely undertaken aversion from his guilty act is not altered by the dependence of penance upon grace. Precisely because penance is necessary for salvation – it is the way in which God's free mercy grants salvation to the free creature[3] – its notion includes the freedom of the saving act; penance is the act of man which, nevertheless, clearly shows that it is God's action upon us that forgives sins and not sorrow, in so far as this sorrow on our part can and must be distinguished from God's activity.

In the Bible this attitude and its many expressions are covered by the notion of 'metanoia', the change of attitude, which is expressed and explained in tangible acts. For Christians this is first and foremost the radical decision which is expressed in baptism. Although, [5] in this case, the notion may be less explicit there is here an act of penance which, nevertheless, both according to the Church's tradition and of its very nature happens only once. This uniqueness is peculiar to the attitude of penance which is expressed in baptism. And this gives rise to the problem of relating the continuing, permanent attitude of Christian penance with the unique, definitive character of baptism. For there can be no doubt that when Scripture refers to penance it is always a matter of tangible, expressed acts and never exclusively of a purely interior attitude which would not be expressed exteriorly. Moreover, there is no reason to deny that even after baptism radical sins can be committed which can be countered only by a correspondingly radical act of penance. But this raises the question of the possibility of such an act of penance after baptism. If our view is correct, this possibility did exist at the time of the New Testament,[4] and it is here that the foundations of the Church's public treatment of this question lie. For it is reflected precisely in the New Testament in the form of a clear distinction between the universal exhortation to repentance and the proclamation that all sins are forgiven by God. Both are connected, however, since the whole being and activity of the Church is a denial of sin. The Church comes into its own as the judging and forgiving presence of Christ in a world of sin by the ministry of reconciliation, by exhorting men to [2] Cf. Matt. 6:1-18; 9:15; Mark 9:29.

[3] Cf. DS 1525-6; 1551-4.
[4] This is particularly clear in 1 Cor. 5:3-5 and 2 Cor. 2:5-11, even if the traditional exegesis of these passages is not correct. These passages also suggest a re-examination of the conclusion reached by H. Thyen in his work: Studien zur Sündenvergebung im Neuen Testament and Seinen Alttestamentlichen and jüdischen Voraussetzungen.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

allow themselves to be reconciled with God by God himself.[5] For man this entails a movement towards a new life, beginning with his conviction as a sinner in a variety of ways: in baptism as the basic sacrament of forgiveness,[6] in the celebration of the Eucharist as the memorial and proclamation of the Lord's death for the forgiveness of guilt,[7] in the Church's own confession of guilt,[8] in penance with prayer and fasting,[9] in concern for the concrete situation of the individual by prayer for the sinner,[10] in fraternal correction,[11] in the 'ostracization of the sinner' by an official,[12] if the fraternal exhortation has no effect, by an official reprimand[13] and, finally, by the act of the Church which is its strongest judging or, more properly, forgiving reaction to sin: the binding and the loosing of the sinner.

Just as, therefore, according to Scripture there are sins of the baptized – although it has not yet been considered how these sins are precisely described and classified – so according to the New Testament and the early Church there is a forgiveness of these sins. The idea that there is only one definitive forgiveness of guilt in baptism [6] and that every subsequent sin is either unforgivable or simply already forgiven by baptism in anticipation is entirely foreign to the New Testament. Just as sin or, more precisely, sinning can exist after baptism as something which need not and should not have happened, so there is also a forgiveness of sins after baptism. This is a new occurrence of God's grace, distinct from baptism, which, although it was promised in baptism, is still a grace and, therefore, cannot be derived from baptism with mechanical certainty but remains a new occurrence. Despite its high esteem of baptism, the New Testament recognizes that Christians do commit sins – from the every-day faults due to our weakness to scandals which do not occur even among pagans, including the perversion of the truth of the gospel and the reversion to paganism or Judaism.

II. THE HISTORY OF CHRISTIAN PENANCE

I. The Teaching of Scripture

But what is the basis for the Church's official attitude towards sin? For Catholic theology this relationship originates in an official authorization of the leaders of the community by Jesus which represents a specific and new expression of the effective proclamation of forgiveness to baptized Christians and which, therefore, according to Catholic understanding, provides the basis of specific sacrament independent of baptism.

In order to establish this teaching, the Council of Trent appealed principally to John 20 as the classical text for the institution of the sacrament of penance.[14] In my opinion, however, John's witness becomes much clearer and more enlightening in the setting of the life of the earliest community if Matthew 16 and 18 are taken as the starting-point. Moreover, this approach rejoins an old tradition; for, from the penitential controversies in Tertullian's day to the high Middle Ages, Matthew 16 and 18 were more frequently and explicitly adduced as [5] Cf. 2 Cor. 5:18 ff.

[6] Cf. Acts 2:38; Rom. 6; 1 Cor. 6:11.
[7] Cf. Matt. 26:28; 1 Cor. 11:26.
[8] Cf. Matt. 6:12.
[9] Cf. Matt. 6:1-18; 9:15; Mark 9:29.
[10] Cf. 1 John 5:16.
[11] Cf. Matt. 18:15.
[12] Cf. 2 Thess. 3:14.
[13] Cf. 1 Tim. 5:20.
[14] Cf. DS 1670. The council takes great care to formulate that Jesus instituted the sacrament praecipue by this saying.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the basis of the power of the keys in the sacrament of penance than was John 20. Indeed in the tradition the power of the keys was considered to be the power to forgive sins.

Furthermore, this practice has antecedents in the practice of imposing [7] a ban found in the synagogues and in the 'Rule of the Sect'[15] of Qumran, although its proper nature in the Christian setting can be determined only by the self-consciousness of the 'church' of Jesus, given by the Lord and its unity with him, precisely because of the institution of this new covenant. Because the Church is holy it must react with the ban against a member's sin which is incompatible with its own nature.[16]

Admission into the Church through baptism and reconciliation with it is the expression of reconciliation with God. Now, both in theory and in practice such a power for binding and loosing in the Church must be expected from the beginning. It is, therefore, irrelevant to ask how far the direct statements in Matthew 16 and 18 are influenced by the 'theology of the community'.

In fact, according to Matthew 16 and 18, the apostles and Peter, as those authorized by Jesus to be leaders of the Church, possess the power so 'to bind and to loose' that a corresponding act has validity also in 'heaven'. The idea that the sentence of an earthly judge has an effect in the other world in God's eyes was widespread at that time.[17] In this regard, the demonological background – in the original and generally accepted sense of this term – should not be overlooked.[18] Nevertheless, Matthew 18 shows very clearly that it is a matter of the power to impose or to lift a ban with regard to a brother who, by his behaviour, radically and obstinately opposes the nature of Jesus' community or who, conversely, wishes to be reconciled with it again. It is the authority to impose an exclusion which has real meaning before God and which places the guilty person outside the community of salvation that is the Church. Conversely, it is the authority to allow readmission into the Church which has meaning before God and which delivers man from the damning power of the devil. Thus the saving power of loosing has in fact the effect of forgiving the sins on account of which the ban was imposed. From the very nature of the case, this authority in the community can belong only to the authorized leaders of the Church, although their exercise of it is the act of the Church.[19] Provided that the notion of an effective, revelatory, that is, sacramental word, according to which what is said to a person happens to him, is not totally eliminated from the theology of the New Testament, the effect of this authority for man's salvation presents no more difficulties than the word of baptism or that of the eucharistic celebration.

[8] What is said in Matthew in more archaic expressions recurs in John 20:19-23 in a more familiar formulation. This latter coincides perfectly with Jesus' manner of speaking and is not at all specifically 'Johannine'. In order to continue Jesus' mission the apostles, and they alone, are endowed with the authority either to forgive[20] or to retain the sins of individuals (τιμων τα_φ α(μαρτι/αφ). Both of these actions do not merely express an already presupposed fact but have as a consequence that it really is before God as the apostles say. This authority to decide between two possible courses of action, each having its own effect,

---

[15] Cf. 1 QS VI 24-VII 25 in: J. Maier, Die Texte vom Toten Meer, 2 vols. (Munich/Basel 1960), vol. i, pp. 34-6.

[16] Naturally a thorough justification of the Church's power to forgive sins should not lose sight of the notion which the early Church had of Jesus' own power to forgive sins, as well as of the way in which he applied it. This notion of the early Church is particularly evident in Matt. 9:8, especially by comparison with Mark 2:12. In the present context, however, we must content ourselves with the simple reference to this vital connection.

[17] Cf. Strack-Billerbeck I 741-4.

[18] Jesus understands his power as a superior 'binding' force (Mark 3:27) which overcomes Satan by 'loosening' his bonds (1 John 3:8); cf. Luke 11:20 etc. He communicates a similar ε0χουσι/α to the disciples (Matt. 10:1). Paul also understands the ban in this way (cf. 1 Cor. 5:5; 2 Cor. 2:11; 1 Tim. 1:20).

[19] Cf. Matt. 18:17 and 1 Cor. 5:3 f.

[20] Similarly only the Son of Man has the power on earth really to forgive sins, even though only God is able to do this in fact; Mark 2:11-12 etc.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

cannot be identified either with the commission to preach the gospel of reconciliation to all men or the authority to baptize.[21] It must, therefore, here be a matter of what the text says: the authority exercised in a judicial decision either to forgive a member of the Church his sins so effectively that they are thereby also forgiven in God's eyes or to allow them to become effective as the cause of the ban. If the Church is not merely an external religious organization but the body of Christ[22] alive with the Spirit, then the loss of grace through sin entails necessarily also a change in the (continuing) relationship of the sinner to the Church. This change is 'confirmed' by the ban in the form of an exclusion from the Eucharist in every case of mortal sin.

2. The Teaching of the Fathers of the Church

The second century marks the end of the apostolic age.[23] It is in Hermas that we have the first theological reflection on this practice, although couched in obscure imagery. As long as the Church of this time is still developing, the person who, as a sinner, has alienated himself from it is able to be reincorporated into it and so find salvation.[24] In view of the imminent end of the world Hermas proclaims just one further possible penance, but he is by no means the first to open up this possibility, as if it did not exist previously. Hermas' once and for all penance[25] was subsequently detached from its original basis and became a principle of penitential practice, in the West for the whole of the patristic age,[26] although in the East only in Alexandria.[27] It did not, however, become a dogmatic principle. This tenet was later justified as a rule against a certain laxity within the Church, but without thereby depriving the sinner who falls again [9] of the possibility of salvation. Neither in Hermas[28] nor elsewhere[29] are schismatics, heretics or fornicators who are truly contrite excluded from reconciliation with the Church. There is no indication of capital sins which are fundamentally unforgivable. If one wished to introduce into the practice and theory of Christian penance in the second century the distinction between a forgiveness which is granted by God and one which is refused by the Church for its own legal reasons this would be purely arbitrary. Where the Church recognizes that God forgives, there it also recognizes its own right to grant full church forgiveness. And the view that God always forgives the person who is repentant is in evidence everywhere. This does not exclude the fact that, in the question of reconciliation or its refusal, individual Churches proceeded exceptionally according their own norm whereby they maintained that the proof of subjective repentance is seldom reached very quickly and [21] The person who is outside, that is, is not yet baptized, is not judged, that is, he does not have the ban imposed upon him; cf. 1 Cor. 5:9-13.

[22] Cf. DS 3807-8.
[23] The letter of Clement of Rome to the Church in Corinth, however, represents an important hinge-document (cf. 51.3 and 52.1). In the edn of the letter in the collection Sources Chrétiennes, p. 50, A. Jaubert says: 'Il semble que Clément n'ait eu qu'à puiser dans une mine toute préparée', by which she means the Jewish background, which she considers under the heading 'Courants pénitentiels'. On p. 51 she says: 'On pourrait a l'aide de ces passages reconstituer les textes et les exhortations qui servaient à une cérémonie pénitentielle dans la communauté chrétienne et l'on pourrait y joindre les passages qui ont pour thème la remonstrance au pécher.' These observations are important for an understanding of Hermas, since he too, according to the generally accepted view, is writing in Rome. This means that even if he were not already acquainted with the text of the letter of Clement, he must certainly have known the tradition which gave rise to this letter.
[24] Cf. Hermas, Sim. VIII 11.3; IX 21.3 f.; Mand. IV 1; Vis. III 7.6; Sim. IX 14,2 etc.
[25] Mand. IV 1.8; 3.6.
[26] From Tertullian, De paen. 7.11 up to can. 11 of the third synod of Toledo, AD. 589.
[27] Clement of Alex., Strom. II 13,57,1; Origen, Lev. 15,2.
[28] Sim. VIII 11; Mand. IV 1.8; 3.1-7 etc.
[29] Ignatius of Antioch; Dionysius of Corinth; Polycarp; Justin; Irenaeus; Clement of Alex.; etc.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

brought to bear aspects of church discipline which, according to the contemporary view, made readmission into the Church appear to be impossible, even given previous repentance. This explains why individual Churches[30] well into the fourth century refuse reconciliation to certain sinners in particular instances, even when this is not clearly demanded by the subjective unrepentance of the sinner. Nevertheless, the dogmatic question appeared only when the Church's right to reconcile those guilty of capital sins was contested as a matter of principle. In general, the refusal of one (first and final) reconciliation even on the death-bed[31] was tantamount to the cruelty associated with the Novatianists. Nevertheless, even the case of Cerdon[32] does not prove that the West recognized the possibility of several reconciliations.

The third century is marked by the two Western heresies on the subject of penance: Tertullian's Montanism and Novatianism. Neither of these is to be seen as the defence of an old radical rigorism against a gradual erosion of the unforgivable nature of capital sins (impurity, murder, apostasy). Rather, Tertullian invents the theory which elevates the old possibility of a practical-disciplinary rigorism to the absolute dogmatic obligation to exclude permanently those guilty of capital sins. In reaction to this, the Catholics appeal to the parallel with baptism,[33] to ancient practice and to the authorization by Christ according to Matthew l8.[34] They define their ancient practice in dogmatic-deliberated declarations as in a decree of the [10] metropolitan of Carthage and in the conclusions of the synods of Carthage[35] and Rome about the middle of the third century.[36] Apart from being a defence against Novatian, the lengthy and detailed synodal legislation in Cyprian's Africa is concerned not with the question of a fundamental possibility of reconciliation for apostates but with the practical administration of penance in different cases, as with the length of the period of penance, speedy reconciliation in danger of death, before martyrdom, etc. In the controversy between Hippolytus and Pope Callistus there seems only to have been a question of Callistus readmitting schismatic Christians to the Church without further performance of penance, while not enquiring whether they had committed other sins when they were in schism.[37] Moreover, the liturgy of Hippolytus recognizes that the bishop, in virtue of Christ's authorization of his apostles, can loosen every bond of evil.[38]

At this time also the form of penance is the penance of excommunication. The Church establishes that a person is a sinner and that he has, therefore, placed himself in opposition to the Church. Thus he is at least excluded from the Eucharist. If he confesses his sins privately before a bishop – which may be simply a way of inquiring whether his sins are really mortal sins and, therefore, have to be submitted to the penance of the Church[39] – and if he is truly sorry, then he is admitted to church penance proper. This access is already a sign of the Church's favour, but it is not yet reconciliation with the Church. The penitent is singled out by his dress, by his particular place in the celebration of the liturgy and by penitential obligations, such as fasting, etc. After some time he is reconciled with the Church by an imposition of hands on the part of the bishop (and of the clergy), accompanied by prayer and [30] For Africa cf. Cyprian, Ep. 55,21; for Spain: the synod of Elvira and still in A.D. 380 the synod of Saragossa; see DS 212.

[31] The council of Nicaea; DS 129. See also DS 212 and 236.
[32] Irenaeus, Adv.haer. III 4.3.
[33] Tertullian, De paen. 12.9.
[34] Not yet John 20; see Tertullian, De pud. 21.9.
[35] Cf. D 43.
[36] Cf. the texts in Mansi I, 921-34, as well as the results of more recent textual-critical investigations of these questions.
[37] Hippol., Phil. IX 12.
[38] Cf. G. Dix, The Treatise on the Apostolic Tradition of St. Hippolytus of Rome (London 1937), p. 5 (new edn 1972).
[39] Cf. Origen, In Ps. 37 hom. 2,6.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in the East sometimes even by an anointing which later evokes the idea of a repetition of confirmation. The performance of penance lasts different lengths of time: sometimes it comes to an end only on the death-bed,[40] but it could last only two weeks. In the latter case it would probably be preceded by a period of personal reform.[41] The necessity of a long-lasting personal penance was based on the not very clear idea that only baptism which is received once and for all is pure remission by grace (α)/φεσιφ) and that, therefore, later sins 'cannot be forgiven in the Church'[42] in this sense. Rather, such sins are to be expiated by the performance of personal penance (μετα&νοια) before God.[43]

[11] There is a clear awareness of the sacramental nature of church penance, in so far as the necessity of public church penance is stressed,[44] reconciliation with the official Church is considered necessary for salvation,[45] even for martyrs, and the renewed bestowal of the Holy Spirit is ascribed to the rite of reconciliation and not to subjective penance.[46] The access to the reconciliation with the Church, which itself reconciles men with God, is brought about by the bishop.[47] The intercession of confessors supports the sinners' personal penance and may, therefore, help to expedite reconciliation, but – given the definite episcopal structure of the Church at this time – it could not deprive the bishop of the last word. There is no trace of a 'private' sacramental penance. But the degree to which the official penance is made public may vary according to the circumstances. The effectiveness of reconciliation before God is explained with reference either to the infallibly efficacious prayer of the Church[48] or to the Church's authorization by Christ,[49] without a precise definition as to whether it is a matter either of the forgiveness of sins or of the communication of the Spirit. Sinners who are clerics are treated at this time still as other sinners. In theory it is recognized that all sins which destroy the grace of baptism should be submitted to church penance.[50] In practice, however, because of the difficulty of church penance and the view that it cannot be repeated, it is especially capital sins that require penance in this sense, although these sins are taken very broadly. Thus it is not only a question of apostasy, murder and adultery.[51]

In the following high patristic age it is above all the great legislative activity of synods, bishops (especially in the East) and popes in questions of penitential discipline that should be underlined. In the East are elaborated stages of penance, that is, a gradual exclusion or, conversely, readmission with regard to the liturgy and the Eucharist.[52] In the West there are also elaborated lasting consequences for the period after reconciliation, for example, the prohibition of marital intercourse, the interdiction of occupations which present a danger to morals, the impossibility of becoming a cleric.[53] Thus the duration of the actual period of penance becomes irrelevant and in the West it seems to be blended with Lent when, perhaps after a successful conversion, the actual church, liturgical celebration of penance was [40] Cf. the synod of Ancyra (A.D. 314), of Elvira and Toledo (A.D. 400), Siricius, Ep. 1, 3.6.

[41] Cf. Didascalia Apost. II 16,2.
[42] Herm. Mand. IV 3.3 f.; Tertullian, De paen. 7.10; Origen, Ex. 6.9.
[43] This is the meaning of Origen, De or. 28.
[44] Tertullian, De paen. 10-12.
[45] Cyprian, Ep. 66.5; 55.17; 72.2; Origen, Ios. 3.5; In Ps. 36,2.4.
[46] Cyprian, Ep. 57.4; cf. Ep. 15.1; 16.2; 17.2; Origen, Lev. 8.11; Didasc. Apost. II 41.2.
[47] Cyprian, Ep. 17.2; 43.3.
[48] Tertullian, De paen. 10.6.
[49] Tertullian, De pud. 21.
[50] Tertullian, De paen. 8; De pud. 9.
[51] Cyprian, Ep. 16.2; 17.2; 4.4; Origen, Lev. 14.2.
[52] It is only in this way that a full readmission to the Church can be realized, so that all the stages of penance are variations of the penance of excommunication.
[53] B. Poschmann, Busse und Letzte Ölung (HDG IV/3), p. 55.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

incorporated into the beginning of Lent.[54]

Nevertheless, the external form of the penitential discipline is, as [12] previously, the penance of excommunication. There is no form of a truly private sacramental kind either in the correptio secreta (= the dispensing with public liturgical reprimand, while it remains unclear whether church penance itself is abandoned because it is not practicable or whether the usual paenitentia publica is carried out without this reprimand)[55] or in other practices which are only adaptations of the one paenitentia publica to particular circumstances.[56] In any case, these practices do not appear to be sacramental. The sins which are subject to this penance are the same as before. In particular, the penitential legislation of the East makes it clear that the notion of capital sins should not be taken too narrowly but means everything that even today would normally be considered subjectively serious sin.

The West maintains even more radically that there is only a single possibility of church penance.[57] Here and there this principle is toned down by the clever use of casuistry in borderline cases.[58] In practice penance is more and more postponed to the death-bed and this practice is even approved;[59] synods[60] warn against undertaking church penance before a mature age, since this – because of the once and for all nature and the lasting consequences of church penance – would be bound to lead to insoluble conflicts.

Gradually special forms of penance are elaborated, such as penance for clerics, which consists of deposition from office (without a further performance of penance) and admission to the community of the laity,[61] or particular ways of reconciling heretics who, having been such from their birth, are reconciled by an imposition of hands without a further performance of penance.[62] Although here generally there is no explicit mention that a sacrament is involved, this is clearly attested with regard to penance. The Church is able to reconcile all contrite sinners; since Nicea[63] Novatianism is clearly tantamount to heresy and is explicitly attacked by the Fathers. In this controversy Christ's authorization of the Church to forgive is underlined and confirmed by the parallel with baptism.[64] Penance and reconciliation remit sins.[65] There is an awareness that both the public and the secret destroying of the relationship to the Church by sin is a forfeiting of salvation. Thus there is often an anxious effort to achieve reconciliation with the Church just before death.[66] In so far as the Church's activity is explained not only with reference to Christ's commission, the pax cum ecclesia is considered the means of [13] reconciliation with God. Reconciliation always means reconciliation with the Church and, therefore, the 'deprecatory formula of absolution' is to be regarded rather as the Church's support of subjective penance by its prayer.[67] The act of the bishop, in his official capacity, reincorporates the penitent fully into the Church, where he receives the [54] Innocent I, Ep. 1.7; Leo I, Sermo 45; 49.3.

[55] Cf. Augustine, Ep. 82.8,11.
[56] Thus, for example, heretics who were not actually guilty of heresy were reconciled immediately; the same applied to those who were seriously ill.
[57] Cf., Jerome, Ep. 80.9; Ambrose, De paen. 2; Augustine, Ep. 153,3,7; Siricius, Ep. 1.5.
[58] It is possible that at the point of death even the viatecum was administered, although without reconciliatio absolutissima; cf. for example Siricius, Ep. 1,5,6; Innocent I, Ep. 6.2; Leo I, Ep. 108.4; 167.13.
[59] Cf. Caesarius of Aries, Sermo 258.2; Avitus, Ep. 18; and others.
[60] For example, the council of Agde (A.D. 506) can. 15; the third council of Orleans (A.D. 538) can. 24.
[61] Cf. Siricius, Ep. 1,14.18; Basilius, Ep. 188 can. 3; Leo I, Ep. 167 inquis. 2.
[62] Cf. the council of Aries (A.D. 314) can. 8 (=DS 127); Siricius, Ep. 5.8; Augustine, Ep. 185.10; Leo I, Ep. 167 inquis. 19.
[63] Cf. DS 127, together with DS 183 and 216.
[64] For example Ambrose, De paen. I 8.36; Pacian, Ep. 3.7; Jerome, In or. III 12.
[65] Even in Augustine the remission of guilt is attributed explicitly to the action of the Church; cf. Sermo 96,6; In Io. tract. 49.24.
[66] Coelestin I, Ep. 4.2; Innocent I, Ep. 3.2; Augustine, Ep. 228.2; and others.
[67] Cf. below where it will be a question of the 'absolutions'; see DS 308-9; it is very clear in Augustine.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Holy Spirit, in so far as it is the Church of the sancti spirituales.[68] This applies even when the official is without the Spirit and, therefore, cannot himself give the Spirit. Occasionally[69] there may appear a purely declaratory view of the Church's activity, although in such texts it is not simply the subjective penance that is stressed as the necessary precondition of effective reconciliation.

With the end of the patristic age the transition to the new system of repeated 'auricular confession' becomes increasingly evident. In theory even now the ancient 'public' penance of excommunication remains in force. It is upheld, for instance, by the synod of Toledo in A.D. 589. But it is imposed by the Church, so long as the sinner is healthy, only in cases of public scandal. Generally it is received on the death-bed as penance of the sick. From the sixth century this then becomes the custom, indeed the legal obligation,[70] for all Christians, including the saints.[71] This death-bed penance loses its defamatory character, even though it is really only a secondary form of public penance. Where this public penance still takes place, the form, duration and obligations are the same as previously. Nevertheless, from the middle of the fifth century exceptional cases are made to perform penance in special groups after the fashion of the Eastern penitential stages.[72] At this time excommunication appears in some cases as a mere ecclesiastical penalty, separate from the whole of church penance, to be imposed and lifted independently without the involvement of actual church penance. This church penance remains to be performed on the death-bed after the excommunication has been lifted.[73] In the seventh century Spanish councils still refer to lasting consequences to which those who have undertaken penance are committed. Only when penance has been undertaken without necessity (that is, not in danger of death) can such a 'penitent' still become a cleric.[74]

From the sixth century in the islands of the Irish-Anglo-Saxon region, and from the beginning with the knowledge that this was different from the continental practice, church penance is not practised once and for all.[75] This fact has not yet been fully explained [14] with regard to its causes (the impracticability of the lasting consequences, the influence of monastic confession, etc.), but as a datum it is indisputable. Once given this practice, it was, on the one hand, impossible to impose a penance which had life-long consequences while, on the other hand, it was possible to subject less serious sins to church penance. It may very well be that these considerations actually gave rise to the practice.

In any case it was in this way that the performance of penance was able to be effective in life itself and not only on the death-bed. The sacrament could, therefore, again be productive in life itself without the necessity to change much of the ancient practice or theory. There was an awareness of the connection with the old form of church penance, all the more so as the early Church's legislation on the times for doing penance, on the duties, etc., were applied to the new form. The only innovation was that the repeated absolution was granted in a simple form by the priest and not in the solemn form by the bishop. Moreover, it was possible on any day and no longer only on Shrove Tuesday. In this sense also it was no longer 'public'. The frequency of confession and the variety of sins which were mentioned in confession necessitated a modification of the obligations which were imposed in penance. The old times for doing penance and the demands made upon the penitents had to be commuted and given [68] Augustine, Sermo 99.9; In Io. tract. 124.7; De civ. Dei XX 9.2; Sermo 71,23.37.

[69] Jerome, In Mt. III 16.19; Consultationes Zachaei et Apollonii n. 18; Gregory the Great, In ev.hom. II 26.6.
[70] Synod of Barcelona (A.D. 541) can. 9; Isidore of Seville, De eccl. off. II 17.6.
[71] Cf. Isidore of Seville in: PL 81.30-3.
[72] Felix III, Ep. 13; cf. J. Grotz, pp. 1-10.
[73] Cf. for example, Avitus of Vienne, Ep. 15 and 16.
[74] Thus the synod of Gerunda (A.D. 517) can. 9; the fourth synod of Toledo (A.D. 633) can. 54.
[75] Cf. the Paenitentiale Theodori I 13.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

substitutes, and thus originated the new kind of book used in the celebration of penance. In the seventh century, with the Irish-Scottish mission, the new system of penance came to the Continent.[76] In any event, the penitential of Columban[77] shows that it was there. Since the old form was practised almost only as penance of the dying, the new form had hardly any opposition. The penance books show that in the eighth century the new practice had spread all over the Continent.

3. The Theology of the Sacrament of Penance in Theologians Since the Twelfth Century

For the further development it is obvious that only a few basic trends and themes can be suggested.

Since the time when the currently accepted notion of the sacrament gave rise to the teaching that there were only seven sacraments, that is, about the middle of the twelfth century, penance also [15] belongs to their number. Alger of Lüttich[78] already cites penance under his notion of sacrament; Robert Pullus[79] attempts an explicit proof of its sacramental nature. Where the contemporary notion of sacrament is present – in the Sententiae divinitatis, in Simon Magister and the glossators of Gratian's Decree – penance is expressly taught as a sacrament. In local synods of the first decades of the thirteenth century the teaching is already presupposed as self-evident.[80] Never a doubt, capable of disturbing the practice, arose over the teaching received from the ancient tradition that this sacrament was absolutely necessary for those guilty of mortal sins, although this necessity was understood in different ways.[81] This remains true even in spite of certain expressions of the synod of Chalon-sur-Saône[82] which will later be quoted by canonists like Burchard of Worms and Gratian.[83] These expressions refer either to the questionable necessity of private confession, so long as the older form of penance still existed, or to the view that forgiveness was already obtained by sorrow before the still necessary sacrament was received. Nevertheless, individual canonists of the twelfth century questioned whether the paenitentia solemnis alone was an actual sacrament. The undisputed acceptance of the sacramental nature of penance did not, however, prevent scholastic theology up to the middle of the thirteenth century (up to Thomas Aquinas) from contesting that the priestly absolution effectively influenced the forgiveness of guilt as such (the reatus culpae). All the theologians of the twelfth century are above all convinced that true sorrow obtains the forgiveness of sins before confession.[84] In the period of High Scholasticism, until Thomas Aquinas inclusive, it was, therefore, considered normal, indeed obligatory, that a person should be justified already before the actual reception of the sacrament. This view gave rise to various insufficient theories on the effect of priestly [76] This is first attested by the synod of Châlons (between A.D. 639 and 654) can. 8; this point is, however, contested by C. Vogel (Cf. 'Bussbücher' in: LThK 2, 802-5).

---

[77] Liber de poenitentiarum mensura taxanda (end of 6th cent.) in: S. Columbani opera, ed. G. S. M. Walker (Dublin 1957); cf. J. Hennig, 'Kolumban' in: LThK 6,403 f.

[78] PL 180,886; cf. B. Geyer, 'Die Siebzahl der Sakramente in ihrer historischen Entwicklung' in: ThGl 10 (1918), pp. 325-48; sec especially p. 329.

[79] Sententiae PL 186,910.

[80] Mansi XXII 1110, 1173 ff., XXIII 396 f., 448.

[81] P. Anciaux, *La théologie du sacrament de pénitence au XII*e siècle (Louvain 1949), pp. 31-6, 164-274, 392-490.

[82] Can. 88; Mansi XIV 99.

[83] Cf. PL 140, 1011 and Gratian, De paen. I c. 90.

[84] Provided, however, that there is present the votum sacramenti; cf. Anselm, PL 158, 662; Bruno of Segni, PL 165,137; Abelard, PL 178,664 f.; Roland Bandinelli, according to: A. Gietl, Die Sentezen Rolands (Freiburg/Br. 1891), p. 248; the circle of the Victorines, PL 176, 565.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

absolution. The declaratory theory[85] teaches: the priestly absolution is the authoritative expression of the forgiveness which has already been given by God alone. Another theory[86] tries to find an effect of absolution in the other world: the Church does not indeed forgive guilt, but remits the eternal punishment[87] or changes God's conditional forgiveness of guilt into an absolute forgiveness.[88] It is first William of Auvergne, Hugo of St-Cher, William of Melitona, Bonaventure, Thomas[89] and subsequently theology in general who allow the forgiveness of sins to be an effect of the sacrament as such. At first they argued from the [16] long-recognized influence which absolution had on sorrow. Now, however, they no longer considered it from this psychological angle. Rather, they saw it as a sacramental cause of grace and thus having an effect on forgiveness, without, however, excluding or neglecting sorrow itself as a cause. The question was further complicated by the different theories (physical-dispositive, intentional-dispositive, effective) of sacramental teaching in general on the effect of the sacraments on grace. Thus until Thomas inclusive the personal and the sacramental events still remain interrelated (grace for sorrow). It is only in J. Duns Scotus that absolution effects the 'infusion' of justifying grace when there is present a sufficient sorrow (attritio), this being considered a mere moral *pre*condition. In this case the justifying grace is no longer communicated and received by an act which corresponds to its nature (genuine contrition). The theological progress attained in the thirteenth century is, therefore, quite clear and established for the future, although this was at the cost of a proper appreciation of the role of the person in the theology of grace and the sacraments. Following in the footsteps of Thomas Aquinas, theology today ought to rediscover this appreciation.

For Thomas from the beginning, as for an even earlier tradition, the sacramental sign consists of the acts of the penitent, considered as the matter, and the absolution, considered as the form of penance. It is only in the Summa theologica III q. 84 a. 1-3; q. 86 a. 6 that he ascribes within this whole an effect of the matter upon grace. Res et sacramentum is the paenitentia interior.[90] The penitent has to produce such a sorrow[91] that he approaches the reception of the sacrament already justified. If he is lacking this sorrow bona fide, although he seriously turns away from sin, then – provided that sin poses no obstacle – his attitude is perfected by the justifying grace given by the sacrament and changed to contritio: ex attritio fit contritus.[92] The justifying sorrow must, however, be sustained by the corresponding grace and even consists of the existential acceptance of the infused grace. This grace is communicated by the act of acceptance, and therefore the instrumental causality of the sacramental sign – if it is correctly understood – refers not to an ornatus animae[93] but only to the justifying grace itself. Thus the place remains open for res et sacramentum in Thomas' terms: either it does not exist as a distinct entity or it must be something other than the paenitentia interior. This also fits in well with the fact that in the Summa Thomas seems to [85] Anselm, PL 158, 662; Abelard, PL 178, 664 f.; Peter Lombard, IV Sent. d. 17 c.1; William of Auxerre, cf. V. Heynck, in: FStud 36 (1954), pp. 47-57 f.; Alexander of Hales, cf. P. Schmoll, Die Busslehre der Frühscholastik (Munich 1909), pp. 146-50; Albert the Great, cf. ibid., pp. 133 f.

[86] This was the view held by the Victorines.
[87] Cf. Hugh of St Victor, PL 176,564.
[88] Cf. Richard of St Victor, PL 196,1165; Praepositinus, cf. Schmoll (Anm.85), pp. 83-8.
[89] The precise evidence for this is provided by V. Heynck, 'Zur Busslehre des hl. Bonaventura' in: FStud 36 (1954), pp. 1-81.
[90] Thus already Guido of Orchelles, William of Auxerre, Alexander of Hales, William of Meitona, Bonaventure and Albert the Great.
[91] This is already the effect of the power of the keys, working in advance; thus Albert the Great, as opposed to Alexander of Hales and Bonaventure.
[92] At the time in question, this teaching was practically universally accepted; cf. Peter Lombard, IV Sent.d. 22 q. 2a. I sol. 3.
[93] This is what Thomas Aquinas, in his youth and with regard to his general sacramental teaching, saw and taught as the immediate, dispositive effect, that is, the res et sacramentum.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[17] have abandoned the dispositive view of the effect of the sacraments on grace in favor of an instrumental-effective view.[94]

In the Patristic period since Tertullian ceremonial confession was already increasingly stressed as a necessary presupposition of the celebration of church penance. Even here, however, there is a development both in theory and in practice. Since the Fathers of the Church considered confession to be rather the natural presupposition for the undertaking of church penance – being the expression of attentiveness and the occasion of exhortation[95] – with the introduction of more frequent penance it becomes noticeable for light and secret sins as well as for the more serious and public ones. Thus confession itself becomes, as it were, an actual penitential work with expiatory value, to such an extent that a further confession is considered to be a penitential obligation. The shame involved in making the confession effects reconciliation for the penitent. Whereas in the early period satisfaction was the basic theme of penance, from the eighth century this becomes the confession; this remains the case, but at the time of the Reformation it received particular emphasis. Penance becomes 'confession'.[96] For a long time the obligation to confess lacked a solid basis and was by no means always justified by the ex institutione sacramenti of the Council of Trent.[97] From the twelfth century onwards it is sorrow and its relationship with absolution that becomes the main theme of the scientific-theological study of penance.

It remains to be noted that the whole of early and high scholasticism handed on the teaching of the patristic period, according to which one effect of the sacrament is reconciliation with the Church. This is universally verifiable for the eleventh and the twelfth centuries.[98] This idea is still found in Bonaventure,[99] in Hugo Ripelius' Compendium theologicae veritatis and in Thomas,[100] although it later disappears. The doctrine, levelled at Wycliffe and Hus, that the sinner still belongs to the Church, because it was an unqualified generalization, must have obscured this insight. But even Luther was still aware both of the ecclesial aspect of sin and its forgiveness[101] and of its connection with the strictly theological aspect of these realities. Today this idea is clearly becoming increasingly accepted (B. Xiberta, B. Poschmann, M. de la Taille, H. de Lubac, M. Schmaus, et al.) and has been endorsed by Vatican II.[102]

This survey explains the meaning and the significance of the studies [18] contained in this volume. They present, as it were, cross-sections of the institution of penance and of its

---

[94] On the special question of Thomas Aquinas' teaching on penance, cf.: R. M. Schultes, Reue und Busse (Paderborn 1906); P. de Vooght, 'La justification dans le sacrement de pénitence d'après saint Thomas d'Aquin' in: EThL 5 (1918), pp. 225-56; id., 'À propos de la causalité du sacrement de pénitence. Théologie thomiste et théologie tout court' in: EThL 7 (1930), pp. 663-75; R.Marine, 'La reviviscenza dei meriti secondo la dottrina del dottore Angelico' in: Gr 13 (1932), pp. 75-108; H. Bouillard, Conversion et grâce chez saint Thomas d'Aquin (Paris 1944); G. N. Rus, De munere sacramenti paenitentiae in aedificando corpore Christi ad mentem S.Thomae (Rome 1944); M. Flick, L'attimo della giustificazione secondo S.Tomaso (Rome 1947); Ch.R. Meyer, The Thomistic Concept of Justifying Contrition (Mundelein 1949); P. de Letter, 'Thomistic Theology of Sacramental Forgiveness' in: Bijdragen 13 (1952), pp. 401-9.

[95] It occurred first as 'exhomologesis'.

[96] It appears as the title of a specific writing: confessio sacramentalis in Peter of Blois; cf. PL 207,1077-92.

[97] It was justified, for example, with reference to the OT or by appeal to Jas. 5. In some canonists, however, as the Glossa ordinaria on Gratian and Nicholas de Tudeschis, the obligation to confess is derived only from the law of the Church; cf. on this point P. Anciaux, *La théologie da sacrement de pénitence au XII*e siècle (Louvain 1949).

[98] Cf. P. Anciaux (n.97); A. Landgraf, 'Sünde und Trennung von der Kirche in der Frühscholastik' in: Scholastik 5 (1930), pp. 210-47.

[99] According to him the indicative part of the formula of absolution has precisely this effect.

[100] Cf. Thomas Aquinas, IV Sent. d. 16 p. 1 a. 2; q. 5 dubium.

[101] Cf. WA I 539.

[102] Vatican II, Lumen Gentium (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church) II; cf. A. Grillmeier's commentary on the passage in: 'Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil I' (LThK) (Freiburg/Br. 1966), pp. 187-8.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation theology which, at the same time, show in the sources discussed a certain corresponding theoretical and practical position on the attitude towards sin. This result is no substitute for either the systematic or the pastoral-theological and pastoral consideration of penance; for this consideration the reader is here referred to the relevant text-books and manuals. Nevertheless, we consider that research into the history of dogma is not irrelevant to contemporary objective and practical questions in connection with penance. Although this point cannot be developed properly here, it should not be overlooked.

III. RESEARCH INTO THE HISTORY OF PENANCE

Finally, something must be said about a part of the research into the history of dogma; this is because our studies belong to a context which perhaps today is no longer very well known. Moreover, the individual studies originated, more or less, in the discussion with other views,[103] to which we ourselves owe a great deal, both where we have agreed and where we have differed. Every scholar knows that, roughly speaking, about the turn of the century the question of penance belonged to those themes which were most contested in apologetics and theological controversy. Indeed, the institution of penance was taken, not entirety without justification – although this view would need to be modified today – as the key to understanding the Catholic view of the Church, as the basis for the differences in the consideration and the understanding of God's saving work, of man's vocation and freedom, etc., in the not infrequently passionate discussions between Catholic and Protestant theologians. Whereas other questions remained in the background and, in any case, received only occasionally a detailed treatment with the new means of historical research, from the beginning the theme of penance was the centre of attraction. One has to see clearly the role which A. von Harnack, for instance, ascribes to penance, penitential discipline and the sacrament of penance for the development of the Catholic view of the Church and of dogma in History of Dogma. Thus it is not surprising if this question held a dominant position in theology up to the end of the First World War. Our bibliography alone should be a sufficient proof of this fact.

[19] It was only in the years between the two World Wars, however, that Catholic theology found, in a certain detachment from immediate controversy, the opportunity for those fundamental studies[104] with which our essays are immediately connected. First of all, B. Poschmann's Paenitentia secunda[105] must be mentioned here. This is a huge study in the history of dogma, objective, precise, with a scientific analysis of the individual texts and a creative dependence on previous literature. The preparations began before the First World War. Thus it is a question of a slowly maturing work. Because of this growth, the eventual result was, already in 1940 – the year of its publication – not surprisingly new. In the main lines of his development Poschmann adheres to the notion already expounded by Esser, Stufler, d'Alès and Galtier. This involves the clear rejection of the theory that there was ever a time in the Church as a whole when certain sins were totally excluded from the celebration

[103] For the details, see the following essays themselves. For the moment, we shall content ourselves with the observations which we consider essential for an appreciation of the orientation of our own work.
[104] Of special importance in this regard are G. Bardy, H. von Campenhausen, P. Galtier, to mention but a few alongside B. Poschmann and the important work of J. Grotz. For the details of the relevant literature, see the bibliography.
[105] Even today this book, which appeared in 1940 in Bonn, is still considered a standard work, offering a most useful introduction to our subject.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of church penance. Neither Hermas' penitential teaching[106] nor the bishop's decree in Tertullian or the moderation in Cyprian should, therefore, be construed as fundamental alterations with regard to the earlier penitential teaching. The same applies even with regard to the earlier penitential practice. Poschmann, however, examines this view again with reference to the texts and defends it convincingly against recent divergent interpretations of the history of penance (especially by H. Koch). In several secondary questions of the history of dogma Poschmann has been widely accepted by Catholic scholars. Thus today the episcopus episcoporum of Tertullian is no longer simply identified with the bishop of Rome, nor is the effort made to discover at this time a sacramental penance which was not paenitentia publica. Poschmann also took up Xiberta's insight that the pax cum ecclesia is the res et sacramentum of divine forgiveness and the means of grace. He has developed this idea with greater historical precision and has shown that, on this assumption, many historical difficulties can be resolved easily and in a way that is dogmatically unobjectionable. Nevertheless, we believe that, by having recourse to Matthew 16 and 18, we have reached a better basis than Poschmann and Xiberta, by which, it is also possible to eliminate a certain vague terminology[107] which is found in Poschmann. For the sake of this clarity, one ought not, even in a historical work, simply to refrain from detailed dogmatic references,[108] such as we have made here repeatedly in this survey, without, however, wishing to enter into an actual systematic exposition of penance. [20] In our opinion there is also lacking in Poschmann the clear emphasis on the fact that Christian penance developed primarily and exclusively as paenitentia publica with all its external and juridical character. He does not explain either why it took so long to realize which sins cause a loss of the Spirit (of grace) in the individual.[109] It is by reflecting on this question that it becomes understandable how, when the number of such sins was originally so small, the institution of penance assumed a form which, when the number of those sins which were subject to penance increased, could no longer be maintained and therefore had to be changed.

Because of the unfavourable time at which it appeared, Poschmann's work was unable to produce an immediate effect. The shift in emphasis in theological work in general after the war from the historical approach to the more speculative approach prevented two further studies by Poschmann from entering the limelight. Nevertheless, they complete the work of this exponent of the history of penance in the early Church and in the early Middle Ages, and they mark a stage in the research for Catholic theology which even today must still be considered fundamental. In 1948 appeared Der Ablass im Licht der Bussgeschichte[110] and three years later Busse und Letzte Ölung in the Handbuch der Dogmengeschichte.[111] A few appropriate remarks are made here on both of these publications. In the first-mentioned study it is obvious that only the ideas on the history of penance are of interest here, while the [106] With regard to Hermas, R. Joly has recently propounded yet another view which does not involve the complete rejection of the 'penance jubilee' theory. If we understand his justification of his position aright, then it is really the mere number of proponents of this view, considered quantitatively, that has forced him to his own compromise. It is our contention that an examination of the context in which Hermas wrote, together with the traditions with which he could have been connected in his Roman milieu, ought to decide the question clearly today. In any event, the proposed compromise is hardly convincing.

[107] Cf. on this point Poschmann, p. 12, where the peace with the Church 'effects' peace with God and coincides with it 'in fact', if not also 'formally'; or p. 485, where the pax cum ecclesia is rejected as 'efficient cause' and accepted only as the 'presupposition or condition' of divine forgiveness. This dogmatic formulation is not very felicitous.

[108] We have in mind here such questions as: in what sense is the person guilty of mortal sin outside the Church; what part does (the ancient penance of) excommunication play in this regard; how is the ordering of the different effects of church reconciliation to be construed logically?

[109] Cf. on this point chap. 2 in this volume, 'Sin as Loss of Grace in Early Church Literature'.

[110] B. Poschmann, Der Ablass im Licht den Bussgeschichte (Theophaneia 4) (Bonn 1948).

[111] B. Poschmann, 'Busse and Letzte Ölung' (HDG IV,3) (Freiburg/Br. 1951).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

application to the history of indulgences lies outside the scope of our present discussions.[112]

In this work Poschmann presents first of all the elements of the early Church's teaching on penance: the necessity of subjective repentance for sins committed after baptism as a factor in the remission of sins, with no distinction made between guilt and punishment; the support of this subjective repentance by the cooperation of the Church (community, martyrs, charismatics, etc.) and, especially, by the intercessory prayer of the priests which must be distinguished from the proper act of reconciliation with the Church and thereby with God, and which should not be construed as absolution with the deprecative formula in the modern sense. Next are considered in detail the nature, the forms and the effects of 'absolutions' in the early Middle Ages, both outside and inside the sacrament of penance. These 'absolutions' are the authentic continuation of the priestly intercession for the sinner and, despite the repeated appeal [21] to apostolic authority and the power of the keys which they contain, they are to be interpreted as an intercessory prayer, albeit authoritative, of the Church for complete forgiveness of the sins of the penitent which includes the remission of the punishment of sins, but not as the infallible act of jurisdiction granting freedom from the temporal punishment of sin.

This interpretation is based on the occurrence of these 'absolutions' (even quite early) outside the sacrament (especially even in the case of 'general absolutions'), on their style and their involved clauses, as well as on the early scholastic theories concerning the nature and the range of priestly activity in the sacrament of penance. Poschmann takes this opportunity to bring out the historical and theoretical factors which have contributed to the change in the institution of penance from public to private penance with the anticipation of reconciliation before the performance of church penance. This leads to the formal distinction between the actual guilt of sin and the punishment due to it, so that now the subjective penance is more clearly related to the remission of the temporal punishment due to sin, and the absolutions are considered as the Church's assistance in the remission of these punishments. The absolution is the successor of the early Church's priestly penitential intercession. It is essentially intercessory and ought not to be identified simply and formally with actual reconciliation. For Poschmann even here it is the pax cum ecclesia that is the res et sacramentum of the forgiveness of guilt before God. Thus the intercessory formula in no way formally represents the act of reconciliation as such. Poschmann, however, saw in this teaching of the early Church only an obsolete theory which is useful for the explanation of ancient penitential practices from the point of view of the history of dogma but which cannot command an important place in contemporary theology. Thus Poschmann's otherwise important studies have had only an indirect influence on Vatican II's re-valuation of this teaching for our time.[113] Nevertheless, it is obvious that the parallel – if temporally distinct – development of the institution of penance and indulgences from the viewpoint of the history of dogma, as far as their basis in Scripture, the notion of a juridical act, etc. are concerned, can help to renew and contribute to a further explanation of church penance. In this sense the results of Poschmann's study of the history of indulgences from the viewpoint of the history of dogma, although they [22] are sometimes superficial, still today represent a good starting-point for further studies.

Poschmann himself set the pace in this field with his sketch of the theology of penance in the history of dogma which in an admirable way presents very succinctly the state of research as it was at the beginning of the fifties. This work comprises a vast amount of fact, detail of sources and literature, and personal scholarship. Its main lines have already been developed [112] Cf. ZKTh 71 (1949), pp. 481-90.

[113] The person who should be named directly in this regard is rather M. de la Taille, who has shown courageously that the early Church's notion of penance is more justifiable than today's and is in accordance with the teaching of Trent on penance. H. de Lubac, M. Schmaus and others have made similar contributions.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

above, and they have been widely accepted. Since its appearance this survey has obviously become obsolete on individual points here and there,[114] for instance, on the point that the position of Thomas Aquinas in the question of penance was not that of a complete innovator, as it was understood for a long time. But this does not alter at all the over-all value of Poschmann's work: it is even today still the best comprehensive presentation of the whole of the history of penance.

As far as older studies are concerned, the readers are here referred to book reviews.[115] The discussion with J. Grotz, Die Entwicklung des Bußstufenwesens in der vornicänischen Kirche is in our essay, 'The Penitential Teaching of the Shepherd of Hermas'. Research on individual points has obviously progressed until the present day and, despite the revision of the present essays, it has not everywhere received the attention which it perhaps might have deserved. Moreover, we did not think it appropriate to deprive these studies of the character which they have from their origin.

Useful editions of texts, like the collection of H. Karpp,[116] and increasing scientific collaboration even on this question[117] make it clear that there is a new interest in the history of penance. Moreover, pastoral and pastoral-theological demands and many actual serious discussions in this field evince a readiness in the life of the Church to reach new forms. If these new forms are to bring a real deepening of appreciation and new vitality, then one cannot dispense with a serious awareness of what the history of penance is and of its importance.

[114] Cf. V. Heynck, 'Zur Busslehre des hl. Bonaventura' in: FSt 36 (1954), pp.1-81.
[115] Cf. our reviews of P. Galtier, De Paenitentia; E. F. Latko, 'Origen's Concept of Penance' in: ZKTh 72 (1950), pp. 116-18; and of C. Vogel, 'La discipline penitentielle en Gaule' in: ZKTh 76 (1954), p. 498; etc.
[116] H. Karpp, Die Busse. Quellen zur Entstehung des altkirchlichen Busswesens (Traditio Christiana I) (Zurich 1969).
[117] Pastoral practice and pastoral psychology give rise to a whole range of questions which suggest the need for new forms of penance. In this connection we could mention other questions, concerning authority, freedom, sociological conditions, which are discernible outside the religious sphere, for instance, even in criminal law. All these questions are directly relevant in the field of education. These few observations must suffice to show – contrary to what might be a first impression – the various dimensions which our question has today.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[23]

2

SIN AS LOSS OF GRACE IN EARLY CHURCH LITERATURE

Every Catholic treatise of dogma considers in the section on grace or in the section on sin the loss of sanctifying grace as the consequence of actual serious sin and the essence of habitual sin. Fundamental to all the considerations of this question is the affirmation that there are sins which deprive the justified person of the interior personal grace, received at the moment of justification. However this assertion may be formulated, it is at the basis of the Catholic notion of the essence of serious sin. The personally culpable loss of sanctifying grace is the specific mark of serious sin which the justified person commits. This study[1] is an attempt to cast a little light on the historical beginning of this teaching of faith. It is intended as a contribution to the history of dogma, which has previously had little to say about this teaching,[2] at least as far as the explicit and directly posed question is concerned. It is also a contribution to the method of presenting this teaching in Catholic dogmatic treatises which in this question content themselves in general with very flimsy arguments from Scripture and the Fathers of the Church.[3]

---

[1] This essay, although revised, appeared first in: ZKTh 60 (1936), pp. 471-510. This explains both the rudimentary nature of the theme and the elementary way in which it is developed. If it were tackled afresh today it is obvious that all the published works which have appeared in the meantime on the relevant exegetical, textual critical and hermeneutical questions would have to be considered. It was, however, that original approach, in the form which we have preserved, that instigated and, to a certain extent, determined the author's studies on the history of penance which are collected together in this volume. It ought, therefore, to serve principally both as a clarification of the question in hand and as an announcement of our main theme, and this precisely in the form in which it affected both historically and in fact the subsequent studies. Thus the author is perfectly aware that this essay, if undertaken in today's circumstances, would have quite a different appearance. For the same reason, the reader of all these present studies must bear in mind their original historical context.

[2] After an intense, but only brief, interest in questions concerning the history of penance in the 40s and the beginning of the 50s – an interest which, however, was unable to make any special impact on theology in general – studies on this theme have become rare in recent years. Even these generally concern the pastoral aspect and do not allow much weight to the systematic-dogmatic side. This observation alone, therefore, provides some justification for the history of dogma today. Mention should be made, however, of the specialist works of B. Poschmann, Paenitentia secunda (Bonn 1940); id., Busse and Letzte Ölung (HDG IV,3) (Freiburg/Br 1951); J. Grotz, Die Entwicklung des Busstufenwesens in den vornicänischen Kirche (Freiburg/Br. 1955); G. Teichtweier, Die Sündenlehre des Origenes (Regensburg 1958); C. Vogel, Le pécheur et la pénitence dans l'Eglise ancienne (Paris 1966).

[3] Cf. on this point: S. Schiffini, Tractatus de gratia divina (Freiburg/Br. 1901), n.342; G. Lahousse, De gratia divina (Brugge 1902), n.326 ff.; C.Mazzella, De gratia Christi (Rome 1905), n.1102 f., 1112 f.; Chr. Pesch, Praelectiones dogmaticae V (Freiburg/Br. 1916), n.372 f.; id., Compendium theologiae dogmaticae III (Freiburg/Br. 1941-2), n.319; J. M. Herve, Manuale theol. dogm. (Paris 1925) II, n.65; B. Beraza, De gratia Christi (Bilbao 1929), n.951; H. Lange, De gratia (Freiburg/Br. 1929), n.467, 471; H. Lennerz, De gratia redemptoris (Rome 1934), p. 260; H. Rondet, Gratia Chnisti (Paris 1948); L. Lercher, Instit. theol. dogm. III (Innsbruck 1951), n.644; M. Schmaus, Kath. Dogmatik III/2 (Munich 1951), pp. 234-9; J. Pohle/J. Gummersbach, Lehrbuch der Dogmatik II (Paderborn 1956), p. 783 f.; J. Brinktrine, Die Lehre von den Gnade (Paderborn 1957), p. 208 f.: L. Ott, Grundriss der kathol. Dogmatik (Freiburg/Br. 1957), p. 318 f.; A. A. Tanquerey, Synopsis theologiae dogmaticae II (Paris/Rome 1959), n.171; F. Diekamp/K. Jüssen, Kath. Dogmatik (Münster 1959), p. 564 f.; H. Lais, Dogmatik I (Kevelaer 1965), p. 236.

Of its very nature, the question which we are considering does not concern a specifically Catholic problem. It is all the more surprising, therefore, that the corresponding manuals on the Protestant side normally do not even touch on the question. It is only exceptionally, and even then in a rudimentary form, that some information is found, as in W. Elert, Den christliche Glaube (Berlin 1940), p. 592 ff. [Das Problem der Perseveranz (in der Rechtifertigungsgnade)]; W. Trillhaas, Dogmatik (Berlin 1962), pp. 197, 203 f.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

I. THE QUESTION

Already according to the New Testament the Christian, by his baptism, has left the kingdom of this world, the kingdom of darkness. He has died to sin and has become a child of knowledge and freedom, [24] who must lead a new life, who must and can allow the holiness given to him in baptism to become effective in a morally perfect way of life. Nevertheless, however great and good this new life of grace given by baptism and confirmation may be, however radically and far it separates the sanctified person from sin, it still remains threatened by sin. Even the Christian, the 'saint', can sin. The New Testament is acutely aware of the irreducible opposition between this new life and sin, and stresses it so strongly that one almost receives the impression that for the person in grace sin has become completely impossible (cf. I John 3:9). Nevertheless, it is just as keenly aware of the danger of sin which still threatens even the saint. It mentions sins and vices which occur among Christians. It exhorts, warns and continually threatens in order to preserve the saints, body, soul and spirit, from sins. All this inevitably raises the question of God's attitude towards the Christian's sin, towards the sinful Christian or-in other words-of the effects of the Christian's sin.

In order to see clearly by means of a historical approach what the New Testament and the Fathers of the Church teach about the Christian's sin, one ought not to consider the effects of sin without any differentiation and simply as a whole, as still happens in the textbooks of dogmatic theology on this question. This is the case when statements to the effect that sin begets death, that the sinner does not have life, that he has been rejected, that he will not inherit the kingdom of God or that he has lost righteousness are simply taken as expressions of one and the same truth: serious sin entails the lost of sanctifying grace. The undifferentiated use of all these phrases as a proof of the truth in question already, at first sight, appears questionable. If one wishes to trace the history of this truth in the available literature, then one must consider the different effects of sin separately.

Both from the nature of the case and from the historical data there are three different ways of considering the effects of sin. The first is the juridical-ethical or moral approach. In it sin is considered a transgression of the divine law, by which man becomes morally inferior and bad, antagonizes God and provokes his anger, offends against God's holiness and justice, causes a scandal both for his fellow Christians and for non-Christians, burdens himself with guilt before God, etc. These and similar ways of speaking about sin have this in common that they all, in one way or another, pin-point the juridical and ethical side of sin in the different relationships of this [25] sin to God, to other men and to the sinner himself. Without wishing to deny the real differences of meaning between these various expressions one can say that they represent a juridical-ethical or moral approach to sin and its consequences.

The second approach we would call the end-of-time or eschatological approach. The person who sins incurs God's judgement; he renders himself liable to eternal death and does not arrive at the final resurrection. He will not inherit the kingdom of God and will be punished with hell-fire. He will not obtain salvation, etc. These and similar expressions attempt to explain the nature and the consequences of sin with reference to man's final destiny. Thus they can be grouped together to represent the eschatological approach.

In any event, in all these studies the earliest development of the teaching of the loss of grace through sin, as this is evinced in very sparse indications, is completely overlooked. Nevertheless, these indications may very well represent notions such as those which H. Thyen attempts to derive and prove in Studien zur Sündenvergebung im Neuen Testament und seinen altestamentlichen und jüdischen Voraussetzungen (Göttingen 1970).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The third approach is from the point of view of grace. The person who sins destroys the life which he has received in baptism; he expels the Spirit from his innermost being and destroys the seal which he received in baptism. He is already dead. Such expressions describe the immediate consequences of sin for the Christian's life of grace, for his own interior grace. It is in this sense that we speak of an approach to the consequences of sin from the viewpoint of grace.

There are two conclusions to be drawn from this simple distinction. In the first place, these different approaches are really closely linked together. All three correspond necessarily to the very nature of sin. For this reason it is naturally sometimes difficult to assign a particular expression describing the consequences of sin clearly and surely to one of the approaches. In practice these approaches often overlap one another. When, for instance, 'death' is mentioned as a consequence of sin it is not always easy to say whether 'eternal death' means damnation (the eschatological viewpoint) or the death of friendship with God (the juridical-ethical/moral viewpoint) or spiritual death as the loss of interior grace (the grace viewpoint). One can justifiably assign such an expression to the third approach (from the point of view of grace), this being the least evident, only when one has already clearly verified the occurrence of such expressions in this sense in the author in question.

Secondly, once the inner connection of these three groups of expressions is presupposed in dogmatic theology, all of them have the same value in practice for a dogmatic proof in a particular question, and one can take the place of the others. When in the Bible, for instance, the consequence of a sin is described in one of the three ways, then this description can be used as a proof that in the case in [26] question it is a matter of serious sin according to the Bible. Similarly, from one group one can deduce the others. Nevertheless, from the point of view of the present essay, it is important to distinguish these three groups clearly.

Although for speculative dogmatic theology this distinction may have only little value, for the establishment of the historical course taken by the teaching of the consequences of sin it is inevitable and of the greatest importance. The real and objective connection between the different consequences of sin is one thing; the knowledge of this connection quite another. The knowledge of one particular consequence can be more explicit in the consciousness of the faithful than the knowledge of another consequence. The awareness of the connection between the three consequences can itself be obscured, and it is possible that, for various reasons, only one particular consequence is continually stressed and the others not even mentioned. Also, as far as this objective awareness is concerned, it is easy to think of the juridical-ethical and the eschatological approaches as being connected. The approach from the point of view of grace, on the contrary, stands out clearly from the two others and can even recede into the background before them.

These apparently purely a priori distinctions and possibilities have, however, had a concrete historical form. In the course of the period of time which we are here considering, i.e. from the New Testament until the middle of the third century, we can observe a real shift in the use of the three kinds of expressions. More precisely, the approach from the point of view of grace – together with its associated expressions – is, at first, scarcely present. It then receives attention, is more clearly formulated and, finally, forms the starting-point for new theological reflections. This is always the clearest sign that a truth has become both clearly grasped conceptually and a sure, undisputed and generally recognized fact. The course and the causes of this development must now be expounded in greater detail.

II. THE NEW TESTAMENT

The teaching of the New Testament on the consequences of serious sin can be resumed

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

briefly as follows: the juridical-ethical and the [27] eschatological consequences are clearly and strongly stressed, whereas the meaning of sin for the interior state of grace acquired by faith and baptism is hardly touched upon or – if it is – receives no emphasis and is mentioned only in passing.

I. The Juridical-Ethical and the Eschatological Approaches

Jesus' teaching on judgment and hell as the punishment for sin[4] is stressed remarkably strongly and emphatically by the synoptics. The Lord refers repeatedly to these consequences of sin. Because the teaching on grace receives very little emphasis in these Gospels it is not surprising that this view on the consequences of sin does not envisage Christians who are in a state of grace. Nevertheless, the early Christian literature, immediately following the New Testament, shows how powerfully effective the idea instigated by Jesus' teaching was that God's judgement and eternal damnation are terrifying punishments even for the sins of Christians. Already in Jesus' discourses on the judgement his return, the day of judgement and the damnation of the wicked are intimately connected. This triad represents the last things also in the teaching of the Apostle's letters and in the Johannine writings. Here, too, God's judgement, damnation and eternal death are taught as the fruit of sin.[5] Likewise, the consequences of sin are viewed eschatologically in Paul's catalogues of vices.[6] Sin is not explained as being incompatible with grace, but it is stated: θεου= βασιλει/αν ου0 κληρονομη/σουσιν.[7]

2. The Approach from the Point of View of Grace

Besides the texts which present juridical-ethical or eschatological perspectives for considering the consequences of sin, there are here and there in the New Testament passages in which the loss of grace appears to be suggested as a consequence of sin. Expressions like ε0κπι/πτειν τη=φ ξα&ριτοφ, υ9στερειν α)πο τη=φ ξα&ριτοφ, ε0νυβρι/ζειν το_ πνευ=μ α τη=φ ξα&ριτοφ, α)δυ/νατον πα&λιν α)νακαινι/ζειν, etc., describe the effects of sin and seem to be understandable n this sense. Upon closer examination, however, it becomes evident that, because of the conciseness and vagueness of the expressions, such an interpretation [28] remains questionable. These ideas could also be assigned to the other two approaches. Perhaps they mean to convey no more than a general falling away from God, a departure from the kingdom of his benevolence and contempt for his saving works. In any case, they do not have to refer definitely, explicitly and directly to the interior grace which is the personal possession of the individual Christian. Even if one or other of these expressions is understood in the sense of the loss of interior grace, they are all still so brief and stand in a [4] Cf. the recurrence of the following key words. Judgement: Matt. 10:15; 11:22, 24; 12:36, 41 ff.; 16:27; 24:30 f.; 25:31, 32, etc.; Luke 10:14; 11:31; 20:47; John 5:22, 27, 29; 12:48. Eternal damnation: Matt. 3:10, 12; 5:29 f.; 8:12; 10:28; 13:30, 41 f., 50; 18:8 f.; 22:13; 23:33; 24:51; 25:30, 41, 46; Mark 9:43, 47, 48; Luke 3:17; 13:28; 16:22 ff.; John 15:6.

[5] Judgement. In Paul: Acts 17:31; Rom. 2:5 ff.; 2:16; 14:10; 1 Cor. 3:13; 4:5; 2 Cor. 5:10; 2 Thess. 2:12; 2 Tim. 4:1. In Heb. 6:2; 9:27; 10:27, 30 f. In James 2:13; 5:12. In Jude 15. In Peter: Acts 10:42; 1 Pet. 4:5; 2 Pet. 2:3, 9. In John: 1 John 2:28; 4:17; Rev. 11:18; 20:12, 13. Eternal damnation. 1 Thess. 5:3; 2 Thess. 1:9; Heb. 10:27; Jas. 4:12; 2 Pet. 2:3 ff., 17; Jude 7:13; Rev. 14:11; 19:3; 20:10, 14 f.; 21:8; 22:15.

[6] 1 Cor. 6:9 f.; Gal. 5: 19-21; Eph. 5:5; Col. 3:5-6 (the o)ργη/ is God's final judgement as in Rom. 2:5; Rev. 6:17; etc.); similarly Rev. 21:8.

[7] 1 Cor. 6:9. This passage represents the classical biblical reference for our question in the textbooks.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

context which draws the attention in another direction. For the teaching of the loss of grace by sin to be believed consciously, clearly and explicitly at least a further impulse from outside was still necessary.

A closer examination of the relevant texts will make this point clearer.

A) PAUL

In Romans 11:16-24 it is first of all a question of the 'excision' of the Jews from the olive tree, and then of the danger that the same thing could happen to the Christians of Gentile origin. The section should be interpreted with regard to the situation of the whole letter. Thus its theme is not that the individual man can lose his interior grace. The olive tree is Judaism or the messianic kingdom issuing from it while remaining linked with the Patriarchs. The Gentiles have been received into this kingdom, although, because of their origin, they do not have a right to it as do the Jews. The latter are the children of the Patriarchs, the first-born, but by their unbelief they have been excluded and 'excised' from this kingdom. This can also happen to the Gentile Christians.[8] This comes near to saying[9] that a loss of interior grace is possible. But this idea is not yet directly expressed, because here it is a question of the relationship of the whole Jewish people to the messianic kingdom. Thus the individual Gentile Christian cannot stand in contrast to the Jewish people.

When Paul in 1 Corinthians 9:27 expresses his fear that he himself, through his own fault, could become α)δο&κιμοφ, and when in 1 Corinthians 10:12 he envisages the possibility of a 'fall' for Christians, he has not yet relinquished the ethical-moral approach. It remains unclear how this 'disqualification' (α)δο&κιμοφ) and this 'fall' effect the interior grace. The same applies to expression like α)πο&λυσθαι (John 3:16; 10:28; Rom. 2:12; 14:15; 1 Cor. 1:18; 8:11; [29] 2 Cor. 2:15; 4:3; 2 Thess. 2:10; 2 Pet. 3:9, etc.) and φθει/ρεσθαι (1 Cor. 3:17; 2 Cor. 7:2; 11:3; 2 Pet. 2:12). Here either the purely eschatological sense predominates or these expressions speak very vaguely of an ethical catastrophe.[10]

In 2 Corinthians 6:1 we read παρακαλου=μεν μη_ ει0φ κενο_ν τη_ν ξα&ριν του= θεου= δε/χασθαι υ9μα~φ. Even if here ξα&ριφ were to mean the interior grace,[11] the sentence is still only an exhortation to take care by our ethical life that the reception of grace does not remain vain and useless. What happens to this grace when our ethical behaviour does not correspond to it is not said.

Galations 5:4 remains to be mentioned: κατηργη/θητε α)πο Ξριστου= οι#τινεφ ε0ν

---

[8] Cf. R. Cornely, Commentarius in epist. ad Romanos (Paris 1896), p. 599 f. This interpretation is generally supported by exegetes, even if the precise meaning is variously interpreted in the different commentaries. Cf. J. Sickenberger, Die beiden Briefe des heiligen Paulus an die Korinther und sein Brief an die Römer (Hl.Schrift.NT V) (Bonn 1921), p. 238, where the passage is interpreted far too rapidly in the sense of Catholic dogma; M. J. Lagrange, Saint Paul Epître aux Romains (Paris 1922), p. 281 f.; O. Holtzmann, Das Neue Testament II (Giessen 1926), p. 663; O. Kuss, Die Briefe an die Römer, Korinther und Galater (RNT6) (Regensburg 1940), p. 92; A. Nygren, Der Römerbrief (Göttingen 1954), p. 287; O. Michel, Der Brief an die Römer (Meyers Kom. 4) (Göttingen 1957), p. 246, where particular attention is given to the meaning of 'standing' and 'falling'; J. Huby/S. Lyonnet, Saint Paul (VS 10) (Paris 1957), p. 397; F. J. Leenhardt, L'Epître de saint Paul aux Romains (Neuchâtel/Paris 1957), p. 163 f. P. Althaus, Der Brief an die Römer (NTD III) (Göttingen 1958), p. 105.

[9] Cf. R. Cornely, p. 605, together with the other authors mentioned in n.8. J. Sickenberger actually draws the conclusion.

[10] For what follows, cf. especially H. Conzelmann, ξα&ριφ D. Neues Testament, in ThW IX, pp. 381-93 (Stuttgart 1971).

[11] ξα&ριφ is here synonymous with καταλλαγη_ in 5:19 and δικαιοσυ/νη in 5:21. Thus it has a wider meaning.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

νομω| δικαιου=σθε, τη=φ ξα&ριτοφ ε0χεπε/σατε. This passage means: the person who hopes for δικαιοσυ/νη from the observance of the law 'has no more to do with Christ';[12] he is separated from Christ and has 'fallen out of grace'. Ξα&πιφ here does not mean simply interior sanctifying grace, since then one could not say: man falls out of grace. Rather it is the whole economy of salvation of the New Testament that is meant. Only if this is the case can Ξα&πιφ be construed as 'kingdom', as an 'area' out of which the Judaizer steps to fall back into the slavery of the law.

B) THE LETTER TO THE HEBREWS

The following texts from the Letter to the Hebrews come quite near to an approach to the consequences of sin from the point of view of grace. Hebrews 6:4-6 describes interior grace sufficiently clearly with the expressions φωτι/ζεσθαι, γευ/εσθαι τη=φ δωρεα~φ τη=φ ε0πουρανι/αν, μετο&ξουφ γι/νεσθαι πνευ/ματοφ α(γιου. All of these expressions refer to an inner state of man. Sin is characterized primarily as a παραπι/πτειν (α. λ. in the NT), as a falling away and an aberration. Παραπι/πτειν means simply: (by falling away from faith) 'to sin'.[13] By this expression alone, therefore, nothing is yet said about the consequences of sin. Of those who 'have fallen away' we read: α)δυ/νατον πα&λιν α)νακαινι/ζειν ει0φ μετα&νοιαν. This phrase presupposes that such α)νακαινι/ζειν ει0φ μετα&νοιαν has already taken place, and that this α)νακαι/νωσιφ ει0φ μετα&νοιαν has subsequently been lost. Thus in theory a second a α)νακαι/νωσιφ would be necessary. Now if one observes only the α)νακαι/νζειν τινα& (therefore here του∴φ φωτισθε/νταφ etc.), then the meaning of the phrase would be: it is impossible to renew again such apostates and to [30] return them to the state which has just been described.[14] In this way it would without a doubt be presupposed that this α)νακαι/νωσιφ had already taken place once. Thus it is identified with the enlightenment, the tasting of the heavenly gifts, the participation in the Holy Spirit, in fine, interior grace. And it is precisely this grace that has been lost. Since, however, the text does not run α&δυ/νατον α)νακαινι/ζειν του∴φ φωτισθε/νταφ etc., but α)νακαινι/ζειν ει0φ μετα&νοιαν, it cannot be explicitly a question of the renewal of the interior grace of the baptized but the renewal of the attitude of μετα&νοια in these Christians. The object of the eventual renovation is, therefore, the μετα&νοια which, as the active form α)νακαινι/ζειν indicates, is considered as being performed by the preacher (apostle).[15] If, however, the α)νακαι/νωσιφ is referred directly to the interior grace, then neither the active of α)νακαινι/ζειν[16] nor the preposition ει0φ μετα&νοιαν is explained. This ει0φ makes it clear that the μετα&νοια is the object of the renovatio. If the renewal referred immediately to the interior state of grace, then the μετα&νοια would not be its object but the presupposed means of the renewal of the interior state of grace. In this case the ει0φ would have to be translated by 'through' or 'in the place of' (Estius) or accedentes, en

[12] This is the meaning of καταργε/ω; for this cf. F. Zorell, Lexicon Graecum Novi Testamenti (Paris 1931), p. 682.
[13] Cf. F. Zorell, ibid., p. 997. W. Bauer, Griechisch-deutsches Wörterbuch zu den Schriften des NT und der ubrigen urchristlichen Literatur (Berlin 1958), p. 1232; W. Michaelis παραπι/πτω, in: ThW, VI, pp. 170-3 (Stuttgart 1959).
[14] That is, enlightenment by the Holy Spirit, the tasting of the heavenly gifts, participation in the Spirit, etc.
[15] The correct meaning of α)δυ/νατον is thus obvious: it is a matter of the moral impossibility of changing, through the preaching of an apostle, a person who has completely fallen away from the faith. It is not, therefore, a matter of the impossibility of a new acquisition of interior sanctifying grace.
[16] If this were the case, then α)δυ/νατον α)νακαινι/ζεσθαι would be expected here.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

les amenant inserted between α)νακαινι/ζειν and ει0φ μετα&νοιαν (Estius, Crampon).[17] The illumination, the tasting of the heavenly gifts, etc. are, therefore, to be construed as indications which explain the impossibility of a renewed access to μετα&νοια. How can the person who has experienced these things and then apostasized be brought to change his attitude? It is nowhere stated, therefore, how the παραπι/πτειν effects the interior grace itself.

In Hebrews 10:29 sin appears as a spurning of God's Son, as contempt for his blood of the covenant which sanctifies us and, above all, as το_ πνευ=μα τη=φ ξα&ριτοφ ε0νυβρι/ζειν. This expression is possibly an allusion to Zechariah 12:10, where it is said of the Spirit of grace that it is 'poured out' on us. Thus this expression could evoke the interior grace. 0Ενυβρι/ζειν means 'to behave improperly', 'to behave proudly and impudently', 'to abuse a person', 'to inflict an injury on someone'.[18] Generally this verb is used absolutely or with reference to the person against whom the insult is directed. In so far as the πνευ=μα τη=φ ξα&ριτοφ is considered as a person,[19] the expression here means: to behave insolently and proudly towards this person of the πνευ=μα. Sin is, therefore, characterized only in its [31] immoral nature. That this insult against the Pneuma brings about the loss of the Father's gift of grace is by no means explicitly stated.

Finally, we read in Hebrews 12:15 that the Christian must take care that he does not υ9στερω~ν α)πο τη=φ ξα&ριτοφ του= θεου=. Ecclestiastes 6:9 and Hermas, Mand. IX 4 should be compared with this expression. It always has the meaning of 'to lack', 'not to obtain', 'to be excluded because of one's own hesitation' or also, as in Hebrews 4:1, 'to delay', 'to arrive too late', therefore: 'through one's own fault to arrive too late to receive something'.[20] But the expression never has the meaning of 'to lose'. Thus here it cannot be primarily and explicitly a question of the loss of something which was already once possessed. Moreover, ξα&ριφ is so general and vague that it can be taken quite justifiably here in the wide sense of 'benevolence' or 'salvation'. Thus the whole sentence ought to be translated along these lines: 'Be careful that no one fails to receive God's salvation, that he does not obtain God's favor.' There is no mention, therefore, of a loss of grace.

c) DEATH AS THE CONSEQUENCE OF SIN

The death which results from a committed sin (Jas. 1:14-15) is, in the first place, the eternal death which is opposed to eternal life.[21] An indication of this is James 2:14 ff., where, as if in opposition to 1:14 f., it is said that faith and works save man for eternal happiness. These passages should be compared with James 5:20, where θα&νατοφ is clearly used metaphorically of the eternal damnation of hell.

The New Testament speaks often about 'death'. It is certain that in the following passages spiritual death is meant in the eschatological sense: Rom. 1:32; 6:16, 21, 23; 7:5; (8:2); 2 Cor. 2:16; (2 Tim. 1:10); (Heb. 2:14b); Rev. 2:11; 20:6, 14; 21:8.[22] Also for the possibility of the spiritual death of grace, here and now, which entails eternal death the following passages may [17] Cf. W. Estius (1542-1613), Commentarii in omnes Divi Pauli epistolas (Douai 1614-16 and finally Paris 1892) on the passage and the edn of the NT by J. Th. A. Crampon (1826-94) (Tournai 1885).

[18] Cf. F. Zorell, p. 449; W. Bauer, p. 535; G. Bertram, υ#βριφ, etc. in: ThW VIII, pp. 295-307.
[19] This person is, however, given to us by the grace of the Father and lives in us as in his temple.
[20] Cf. F. Zorell, p. 1383; W. Bauer, p. 1679; U. Wilckens, υ3στεροφ, etc., in: ThW VIII, pp. 590-600.
[21] This is how it is understood by J. E. Belser, Die Epistel des hl. Jakobus (Freiburg/Br. 1909), p. 60, and M. Meinertz/W. Vrede, Die katholischen Bniefe (Bonn 1932), p. 23 f.
[22] Cf. F. Zorell, p. 578; W. Bauer, pp. 693-5; R. Bultmann, θα&νατοφ, etc., in: ThW III, pp. 7-25.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

be adduced: John 5:24; 8:51; Rom. 7:10, 13, 24; 2 Cor. 3:7; Jas. 1:15; 5:20; 1 John 3:14; 5:16. But even if 'death' in these passages is not to be construed purely eschatologically and also concerns this present life, what is its precise meaning? Does it mean loss of grace or, at least explicitly and directly, only 'death of the moral life', 'death of sinlessness' or 'death of relationship and friendship with God'? In the later Fathers of the Church death certainly means 'death of grace'. But this is by no [32] means clear with regard to the New Testament. In John 5:24 it is possibly mainly a question of 'moral death', with the further implication of bodily death considered as the counterpart to the final resurrection of the body. This reference to the resurrection, together with the parallel with the judgement (5:22), calls for an eschatological interpretation. It is possible to grasp the profound nature of this death, opposed as it is to 'life', only by taking the whole Gospel into consideration. Only in this way could it perhaps be shown that the Johannine notion of death includes, as a secondary meaning, the idea of 'death by the loss of grace'. In John 8:51 'death' ought certainly to be understood eschatologically,[23] while in Rom. 7:10, 13 it is only a question of moral death through sin.[24] Nevertheless, Paul's notion of the nature of death can be derived only from his theology as a whole. In Romans 8:6 the eschatological meaning is obvious. Φρο&νημα means the 'thinking and effort' directed to a goal and then, metonymically, this goal itself.[25] Θα&νατοφ is, therefore, the last goal and the end of sinful activity and thus is meant eschatologically. 2 Corinthians 3:7 has an ethical-moral meaning; 2 Corinthians 7: 10 refers to eternal death,[26] while 1 John 3:14 envisages a death which is already present. Nevertheless, it is only in the light of the whole of Johannine theology that it can be established that this death consists essentially of the loss of grace and, as far as the present life is concerned, is not to be understood merely as the punishment of a fault which entails eternal death but concerns the loss of a personal life of grace. In 1 John 5:16 θα&νατοφ means the complete falling away from faith and the total denial of Jesus[27] but not the loss of grace which is associated with a serious sin. By way of conclusion, it remains true to say that θα&νατοφ can mean 'moral, spiritual death'. A consideration of the theology of the whole of the New Testament can eventually point to the loss of grace as the inner nature of this death; but this is never directly and explicitly expressed.

In 1 John 3:8-10 sin and righteousness are explained with regard to man's true character. In their effects they are the revelation (ε0ν του&τω| φανερα&) that one is either a child of God or a child of the devil. Nevertheless, it is not stated that a person who became a child of God through grace becomes a child of the devil through sin and so loses grace. The ου0

[23] The eschatological meaning is brought out very clearly especially in the commentaries of J. Knabenbauer, Comment. in Evang. sec. Joan. (Paris 1906), p.313 and F. Tillmann, Das Johannesevangelium (Bonn 1931), p. 185, while R. Cornely, p.366, stresses the ethical aspect of the passage in Rom. 7. For the meaning of 'death' in John 8:51 cf. also R. Bultmann. Das Evangelium des Johannes (Meyers Kom. II) (Göttingen 1952), p. 246, who remains, however, strangely hesitant, and A. Schlatter, Der Evangelist Johannes (Stuttgart 1948), p. 218, who refers to Luke 2:26 and Ps. 89:49 with regard to the 'not to see death'. A.Wikenhauser, Das Evangelium nach Johannes (RNT 4) defends an eschatological meaning of the passage. The interpretation of the passage in the letter to the Romans which is prevalent today appears to owe its origin to Protestant thinking and considerations about the law (gospel). Because justification was the focal point of all the discussion, whenever death was considered the accent was placed on the nature of sin as death before justification. Hardly any attention was paid to sin as a possibility or as a fact or to the way its nature was affected by justification after justification (by faith and baptism), and this despite the formula simul iustus et peccator. The different approaches which we are considering here do not, however, have much relevance to sin in this sense. Cf. O. Kuss, Der Römerbrief II (Regensburg 1959), pp. 444-48, 450 and H. Thyen, loc. cit.

[24] Cf. R. Cornely, p. 366: mortem obii vita innocentiae iustitiaeque privatus.

[25] Cf. F. Zorell, p. 1416; W. Bauer, p. 1713; G. Bertram, φρη=ν, etc., in: ThW IX, pp. 216-31 (Stuttgart 1970).

[26] R. Cornely, Comment, in Epist. ad Corinth. alteram (Paris 1892), p. 205.

[27] Cf. M. Meinertz/W. Vrede, Die katholischen Briefe (Bonn 1932), p. 177.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

δυ&ναται α(μαρτα&νειν ο#τι ε0κ του= θεου= γεγε/ννηται seems rather to suggest another meaning. In the light of this passage [33] and seen in its own context the meaning of the observation in 1 John 3:15 is clear. The 'murderer' who hates his brother does not have 'life dwelling' in him and must, therefore-precisely because of this-hate those brothers who, being different from him, do possess this life. It is for this reason that we should not be surprised at the hatred of the world (1 John 3:13). Nevertheless, there is no mention of the fact here that a person loses the 'life dwelling in him', which he once already possessed, when he begins to hate his brothers. According to 1 John 3:8 ff. hatred of the brothers is rather an indication that the 'murderer' never possessed life. What is more, the phrase ου0κ ε1ξει ζωη∴ν αι0ω&νιον ε0ν αυ0τω~| με/νουσαν does not have the same sense as η9 ζωη∴ αι0ω&νιοφ ου0 με/νει ε0ν αυ0τω~|.

D) IMAGES AND PARABLES

In theological tradition biblical parables have been repeatedly applied to the interior state of grace and its loss. Nevertheless, these parables are far too vague to be able to support on their own such a precise theological notion. Pride of place, in this connection, is usually given to the prodigal son who, upon his return, receives a new garment and a new ring (Luke 15:22); this signifies God's loving acceptance of the sinner. The application of the garment to sanctifying grace, however, goes far beyond the literal meaning of the text.[28] Similarly treated is the man who appears at the royal wedding banquet without a festal robe (Matt. 22: 12) and is, therefore, turned away from the table. This seems to be saying[29] that everyone must strive to acquire a wedding garment by leading a life in conformity with the demands of the gospel. The participation in the meal of eternal life is, therefore, connected with the fulfilment of certain conditions. But it is not said that these conditions are tantamount to the preservation of the interior state of grace. Rather, they ought to be interpreted in the light of Matthew 7:21 f. A third image which is adduced here is the destruction of God's temple in which the divine Spirit dwells (1 Cor. 3:16 f.; cf. also 1 Cor. 6:19). According to the whole context, however, ναο_φ θεου= must here mean not the individual Christian but the community and the individual Church,[30] in much the same way as Ephesians 2:21 f. and 2 Corinthians 6:16 refer to the universal Church. The φθει/ρειν is the disintegration of the community by false teachers. The φθει/ρεσθαι which threatens the [34] false teacher is to be understood eschatologically, being the φθορα& which, as in Galatians 6:8, is opposed to ζωη∴ αι0ω&νιοφ. In 1 Corinthians 6:19, however, it is a question of individuals considered as God's temple. Nevertheless, what effects the sins of the flesh have upon the temple of God remain unclear.

John 15:6 seems to be the best New Testament candidate for a consideration of the consequences of sin from the point of view of grace. 'To remain in Christ' is the activity of the disciples themselves. It is also primarily meant as a moral relationship, and therefore 'not to remain in Christ' belongs to the juridical-moral approach. The images of separation, rejection[31] and burning can be construed eschatologically.

---

[28] Cf. L. Fonck, Die Parabeln des Herrn (Innsbruck 1909), p. 911, and J. Jeremias, Die Gleichnisse Jesu (Göttingen 1956), pp. 113-16.
[29] Cf. L. Fonck, p. 418, but see also J. Jeremias, pp. 154-7, who explains the meaning of the parable in terms of justification.
[30] F. Zorell, p. 864, and R. Cornely, Comment. in priorem Epist. ad Corinth. (Paris 1890), p. 93, together with W. Bauer, p. 1055 f. and O. Michel, να&οφ, in: ThW 1 IV pp. 884-95 (esp. p. 892) (Stuttgart 1942).
[31] This rejection is here expressed by a gnomic aorist.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We can sum up this rapid survey of a few important New Testament passages in this way: the juridical-ethical and eschatological consequences of sin are well known and are strongly emphasized. On the other hand, the consideration of the consequences of sin from the point of view of grace and, therefore, the teaching of the loss of sanctifying grace through sin appears only indirectly. In any event, this idea is not prominent in the New Testament.

The reasons for this phenomenon are not hard to find. In the first place, baptism, the simple fact of becoming a Christian, was considered such a decisive and definitive break with sin that the immediate consequence of a further serious sin could hardly be envisaged. Among Christians, at least in general, intense moral effort was taken for granted. Moreover, the approach to the consequences of sin in the Old Testament and in the synoptics, that is, in the original tradition concerning Jesus' message, succeeded in fixing the attention of the other New Testament writings more on the moral and eschatological consequences than on the effects of sin upon the state of grace. The return of the Lord, the day of Christ and the imminent judgement are part and parcel of the living expectation of Christians in the early community. This is why they were warned against sin with reference to these ideas. In this context there was no pastoral necessity as yet to refer to the loss of grace. All the relevant biblical texts warn against sins which have not yet been committed. The approach to the consequences of sin from the point of view of grace, however, must necessarily be concerned rather with sins which have actually been committed.

[35]

III. THE APOSTOLIC FATHERS

As far as the question of the effects of sin in the writings of the 'Apostolic Fathers' is concerned, these writings may be divided into two groups. The first group would contain those witnesses which were certainly composed at the beginning of our period, that is, in the first half of the second century: the First Letter of Clement, the Letters of Ignatius of Antioch, the Didache, the Letter of Barnabas and the Letter of Polycarp. The second group of the Apostolic Fathers comprises the writings of the middle or the second half of the second century: the Second Letter of Clement and the Shepherd of Hermas. The Martyrdom of Polycarp and the Letter of Diognetus have no relevance for our question. This chronological division coincides with an objective difference of content, as we shall now show.

1. The Early Apostolic Fathers

The witnesses of this group consider the consequences of sin in more or less the same way as does the New Testament. The juridical-ethical and eschatological approaches predominate almost exclusively. This observation can be confirmed by expressions culled from these writings. Thus it is said that idolatry destroys the covenant with God,[32] that sin relegates man again among the pagans,[33] that it makes him a slave of the devil.[34] Consequently God is [32] Barn. 4,7.8 (Th. Klauser, Doctrina duoDec.ap. – Barn.ep. [Flor.Patr.I], Bonn 1940, p. 36 no. 34). Cf. also the new edn in the series 'Sources Chrétiennes': Epître de Barnabé (SC 172), ed. P. Prigent/R. A. Kraft (Paris 1971) with a comprehensive introduction (pp. 9-70).

[33] Polycarp 2,11,2 (Fischer, Munich 1956, p. 260 f. nos. 17-19). For the 'Apostolic Fathers' we are using the edn of J. A. Fischer. The reader is also referred, however, to the edn in the series 'Sources Chrétiennes': Clément de Rome, Epître aux Corinthiens (SC 167), ed. A. Jaubert (Paris 1971). Particularly valuable in this edn are the comprehensive introduction (pp. 13-96), where, in particular, the question of 'Courants pénitentiels?' (pp. 50-2) in Judaism is considered, and the glossary (pp. 231-74).

[34] Ign.ad Smyrn. 9,1 (Fischer, p. 212 f. nos. 1-4); cf. Ign.ad Rom. 7,1 (Fischer, pp. 188-91 nos. 19 f. and nos. 1 f.); Ign.ad Philad. 6,2 (Fischer, p. 198 f. nos. 5-8); Polycarp 2,7,1 (Fischer, pp. 256-9 nos. 18-21 and no. 1).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

unfavourable towards the sinner and becomes his enemy,[35] because he hates sin[36] and curses it.[37] Sin entails misfortunes and dangers.[38] It is the object of a curse,[39] since God will not be mocked,[40] and peace and righteousness are far from the sinner.[41]

The eschatological viewpoint is especially evident in the following expressions: sin is a road leading to death, that is, to eternal damnation, a road of darkness and a death-trap.[42] It leads man to death.[43] Thus sin is threatened by the judgement of God and of Christ.[44] Warning against sin often contains a reference to the end of time.[45] At the judgement the sinner will receive a just punishment,[46] damnation[47] and hell.[48] Quite often Paul is cited verbatim.[49]

Naturally even in these early Apostolic Fathers there are some [36] texts which one could be tempted to interpret in the sense of an approach from the point of view of grace. Quite a few of these passages seem to reflect this approach – those, for instance, which present death as already having been introduced by sin. Thus we are inclined spontaneously to interpret them immediately with regard to grace. If, however, the principle of interpretation is maintained, according to which general and vague phrases can justifiably be understood in a precise sense only if the idea in question occurs clearly in at least one other place in the same author, then these passages cannot be understood in the precise, unambiguous sense of the loss of interior grace. This idea is found nowhere unambiguously in the early Apostolic Fathers. Thus there is no foundation for a precise interpretation of more general expressions in the sense of a loss of grace.

Nevertheless, a series of these texts should still be considered more closely in order to explain and to justify the point which has just been made with reference to the expressions themselves. It is stated in the Didache 16,1:[50] γρηγορει=τε υ9πε∴ρ τη=ϕ ζωη=φ υ(πω~ν. This phrase suggests the possibility of the loss of grace, the loss of 'life'. Nevertheless, because the vigilance in question is based upon our ignorance of the moment of the Lord's coming, it is obvious that the life over which we should keep watch should be understood es-

[35] 1 Clem. 2,3 (Fischer, p. 26 f. nos. 7-10); 36,6 (Fischer, p. 70 f. nos. 15 f.); 48,1 (Fischer, p. 84 f. nos. 19-22).
[36] 1 Clem. 30,6 (Fischer, p. 62 f. nos. 3 f.); 35,6 (Fischer, p. 68 f. nos. 9-11).
[37] 1 Clem. 30,8 (Fischer, p. 63 f. nos. 6-8).
[38] 1 Clem. 14,2 (Fischer, pp. 40-3 no. 28 and nos. 1-3); 47,7 (Fischer, p. 84 f. nos. 15-l8); 59,1 (Fischer, p. 98 f. nos. 9 f.).
[39] Ign.ad Trall. 8,2 (Fischer, p. 176 f. nos. 18-20); 1 Clem. 46,8 (Fischer, pp. 82-5 nos. 28 f. and no. 1).
[40] Polycarp 2,5,1 (Fischer, p. 254 f. nos. 4 f.).
[41] 1 Clem. 3,4 (Fischer, pp. 26-9 no. 25 and nos. 1-6).
[42] Didache 1,l (Th. Klauser, Doctrina duodec. ap. – Barn. ep. [Flor. Patr.I], Bonn 1940, p. 14 nos. 5-7); 2,4 (ibid., p. 16 nos. 10-12); 5,1 (ibid., p. 20 nos. 1-10); Barn. 5,4 (ibid., p. 38 nos. 31-6); 19,7.8 (ibid., pp.. 14-31).
[43] Barn. 10,5 (Klauser, op. cit., p. 50 nos. 25-34); 1 Clem. 9,1 (Fischer, p. 36 f. nos. 6-9); Ign.ad Magn. 5,1 (Fischer, p. 164 f. nos. 8 f.). cf. Ign. ad Trall. 6,2 (Fischer, p. 176 f. nos. 5-7); 11,1 (Fischer, p. 178 f. nos. 8-10); Ign. ad Smymn. 7,1 (Fischer, pp. 208-11 nos. 16-19 and nos. 1 f.).
[44] Barn. 19,10 (Klauser, op. cit., pp. 66 f. nos. 36 f. and nos. 1-6); 1 Clem. 13,2 (Fischer, p. 40 f. nos. 17-21); 21,1 (ibid., p. 52 f. nos. 6-8); 28,1 (ibid., p. 60 f. nos. 4-6); Polycarp 2,6,2 (Fischer, p. 256 f. nos. 9-12).
[45] Barn. 4,1 ff. (Klauser, op. cit., p. 35 nos. 13 ff.); Didache 16,1 ff. (ibid., pp. 29 f. nos. 23 ff.).
[46] Barn. 4,12 (Klauser, op. cit., p. 37 nos. 26-31).
[47] Barn. 21,1 (Klauser, op. cit., p. 68 nos. 18-25).
[48] 1 Clem. 51,3,4 (Fischer, p. 88 f. nos. 13-16); Ign. ad Eph. 16,2 (Fischer, p. 154 f. nos. 15-18).
[49] Ign. ad Eph. 16,1 (Fischer, p. 154 f. nos. 14 f.); Ign. ad Phibad. 3,3 (ibid., p. 196 f. nos. 6-8); Polycarp 2,5,3 (ibid., pp. 254-7 nos. 13-17 and nos. 1 f.); cf. also Barn. 4,13 (Klauser, op. cit., p. 37 f. nos. 33 f. and nos. 1 f.). With regard to Ign. ad Eph. 16,1, Fischer remarks (p. 155, no.71): 1 Cor. 6:9 f.; (see also Matt. 24:4; Mark 13:5; Luke 21:8; 1 Cor. 15:33; Gal. 6:7; in effect the formula μη_ πλανα~σθε was also current in diatribe: A. Vögtle, Die Tugend- und Lasterkataloge im Neuen Testament (Münster 1936), p. 123. See also Eph. 5:5. Those who ruin houses are firstly those who destroy family life, that is, adulterers who, for example in Lev. 20:10 (cf. John 8:5), are threatened with death, and then (v. 2b), in a figurative sense, the adherents of sects. The same applies to Polycarp 2,11,2 (Fischer, p. 261 n.128).
[50] Klauser, op. cit., p. 29 nos. 23 f.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

chatologically as eternal life.

In the First Letter of Clement (57,2)[51] it is stated that it is better to be found ε0λλο&γιμοφ and μικο&φ than by pride ε0κριφη=ναι ε0κ τη=φ ε0λπι/δοφ αυ)του= (sc. Ξπριστου=) A similar image and a similar idea are found in Barnabas 2:10 and already in Galatians 5:4. Thus the expression here could also be rendered: 'by pride be deprived of the hope (of eternal life)'. In Ignatius 5,2.3[52] the υ(στερει=ν του= α!ρτου του= θεου= and the ε9αυτο_ν διακρι/νειν signifies separation from Christ in the wide sense for the person who does not stay in communion with the bishop. There is no mention of a loss of interior grace in this passage.

Expressions like ου)κ ει]ναι του= θεου=,[53] διαφθει/ρεσθαι,[54] τη=φ ε0λπι/δοφ [= Ξριστου=] ε0κτρε/πεσθαι,[55] after conversion θεου= ει]ναι,[56] νεκροφο&ροφ[57] (describing the person who denies Christ) are too vague to evince with certainty the approach from the point of view of grace, in addition to the evident juridical-moral approach.

There are, however, passages in Ignatius which speak of a death [37] caused by sin. Thus false teaching is a θανα&σιμον φα&ρμακον,[58] of which a person dies. Of those people who do not participate in the Eucharist, it is stated: α)ντιλε/γοντεφ τη|= δωρεα~| του= θεου= συνζητου=ντεφ.[59] About the proud Ignatius says: α)πω&λετο,[60] and about the person who elevates himself above the bishop: ε1φθαρται.[61] The α)ποθνη/σκειν of Smyrn. 7,1 can certainly be understood eschatologically, because in the same place Ignatius continues: συνε/φερεν αυ0τοι=φ α)γαπα~ν (i.e. to celebrate the agape-Eucharist), ι3να και∴ α)ναστω~σιν. Now this resurrection can hardly be understood as other than eschatological. The same applies to Ephesians 20:2,[62] where the Eucharist is praised as φα&ρμακον α)θαναστι/αφ, and the term 'resurrection' is certainly understood to include eternal life. Similarly, false teaching described φα&ρμακον θανα&σιμον is to be understood eschatologically. Ad Polyc. 5,2 does indeed refer to a direct consequence of sin, but it does not explain further the nature of the ruin which has already been experienced. The expression of Trall. 11,1[63] comes near to the approach from the point of view of grace. Similarly to Ad Polyc. 5,2, there is a mention of an immediate (παρə αυ0τα&) death. In the light of this passage, Smyrn. 7,1 could also be understood in this sense. Nevertheless, in Trall. 11,1 this immediate death is not explained in any detail. There is no explicit reference of this death to the life of grace.

When, in the exhortation to harmony within the community and to subordination to the [51] Fischer, p. 96 f., nos. 13 f.

[52] Fischer, p. 146 f., nos. 3-6.
[53] Ign. ad Magn. 10,1 (Fischer, p. 168 f. no. 7).
[54] Ign. ad Magn.10,2 (Fischer, p.168 f. no. 9).
[55] Ign. ad Magn. II (Fischer, p. 168 f. no. 19); cf. the use of this expression in 1 Tim. 1:1 and see Col. 1:27.
[56] Ign. ad Philad. 3,2 (Fischer, p. 196 f. no. 5).
[57] Ign. ad Smyrn. 5,2 (Fischer, p. 208 f. no. 5). Sec Fischer's n.34: the person who does not confess Christ as σαρκοφο&ροφ is himself a νεκροφο&ροφ: just as he lacks true faith, so he is bereft of true life and of any claim to a blessed resurrection; cf. Sm 2.
[58] Ign. ad Trail. 6,2 (Fischer, p. 176 f. no. 6).
[59] Ign. ad Smyrn. 7,1 (Fischer, pp. 208-11 no. 19). Cf. John 4:10; 2 Cor. 9:15.
[60] Ign.ad Polycarpem 5,2 (Fischer, p. 220 f. no. 6).
[61] Ibid.
[62] Fischer, p. 160 f. no. 1. On this point see Fischer's note 98: the φα&ρακον α)θανασι/αφ or α)νιτδοτοφ α)θανασι/αφ was an elixir which Isis was supposed to have discovered. Certainly the notion of an antidote to death played a role in both the magic and the mystery cults and in the Jewish tradition; cf. R. Buitmann, α)θανασι/α, in: ThW III, 24; Th. Schäfer, Antidotum in: RAC I, pp. 457-61.
[63] Fischer, p. 178 f. nos. 8-10.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

bishop, it is stated in Philad. 8,l:[64] ου[δε∴ μερισμο&φ ε0στιν και/ ο)ργη/, θεο_φ ου) κατοικει=, this must apply here to the community as such. God does not live in a disunited community. This passage is, therefore, not relevant to our present purpose. Obviously the texts which we have just considered and quite a few others already contain the clear foundations for the teaching of the loss of grace as a consequence of sin. These foundations can be developed further as soon as an external factor demands a greater emphasis on the relationship between morality and grace as well as a more explicit formulation of this relationship. But this is not yet the case here. The teaching itself appears as such only later, although it can easily be related with the foundations which we have just seen.

As far as the writings of the early Apostolic Fathers are concerned, the juridical-moral and the eschatological approaches to the consequences of sin predominate. The reasons for this are undoubtedly the same as those given for the case of the New Testament.

[38]

2. The Later Apostolic Fathers

As we have already said,[65] it is especially the so-called Second Letter of Clement and the Shepherd of Hermas that have any importance for our question. In these writings the approach to the consequences of sin from the point of view of grace appears very clearly. In comparison with the witnesses of the earlier period, it is noticeable that there is here a change of interest in a new direction and a further development in the formulation of the idea. The two other approaches are still in evidence, but the view with which we are presently concerned is so prominent that we are now able to concentrate exclusively on it.

In the Second Letter of Clement it is stated: η9μειφ ε0α_ν μη∴ τηρη/σωμεν το_ βα&πτιστα α(γνο_ν και∴ α0μι/αντον, ποι/α| πεποιθη/σει ει0σελευσο&μεθα ει0φ το_ βασιλειον του= θεου=,[66] and in another place:[67] τω~ν γα_ρ μη∴ τηρησα&ντων . . . τη∴ν σφραγι=δα ο(σκω&ληξ αυ0τω~ν ου0 τελευτη/σει και∴ το_ πυ=ρ αυ0τω~ν ου0 σβεσθη/σεται. And in the next chapter:[68] τηρη/σατε τη∴ν σα&ρκα α(γνη∴ν και∴ τη∴ν σφραγι=δα α!σπιλον, ι3να τη_ν αι0ω&νιον ζωη_ν α)πολα&βωμεν. First and foremost, the preacher warns against sin with reference to its eschatological consequences. But – and this is what is new – between sin and what it finally entails – hell – an immediate effect of sin is mentioned: the loss of baptismal grace for the Christian. For its part, the punishment of hell follows from this immediate consequence of sin. The person who sins does not 'keep' the 'seal', does not preserve baptism safe and sound.

In the Shepherd of Hermas we find the same kind of expression. In Sim. VIII 6,3[69] it is stated of the Christians: ει0ληφο&τεφ τη_ν σφραγι=δα και∴ τεθλακο&τεφ αυ0τη_ν και∴ μη_ τηρη/σαντεφ υ9γιη=. And Hermas means that they will receive the σφραγι/φ back if they do penance. This term here means the baptismal grace, the life which is received in baptism, as, for example, Sim. IX 16,3.4[70] clearly shows. Many Christians have broken this seal and have not preserved it in innocence. But they can recover it by penance.[71] This passage teaches unambiguously the loss of baptismal grace which is so decisive for man's [64] Fischer, p. 198 f. no. 23.

[65] Cf. the introductory remarks to III above: 'The Apostolic Fathers'.
[66] 2 Clem. 6,9 (K. Bihlmeyer, Die Apostolischen Väter [Tübingen 1924], p. 74 nos. 5 ff.).
[67] 2 Clem. 7,6 (ibid., p. 74 nos. 19-21).
[68] 2 Clem. 8,6 (ibid., p. 75 no. 4 f.).
[69] Cf. M. Whittaker, Die Apostolischen Väter I. Der Hirt des Hermas, Sim. VIII 6 (GCS 48) (Berlin 1956), p. 71 nos. 17 f.
[70] GCS 48: p. 89 f. no. 31 and nos. 1-6.
[71] Sim. VIII 6,3 (GCS 48: p. 71 nos. 17 ff.).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

eternal destiny. Just how important the possession of this baptismal grace is for Hermas can be seen from his assumption that the righteous men of the Old Testament – in the underworld, as they are – must receive this seal by baptism through the apostles if they are to be able to enter into the kingdom of God.[72] The expression: [39] 'breaking' (θλα&ω) of the seal through sin and the fact that the penitents, according to Hermas, recover it from the angle of penance (μετανοη/σωσιν λαβο&ντεφ υ9πο_ σου= σφραγι=δα)[73] show that it is a question of an actual loss of the seal which here means baptismal grace. The other more imaginative expressions, such as the sullying of the seal or of baptism can, therefore, justifiably be understood in the same sense as the loss of baptismal grace. Because of the close relationship between the Shepherd of Hermas and the Second Letter of Clement, this observation is valid for both writings. In Sim. IX 17,4.5[74] many people having received the σφραγιφ have sullied it again. Thus they have fallen back into their previous state (before baptism) or into a worse state still.

Although, up to this point, the Shepherd of Hermas and the Second Letter of Clement agree in their way of speaking, yet another expression for the loss of grace after baptism is found in Hermas. This is not so clearly discernible in the Second Letter of Clement. Here it is a question of πνευ=μα α#γιον being used instead of, but clearly synonymously with, σφραγι/φ. The person who sins 'sullies' the Spirit.[75] Sin 'expels' the Spirit which dwells within man.[76] It 'injures' the Holy Spirit[77] and brings it about that it 'abandons' man.[78]

This teaching of the loss of grace through sin is developed still further in Hermas in a direction which is quite peculiar to him. Since this point is without great importance, a brief reference to it will suffice for our present purpose. The expressions used by Hermas suggest a kind of physical activity, when, for instance, he speaks of the soul as a container which has a certain capacity. This is filled either with the Holy Spirit or with the wicked spirit. If the latter forces himself into the soul, then the good Spirit becomes 'compressed' and finally leaves man completely.[79]

The following expressions can be understood unhesitatingly in the sense of the loss of grace as a consequence of sin: λυ/πην ε0πα&γειν τω~| πνευ/ματι τω~| σεμνω~| και∴ α)ληθη=|,[80] λυπει=ν το_ πνευ=μα το_ α#γιον[81] or πονηρα_ συνει/δησιν μετα_ του= πνευ/ματοφ τη=φ α)ληθει/αφ μη_ κατοικει=ν.[82] Similarly, Hermas speaks of the Spirit becoming old, diminishing and becoming powerless.[83] On the other hand, the recovery of the Spirit is α)νακαινι/ζειν το_ πνευ=μα.[84] The exhortation to avoid sin is now expressed in this way: reddite ei Spiritum integrum, sicut accepistis.[85] At least by way of allusion, the

[72] Sim. IX 16,2-7 (GCS 48: p. 89 f. nos. 28-31 and nos. 1-18).
[73] Sim. VIII 6,3 (GCS 48: p. 71 no. 19).
[74] GCS 48: p. 91 nos. 4-12.
[75] Sim. V 6,5 (GCS 48: p. 57 nos. 17-19); Sim. V 7,2 (GCS 48: p. 58 nos. 8 f.).
[76] Mand. X 2,1 (GCS 48: p. 38 nos. 26 f.).
[77] Mand. X 2,5 (GCS 48: p. 39 no. 9).
[78] Mand. X 2,6 (GCS 48: p. 39 nos. 10-12).
[79] Cf. especially Mand. V 1,1-4 (GCS 48: p. 29 nos. 5-16); Mand. X 2,6 (GCS 48: p. 39 nos. 10-12); Mand. XI 2.3.9.13.14 (the application of this notion to true and false prophets) (GCS 48: p. 40 f. nos. 6-14; nos. 3-8; 17-25).
[80] Mand. III 4 (GCS 48: p. 25 nos. 10-14).
[81] Mand. X 2,2.4 (GCS 48: p. 38 f. nos. 27ff. and nos. 5-8).
[82] Mand. III 4 (GCS 48: p. 25 nos. 10-13).
[83] Vis. III 11,2 (GCS 48: p. 17 nos. 20-3).
[84] Sim. VIII 6,3 (GCS 48: p. 71 nos. 15-21); Sim. IX 14,3 (GCS 48: p. 88 nos. 13-17).
[85] Sim. IX 32,2 (GCS 48: p. 103 nos. 1-4).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

image of the 'robe [40] of grace',[86] which will become so frequent later, is already found in Hermas. Thus we read:[87]

> Si sic igitur tu doles de vestimento tuo et quereris, quod non illud integrum recipias, quid putas dominum tibi facturum qui spiritum integrum tibi dedit, et tu eum totum inutilem redegisti, ita ut in nullo usu esse possit domino suo? Inutilis enim esse coepit usus eius cum sit corruptus a te. Nonne igitur dominus spiritus eius propter hoc factum tuum (morte te) adficiat?

Now, once the teaching of the loss of grace as the consequence of sin has been established – as we have seen it to be in the above-mentioned passages – then phrases which speak about the denial of life,[88] of 'to inflict death on oneself'[89] or, conversely, about the renewal of life[90] may also be interpreted in the same sense.

It is a reasonable assumption that the cause of the development which we have discerned in the teaching on the loss of grace through sin, together with its clear formulation, is a reaction to a fundamentally different way of thinking. Only such a reaction could explain the explicit and clear expressions which we have seen. Now the anti-Gnostic character of the Second Letter of Clement and the Shepherd of Hermas is abundantly clear.[91] This tendency is discernible in what could be called the 'teaching on grace' in both of these writings. The Gnostic teachings on the pneuma, on the divine 'seed', on the particle of the 'Father' and on the pleroma could be understood as the opposing 'teaching on grace'.[92] This teaching is fundamentally amoral, and neither in encratistic nor in actually immoral Gnosticism is this Gnostic 'grace' designed to sanctify and to enlighten the whole man. This is because man's material and psychic part, being the fall-out of a pre-human 'original sin', can have nothing at all to do with the pneuma. On the other hand, according to this view, man's immoral behaviour cannot do any harm to this Gnostic 'grace'. Thus we can justifiably assume that the Second Letter of Clement and the Shepherd of Hermas considered themselves called upon – in reaction against this teaching – to declare that the grace received in baptism is lost by sin. This explains how the approach to the consequences of sin from the point of view of grace came in to complement the traditional juridical-moral and eschatological approaches. This assumption is confirmed by the fact that some occurrences of the new formulations appear in sections where there is a [41] direct polemic[93] against Gnosticism. Furthermore, the notion of σφραγι/φ as a description of the gift of grace received in baptism was a favourite term among the Gnostics.[94] Thus the expression that the σφραγι/φ is lost through sin would have naturally

---

[86] Sim. IX 32,3,4 (GCS 48: p. 103 nos. 4-14). Cf. also Sim. VIII 2,4(GCS 48: p. 67 nos. 18-20): δου∴φ αυ∴τοι=φ ι9ματισμο_ν λευκο_ν και σφραγι=δα.

[87] Ibid. (GCS 48: p. 103 nos. 11-14). [This is the passage in Whittaker's edn: unde si tu de vestimento tristis efficeris et rixaris quia non integrum recipis, quid putas dominum esse facturum, qui tibi spiritum dedit integrum, et tu iliud totum ita inutile fecisti, ut domino suo in usu esse non possit, quia usus ipsius spiritus a te inutilis esses coepit et corruptus?]

[88] Vis. II 2,7 (GCS 48: p. 6 nos. 10-13).

[89] Mand. IV 1,2 (GCS 48: p. 26 no. 3).

[90] Sim. IX 14,3 (GCS 48: p. 88 no. 17).

[91] Cf. for example F. X. Funk, Patres Apostolici I (Tübingen 1901), pp. lii, cxxx.

[92] Cf. F. Mitzka, 'Gnosticismus und Gnadenlehre' in: ZKTh 51(1927), pp. 60-4.

[93] 2 Clem. 8,6-9,5 (K. Bihlmeyer, Die Apostolischen Väter (Tübingen 1924), p. 75 nos. 3-12; Hermas, Sim. V 6-7 (GCS 48: p. 57 f. nos. 5-25 and nos. 1-16).

[94] Obviously the notion is not only found in the Gnostics. It is already found in Paul (2 Cor. 1:22; Eph. 1:13; cf. also Rev. 7:3). Nevertheless, its use in the NT could hardly account for the surprisingly frequent occurrence of the notion in the Gnostic writings. It occurs 20 times, for instance, in the (Gnostic) Acts of Thomas (cf. DThC 11,1 col. 205); in the Pistis Sophia c. 86, c. 91 and often elsewhere (W. Till, Koptisch-Gnostische Schriften I [Berliner-Akademie Ausgabe] originally ed. C. Schmidt (Berlin 1959), p. 127 no. 18 and p. 134 no. 27; cf. the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

suggested itself.

The approach from the point of view of grace was fully developed, therefore, in the struggle against Gnostic notions of grace. The Shepherd of Hermas, however, had other opponents with whom he had to enter into the lists on essential aspects of our question. In the penitential controversies Hermas played an important role, in so far as he was the first person to pose explicitly the question[95] of the fate of a fallen Christian who had lost the grace which had been given to him in baptism. One of the most important questions for Hermas is whether there is a further conversion, a second μετα&νοια for such an unfortunate person and under which conditions it is possible. In the second and third centuries this question provoked a whole series of theological controversies and led to schisms and heresies. The most notorious of these are Tertullian's penitential rigorism, inspired by his Montanism, the schism of Hippolytus in Rome, the differences of opinion on the celebration of penance at the time of Cyprian of Carthage and his adversaries Novatian, Felicissimus and Fortunatus and, finally, the Novatian schism in Rome. Generally, these controversies are considered solely from the point of view of the Church's increasingly emphasized conviction that it has the authority to forgive sins and of the practical and lenient exercise of this authority in the face of a rigorism which is heretical at least in practice, if not in theory. It is obvious that in these controversies the teaching of the loss of grace through sin had to be recognized ever more explicitly and clearly. It is from this point of view that we must now consider the penitential controversies further, albeit very briefly.[96]

IV. THE RIGORISM OF MONTANISM

The Apologists of the second century may be passed over, since their own interests provide little opportunity for them to speak about the loss of grace as the consequence of sin. Even the intention of Irenaeus of Lyons in his Adversus Haereses is so peculiar to him that we can hardly expect him to provide details on our theme. [42] Nevertheless, the idea itself is clearly expressed by him: δια_ τη=φ πι/στεωφ και∴ τη=φ α(γνη=φ α)ναστροφη=φ συντηρει=ν το_ Πνευ=μα του= θεου=, ι3να μη_ α!μοιροι του= θει/ου Πνευ/ματοφ γενο&μενοι α)μοτυ/ξωμεν τη=φ βασιλει/αφ τω~ν ου0ρανω~ν.[97] In this passage the loss of grace as glossary (ibid. p. 396); in the first book of Jeu c. 33 and often elsewhere (W. Till, p. 290 no. 3; cf. the glossary); for a general survey of its meaning and use see G. Fitzner, σφραγι/φ, etc., in: ThW VII, pp. 939-54 (esp. p. 952 ff.) (Stuttgart 1964). For its use among the Church Fathers cf. the following witnesses: Clemens Alex., Ed. proph. etc. (O. Stählin, Clemens Alexandrinus III [GCS 93,17] (Leipzig 1909)140,19; 188,18; 185,12); see O. Stählin, Clemens Alexandrinus IV – Register [GCS 39] (Leipzig 1936) 737; Excerpta ex Theodoto 80,3 (Fr. Sagnard, Clement d'Alexandrie: Extraits de Theodote [SC 23] reprinted Paris 1970, p. 204 f. no. 1); 83 (SC 23: p. 208 f. no. 2); 86,2 (SC 23: p. 210 f. nos. 6-9). Hippolytus, Philosophumena V 10,2 (P. Wendland [GCS 26] (Leipzig 1916)103 no. 18). Hippolytus calls this work κατα_ πασω~ν αι3ρε&σεων ε0λεγκοφ = Refutatio omnium haeresium; for the external in the Gnostics cf. Irenaeus, Adv.haer. I 20,4 (W. Harvey [Cambridge 1857; reprinted 1949] I 210) (I 25,6 [PG 7,685]); Epiphanius, Haer. I 27,5,9 (K. Holl [GCS 25; 31; 37] (Leipzig 1915/33) 308 nos. 3 ff.).

[95] Cf. A. d'Alès, L'édit de Calliste (Paris 1914), p. 52: le deuxième siècle ne nous a légué aucun document plus considerable pour l'histoire de la pénitence, que le Pasteur d'Hermas. Apart from M. Whittaker's edn in the GCS, which we are generally using here, we refer the reader to the revised and extended edn in the series 'Sources Chrétiennes' 53 bis: R. Joly, Hermas-Le Pasteur (Paris 1968).

[96] See the detailed historical studies on the penitential teaching of Hermas, Irenaeus of Lyons and especially Tertullian in this volume. In the present essay these individual authors are considered principally from the viewpoint of the loss of grace; the other studies in this volume attempt rather to summarize the whole penitential teaching of these individual authors and so to determine their place in the development of the nature of church penance.

[97] Irenaeus, Adv. haer. V 9,3 (Ad. Rousseau, et al. [SC 153] (Paris 1969), pp. 114-17 nos. 58-61).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the consequence of sin is clearly inserted between the sin and the eschatological loss of the kingdom. of God. Similarly, we read elsewhere: ut non amittentes eum, qui nos possidet Spiritum amittamus vitam.[98] Of the Gnostics Irenaeus says: propter suam incredulitatem aut luxuriam non adipiscuntur divinum spiritum et variis characteribus eiiciunt se vivificans Verbum.[99] Thus the heretics are in mortem demergunt sibi credentes[100] . . . letaliter vulnerantes.[101] In Irenaeus, therefore, the connection between sin, the loss of grace and exclusion from the kingdom of God is clearly expressed.[102] Apart from this, the few passages in Irenaeus which touch on the question of the practice and the theology of penance in the early Church offer little help for the problem with which we are presently concerned.[103]

Although the idea that grace could be lost was already clearly expressed before Tertullian, in the witnesses which we have questioned so far this was rather indirectly and in contexts where the main emphasis was on exhortation, even though they included a sharp attack on the heretical notions on grace. In the discussions about the Church's power to forgive sins which break out so acutely towards the end of the second century with Tertullian there begins the actual theological consideration of this question. The attempt is now made to prove the idea from the Bible and to establish more precisely which sins have this effect and which consequences this loss of grace itself further entails, etc. Thus this problem becomes an object of 'theology', i.e. one of the explicit and direct truths of the faith.

The attention which has been given to Tertullian's position regarding the possibility of a

---

[98] Irenaeus, Adv.haer. V 9,4 (SC 153: p. 120 nos. 89f.).
[99] Irenaeus, Adv. haer. V 8,3 (SC 153: p. 104 nos. 86-9).
[100] Irenaeus, Adv.haer. IV praef. 4 (Ad. Rousseau et al. C 100] (Paris 1965), p. 388 no. 48).
[101] Ibid., p. 388 nos. 59 f.
[102] The same idea is often found elsewhere in Irenaeus. Evil men α)πε/στησαν α)πο_ τη=φ του= θεου= ξα&ριτοφ (II 54; W. Harvey, I 308; II 33,5 PG 7,834). The 'perfect' are those qui et Spiritum semper perseverantem habent Dei et animas et corpora sine querela servaverint (V 6,1 SC l53: p. 80 f. nos. 52-5). The most perfect expression of Catholic teaching on grace in this respect is found in Adv. haer. 11,12 (W. Harvey I 57) (I 6,4 [PG 7,509]: η9μα~φ (the Catholics) με/ν γα_ρ ε0ν ξρη/σει τη_ν ξα&ρον λαμβα&νειν λε/γουσιν (the Gnostics) διο_ και∴ α)φαιρεθη/σεσθαι αυ0τη=φ; αυ0του_φ (the Gnostics) δε∴ ι0δια&κτητον α!νωθεν . . . συγκατεληλυθυι=αν ε1ξειν τη∴ν ξα&ριν και∴ δια_ του=το προστεθη/σεσθαι αυ0τοιφ. This statement reflects both the Gnostics' view of the Catholics' notion of grace and their own view. Its meaning is best rendered as follows: 'According to us Catholics, say the Gnostics, grace is received as a loan, but according to them (the Gnostics) it is received from above as a personal gift and, therefore, it can only increase.' The contrast 'according to us . . . according to them (in our view . . . in their view)' is demanded by the overall meaning of the sentence, since the whole passage transmits the notion of the Gnostics. According to them, Catholics (the psychics) do not receive 'grace' in the same way as do the 'pneumatic' Gnostics. Otherwise they would already have the right of access to the pleroma, which is not the case, since the 'psychic' Catholics lead a good life (cf Irenaeus, Adv.haer. I 1,12 [W. Harvey, I 59]; I 6,4 [PG 7,152]). Thus this statement of the Gnostics cannot ascribe the possession of 'grace' to the Catholics. It formulates the Catholic view of the nature of grace in opposition to the Gnostic notion. But it does provide us with a poignant formulation of the Catholic notion of grace in the words of the Gnostics. The Gnostics themselves obviously considered that their own view was superior to that of the Catholics: grace is not an inalienable possession; it can be taken away from a man if he does not lead a moral life which corresponds to the mules propounded by the one who dispenses this grace.
[103] On Irenaeus' penitential teaching cf. DThC VII, 2 col. 2496; A. d'Alès, 'La Discipline pénitentielle au II^{e} siècle en dehors d'Hermas' in: RSR 4 (1913), pp. 201-22; B. Poschmann, Paenitentia secunda (Bonn 1940), pp. 211-29; J. I. Hochban, 'St. Irenaeus on the Atonement' in: ThSt 7 (1946), pp. 525-57; H. Holstein, 'L'Exhomologèse dans l "Adversus haereses" de S. Irénée' in: RSR 35 (1948), pp. 282-8; cf. the author's 'The Post-baptismal Forgiveness of Sins in the Regula Fidei of Irenaeus' in the present volume. In Adv.haer. IV 27,4 (SC 100: p. 748 f. nos. 159 f.) it is stated: iniusti et idolatres et fornicatores vitam perdiderunt. This very probably refers also to those who are already baptized. Thus the 'life' in this text should be understood as the life of grace. The remaining texts in Irenaeus have nothing more to say about the question of penance in so far as it concerns us here. Adv.haer. IV 40,1 (SC 100: p. 974 f.) and V 11,1 (SC 153:pp. 132-7) do not draw any distinction between baptized and unbaptized penitents; the distinction is between the baptized and the unrepentant who postpone baptism.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

forgiveness of sins after baptism has perhaps led to a certain neglect of the theological presuppositions which underlie Tertullian's teaching on penance itself. We will here outline one of these presuppositions, since it is relevant to our question. After a general consideration this notion of Tertullian will be examined further in more detail.

In his Montanist period in order to justify and to promote theologically his penitential rigorism Tertullian had to explain, first of all, why certain sins cannot be forgiven after baptism. And to do this he [43] had to touch, at least briefly, on the idea of a loss of baptismal grace. Only after he had done this was Tertullian able to conclude with his trenchant dialectic:[104] what baptism has given to a man, namely the Spirit, grace, is lost again through sin. Now a man is able to receive baptism only once. Through serious sin after baptism, therefore, there occurs a loss which cannot be made good again. The one and only way remaining to do this is the other baptism which God still gives, the baptism of blood in martyrdom. Otherwise, all that remains is the uncertain prospect that God will perhaps still be gracious towards a life-long penitent. In any case, for such sins there is no forgiveness by means of a precise ritual, analogous to baptism,[105] which would restore baptismal grace to the sinner. This would mean the introduction of a second baptism.

It is possible today to underestimate the force of this argument in Tertullian. Thanks to the sacrament of penance, the possibility of a second bestowal of grace has become accepted, and the nature and effects of penance are considered in such a way that the definitive character and the uniqueness of baptism are not thereby neglected. In Tertullian's day, however, this view was by no means quite so clear. Tertullian could be quite justified, therefore, in thinking that he had a decisive argument for his thesis that certain sins were unforgivable. He reasoned as follows: either the baptized person does not lose the baptismal grace through sin or – if he has lost it – he cannot recover it and is for ever dead. The first solution was not acceptable, being recognized as Gnostic and considered false. Against the second solution was the witness of the teaching of the Bible and the Church's self-awareness which was expressed in its practice and, to a greater or lesser extent, in its teaching. How are both of these truths to be reconciled without detriment to the decisive significance of baptism – a point on which all were profoundly agreed?[106]

As often happens elsewhere, the Church's awareness of its faith here appears to contain two contradictory truths. And there is a temptation to sacrifice one truth in order to save the other. Nevertheless, in his De paen. the reconciliation of these two truths does not yet appear to have presented any difficulties to Tertullian; thus it is not here that we should look for the basis of his erroneous teaching on penance. In his De pud., however, he later saw the problem clearly and there solved it in a false sense on the basis of practical [44] rigorism supported by his rigid dialectic. The Church's answer to this question in Tertullian's time consisted simply [104] This argument should not, however, be considered either the first or the most important one for Tertullian's teaching on penance. There are several other factors which gave rise to this teaching. The principal reason for his false teaching on penance must be seen in both his practical rigorism and his exaggerated idealism. His montanist view of the Church also played a role at this point. Nevertheless, his speculation on the subject of the loss of grace must also have exercised considerable influence on the development of this penitential teaching. Certainly he would have wanted to corroborate the already established teaching on the unforgivable nature of the capital sins with any supporting arguments.

[105] Tertullian maintained that only God could forgive capital sins, either in the next life or already here through montanist prophets by a special impulse of the Holy Spirit. This does not contradict our explanation of his thought. The forgiveness which is impossible is that through an act of the hierarchical Church, that is, of a bishop, such as is the case in baptism as the Church's sacramental application of Christ's redemption. It is only this possibility which, according to Tertullian, would jeopardize the definitive nature of baptism, which alone can give sacramental grace.

[106] Cf. the texts of the Church Fathers which stress emphatically the uniqueness of baptism in J. Stufler, 'Die Verschiedenen Wirkungen der Taufe und Busse bei Tertullian' in: ZKTh 31 (1907), pp. 372-6.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in maintaining these two apparently contradictory truths. It was only at a later period that the Church succeeded in showing how these two truths were not mutually exclusive. In the Fathers of the Church there are only the first elements of the distinction which has to be made in order to resolve the question.[107] Apart from Origen, however, these witnesses hail from a century after Tertullian. As in other cases, theological progress in this question was made possible by the clear distinction between the recognition of a truth of the faith, on the one hand, and the speculative justification of this truth, together with its integration into the body of all the truths of the faith, on the other. This process is demanded by the very nature of revealed truth.

Although, in this essay, we are not concerned with the penitential controversy as such, Tertullian' s way of arguing is still of some importance. It shows how the teaching on the loss of baptismal grace is already a presupposition for Tertullian from which other views can be derived. We have already been able to trace the historical development of this teaching up to its explicit formulation. For his part, Tertullian now considers its consequences and how it is connected and compatible with the other truths of the faith. This is surely an indication of how clearly at this point of time the teaching of the loss of baptismal grace was already recognized.

On yet another question Tertullian' s view of penance proved to be important. If, with his teaching that serious sins are unforgivable, he wished to take any account of the daily life of Christians he had to restrict the number of these sins as much as possible.[108] He could not make such strict moral demands that would include the majority of Christians among those sinners who were excluded from the Church. Thus he had to compensate the exaggeration in his view of the consequences of sin with an excessive leniency in his judgement of the gravity of the sins themselves. Only a few sins, therefore, entail the loss of baptismal grace. In this way he arrived at his teaching on capital sins,[109] which, as a special group, are sharply distinguished from other sins. Only the former are 'serious' or mortal sins in today's sense. Although even the distinction which Tertullian drew between serious and light sins was a false one, this view still remains the first attempt we know of to make a distinction between serious and venial faults, in the sense of essentially different [45] categories, especially in reference to their effect on grace. We must now examine these main lines of Tertullian's teaching in greater detail.

1. The Loss of Grace in General

Tertullian's teaching on the possibility of the loss of grace in general did not change when he passed over to Montanism. Thus there is no need to make any distinction here between his writings from his Catholic period and those from his Montanist period. He certainly does not waste many words on this question. The Shepherd of Hermas and Irenaeus of Lyons, both of whom he knew and used, had a clear position on this question. At the same time, Christian experience, the practice of the Church and the teaching of the Bible pointed clearly in the same direction. Thus the question no longer called for explicit treatment. Tertullian merely reiterates it clearly and succinctly.

We are templum Dei illato in nos et consecrato Spiritu Sancto and must beware ne Deus

[107] Cf. J. Stufler, ibid.
[108] Tertullian himself gives the reason why all sins are not peccata ad mortem. We are so often tempted and we sin so often ut, si nulla sit venia istorum (of daily sins), nemini salus competat. De pud. 19 (CSL 20) 265,20 f.
[109] For Tertullian's teaching on capital sins cf. A. d'Alès, L'édit de Calliste (Paris, 1914), p. 197 ff. The indeterminateness of capital sins, with regard to both their number and their nature, only shows that the teaching was invented as a compensation for the previous error.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ille qui inhabitat inquinatam sedem offensus derelinquat.[110] Without the virtue of patience, which 'safeguards the Spirit', the Spirit cannot stay long in man. If this virtue is lacking the Spirit of God cannot withstand the assaults of the enemy and, therefore, will not remain in us.[111] The confessors are admonished by Tertullian not to sadden the Holy Spirit (cf. Eph. 4:20): et ideo date operam, ut (Spiritus Sanctus) illic vobiscum perseveret.[112] Tertullian presupposes, therefore, that the Spirit of God, who previously helped the confessors to bear imprisonment, can be lost. He recognizes, therefore, that it is possible to lose the Spirit.[113] Indeed, in another passage he teaches clearly that the Spirit received in baptism is in fact lost, along with all his gifts, through several sins. This is how Tertullian describes the gifts of grace which the Christian receives as his mysterious fortune (substantia) and as his inheritance as the child of God: remissio delictorum, absolutio mortis, regeneratio hominis, consecutio Spiritus Sancti.[114] In baptism we receive the Holy Spirit[115] and are enlightened by him;[116] we put on Christ.[117] Thus baptism is a regeneratio caelestis,[118] a nova nativitas.[119] In baptism we receive the image and likeness of God and the Spirit with all his heavenly gifts (bona caelestia), in other words, everything which [46] Adam lost in paradise.[120] Tertullian is talking, therefore, about the reception of interior gifts, about the Spirit and grace which are bestowed on the soul in baptism. However, the Christian loses these gifts completely if he commits a serious sin after baptism. Penance before baptism prepares in man a pure dwelling for the Holy Spirit, quo se ille (Spiritus Sanctus) cam caelestibus bonis libens inferat.[121] If a person does not take seriously the conversion which is required for baptism he must reckon with Tertullian's warning that what God is about to give in baptism can be lost again after baptism: Non enim multi postea excidunt? Non a multis donum illud aufertur?[122] To lack true seriousness when receiving baptism is to run the risk of losing the baptismal grace, the donum

[110] Tertullian, De cultu fern. II,1 (CSL 70) 71,8.11-12. The text here runs: templum dei simus, inlato in nos et consecrato spiritu sancto . . . and: ne deus ille qui inhabitat inquinatam sedem offensus derelinquat. This terminology is found already in the Shepherd of Hermas. For instance, in Mand. X 2,5 we read: μη_ θλι~βε (corresponding to Tertullian's offensus) το_ πνευ=μα το_ α#γιον το_ ε0ν σοι∴ κατοικου=ν μη/ποτε . . . α)ποστη= α)μο_ σου= (GCS 48: p. 39 nos. 9 f). There are similar reminiscences of Hermas when we read in Tertullian's De spect. 15 (CSL 20: p. 16 nos. 21-4): deus praecepit spiritum sanctum, utpote pro naturae suae bono tenerum et delicatum, tranquillitate et lenitate et quiete et pace tractare, non furore, non bile, non ira, non dolore inquietare. Cf. Hermas, Mand. V 1,3 (GCS 48: p. 29 nos. 11, 14 f.) the πνευ=μα α#γιον is τρυφερο&ν (tener) and, therefore, lives only in the person who is μακαρο&θυμοφ. It retires when ο_χυξολι/α enters into a man's heart. Another parallel to this is Tertullian, De or. 12 (CSL 20;p. 188 nos. 12-17). The στενοξωρει=σθαι in Hermas, Mand. V 1,3 (GCS 48: p. 29, 11) corresponds to the angi of the Holy Spirit in De pat. 15 (CSL47: p. 23 no. 17).

[111] De pat. 15 (CSL 47: p. 22 no 21 and p. 23 nos. 12 ff.).

[112] Ad mart. 1,3 (CCHL 1) 3 nos. 15 f.

[113] Cf. also De cultu fem. 11,2 (CSL 70: p. 73 no. 9).

[114] Adv. Marc. I 28 (CSL 47: p. 329 f. no. 29 and nos. 1,2 f., 4 f., 7).

[115] De Anima I (CSL 20: p. 299 nos. 21 f.); De bapt. 6/7 (CSL 20: p. 206 f.). According to Tertullian the communication of the Spirit occurs only through confirmation which is conferred together with baptism. This is a point which we need not consider further here, especially since Tertullian himself makes this distinction in other passages; cf. Adv. Marc. IV 17 (CSL 47: p. 474 no. 21).

[116] De carn. resur. 8 (CSL 47: p. 37 no. 3).

[117] De fuga in persec. 10,2 (CCHL II: p. 1147 nos. 16 f.); Adv. Marc. III 12 (CSL 47: p. 393 no. 1).

[118] De carne Christi 4 (CSL 70: p. 197 no. 31); De carn. resur. 47 (CSL 47: p. 96 no. 28).

[119] De carne Christi 17 (CSL 70: p. 232 no. 11); De bapt. I (CSL 20: p. 201 no. 13); De exhort. cast. 1,4 (CCHL II: p. 1015 nos. 17 f.).

[120] De bapt. 5 (CSL 20: p. 206 nos. 10-14); De paen. 2,3 (CCHL I: p. 322 nos.8-14); de anima 41 (CSL 20: p. 368 f. no. 30 and nos. 1-3).

[121] De paen. 2,6 (CCHL I: p. 323 no. 30).

[122] De paen. 6,13 (CCHL l: p. 331 nos. 49 f.). Cf. ibid., p. 331 nos. 48 f. (6,12): quis autem promittit permansuram et quod tribuerit invitus?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

again, supposing that it is received in the first place. Similarly, in De paen.[123] Tertullian presupposes the loss of baptismal grace when he says to the sinner faced with The second penance: Amisisti quod acceperas (that is, in baptism). This is even more clearly expressed in De pud.: the person guilty of impurity is completely dead.[124] There are sins, therefore, which are mortal.[125] The sinner is a lost son who has lost and squandered completely the property which he has received in baptism from God his father (substantia baptismatis).[126] It is precisely here that Tertullian describes particularly clearly the nature of this lost baptismal gift: it is the indumentum Spiritus Sancti, the signaculum lavacri, the substantia utique baptismatis, utique Spiritus Sancti.[127] The person who has sinned seriously no longer has any wedding garment, he is spoliatus, exutus bonis mentis.[128] The person guilty of impurity expels the Lord from his body instead of glorifying him and bearing him in his body.[129] The sinful flesh kills the Spirit: spiritum elidit.[130] In De pud. 9 Tertullian says that, in baptism, the pagan receives vestem pristinam, statum scilicet quem Adam transgressus amiserat.[131] Moreover, in the same chapter it is stated that, according to the Catholics, the repentant apostate will receive back the vestis prior.[132] Thus both Tertullian and the Catholics presuppose that an apostate has lost the vestis prior, i.e., the position which Adam had in Paradise.[133] Tertullian frequently explains the nature of this status of Adam. Even in De paen. already the sinner is the lost son[134] who, after squandering his father's goods, returns naked. Taking part in idolatrous shows is a signaculum rescindere,[135] this being Tertullian's translation of Hermas' θλα~ν τη.∴ν σφραγι=δα.[136]

[47]

2. The Consequences of the Teaching of the Loss of Grace

Tertullian uses this teaching of the loss of grace to arrive at further theological conclusions. In his Montanistic period he derives from this teaching the idea that certain sins are unforgivable, and it is in this connection that he draws a distinction between sins which entail the loss of grace and those which do not have this effect. The latter point is of special importance for our present purpose.

Along with other considerations, Tertullian derives his view that some sins, which he calls capital sins, are unforgivable from the fact that these sins destroy the baptismal grace.

[123] De paen. 7,11 (CCHL I: p. 334 no. 40). Tertullian does not seem to have been very clear on the question of whether a person who did not undertake a serious conversion before baptism would really receive the grace of baptism. He contents himself with the observation that such a 'baptized' person is at least in danger of losing this grace again.
[124] De pud. 7 (CSL 20: p. 233 nos. 4 f.). Tertullian says of heretics*, de vivis mortuos faciunt,* in De praescr.haer. 30,17 (CCHL I: p. 212 no. 47).
[125] De pud. 2 (CSL 20: p. 224 nos. 6-11).
[126] De pud. 9 (CSL 20: p. 236 nos. 27 ff.).
[127] De pud. 9 (CSL 20: p. 237 nos. 8 f. and p. 236 nos. 28 f.).
[128] De pud. 9 (CSL 20: p. 237 no. 12; p. 236 no. 30).
[129] De pud. 16 (CSL 20: p. 253 no. 27; p. 254 no. 1).
[130] De pud. 22 (CSL 20: p. 273 no. 22).
[131] De pud. 9 (CSL 20: p. 238 nos. 3 f.).
[132] De pud. 9 (CSL 20: p. 236 nos. 27 ff.; p. 237 no. 8).
[133] Cf. for example Adv.Marc. II 2 (CSL 47: p. 335 nos. 19-27); II 6 (CSL 47:p 341 nos. 13-22); II 8 (CSL 47: p. 345 nos. 8-13); De bapt. 5 (CSL 20: p. 206.11-14); De spect. 2 (CSL 20: p. 3 nos. 20 f.; p. 4 nos. 11-14); De pat. 5 (CSL 47: p.no. 1); De cultu fern. I 1,2 (CCHL I: p. 343 no. 19); De anima 16 (CSL 20: p. 321 nos. 21-23); 41 (CSL 20: p. 368,18-369,7); De carn. resur. 26 (CSL 47: p. 63 nos. 11-2.
[134] De paen. 8,6 (CCHL 1: p. 335 nos. 21-32).
[135] De spect. 24 (CSL 20: p. 24 no. 17).
[136] Hermas, Sim. VIII 6,3 (GCS 48: p. 71 no. 18).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Although this is not the only and the most important reason for his view, it is still very clear. According to Tertullian, man is redeemed by Christ's unrepeatable suffering on the cross. This redemptive offering is appropriated by man at baptism which, however, he is able to receive only once. If a man has lost the gift of baptism, he has no further means – at least, no sacramental means of the institutional Church – of regaining the baptismal grace. Homo cum inquinatur, occiditur.[137] The sinner is not only 'lost' or 'wayward', he is 'dead'.[138] Baptism has been lost.[139] Thus the sinner has ceased to have God as the source of his existence.[140] The incestuous person is mortuus, devoratus,[141] as Tertullian puts it. And this consequence, this loss of the baptismal grace is caused by the serious sins. They are delicta ad mortem.[142] Of the sins which Paul enumerates in 1 Corinthians 6:9 f. Tertulhian observes: delicta ista . . . post lavacrum irremissibilia constituit (scl. Paulus), siquidem denuo ablui non licet.[143] But this means only that a baptism through which these sins would be able to be remitted is no longer possible, i.e. these sins cannot be forgiven. Tertullian does not develop this idea any further. Nevertheless there can be no doubt that he bases the fact that these sins cannot be forgiven on the impossibility of repeating baptism. Thus Tertullian must presuppose that only those sins which he describes as unforgivable destroy the baptismal grace totally. What, according to him even in his Montanistic period, can be forgiven[144] by the Church cannot, therefore, have this totally destructive effect. If these sins, too, caused the total loss of the baptismal grace, then the same would apply to these leviora delicta: irremissibilia siquidem denuo ablu, non licet. But Tertullian in fact declares that sins other than capital sins do not annihilate the baptismal [48] grace. The person who frequents the circus or the dubious theatre, who tries to compromise himself with ambiguous formulas when making his confession of faith, who provides objects for the worship of idols, etc., is aberrant and a vivens adhuc peccator.[145] His faults are sordes, but not irremissible maculae.[146] Even those sins of which Paul disapproves in Corinth – apart from incest – do not, according to Tertullian, bring it about that a sinner is lost totally. Rather, he remains a salvus.[147]

As a proof that some sins are unforgivable we read in Tertullian: quis enim timebit prodigere (scl. substantiam utique baptismatis, utique Spiritus Sancti, et exinde spei

[137] De pud. 5 (CSL 20: p. 227 nos. 18 f.).
[138] De pud. 7 (CSL 20: p. 232 no. 15; p. 233 no. 7).
[139] De pud. 13 (CSL 20: p. 246 nos. 2 f.: baptismate amisso).
[140] De pud. 19 (CSL 20: p. 265 nos. 7 f.).
[141] De pud. 14 (CSL 20: p. 248 no. 18; p. 249 no. 16).
[142] De pud. 2 (CSL 20: p. 224 nos. 6-16); 19 (CSL 20: p. 265 no. 29; p. 266 no.7).
[143] De pud. 16 (CSL 20: p. 253 nos. 1 f.).
[144] De pud. 18 (CSL 20: p. 261 no. 26).
[145] De pud. 7 (CSL 20: p. 232 nos. 19 ff.; p. 233 nos. 3 f.). In De pud. 19 20: p. 265 nos. 15-21) Tertullian mentions yet another group of delicta non ad mortem, namely the delicta cotidianae incursionis. It should be noted that, in Tertullian's Catholic period, taking part in spectacala was considered rescindere signaculum (De spect. 24 [CSL 20: p. 24 no. 17]). In his montanist period, however, such a sinner is vivens adhuc peccator, who sins non moriendo sed errando and thus is reckoned as salvus (De pud. 7 [CSL 20: p. 232 nos. 19,20 f.; p. 233 no, 3]). This laxity on the part of a rigorist Tertullian is comprehensible only on the assumption which we have already explained: if such sinners were also in Tertullian's later view dead and complete devoid of baptismal grace, then logically he would have to deny them any possibility of having their sins forgiven. In order to avoid this conclusion he maintains that these sins are not mortal.
[146] De pud. 16 (CSL 20: p. 255 nos. 27 f.); 12 (CSL 20: p. 241 nos. 21 f.).
[147] De pud. 14 (CSL 20: p. 249 no. 20): nihil de transacto praecavetur, sed de adhuc salvo. With sheer consistency Tertullian considers that only those guilty capital sins are outside the Church, while all other sinners are still in it. Cf. De pud. (CSL 20: p. 233 nos. 17 f.): intra domum dei ecclesiam licet esse aliqua delicta; in the case of capital sins, however, statim homo de ecclesia expellitur (ibid., nos. 23 f.) The man guilty of a capital sin no longer has the solacium navis ecclesiae (ibid., p. 2 nos. 20 f.); he belongs to those extra ecclesiam proiectis (ibid., no. 25).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

aeternae)[148] quod habebit postea recuperare. This presupposes, however, that in the case of sins which can be forgiven by the Church there is no loss of the baptismal grace. Otherwise, it should also be said of these sins: Quis timebit prodigere, quod habebit postea recuperare, quis curabit perpetuo conservare quod non perpetuo poterit amittere.[149] Elsewhere also Tertullian's train of thought presupposes this idea. Thus, in his view, for some sins there is only the penance of baptism. The pagan sinner is a semel diluendus per gratiam Christi semel pro peccatis nostris morte functi. [150] Thus Tertullian argues from the unrepeatable character of Christ's death on the cross to the unrepeatable character of baptism, considered as the application of Christ's offering to men, and then to the conclusion that capital sins are unforgivable.[151] These sins are indeed forgiven at baptism but if they are committed afterwards they annul the effects of baptism. This is not the case with those sins which Tertullian considers forgivable. The same conclusion follows from Tertullian's idea that there is only one way that such sins committed after baptism can be forgiven: the baptism of blood.[152] Thus it is martyrium . . . quod solum omni substantia prodacta restituere filium poterit.[153] There are crimina non nisi proprio martyrio diluenda. This is because martyrdom is an aliud baptisma.[154] Already, in earlier writings, Tertullian had called martyrdom secunda regeneratio, secunda intinctio, secundum lavacrum.[155] Against this background the statement that some sins, by which the whole property of the son is squandered, can be forgiven only by the second baptism – itself only possible once – that is, by martyrdom, has a meaning only if the sins which can be forgiven by the Church have not dissipated the whole baptismal gift and, therefore, have not made a second baptism necessary.

Let us now resume the whole of Tertullian's train of thought as we have traced it in our interpretation. He expressed its premisses, albeit in a different sense, already in his Catholic period. In De bapt. he says:[156] semel ergo lavacrum inimus, semel delicta diluuntur, quia ea iterani non oportet. Here already he speaks of the baptism of blood in exactly the same way as later in De pud: hic est baptismus qui lavacrum . . . perditum reddit.[157] How is this to be understood in Tertullian's Catholic period? It has been taken to mean[158] that according to Tertullian penance has indeed the power to forgive sins but does not bring about readmission into the community of the Church. Since this distinction is totally alien to Tertullian, such a view is patently false. In De paen. he teaches clearly that there is a readmission into the Church.[159] Moreover, other Fathers of the Church use the same expressions and they also recognize a readmission into the Church. Indeed, as a Montanist, Tertullian understood the [148] De pud. 9 (CSL 20: p. 237 nos. 5 f. and for the explanation in brackets ibid., 236 nos. 28 f.).

[149] Ibid., p. 237 nos. 5-7.
[150] De pud. 18 (CSL 20: p. 261 nos. 14 f.).
[151] Ibid.; cf. also De pud. 17 (CSL 20: p. 257 nos. 3-6); 9 (ibid., p. 237 nos. 9 f.): rursus illi mactabitur Christus.
[152] Tertullian leaves open the further possibility of forgiveness by God himse1f, either in the next life or through the mediation of some prophets specially inspired for the particular task. This element of indecisiveness does not, however, affect the argument put forward. The latter concerns only the exclusion of every certainly effective ex opere operato means which is administered after the manner of baptism by the ecclesia numerus episcoporum (De pud. 21 [CSL 20: p. 271 nos. 9 f.]). In effect Tertullian seems to have considered the pardon by God in the next life as a last, undetermined hope, of which theme was no certainty.
[153] De pud. 9 (CSL 20: p. 238 nos. 25-7). If baptism in blood is the only sure means of forgiveness for those guilty of capital sins, then the omnis substantia (of baptism) cannot be destroyed by those sins which can be forgiven without martyrdom.
[154] De pud. 22 (CSL 20: p. 272 nos. 23-5).
[155] De pat. 13 (CSL 47: p. 21 no. 4); Scorp. 6,9 (CSL 20: p. 158 nos. 3-10); De bapt. 16 (CSL 20: p. 214 no. 14); Apolog. 50,13.15 f. (CCHL I: p. 171 nos. 60 f. 67-70).
[156] De bapt. 15 (CSL 20: p. 214 nos. 7 f.).
[157] De bapt. 16 (CSL 20: p. 214 nos. 22 f.).
[158] Cf. F. X. Funk, 'Das Indulgenzedikt des Papstes Kallistus' in: ThQ 88 (1906), pp. 543, 554 f.
[159] Cf. A. d'Alès, L'édit de Calliste (Paris 1914), p. 154 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

whole relationship between God's forgiveness, which we receive already in this life, and the pax of the Church in a sense which is exactly the reverse to that suggested by the above-mentioned view. Satis denegavit (Spiritus Sanctus) veniam eorum quorum custodiam elegit. . . Hinc est quod neque . . . pax ab ecclesiis redditur.[160] Because God, therefore, does not forgive sinners, neither do they receive a pax. Otherwise these sinners receive no pax, even though God gives them forgiveness. During his Catholic period Tertullian recognized a complete divine and church forgiveness for all sins committed after baptism. In this case, what is the meaning of the passage in De bapt.: semel delicta diluuntur, quia ea iterari non oportet? The attempt has been made to explain the view expressed in these words with reference to later Fathers of the Church.[161] But it always remains unsatisfactory to have recourse for an explanation to expressions which arise a hundred or a hundred and fifty years later. Certainly the sentence could be a paraphrase of the semel lavacrum inimus, which would mean that the uniqueness of baptism were stressed without, however, a penance which has partly the same effects as baptism being at all contested. Nevertheless, what is the reason for such a stress on the uniqueness of baptism? Certainly the second penance – especially in the practice of that time – was the more onerous. But this difference ought not to be exaggerated. A change in moral behaviour was also demanded of candidates for baptism, as is evidenced both by Tertullian with his exhortations in [50] De paen. and the numerous formulas of renunciation demanded before baptism. It is possible that the reason for a stress on the uniqueness of baptism is the existence of false teachings which recognized repeated baptism.[162]

But what are the reasons for the stress on the semel dilui peccata, in particular, and what did Tertullian as a Catholic understand by this phrase? It is, after all, somewhat vague and ambiguous. At that time there was no clear idea either of its meaning or of its compatibility with the possibility of a further penance after baptism. Tertullian was able to understand the phrase in De bapt. quite correctly, while some twenty years later he could give it a precise but false meaning from which he was able to derive a new penitential teaching. Nevertheless, the expression which is already found in De bapt. does not provide a definite key to Tertullian's view in De pud. In the latter text he was able to define the meaning of phrases in a way which previously one would not even have suspected. Nevertheless, the new teaching could receive a basis which the original and previous meaning of the formulas could not provide. Against this explanation it may be objected that Tertullian afterwards in De pud. recognizes a penance for sins[163] which can only be interpreted as venial, i.e. do not entail the loss of baptismal grace. But this admission does not seem possible. Nevertheless, this contradiction concerns not only the explanation which is offered here: it has its basis in Tertullian himself. Moreover, it is not the only case of contradiction in De pud. This case, however, can be explained without great difficulties. Tertullian wished to prove the unforgivable character of capital sins. To do this he uses the line of argument which we have explained. On the other hand, he is aware of the church institution of penance which he cannot simply explain as false and reprehensible. He simply ascribes to it, therefore, the treatment of the other sins, without considering further whether the institution of penance was actually superfluous for these sins alone, since now it is a question only of 'venial' sins.[164] Despite his restricting the number of [161] Cf. J. Stufler, 'Die verschiedenen Wirkungen der Taufe und Busse nach Tertullian' in: ZKTh 31 (1907), pp. 372-6; with regard to De bapt. 15 (CSL 20: p. 214 nos. 7 f.).

[160] De pud. 12 (CSL 20: p. 242 nos. 25-7).
[162] Cf. for example Hippolytus, Philosophumena IV 41,2 (GCS 26: p. 172 nos.21 ff.); 42,1 (ibid., p. 173 nos. 13 f.); IX 15,1 (ibid., p. 253 nos. 10ff.); IX 13 (ibid., p. 251 nos. 22 ff.). On the work of Hippolytus cf. n.94 above.
[163] De pud. 18 (CSL 20: p. 261 nos. 25 f.); 21 (ibid., p. 270 nos. 30-2).
[164] The sins for which, therefore, public penance is appropriate are those mentioned in De paen. There appears to be no reason to see here a reference to private church penance. Authors who think that there is are: A. d'Alès,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

actual serious sins, there still remained faults which were in fact sufficiently 'serious' for the institution of penance. The idea that capital sins are the only actual serious sins was not completely outlandish at that time. This is borne out by the fact that even later only those sins count as materia confessionis which are hardly less grave than Tertullian's capital sins.[165]

It is not necessary to inquire here, in particular, which sins according [51] to Tertullian belong to the mortal sins which cannot be forgiven. Even the principles governing such a distinction are not of importance here. Basically, sins against God are not to be forgiven, whereas faults against men can receive forgiveness. In any case, this principle works when applied with reference to Tertullian's capital sins.[166] In some passages he has attempted to define these sins in detail with the help of biblical expressions.[167] As far as the number of these faults is concerned, a certain oscillation is noticeable. In De pud. idolatry, impurity and murder are usually mentioned, although accompanied by seven or more such sins.[168]

For Tertullian, therefore, the delicta irremissibilia are not only sins which, because of their

---

L'édit de Calliste (Paris 1941), p. 437, and P. Galtier, L'église et la rémission des péchés aux premiers siècles (Paris 1932), p. 272 ff. The sins which Tertullian, even in his montanist period, allows to be submitted to the institution of penance are serious ones, both objectively and in so far as previous practice is concerned. It should be assumed, therefore, that they are submitted to public penance, even if Tertullian presents them as leviora delicta by comparison with capital sins. Tertullian himself does not seem to have averted to the fact that since such sins have become 'venial' in his theology they no longer require church penance. Similarly he did not see that, in the light of his own opinions, theme was no longer an essential difference between the leviora delicta and the delicta cotidianae incursionis. Tertullian would have been decidedly aware of these contradictions in his theory only if, before him, the difference between serious and venial sins had already been explained reflexively with regard to their effect on grace. But there is no indication that this was the case.

[165] Thus, for example, Augustine attacked the notion that only capital sins were serious sins; cf. De fide et operibus 19 n.34 (J. Zycha, S.Aur.Augustini . . . [CSL 41] 79 f. nos. 15-23 and nos. 1 f.); Speculum 29 (Fr. Weihrich, S.Aur. Augustini . . . [CSL 12] 199 f. nos. 25-9 and nos. 1-4). He appears, however, to have held in practice this view which he rejected in theory; cf. K. Adam, Die kirchliche Sündenvergebung nach dem hl. Augustin (Paderborn 1917), p. 27. Caesarius of Arles draws a distinction between capitalia crimina and minuta peccata. The latter include not only gossip in the church but also iuramenta, periuria, maledicta, sordidae cogitationes, voluptuosa delectatio aurium; cf. Sermo 64,2 (G. Morin, S.Caes.Arel.Sermo I [CCHL 103] p. 264 nos. 3-8); the group of the capitalia, however, includes more than the three well-known major sins; cf. Sermo 179 (G. Morin, S.Caes.Arel.Serm. II [CCHL 104] p. 684 nos. 29-32). Gregory of Nyssa, Epist. can. 7,6 (PG 45, 232 f.), deplores the fact that there is traditionally no church penance applicable to certain sins, even though he holds that these faults arc serious. But in general they must have been considered otherwise. Basil, De iud.Dei 7 (P031,669) appears to take a similar practice and theory for granted, while deploring it. At that time the institution of penance was obviously still administered as paenitentia publica in the form which it had previously. The only sins which were considered with certainty to destroy grace were capital sins. Then in Augustine's day theme was an ever-increasing general awareness of the much wider circle of serious sins. This had to give rise to certain difficulties, since church penance in its previous form was not applicable to this enlarged circle of sins. However, the form of the traditional institution of penance was not to be altered so easily and so quickly. Thus the idea arose gradually that certain serious sins could be remitted in the same way as venial sins. All that this required was the sinner's personal penance without the mediation of the Church (cf. K. Adam, Die kirchliche Sündenvergebung nach dem hl. Augustin (Paderborn 1917), p. 20 f.; K. Jüssen, Die dogmatischen Anschauungen des Hesychius von Jerusalem II (Münster 1934), pp. 97 ff., 103 ff.). The criterion for deciding which sins arc to be submitted to church penance and which sins are to be expiated by personal penance cannot be found, therefore, in the way these sins deprive men of grace or leave grace intact. It became necessary to introduce into penance at this point another way of distinguishing sins (sins of deed/sins of thought; public, notorious sins/secret sins; etc.).

[166] Cf. A. d'Alès, L'édit de Calliste (Paris 1914), p. 208 ff.

[167] For this he takes as his basis the decalogue, the decree of the Council of Jerusalem, the sentence passed on the incestuous person in 1 Cor. and similar texts.

[168] In De pud. 5 three capital sins are mentioned: idolatria, moechia and homicidium, cf. De pud. 12 (CSL 20: p. 226 f.; ibid., p. 242 nos. 4 f.); in De pud. 19 (ibid., p. 265 nos. 23 f.) it is a question of homicidium, idolatria, fraus negatio, blasphemia, utique et moechia et fornicatio et si qua alia violatio templi dei; Adv.Marc. IV 9 (CSL 47: p. 441 nos. 28 f.; p. 442 no. 1) names seven capital sins. Cf. A. d'Alès, L'édit de Calliste (Paris 1914), p. 205 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

gravity, God does not forgive. Rather, they form a group of faults by which the baptismal grace is destroyed, i.e. mortal sins.[169] There is really no difference between what we call mortal sin and Tertullian's delictum irremissibile. Tertullian's delictum ad mortem has the same effect on baptismal grace. Thus he can say: . . . aut neges moechiam et fornicationem mortalia esse delicta aut irremissibilia fatearis.[170] The deadly effect of these sins demands that they should be unforgivable. Tertullian speaks of these sins above all with reference to 1 John 5:16, according to which one should not pray for the delicta ad mortem. Nevertheless, all the explanations given refer to the understanding of mortal sin in today's sense.[171]

Tertullian attempts, therefore, an explicit definition of the difference between light and serious sins precisely with regard to their effect. It is here that we meet this distinction explicitly for the first time, although – from the very nature of the case – it was already clear to the conscience. Serious sins destroy grace, light sins, according to Tertullian, let it remain, at least essentially. Further, he begins to establish in detail which sins in fact belong to each group. This attempt, as far as it was carried out, was a failure. The statement that for mortal sins, in the sense outlined, there is no forgiveness is even false. Nevertheless, a certain [169] The expression 'mortal sin' must have been drawn from 1 John 5:16. Thus already in Tertullian, besides delictum ad mortem (De pud. 2 [CSL 20: p. 224 no. 101 and De pud. 19 [ibid., p. 266 no. 2]), is also found the expression mortalia delicta (Cf. I De pud. 19 [ibid., p. 266 nos. 8 f.]). Corresponding to this, Cyprian also has the notion, mortale crimen (De bono pat. 14 [CSL 3,l: p. 407 no. 21]). In Origen we find α(μαρτη/ματα μη_ θανατηφο&ρα (In Matth. XIII n.30 [GCS 38: p. 264 no. 16]) and in translations of his works crimen mortale, culpa mortalis (In Lev.hom. XII n.3 [GCS 29: p. 489 nos. 13 f.]) and mortale peccatum (ibid., p. 460 nos. 1,5). The same expression is then also found in Pacian, Epist. 3 ad Sympronianum (PL 13,1063).

[170] De pud. 19 (CSL 20: p. 266 nos. 8 f.).

[171] This notion of the delicta mortalia in Tertullian is disputed by other authors who hold that Tertullian considered the delicta leviora to be mortal sins in today's sense. Thus for example B. I. Döllinger, Hippolytus und Kallistus (Regensburg 1853), p. 137; B. Poschmann, Die Sichtbarkeit den Kirche nach den Lehre des hl. Cyprian (Paderborn 1908), p. 143; P. Galtier, L'église et la rémission des péchés aux premiers siècles (Paris 1932), p. 272 n.5. Certainly it is possible to conclude from Tertullian that, according to the Catholics also, the leviora delicta were the object of church penance, that is, that they were necessarily treated as serious sins (cf. P. Galtier, p. 273 f.; A. d'Alès, p. 437). Nevertheless, it is not correct to conclude that Tertullian, in his own theory, considered such faults as mortal sins in our sense. Those guilty of such sins are styled 'lost' (cf. De pud. 7 [CSL 20: p. 232 nos. 20 f.]), although the context demands that the term is used here in a wide sense. According to Tertullian, the parables of the lost sheep and the lost drachma can be applied to Christians who have sinned. It is in this sense that a person guilty of such a sin is 'lost'. The precise nature of this 'being lost' needs to be underlined particularly in relation to these parables: Licet enim perisse dicatur, erit et de perditionis genere retractare (cf. De pud. 7 [CSL 20: p. 232 nos. 17 f.]). It is here a question of an erring, not of a destruction (quia et ovis non moriendo, sed errando et drachma non interiendo, sed latitando perierunt; ibid., nos. 19-20). 'In this sense it could be said (finally) that what is "lost" is (actually) still safe' = ita licet dici perisse, quod salvum est; ibid., nos. 20 f. The following perit igitur must, therefore be placed in quotation marks if full justice is to be given to this meaning. It is only this that enables Tertullian to say immediately afterwards of such a sinner that he is not lost (in the strict sense), provided that he does not refuse penance (quod potest recuperari, non perit, nisi foris perseveraverit; ibid., p. 233, nos. 2 f.). The sinner is still vivens adhuc peccator, as opposed to the person guilty of capital sin who dies immediately after his deed. Tertullian deduces from these different conditions ('being lost' in the wide sense and actual death) the fact that the respective sins arc forgivable or unforgivable. Thus these notions cannot simply be other expressions for the forgivable or unforgivable character of the sins concerned. Rather they explain the fact that the one sinner has preserved the fundamental grace of baptism, while the other has lost it. In other words, it is a question here of venial sins, on the one hand, and of mortal sins in today's sense, on the other. The expression extra gregem datus (ibid., p. 232 no. 26) can, therefore, only be understood as a reminiscence of Tertullian's Catholic period. It no longer fits in with the new notion of the delicta leviora. Nevertheless, Tertullian has to hold on to this idea because the penance which was considered necessary for such sins at that time included such an excommunication. At the same time, Tertullian's new notion of the delicta leviora entailed logically that there are delicta mediocria intra domum dei ibidem delitescentia mox ibidem et reperta (ibid., p. 233 nos. 17 ff.). In clear contrast to this, it is said of the person guilty of a capital sin*: statim homo de ecclesia expellitur nec illic manet*. This phrase nec illic manet (ibid., p. 233 no. 24), following the expellitur, makes sense only if Tertullian wishes to stress the contrast with the sinner who, despite his sin, remains within the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

progress in the knowledge of the nature of different kinds of sins was achieved.

V. THE BASIS OF FURTHER DEVELOPMENT

What follows in the further course of the penitential controversies and in the development of penitential teaching during the first half of [52] the third century is, as far as our question is concerned, rather a continuation of these positions than an elaboration of truly new aspects. The Montanist errors died out. There remains the clearly expressed doctrine that man loses baptismal grace through serious sins. The distinction is maintained between the two main groups of sins, a difference based on their nature and their effects on grace. A few random and by no means complete references will serve to illustrate this, by way of a conclusion.[172]

The loss of grace through sin is clearly expressed by Cyprian of Carthage. Just as in Tertullian, so in him we read that by baptism we have become the temple of God and must now take care, ne quid immundum et profanum templo Dei inferatur, ne offensus sedem quam inhabitat derelinquat.[173] The lapsi are dead,[174] the sinner has lost his wedding garment, he is naked and mortally wounded,[175] spiritually dead he carries his own corpse around with him.[176] The baptized person loses grace if he does not preserve his innocence.[177] By this 'grace' is certainly meant interior grace, since according to Epist. 70,2[178] the baptized has in se gratiam Christi, and according to Epist. 64,3[179] the 'grace' of baptism is the Holy Spirit. The sinner loses this 'grace of the life-bestowing bath'.[180] Even children who with their

[172] We are here leaving aside Hippolytus and Clement of Alexandria. Hippolytus reprimanded pope Callistus for not deposing bishops even when they have sinned 'mortally' (cf. Philosophumena IX 12, 22 [GCS 26: p. 249 nos. 21 ff.; cf. n.94]). What Hippolytus understood precisely by such sins is difficult to say. Already Dollinger, p. 136 f., could only surmise. Mortal sins, for Hippolytus too, must have been identifiable with delicta irremissibilia, but it is not at all clear precisely which sins these were or whether he considered them mortal sins only in today's sense. In one passage he enumerates the three well-known capital sins (cf. Fragm. zu den Proverbien XXI [GCS 1: p. 163 f.]). But it is not clear whether this is intended as an exhaustive list of the capital sins. Even Tertullian frequently mentions these three, although he recognizes others. What Clement of Alexandria contributes to our question corresponds to what we have found in the Shepherd of Hermas. Without any doubt, in the question of penance Clement of Alexandria depends entirely on Hermas (cf. A. d'Alès, p. 74 ff.). He clearly expresses the loss of grace through sin. At the same time, he does not give us a clear answer on the question of the difference between sins with regard to their effect on grace. The sinner passes his own death sentence (cf. Quis dives salvetur 39,2 [GCS 17: p. 185 no. 18]); he is left for dead by the Logos and the Holy Spirit, since that which is holy ought not to be sullied. The sinner, however, offends God, who dwells within him, and defiles the Logos (Paed. II 10,100, 1 [GCS l2: p. 217 nos. 9 ff.]; cf. Paed. 1110,100,4 [GCS 12: p. 217 nos. 20ff.]). Thus the sinner has died, as far as God is concerned (Quis dives salvetur 42,9 [GCS l7: p. 189 nos. 16 ff.]); he is already dead to God (Paed. III 11,81,1); the image of God is no longer in his soul (Paed. III 2,4-5,1 [GCS l2: p. 237 ff.]). Thus conversion is a real rebirth, a second baptism (Quis dives salvetur 42,14 [GCS 17: p. 190 no. 11]); a true παλιγγενεσι/α ζωη~φ (Strom. II 23,147,2 [GCS 15: p. 193 no. 26]); once sin has been set aside God can once more take up his residence in man (Quis dives salvetur 39,2 [GCS 17: p. 185 nos. 18 f.]). Clement recognizes the variety of sins (cf. for example Strom. II 15,62,1 ff. [GCS l5: p. 146 ff.]); he quotes 1 John 5:6 (ibid., II 15,66,4 f. [GCS l5: p. 148 nos. 20 ff.]). Nevertheless, he does not examine the differentiation of sins according to their effect on grace.

[173] De habitu virginum 2 (CSL 3,l: p. 188 nos. 23-5).

[174] Epist. 15,2 (CSL 3,2: p. 514 nos. 16 f.); Epist. 21,1 (from Celerinus; CSL 3,2: p. 530 no. 17); Epist. 33,1 (CSL 3,2: p. 566 nos. 18 ff.); De lapsis 8 (CSL 3,l: p.242 f. no. 14 and no. 1).

[175] Epist. 30,7 (CSL 3,2: p. 555 no. 5); De lapsis 30 (CSL 3,l: p. 259 no. 16); 35 (CSL 3,1: p. 262 no. 26).

[176] De lapsis 30 (CSL 3,l: p. 259 no. 24).

[177] Test. III 27 (CSL 3,l: p. 141 nos. 17 f.).

[178] Epist. 70,2 (CSL 3,2: p. 768 no. 15).

[179] Epist. 64,3 (CSL 3,2: p. 719 nos. 6-9).

[180] De lapsis 24 (CSL 3,l: p. 254 nos. 20 f.).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

parents are involved in apostasy lose what they received immediately after their birth.[181] Nevertheless, the two groups of sins do not appear as clearly distinct with regard to their effects on grace in Cyprian as they do in Tertullian. Nevertheless, the further development in this regard in Tertullian is not proper to him. It has already been noted that according to Cyprian there are sins which destroy grace. He even knows already the notion of mortale crimen[182] which is used for sins such as adulterium, fraus and homicidium. This expression already means at this time the 'sin causing the death of the life of grace' and not simply the sin which finally entails the death of hell. Moreover, Cyprian knows the group of unforgivable sins against God[183] mentioned by Tertullian which certainly denote the death of grace. Besides these he also knows other sins to which he is clearly unwilling to ascribe such deadly effects for the life of grace. According to him no one is completely without sins and faults.[184] We all fail daily[185] and are never quite without a wounded conscience, even if we are sancti.[186] The Our Father reminds us of daily sin[187] and so, even after the gratia baptismi, we are still often burdened with sin.[188] It can certainly be assumed, therefore, that the bishop of [53] Carthage was clearly aware of the distinction between sins which annihilate the life of grace and those which allow the radical grace to remain.

This idea is also found in Origen. The soul is alive when no mortale peccatum lies on it; otherwise it is dead. Christ does not then come to it.[189] The person who 'sins to death' does not preserve the baptism of the Holy Spirit.[190] Every mortal sin (peccatum ad mortem) means death.[191] The person who commits mortal sin loses the Holy Spirit, since Origen says that the penitent recovers the Holy Spirit, the garment (of grace) and the ring.[192] All this expresses in Origen the loss of inner grace by sin. Whether only these α(μαρτη/ματα θανατη/φορα are mortal sins for him in today's sense or whether still other sins, which he describes as α(μαρτη/ματα μη_ προ_φ θα&νατον, are also to be regarded as such, depends upon the way this distinction in his writing is to be understood. To attempt to give an answer to this question here would lead too far from our present study.[193] But that there are several kinds of sins and that these have different effects on grace is self-evident in Origen.[194]

Similarly the Didascalia Apostolorum, which originates from the first half of the third century, teaches that sin expels from the soul the Holy Spirit who otherwise dwells permanently in the baptized person, and allows access to the evil spirit.[195] If a person has sinned, then he recovers the baptismal grace, the Holy Spirit, by being reconciled through the [181] De lapsis 9 (CSL 3J: p. 243 nos. 10 f.).

[182] De bono pat. 14 (CSL 3,I: p. 407 no. 21).
[183] Test. III 28 (CSL 3,l: p. 142 nos. 6 f.); in the case of Cyprian, however, these sins are not actually unforgiveable. Cf. A. d'Alès, p. 312 ff.
[184] Test. III 54 (CSL 3,l: p. 156 no. 5).
[185] De dom. orat. 12 (CSL 3,l: p. 175 nos. 4 f.).
[186] De op. et eleem. 3 (CSL 3,l: p. 375 no. 3).
[187] De dom. orat. 22 (CSL 3,l: p. 283 no. 19).
[188] De op. et deem. 2 (CSL 3,l: p. 374 nos. 17 f., 24).
[189] In Lev.hom. XII, 3 (GCS 29: p. 460 nos. 1-7).
[190] In Jer.hom. II,2-3 (GCS 6: p. 19). This idea is derived from the context. Origen considers the person who preserves the baptism of the Holy Spirit (τηρει=ν το_ βα&πτισμα του= α9γι∴ου πνευματο/φ: ibid., [GCS 6: p. 19 no. 22]) fortunate, as opposed to the person guilty of mortal sin.
[191] In Lev. hom. XI,2 (GCS 29: p. 452 nos. 8 f.).
[192] In Lev. hom. VIII,11 (GCS 29: p. 417 nos. 12 ff.).
[193] On the question of the different classes of sins in Origen cf. 'The Penitential,. Teaching of Origen' in this volume.
[194] In any case α(μαρτη/ματα μη/ θανατηφο&ρα, which Origen mentions in Matth. XIII,30 (GCS 6: p. 264 nos. 16 ff.) are not considered as destroying the state of grace.
[195] Didascalia Apost. IV,21,1.2.4.5.6. (F. X. Funk, Didaskalia et Constitutiones Apostolorum I [Paderborn 1905], p. 368 nos. 12 f., p. 370 nos. 3 f., 20 f.; p. 372 nos. 1f., 13 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

imposition of the bishop's hands.[196]

These examples show how the progress in the question considered in this essay, which seems to have presented itself clearly as such only with Tertullian, is to be observed generally. The need to arrive at greater clarity in the penitential questions and discussions pushes the question and its development to the fore. Everywhere the concern is expressed to preserve what man has received in baptism. Everywhere is expressed the Christian conviction that God's free mercy lifts man to the mysterious participation in the divine nature and the divine life. This participation transcends human comprehension. Nevertheless, man has to safeguard it by a way of life which corresponds to his call to share in the life of God.

[196] Didascalia Apost. II 41,2 (F. X. Funk, p. 130 nos. 1-5).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[55]

PART TWO

The Roman Tradition

[57]

3

THE PENITENTIAL TEACHING OF THE SHEPHERD OF HERMAS

Anyone who has been at all interested in the history of the practice and the teaching of penance in the early Church knows the important role which the 'Shepherd of Hermas'[1] with his teaching plays in this question. There is a vast amount of literature on this subject.[2] Nevertheless, after the penetrating study of this teaching by B. Poschmann[3] one would be tempted to think that the last word had been said on the correct understanding of it. This is so in so far as Poschmann has proved convincingly that the Shepherd of Hermas cannot be adduced as evidence for the view that it was only in the second century that there was opened up a further possibility of penance after baptism, whereas previously the Church, considering itself sinless, had precluded a further possibility of forgiveness after baptism. According to this view, it is only in the Shepherd of Hermas that a new, previously unheard-of, jubilee of a second penance was announced through a new revelation.

I. THE STATE OF THE RESEARCH

More recently, however, since Poschmann' s major study, a quite new situation has arisen with regard to the interpretation of Hermas' penitential teaching, in so far as it has been taken

[1] This essay, which is here presented in a revised form, appeared originally in ZKTh 77 (1955), pp. 385-431.

[2] J. Stufler, 'Die Bussdisziplin der abendländischen Kirche bis Kallistus' in: ZKTh 31 (1909), pp. 433-73; Vanbeck, 'La Pénitence dans le Pasteur d'Hermas' in: RHLR nouv. série 2 (1911), pp. 389-403; A. d'Alès, L'édit de Calliste (Paris 1914), pp. 52-113 (with references to previous literature); H. Koch, Die Bussfrist des Pastor Hermä (Festgabe A. v. Harnack) (Tübingen 1921), pp. 173-82; C. D. Watkins, A History of Penance I (London 1920), pp. 47-72; M. Dibelius, Der Hirt des Hermas (Handbuch zum NT, Ergänzungsband) (Tübingen 1925); A. d'Alès, De sacramento paenitentiae (Paris 1926), pp. 17-21; J. Hoh, Die kirchliche Busse im zweiten Jahrhundert (Breslau 1932), pp. 10-34; L. Kogler, Busssakrament und Ablass (Linz 1931); J. Lebreton, 'Le développement des institutions ecclésiastiques à la fin du II^{e} et au début du III^{e} siècle, in: RSR 24 (1934), pp. 124-64; E. Amann, 'La pénitence dans le "pasteur" d'Hermas' in: DThC XII/l (Paris 1933), pp. 759-63; B. Poschmann, Paenitentia secunda (Bonn 1940), pp. 134-205; P. Galtier, De paenitentia (Rome 1950), n.238-45; S. Prete, 'Cristianesimo antico e riforma ortodossa. Note intorno al "Pastore" di Erma (II.Sec.): Convivium', Raccolta nuova 1950, pp. 114-28; P. Galtier, Aux origines du sacrement de la Pénitence (Rome 1951), pp. 132-44; J. Grotz, Die Entwicklung des Bussstufenwesens in der vornicänischen Kirche (Freiburg 1955), pp. 13-70; R. Joly, 'La doctrine pénitentielle du Pasteur d'Hermas' in: RHR 147 (1955), pp. 32-49; id., Hermas le Pasteur, SC 53 bis (Paris 1968), pp. 22-30; W. Doskocil, Der Bann in den Urkirche (NThSt Kan. Abt. vol. 11) (Munich 1958), pp. 160-91; S.Giet, Hermas et les Pasteurs. Les trois auteurs du Pasteur d'Hermas (Paris 1963), pp. 123-34, 174-8, 189-94, 230-4; C. Vogel, Le pécheur et la penitence dans l'église ancienne (Paris 1966), pp. 16-18, 62-6; K. Baus, Von der Urgemeinde zur frühchristlichen Grosskirche (HdKG I) (Freiburg 1962), pp. 364-6, 166 f.

[3] B. Poschrnann, Paenitentia secunda. Die kirchliche Busse im ältesten Christentum bis Cyprian und Origenes (Bonn 1940). Ch. 3: 'Die Busslehre des Hermas', pp.134-205.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

as the starting point in a very important attempt to place the penitential teaching of [58] the early Church on an entirely new basis. What is referred to here is the important study of Joseph Grotz.[4] It is neither our task nor our intention here to expound the content of this book and to adopt a critical stance with regard to the theses which are defended therein. In the present instance, rather, the penitential teaching in the Shepherd of Hermas will be explained in its own right without much polemic or discussion with other views on the subject. This approach[5] (which was already completed some time before the appearance of Grotz's study) receives a further justification from the study just mentioned, although – at least incidentally – there must be some discussion with the interpretation which the penitential teaching in the Shepherd of Hermas receives at Grotz's hands.

It is for this reason that, by way of an introduction, a few observations on Grotz's study in general cannot be avoided. As for his interpretation of Hermas, this will be considered in the course of the exposition of the penitential teaching of Hermas itself.

What were the main lines of the previous interpretation of the penitential teaching of the early Church? Certainly there was a difference of opinion among Catholic historians of dogma on the question as to whether besides the poenitentia publica which generally, for some decades, was considered the normal basic form of the ancient penitential discipline, there also existed a 'private' sacramental penance, and from which point in time such a penance was in evidence. But, apart from this disagreement, it was fairly unanimously accepted that public penance, which could be designated as penance of excommunication, was also the normal basic form of the ancient penance, that it was concluded at the end of the whole process with the reconciliation of the sinner with the Church and with God in one act,[6] and that the 'excommunication', the 'binding', was the natural expression of the fact that the sinner (and precisely because of all the sins which are subjected to this penance) has placed himself in contradiction to the Church, and thus this 'excommunication' represents an essential aspect of this whole penitential process.

Against this view Grotz now defends the following basic thesis: The actual essential form of sacramental church penance, from the very beginning, has had nothing to do with such an excommunication. This excommunication was introduced only in the second century before the actual penitential process, and then only in certain, specially determined cases; it is not an essential element of the actual [59] sacramental penance but an external measure of church discipline. It is not lifted at the time of reconciliation, at the end of the whole period of penance, but earlier so that the readmission into the community of the Church and the bestowal of divine peace are not only in reality but also temporally two distinct acts of the Church which have no intrinsic relationship the one to the other. From this period of excommunication, which was inserted before the penitential period proper, there arose,

---

[4] J. Grotz, Die Entwicklung des Bussstufenwesens in der vornicänischen Kirche (Freiburg/Br. 1955). Part One: 'Die Busslehre des Hermas', pp. 11-70.

[5] We are obviously unable to avoid repeating a great deal of what has already been said by others (especially by Poschmann). Nevertheless, we consider it more appropriate to give a synthetic view of the whole of Hermas' penitential teaching than merely to criticize and supplement the conclusions of others. The latter approach may render some service to the specialist, but it would inevitably remain incomprehensible to the reader who lacks the necessary background.

[6] Cf. for example Galtier's thesis 17, De paenitentia (Rome 1950), n. 270, p. 224: 'Cum constet mentem fuisse Ecclesiae antiquae remissionem peccati haberi in "reconciliatione" post peractam paenitentiam publicam, dicendum omnino videtur eam "reconciliationem" fuisse sacramentalem nec ei praemissam esse de iure privatam peccati absolutionem.' Thus even those who, like Galtier, defend the existence of private penance in the early Church acknowledge that in the case of public penance reconciliation with the Church is also sacramental absolution. Neither Galtier nor Poschmann separate these two realities temporally. This is in no way altered by the fact that Galtier, in his thesis, is only contesting the view according to which sacramental absolution precedes the lifting of excommunication. Grotz holds that the opposite order is the one which is historically verifiable.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

through a refinement of the procedure by the Church's discipline, the ancient grades of church penance, which are to be found both in the East and in the West. This more original form of penance, which Grotz is reluctant to style private (because it also represents the second phase of 'public penance'), occurs, precisely because it is the more original, not only within public penance for specially determined cases but also, during the whole of the patristic period, outside public penance and, indeed, for other serious sins. It became so frequently practised that Grotz even suggests that it could explain the great number of priests (beside the bishop) in many Churches.

Already, from this brief exposition of Grotz's basic thesis, it is clear that he is attempting to make a frontal attack on the thesis which is generally accepted today by Catholic historians of dogma. He maintains that there is not only (as Galtier and others hold), alongside the public form, a private form of sacramental penance which, apart from the main institution of penance, has its own distinct existence, but this private form (even if it is not called such) is precisely, from the beginning, the basic form which continues in public penance. It is only for want of close examination that this form could not be discerned within public penance. And it is for the same reason that B. Poschmann, K. Rahner and others could not see that this form of sacramental penance, completely unconnected with excommunication, was clearly practised besides public penance. Grotz begins his study of the history of penance prior to the Council of Nicea with the Shepherd of Hermas. It is here that he attempts to establish for the first time the presence of a church penance without the process of excommunication and which will be the principal norm of church penance.

As already stated, it is not our intention here to give a critical appraisal of the whole of Grotz's study, otherwise we would have to examine carefully his interpretation of penance in Cyprian, Origen [60] and others – all of whom are important for the development of his thesis. Nevertheless, a few more basic and general remarks on Grotz's work are called for, in order to avoid overloading either the actual exposition of Hermas's teaching or the assessment of Grotz's views on this particular topic.

Grotz's thesis presents the whole of the history of penance in Christian antiquity as a unilinear development. This approach meets what the modern dogmatic theologian considers to be his needs. Whereas previously the development of penance in the early Church often appeared to the dogmatic theologian to have been somewhat tortuous, he is now able, starting from what (for him) are the all-important dogmatic theses, to explain this development easily and confidently as follows: what is today recognized and practised as the essence of the sacrament of penance was also previously and on its own the essence of this sacrament, and everything else which may have been involved with it, even in the early Church, is a subsequent addition on the part of church discipline having nothing at all to do with the sacrament as such – and this already at that time. But is this reconstruction correct? Only a precise examination of Grotz's argumentation would yield an answer to this question. This argumentation, however, represents such a massive and complicated construction of indirect arguments that such a precise examination would be a mammoth task, requiring as much space as the work of Grotz itself. Nevertheless, it is still possible to submit certain weighty objections which, for their part, need very exact and as direct as possible arguments to be confuted.

In the first place, he has to confine himself to very subtle, indirect arguments. Wherever he pretends that his thesis is to any extent directly attested, it is always a question of texts which have been widely quoted in previous literature. Both the defenders of a private penance existing alongside a public penance and their adversaries used these texts to support their own view. I must say quite frankly that Grotz's interpretation of these texts offers me no more light than that of Galtier and others who defend a private church penance. As far as the numerous other more indirect arguments are concerned, it seems that the texts in question are

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

evidence of the view expressed only for the person who is already convinced of the correctness of the thesis.

In so far as the precise proof for this observation has to go beyond [61] the Shepherd of Hermas, it cannot be given within the limits of this essay.

What appears more important to me is that no dogmatic theologian can doubt that every serious sin also involves the relationship of the sinner to the Church (and not only to God). One may view this change of relationship to the Church, as one wishes, in order to accommodate it with the teaching that the sinner, even as sinner, still remains a member of the Church. But the only person who can doubt that this relationship does change, in so far as the Church is holy, is the person who sees the Church in a nestorian, external and naturalistic way as a purely social entity and construction and who does not recognize in it the body of Christ enlivened by the Holy Spirit. Now this comprehensive and, especially, pneumatic view of the Church was current in the early Church and, indeed, to a greater extent than was the case later after the aberration of Donatism, Wyclif, Hus and the Reformers: the Church is the holy Church. To accept this one does not have to share the exaggerations of Windisch.[7] If this is the case, then one ought to expect that when serious sins committed after baptism are remitted the ecclesial aspect should be in evidence. But one can only think along these lines in so far as the Church expressly adverts to this aspect of sin in the celebration of penance and reacts accordingly, that is, regards the sinner as such (irrespective of which sins are involved) as in some sense 'excommunicated'. Such an 'excommunication' is obviously quite different from the excommunication of modern church law where it is only a disciplinary measure against certain sins. On the contrary, in the early Church excommunication followed from the nature of sin and was, as it were, made explicit by the church community; it is, therefore, the confirmation and the response, on the Church's part, to the sinner's change of relationship to it. This excommunication is just as much present (at least in its theological essence) today as it was in the early Church, even though it is not so apparent. Even today the sinner is excluded from the Eucharist. If one does not consider this as a consequence of sin iuris divini, one must recognize this exclusion – because it is iuris ecclesiastici – as a kind of excommunication by the Church.

Grotz lacks a precise consideration of what an excommunication is. He implicitly takes as his starting-point the modern notion. Where this notion is not verified, there is, according to him, no [62] excommunication and, therefore, no penance of excommunication. It also follows that excommunication, where it was granted as having been present, is treated as lifted, even though there is still exclusion from the Eucharist. This notion is also modern, but it is certainly not envisaged by the early Church, in which a Christian who was excluded from this central act of the Church and from its holiest part did not count even as a normal Christian but as a sinner who had to be alienated from the church community because he was unworthy of its holiness. From this brief glance at the early Church, it is not to be expected that at that time there was recognized a celebration of penance which had nothing to do with 'excommunication'. This does not mean, however, that this 'excommunication' was not susceptible of various degrees and modifications.[8] Our view that all penance in the early

[7] Cf. H. Windisch, Taufe und Sünde im ältesten Christentum bis auf Origenes (Tübingen 1908).

[8] The remark of C. Chartier, 'L'excommunication ecclésiastique d'après les écrits de Tertullian' in: Antonianum 10 (1935), pp. 301-344, 499-536 (cf. esp. 334), that there were in the early Church several forms of excommunication which ought not to be confused is quite correct. However, this fact, which is recognized both by Poschmann and by myself (cf. Grotz p. 438), does not have the significance which it is often given. What Chartier calls 'partial' excommunication ought not to be minimized and made into a non-literal excommunication. In the view of the early Church this is where the decisive theological point lies. We may regret that this alienation of the sinner (of every sinner!) from the Eucharist and, therefore, from fellowship with the Church is not expressed more felicitously than with the notion of 'excommunication', and that the corresponding penance is consequently described as 'penance of excommunication', that is, with words which

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Church was 'penance of excommunication' (and therefore was 'public') does not exclude an 'excommunication' which would correspond more to our modern notion. The person who is no longer bothered about his Christian life and who in no way has the intention to do penance and mend his ways was naturally excluded from the Church in a way (as can be clearly seen, for example, in Cyprian) which does not correspond simply and in every respect with that 'exclusion' which is imposed on a repentant sinner who has been admitted to penance and is striving to reform himself. This access to penance was already an important step towards a purification of the relationship between the sinner and the Church and, on the other hand, it represents a specific act of grace on the Church's part which is tied to certain conditions. Nevertheless, one cannot conclude from all this that, in those cases where an excommunication has been imposed, this can already have been lifted in the sense attested in the early Church and that all that had to follow was the non-ecclesial, purely sacramental part of penance, that is a simple reconciliation with God through the Church (not, however, any longer a reconciliation through the Church with the Church). In any case, I cannot find sufficient proofs for this theory of Grotz. From the early Church's viewpoint, it seems self-evident that in every case where there is an exclusion from the Eucharist (and not even Grotz can deny that such an exclusion is imposed until the definitive reconciliation with God) there is also a kind of excommunication. This follows from the fact that the Eucharist is precisely the sacrament of full church unity.

[63] Moreover, Grotz appears to have committed a fundamental methodological fault in that he begins his investigation with the Pastor Hermae and not with the New Testament. It is true that everyone can begin his theme where he wishes. One may consider patristic theology while presupposing biblical theology. Nevertheless, if one holds that the penance of excommunication is a subsequent and additional secondary form of an original type of penance, and if this development occurred already before the middle of the second century, then the question poses itself whether this was already the case in the New Testament which, after all, is relatively near this time. Without wishing to give detailed proof, we feel justified in claiming that a close exegesis of Matthew 16 and 18, considered in itself and in the context of the Old Testament, the customs of the synagogue communities at the time of Jesus and the practice of sects and groups at that time, together with a precise understanding of the life of the community, as this is attested in Paul's letters, lead to the conclusion that the original biblical notion of church penance is that of a penance of excommunication. The person who sins seriously, who gravely offends the holiness of the community of those who are called, is 'bound' and he must be 'unbound'. The loosening forgiveness of sins is the lifting of this binding on earth by which the loosening in heaven, therefore the forgiveness of guilt before God, becomes effective. If, according to a correct interpretation of the text of Matthew 16 and especially Matthew 18 it must be a question of the power to forgive sins, and if here the binding is understood as 'banning' and the loosing as the lifting of this ban and precisely as the forgiveness of sins by the whole Church – if, therefore, these texts attest a penance of excommunication, then it is already totally unlikely that we do not have here the actual and original form of the sacrament of forgiveness which Christ left to his Church. Further, if one observes that this excommunication was applied in the Church of the apostles and the way it was applied, and one notices that, in Paul, the catalogue of sins which exclude people from the kingdom of God (therefore all serious sins) coincides with the list of those sins which require an 'avoidance' of the sinners by the Church until they have mended their ways, then a almost inevitably today conjure up the idea of procedures of modern canon law. Nevertheless, this difficulty of terminology ought not to obscure the fact that not only did these 'excommunications' exist in the early Church, but also they represented a decisive aspect of the very notion of penance. They were an element which explained so many other aspects of penance (especially with regard to its public nature) and which, therefore, was found in one form or another in every penance of the early Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

penance of excommunication for the apostolic Church has such evidence in its favour that there is no longer any place for another kind of church penance. Also in this regard, it is hardly to be expected that such a penance with excommunication [64] should have been a secondary development; on the contrary, the possibility has to be faced that the practice of such a penance of excommunication became more variegated and underwent developments and refinements corresponding to the increasingly complicated conditions of the early Church. But this is something quite different from the subsequent appearance of this penance from (or, in addition to) a form which originally had nothing whatsoever to do with such an excommunication.

For methodical progress in the question under discussion there is, therefore, the basic expectation that church penance is penance of excommunication, by which is meant excommunication in the theological and not in the modern church law sense of the term. For this assumption to be rejected it must be clearly proved – in the present case, therefore, for the Shepherd of Hermas – that there is a group of sinners which, on the one hand, according to the notion of the early Church needs an actual sacramental measure of the Church for the remission of its sins and for reconciliation with God, but which, on the other hand, does not have to be reconciled with the Church in any way. In this case, one would not have to see any change in the relationship with the Church, either in the sin or in the reconciliation. If such proof cannot be adduced in respect of the Shepherd of Hermas and if, indeed, the very contrary is indicated in his case for all sinners who certainly need a second metanoia, then at least Hermas is excluded from the witnesses to Grotz's theory. This point will be proven here by a positive exposition of the penitential teaching of the Shepherd of Hermas. It is only accidentally, in the course of this exposition, that a position will be taken with regard to Grotz's interpretation of this teaching.

II. THE SHEPHERD OF HERMAS – THE AUTHOR AND HIS WORK [9]

Without going into the many obscure literary questions which are still posed with regard to the Shepherd of Hermas,[10] we may take the following points as being generally accepted. According to the latest results of research, which are partly hypothetical, the composition of [9] On this question cf. Poschmann, pp. 136-40, and especially R. Joly, pp. 11-21, together with his bibliography (pp. 69-74). More recent French publications on the Shepherd of Hermas express a general reserve and disagreement with regard to the results of researches published in German (thus R. Joly, p. 25; S. Giet, p. 125), without, however, providing either detailed reasons or preferable opinions. In his work mentioned above S. Giet attempts to conclude from the threefold division of the whole of Hermas' s composite work to the existence of three different authors. It must be said, with J. A. Fischer (cf. ThRv 61 [1965], p. 308), however, that the deriving of three different authors, simply from what are certainly in the main three distinct parts, does not appear to be justified (cf. on this point also R. Joly, pp. 12 f.; 16 ff.; 140 f.; E. Peterson, Frühkirche, Judentum und Gnosis [Freiburg 1959], p. 272; J. A. Fischer, p. 307 f.). One 'author' (who could have sketched the writing at different periods) or a final redactor could have easily composed the whole work from material belonging to different traditions and from drafts of various stages of edition. Also in a work of this period we should not expect to find highly differentiated and precise theological terminology, even if this does not mean that it evinces a naive mentality. Differences of terminology and the clear notion of the differences of doctrine which they presuppose can serve only in a very limited way here as an indication of different authors, since at that time doctrinal disputes and their solution were generally expressed in another form.

[10] A review of the state and the history of the text is given in the introduction to Whittaker's edn, Die Apostolischen Väter I. Der Hirt des Hermas (GCS 48) (Berlin 1956) IX-XX. The work itself is composed in the style of an allegory and belongs to the category of apocalypse. For this reason alone, it is obvious that to explain this work historically, indeed to interpret it at all, is a difficult task.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the entire work in its present form is to be placed between c. A.D. 75-175[11] (while it is not possible to ascribe it to the time of Clement [65] of Rome). A Roman tradition, based on the Muratorian Canon, identifies the author Hermas as the brother of the Roman bishop Pius I (A.D. 142-55).[12] What Hermas, who undoubtedly hails from a Judaeo-Christian milieu,[13] recounts about himself and his family, especially in the first four visions, is hardly a mere literary fiction.[14] It is difficult to deny that these accounts contain a genuine autobiographical core; but this latter has been considerably elaborated with later reflections and developments.

The most important passages for the penitential question in the Shepherd of Hermas are: Vis. I 1,9 (GCS 48: p. 2,14-17); ibid., 3,2 (GCS 48: pp. 3,16-4,2; here the possibility of penance is already assumed!); Vis. II 2,2-3,4 (GCS 48: pp. 5,18-7,4; the content of the 'booklet' which the Church in the guise of an old lady transmits as the great revelation in a vision); Vis. III 2,4-8,9 (GCS 48: p. 9,14-15,16; the vision of the construction of the Church as a tower: the 'allegory of the tower'); Mand. IV 1,4-3,7 (GCS 48: pp. 26,5-28,19; the instruction on marital purity by the 'Shepherd': the singular character of post-baptismal penance; the relationship between baptism and penance after baptism; the justification and the limits of the view of 'certain teachers' on this point); Sim. VIII (GCS 48: pp. 65,18-76,5; the differentiation of various groups of penitents, their examination by the Shepherd and their respective destiny); Sim. IX (GCS 48: pp. 76,7-105,16; appendix and summary: the second 'allegory of the tower').[15]

The problem posed for the history of dogma by the penitential teaching of the Shepherd of Hermas consists in the fact that a forgiveness of all the sins which have been committed after baptism is announced as being possible only once.

Now is this possibility according to Hermas a new and previously non-existent possibility which, as such, needed to be communicated through a new revelation? Is it, therefore, an extraordinary concession made to those who have been Christians for some time, a kind of 'jubilee' which presupposes that previously both in theory and in practice (or at least in practice) a forgiveness (by the Church) was no longer possible for capital sins committed after baptism? (This view could be called the 'baptismal theory' and is held by Funk,[16] Batiffol, Windisch, Preuschen, Schwartz, H. Koch, Dibelius, Weinel, Puech, Laun, v.

[11] Thus for example S. Giet; J. Daniélou, Théologie du Judéo-Christianisme (Tournai 1958), p. 48 f. Cf. also R. Joly, p. 14 f.

[12] Origen, Eusebius and Rufinus know nothing of this tradition. S. Giet proposes Pius I's brother, whose name is unknown, as the author of at most the nine parables (p. 288), while he ascribes to 'Hermas' the four visions (which, according to his three-author hypothesis represent the 'first book'), since they evince a Latin and at times a clearly Roman environment as the milieu of composition.

[13] Cf. J. Daniélou, pp. 43-9; see also E. Peterson, pp. 254-309.

[14] On this question cf. R. van Deemter, Der Hirt des Hermas - Apokalypse oder Allegorie? (Delft 1929); A. V. Ström, Der Hirt des Hermas. Allegorie oder Wirklichkeit (Leipzig-Uppsala 1936). Deemter and Ström reject the thesis of a purely literary fiction. Others, on the contrary, for instance D. van den Eynde, Les normes de l'enseignement chrétien dans la littérature patristique des trois premiers siècles (Paris 1933) p. 89 f., and G. Bardy, La Théologie de l'Eglise de saint Clement à saint Irénée (Paris 1945) p. 117 f., think that it is a literary fiction, at least as far as Hermas' personal relationships are concerned. R. Joly (pp. 17-21) also inclines towards this view. S. Giet leaves open the possibility of 'un cadre biographique' at least for the visions.

[15] These texts have recently been presented in a carefully prepared edn: H. Karpp (ed), Die Busse. Quellen z. Entstehung d. altkirchl. Busswesens (Zurich 1969) (Traditio Christiana, vol. 1); see the general introduction and bibliography. In the interpretation of the individual 'penitential' texts and in the analysis of the texts a special place must be afforded within the work as a whole to the first four visions. If S. Giet's thesis of three authors is correct, then a greater independence must be assumed for the ninth parable. Nevertheless, the generally accepted view today is that one author established the eventual form of the work, albeit with the use of several traditions.

[16] For further references to the authors named, see in Poschmann, p. 134 f.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Harnack, Loofs, Seeberg, Adam, Rauschen, Hoh, Amann)[17] Or does the Shepherd of Hermas attest the existence of a [66] previous practice and theory of the Church, so that the actual significance of the new revelation lies not in the possibility of the forgiveness of all sins but in the urgency of penance in view of the imminent end of the world, in the personal assurance of actual forgiveness to Hermas and his family and in the exhortation to all sinners to do penance in the assurance that such penance will be effective (thus Stufler, d'Ales, Hunermann, Tixeront, Galtier, Poschmann)?

A third possibility, which would count as a middle course between the two views mentioned above, is that Hermas is countering the rigorists who are unwilling to admit a post-baptismal penance. He would be doing this in view of the imminent end of the world. It is possible that in Rome at the time of 'Hermas', because of a strong rigoristic current, there began to emerge a more definite and more urgent tendency which advocated a post-baptismal penance (cf. R. Joly, pp. 23-7). Perhaps we have here, therefore, the attempt to do justice to both tendencies: on the one hand, the possibility of a penance after baptism is presupposed, while, on the other hand, this possibility is limited and confined practically to a single opportunity. It is obvious that Hermas wishes to avoid a head-on clash with the rigorists.[18]

III. THE LIMITATION OF THE ACCEPTED POSSIBILITY OF PENANCE

First of all, we must prescind from the question of whether and how the Church can be a cause for the remission of sins.[19] In any case, Hermas teaches that all sins (including those which will later be the so-called 'capital sins') can be forgiven by genuine sorrow and repentance. According to him, this possibility for those who are already baptized Christians is not a new grace which is merely announced through his revelation as a kind of 'jubilee'. Although it is offered only once for sins committed after baptism, it was still previously recognized by the Christian Church. All that Hermas does is to modify this traditional belief by limiting it eschatologically in view of his conviction that the end of the world is imminent. For him personally the renewal of this ancient truth by the 'old woman Church' and the 'shepherd', as far as it concerns himself, his family and his relatives, represents an urgent exhortation, a consolation and assurance [67] of their own salvation, all rolled into one. It is worthwhile considering each of these points in turn.

1. Forgiveness is Possible

A) ALL SINS ARE FORGIVABLE

Hermas certainly recognizes a kind of apostasy from faith for which, he says, there is no question of a metanoia. He describes this apostasy (clearly with reference to Mark 3:29 par.)

[17] The Catholic historians of dogma among those mentioned modify this thesis with regard to the extent of the supposed penitential rigorism and on the question of whether this rigorism concerns only the practice of church reconciliation or includes other areas.

[18] This means that a great deal of the obscurity in the Shepherd of Hermas is to be construed not simply as a literary elaboration of a more original part, but in relation to the context and the concrete situation of that time. On this assumption, the final redactor would have had to avoid writing too concretely and too clearly to a given situation. Both the obscure style and the literary form were, therefore, understandable as a 'defence-mechanism', which allows a great freedom in the interpretation of what is actually meant. The composition and structure of the work evince different levels, traditions and stages of redaction. It is, therefore, also probable that, in the course of composition, new addressees and changed circumstances had to be considered and that, consequently, the attempt was made to harmonize historical necessities with 'pastoral astuteness'.

[19] Cf. Sim. VI 2,3; VIII 6,4; 8,2; IX 19,1.3; 26,3.5; cf. also Vis. I 4,2; III 7,2.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

as a 'blasphemous' offence and as completely deliberate (ε0κ καρδι/αφ: Sim. IX 26,5 [GCS 48: p. 95 n. 26 f.]). Upon close examination, it becomes clear that what makes these sins irremissible is not the objective gravity of the action itself but the obstinacy and remorselessness associated with them (see, e.g. Sim. VIII 6 [GCS 48: pp. 71,7-72,10]). Thus, for our purpose, it does not matter whether, in the relevant cases (i.e. where the angel of penance makes a distinction between the repentant and the unrepentant), Hermas regards this irremissible character as being only tied to this apostasy in fact, or whether he considers it as following with a moral or absolute necessity from the very nature of the sins in question.[20] In any case, he does not mean that a sin for which a person is sorry and does penance is unforgivable. This is clear by the way he stresses that there has been no sorrow for these sins: despite exhortation, not one of these sinners has done penance (Sim. VIII 6,4 [GCS 48: pp. 71,21-72,1]), they have fallen away definitively (Sim. IX 26,3 [GCS 48: pp. 95 n. 18-21]), thy persist in their decision (Sim. VIII 7,3 [GCS 48: pp. 72,17-73,2]) and therefore do not receive any penance from God, that is, God does not give them the grace to enable them to answer his call to repentance, since they will only simulate repentance and blaspheme his name still further (Sim. VIII 6,2 [GCS 48: pp. 71 n. 11-15]). Even in the case of this blasphemous apostasy it is unrepentance that is the reason for the fact that it cannot be forgiven. This point is made clearer by the fact that the same designation of 'those who do not have' penance is applied to sinners who belong to the same class as others who, precisely because of their sorrow, do receive forgiveness (Sim. VIII 8,2 f. [GCS 48: pp. 73,16-74,4]; IX 23,2.4 f. [GCS 48: p. 94, 7-11,14-22]); which means that Hermas (as he himself concedes: Sim. IX 19,3 [GCS 48: p. 92,13-20]) has not been able to distinguish [68] and to categorize sins clearly according to their objective gravity in such a way that it becomes evident why some receive forgiveness while others do not. Such a distinction can express and, to a certain extent, explain only a difference in the spiritual attitude towards penance. It does not represent a difference between what is forgivable and what is unforgivable which is independent of sorrow and repentance or unrepentance. The sin of apostasy does not, therefore, even according to Hermas himself, contravene his general principle: penance for sins entails life, unrepentance entails death (Sim. VI 2,3 [GCS 48: p. 60,2-7]) ; VIII 6,6 [GCS 48: p. 72,5-10]); the person who repents from the bottom of his heart and so purifies himself from the sins mentioned, to the extent of not committing them again, will receive from the Lord the healing of his earlier sins (Sim. VIII 11,3 [GCS 48: pp. 75,20-76,3]). Following this principle, Hermas promises forgiveness even to the gravest sins: adultery (Mand. IV 1,8 [GCS 48: p. 26,16-20]), falling away from faith (even after a long time: Vis. I 3,2 (GCS 48: pp. 3,16-4,2). In this regard, it is worth noting that Hermas' children had fallen away from the faith and had denounced their parents: Vis. II 2,2-4 (GCS 48: pp. 5,18-6,4); 3,1 (ibid., p. 6,18-23); Sim. IX 21,3-4 (GCS 48: p. 93,14-20); 26,5-6 (GCS 48: p. 95,25-32).[21] Hermas promises forgiveness to false teaching in Sim. IX 19,2 (GCS 48: p. 92,7-13).

[20] In Sim. IX 26,6b it is stated clearly that penance is possible even for those who have previously fallen away from the faith. It may be that this is an allusion to a specific church practice following a persecution. Cf. R. Joly, p. 27 f.

[21] It is immaterial whether, with Dibelius (p. 586) and Grotz (p. 27), we read ποτε/ in Sim. VII 4 or follow the traditional text πα&ντωφ (or παντελω~φ). In any case Hermas's children are promised full forgiveness, provided that they do penance in the prescribed way; for then their hearts are 'clean from every wicked deed'. Any element of uncertainty or the hypothetical in such cases consists (apart from the gravity of the sins in question) in the question of whether penance is really done conscientiously and completely but not in any doubt of whether, given such a penance, complete forgiveness will be really granted. The fact that Hermas' children are doing complete penance is evidenced by their undergoing the trial imposed by God and still continuing, and not only by their good intention, to do penance which is taken for granted and is described as 'wholehearted' penance. If, without any justification in the text, the πα&ντωφ is corrected to a ποτε/ this can only signify uncertainty with regard to the conditions and consequently with regard to divine forgiveness. For it is certainly

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In general Hermas sees very clearly that certain sins destroy the grace of baptism, and even for these sins he teaches that there is a forgiveness which restores the baptismal seal (Sim. VIII 6,3 48: p. 71,15-21]). He rejects, therefore, the principle by which, from Tertullian onwards, the unforgivable character of capital sins will later be justified: sins which destroy the grace of baptism can be remitted only by a second baptism which (apart from the baptism of blood in martyrdom) does not exist. Already, on the basis of this theological principle, there can be no sinners who, according to Hermas, can be refused the possibility of forgiveness because of the objective seriousness of their faults. Such fundamental gravity must show itself, if anywhere at all, in its detrimental effect on the grace of baptism. But since, according to Hermas, the baptismal seal is restored by penance, on the one hand there can be no unforgiveable sins in his view (granted the presence of penance) and, on the other hand, penance, considered as the remission of sins, is clearly seen as parallel to baptism.

[69] These sinners who, according to Hermas, in general and without exception have a possibility of penance when they are compared with one another evince considerable differences with regard both to the objective seriousness of their sins and to their attitude to penance and their intention to be converted. There is naturally a connection between these two aspects: the more serious the sin the less likely it is (in normal circumstances) that the sinner has the will to repent. Hermas draws the distinction between the different groups of sinners especially in Vis. III (GCS 48: p. 7-19). Grotz has analysed these groups carefully (in our opinion rather too subtly and exactly). There is no need for us to enter any further into these distinctions here. Since, even if Grotz denies that the sinners of some groups are excommunicated, while renouncing the possibility of church reconciliation for other groups (thus, according to him, the stones who are simply rejected in Vis. III 2,7a-5,5 [GCS 48: pp. 926-7; 12,11-17] are not excommunicated, whereas the stones which have been cast far away in Vis. III 2,7c [GCS 48: p. 9,28-9] and 2,9-6,1 and 7,1-3 [GCS 48: pp. 10,3-8; 12,18-22; 13,20-14,6] are, in his view, excommunicated in the fullest sense and can no longer receive a church reconciliation), he nevertheless allows a possibility of salvation for all sinners, at least by means of subjective penance, even if, in this case, the assurance of salvation is not very great.[22] In agreement with Grotz, therefore, we have to make the following observation: there is simply no exclusion from salvation for the sinner who has committed sin after baptism, purely because of the gravity of his fault and quite independently of whether or not he intends to do penance. On this score, at least, even a church reconciliation cannot be impossible.

B) THE LIMIT

---

complete healing that is promised (παντω&φ, here being connected with the total purification of the heart, must mean not ‘certainly’ but ‘completely’). To translate this word by ‘certainly’ or ‘surely’ is to create a contradiction, in so far as the forgiveness, the uncertainty of which has been stressed, is now certain once the condition for it has been fulfilled (cf. Grotz). If, therefore, certain sinners have proven that their conversion is genuine (such would be excommunicates, according to Grotz), then it is no longer possible to speak of the uncertainty of healing in their regard. Moreover, this text speaks explicitly only of forgiveness by God. The question of how the Church should behave towards such a genuine and tested excommunicate is not considered at all. In the case of a complete pardon by God, however, a complete forgiveness on the part of the Church also ought to be presumed, in principle. The idea that the Church, for its part, should not grant forgiveness, despite God’s pardon, was introduced first by Tertullian and was opposed by the Catholics who showed that the notion was nonsensical. For reasons other than those of Tertullian, this view later played a considerable role, for example, with Augustine, in respect of the many recidivists after the first penance. Because at that time already church law prescribed that penance could only be granted once, the bishop of Hippo did not know any other way of helping such people who had fallen but were again repentant The τινα healing promised in Sim. VII 4 (ibid., 65.2) should not to be given too much weight, since it is immediately explained and modified by the following πα&ντωφ.

[22] Cf. J. Grotz, pp. 21, 36 f.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

That the possibility of penance is in fact only limited is a point often made by the Shepherd of Hermas. In the great and decisive revelation concerning penance in the second vision it is established that for the 'saints' (i.e. for baptized Christians who, although they may be sinners, are still given this name by Hermas) penance 'from the fixed day' on is no longer possible, since the days are fulfilled and Christians can no longer expect salvation from the sins committed from now on (Vis. II 2,4-5 [GCS 48: pp. 5,25-6,8]; similarly Vis. III 5,5 [ibid., [70] p. 12,11-17]; 8,8 f. [ibid., p. 15,9-16]; 9,5 [ibid., p. 16,5-8]; Sim. IX 9,4 [ibid., p.83,26-9]; 19,2 [ibid., p.92,7-13]; 20,4 [ibid., p.93,2-6]; 21,4 [ibid., p. 93,17-20]; 26,6 [ibid., p. 95,27-32]; Sim. X 4,4 [ibid., pp. 111,18-112,4]). But in these passages the reason for the limitation is clear: the end of the world is imminent (for Hermas this seems to be announced by the dreaded, near 'tribulation' of a persecution: Vis. II 2,7 [GCS 48: p. 6, 10-13]; 3,4 [ibid., p. 7,2-4]) and there is no το&ποφ (Vis. III 5,5 [GCS 48: p. 12,11-17]) for penance. Because the judgement is coming soon and, therefore, the 'tower' is about to be completed, beforehand there is only a το&ποφ for doing good and so for true penance (ibid. 9,5 [GCS 48: p. 16,7-8]). Thus penance must be done 'rapidly' and not delayed (Sim. IX 19,2 [GCS 48: p. 92,7-13] and cf. VIII 9,4 [GCS 48: p. 74,21-5]).

If in Vis. II, 2,5 (GCS 48: p. 6,4-8) the days for penance for the saints are declared as being fulfilled, while the opportunity for (baptismal) penance is still offered to the pagans until the 'last day', the suggested difference between the deadline for the possibility of penance for Christians and that of baptism does not contradict the explanation given above. The Christian must have finished his penance by the last day and cannot begin it only then. If he wishes to complete it he must have begun it quite a while before this day. The critical moment for his penance, therefore, occurs already before the last day and, indeed, is determined by the threatening imminence of the end of the world, whereas for the pagan there is still the possibility of baptism right up to this day. (The idea that the Christian must not merely begin his penance but already have finished it is expressed e.g. in Sim. VIII 7,3 [CGS 48: pp. 72,17-73,2]; 8,3.5 [GCS 48: p. 74,1-10]; 9,4 [ibid., p. 74,21-5]; 10,1.3 [ibid., pp. 74,26-75,3.6-11]; it is even stressed that only after a long penance and after the completion of its conditions will sins be forgiven: Sim. VII 4 [GCS 48: pp. 64,17-65,21]). It might also be asked whether the distinction between a critical deadline for the penance of Christians, on the one hand, and for pagans, on the other, evinces a view which was widespread in Hermas' time, namely that before the actual end of the world and before the judgement there would be a 'reign of a thousand years' in which the pagans would still be able to be baptized, while bad Christians would have no further possibility of penance (since the good Christians would already have begun to reign with the Lord).[23] Moreover, Vis. II 2,5 (GCS 48: p. 6,4-8), translated [71] literally and verbatim, runs: 'The days of penance for the saints are fulfilled; and for the pagans, though (δε/) there is penance up to the last day.' Thus the δε/, because of the previous και/, establishes an opposition only between the saints and the pagans[24] but not between the limits of penance themselves; rather, the και/ stresses the identity of these two limits. Why, therefore, should Hermas not stress that for the pagans also the possibility of baptism ends with the last day? According to his expressed opinion the righteous who have died in pre-Christian times can and must be baptized in the underworld. Thus it can hardly be said that it is impossible that he stresses that from the now imminent day onwards there is no

[23] Galtier, De paenitentia, n.233, p. 162, n.l, believes that there is a chiliastic notion in this disputed text. L. Atzberger, Geschichte der christlichen Eschatologie innerhalb der vornicänischen Zeit (Freiburg/Br. 1896), p. 89 f., contests that Hermas was a chiliast.
[24] Cf. R. Joly, p. 92, n. 2.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

longer any possibility of salvation in the next life and that, therefore, the pagans and the faithful should strive to avail themselves of this last and quickly fading chance of salvation.

The day which in Vis. II is announced as the deadline for the possibility for penance and which here, at least, practically seems to coincide with the day on which this limit is promulgated in the vision to Hermas must not, however, be treated as a rigid and fixed term. In the course of the revelations throughout the book it is repeatedly postponed.[25] Hermas does not understand the exact determination of the term very precisely: it arrives with the completion of the tower, the final construction of which has been interrupted, precisely to allow the possibility of penance (Sim. X 4,4 [GCS 48: pp. 111, 18-112,4])!

In any event, in the whole book the limit for penance remains determined by the last day, expected as imminent, and the completion of the tower. If, therefore, because of the imminent end of the world there is for the faithful still a possibility for the remission of faults, but only if they are zealous and do penance immediately, then it is easy to understand that Hermas can deny to those who still have to receive baptism (and for this, at that time, a long preparation was necessary)[26] the possibility of finding the opportunity of further penance after baptism solely because of the nearness of the last day: Mand. IV 3,3 (GCS 48: p. 28,3-7); Vis. II 2,5 (ibid. p. 6,4-8).

The decisive reason for the principle 'Only one, unique remission of sins in baptism' is certainly other than that just mentioned; it is the 'ideal' principle for neophytes and the newly-baptized, which is proposed to them but which does not preclude the possibility of a further penance after baptism.[27]

[72]

2. The Situation before Hermas

A) THE POSSIBILITY OF A PENANCE FOR ALL SINS

In Vis. II the decisive revelation on penance is given to Hermas in the form of a booklet which he must transcribe and only after a long time be able to decipher (1,1-2,1 [GCS 48: p. 5,3-18]). This revelation concerns Hermas himself and his family (2,2 [ibid., p. 5,18-22]), but also all 'God's elect' (1,3 [ibid., p. 5,7-11]).

According to this vision his family (which has sinned) and 'all the saints' (who are also sinners), together with the church leaders (who also must mend their ways) will be forgiven their sins which they have previously committed (but only these) by God's mercy, provided that they do penance (conversion is taken for granted), change their ways, do not doubt God's readiness to forgive and undergo the 'tribulation' which precedes the end of the world

[25] For further details on this point cf. Dibelius, pp. 447, 453, 511 ff., and Poschmann p. 146. In the first four visions which have a special place in the whole work, the deadline for the possibility of doing penance appears to be immediately imminent. Thus the summons to penance in expectation of the imminent end of the world is the urgent leitmotif of these visions (cf. S. Giet, p. 123 ff.). In the mandata and similitudines we already meet a comparative 'diluted eschatology'. The end of the world is delayed, and this affects the doctrine of penance: the building of the tower is immediately interrupted (Sim. IX 5,2; 14,2) in order to postpone the Parousia (cf. R. Joly).

[26] In Hippolytus' Paradosis (17, Dix p. 28), which codifies the traditional Christian practice in about A.D. 220, a period of three years is envisaged for the catechumenate. Although such a long period may not yet have been customary in Hermas' circle (Justin, for instance, does not yet appear to be cognisant of such fixed periods), it is reasonable to assume, granted Hermas' picture of the general state of the Church, that is, as being considerably diminished in its original idealism, that already at this time (as later at the time of Hippolytus) great care was taken in the admission of neophytes and quite long probationary periods were imposed.

[27] On this point cf. P. Galtier, Aux origines du sacrament de la Pénitence, p. 132, n.34, together with R. Joly's criticism of d'Alès and Poschmann in La doctrine pénitentielle du Pasteur d'Hermas, p. 41 ff.; id., Hermas le Pasteur, pp. 24 f. and 158ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

without renouncing their faith (2,2-3,4 [GCS 48: pp. 5,18-7,4]). This is the content of the 'new' revelation.

Now what is the actual meaning of this revelation? Does it mean that previously there was no such possibility for the forgiveness of sins, so that now, for the first time, by means of this new revelation this possibility is offered by God for sins which have been committed after baptism? Or is it merely a question of the promise of the actual conversion of Hermas' family, of the limit for penance and, therefore, of the relative impossibility of being able to do penance later for new sins, both of these circumstances, together with the divine assurance of an actual forgiveness, being the (psychological) reason for the actual conversion of his family?

The second interpretation is the only one possible, and this for the following reasons. In the first place, even before this new revelation Hermas considers it completely self-evident that his children will be inscribed in the book of life along with the saints (Vis. I 3,2 [GCS 48: pp. 3,16-4,2]), if they do penance wholeheartedly, and that only pagans and unrepentant apostates (Hermas' children were also apostates) will be really rejected (Vis. I 4,2 [GCS 48: p. 4,18-21]). The possibility of a forgiveness of sins is, therefore, presupposed as self-evident in the first vision, without the murmur of a word to the effect that the promise made is something previously unheard-of. The content of the revelation on penance itself corroborates this observation: if Hermas communicates it as 'the Lord's oath' to his [73] family, it entails the forgiveness of sins because of the change of heart which is thereby elicited (this communication certainly cannot effect anything else; it is obviously not to be considered the reason for the immediate forgiveness itself) (Vis. II 2,4 [GCS 48: pp. 5,25-6,4]). The Lord's oath (2,5.8 [ibid., p. 6,4-8,14-17]), according to the obvious sense of the text, does not have as its subject the first opening of a possibility of penance (there is no mention of this), but the limitation of this possibility for penance. It is easy to see that such a communication can have the announced effect, already mentioned, namely the actual penance and the subsequent forgiveness of the sins of his family. This makes for an increase in the subjective and personal assurance of the forgiveness of sins (which, because of the uncertainty of fulfilling all the conditions necessary for forgiveness, is not absolute), and in turn this certainty becomes a new motive for an effective conversion, in so far as it facilitates the overthrow of doubt and despair (cf. Vis. III 11 [GCS 48: pp. 17,20-18,2]) which otherwise easily have a detrimental effect on the will to do penance.

The content of the revelation is, therefore, not the opening of a new, previously non-existent possibility of penance, but the impossibility of a later penance; and this not simply as a threat but as the effective motive for conversion which is still possible 'now', 'in these days'. This interpretation is confirmed by the observation in Mand. IV 3,4-5 (GCS 48: p. 28,7-13) that God, in his providence, has allowed for a penance for the faithful even after baptism because he knew that men, because of their own weakness and the devil's guile, would sin again after baptism.

The fact that Hermas 'has heard from certain teachers[28] that there is no other penance than that by which we descended into the water and received absolution of our earlier sins' (Mand. IV 3,1 [ibid., pp. 27,21-28,2]) cannot be adduced as a proof that the possibility of the forgiveness of post-baptismal sins is opened up for the first time by this revelation. The angel of penance verifies Hermas' grasp of the teachers' thesis (3,2 [ibid., p. 28,2-3]), but the manner in which this is done shows that there must always have been the possibility of [28] On the identification of these 'teachers' cf. Poschmann, p. 165, and P. Galtier, op. cit., together with R. Joly. G. Bardy prefers to see them as a particular group and connects them with the teachers reprimanded in Sim. VIII 6,5 and IX 19,2 f.; 22,14; cf. G. Bardy, 'Les écoles Romaines au second siècle' in: RHE 28(1932), pp. 501-32 (on Hermas see pp. 503-6). Nevertheless, the praise in Mand. IV and the reprimand in Sim. VIII/IX hardly refer to the same group of teachers, even though they all spread erroneous theories on penance.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

penance for sins after baptism. The principle of the 'teachers' is not interpreted as being obsolete, as if it were previously correct but now had been abolished by a new revelation; rather, it is presented as a still valid formulation of the ideal prescription (which earlier no [74] less than now excludes the possibility of a second penance): 'You have heard correctly [with this principle of the "teachers"]. It is so. Because the person who has received pardon for his sins must sin no more but must persevere in purity.' The ε1δει in the imperfect implies (as, e.g. in Vis. III 4,3 [GCS 48: p. 11,14-22]; Sim. VI 4,2 [ibid., p. 62,12-13]), as opposed to a δει= (Mand. IV 1,8 [ibid., p. 26,16-20]; Sim. VII 1 [ibid., p. 64,2-7]), that the person who was baptized earlier ought not to have sinned, but he has still done so, whereas a present δει= simply expresses the strict moral necessity without reference to its being contradicted by the reality. Since this ε1δει is brought in not as an opposition but as the basis for, and as a more precise explanation of, the teachers' principle (γα&ρ!), this principle, according to the angel of penance (i.e. according to Hermas) is intended to express nothing more than the prescription to preserve the grace of baptism.

The rest of the angel's explanation shows that this interpretation is correct, i.e. that it is a question of the compatibility of two axioms ('pardon only by baptism'-'penance for sins after baptism') and not of their mutual exclusion. The angel does not wish to go any further into his explanation (the δηλω&σω does not say any more, since the possibility of penance has been known to Hermas for a long time already and, therefore, does not need a new 'revelation'). But, with this explanation, he does not wish to give any opportunity for sinning to either present or future newly-baptized persons. In fact, these newly-baptized persons (the following sentence in Mand. IV 3,3b [ibid., p. 28,5-7] is, as the γα&ρ indicates, only intended as the justification of the intention not to give a pretext for sin, but not as the content of the announced 'explanation') do not have μετα&νοια but the (baptismal-) pardon of their sins; i.e. therefore they must (because they have no pretext for sinning) simply realize that they have to preserve this forgiveness of their sins (3,3b.4 [GCS 48: p. 28,5- 7.7-11]).

There now follows the announced further explanation as to why and how there is still a possibility of penance for sins committed after baptism, notwithstanding the ideal axiom of the teachers (3,4-6 [ibid., p. 28,7-16]): those who have been Christians for some time have (and ought to know that they have) a penance for their sins, because God, in his providence, knows men's weakness and the devil's guile and has, therefore, in his great mercy (it is called great [75] and not new!) granted such a possibility for penance. Thus the person who, after baptism (this is the 'great and holy calling'),[29] being tempted by the devil, falls into sin has still one (and only one) possibility for penance and forgiveness. The precise explanation of the meaning and the limits of the teachers' axiom and the justification of the single possibility of penance for those who are already Christians is based not on the fact that an earlier, stricter principle has been replaced by a new, more lenient one – there is no mention of such a change – but on the fact that God, in his mercy, has created such a possibility for forgiveness. Thus this principle of the teachers is more an ideal norm than a principle which does not admit of exceptions in practice.

If it were a question of a 'jubilee' which is to be proclaimed through a new revelation, then the problem of how the opinion of the teachers is to be understood and to be justified as still [29] A. d'Alès, L'edit de Calliste, pp. 73-8, has proven quite convincingly against Zahn, Funk, Rauschen and Watkins that this call does not mean a 'jubilee of penance', which Hermas supposedly announced, but that it is to be understood of baptism. This point is generally no longer disputed today; but cf. R. Joly (SC 53b) p.25.The 'call' is also baptism elsewhere in Hermas (cf. Sim. VIII 1,1; IX 14,5), and in Sim. VIII 11,1 the 'mission' of the angel of penance is explicitly distinguished from the 'call' by God's son. Thus it cannot be deduced from Mand. IV 3,3.4.6 that it is only after Hermas' preaching of penance that those who are already Christians have a single possibility of penance. Rather it was there from the time of their baptism. Clement of Alexandria also understands this 'call' as baptism (cf. Strom II 13,56 f.).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

valid would hardly arise; rather, it could just be said that this axiom has now been abrogated. But then a distinction between 'pardon' in baptism and 'penance' for sins committed after baptism would be completely superfluous; then the possibility of penance for those who are already Christians would not be demonstrable with reasons which are universal, always valid and always known by God; then the inefficacy of a further possibility for penance after the single post-baptismal μετα&νοια (Mand. IV 3,6b [ibid., p. 28,14-15]) must appear more clearly and must have its basis in God and not in the doubtful state of the human conscience, as it always has according to Hermas.[30]

When Hermas says that, after this explanation of the angel, he 'lives again' (Mand. IV 3,7 [ibid., p. 28,16-19]), this does not mean that he experienced something completely new from the angel; the phrase belongs more to the rhetorical conclusions of a rather clumsy stylist. Hermas was already aware of the possibility of penance (irrespective of how he may have envisaged it). Nevertheless, there was sufficient reason in the angel's explanation for a 'new life'. Even if the fundamental possibility of a remission of sins after baptism was previously recognized and, therefore, presented no purely theoretical problem, the doubt over the effectiveness of post-baptismal penance could, nevertheless, have very well been a practical problem. If one were convinced that a long and tiresome effort was required, [76] that this had to be metanoia and not only aphesis of sins, then even Hermas could be very unsure about the actual effectiveness of penance (despite the already known theoretical principle). The new explanation of the old possibility must have helped him and his readers to surmount the weakness of their spirit, caused by age and doubt (Vis. III 9,2 [ibid., p. 15,25-7]), and to become sure that their previous sins have really been forgiven, in so far as, from now on, they sin no more (Mand. IV 3,7 [ibid., p. 28,16-19]).

In conclusion we can say, therefore: neither in Vis. II nor in Mand. IV is there any mention of the fact that the announced possibility of penance for sins committed after baptism is a new, previously unheard-of privilege of God's grace. What is new is the eschatological limitation of this possibility of penance and the assurance of its effective success in the present cases.

For the correct assessment of this teaching of Hermas we should keep the following point in mind: as much as this eschatological notion of penance in Hermas with regard to the imminent arrival of the last day is based on subjective and erroneous assumptions,[31] it also contains a nucleus of truth which today is only too easily forgotten: the person who sins after baptism puts himself in a situation which, despite the fundamental possibility for penance and forgiveness, from man's viewpoint contains no guarantee of a new forgiveness. This is because the sinner is deprived of the certainty that he will in fact have again the interior (he has sinned as a believer!) and the exterior (he can always die) possibility of a conversion. If then this possibility is indeed granted to him, it is not simply the mere application of a universal, institutional possibility of forgiveness, but an 'actual', always 'once and for all' grace of God, over which he has no control, which always comes to him as a new miracle, as a 'revelation', and in which there is no guarantee that it will be granted to him ever again if he should squander it. Hermas is more correct than he appears at first sight if, according to our view, he does not announce a 'jubilee'. The sentence directed to the concrete existence of a man, 'Penance is granted to you', must affect the man of today, as it did Hermas then, as an unexpected gift, which one has to doubt when he thinks of the irrational depravity of the man who, while believing, still sins, and when he thinks of his inevitable lack of control over his present existence.

[30] If it were merely a question of God's will to forgive being limited, then Hermas need only have said: from now on or after the paenitentia secunda God will no longer forgive, even though a person does penance. However, he always says: there is no further forgiveness, because either penance is not done or is not possible.
[31] These conditions are especially clear in the first four visions, above all in Vis. II 2.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[77]

B) BAPTISM AND FURTHER PENANCE

Although this question has already been touched upon briefly, it still needs to be examined separately. This examination will, in its turn, act as a confirmation of the findings of the last section. In Mand. IV 3,3 ([GCS 48: p. 28,3-7]) Hermas makes a distinction between a metanoia after baptism and the aphesis in baptism. Alongside the general notion of every conversion (cf. Mand. IV 3,1 [ibid., pp. 27,21-28,2]) he knows, therefore, of a narrower, specific kind which applies only to sins committed after baptism. It has already been said that, in connection with Mand. IV 3, such a distinction would be completely superfluous if the post-baptismal forgiveness were simply a matter of a new act of God's grace which was determined only by God's good pleasure. In this case, Hermas would only have to explain that new Christians have no such possibility since it was not granted to those who have been Christians for some time. Indeed, it would be superfluous to explain that new Christians ought not to count on a metanoia, but must preserve the aphesis (which is obviously meant as the greater and better and, therefore, not to be squandered).

Nevertheless, it is still not yet clear what makes the difference between this aphesis and the metanoia. This is precisely what is not said. Thus it may be assumed, despite the literary device of an instruction by an angel, that the distinction was already known. And this would be a confirmation of the fact that the possibility of penance after baptism was not an unheard-of novelty. If we wish to explain, at least indirectly, the difference between these two notions, then we could consider that, according to the view of the Shepherd of Hermas, metanoia was a difficult and long-lasting operation,[32] a 'humiliation and purification of the soul', emanating from a fresh insight (Mand. IV 2,2 [ibid., p. 27,9-16]), living according to the commandments (2,4 [ibid., p. 27,19-20]), praying for forgiveness Vis. 11,9 [ibid., p. 2,14-17]), being corrected by others (Vis. I 3,2 [ibid., pp. 3,16-4,2]) and especially by church officials (Vis. II 4,3 [ibid., p. 7,14- 18]) who have a right to administer discipline in the community (Vis. III 9,10 [ibid., p. 16,18-21] and Sim. IX 31,5 f. [ibid., pp. 100,11-101,17]) which can extend to excommunication (cf. Mand. IV 1,8.9 [ibid., p. 26,16-23]: if a private relationship with the adulterous wife has already been broken off, then she cannot be tolerated in the community either). To all these would certainly be [78] added fasting (cf. Vis. III 10,6 [ibid., p. 17,7- 10]; Sim. V 1 [ibid., p. 52,2-19]), almsgiving (Vis. III 9,4-6 [ibid., p. 16,4-11]; Sim. V 3 [ibid., pp. 54,11-55,13]) and similar works of neighbourly love (Mand. VIII 10 [ibid., pp. 35,21-36,4]; Sim. IX 20 [ibid., pp. 92, 21-93,6]) and finally the patient bearing of the tribulations imposed by God himself (Sim. VI 3,4-6 [ibid., pp. 61,12-62,8]).

It is in such a regulated penance which only slowly (cf. e.g. Sim. VI 4 [ibid., p. 62,9-21]) leads to man's 'healing' and to the 'purification' from sins (healing: Vis. 11,9 [ibid., p. 2,14-17]; Mand. IV 1,11 [ibid., p. 27,2-5]; purification: Vis. III 2,2 [ibid., p. 9,9-12]; Sim. VII 2 [ibid., p. 64,7-13]) and only in this way to the pardon of sins which Hermas ascribes to metanoia (Vis. II 2,4 [ibid., pp. 5,25-6,4]; Mand. IV 4,4 [ibid., pp. 28,27-29,3]; Sim. VII 4 [ibid., pp. 64,17-65,2]; Sim. IX 33,3 [ibid., pp. 104,11-105,15]) that there can be seen a difference from the aphesis of baptism in which the forgiveness of sins is obtained more speedily, more surely and with less effort. This is one way of understanding the view of the 'teachers' who know only a single metanoia of baptism which leads immediately to a full aphesis of sins without the long way of penance.

[32] Cf. S. Giet, p. 192, and P. Aubin, Le problème de la 'conversion' (Théologie historique I) (Paris 1963), p. 85 ff., together with J. Hoh, p. 14 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In this way it also becomes clearer that the angel, despite the possibility of a penance after baptism, does not have to contradict the view of the teachers, since such an aphesis without penance in the narrow sense of a long-lasting performance of penance is, even according to his message, given only once, and that in baptism. Whether Hermas himself thought exactly along these lines is not easy to prove from the brief reference in Mand. IV 3,3 (GCS 48:28,3-7). Nevertheless, it is a plausible explanation of the difference in question. Also later tradition,[33] beginning with Clement of Alexandria, knows this distinction and explains it in the way we have proposed. If this whole later tradition does not depend upon the brief reference in Hermas, just as it was hardly invented by Hermas himself, then this explanation of his expressions becomes all the more reasonable.

Nevertheless, the difference between the baptismal remission and metanoia after baptism should not be exaggerated. As we have said, the early Church knew a very real performance of penance for catechumens, as the successful organization of the institution of the catechumenate in the second century shows. Hermas himself suggests this, since in Mand. IV 3,1 (ibid., pp. 27,21-28,2) the metanoia, [79] taken literally, means not baptism itself but 'penance' on the occasion (ο#τε) of baptism.

IV. THE UNREPEATABLE CHARACTER OF THE GRANTING OF PENANCE

The possibility of receiving the forgiveness of all sins committed after baptism is, therefore, according to Hermas, not given for the first time by a new revelation. But it is granted for one occasion only.

[33] Thus 2 Clement 8,6 states: 'Keep the flesh pure and the seal unsullied, so that we may receive eternal life.' This life is, accordingly, attainable only if the baptismal seal has never been lost. But even 2 Clement recognizes a post-baptismal penance (cf. Poschmann, Paenitentia secunda, pp. 124 ff.). In Dial. 44 Justin says that the unique hope is to continue to live without sins after the α!φεσιφ in baptism. Nevertheless, he also holds that every repentant person receives forgiveness from God (cf. Poschmann, p. 209 f.). Origen declares: outside baptism there is no α!φεσιφ of sins (Exhort. ad mart. 30), yet he does not dispute the fact that even the most serious sins can be remitted by a subsequent penance. (On this point cf. chap. 8 in this volume, 'The Penitential Teaching of Origen'.) In another context, in In Jerem. hom. XX 19,4, Origen develops a whole theory of the salvific aspect of error (for example in the ethics of marriage). These ideas are relevant here since this theory includes the error over the extent of God's mercy. In his Catholic period, when he taught the possibility of a remission of even the most serious sins, Tertullian tells the catechumens quite simply: semel delicta diluuntur, quia ea iterari non oportet (De bapt. 15). Indeed in cap. 18 he uses this as the basis for his principle that baptism should not be received too early. Nevertheless, he speaks to Christians only very reluctantly about a post-baptismal penance: Nihil iam de paenitentia noverint, nihil eius requirant. Piget secundae, immo iam ultimae spei subtexere mentionem, ne tractantes de residuo auxilio paenitendi spatium adhuc delinquendi demonstrare videamur (De paenit. 7,1-6). Pacian preaches to his neophytes: semel liberamur . . . tenete quod accepistis (De sancto bapt. 7), and yet he is one of the most outspoken opponents of novatianist rigorism. In Epist. I n.5 he develops explicitly a theory about the pedagogical value of silence with regard to a second possibility of penance as far as neophytes are concerned: sed nos hanc indulgentiam Dei nostri miseris, non beatis, nec ante peccatum, sed post peccata detegimus; nec sanis medicinam, sed male habentibus nuntiamus. (Cf. also his description of the capital sins, which is obviously intended in the first place to give the impression that such sins are unforgivable, while – as is clear from what follows – he only wishes to invite those guilty of such sins to undertake public church penance: Paraenesis de paenitentia 4-5. Chrysostom, In Hebr. hom. 31 n.2 speaks of Paul's pedagogical silence in the letter to the Hebrews in connection with a further possibility of penance. Jerome says of baptism: solum potest peccata dimittere (In Isaiam I 1 v.16; PL 24,35). Although this may have been intended as an opposition to the Jewish rites of purification, it still shows how naturally an author could stress the uniqueness of baptism with regard to the forgiveness of sins without being a novatianist. Even for Augustine church penance after baptism is something which in fact ought not to occur in the life of a Christian, something on which one should not count: Epist. 265,2; Sermo 352 cap.3 n.8.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

1. The Fact of the Unrepeatable Character

In two passages Hermas says that this metanoia announced by him is once and for all: Mand. IV 1,8 (ibid., p. 26,16-20); 3,6 (ibid., p. 28,13-16). Here we have the first tangible witness for such an unrepeatable character. Now was Hermas the first to formulate this principle or did he merely take up a previously existing principle? Does this unrepeatable character concern the possibility of a unique granting of church penance and reconciliation or does it mean that the sinner can receive the forgiveness of his sins only once from God? An answer to this question is possible only (if at all) in so far as the basis of this unrepeatable character in Hermas is clarified.

2. The Basis and Meaning of the Unrepeatable Character of the Granting of Penance

The reasons for the unrepeatable character of penance after baptism according to Hermas are varied. In the first place, the notion of the limitation of penance plays an important role in this connection. Since absolutely every possibility of penance will cease with the imminent end of the world,[34] while the completion of penance requires a certain amount of time, for this practical reason alone Hermas cannot envisage a repeated penance. This idea is many times expressed and, given this assumption, the unrepeatable character of penance is not at all surprising or problematical. This limitation is precisely the decisive point in Hermas' prophecy on penance, even [80] if it is not the unique reason for the unrepeatable character of penance.

Hermas also often emphasizes that a performance of penance which is hesitant, doubtful and does not really come 'from the heart' can only with difficulty hope for forgiveness. The reason why certain sins will not be forgiven is that there is a lack of true repentance. Similarly, Hermas considers a falling back after the first post-baptismal penance as a sign of unrepentance and lack of sincerity in the previous repentance and, because of the hopelessness of the situation, holds a further penance as impossible. In practice, it was always a question, in those days, of a person who had been separated or excommunicated from the Church, who after a long penance had been accepted by the Church again and then, once more, had fallen away from it. Thus it is hardly strange that the decisiveness and seriousness of such a person's penance should have been called into question and that he should have been considered as a 'hopeless case'. We might think of today's practice of the 'refusal of absolution' in the case of a recidivist sinner. In those days one could arrive psychologically more easily at a judgement of unworthiness, arguing from the point of view of admission into the holy community of the Church, than we can from our contemporary viewpoints. Certainly such a judgement had a meaning for God and the Church, but it could, nevertheless, leave the 'hopeless case' to God. If[35] sinners, who sin υ(πο_ ξει=ρα, really 'continue' to sin

[34] As we have frequently observed, the expectation of the end of the world in Hermas is found above all in the visions. But it then appears to recur gradually in the mandata right through to the similitudines. Cf. S. Giet, pp. 190, 229 f.

[35] We say 'if', for it is by no means certain that υ9πο& ξει=ρα α&μαρτα&νειν means 'to sin continually, repeatedly'. 9Yπο& ξει=ρα is not witnessed elsewhere in the sense of 'continually', 'repeatedly'. In Hermas the expression is found in Vis. III 10,7; V 5*;* Mand. IV 3,6. In the ancient Latin translations it is rendered by confestim or subinde. But confestim does not mean 'continually'. And if – as is perfectly possible – subinde is construed in the same sense, then the ancient translations provide no proof for the sense which we have suggested. Subinde does usually mean 'often', but this meaning is not compelling. What is more, it would still have to be shown that the translation really understood the Greek text correctly. Dibelius' explanation (p. 478) of the possible evolution of υ9πο& ξει=ρα from its use attested by the papyri to the sense which we suggest here is enlightening only if this suggested sense is already taken for granted. In fact the meanings in the papyri

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

(increasingly) and wish to do penance (Mand. IV 3,6 [GCS 48: p. 28,13-16]), then in this passage the assumed unrepentance of such a sinner is more or less explicitly suggested as the reason for the single meaningful penance after baptism.

Moreover, one could consider that, according to Hermas, this post-baptismal penance stands in a clear parallel to baptism (Mand. IV 3,3 f. [ibid., p. 28,3-11]). It is possible to understand this parallel in such a way that the unrepeatable character of baptism is ascribed to post-baptismal penance. This is at least (and even only) possible in the sense that Hermas, for pastoral-pedagogical reasons – as when he keeps quiet about the possibility of a penance after baptism before neophytes – speaks only of a single possibility of penance to those who have been Christians for some time, in order to give them no pretext for sin and, even in the case of sinful people who have been Christians for some time, to appeal to the 'ideal' principle: [81] there is only one metanoia open to us. These presumed reasons for the unrepeatable character of penance concern the question of the effectiveness of this penance before God. They do not allow the conclusion that Hermas thinks that a further church penance, which would no longer be performed, is impossible, while it always remains possible to expect the forgiveness of sins before God. Explicitly in the whole of Hermas' treatment of penance it is always a question of whether and in which circumstances the sinner can find forgiveness from God. In any case a further church penance is denied because (and not even though!) there is no longer the certainty that God will still forgive.

Has, therefore, the unrepeatable character of penance nothing to do with church penance? Without going into this question, we should make it clear here that in Hermas this notion, in the final analysis, is not based on church discipline. Nevertheless, there is in fact a connection between this single possibility for penance and the reality of the Church. This is shown already by the parallel with the unrepeatable character of baptism (the great and holy calling; cf. Mand. IV 3,6 [ibid., p. 28,13-16]), therefore, with a tangible and even juridical event which is once and for all and precisely therein ecclesial. If one does not consider the ecclesial character of penance, then one cannot envisage anything further of its 'unrepeatable character'. Indeed, what can it mean at all if it is understood merely as an event between the conscience and God? How can an actual forgiveness of sins be conceived, after which a further forgiveness would be meaningless, so that it could be said: from now on, therefore, something is no longer possible? It is precisely the matter-of-fact way with which the principle of the single possibility of penance is introduced which shows that, in Hermas' view, penance in some way (yet to be determined) occurs before the Church and even there receives its clear conclusion.

The above conclusion can be discounted only on the assumption that the unrepeatable character of penance rests on nothing other than the eschatological limitation. Certainly it makes no sense to allow a recidivist access yet again to penance, since this, because of the threatening end of the world, arrives too late. But the limit for this world and the limitation of the possibility of penance do not coincide. In Mand. IV 3 the unrepeatable character is mentioned without reference to the imminent end. It seems there to have as its [82] cause the are far from clear. The meaning of υ9πο& ξει=ρα just mentioned for Vis. III and V is not proven with certainty from the context. Certainly it makes sense there, but the question remains whether this sense is the correct one. Yet another meaning, such as sans gêne would suit these passages. The Latin sub manu (which is another possible translation of the Greek) does not mean 'continually'. In other words, we have no proof that the υ9πο/ ξει=ρα in Mand. IV 3,6 is not intended as the opposite of the preceding υ9πο& του= διαβο&λου, which was already the view of Windisch (p. 364). Accordingly, Hermas would have in mind the sin of obduracy, for which theme was no prospect of true sorrow. At most this sin could be accompanied by the semblance of 'penance' but allowed for no doing of 'wholehearted' penance. In so far as Hermas (as Clement of Alexandria will do so explicitly later, Strom. II 13,57.4) recognizes in a relapse after penance just such an act of malice, an interpretation of Mand. IV 3,6 as a sin of obduracy would amount in fact to the same meaning. Cf. Poschmann, p. 165 n. 1.

---

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

unrepentance of the sinner, a reason, therefore, which is independent of eschatological considerations. Nevertheless, the single possibility of penance is proposed in such a matter-of-fact way, without an actual justification, that it appears unlikely that Hermas is the first person to have formulated it. Even if he were not the only author of this principle, we ought to assume that it emanated from the same considerations which we can suppose in Hermas' background. But even with this we have not made much progress. It is by no means certain and self-evident (despite the high esteem which the Shepherd of Hermas enjoyed in the early Church) that the later witnesses of the single possibility of penance (already from Clement of Alexandria onwards, where indeed it is understood as purely ecclesial) depend solely on Hermas. Would this be sufficient to explain the self-evidence, the universality and the tenacious, long duration of this teaching? On this point there remain questions which do not admit of a complete solution.

What is sure is that in Hermas the single possibility of penance after baptism is discernible for the first time. The reasons which may be supposed for this notion, however, do not prove that this principle could claim to be a universal, always valid and immutable dictate of the divine law. Once, however, this obscure and polyvalent principle was expressed, be this only with the authority of Hermas or with others as well, then it worked even further on its own, independently of the psychological and eschatological ideas which had once determined its origin. From a theological principle (the unrepeatable character of penance before God) it becomes a principle of church law, according to which penance before the Church is possible only once (in Tertullian this passage is fairly easy to discern).[36] It can even (e.g. in Augustine)[37] receive a new justification which almost contradicts the old one; it remains in force because the deviation from such a strict principle always smacks of laxism for an uneducated conscience and, therefore, requires a courage which is not at all common among men. Finally it can be discarded, only because it could die, still without actually being killed.

Nevertheless, there still lives in this principle of Hermas of the single possibility of penance an imperishable nucleus which is usually overlooked. Just as one cannot love truly without excluding in the act of love the thought that it could be revoked and come to an end, so one cannot repent of one's guilt before the unconditioned [83] that is God if this sorrow is not intended as irrevocable and once and for all. Only from the outside and by one who is not involved can it be said that it could happen often.

3. The Fate of Recidivists

On the question of the fate of those who, after the single post-baptismal penance, fall back again, the first point to be noted is that Hermas did not consider cases of this kind very often. The sinners he knew best were those to whom his exhortation to a first penance actually applied. Even in those cases where he has doubts about there being sufficient metanoia, he is thinking about unrepentance after baptism and not such an unrepentance after post-baptismal penance.[38]

---

[36] Obviously Tertullian, in his Montanist period, had to leave some hope of forgiveness by God even to the sinner to whom he refused church reconciliation. In fact he did this much more clearly than did Hermas. Thus the way was prepared for the Catholic presentation of the tenet that recidivist sinners can still be forgiven by God, even if the Church denies them a second reconciliation.

[37] Augustine, Epist. 153,7 attempts to justify the once and for all character of church reconciliation, quite independently of doubt concerning the sinner's disposition and of the doubt of God's forgiveness to which this gives rise: ne medicina vilis minus utilis esset aegrotis, quae tanto magis salubris, quanto minus contemptibilis fuerit.

[38] J. Grotz (p. 20) considers that the men who are described in Vis. III 2,7c are 'recidivists'. But this is difficult to prove. These people arc near the Church and have not, as the 'alienated', broken off all relationship with the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This could apply especially to the case of Maximus (Vis. II 3,4 [GCS 48: p. 7,2-4]), who belongs to this category in so far as Hermas does not consider the danger of a new fall as excluded for this Christian who has often fallen and been repeatedly received into the Church. It is not surprising that we do not have concrete examples, since the Christian faith at that time hardly provided material advantages, was entirely a matter of personal belief and was menaced throughout the whole world. In this situation it would be unusual to find sinners who, after an official penance (unless it is official it could not be conceived as 'once and for all'), come to the Church after a second, notorious fall and again receive penance.[39]

Thus the men Hermas has in mind are those who, after baptism, have fallen away, become traitors, have alienated themselves from the life of the Church or who otherwise no longer observe the externally tangible obligations of a Christian. He is hardly thinking of men who have already expressed sorrow for such faults in a tangible form (so that they have already done 'penance'), who have fallen again and now wish to rectify their defection. In reality there is no pressing problem of the recidivist, at least as a general phenomenon. Only the latter would lead to a thought-out theory, while previously eventual individual cases were solved – positively or negatively – according to an indefinite norm.

This is also the best explanation of the fact that the whole question of the fate of recidivists is a peripheral one and is 'solved' only [84] vaguely. Thus in Sim. VIII 7,5 (GCS 48: p. 73,6-9) those who have been reinserted into the tower are warned that they will be ejected again and will lose their life if they fall back into their old sin of quarrelsomeness. In this warning there is no assumption that the addressees will do penance once again (either because the will or the possibility is not available for it). But this says nothing about the fate of the recidivist who still repents. For this case there remains only Mand. IV 3,6 (ibid., p. 28,3- l6),[40] provided that it is here a question of those who fall away after a post-baptismal metanoia. Then there would be a reference to those who, in some sense, do penance again (or at least give this impression). Of these Hermas says: 'Ασυ/μφορο&ν ε0στι τω|~ α0νθρω&ποω| τω~| τοιου/τω|: δυσκο&λωφ γα_ρ ζη/σεται. The second half of this passage must be understood as the justification, not as the consequence, of the 'uselessness' of such a penance after backslidings (with Poschmann, 169, it is best to relate the υ9πο_ ξει=ρα to both the act of sinning and the doing of penance). The person who oscillates between sin and penance in this way can only with difficulty arrive at a complete revival of freedom from sin in this life. Thus such a penance is useless (as Poschmann suggests, the 'life' in question is that of Vis. III 8,3 [GCS 48: p. 15,11-16]; III 11-13 [ibid., pp. 17,20-19,3]; Sim. VIII 7,6 [ibid., p. 73,9-13]; IX 14,3 [ibid., p. 88,13-17]), that is, the present interior life of the person who is genuinely and sincerely repentant). In the Shepherd of Hermas δυ/σκολοφ means only 'very difficult'[41] but not 'impossible' (Mand. IX 6 [GCS 48: p. 37, 4-7]; XII 1,2 [ibid., p. 42,21-6]; Slim. VIII 10,2 [ibid.,p. 75,3-6]; IX 20,2 [ibid., p. 92,24-9]; 23,3 cp. 23,5 [ibid., p. 94,11-22]). Because of the clear lack of sorrow and repentance envinced in the new fall Hermas considers the recidivists to be in a fairly hopeless situation thus he rejects the performance of Church (cf. Vis. III 2,9). They may also have had the opportunity of penance, but it is not possible to prove that they were recidivists in the strict sense, that is, that they had fallen again into their old sins after having completed their penance and received church reconciliation. They could just as well be hypocrites who, despite their (exterior) faith, remain full of wickedness, who after their baptism have never really led a Christian life or have reverted to a non-Christian way of life, although exteriorly they remain united with the community, and who finally have remained irresponsive to exhortations and attempts to bring about their conversion. Similarly it is easy to see those who are supposed as possible (but not as actual) recidivists in Sim. VIII 6,2 as those who have sinned after baptism, but not after a post-baptismal completed penance.

---

[39] This lack of examples is, therefore, not a proof that, before Hermas, church penance with excommunication did not exist.

[40] Cf. R. Joly, p. 161 nn.4-7.

[41] Cf. S. Giet, p. 194.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'church' penance as useless (better: as unfeasible) – and, moreover, he renounces any clear prospect for their further fate.

Hermas holds that the interior, subjective condition of such sinners is vague and, therefore, the forgiveness of their sins by God is uncertain. Thus they cannot be received back into the Church, and in this sense penance after baptism remains necessarily a single possibility. Certainly no definitive judgement can be made about the personal fate of these sinners in the next life. According to Hermas, therefore, no further metanoia can be made available to the recidivist sinner because it is not known whether he has made himself [85] worthy of the forgiveness of his sins before God by real penance. This view corresponds entirely with the notion that there are sins of such gravity that they do not admit of genuine penance 'from the bottom of the heart', any more than they can be forgiven by God.

Even today, however, it is easy to think of cases in which absolution would inevitably be refused, even though there is no absolute certainty about the unrepentance of the person concerned. Even today, therefore, there is something like a 'once-and-for-all penance' where a person has sorrow 'with difficulty'.

V. CHURCH PENANCE

1. The Church and Salvation

Without a doubt the Church plays an important role in the theology of Hermas. For him it is not only the community of believers, but a transcendent and spiritual reality which was created before all other things and is above all the aim and the meaning of God's creation (Vis. II 4,1 [GCS 48: p. 7.5-10].[42] The fate of all men, that is, their salvation or their perdition, is determined by their belonging or their not belonging to the Church. This is because human destiny is dependent upon both penance in baptism and penance after baptism. The effectiveness of this penance is discernible for Hermas by a man's being integrated into the tower of the Church or his being rejected from it (Vis. II 2,3-8,10 ; Sim. IX 3,1-10,5 [Ibid., pp. 78,8-84,27]; 11,9-33,3 [ibid., pp. 85,28-104,15]; X 4,4 [ibid., pp. 110,20-112,4]). This tower is certainly not simply identical with the actual, visible church community on earth, since it also counts as its members, and even in its first rank, the righteous dead (Sim. IX 15,4 [ibid., p. 89,14-18]; 16,5 [ibid., p. 90,6-11]; 25,2 [ibid., p. 95,6.11]). At the same time, according to Hermas, there are in the earthly Church men who have been ejected from the tower. In quite a few cases one can hardly take it for granted that such men (as apostates) are always separated from the Church (Vis. III 6,4-6 [ibid., p. 13,3-6]; Sim. IX 20,1 f. [ibid., p. 92,21-9]; 21 [ibid., p. 93,7-20]; 22,4 [ibid., pp. 93,30-94,4]).[43]

---

[42] In the first four visions the Church appears above all as pre-existent and as a spiritual reality. In parables IX (which is strongly Christological) and X it is presented at a later stage of development and less spiritualized. In the mandata and the first eight similitudines it is scarcely mentioned explicitly. On the Church in Hermas and its mole in his view of penance, cf.: R. Joly, pp. 28-30, 34-41; S. Giet, pp. 108-21, 169-73, 228 f.; C. Vogel, p. 18, together with W. Doskocil, pp. 169-77.

[43] In Sim. III 3 it is stated: 'Just as in winter trees which have lost their leaves resemble one another, making it impossible to know which are withered and which have vitality, so in this world the righteous are not distinguishable from sinners but all resemble one another.' According to this idea, the tower is not simply to be identified with the earthly Church, since in the tower sinners and the righteous arc separated, which is precisely not possible in the case of the earthly Church. We could put this more precisely: in the tower sinners and the righteous are made separate, in a way which clearly underlines the relationship between these two groups. This analogy also shows, however, that the idea of an earthly Church which is a pure community of saints is totally alien to Hermas. But why should he be so opposed to the reconciliation of a repentant sinner with this Church, if in this world it is never possible to distinguish Sinners clearly from the righteous?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Nevertheless this Church of Hermas' visions is not simply a pure [86] ideal being which has nothing to do with the visible earthly Church. This 'ideal' image is rather the empirical Church, which is based on baptism as a tangible event, which needs purification (Sim. IX 18,2 [ibid., p. 91,15-20]), which, being involved in the sins of its members, is old and weak, so that it can be rejuvenated only by their penance (Vis. III 11-13 [ibid., pp. 17,20-19,3]).[44] The Church in Hermas' visions is, therefore, the earthly Church, which is entered by baptism (Sim. IX 17,4 [ibid., p. 91,3-9]), which is still being built (Vis. III 5,5 [ibid., p. 12,11-171; Sim. IX 14,2 [ibid., p. 88,8-13]; X 4,4 [ibid., pp. 110,20-112,41) and which can be soiled. Nevertheless, it is viewed from God's standpoint; empirically it evinces a clash between the reality and the appearance, without, however, there being two quite independent realities: an ideal and an empirical Church.

Visible belonging to the Church (especially by baptism) is in the first place so necessary for salvation that, according to Hermas, mankind before Christ still needed baptism (Sim. IX 16,5 ff. [ibid., p. 90,6-18]). At the same time, however, mere empirical belonging is still not an absolute guarantee of salvation, since, in some cases, it does not express an inner reality and the men in question – from God's viewpoint – are not actually in the tower. In fact even sinners belong to the Church (at least externally), and therefore the 'holy church' (Vis. 11,6 [ibid., pp. 1,17-2,3]; 3,4 [ibid., p. 4,7-15]; IV 1,3 [ibid., p. 19,8-12]) cannot consider itself holy in the sense that it has nothing at all to do with sin and sinners.

2. Church and Penance

A) PENANCE OF EXCOMMUNICATION

The Church, however, is so 'holy' that it wishes to express in its earthly reality the fact that its sinful members do not actually belong to it, which fact is evident to God. Thus the Church 'excommunicates'[45] sinners, while it remains irrelevant whether, by so doing, it has actual success. In the case of apostates and others who themselves break their external relationship with the Church such a specific act of the Church is obviously superfluous (cf. Sim. IX 26,3 [ibid., p. 95,18-2 1]). In other cases, however, e.g. in the case of adultery, such an act can be necessary and is even prescribed: [87] Mand. IV 1,5 (ibid., p. 26,8-11). This passage concerns only the innocent partner who must break up the marriage relationship, but it is unthinkable that, at the same time, both partners should continue their fellowship with each other within the Church.[46] The obligation to separate (1,9 [ibid., p. 26,20-4]) is immediately changed into a fundamental and universal principle ('If a person [masc.!] remains in such works and does not do penance, keep yourself far away from him and do not live together with him, otherwise you share in the guilt of his sin'), so that it is reasonable to suppose that the empirical Church tries – as far as it can – to respond to the sin which separates a man [44] The justification for the Church's 'old age' in Vis. III 11,2 is derived from the presentation in Vis. II 4,1 and is developed further.

[45] W. Doskocil, pp. 160-93, considers the close connection between excommunication and penance in the Shepherd of Hermas.

[46] In this question we should obviously not have in mind our modern church life, where one 'attends church anywhere', without in any way affecting practically the rest of the individual's personal and social relationships. Rather we should conjure up the life of a community such as is presented to us, for instance, in Hippolytus' Paradosis. In this context the idea of a secular 'boycott' without an ecclesial significance is impossible (cf. J. Hoh, p. 18 f.). If 'concubinage' (in the ancient sense) and certain professions were punished by excommunication, and if a catechumen (even according to Justin) was not allowed to take part in the actual liturgy, then the cessation of married life inevitably signified an excommunication by the Church as well, however this may be envisaged as having taken place. In this regard, it is worth bearing in mind that for several decades before Hippolytus community life was even more narrow and more strict.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

interiorly from itself with institutional measures ('excommunication'), this being considered the natural and prescribed reaction to sin (how this actually took place the text does not say).[47] Precisely because the Church is necessary for salvation and yet belonging to it offers no guarantee of salvation, the attempt is made to resolve the tension between these two points by expressing in the external sphere what has happened within man by sin. If perdition is seen as involving loss of relationship with the Church, the Church itself will appear as holy, salvific and necessary for salvation even in its empirical reality.

Now Grotz is convinced, by his thorough analysis of the text of Hermas, that he has provided the proof that there is mention in Hermas of sinners who have need of sacramental penance and yet are not excommunicated. He thinks that he can recognize a group of such sinners in the people who in Vis. III 2,7a (ibid., p. 9,26 f.); 5,5 (ibid., p. 12,11-17) (Grotz, p. 19) 'therefore have not strayed far away from the tower, because they will be very useful for the building when they have done penance'. These people are certainly different from those who do not lie by the tower but have been expelled far from it (in Grotz the group E: Vis. III 2,9 [ibid., p.10,3-8]; 7,1-3 [ibid., pp.13,20-14,6]). But does this mean sinners who are not excommunicated? The answer to this question will naturally depend upon the view that one has of excommunication. If it means that the 'relations with the tower, i.e. with the Church have been broken' (Grotz, ibid.) then obviously this group is not excommunicated. It is readily granted that the relationship of these men to the church community, according to Hermas' image, is radically different from that of the group E. The latter have been driven away from the tower and this – as Grotz rightly stresses – because they have themselves [88] defected from the Church as apostates with a certain definitiveness through their own decision and without having the intention of doing penance in any way. Nevertheless, this in no way proves that the group C2 (Grotz distinguishes this group from C3 and E) cannot be treated as excommunicated. Grotz overlooks the basis for the whole of Hermas' image: all those who have to do penance find themselves outside the place in the tower itself where they were and should be because of their baptism. This applies also to the group C2. One may only unwillingly call this state of being outside the tower 'excommunication'; one may stress that those who are 'cast right out' are in a totally different position from the men of group C2, because they are not influenced at all by the Church's penitential concern, because the Church-at least for the time being-does not bother about them any more and has practically given up hope of their conversion. Nevertheless, one ought not to overlook what is also for Hermas obviously the most important point and what is presupposed by the Church's actual penitential concern, having as its aim the reincorporation into the tower: even these well-disposed sinners near the tower are not in the tower itself. They are not, therefore, merely sinners with a destroyed relationship with God, but they also do not stand in the relationship with the Church to which they were introduced by their baptism. Even their penance is, therefore, not only a reconciliation by the Church, but also a reconciliation with the Church. Such a penance can still be called meaningfully 'penance of excommunication', provided that one is clear that 'excommunication' in this context has a different sense from the one which it has in modern church law.

The above consideration is not weakened by the fact that (as Grotz, e.g. p. 21, stresses) 'excommunication' considered in itself has nothing to do with penance. It can obviously exist in cases where there is no intention, either on the part of the sinner or on the part of the Church, of obtaining the reincorporation into the tower of the Church by penance. But this does not affect Hermas' assumption that, whenever it is a question of penance, the sinner is [47] Cf. W. Doskocil, p. 174 ff. (especially the summarizing remarks on p. 177). The word 'excommunication' in the sense of a church disciplinary measure or of the early Christian ban is observable for the first time about the beginning of the 5th century in the synod of Carthage (A.D. 390) (cf. Mansi III, 695, c.8); cf. E. Valton, 'Excommunication' in: DThC V,2 (Paris 1913), p. 1735 f.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

also outside the tower (whether near or far is irrelevant), and still less does it affect the result of this penance (not its presupposition), namely the actual incorporation into the tower. In Vis. III 5,5 (ibid., p. 12,11-17) we read: 'If they do penance they are fitted for the building.'

Whether the penance of those who are cast far away has several [89] levels (first the appearance before the angel of punishment and then the correction of the angel of penance), what this means in the life of the community and how the effect of the penance of these people might appear, i.e. whether they are inserted into a 'lesser place' or right into the tower again-all these questions do not alter the fact that the Shepherd of Hermas, contrary to Grotz's view, in Vis. III does not know of any men who, on the one hand, are subject to church penance while, on the other hand, are not to be considered in any way 'excommunicated'. And even if Hermas were to know sinners who do penance, i.e. have to mend their ways, without seeing them outside the tower, i.e. without hinting at an excommunication of these sinners, then this would not prove that the penance of such sinners should be understood as sacramental, even if the Church plays a role in it. Not every concern of the Church over the penance of a sinner has to be understood as sacramental, either in Hermas' sense or in the sense of modern theology. According to the Shepherd of Hermas a distinction between a sacramental and another kind of penitential help offered by the Church for the conversion of a sinner (if one wishes to pose the question in this way at all) can be made only by asking whether or not it is a question of the restoration of baptismal grace (of the seal), of the reincorporation into the tower of the Church. If this aim and this necessity are not present, then it is no longer possible to say for certain in what a sacramental act of the Church consists according to Hermas' theology and how it would be distinguished from other exhortations to penance, from the assistance afforded by prayer, etc.

Before considering (e.g. in the conclusion to Vis. III 2,7a-c [ibid., p. 9,26-9] in Grotz p. 19) which of the groups of sinners listed are excommunicated, it is first necessary to clarify what it means for them, in general, to be no longer in the tower. This common characteristic is just as important to Hermas as is the following differentiation according to a greater or lesser proximity to the tower. In explaining this common characteristic (which really presents no difficulty) one could more easily understand that only those sinners who are alienated far away from the tower must be really excommunicated, if among them are found only those who, according to today's theological notion, have placed themselves 'outside the Church' by the kind of sin which they have committed (e.g. heresy or schism). But this is not the case; according to Grotz himself, the adulteress [90] (p. 30 f.) and especially the obstinate sinners (p. 30, etc.), even when it is not a question of sins against faith, are excommunicated (whether definitively or temporally is irrelevant). If, therefore, even sins which are not against the faith entail excommunication, and if, at the same time, according to Hermas,[48] excommunication is not simply imposed or not imposed at the Church's whim (as it is according to modern church law in the lower levels of excommunication of those who are not [48] Hermas never appeals to a specific legislative act on the Church's part by which certain sins are punished by excommunication. In his view the excommunication is demanded immediately by the very nature of the sin itself. The question of Hermas' principle of the exclusion of sinners, which is not a positive canonical prescription, cannot be solved simply with reference to the obstinacy of the sinner. That would only raise the further question of why the Church excludes the obstinate sinner without a positive prescription. If the answer is that such a state of sin is incompatible with membership of the Church in the full sense (even though theme is no sin against faith itself, and the sinner concerned, according to today's teaching, remains a member of the Church), then the principle is implicitly justified. The man who has excluded himself from grace violates his own membership of the Church, which is the holy Church of the Holy Spirit. Thus with all the Fathers of the Church it must be said: wherever there is serious sin, there is necessarily this kind of excommunication. This means: every penance for such sins is penance of excommunication (and this still applies even today, since it is only reconciliation that restores the right to celebrate the Eucharist).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

vitandi),[49] then he must have a principle for excommunication which differs from the modern practice of excommunication. Today, in fact, two kinds of excommunication are recognized: one which involves no actual exclusion from the Church, another which involves an exclusion which the sinner has already brought about objectively, iure divino, by his own fault. The point of this observation is that it is methodologically false to read the modern notion of excommunication into the Shepherd of Hermas. Indeed, this notion does not cover the excommunication which even Grotz allows in Hermas. In other words, it should be asked what Hermas himself thinks about the matter. What becomes fundamental then is his idea that all serious sins (of deed) lead men away from the tower. This basic state of affairs may be expressed in this way: since every serious sin causes the loss of the Spirit of the Church, the seal of baptism, every sinner, according to Hermas, is 'excommunicated' – bound, as one would say in biblical terminology.[50]

Thus one can hardly gather from Mand. IV with Grotz that there are sinners who have committed mortal sins and yet are not excommunicated. In Grotz's interpretation in this passage Hermas receives the commission or the concession that a man ought to live with his wife who has committed adultery but afterwards has repented (1,5 [ibid., p. 26,8-11]). From this Grotz (pp. 30-3) concludes (and obviously this can be no more than a conclusion) that the woman could not be excommunicated, since the husband otherwise would not be permitted to live with her. The assumption here (which Poschmann and we ourselves share with Grotz) is that the prohibition of married life together with an adulterous and unrepentant wife (1,9 26,20-4]) is based on a measure taken by the Church in the form of an excommunication. Grotz (p. 32) identifies the case of the adulterous but immediately repentant wife with his group C2 of Vis. III and thus places himself in an unfortunate position at the outset. Certainly, the identification itself appears to us to be correct, but precisely [91] the group C2 must be thought of, according to the phraseology of the vision, as being outside the tower (even if, to use Grotz's expression, in its 'forecourt') and is, therefore, to be considered as a group of those who are excommunicated (in the theological sense). This would apply, therefore, also to this adulterous, even if immediately repentant, wife. Indeed, what does Hermas himself say about this? All that we have is: 'But if the husband notices the sin (of his wife) and his wife does not repent (μερανοη/ση) but persists in her impurity, and the husband (in these circumstances) lives with her, then he will share in the guilt of her sin and take part in her adultery' (1,5). From this it is concluded that in Hermas the husband must leave his wife if she persists in adultery (1,6).

But does all this warrant the conclusion drawn by Grotz? In no way. In the first place, it is certainly clear for Hermas that the husband of an unrepentant adulteress must separate from her. Nevertheless, it is by no means self-evident for him that the separation of the spouses is only the mere effect of a church excommunication. It is rather demanded by the principle that a Christian should not share in the sin of another (by tolerating, condoning, etc.). From the fact that the communal married life has ceased one can conclude that the church fellowship no longer exists either, since two people separated in their private lives for religious reasons could not communicate with each other in the Church. But the opposite conclusion does not necessarily follow: where two people are united in their private life their ecclesial relationship (to the Church and to each other within the Church) must also be in order. Even [49] On this point, cf. A. Gommenginger, 'Bedeutet die Exkommunikation Verlust der Kirchengliedschaft' in: ZKTh 73 (1951), pp. 1-71, and K. Mörsdorf, 'Exkommunikation' in: HThG I (Munich 1962), pp. 375-82.

[50] In this context it should be remembered that Paul has the same catalogue of vices for sins which exclude a person from the kingdom of God and for sinners who should be 'avoided' by the community or the bishop (Gal. 5:19-23; 1 Cor. 6:9 f.; Eph. 5:3-9; Col. 3:5-9; cf. Rom. 13:12 f.). Paul, therefore, recognizes a norm for banning which presupposes that every mortal sin in today's sense is 'deserving of excommunication' (in the ancient sense). S. Wipping, 'Die Tugend- und Lasterkataloge im NT' (ZNW, BH 25) (Berlin 1959), p. 115 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in modern church law not every excommunication causes a secular separation of the person who is excommunicated.[51] Thus it is perfectly conceivable that a man should live with his wife when she, at least by sorrow and renunciation of the adulterous relationship, has abandoned sin, without it being any longer possible to maintain that, by living with her, he shares in the guilt of her sin.

Nevertheless, the question of the relationship of this woman to the Church-whether she is already again 'in the tower' or comes to full reconciliation only after a long penance before the Church-is still not necessarily decided. We have the right, therefore, to say, even according to Grotz: it is here a question of a well-disposed sinner who, in the sense of Vis. III 2,7a (ibid., p. 9,26-7) is truly repentant (5,5) but, as far as the Church is concerned, still belongs to those [92] who have been 'cast away'. For Grotz's conclusion to be absolutely convincing, it would have to be proven first of all that the secular and the ecclesial relationships of two people correspond to each other exactly. But such a presupposition is purely gratuitous. In fact it is a question of a wife who is sorry and who is willing to do penance (however the husband may establish this fact). On the supposition that indeed the performance of church penance is already in progress, but not yet completed – even though, because of the wife's good disposition, it is bound to achieve good results – it is precisely a question of a church penance (Mand. IV 1,8 [ibid., p. 26,16-20]). The full reconciliation with the Church and with God is guaranteed, if not yet actually achieved. On these hypothetical suppositions, is the idea impossible that Hermas allows the husband already to live with his wife? And could it not then be concluded, since Hermas has made this concession, that the assumptions which we have just mentioned do not exist, i.e. the wife is not considered as being 'outside the tower'? In my opinion, the person who argues in this way derives from the text points which it will not support and which, moreover, are precluded by the fact that Hermas considers even a repentant sinner as still a stone lying outside the actual tower. It is not only a question of the cessation or the continuation of married life in the strict sense but of whether the household community should be continued or whether the wife – to put it simply – should be turned out of the house. Now Hermas lays it down that a wife who has been, ejected from the house should be accepted back if she – albeit only later – repents. What would be the sense of turning her out of the house, if, because of the sorrow she has expressed, it is already established that she can and ought to return to the house? Or should one really believe that all excommunicated sinners either then or later when they do public penance are also, on this account, to be punished with a secular boycott? Where, for example, did Hermas' repentant children live while, as even Grotz does not dispute, they were under a penance of excommunication? It is obvious that they lived with their father so that he shared their affliction.

Grotz has to admit that a wife who is not definitively obdurate in her adultery, but has not immediately repented, is under a 'provisional excommunication', a 'revocable excommunication'. This is because, on the one hand, he must grant that such a wife can still come to a complete penance, while on the other hand he knows that [93] Hermas still considers her as excommunicated (p. 31 ff.). We should prescind from the problem posed by a 'provisional', 'revocable' excommunication which has no clear basis in the sources and has to be constructed indirectly. This notion appears to be problematical already in Hermas himself, since, from what he says, it is by no means clear that he knows an excommunication which occurs for any other reason than the sinner's unrepentance, even though he is convinced that it is automatically associated with certain sins. But if this is the only reason [51] Already in the ancient ban from the synagogue there were cases in which the actual relatives of the sinner were not obliged to avoid him, while he had to be avoided by others.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

for the continuation of an excommunication, then every excommunication lasts until penance is done and is temporary.

Nevertheless, we could ask a further question: if Hermas had not considered the act of adultery (as opposed to the mere sin of thought: Mand. IV 1,1-2 [ibid., pp. 25,22-26,3]) as the reason for an excommunication, would he then, as Grotz also stresses, have justified a (provisional) excommunication by the persistence in this adultery? Obstinacy derives its moral value from the evil of the state in which one persists, even if it aggravates this sin. Moreover, Hermas presupposes that the husband of an adulterous wife does not sin by living with her if he knows nothing of his wife's sin (Mand. IV 1,5 [ibid., p. 26,8-11]). This self-evident observation would be meaningless if the husband is only to interrupt his married life when a church excommunication has already taken place. if, however, this is not the case, then the husband can have reasons for interrupting, continuing or recommencing his married life which do not coincide simply with those of the Church for its excommunication or the lifting of this excommunication. If one considers further that Grotz demands that the adulteress who only later comes to her senses must do a long penance and provide visible proof of her conversion (p. 30), then surely the husband who keeps his sinful wife because she is doing penance must demand such a visible and tangible document proving her conversion. Is this not precisely where church penance comes in? The undertaking of this penance can, therefore, be just as well considered as the reason for the husband's obligation to dismiss his wife, as the non-dismissal can count as a proof that there is no excommunication. Even according to Grotz the adultery of the wife who is immediately repentant demands a 'church penance' (p. 33) which obviously must have 'nothing to do with excommunication' (ibid.).

[94] But how does Hermas envisage concretely such a church penance which on the one hand is sacramental, while on the other is not a penance of excommunication? Grotz does not seem to give an answer to this apposite question. In Hermas, wherever there are serious sins of deed to be expiated, there is always found a penance which involves that the sinner, after along time of penance, is again incorporated into the tower, therefore a 'penance of excommunication'. In the light of these observations the existence of sins in Mand. IV which require church penance without entailing a 'penance of excommunication' must be questionable.

Along with Hoh, Grotz (p. 51 f.; p. 32) also wishes to recognize in Sim. IX sinners who are indeed submitted to church penance without, however, being excommunicated. According to Grotz, the reason for this is that these sinners (certain kinds of stones) still lie beside the tower and are found in a place which belongs to the rock on which the actual tower is raised. But the objection already raised against the interpretation of Vis. III also applies here. It has already been granted that the tower in Sim. IX signifies the empirical Church (p. 47 f.). This Church is built upon the rock which has a door (2,2 [ibid., p. 77,18-21]; 3 [ibid., p. 78,8-23]). The stones for this building are brought to the rock through the door (3,4 [ibid., p. 78,18-21]; 4,1 [ibid., pp. 78,24-79,4]); the tower thus consists of many stones (4,1-8 [ibid., pp. 78,24-80,4]). In this regard, it is noticeable that the stones have the right colour, i.e. the qualification for being inserted into the tower. This insertion is carried out by virgins (the virtues) who carry the stones through the door (4,5-7 [ibid., p. 79, 16-26]), which is the Son (12,6-8 [ibid., p. 86, 17-27]).[52] Thus both faith in the, Son of God in baptism and virtue are necessary in order to arrive at the tower. Even if only virtue is lacking, the stone remains lying in its black colour beside the tower (4,6 f. [ibid., p. 79,20-26]). If a white stone (i.e. a faithful and virtuous man) is inserted into the tower and then, under the influence of the spirits of the vices (they black-clad women, 13,8 again and, upon examination by the Lord of the tower, [52] Cf. S. Giet, p. 157.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

shows his black colour, then he will again be ejected from the tower (6,5 [ibid., p. 81,13-15]; 7,1 [ibid., p. 81,26-8]). If such stones still lie on the rock, this is indeed an indication that they are not considered as having fallen totally from the faith and that they have not bee completely abandoned by the Church. But this does not alter the fact [95] that they no longer occupy the place which they held in virtue of their sincere conversion and their baptism. As opposed to the time immediately following their baptism, they now lie beside the tower, if even still on the rock of faith and so within the door.

All this expresses that alienation from the Church and by the Church which we have called excommunication in the theological sense and which makes a penance of excommunication necessary. It is only after such a penance that one can be reinserted into the tower. That the still worse stones in this allegory are alienated much further from the tower (7,2 [ibid., pp. 81,29-82,1]; 8,1 [ibid., p. 82,19-21], etc.) does not change this state of affairs radically. It hits already been established that, according to the Shepherd of Hermas, there can be grades of the sin of obstinacy and, therefore, of alienation from the Church by excommunication which-at least temporarily-even hold such a sinner back from an actual church penance. But this does not prove that only such sinners are 'excommunicated'. All those concerned in Sim. IX are no longer in the walls of the tower and must first again arrive at the tower. The state of no longer being in the tower is not, in itself, a means of salvation. It cannot be said (p. 55), however, that excommunication is not a means of penance and, therefore, concerns only those sinners who offer no prospect of penance. The condition of no longer being in the tower makes the situation of the sinner as sinner clear. Whether immediately afterwards, later or never, there follows conversion and consequently readmission into the Church depends, according to Hermas, upon the different dispositions of the sinners. On the one hand, all the sinners in Sim. IX are taken out of the walls of the tower, but, on the other hand, they all have the radical possibility of coming back to the tower, since in all the different groups mentioned there is an explicit reference to the possibility of a reinsertion into the tower. Wherever it is presented as being impossible in fact (not actually as a priori impossible) it is a question of a lack of disposition (which Hermas obviously assumes to be present here and there somewhat categorically), not, however, of a refusal of forgiveness by God and the Church which is independent of the state of mind of the sinner concerned.

Moreover, it is worth noting that according to Grotz those who, by reason of sins of deed, need church penance enter a special place as penitents but without, according to him, being excommunicated. [96] This special place beside the tower is thought of primarily for these well-disposed and, therefore, not excommunicated sinners. But in fact, in certain circumstances, other sinners who are already (provisionally) excommunicated come to this place (without the prospect of proceeding further).

But how can one arrive at the idea of a special place for penitents (irrespective of whether this is considered either a symbol of the relationship of sinners to the Church or more materially a special place to be occupied during the celebration of the liturgy), if for these men the idea is fundamentally excluded that a sinner, by his fault and the corresponding reaction of the Church, enters into a different relationship with the Church than the baptized who have not sinned? In Grotz there is no answer to the question of where the 'life setting' or the 'theoretical setting' for the idea and the practice of a special place of penance could be sought. The fact that Hermas' notion of penance (even there where according to Grotz there is no penance of excommunication) is completely determined by the idea that the sinner is rejected from the tower and has a special place for his penance, shows very clearly that his basic idea of penance – in so far as it is church penance – must be of a penance of excommunication. Conversely, it follows from this that wherever Hermas considers an obligatory church penance, sin, of its very nature, is so conceived that, of itself and by the reaction of the Church (so far as this is possible), it leads to a kind of excommunication.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This stress that according to Hermas all serious sins of deed objectively exclude the sinner from the tower and, therefore, in so far as they are known, are met by the Church with an 'excommunication', so that penance is always a penance of excommunication, does not derogate in the least from the wide variety of penitential procedures which exist despite this common denominator in all the individual cases. The useful and meaningful observations of Grotz on this point are to be fully recognized. The treatment of certain groups of sinners by the punishing angel before they are handed over to the angel of penance only at a later point of time and after a certain performance of penance at the hands of this angel of punishment, only then to arrive at the place which is fixed for the usual penitents (near the tower itself), can certainly have its counterpart in the treatment of sinners by the Church itself. This may be a way of expressing the grace and favour of the Church in allowing a man who is guilty of [97] particularly serious sins (apostasy, etc.) to have access to actual penance, as well as the prerequisite for this penance, namely another kind of previous penance in which the willingness to do penance and the readiness for a performance of church penance in the strict sense are already expressed (cf. Sim. VI and Grotz, pp. 23-6). We do not, therefore, reject the idea of a graded penance already in Hermas. All that is rejected is the idea that only the group under the punishing angel is to be considered as excommunicated. Even according to Grotz the place to which these sinners come after their treatment by the punishing angel, 'the lesser place' (Vis. III 7,5-6 16]), is in practice identical with the place for the usual penitents (Grotz, pp. 21-3; 26). But also there from the beginning are those who are outside the actual tower and, therefore, ought to be considered as excommunicated, even though they did not have to pass first through the examination of the punishing angel.

B) THE CHURCH FORM OF PENANCE

Hermas' intention is not to describe church penance but to stir the conscience of sinners. He is a preacher of penance, not a dogmatic theologian or a canonist. We cannot expect him to say a great deal, therefore, about the form of penance with which his addressees were familiar or about how or how widely this form was used. The explanations which we have already given, however, suffice to give us some idea of the way in which the penance of a Christian sinner was performed within the Church in those days.

It has already been shown that a church excommunication is discernible in Hermas, at least in so far as he recognizes the obligation to 'avoid' certain sinners. But this must also be worked out in the sphere of the Church, which is obviously possible only if the sinner is in some active form expelled from the community. This does not mean that such an excommunication in fact occurs in the actual Church in all those cases where Hermas exhorts to penance and thereby theoretically presupposes that such it sinner no longer belongs to the tower in God's eyes and, therefore, ought to be treated correspondingly by the Church (cf. all the different sins in Sim. VIII and IX). To this extent, Hoh is right (p. 32) in stressing that, on this supposition, the Church would be 'de-peopled', since even according to Hermas himself there are only a few in the Church who do not belong to one or other of the groups of sinners distinguished by him [98] and urged to penance. For many of them it is practical only to think of the doing of subjective penance. Nevertheless, this does not prove that in these cases it is a question of a 'private' (because it is without an excommunication) but still sacramental penance,[53] since in Hermas there is not the slightest trace of an act on the Church's part [53] This is the opinion of K. Adam, 'Die abendländische Kirchenbusse im Ausgang des christlichen Altertums' in: ThQ 110 (1929), pp. 1-66 (for Hermas cf. p. 26). He finds evidence only of an inner church (but sacramental) penance for all offences. J. Hoh also recognizes only an inner church penance, but he does not appear to consider it sacramental.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation which could in these cases clearly be styled sacramental.[54] In these cases, in fact, one can detect a lack of theological consistency in Hermas. For, on the one hand, even for these groups of sinners he presupposes a loss of the baptismal seal, the loss of life, the expulsion from the tower (Sim. VIII 6,3 [ibid., p. 71, 15-21]; 7,3.5 [ibid., pp. 72,17-73,9]; 8,3 [ibid., p. 74,1-4]; 9,2.4 [ibid., p. 74,17-25]; 10,1.3 [ibid., pp. 74,26-75,11]; Sim. IX 14,2 [ibid., p. 88,8-13]; 19 [ibid., p.92,4-20] 21,1.4 [ibid., p. 93,7-20]; 22,3f. [ibid., pp. 93,26-94,4]; 23,2 [ibid., p. 94,7-11]; 26,2 [ibid., p.95, 14-18], etc.); on the other hand, because of their great number, it is impossible to think of a church penance in their regard. It would be asking too much to put such theological consistency in practice. Such theological 'inconsistency' can be met even in Augustine, although in his case it has been the subject of some reflection.[55]

Be all this as it may, there is in Hermas an excommunication which is presented as self-evident and in no way as his own invention. Moreover, it is applicable to sins such as adultery, etc. which do not simply, of their very nature (as apostasy), automatically bring about excommunication as a separation from the community. The fact that he does not insist on its application in every case where he presupposes a separation from the Church or from the 'tower' springs from his strict theory of moral theology, which recognizes 'serious sins' (in the modern sense) precisely where he cannot treat them according to his own principles.

It would be false, however, to conclude from this inconsistency that according to Hermas, as a matter of principle, serious sin (which destroys the baptismal grace) is not always and everywhere, as in the case of adultery, to be countered with a church excommunication.

---

[54] It is possible that such sinners have also experienced correction and exhortation by the pastors of the Church in a 'preaching of penance'. But this alone can hardly be the exercise of that power of the keys which is conferred on the Church in Matt. 16 and 18. This would be difficult to prove, particularly with regard to the sacramental character of this function. Hermas himself must have performed a voluntary but church penance for his own sins of thought (according to Grotz, p. 50 f.). According to the principles enunciated by Hermas (Mand. IV 1,1 f.) this would be possible (Vis. I 2,3 f.). Although he distinguishes sins of thought from those which, as deed, 'bring death', he may, granted his dynamic notion of the struggle between different spirits for man's heart, have been of the opinion that such a sin of thought deprived a person of the seal of baptism because it expelled the Holy Spirit. Nevertheless, this assumption is not easily confirmed. For this to be the case, it would first of all have to be shown that the μεγα&λη α(μαρτι/α in Mand. IV 1,1 coincides with our notion of mortal sin. When there is a mention of death in the context of sins of thought (Vis. I 1,8), this could be understood as the consequence of such sins, in so far as they lead to action. In any event, it need not necessarily be a question of the inner aspect of the sin of thought as such as opposed to the deed. Moreover, it would still have to be shown that Hermas' personal penance (Sim. IX 10,6-11,8, in so far as penance really is involved here) was ecclesial in the strict sense. Obviously it could be stressed that Hermas' nightly meeting with the virtues, as his eating of God's word, occurs on the forecourt before the tower, therefore, on the place of the stones which are to be dressed, that is, of the penitents. Before such vague allegories are interpreted so widely it should be noted that the place before the tower is introduced as being perfectly purified (Sim. IX). Hermas precisely is not handed over to the pastor of penance, but he sequesters himself to play with the virtues (Sim. IX 10,6 f.). Hermas does not belong to the stones which have to be dressed for penance (Grotz, p. 50), but it is precisely this symbol of the stones which can be inserted into the tower only when they are dressed which refers to the penance which is imposed on sinners (Grotz, pp. 48-50). One can hardly recognize in this scene, therefore, a symbol of the fact that Hermas has undertaken a voluntary church penance on account of his sins. The fact that Hermas has spiritually 'rejuvenated' himself by the practice of the virtues, prayer and reading the Scripture is not only a part, but the whole, of the explanation of this symbol.

[55] Cf. for example Augustine, Sermo 98,5 593-4: in some circumstances sins of thought were considered mortal and, therefore, remitted intus inter latebras conscentiae tamquam inter domesticos parietes. Even if here there may have been a private sacramental penance in the sense of K. Adam (as opposed to Poschmann), this text still affords proof that the recognition of a mortal sin by the Fathers does not allow us to conclude that they knew of a private sacramental penance, since in the instance given there is no question of penance of excommunication. In fact these mortal sins of thought are certainly in Augustine's view remitted only by subjective penance. If, therefore, much earlier Hermas acknowledged sins of thought, which arc mortal sins, and if he demanded penance for them, this does not prove that he was thinking of a sacramental penance.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Apart from this, it is possible to discern directly further acts of the Church in the overall performance of penance. The leaders in the community doubtless play an important role in this regard. Thus Hermas receives the commission to transmit his revelation to the presbyters and leaders of the Church (Vis. II 4,3 [ibid., p.7,14-18]); [99] the latter must obviously subsequently take the corresponding measures. It appears incumbent on the church leaders, 'God's chosen', to take charge of discipline (παιδευ/ειν): Vis. III 9,7-10 (ibid., p. 16,11-21). If the sheep stray from the flock through their fault they are answerable for it: Sim. IX 31,5 (ibid., p. 100,11-13). Thus there is clear evidence for the Church's active right to exercise penitential discipline over its members.

It is, however, possible to make further indirect conclusions. Although the angel of penance in Hermas may not be simply a symbol of a church official (say, of the bishop), there is in Hermas an emphasis on the comparison with the 'shepherd' of the empirical Church: '. . . I also am a shepherd' (Sim. IX 31,6 [ibid., p. 100,11-13]). This even suggests the idea of the heavenly shepherd of penance 'being called to account' by God over his activity (Sim. IX 31,6 [ibid., p. 100,13-17]; VIII 2,7 [ibid., pp. 67,27-68,4]), which is doubtless a transfer of an earthly reality into the heavenly world. This reflection is the justification for concluding to the existence of other activities of the earthly shepherd which correspond to other aspects of the heavenly angel of penance's activity. This applies particularly to those aspects which cannot be easily understood as the explanations of the general idea of the influence of angelic powers on men's subjective penance. If, therefore, the angel of penance examines sinners and tries as hard as possible to lead them all to penance, if he feels himself responsible for them, drives them from the tower and abandons the obstinately impenitent to their fate, then it becomes difficult to dispute that, in these cases, (especially in Sim. IX) there are transferred to the activity of the angel of penance aspects of the work of church leaders which are obviously presupposed as already existing and not introduced here for the first time.

The same must be said of the activity of the angel of penance when he inserts those people who are repentant but not yet fully healed not yet into the tower itself but into the 'walls', therefore into a 'lesser place' (Vis. III 5,5 [GCS 48: p. 12,11-17]; 7,6 [ibid., p. 14,10-16]; Sim. VIII 2,5 [ibid., p. 67,20-5]; 6,6 [ibid.,p. 72,5-20]; 7,3 [ibid., pp. 72,17-73,2]; 8,3 [ibid., p. 74,1-4] and even in this case only gradually, according to their (relative) worthiness (Sim. VIII 2,5 [ibid., p.62,20-5]). This 'lesser place', these 'walls' are not in or on the tower itself;[56] it is a question of a place which is distinguished from the actual tower of the Church itself. To this place come sinners [100] who are indeed doing penance, after they have been brought to their senses and to conversion by the external punishments of the angel of punishment (Sim. VI 3 [ibid., pp. 61,4-62,8]; Vis. III 7,6 [ibid., p. 14,10-16]), but who have not yet completed their penance. What is meant, therefore, is a place which explains the situation of a sinner before the completion of his penance, and indeed directly his situation in this world (even if this obviously has its counterpart in the next world, in the event of his penance not being completed before the final construction of the tower). This is because even a person who lives in the 'walls' can certainly move up into the tower and has to remain only temporarily in the walls on account of the long duration of his penance (Sim. VIII 8,3 [ibid., p.74,1-4]; 6,6 [ibid., p. 72,5-10]). The lesser place outside the tower itself buy in the walls which surround it is to be understood, therefore, as a symbol of the situation of those penitents who have indeed begun their penance (and thus are sure of their salvation), but have not yet completed it and so do not yet actually belong again to the tower of the Church. It is impossible to deny that Hermas has here spiritualized a reality existing in the empirical sphere of the Church: the [56] Cf. for example Sim. VIII 7,3: to dwell in the tower and to dwell in the walls are clearly distinguished. In this regard it should be noted that to be inserted into the external part of the tower is, according to Hermas, a particularly honourable position. The 'walls', therefore, cannot signify the external part of the tower: Sim. IX 7,5; 8,2.4.5.6; 9,3.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

access of repentant sinners to church penance and their relationship to the Church before the definitive and complete readmission into it. Without such a real background it is difficult to find a sufficient explanation for such an elaborate idea. This does not mean that there was in Rome in the middle of the second century already the kind of structured institution of penance which appears fifty years later with Tertullian. It is not only possible but even probable that these two institutions differed from each other in much the same way as the catechumenate in Justin (Apol. 61; 65,1; 66,1) differs from the catechumenate attested in the Paradosis of Hippolytus (17 ff.; Dix p. 28 ff.). (The most that one can think is that Hermas' theology of baptism and penance is closer to the theology of Hippolytus than is that of Justin, in so far as Hermas also ascribes an important role to demonology, considering sin as possession by demons and liberation from sin as their expulsion.) So the structure of penance may have been fairly improvised, according to the cases which occurred. But there certainly was such a structure, since 'excommunication' and the community leaders' right to administer discipline are clearly discernible.[57] Both of these were naturally exercised in certain forms which must have demanded more precise regulations as the Church and the number of sinners and penitents increased.

[101] In this context, after the explanation we have just given of the 'lesser place' for certain penitents, it is necessary to broach the question of whether, according to Hermas, as Grotz maintains, there are also such penitents who are refused definitively and permanently an actual church penance. These would be precisely those people who come only to the lesser place (Vis. III 7,6 [ibid., p. 14,10-16]) and are not inserted into the tower itself. Grotz is of the opinion that this place is identified not formally but practically with the place for penitents (p. 22 f.). If one considers that a certain penance is necessary in order to arrive at the place for penitents i.e. to be allowed access to the official church penance, then the 'meaningless tautology' of Vis. III 7,5.6 (ibid., p. 14,7-16) of which Grotz (p. 22) is afraid and which hinders him from identifying the lesser place simply with the place for penitents is resolved. But, despite this, Grotz only admits that the lesser place is 'practically' identified with the place for penitents (p. 23). He holds that those who are once (definitively) excommunicated go no further beyond this place (pp. 23; 25 f.; 65; 68), that excommunication is definitively absolute and that consequently certain groups of sinners never again become full members of the Church (p. 27). Rather, they must remain permanently in the 'lesser place' which Grotz (p. 68) compares with the 'first walls' (Sim. VIII 6,6 [ibid., p.72,5- 10]; 7,2 f. [ibid., pp. 72,13-73,2]); 8,3 [ibid., p. 74,1-4]), even though he hits previously sharply distinguished the 'first walls' from the place for penitents (p. 44 if.)[58] and sought this mysterious middle position between the outside of excommunication and the inside of the church fellowship principally in the other world (p. 46).

Thus the question poses itself: does the residence of certain repentant sinners in the lesser place, in the first walls, mean the final, impassable point reached by their penitential efforts independently of the intensity of their penance, and this only because they were once (according to Grotz, definitively) excommunicated? We think that this question should be answered in the negative. Naturally this question does not include the group of those who, after a church penance, have again fallen away and who, therefore, according to Hermas'

[57] Cf. R. Joly, pp. 29 and 40 f.; S. Giet, p. 116.

[58] The argument against the identification of the place of penitents with the 'first walls' (cf. Grotz, p. 44 f.) disappears once it is realized that even the access to officially controlled penance presupposed a certain repentance (just as in the case of the catechumenate), even though the actual penance still remained to be done. Thus penance can be both the condition of access to the 'first walls' and then that which is imposed there. Furthermore, it is not surprising that access is gained to the penance of the place of penance by penance and that through (a greater and more intense) penance it is possible to arrive not only in these first walls but also in the tower (cf. the interpretation of Sim. VIII 6,6 by Grotz, p. 45).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

principle, can no longer be allowed access to a further church penance. This case, however, because of the conditions which it supposes, arises only theoretically and peripherally. Leaving aside the radical hope of God's mercy, which is open to all penance, nothing can be concluded, therefore, from the Shepherd [102] of Hermas about this group of sinners or about another form of penance to which they may be allowed access. Nevertheless, these men are not among those who have been fitted into the lesser place, the first walls. Our question concerns those who, having been excommunicated (definitively), do penance for the first time. Are they, as Grotz maintains, radically unable to pass further beyond the lesser place? This question calls for further clarification, since Hermas does in fact assume that there are certain cases, at least in practice, in which some sinners do not pass beyond this stage.[59] It should be noted, however, that in the passages where these cases are mentioned by Hermas the long duration or the late commencement of the penance is given as the reason. Our question does not, therefore, concern the fact that, because they began their penance late or because it lasts a long time, penitents in fact do not complete their penance and, therefore, are taken unawares by this day, being outside the tower although near it, and consequently, according to Hermas, are neither completely lost nor able to share in the happiness of those who are perfect. On Hermas' assumptions this situation needs no further explanation. The question we have raised, therefore, is only whether the Church refuses a full reconciliation to penitents who have once been excommunicated, and for this reason alone, and leaves them permanently on the place for penitents and indeed even if they demonstrate every possible and effective attitude of repentance as well as a clear improvement in their way of life. What precludes this view, in the first place, is the fact that Hermas knows of men who actually come to the tower again from all the classes of sinners, and indeed from the same groups from which others are banished to the outer walls (Sim. VIII 7,2.3 [ibid., pp. 72,13-73,2]; 8,4.5 [ibid., p. 74,4-10]); 9,2 [ibid., p. 74,17-18]); 10,1.4 [ibid., pp. 74,26-75,3.11-13]). The difference of effect seems to have no other reason than the different intensity of penance which the individual performs (even because, for example, he has begun sooner or later with his penance or undertakes it more seriously, etc.).

It can hardly be objected against what we have just said that the tower into which people are incorporated in Sim. VIII refers not to the earthly Church but to the final salvation (p. 35 f.). Even if this were the case,[60] our observation would still be correct, since, even according to Grotz, there is a mere existence in the first walls which, [103] while expressing a reality in the Church of this world, is also a symbol of the final state in the next world. Now irrespective of what may be in the foreground, membership of the tower similarly has its earthly and heavenly counterpart; otherwise it is not possible to see why Hermas claims that some people (he has definite cases in mind) are already inserted into the tower of the next world before they are allowed access to the Church of this world. Thus Hermas recognizes men in all groups of sinners, apart from the apostates in Sim. VIII 6,4 (ibid., pp. 71,21-72,1) (therefore, such sinners who have not simply denied the faith, but as enemies and traitors of the Church have in fact fully, unrepentently and obstinately separated themselves finally from it), who return to the tower. The fate of having to remain in the walls must, therefore, relate to the deficient subjective penance. Grotz's attempt to prove anything different from this rests solely on the fact that in some cases nothing more is said than that these people come into the [59] Sim. VIII 7,3; 8,3 must be understood in this sense, since the distinction between those who come into the tower and those who arrive only at the walls would hardly have much meaning if in fact this second group also came into the tower.

[60] There is lacking, however, a clear proof of this, since the fact that here Hermas is thinking more of interior penance is not a convincing proof. In this respect, it should be noted that Sim. VIII 7,5 allows for the fact that a person who has re-entered the tower could still leave it again. This could hardly apply to the Church of the next life.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

walls, that is, to the lesser place. But when we read in Vis. III 7,5.6 (ibid., p. 73,6-13) that those who are rejected 'are not able to enter into the tower, but are suitable for a far lesser place and only after they have been tested', then to make this meaningful we should insert the phrase 'not immediately' (come into the tower). From the Church's answer to Hermas' question one can work out the distinction between the penance of those who are rejected and that of those who are lying near the tower. The latter are able, by their penance – under the angel of penance – to be reincorporated immediately into the tower, while the former are only led by the punishing angel to that attitude of, and readiness for, penance, by which they become ready and worthy to assume church penance in the strict sense in the actual place of penitents. That they are later able to proceed further is not excluded by the text. Indeed, such a progress is implied in the prospects which Hermas offers these sinners in Sim. VIII. If in Sim. VI there is mention only of their being handed over to the angel of penance, but not of an eventual end to this time of penance, this is no proof (as Grotz assumes, p. 26) that this time simply has no end.

All that is really excluded by these texts is an 'immediate pardon' (cf. Sim. VII 4 [ibid., pp. 64,17-65,2]).Thus, just as Hermas' children are refused an immediate forgiveness of sin (ibid.), so, in all Probability, all that is rejected in Vis. III 7,5.6 (ibid., p. 14,7-16) is an immediate arrival at the tower, and what is taught is an arrival at [104] the outer walls (= the place for penitents, for those arriving to do church penance) as the first, not the definitively last, step on the way of penance. When one considers that it is perfectly reasonable that those sinners who came from far off should first of all do penance in order to be allowed access to church penance, therefore before they are handed over to the angel of penance, and when one considers further that the handing over to the shepherd of penance (Sim. VI 3,6 [ibid., pp. 61,20-62,8]) is, of its very nature, a transfer to a further penance, now conducted by the Church, then one cannot say (cf. P. 26) that the penance of those who were previously remaining near the tower and that of those coming from far off are essentially different and that this is proven by the fact that the second group obtains a confirmation of faith, but otherwise nothing more is said.

Moreover, the point is made about these sinners that, as a result of the discipline under the shepherd of penance, from now on they serve the Lord with a pure heart (Sim. VI 3,6 [ibid., pp. 61,20-62,8]). How is this possible, if not by penance under the leadership of the angel of penance? But why should the aim of the angel of penance, namely the reincorporation into the tower, not be achieved in this instance? In any case the text of Hermas does not exclude this explicitly and clearly. Moreover, if the people (of Grotz's group D) in Vis. III (ibid., pp. 9,29-10,3) are the same as those sinners who, according to Sim. VIII, are inserted into the walls by a long penance (p. 43), and if, still according to Vis. III 2,9 (ibid., P. 10,3-8); 7,1-3 (ibid., pp. 13,20-14,6), they belong to those who are ejected farther than the men of the group D but who are still able to return to the tower itself, according to Sim. VIII (e.g. those who err in their faith: Vis. III 7,1 [ibid., p. 13,20-4] and Sim. VIII 6,5.6 [ibid., p. 13,6-16]), then it is impossible to see that for the group D the first walls are the impassable goal of their penance.

Grotz's assumption also implies a distinction between a definitive excommunication and one which is only temporary, this latter not excluding a full reconciliation with the Church. The sole criterion for such a distinction, even according to Grotz, is obduracy (cf. P. 31 f.; 57ff.; 66f.), which is expressed in the refusal of penance.[61] But in this case the only explanation for a permanent excommunication is the sinner's continuing obstinacy.

[61] It is worth noting here that according to Grotz not every refusal to undertake the obligation of penance makes excommunication definitive (cf. Grotz, p. 32). Provisionally obstinate sinners have the same possibility of penance as those who are converted immediately after their sin.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now if a person does not go any farther than the place for penitents, not as a mere matter of fact, i.e. because he dies or the Lord arrives before he completes his personal penance, but as a matter of [105] principle, then there would be a permanent excommunication which is not based on the definitive obstinacy of the sinner. But, if this were the case, how can the adulteress, for example, still come to full penance, even if she has been obstinate for a short time? In fact those people who, according to Grotz, have been definitively excommunicated because they have not responded to the first call to penance have done nothing worse than she has done (p. 66 f.)

How can Grotz write: 'When we consider once again in order the groups of sinners to whom, according to Sim. IX, the notion of a temporary excommunication applies, it becomes immediately obvious that it is a question of the same sinners who, according to Sim. VIII, arrive, in certain circumstances, at the "first walls" and who are, as we have seen [p. 41 ff.], in turn identical with those of the group D in Vis. III' (p. 67)? A temporary excommunication can still (even according to Grotz) end with a full reconciliation. Must not those, therefore, who (in our view, first) come to the first walls also not be able to proceed further if they were only temporarily excommunicated? Grotz avoids this conclusion with the idea that there are people who belonged to group D but then, because they did not complete their penance quickly enough, have been definitively excommunicated and for this reason, with the help of the penance already undertaken, have only been able to arrive at the walls (p. 68). But a definitive excommunication based solely on the refusal – which is itself understood as necessarily provisional – of penance is a hypothesis which has not the slightest support. In fact, how could a precise deadline be fixed by the Church for the end of the toleration of a temporary obstinacy (as in the case of the adulteress who does not repent immediately)? Why does Hermas say nothing at all about this point? If a person is definitively excommunicated he certainly does not belong any longer to group D.

Finally, it should be emphasized that the idea of a penance which is granted merely once is precisely based on the assumption that the sinner, in this single penance, is really reconciled with the Church and indeed by an act of the Church. This possibility is offered to all sinners without exception or reserve (apart from those sinners who in fact are unrepentant). A reserve must be expressed if it really exists. What would be the point in proclaiming solemnly such a Possibility if, from the outset, it remained inaccessible to a whole group of sinners?

This is our conclusion: it is not proven that Hermas recognized an [106] excommunication which, independently of the sinner's definitive obstinacy, excludes him from full communion with the Church, even though he has not yet received the one metanoia, and which banishes him as a matter of principle and for ever to a 'lesser place'.

C) CHURCH RECONCILIATION

But is it possible to show that Hermas knew a church reconciliation of sinners? Does the church-regulated penance end with the reacquisition of full church rights, or is it not possible to discern such an act on the Church's part in the Shepherd of Hermas, which of course does not mean that it did not exist or that he did not know such an act? The only passage which speaks explicitly about the 'readmission' of a sinner into the empirical sphere of the Church is Mand. IV 1,8 (ibid., p. 26, l6-20.)[62] A sinner who is converted must be received (παραδε/ξεσθαι), again, and indeed only once, and the husband must treat his adulterous but repentant wife, from whom he had separated himself, accordingly.

[62] R. Joly, p. 29, sees also in Maximus (Vis. II 3,4) a person who was at one time a lapsus but who was reincorporated into the community.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It has been claimed[63] that this 'readmission' refers only to the access to church penance, but does not include a church reconciliation. Apart from the fact that, in general, it supposes before Hermas an absolute rigorism in the treatment of sinners which in reality cannot be proven, this opinion is based on the observation that the prerequisite demanded for the readmission is only a μετανοει=ν, but not the previous performance of penance. This reason is certainly not tenable, since, as Poschmann (p. 193) rightly says, μετανοει=ν even in the present can be used of a person 'whose heart is already clean from every evil work' (Sim. VII 5 [ibid., p. 65,2-7]) and thus is already fully healed (p. 4). If, therefore, there is no reason to understand the readmission as only an access to penance, it can be taken to mean a proper, full readmission into the Church. We find the term in Ignatius, Smyrn. 4,1 (Fisher: 206,10-14) (only repentent heretics ought to be 'received'), where it is obviously understood of a full church communion.

According to Hermas, the 'readmission' can take place only once, since only one penance is granted to God's servants. Such a readmission can refer only to full church communion, since it presupposes an exclusion which is very difficult to envisage for an access to penance. Otherwise, this exclusion would have to be conceived as a public renunciation of penance before the Church, after which no further access to church penance would be allowed. But there is not [107] the slightest trace of such a refusal to do penance in the early Church. A further penance later was impossible, however, only when a person fell back into sin after the church reconciliation. This did not apply to relapses during the time of penance itself. As the case of the Gnostic Cerdon in Rome at the time of Hermas shows, this was already church practice at that time (Irenaeus, Adv.haer. III 4,3).[64]

Moreover, according to Hermas, the fully completed performance of penance doubtless reopened the possibility of integration into the tower of the Church, at least as an interior community of grace and salvation, and indeed already in this life, before the 'completion' of the tower (cf. e.g., Sim. VIII 6,6 [GCS 48: p. 72,5-10]; 7,3.5 [ibid.,pp. 72,17-73,9]; 8,2.3.5 [ibid., pp. 73,16-74,10]; 9,2.4 [ibid., p. 74,17-25]). If this is correct and implies that at least certain sinners were excommunicated by an act of the Church, then it is unthinkable that such a sinner should not be received back into full external fellowship with the Church by an act of the Church, once he has completed the performance of penance. If full inner church communion is granted to such a sinner how can the Church still refuse him the external fellowship? Again, if Hermas makes a distinction between a full insertion into the tower and an existence 'beside the tower in a lesser place in the walls round the tower', and if this latter

[63] Thus for example H. Koch and J. Hoh.

[64] According to Irenaeus' text the 'correction due to his false teaching' must have taken place often during the period of Cerdon's penance; this shows that he must have alternated between appearing in the community as a penitent, on the one hand, and spreading his false teaching, on the other. Quite correctly Poschmann says: 'In this case our passage attests that heretics were not only admitted to penance, but even after a relapse they ought to be readmitted' (op. cit., p. 221). This opinion, which is shared not only by d'Alès but also by H. Koch (in ZNW 9 [1908], p. 38), should be maintained, despite the protestation of Köhne (in ThGl 35 [1943], p. 33). Kohne himself admits that Cerdon performed exhomologesis, that is, appeared in the liturgy as a penitent, several times. Now the ποτε∴ ε0λεγξο&μενοφ, translated as 'now to be corrected', is placed in strict parallel to the 'now appearing as a false teacher' and 'now appearing as a penitent', and so it is eliminated by the α)φιστα&μενοφ, the definitive exclusion from the community. It is to be concluded from this text that it was often the case that Cerdon, during the period of his penance (that is, at that period when he appeared repeatedly as a penitent at the celebration of the liturgy) continued to spread his false teaching, and that he was alerted to the fact that these two kinds of behaviour were incompatible. Cerdon probably did not accept this, since he obviously wished to belong to the main community and attempted to achieve this through his penance, and at the same time he tried to remain in his esoteric circle. On this supposition (without which it is impossible to understand Cerdon's behaviour) it is easy to see that he does not attach much importance to the secrecy of his circle and that, consequently, it was always possible to recognize the formation of his gnostic, esoteric group.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

position of the penitent, as we have already seen,[65] reflects his relationship with the empirical Church at least, then the full insertion into the tower must be expressed exteriorly in such a way that, also in this position, such a penitent differs from the one who is only 'by the tower'. He must receive complete reconciliation with the Church. This is all the more proper, in that this belonging to the Church was in no way considered an absolute guarantee of grace, since it was recognized that even those who had lost the seal of baptism still belonged to the external community of the Church. How could one, therefore, have refused this external communion with the Church to a repentant person after a long period of serious penance?

Finally, even Tertullian (to whom this testimony was very inconvenient) had to admit that Hermas was a witness for the reconciliation of adulterers (De pud. 10,12 [CSL 20: p. 241,10-19];20,2 [CSL 20: p. 266,20-4]). He stood fairly near to Hermas' time and was not disposed to accepting such a testimony.

If there had been another way of interpreting the evidence Tertullian [108] would not have derived a reconciliation from the Shepherd of Hermas. 'We must have very convincing reasons to ignore Tertullian's judgement on our question' (Poschmann, p. 199). Naturally, we can hardly expect any theories on the meaning which this church reconciliation has for salvation from Hermas. The healing of the sinner takes place through the personal act of penance of the sinner himself; he is accepted into the tower only after he has completed his penance. To this extent, the accent is here entirely on the subjective side. Nevertheless, since the visible Church into which one is received by baptism and – as we can now say, by reconciliation – is necessary for salvation the saving significance of the Church's act is still, in principle, sufficiently guaranteed. In the final analysis, the whole of Hermas' theology of penance revolves around the question of the right relationship of sinful man to the Church. Even if this relationship is put in order again principally by the penance of the sinner himself, it is still important for this theology that man's penance directs him to the Church. And just as in the case where new Christians are inserted into the tower, the accent is placed on their subjective conversion (Vis. III 7,3.5 [ibid., p. 14,1-6,7-10];6,1 [ibid., p. 14,17-19]: to become a Christian only in appearance; Sim. IX 31,1 f. [ibid., pp. 98,10-100,4] Mand. IV 3,1 [ibid., pp. 27,21-28,2]: penance in baptism), without the sacramental significance of baptism being contested, so something similar ought to be assumed for reconciliation by the Church. If the 'seal', despite penance which is a necessary condition for its reception, is given only by baptism, how can this seal be restored by subjective penance alone?

VI. CONCLUSIONS ON HERMAS' PENITENTIAL TEACHING

We have come to the end of our exposition of Hermas' penitential teaching. In it we have also tried to examine J. Grotz's exposition of this teaching. Our conclusions differ from his on a whole series of points which it is now worthwhile to resume.

It seems historically certain that wherever in Hermas there is a question of an intervention by the Church in the penance of a sinner which can actually be considered a sacramental act, it is always a question of a sinner who is considered 'excommunicated'. In other [109] words, penance as a church-sacramental event and penance of excommunication are identical in the Shepherd of Hermas. He shows no sign of any kind of church penance other than that which considers the sinner alienated from the Church. Hermas' book on penance cannot be taken as a historical witness, therefore, for the view that before the actual church penance, and indeed only in certain cases, there preceded a phase of excommunication.

[65] Cf. above for further details on this point.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

All that can be observed here is that the access to actual church penance, in which the sinner is not yet considered reconciled with the Church, is itself an act of the Church which is only granted after a certain examination of the sinner's genuine repentance and sorrow. This examination will lead to a positive result more or less easily, according to the particular cases presented; i.e. the sinners who, despite their very superficial Christian life, have never lost their close relationship with the community will obviously very easily and without many formalities be given access to actual church penance. Others, on the contrary, who have separated themselves from the community by a very clear and 'secular' defection from the faith or a radically un-Christian way of life will be given access to penance only after a more probing examination.

This difference, however, does not alter the fact that basically all penitents were considered to be, in some sense, 'outside' the Church (which does not mean: without relation to it) and that, consequently, the performance of their penance – considered as the work of the penitent and the act of the Church – is seen precisely and principally from the viewpoint of the Church: the act of the Church is the incorporation into the Church of the penitent who has expiated his sins. It is only by this act-that the penitent is assured of his salvation. The act of the penitent is his effort to prove to the Church that he is worthy of such a full reincorporation. This basic structure of Hermas' teaching on penance is exactly what we would expect after our consideration of the teaching and practice of penance attested in the writings of the New Testament.

We cannot here examine critically other sections of Grotz's major study, i.e. especially his explanation of church penance in the writings of Cyprian, Origen, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, the Didascalia, etc.[66] This would be possible only in a detailed work which follows, step by step, Grotz's own development. Nevertheless, the result of this examination of his interpretation of Hermas' teaching [110] on penance does not augur well for any of Grotz's further conclusions. The reason for this scepticism is obviously not simply that, in our opinion, his interpretation of the Shepherd of Hermas contains errors. Rather, we consider it entirely improbable that, if from the New Testament and from the first work on penance by a Father of the Church the penance of excommunication is met as the first actual type of sacramental penance in the Church, penance in a different form can present itself at a later time with the claim of representing the pure and original essence of sacramental penance. This observation prescinds from the fact that the dogmatic theologian (even if he is not a historian of dogma) can say: this is not possible because it cannot be possible, since every penance which concerns serious sin sacramentally means something which excludes man iure divino et iure ecclesiastico from the Eucharist, the Church's central celebration. It is, therefore, something which establishes him in a broken relationship with the Church and brings it about that the sinner no longer belongs to the Church in the same sense as does the baptized person who is just. (All this applies only if the Church is regarded as more than an external juridical organization.) Thus every sacramental penance and absolution of a serious sin is also a reconciliation with the Church. And this presupposes that the person to be reconciled is actually 'excommunicated'. Every sacramental penance – at least for serious sins – is, therefore, a penance of excommunication. This was recognized not only by the patristic age but also by the whole of the Middle Ages, although it is not so central in modern theological thinking. This strange fact in the first centuries of the Church, that wherever the sacrament of penance appears clearly, it always has the form of a penance of excommunication, is perfectly comprehensible on dogmatic grounds and is to a certain extent [66] Only in J. Grotz's work is it stressed that the central form of penance had nothing to do with a penance of excommunication. In contrast, previous historians of dogma, for example K. Adam and P. Galtier, had allowed only a modest and insignificant, peripheral existence to a 'penance without excommunication'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

to be expected a priori. It is also evident that it should be explained in the light of this dogmatic nature and not by a subsequent and slowly developed notion and practice of excommunication springing from church law. If, therefore, the penance of excommunication, which is the essence of sacramental penance, has a dogmatic and still valid nature, and if, the further one goes back in time, one discovers more and more of a process of excommunication in the external and tangible form and practice of penance, then it cannot be false to understand this external, tangible and clear process of excommunication historically as the concrete expression of the nature of penance and [111] not as something which only in the course of time and subsequently is connected with penance.

So it seems to us most likely that the process of development went in the opposite direction to that thought by Grotz. Excommunication in the modern sense of church law has not become connected with penance subsequently and as a purely disciplinary measure. Rather, it gradually became separated from penance and developed into what is today called excommunication. Obviously this is not the place to demonstrate these a priori ideas. Nevertheless, from what has been said it appears unlikely that we will be able to discover the older and more original form in later Church Fathers if in Hermas we can only trace a secondary type of the sacrament of penance.

These objections could be countered by the observation that excommunication in the sense envisaged by us is not disputed. At the same time, that other kind of excommunication in the Shepherd of Hermas occurs only for certain groups of sinners but not for all. Thus we are talking at cross-purposes. Now it is agreed that the ‘excommunication’ which, in our opinion, is (always) in the early Church a hall-mark of every church penance is not explicitly contested by Grotz. But the point is that he appears not to have noticed it even once. And this must be considered as a fundamental defect in a history of penance. In this work the application of a modern notion of excommunication hides the basic structure of the institution of penance in the early Church, as this appears in the sources. This entails that other things too are distorted. Thus, for example, it is indisputable that for the Shepherd of Hermas the place of penitents (the lesser place, the first walls, whether these are formally or only practically identical with the place of penitents) can be reached even by people who come from far away, who therefore, according to Grotz, were excommunicated – at least temporarily. But when they arrive at the place of penitents does the excommunication still continue? If this is not the case, why do they not also come into the tower (at least after further penance)? By what right can one dispute the possibility of explaining such a permanent exclusion from the Church as an excommunication? But if the excommunication persists, then what wits previously a temporary excommunication has changed into a permanent one. Thus penance brings only further punishments, without really improving the situation. Moreover, the penitents are no better off than they were before they came to the [112] place of penitents, since even where they were (i.e. disconnected from the community) they could receive pardon for their sin and hope for God’s grace. If, therefore, Hermas is convinced that there is a way into the Church, the excommunication must be able to be lifted in principle. But if that is possible, then in those days one did not have to reckon with a definitive and permanent exclusion from the Church for such sinners.

The modern notion of excommunication only leads to constructions which raise new problems not envisaged by Hermas. At the same time, the same problems cannot be applied to the case of those who fall again after metanoia, who indeed even in our opinion were refused a further church penance. On the contrary, it is simply to be observed that Hermas (rightly or wrongly is in this context irrelevant) considers these people definitively unrepentant. For him, therefore, the assumption that there are sinners who are excommunicated by an act of the Church and who are no longer allowed access to full church fellowship, although they are recognized as repentant, poses no problem. The same notion of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

excommunication must then lead further to the attempt to prove later, by a subtle dialectic, that in Cyprian, et al. the lifting of excommunication and the absolution of guilt before God are two different and temporally distinct acts. This, however, does not correspond at all to the data provided by the sources. This view could contain a grain of truth[67] in so far as perhaps those groups of sinners are alienated from the Church not only because of their own serious faults and their own separation from the life of the community but also through an actual and clear act of excommunication on the Church's part, as in the case of those sinners for whom 'excommunication' consists only in the fact that, by their own confessions and their own repentance, they have put themselves in the class of penitents and then have been considered 'excommunicated'. Such an explicit act of excommunication could easily have existed. And perhaps in this sense the Shepherd of Hermas contains the basis of the modern practice of excommunication.

Nevertheless, this assumption cannot be sustained on the basis of the text itself. This is not to dispute that, in certain cases, even the early Church could and did excommunicate (e.g. in the case of heretics who were not willing of their own accord to abandon fellowship with the Church) already in the form which the excommunication of church law later acquired. But it remains impossible to say. [113] Everyone has the right to look for such things in connection with the penitential practice of the early Church and to distinguish them from the actual essence of penance.

What is opposed, however, is the attempt to dispute that the penance of the early Church was, as such, a penance of excommunication. Such an attempt does not only contradict the sources but also incurs the risk either of denying that the penance of the early Church was more than an external event of church discipline (namely a sacrament) or of having to look for the sacrament in another place, where one can find it only because one looks. Or one simply disputes – because no penance can be found which is not a penance of excommunication – that there was a sacrament of penance in the early Church.

[67] In this connection we might at least raise the question, which will still remain to be considered, of whether behind the possible two-tiered church ban in Hermas there is a double ban which is already discernible not only in the practice of the synagogue but also in the New Testament and in the apostolic communities: the simple ban and the (solemn) ban accompanied by a curse. If this were the case, it would make it clearer that in Hermas also the first level in any case involves a real excommunication and that, at the same time, the ban accompanied by a curse in the New Testament and, therefore, the intense form in Hermas do not imply that the sin of the person banned is unforgivable. For the simple ban cf. Rom. 16:17; 1 Cor. 5:9 ff.; 2 Cor. 2:6; 13:2; 2 Tim. 3:5; Tit. 3:10; 2 Thess. 3:6 ff.; Rev. 2:2. For the solemn ban accompanied by a curse cf.: Acts 5:1-11; 8:18-24; 1 Cor. 5:1-5; Gal. 1:8 f.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[114]

4

THE POST-BAPTISMAL FORGIVENESS OF SINS IN THE REGULA FIDEI OF IRENAEUS

There is no doubt that the Regula Fidei, in which Irenaeus of Lyons summarizes the faith which the universal Church recognises as the inheritance which it has received from the apostles and their disciples and which it carefully preserves, belongs to the most important texts of Christian antiquity (Adv. haer. 1,2; edition of W. Harvey I: 90 f.). Certainly it is easy to understand Irenaeus' teaching on penance[1] quite independently of this text; and, in any case, the Regula Fidei offers nothing at all new on the subject. Nevertheless, in interpreting such a rule of faith which presents itself as the clear expression of the belief of the whole Church, it is not without interest to ask whether or not it provides any evidence for the possibility of a penance after baptism.

I. EXPLANATIONS OF THE POSSIBILITY OF PENANCE ACCORDING TO IRENAEUS

If Irenaeus does testify to such a possibility of penance and forgiveness of sins in this context, that is, as part of the Church's universal belief from the beginning, then he certainly cannot count as the last advocate of the old ideal of holiness and as the representative of a rigoristic theory of baptism, as, for example, H. Windisch,[2] H. Koch[3] and G. N. Bonwetsch[4] consider him to be. In fact, several [115] scholars, in their researches into Irenaeus' teaching on penance, have found evidence for a post-baptismal possibility of penance and forgiveness of sins, even in this passage. This is the case of the earlier authors Feuardent (1575)[5] and Grabe (1702),[6] and the more recent Stufler,[7] d'Alès[8] and Hoh.[9] Nevertheless, B. Poschmann,[10] in the excellent exposition of Irenaeus' penitential teaching which forms part of his comprehensive work on church penance in early Christianity up to Cyprian and Origen, has contested this view. It would seem, therefore, that the question of whether or not Irenaeus in fact attests the possibility of a post-baptismal penance in this Regula Fidei merits a re-examination.

For the above-mentioned advocates of a positive answer to this question the text itself appears to be so clear that they do not offer an actual proof for their view. Thus there is no need to consider them further here. Poschmann's negative answer is based on the fact that the

[1] The present study is a revised and extended version of an original one which appeared in ZKTh 70 (1948), pp. 450-5. The basic text of the Regula Fidei can also be found in (PG 7) I 10,1 cols. 550 f. On our theme cf. in general J. Hoh, Die kirchliche Busse im zweiten Jahrhundert (Breslau 1932), pp. 89-103; B. Poschmann, Paenitentia secunda (Bonn 1940), pp. 211-29; H. Holstein, 'L'Exhomologèse dans l'Adversus haereses de saint Irénée' in: RSR 35 (1948), pp. 282-8. There is a comprehensive bibliography in B. Altaner/A. Stuiber, Patrologie (Freiburg/Br. 1966), pp. 118-25.
[2] Cf. H. Windisch, Taufe and Sünde im ältesten Christentum bis auf Origenes (Tübingen 1908), p. 404.
[3] Cf. H. Koch, 'Die Sündenvergebung bei Irenäus' in: ZNW 9 (1908), pp. 36-46.
[4] Cf. G. N. Bonwetsch, Die Theologie des Irenäus (Gütersloh 1925), p. 131 f.
[5] Cf. the remarks of F. Feuardent, reprinted in the 2nd vol. A. Stieren's edn of Irenaeus (Leipzig 1848), p. 613.
[6] His remarks are reported by W. Harvey I 91.
[7] J. Stufler, 'Die Bussdisziplin der abendländischen Kirche bis Kallistus' in: ZKTh 31 (1907), pp. 433-73; J. Stufler, 'Die Sündenvergebung bei Irenaus' in: ZKTh 32 (1908), pp. 488-97.
[8] A. d'Alès, L'édit de Calliste (Paris 1914), p. 123.
[9] J. Hoh, p. 93.
[10] B. Poschmann, p. 220, n.2.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

two classes, named in the text, of those who reach salvation mean not two classes of men but angels and men. The ones who 'from the beginning' persevered in love are to be understood as the good angels, and the others, who 'by penance' remain in love, are, accordingly, men 'who all, after Adam's fall, can regain it [grace] only by way of penance'. Poschmann sees the proof that these two classes must refer to angels and men in the fact that, in the same context, there is also a mention of the judgement and the rejection of fallen angels and of sinful men. In the case of those, therefore, who, through the judgement, attain happiness, it must be a question of angels and men.

As is usual in confessions of faith, in the Regula Fidei the final phrases of the disputed text refer to eschatology (Adv. haer. I PG 7 10,1). First of all, the belief is here expressed that the Lord Jesus Christ will come again from heaven in the glory of the Father to gather everything together. He will raise up all flesh, the whole of mankind, so that the knee of everyone in heaven, on the earth and under the earth may bend before our Lord and God, the Saviour and King, according to the will of the invisible Father, and that every tongue may praise him. Then the Regula Fidei continues:[11]

> Then he will hold a righteous judgement over all; the wicked spirits and the disobedient angels, who deserted God, and the godless, unrighteous, transgressors and blasphemers among [116] men he will commit to everlasting fire. But to the righteous, the pious, those who have followed his commandments and remained in his love – some from the beginning, some by penance – he will grant life as a grace, give immortality and provide eternal glory.

It is, therefore, a question of the judgement which Christ will hold, acting as judge, at the end of time. It is stated who will be judged and what the content of the verdict (or its effect) will be. Those judged and the corresponding verdict are divided into two classes: the wicked, for whom eternal fire is reserved, and the good, who receive ζωη/, α)φθαρσι/α and δο&χα αι0ωνι/α. The wicked are, for their part, again clearly subdivided into two groups: the wicked angelic powers, who err (παραβεβηκο&τεφ) and fall away, and men who, as a sub-group, are more closely characterized by four adjectives: α)σεβει=φ, α!δικοι, α!νομοι, βλα&σφημοι.[12] On the other side, the class of the good is similarly described more precisely by four characteristics,[13] and then is still further divided in another sense, so that one part belongs to this class α)π' α)ρξη=φ and the other belongs to it ε0κ μετανοι/αφ. Now the question is whether, in this class of the good, we have to reckon with angels who have remained faithful, so that those who are good α)π' α)ρξη=φ means precisely the angels who have remained faithful, and those who are good ε0κ μετανοι/αφ means men who, since Adam's fall, are all in need of a penance. Or is the whole class of the good to be understood only of men, of whom some have persevered in Christ's love 'from the beginning' of their Christian life, while others have done so only after a (second) penance?

II. THE REFERENCE TO MEN

[11] Our translation changes the opening clause, which – in the original – depends upon the previous sentence, into an independent sentence.

[12] Since this group is determined syntactically by the final phrase τω~ν α)νθρω&πων as well as by the initial unique article (as is the case with the group of wicked angels) it is obvious that these four adjectives refer only to men.

[13] The four descriptions of this group are also bound together as a unity by the unique initial article. Thus the following phrase τοι∴φ (με/ν) – τοι∴φ δε/ must refer to this whole group of descriptions as a unity and cannot be understood merely as a differentiation within the last description.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Our view is that only the second possibility does justice to the interpretation of the text itself. First, this view is demanded by the striking fourfold description of the class of the good, which is quite clearly paralleled to the class of wicked men, this class itself being more closely characterized by four types.[14] Second (and this is a point of particular relevance to such a traditional formulation),[15] the idea that good angels would be judged by Christ during his judgement at the end of time is totally alien to the tradition before [117] Irenaeus. Rather, they appear as the judge's companions, as his court, as assistants and executors of his sentence; in no way do they appear as those who are judged.[16] This is all the more striking in that the idea is freely current that the wicked angels will be judged at this judgement.[17] Third,

[14] The adjectives (or participles) used here: δι/καιοι, ο#σιοι, τετηρηκο&τεφ and διαμεμενηκο&τεφ would, at least in an absolute form, have been unusual as a precise description of angels. In some circumstances, 'holy' could refer to angels (cf. for example 1 Thess. 3:13), even when the term is used absolutely. But this hardly applies to the expressions used here.

[15] The precise point at issue here should be kept in mind: it is not a question of the actual legitimacy or the possibility of deriving from biblical expressions or those found in the early Church the fact that even the good angels will be judged in some sense of the last day, but only of whether the expressions of such a notion, which is quite possible in itself, were at that time part and parcel of the current view about the future judgement of the world, and this to the extent that they could be expected to figure here in this brief confession of faith, even though there is nothing in the text itself which would demand such an interpretation.

[16] Cf. for example Matt. 16:27; 25:31; Luke 9:26; 12:8 f.; 1 Thess. 3:13; 2 Thess. 1:7. On this point see ThW I 83. Jewish theology at the time of the New Testament knows the same idea: the good angels accompany God at the judgement and are the executors of his sentence on men and demons, but they are not judged themselves. Cf. Strack-Billerbeck, Kommentar zum NT aus Talmud und Midrasch I, pp. 672, 973 f.; P. Volz, Die Eschatologie der jüdischen Gemeinde im neutestamentlichen Zeitalter (Tübingen 1934), pp. 276 f., 303 f., 316. The only text which constitutes an exception to this general view and perspective is Henoch, pp. 61,6 ff., where the Son of Man appears to judge all angels and men. But it should be pointed out that, first, it is unique in the whole of the relevant literature and, second, it is not consistent with the New Testament perspective. Above all, this unique occurrence hardly affords sufficient explanation of such a perspective in a short confession like the Regula Fidei. The most that can be said is that in 1 Cor. 6:3 it could be presupposed that in the end all angels (even the good) will be judged and that consequently such a perspective could have been familiar to Irenaeus. All that need be said on this point at present is that it seems more reasonable today to understand this text too, following Sickenberger, B. Weiss, Lietzmann, Förster (cf. Foerster, W. in ThW II 18) and H. D. Wendland, NTD III (Göttingen 1965) (but contrary to Cornely, Allo and others) as referring to the judgement of the fallen angels. The decisive factor for this question, however, must be that all of the Greek and most of the Latin Church Fathers (beginning with Tertullian, who was the first Latin author to interpret this text which is not found in Irenaeus) understood this passage as referring only to the judgement of fallen angels. It is, therefore, highly unlikely that Irenaeus would have been familiar with the idea of a judgement of the good angels on the basis of this Pauline passage. A further observation confirms this conclusion: the confession of the future judgement by the returning Lord is usually modified in a 'regula fidei' or in the confessions in general by the statement that it will be a judgement of living and dead men, but never a judgement of angels. Only very exceptionally are those to be judged further distinguished into good and bad (as in Irenaeus). Although this distinction is found in the traditional formulations of the 'regula fidei' which are closest to Irenaeus, it is abundantly clear that here it is only a question of good and bad men: Tertullian, De praescr.haer. 13 (CSL 70: p. 18,14-17), and Origen, Peri archon, I,5 (PG 11) 118. Moreover, the idea of a judgement of the good angels is not found elsewhere in Irenaeus. In fact this idea seems to be totally alien to the whole of early Christian literature, which is remarkable, in view of the fact that the teaching of a final judgement of the demons appears to have been generally widespread. Cf. L. Atzberger, Geschichte der christlichen Eschatologie innerhalb der vornicänischen Zeit (Freiburg 1896). An isolated passage in the fragment of Hippolytus Adv.Graecos 3 (PG 10, 801 A) contains a remark which could refer to a judgement of the good angels. Origen's idea, however, that the guardian angels of men would have to render an account of their activity at the judgement (In Luc.hom. 13 [GCS 35] 92) is so incidental that it cannot be considered relevant to our question. In fact this idea seems to have been introduced by Hermas, Sim. IX 31,6 (GCS 48: p. 100,13-17).

[17] Cf. 2 Pet. 2:4; Jude 6. That the fallen angels, despite their previous condemnation, will be finally and definitively condemned only at the last judgement is a view which is very familiar to Jewish theology; cf. Strack-Billerbeck III, p. 783 f. The earlier Church Fathers already witness to the fact that the wicked angels are among those who will be judged in the end. Cf. Atzberger, pp. 107, 160, 162, 282, 330, 412, 598 n.3. This idea is found in Irenaeus not only in our passage; cf. Adv.haer. I 10,3; V 26,2; III 23,3; IV 40,1; Epideixis 85 etc.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

according to Poschmann's interpretation, the text would suggest that it is only at the judgement that good angels receive life and eternal glory. And this, again, is an idea which contradicts the world-view of early Christianity, according to which the angels belong from the beginning to the world of the God of the living and appear with Christ at the judgement already in the glory of the Father.[18] Indeed, according to this interpretation, it is only at the judgement that they receive even α)φθαρσι/α, a prerogative which is theirs precisely in contrast to man, who is bodily and therefore mortal.[19] Fourth, if by those who remain in Christ's love from penance onwards are meant all men (Christians), and by μετα&νοια something concrete and specific is to be understood, which, in this instance, can only be baptism, then the text would say that all those – and only those – who have preserved their baptism will be saved. But this view clearly contradicts Irenaeus' teaching (even according to Poschmann' s interpretation). In the class of the good, therefore, it is a question only of good men. And it is said of them that they will all be saved, both those who have kept Christ's love from the beginning of their Christian life and those who, after a later penance, have persevered in this love until death.

The terminology in which this situation is expressed cannot be brought to bear against this interpretation. It is neither surprising nor unusual that the beginning of the Christian life should be described simply as α)π' α)ρξη=φ.[20] For this, one has only to consider, for example, especially 1 John 2:7; 2:24; 3:11; 2 John 5:6; Martyrium Polyc. 17,1; Polyc. Epist. ad Phil. 7,2, apart from Hb 3,14; 5,12; 6,1. It is not in the least surprising,[21] either, that the post-baptismal conversion is described simply as μετα&νοια after the Shepherd of Hermas, which Irenaeus considers 'Scripture'.[22] Thus there are in Irenaeus two groups of Christians, just as they are already described repeatedly by Hermas. The one group of believers > are as innocent children, whose minds are entered by nothing that is evil and who have never learnt what sin is, but who remain always innocent; now these will certainly obtain a dwelling [118] place in the kingdom of God, because they . . . have persevered all the days of their life in the same innocent attitude of mind (Sim. IX 29,1 f.).

The others all belong to the different categories who have kept the 'seal', only after a second post-baptismal penance.

A further point deserves attention: if – as is easy to see – the whole of Irenaeus' Regula Fidei is loaded with certain anti-Gnostic nuances, then it is already understandable why what appears, at first sight, to be a subtle and far-fetched differentiation for the group of those who are saved at the judgement should be made. Such a differentiation is, in fact, anti-Gnostic in a

---

Irenaeus is fond of quoting explicitly the passage of Matt. 25:41; he understands it in the sense that the fire is still to be prepared even for the devil. Nevertheless, this in no way implies the idea of a judgement of the good angels. For, in the case of the future judgement of the wicked angels, Irenaeus makes certain presuppositions which are not relevant in the case of the good angels: thus, in his opinion, the wicked angels share in the fate of the imperfect world (cf. IV 16,2). Cf. on this point D. Petavius, Dogmatica theologica, De Angelis lib, III cap.4; R. Massuct, Sancti Irenaei episcopi Lugdunensis et martynis detectionis et eversionis falso cognominatae agnitionis, seu contra haereses libri quinque . . . (Paris 1710) Diss. III art. 8, and A. Stieren (edn of Irenaeus) (Leipzig 1848) II 341 f. In Irenaeus himself, Adv.haer. V 26,2. Otherwise, Irenaeus generally speaks only about the judgement of men; cf. Adv.haer. II 22,2; III 4,2; 5,3; IV 22,2; 33,13; V 27,1; Epid. 69.

[18] Matt. 16:27; Mark 8:38; Luke 9:26; Jude 8; 2 Pet. 2:10; Cf. ThW II 255 and I 81ff.

[19] However Irenaeus may have envisaged the nature of angels (cf. on this R. Massuct, Diss III), they are certainly not σα&ρχ (Adv.haem. III 20,4) but, of their very nature, as opposed to the flesh, immortal (V 4,1; 7,1; 13,3).

[20] Cf. ThW I 480 f.

[21] Adv.haer. IV 20,2.

[22] Hermas, Mand. IV 3,3 f. (GCS 48: p. 28,3-11); 1,8 (ibid., p. 26,16-20); cf. R. Joly, Hermas-Le Pasteur (SC 53b) (Paris 1958, 1968), p. 159 f., and the introduction, pp. 22-30 ('These intermédiaire', p. 24); cf. chap. 3 in this volume, 'The Penitential Teaching of the Shepherd of Hermas'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

polemic sense, because it is directed against the Gnostic notion that the Spirit is an inalienable quality of those who have received it just once (either by baptism or already from eternity).[23] The same point is anti-Gnostic in an irenic sense, because it invites recusant Gnostics to penance and conversion to the Church by opening up the possibility of salvation after baptism.[24]

It must be said, therefore: according to Irenaeus, it is part of apostolic faith that even those who have sinned after baptism attain salvation, provided they have returned to the love of Christ by means of a new metanoia and have remained in it until Christ's return in judgement. It is not stated explicitly how often such a metanoia is possible. But since the main emphasis of the passage is on the fact that man will be saved in so far as, at the judgement of Christ, he is found to be in Christ's love[25] only through metanoia (considered as personal conversion), this text precludes the idea that there can be sins which, because of their objective gravity, are unforgivable, even if a man has turned away from them by penance. There is no mention in this text of the once-and-for-all character or of the possibility of repeated church penance, least of all of a relationship of this penance to the Church, therefore, of a readmission into the Church. But this can hardly be expected, since these questions do not fit at all into the context given. Nevertheless, on the basis of this text alone, it can be said: If it belongs to the deposit of faith that a man, even after baptism, can return to Christ's love through penance and so will find grace in Christ's judgement, then the Church, even at this time, must have drawn the conclusion from its own conviction, at least in general, and have extended its own love again [119] to the man who is in Christ's love (cf. 2 Cor. 2:8),[26] that is restored to him the full church fellowship.

III. THE TEXT

To help the reader, the text of Irenaeus' Regula Fidei is reproduced here in its Latin form, as it is presented by W. Wigan Harvey and in the English translation by A. Roberts and J. Donaldson (eds.) in The Ante-Nicene Fathers.[27] For the sake of completion, the English text of the Regula Fidei is also reproduced in the form which this has in the 'Proof of the Apostolic Preaching'.[28] Since these texts are not usually included among the witnesses to the practice and the theology of penance in the early Church, and since our brief remarks refer to them directly, it seems appropriate to reproduce them here. In any case, it should be kept constantly in mind that it is here a question primarily of a confession of faith on the part of [23] According to Adv.haer. I 6,3, the Gnostics maintain that they have grace as an inalienable personal possession (ι0διο&κτητοφ). On this, cf. chap. 2 in this volume, 'Sin as Loss of Grace in Early Church Literature'.

[24] The apologetic tendency explains why it is that, in the description of the men who come before the judgement, no attention is paid to humanity before Christ. Irenaeus obviously knows that even these men, in so far as they have lived virtuously before Christ's arrival, are saved and that, consequently, in the history of salvation (Adv.haer. IV 22,2) there have 'from the beginning' been men who would withstand the judgement. But there can be no question of these men here. For if it were a question of the whole of mankind, including the generations before Christ, then it would be saved as a whole and not only partially by μετα&νοια. In fact Irenaeus recognizes that in Adam all men have lost the Spirit, which is necessary for salvation (Adv.haer. V 16,3 etc.; cf. R. Massuet, n.115) and that, consequently, even the 'righteous' of the Old Covenant have to receive the forgiveness of their sins through Christ (Adv.haer. IV 27,2 etc.).
[25] Such unqualified statements arc found frequently in Irenaeus. Cf. B. Poschmann, p. 218 ff.
[26] For the juridical notion of κυρου=ν, which is used when a community grants its 'love' once more to a person who has been excommunicated, cf. ThW III 1098 f.: love is 'granted officially'.
[27] Translator's note: the text which we have used here is the American Reprint of the Edinburgh Edn, published by The Christian Literature Publishing Co., Buffalo 1887.
[28] Translator's note: the translation which we present here is that of J. P. Smith, St. Irenaeus, Proof of the Apostolic Preaching (Ancient Christian Writers, no. 16) (Westminster, Md/London 1952).

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the Church which has only been adopted by Irenaeus.

1. W. Wigan Harvey, Sancti Irenaei . . . , cap. II

'Ecclesia enim (et quidem) per universum orbem usque ad finem terrae (dis)seminata, et ab Apostolis, et discipulis eorum accepit eam fidem, quae est in unum Deum, Patrem omnipotentem, qui fecit coelum et terram et mare, et omnia quae in eis sunt: et in unum Christum Jesum Filium Dei, incarnatum pro nostra salute: et in Spiritum Sanctum, qui per Prophetas praedicavit dispositiones Dei, et adventum, et eam, quae est ex Virgine generationem, et passionem, et resurrectionem a mortuis, et in carne in coelos ascensionem dilecti Jesu Christi Domini nostri, et de coelis in gloria Patris adventum eius, ad recapitulanda universa, et resuscitandam omnem carriem humani generis, ut Christo Jesu Domino nostro et Deo, et Salvatori, et Regi, secundum placitum Patris invisibilis omne genu curvet coelestium, et terrestrium, et infernorum, et omnis lingua confiteatur ei, et iudicium iustum in omnibus faciat: spiritualia quidem nequitiae, et angelos transgressos, atque apostatas factos, et impios, et iniustos, et iniquos, et blasphemos homines in aeternum ignem mittat: iustis autem et aequis, et praecepta eius servantibus, et [120] in dilectione eius perseverantibus, quibusdam quidem ab initio, quibusdam autem ex poenitentia, vitam donans incorruptelam loco muneris conferat; et claritatem aeternam circumdet.'

2. A. Roberts and J. Donaldson (eds.), Irenaeus Against Heresies (The Ante-Nicene Fathers, vol. I) Buffalo 1887, pp. 330-1

'The church, though dispersed throughout the whole world, even to the ends of the earth, has received from the apostles and their disciples this faith: (She believes) in one God, the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all things that are in them; and in one Christ Jesus, the Son of God, who became incarnate for our salvation; and in the Holy Spirit, who proclaimed through the prophets the dispensations of God, and the advents, and the birth from a virgin, and the passion and the resurrection from the dead, and the ascension into heaven in the flesh of the beloved Christ Jesus, our Lord, and His (future) manifestation from heaven in the glory of the Father 'to gather all things in one', and to raise up anew all flesh of the whole human race, in order that to Christ Jesus, our Lord, and God, and Saviour, and King, according to the will of the invisible Father, 'every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things on earth, and that every tongue should confess' to Him, and that He should execute just judgment towards all; that He may send 'spiritual wickednesses', and the angels who transgressed and became apostates, together with the ungodly, and unrighteous, and wicked, and profane among men, into everlasting fire; but may, in the exercise of His grace, confer immortality on the righteous, and holy, and those who have kept His commandments, and have persevered in His love, some from the beginning (of their Christian course), others from (the date of) their repentance, and may surround them with everlasting glory.'

3. J. P. Smith, St. Irenaeus, Proof of the Apostolic Preaching (Ancient Christian Writers, no. 16) Westminster, Md./London 1952, pp. 51-2

'And this is the drawing-up of our faith, the foundation of the building, and the consolidation of a way of life. God, the Father, uncreated, [121] beyond grasp, invisible, one God the maker of all; this is the first and foremost article of our faith. But the second article is the Word of God, the Son of God, Christ Jesus our Lord, who was shown forth by the prophets according to the design of their prophecy and according to the manner in which the Father disposed; and through him were made all things whatsoever. He also, in the end of times, for the recapitulation of all things, is become a man among men, visible and tangible, in order to abolish death and bring to light life, and bring about the communion of God and man. And the third article is the Holy Spirit, through whom the prophets prophesied and the patriarchs were taught about God and the just were led in the path of justice, and who in the end of times has been poured forth in a new manner upon humanity over all the earth renewing man to God . . .

. . . for none shall escape immune from his judgement, neither Jew nor Gentile nor sinner among the faithful, nor angel. But those who are now sceptical of His kindness will know His power in the judgement, as the blessed apostle says: 'Knowing not, that the benignity of God leadeth thee to penance, but according to thy hardness and impenitent heart, thou treasurest up for thyself wrath, in the day of wrath, and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation revelation of the just judgement of God, who will render forth to every man according to his works (Rom. 2:4-6).'

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[123]

PART THREE

The African Tradition

[125]

5

TERTULLIAN' S THEOLOGY OF PENANCE

The role of Tertullian, especially in the theological tradition of North Africa, but also of the whole Western Church, has remained in the background for a long time. This is doubtless due to the fact that, in his later writings, he veered towards Montanism. It is only in recent times that his thinking has been placed in the limelight, even if earlier there were not wanting a few authors who tried to exploit his voluminous and well-authenticated writings with regard to specific thematic questions.[1] These include his teaching on penance, which has received repeated treatment.[2] Nevertheless, we consider that this question has not yet received a detailed consideration in relation to his thought as a whole.

Our intention, however, is to highlight aspects and points which perhaps have been either overlooked or forgotten today. Such a treatment of Tertullian's theology of penance must obviously involve that a great deal of what is already known be presupposed or even repeated.[3] Revising familiar material in this way is never very satisfying. But, perhaps for that very reason, it is all the more necessary to do.

---

[1] The essay which is presented here in a revised and extended form appeared originally in Abhandlungen über Theologie und Kirche (Festschrift K. Adam), ed. M. Reding (Düsseldorf 1952), pp. 139-67. On the same theme cf. B. Poschmann, Paenitentia secunda (Bonn 1940), pp. 283-348; id., Busse und Letzte Ölung (HDG IV,3) (Freiburg/Br. 1951), pp. 20-7. For general considerations see also M. Spanneut, Tertullien et les premiers moralistes africains (Gembloux/Paris 1969), as well as the detailed study of J. Moingt, Théologie trinitaire de Tertullien (4 vols.) (Paris 1966-9). In recent years Tertullian's thought has attracted great interest in ecclesiology (and in this context it has given rise to information and considerations on penitential discipline): cf. E. Altendorf, Einheit und Heiligkeit der Kirche (Berlin 1932); W. Simonis, Ecclesia visibilis et invisibilis (Frankfurt/M. 1970); U. Wickert, Sacramentum Unitatis (Berlin/New York 1971); R. F. Evans, One and Holy (London 1972).

[2] Cf. the works mentioned above. There can be no question here of repeating the results of these studies. Our intention is rather to re-examine independently Tertullian's expressed views themselves and so, hopefully, obtain both more satisfactory Ecclesia visibilis et invisibilis (Frankfurt/M. 1970); U. Wickert, Sacramentum Unitatis out will be to uncover in Tertullian's theology of penance principles which are hardly present in today's systematic theology but which could very well be of great importance for the teaching on penance.

[3] B. Poschmann, p. 283 ff., lists all the important literature up to 1940. Later works which should be mentioned are: P. Galtier, 'Comment on écarte la pénitence privèe' in: Gr 22 (1940), pp. 183-202 (esp. 188-93); J. Köhne, 'Zur Frage der Busse im christlichen Altertum' in: ThGl 35 (1943), pp. 26-36; E. Dekkers, Tertullianus en de geschiednis der liturgie (Brussels/Amsterdam 1947), pp. 217-30; G. H. Joyce, 'Private Penance in the Early Church' in: JThS 42 (1941), pp. 18-42 (on R. C. Mortimer, The Origins of Private Penance [Oxford 1939]); C. B. Daly, 'The Sacrament of Penance in Tertullian' in: IER 69 (1947), pp. 693-707, 815-21; 70 (1948), pp. 731-46, 832-48; H. von Campenhausen, Kirchliches Amt und geistliche Vollmacht in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten (Tübingen 1963), pp. 243-61; K. Baus, Von der Urgemeinde zur frühchristlichen Grosskirche (HdKG I) (Freiburg/Br. 1962). pp. 367-73; B. Altaner/A. Stuiber, Patrologie (Freiburg/Br. 1966), pp. 162 ff.; J. Quasten, Patrology II (Utrecht 1953), pp. 332-5; J. Grotz, Die Entwicklung des Busstufenwesens in der vornicänischen Kirche (Freiburg/Br. 1955), pp. 343 -70.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is obvious that what is found in Tertullian's writings does not, in itself, have any dogmatic binding force. This would be the case, only if one of his statements could be proven to be a unanimous opinion of the Fathers of the Church. Such direct bases of later opinions are, however, not very numerous in Tertullian. His influence is to be seen [126] elsewhere, since he stands at the beginning of a line of theological development in North Africa which leads, via Cyprian of Carthage, to Augustine and from him to the whole medieval theology of the Western Church. Many of his instigations had only a negative effect, but they did have an effect, nevertheless. This ought to become a little clearer in a historical essay on the question of penance, even if, in this context, that probing from the dogmatic viewpoint is hardly possible which can show up the theological significance of many aspects which, though today somewhat forgotten, are very clearly emphasized by Tertullian. In this essay we are concentrating on the actual theology of penance.

In this consideration of Tertullian's teaching on penance, therefore, the whole question of the existence or non-existence of limits to the Church's power to forgive sins in relation to certain (capital) sins, as they could have existed in the teaching and practice of the Church in Tertullian's time, must be precluded at the outset. What could be said about these limits does not come within the ambit of this investigation, which is concerned with Tertullian's theology of penance in the strict sense.

I. THE OBJECT OF PUBLIC PENANCE [4]

In his work De paenitentia, where he considers church penance, Tertullian speaks only about serious sins which cause the loss of grace (cf. De paenit. 2,6.7.8 [CSL 76: p. 143,25-36]). But since penance is here conceived as the restoration of the state which was given to the Christian at baptism (7,10 ff. [CSL 76: pp. 159,33-160,45]; 8,8 [ibid., pp. 162,27-34]; 12,9 [ibid., pp. 169:34-170,40]), he would surely have agreed with the general theological principle that all sins which destroy the grace received in baptism should be submitted to church penance. Obviously, this does not mean that Tertullian concluded from this idea precisely which sins are in fact serious and, therefore, submitted to church penance.[5]

It does mean, however, that, in Tertullian's view, all those sins which he considers as destroying the grace of baptism, entailing death, etc. are, of their very nature, the object of church penance. The only way to see which sins these actually are is to consider his work as a whole. Thus, in the present context, it is not important to [127] discuss which criteria Tertullian uses to distinguish these faults from those others which do not have such an effect and are, therefore, in today's terms, 'venial sins'.

Tertullian did not draw up a systematic, fixed list of serious sins. Certainly, in his view, these sins are not simply identifiable with the three capital sins,[6] in the strict sense of the term. The 'triad' appears first of all in the work De pudicitia 5 (CSL 20: pp. 226,4-228,2)[7] which hails from Tertullian's Montanist period. And here it is one of his polemical devices. The triad is designed to name the sins which are unforgivable. As Poschmann has convincingly shown, even according to De pud., moechia at least did not previously count among such sins. At the same time this triad itself, according to De pud. 19 (CSL 20: p. 262,27-30; p. 265,22-5), is in no way an actual exclusive and clearly-defined group of sins;

[4] On this cf. chap. 2 in this volume, 'Sin as Loss of Grace in Early Church Literature.'
[5] Even today this is not possible. Loss of grace is indeed the essence of mortal sin, but it is still not the precise criterion for the distinction between mortal and venial sins.
[6] This means in practice apostasy, murder and fornication. On this cf. J. Grotz, pp. 356-64.
[7] Edns of the text: E. Preuschen (Tübingen 1910) and P. de Labriolle (Paris 1906). The text which we are using here is that in the relevant volume of the Corpus scriptorum latinorum (CSL), published in Vienna.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

since here it includes: homicidium, idolatria, fraus, negatio, blasphemia utique et moechia et fornicatio et si qua alia violatio templi dei. If even here, therefore, the number of unforgivable sins exceeds the three 'capital sins', there can be no question that Tertullian would maintain that the sins which are to be submitted to church penance are identifiable with the three capital sins.

In fact, in his Catholic period, he recognizes that many more sins destroy grace and are, consequently, the object of church penance. In the work De paen. he includes among these: concupiscentia carnalis, inlecebrae saeculares, denial of faith out of fear of worldly power, heresy (perversae traditiones) (7,9 [CSL 76: p. 159,28-33]), stuprum, idolothytorum esus, perversa docere, fidere divitiis (8,1 [CSL 76: p. 160,1-6]). In Apol.2, the following are enumerated as offences forbidden to Christians: homicidium, adulterium, fraus, perfidia et cetera scelera (CSL 69: p. 6,2-3). According to Apol. 11, these deserve hell: impii quique in parentes, et incesti in sorores et maritarum adulteri et virginum raptores et puerorum contaminatores et qui saeviunt et qui occidunt et qui furantur et qui decipiunt (CSL 69: p. 32,16-19). Tertullian's treatise in moral theology De spectaculis sets out to prove that the offence of Deo excidere can exist,[8] even when there is no argument to be drawn from a scriptural commandment aimed directly against this sin, so that, for instance, taking part in circuses and in pagan spectacles, etc. belongs to the sins which separate men from God. Similarly, deceit is counted among the sins which are incompatible with the grace of baptism.[9] Obviously, various [128] occupations associated with pagan worship, such as that of a master of gladiators, a provider of incense, a seller of sacrificial meat, are likewise also considered as being seriously sinful and punished by exclusion from the community (De idol. 11 [CSL 20: p. 41,16-19]). In view of Hippolytus' Paradosis (16, Dix p. 24 ff.), this can hardly be considered as Montanistic rigorism. The same applies to everything that counts as idolatry, such as the fabrication of the images of idols (De idol. 5 [ibid., pp. 34,29-35,2]; cf. De pud. 7,15 f. [ibid., p. 232,21-6]), soothsaying (De idol. 9 [ibid., p. 39,11-14]; cf. De pud. 7,16 [ibid., p. 233]). Thieves, deceivers, robbers also obviously do not enjoy any church fellowship (De idol. 5). Nevertheless, in other cases Tertullian's Montanistic rigorism later explained things as serious sins which are not such according to Catholic teaching, and then also refused church fellowship to such 'sinners' as, for example, those who marry a pagan (Ad uxorem 11,3; De monogamia 11), or who marry a second time (De pud. 1,20 [CSL 20: p. 222,2-6]). Also, it is clear from De pat. 5 (CSL 47: pp. 8-9) that belonging to the major offences against God are not only idolatry, murder and impurity, but also enmity, avarice, robbery and hatred.

Thus, neither in his Catholic nor in his Montanist period does Tertullian acknowledge a fixed and exclusive triad of mortal sins. Rather, in his view, the number of sins, with regard both to the loss of baptismal grace and to exclusion from the Church, is very much greater. Nevertheless, all these sins are submitted to church penance.

Theoretically, Tertullian acknowledges more mortal sins in his Catholic period than later, although even then, for example (cf. De pud. 7 [CSL 20:233]), the person who takes part in pagan games is described as vivens adhuc peccator. Later he restricts the number of mortal sins because they cause the loss of baptismal grace and, therefore, are unforgivable. For practical reasons, therefore, he cannot accept too many mortal sins.

It is possible to see which sins he regarded as being remissible by church penance, in his Catholic period, by considering De pud. and, particularly, those faults for which he prescribes church penance in his Montanist period: the mediocria delicta, such as taking part in chariot races, gladiator fights, the theatre, pagan feasts, idolatry and astrology (De pud. 7,15 [CSL

[8] Cf. De spect. 8.
[9] Cf. De bapt. 4; De spect. 3,20.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

20: p. 232,21-6]). He must have considered these sins earlier as mortal sins, since in De pud. 7,15 f. [129] (CSL 20: pp. 232,26-233,3)[10] he concedes it as quite self-evident that they alienate men from the Church; such sinners are extra gregem and foris. It is unthinkable, however, that he should consider a sinner in a state of baptismal grace as being separated from the Church or excluded from it by excommunication. Thus these sins are leviora delicta[11] only by comparison with the capital sins. They are here presented precisely as the object of church penance and should not be confused with the delicta cotidianae incursionis (De pud. 19 [ibid., p. 265,15]), to which all are subjected. But, since Tertullian considers church penance something which actually ought not to exist, it is hardly possible to assume that, in his opinion, all men have to undergo church penance. Christ is intercessor in the event of daily faults (De pud. 19 [ibid., p. 265,21-2]), but this does not mean that he always plays this role in exactly the same way as he does in actual church penance, where he is intercessor in an official act of the Church through the bishop and the community (De paen. 10,6 f. [CSL 76: p. 165,20-7]). The daily faults are not mortal sins and must not, therefore, be confused with the mediocria delicta which are serious sins for Tertullian in his Catholic period. For Tertullian in his Montanist period only those sins properly belong to the obligatory object of church penance which, in his opinion, cannot be forgiven by the Church: namely, the frequently mentioned triad of idolatry, impurity and murder (De pud. 5 [CSL 20: p. 227 ,28-9]).[12] According to De pud. 19,22 (ibid., p. 265,15-20), he counts among the daily faults of all Christians: anger, acts of violence, cursing, white lies, etc., which, in his opinion, can all be remitted without church penance.

This is all that we can say about Tertullian's 'theory' of the obligatory object of public church penance. The field in which this 'theory' could be applied is very wide, especially if one considers that even secret sins are explicitly included (De paen. 10,8 [CSL 76: p. 165,27-9]). Even sins of thought are understood, in some circumstances, to be just as serious as sins of deed, at least in theory (De paen. 3,4 ff. [CSL 76: p. 145,13-24]). The 'practice', however, was quite different. The situation with regard to church penance in those days may have been the same as that of excommunication as a church punishment today: in theory, it is very frequently in order, but it occurs very seldom in practice, because there are sufficient reasons why 'in this particular case' the excommunication is not [130] verified. Tertullian himself observes that very many people not only repeatedly postpone church penance but probably try to 'flee from' (suffugere) it (De paen. 10,1 [CSL 76: p. 164,1-5]), that is they find reasons for considering their fault not so serious that it should demand church penance in fact. Thus it must remain doubtful whether the practice of such a church penance extended beyond the publicly known cases of capital sins. In the light of this practice, it is understandable that later, despite the protest of 'theologians', there is a tendency here and there to restrict the number of actual mortal sins which should be submitted to church penance to the three capital sins. Nevertheless, this number almost always includes other sins.

II. THE PERFORMANCE OF PENANCE

1. The Obligation to Do Penance

[10] Nevertheless, this is, as such, a logical contradiction of the Montanist view that these sins are not in fact mortal sins.
[11] Cf. De pud. 18,18.
[12] Even in De pud., however, as in De pud. 19,25, further sins are added to these: fraus, negatio, blasphemia . . . et si qua alia violatio templi Dei; similarly Adv. Marc. IV 9.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The obligation to do public church penance for serious sins is emphasized by Tertullian in De paen. 10-12. All false shame is to be set aside; it ought not be repeatedly postponed; the difficulties of penance should not frighten sinners, because it is only penance that liberates them from the 'hell in their hearts'. Without penance, there is no salvation, and this applies even to secret sins: an melius damnatum latere quam palam absolvi? (De paen. 10,8 [CSL 76: p. 165,27-9]).

2. The Confession

Penance consists first of all of the confession, the exhomologesis (De paen 9,5 [ibid , p 163,18-22]), in the publicatio sui (De paen. 10,1 [ibid , p 164,1-5]). The sin must not be deprived of the humana notitia (De paen. 10,7 [CSL 76: p. 165,25-7]). This public confession to which Tertullian exhorts and which he explains as necessary for salvation consists above all of the undertaking of the public penance itself (cf. De paen, 9-10 [CSL 76: pp. 162-5]). The sinner appears before the community dressed as a penitent, implores his fellow-Christians [131] for their intercession and installs himself in the place for penitents in the church. It is in this way that he 'confesses' that he is a sinner.[13] This public avowal is difficult to do, it is the actus which oversteps the limits of the conscientia (De paen. 9,1 [ibid., p. 162,1-31). Thus Tertullian does not mention, in the first place, a detailed confession of sins before either the bishop or the community. This was least of all demanded in cases where the sins were already known and had perhaps even provoked a spontaneous intervention on the part of the church leaders. This intervention could be thought of either as an excommunication or as the imposition of church penance with exclusion from the Eucharist. Nevertheless, according to Tertullian, sinners should also do public penance for secret, serious sins (De paen. 10,8 [ibid., p. 165,27-9]). In this case, was a general avowal, implied in the announcement of public penance, sufficient, or are we to think that, at the beginning of such a penance, we have a detailed confession of the sinner, at least before the bishop? We ought to assume the latter case. Such a confession before the bishop is implied in the request for penance. The castigatio does not depend on the judgement of the penitent alone. At least as far as its duration is concerned, penance varied according to the sins in question. This would have been very difficult to justify solely on the basis of the degree of the sinner's sorrow or repentance[14] (although this may have played a role). And this applies to Tertullian's time as it does later. On this presupposition, it is possible to have a clear idea of the significance of the censura divina, the iudicari magno cum pondere in God's presence until the excommunication (Apol. 39 [CSL 69: p. 92,14-18]) which, according to Tertullian, occurs in the liturgy. Thus, either before or after the liturgy there must have been a censura divina by the bishop by which castigationes, that is, church penance (besides a mere excommunication),[15] were imposed. A precise determination of this church penance in the case of secret sins, however, presupposes a detailed confession at some point of time before the bishop.[16] This could also have been the occasion already – as it is later attested by Origen [13] Cf. also De or. 7: exomologesis est petitio veniae, quia qui petit veniam delictum confitetur.

[14] This obviously played a role, and not only later. For the penitent begs the clergy and the community not only to intercede for him but also to grant him the pax (De pud. 1; 3; 13). At that time all this certainly meant more than a mere liturgical ceremony. Whether it bore fruit sooner or later depended, therefore, on the impression which the penitent actually made upon the community.
[15] This is to be understood as an enforced excommunication, in the case of sinners whose faults had become known without their own confession and who were, nevertheless, not prepared to undertake church penance. The only course of action was to exclude such sinners.
[16] This is particularly clear in Cyprian; cf. De lapsis 28. Even the mere thought of an offence is confessed apud sacerdotes Dei dolenter et simpliciter. Whether an actual church penance is imposed for these prava et modica

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

– for the sinner to ask whether in fact church penance was really necessary in his particular case. Nevertheless, it is not possible to tell from Tertullian's statements whether a precise confession of sins, even for secret sins, was required to be made publicly before the whole community. Certainly [132] this was not required later. Leo the Great (cf. DS 323) maintains that the strict personal confession of secret sins before the bishop is the unique apostolica regula.[17]

3. Penitential Practices

Penance also comprises certain penitential practices which, initially, are of a more private nature, such as fasting, the wearing of a special penitential garb and other practices (including abstention from taking a bath) (cf. De paen. 9,4). It would be natural for the sinner to undertake these practices as soon as he comes to his senses, since when, during the liturgy in the church, he begs to be admitted to the Church's official penance he already appears as a penitent.[18] According to Cyprian a person is able to do private penance in this manner for some considerable time before bothering about church penance and only then take on the exhomologesis proper (cf. Epsit. 16,2). This private 'pre-penance' is perfectly understandable. The period of exhomologesis done during the public liturgy may be experienced as particularly humiliating and difficult. A previous private penance, while not alleviating the serious obligation to do penance for sins, makes it possible to shorten the period of public church penance.[19] In any case, these private penitential practices were also continued simultaneously with actual church penance. It is worth noting that Tertullian considers them in De paen. only after his treatment of the exhomologesis. To this private penance are then added specifically ecclesiastical practices: in virtue of his confession the sinner incurs first of all a censura divina: a communione orationis et conventus et omnis sancti commercii relegatur (Apol. 39). He is denied the communicatio ecclesiastica (De pud. 18), that is, he is 'excommunicated'. Obviously this excommunication in no way coincides with our modern canonical notion of excommunication. Nor did it at that time denote, in every case, the introduction of the performance of church penance.[20] There was naturally an exclusion of unrepentant sinners from the community and from the liturgy. This was considered a purely punitive measure, at least until the sinner's willing conversion. Nevertheless, in this period excommunication belonged to the very essence of church penance. The penitent's aim was, precisely through his penance, to regain peace with the Church and church [133] fellowship. Moreover, in the case of secret sins, it was not a matter of his simply being already 'outside' because of the act in the sense that all that was required vulnera may remain an open question. There is only mention of a exomologesis conscientiae before the bishop. It remains unclear whether subsequently such people either willingly or compulsorily undertake public penance. It is even less certain that the salutaris medela which the bishop may recommend outside the actual church penance includes a sacramental penance. In any event, Tertullian indicates that in the case of secret sins confession before the bishop was the first step towards penance.

---

[17] On this cf. B. Poschmann, Die abendländische Kirchenbusse im Ausgang des christlichen Altertums (Munich 1928), pp. 11-16. The reader will find here further literature on the question of the public confession of sins in the early Church.

[18] In certain circumstances, such a sinner would already have tried also to obtain the intercession of an imprisoned confessor (Ad mart. 1,6; De pud. 22,1). Such a 'pre-penance' can be supposed in the background to De paen. 10,1: the sinner is repentant, but he repeatedly postpones the publicatio sui.

[19] Such a private 'pre-penance' is clear in the Didascalia Apostolorum. On this cf. 'Penitential Teaching and Practice According to the Didascalia Apostolorum' in this volume.

[20] Cf. K. Baus, p. 370. On this question cf. also the details in 'The Penitential Teaching of the Shepherd of Hermas' in this volume.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

was his official reconciliation with the Church. At least in order to have access to the performance of church penance an official act of excommunication is necessary. In the act the bishop doubtless had the decisive word, even if priests and the faithful co-operated in the decision. 'To put a person outside the church' (extra Ecclesiam dare) is the duty of the leader (praesidentis officium) (De pud. 14,16). The exclusion is clearly expressed. The sinner has to stand at the church doors (pro foribus ecclesiae; De pud. 3,5; 4,5), at limen ecclesiae (De pud. 1,21; 4,5), where the faithful proceed to 'disown' him (De paen. 10,4). There in vestibulo (De paen. 7,10) he begs on bended knee the bishop, the priests and the faithful to receive him back into the community of the Church (De paen. 9,4.6; 10,6; De pud. 1,21; 3,5; 5,14; 13,7). Already at the time of Tertullian church penance appears to have taken place in two stages. In the first place the sinner, dressed in sackcloth and ashes, and standing before the actual church building, asks the community to be admitted to penance.[21] The granting of this prayer is already an opening of the ianua paenitentiae (De pud. 6,1). Then follows the actual penance in the church itself. It is carried out almost according to the same rite as the penitential prayer outside the church, that is by a prayer on bended knee both for the community's intercession with God and for full church communion, only it occurs now after an inducere in ecclesiam (De pud. 13).[22] Also according to De pud. 18,13 the exhomologesis appears to take place in the church itself.

The penance which took place inside the church, however, was not a single act. It lasted a fairly long time (cf. De paen. 11,4-6). Thus the penitents obviously had to be present for a long time in their penitential garb on Sundays in the liturgy and to address the above-mentioned prayer repeatedly to the community. For such an exhomologesis they obviously needed a great deal of patience (cf. De paen. 15). The poenitentiae ambitus (De pud. 18,12) must have varied in length according to the different cases. Nevertheless, Tertullian obviously does not know of a penance which lasts a life-time (in so far, that is, as he recognizes a church forgiveness at all). This is clear from the fact that he considers the king of Babylon's seven year penance (Dan. 4:33) as already very long (De paen. 12,7).

[134] The fact that liturgical penance does not always terminate only on the death-bed can be derived from the warning that penance is only possible once and that, for this reason, one must beware of a further fall (iterato beneficio gratus esto, nedum ampliato; De paen. 7,11).

4. Reconciliation

Normally penance came to an end not only at a particular point of time (De paen. 12,9: exomologesi . . . restitutus), but was certainly concluded by an act of church reconciliation.

[21] On this cf. De pud. 3;5; De paen. 7, 10: in vestibulo is a second penance which is still to be opened as a doom; De pud. 4: the Montanist will no longer grant access even to the threshold (limen) of the Church in the case of unnatural impurity, as opposed to natural impurity. But this obviously presupposes that, according to the Catholics, there are two stages of church penance.

[22] It could also be that this introductory rite was performed only at the conclusion of the period of penance, that is, as the actual beginning of the exhomologesis, which then ended with the reconciliation. At least De pud. 13, 7 gives the impression that reconciliation follows immediately upon this introductory rite and the exhomologesis (inducens-indulgens), unless, that is, Tertullian is here combining rhetorically two acts which are in fact quite distinct. In this case, it could be assumed that the repeated exhomologesis took place during the long period of penance foris and in vestibulo. Nevertheless, it is by no means clear what is meant by the vestibulum, from which the penitent is led into the church (or its interior): is it an area in front of the church or a place at the entrance to the church? Accordingly, the exhomologesis in vestibulo (De paen. 7, 10) would be identical either with the prayer to be readmitted into the church (cf. De pud. 5; 3) or with the rite within the church (De pud. 13; 18). In any case the two phases in the exhomologesis must be distinguished; all that remains obscure is which lasts the longer, that is, whether the first is only an introductory rite or the latter is only a concluding rite and, accordingly, the other has the meaning of the exhomologesis of the long period of penance.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This involves a restitutio (De pud. 9), a venia ab episcopo (De pud. 18). It is not very easy to visualize how this would occur liturgically. Obviously it followed the sinner's last exhomologesis in the appropriate liturgy. Details of such a ceremony are still discernible in De pud. 13,7 ff., even despite the smokescreen of Tertullian's mockery. The sinner is once more led into the liturgical assembly (or is he brought forward from the place which he has occupied as a penitent at the back of the church?), and on bended knee he begs for the community's intercession and for readmission into the community. The bishop gives a sermon on the gravity of sin and the mercy of God, and then follows the forgiveness. Tertullian does not say how the actual rite of forgiveness appears as the readmission of a penitent to full church fellowship. But since already in Cyprian[23] the imposition of hands accompanied by prayer was used quite naturally for this purpose and the same ritual was practiced generally in the Church,[24] it is reasonable to suppose that it was employed already in Tertullian's time.

However reconciliation may have appeared liturgically, De pud. leaves no doubt about a proper act of forgiveness by the Church. The aim of the whole work is precisely to dispute that the bishop had the ability of an Ego. . . dimitto with regard to certain sins and to reject the claim of the numerus episcoporum (21) to the potestas (3; 21; 22) to forgive sins. At the same time, it is precisely this power that is defended, at least since the polemic against Montanism, with explicit reference to Matthew 16:18 f. (De pud. 21,9 f.).

Already according to De paen., however, the penance described by Tertullian as being demanded for all serious sins committed after baptism had to be concluded by a church reconciliation. This reconciliation is indeed not explicitly mentioned – or, at least, not as explicitly as in De pud. The notions of absolvere as an act of the [135] bishop, of pax, communicatio and communicare do not occur, although later in De pud. they are very common. Also, already in De paen. penance is seen very clearly as the concern of the Church, in so far as it is to be performed before the Church, that is, publicly in the presence of the community, if it is to avail to salvation. Moreover, it must be supported by the intercession of the Church, if it is to find a hearing with God and obtain the forgiveness of sins. This is because the prayer of Christ's body is the infallibly efficacious prayer of the Lord himself (10,6 f.). Nevertheless, there is no mention of an official act of absolution by the bishop. But that such an act must have existed at this time is clearly suggested by other expressions in De paen.

The difference between Tertullian's two works on this point does not appear to be very considerable.[25] In the later period he contested the Church's claim to be able to grant full forgiveness even for sins of impurity. In this context he naturally had to deal explicitly with an official act on the Church's part. Earlier, however, he was concerned only to exhort sinners not to stay away from penance but to accept it willingly. Such a penitential preaching considers naturally the situation of the sinner but not that of the Church.

We need not consider here whether the Catholics (the 'psychics') at that time, either before or after the bishop's edict which Tertullian challenges in De pud., exempted certain ('capital') sins from the Church's absolution. In fact there is no proof that Tertullian as a Catholic did not recognize a church reconciliation in respect of those sins for which he prescribes penance in De paen. Certainly there are indications from this period of Tertullian's life (Apol. 2; De corona 11; De monogamia 15) – that the Church punishes certain sins with excommunication and does not tolerate in its midst those who commit them, as long as they are unrepentant. But there are no indications that these sinners are not to be readmitted if they [23] Epist. 15,1; 16,2; 17,2; 18,1; 19,2; 20,3; 71,2; De lapsis 16; Sent. episcop. 8.22.

[24] Thus in Origen and in the Didascalia Apostolorum still in the 3rd cent.
[25] At least this difference is not very striking, although between De paen. and De pud. Tertullian changed over to Montanism.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

stop sinning and do penance. Moreover, these texts say nothing about a permanent and irrevocable exclusion.[26]

At the same time, there seem to be positive proofs that at the time of De paen. a church reconciliation was possible. Penance is compared with baptism. It is paenitentia secunda (7,10.12; 9,1), the other planca salutis (12,9). It restores the lost baptismal grace, and this after a precisely measured period of time in this life, so that one can be afraid of losing it again (7,11).

If penance and baptism are compared in this way, at least as far as [136] their internal effect is concerned, that is to say, if there is the awareness that, through penance, a sinner recovers everything that he received in baptism but, as a prodigal son, had squandered (8,8), then it is unthinkable that he remains permanently excluded from full church fellowship. What he receives again is the baptismal grace which previously had established his full church membership. Moreover, Tertullian considers that this paenitentia secunda is unrepeatable (7,10 f.), although its effect can be lost again (7,11). But how can this unrepeatable possibility be established, known and determined in relation to a further penance if it is not followed by a church reconciliation? Naturally a penitent can fall again into sin during the period of his penance without this affecting the single opportunity for penance. This is because any further attempt (which is not allowed anyway) at penance would only count as a new penance if it were previously established that the penitent has already in fact recovered the lost baptismal grace and that he has precisely lost it a second time. Tertullian states explicitly that a further penance after the paenitentia secunda is impossible precisely because the penitent has already recovered the baptismal grace a second time and, therefore, ought not to lose it again (7,11). Thus the knowledge that reconciliation has been achieved concludes penance and also clearly distinguishes it from a further possibility. But the sinner can have this knowledge only by being readmitted explicitly into the community of the Church. Otherwise, he would have to do penance for the whole of his life. Penance can be unrepeatable only if it has a tangible conclusion, which is conceivable only as an act of the Church. Accordingly, the palam absolvi (10,8) also indicates that Tertullian must be thinking of a church reconciliation. Certainly the absolving subject here is God himself or perhaps also the sinner's personal penance (cf. 9,6), the latter, as church exhomologesis, being already public (palam). Nevertheless, the forgiveness which God grants to the sinner in view of his penance is not in itself public and man's public penance is not, on its own, a palam absolvi. This expression obviously means more than: to deserve an intangible forgiveness by means of public penance. But how can forgiveness itself be tangible, if not by an act of the Church which expresses full fellowship and peace with God, in the same way as the enmity with God caused by serious sin was expressed by excommunication? Finally, Tertullian says that the ianua ignoscentiae which was once opened to him in [137] baptism is indeed closed to the baptized person who sins, but that the secunda paenitentia is offered to him by God in vestibulo as a door which gives the sinner who is knocking free access to the Church (patefaciat) (7,10). This image applies directly only to the access of the penitent who is knocking to penance in the church, since he is standing foris and desires to be invited in (cf. De pud. 3). Thus it is irrelevant whether this penance is envisaged as a single act or as a long-lasting exhomologesis. The access to penance in the Church signifies already, therefore, an opening of the ianua paenitentiae (De pud. 6). Nevertheless, according to Tertullian, it is quite clear that for him, even in his Montanist period, the access to this penance, the opening of the ianua paenitentiae, introduces a process which ends with an act of forgiveness by the Church. As a Montanist he refuses those guilty of sins of impurity access even to this penance (De pud.

[26] For further details cf. B. Poschmann, pp. 293-300.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

13).[27] If this penance did not necessarily end with a forgiveness by the Church, which the Montanist Tertullian will not admit with regard to impurity, it would be impossible to see why he refuses this penance, since, in his opinion, penance must certainly be done for these sins. The access to such a penance would in no way affect the divine privilege of the forgiveness of sins, which must be denied to the Church in the case of these sins. Thus the only reason why Tertullian refuses those guilty of sins of impurity access to church penance is that it necessarily, both previously and even according to his Montanist notions, concluded with an act of forgiveness by the Church. At the same time, he does in fact apply to church forgiveness yet other expressions which, in themselves, refer only to access to penance. This actually contradicts the very principles of Montanism, according to which penance and forgiveness by the Church are not necessarily any longer connected. When, for instance, he wishes to say that the Catholics grant church forgiveness to those who are guilty of sins of impurity, he formulates the idea as follows: this is a fornicationi quoque paenitentiae ianuam expandere (De pud. 6), a fornicationem paenitentia donare (9), a secundam paenitentiam promittere (20). In other words, even for Tertullian as Montanist access to actual church penance is so intimately and indissolubly connected with the idea of forgiveness by the Church that he has to deny access when he does not wish to grant forgiveness and when he formulates the refusal of the possibility of forgiveness in terms of the refusal or the possibility of access. In De paen. it is a question of access to [138] actual church penance for all sins. From what we have seen, this must be taken so unconditionally that this penance ends with an act of forgiveness by the Church. The penance in question here is the paenitentia secunda which, because of the concluding church forgiveness, stands in clear parallel to baptism, which makes God's own remission 'public' and which is already so symbolically connected with absolution by the Church that it can no longer be granted if this act of reconciliation by the Church is lacking. To this extent the ideas of Tertullian the Montanist represent the Catholics' argument: penance is meaningless, if venia is not granted by the Church (De pud. 3). This is a description of the ancient and traditional nature of church penance. Thus all sins for which Tertullian prescribes church penance in De paen. receive church forgiveness after the appropriate period of penance. All the sinners whom he here exhorts to penance ought to hope for venia, the pax of the Church and communicatio. Among the sins in question Tertullian counts the following: stuprum, idolothytorum esus, docere perversa (8,1). His exhortation to sinners and his justification of God's readiness to forgive are so general (8; 10,6 f.) that as far as he is concerned at this period in his life it is impossible for there to be sinners who would be totally ineligible for this church penance. His later division of sins in respect to a forgiveness by the Church into peccata remissibilia and irremissibilia (De pud. 2; 9; 12; 16) was not yet known to him at that time, despite his own reference to a change of opinion on the subject (1,10). It is to all sinners that he directs his instruction to re-enter the Church through the door of penance. This entrance through the paenitentia secunda (De paen. 7,10) which opens itself to the person who knocks is the access to forgiveness by the Church.

Finally, it needs to be underlined that the act of reconciliation is performed decisively by the bishop. It is a fact that according to De paen. the intercessory prayer, which as the prayer of Christ is bound to be heard, is the act of the whole Church, and that the bishop is not mentioned as having a special part in it (De paen. 9,4). The presbyteri, the cari Dei (confessors) and the brethren, who have been asked to make intercession, are all placed on [27] Correspondingly, the actual rite of public penance (presbyteris advolvi, caris Dei adgeniculari, omnibus fratribus legationes deprecationis suae iniungere: De paen. 9,4) is likewise no longer granted to those guilty of capital sins (De pud. 13), although such a penance, which, therefore, would not end in church forgiveness could no longer affect God's unique prerogative to forgive sins, once he has certainly allowed those guilty of capital sins to appear before the Church as penitents (De pud. 3,5).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the same level. Since it is here a question of obtaining everyone's intercession (Tertullian wishes to describe what the penitent himself has to do), there is no need to spotlight the bishop's role. Moreover, at that time the African Churches were clearly organized along the lines of a monarchical [139] episcopate. Tertullian himself in his Catholic period unambiguously testifies to the position of the episcopate as that of a church institution which receives its authority in virtue of the apostolic succession[28] and not merely of a function of a democratic community. There can be no doubt, therefore, that already at the time of De paen. the bishop had the decisive word in the reconciliation of the penitent. This is also evident from the fact that penance began with the excommunication of the sinner which was necessarily expressed by the bishop.[29] The reconciliation of a penitent with the Church must, accordingly, be primarily the prerogative of the bishop,[30] in the same way as baptism, considered as reception into the Church. In De pud. the role of the bishop is clear: he is the one who, through his potestas, makes church fellowship possible again for the sinner and who 'remits' sins.[31]

But, given this role of the bishop, what is the meaning of the co-operation of the whole community, as this is attested not only in De paen. but also in De pud.? Naturally the whole community intercedes with God on the sinner's behalf: for the Church ad remedium conlaboret necesse est and indeed through its intercession (De paen. 10,5). This act of intercession, which is considered the act of Christ himself, is the work of the Church as such, even if it is expressed in the activity of a particular community and in the prayer of individual Christians. When one considers that in Origen and still in Augustine[32] the Church as a holy community has a genuine part to play in the forgiveness of sins, and this without impugning the bishop's unique authority, even though this is no longer (or not so clearly) expressed 'liturgically', then one might well ask whether this intercessory prayer of the community represents a function of the Church which is even more fundamental than this intercession itself and can still operate even when this prayer is no longer present. It is because the whole Church as such has a significance for the forgiveness of the guilt of the individual sinner that it prays for him. This significance for the sinner's recovery of holiness, therefore, does not reside merely in the fact that the Church prays for him. This significance of the universal Church, representing Christ in the world (ecclesia vero Christus: De paen. 10,6) does not necessarily mean that the members of the community share in the sacramental and special [28] Hane episcopatus formam apostoli providentius condidereunt (De fuga 13,6). In the Catholic churches theme is an ordo episcoporum ita per successionem ab initio decurrens (De praescr. haer. 32). The question here is not whether Tertullian has done full justice to the nature of the episcopate in his ecclesiology. He does, however, testify to the existence in his time of an episcopate which had the final decision in all church questions and practice. Obedience to the bishop's teaching distinguishes Catholics from heretics (De praescr. haer. 42), the summus sacerdos has the right to baptize all others non tamen sine episcopi auctoritate (De bapt. 17). He also prepares the body and blood of the Lord and distributes them to the faithful (De idol. 7; De cor. 3); he lays down the rules for fasting (De ieiunio 13). Even the Montanists still maintain that excommunication resides in praesidentis officio (De pud. 14). Tertullian draws a sharp distinction between priests and the laity; the priest is servus maioris loci (De fuga 11,1) as opposed to the lay person, the servus minoris loci (De ieiunio 13).

[29] This is still the case in Tertullian's Montanist period, when he could hardly have had an interest in stressing the role of the bishop (De pud, 14). He leaves to the bishop disciplinae solius officia (De pud. 21,6). Cf. also Adv.Praxean 1, where the bishop of Rome refuses the litterae pacis to the Montanist communities in Asia and Phrygia.

[30] Also here what is important is only the fact and not the theological justification which Tertullian gives of this ius of the summus sacerdos.

[31] De pud. 1; 13; 21. At the same time, the bishop of Carthage is otherwise constantly singled out and attacked as an adversary.

[32] On Origen cf. 'The Penitential Teaching of Origen' in this volume. On Augustine cf. B. Poschmann, 'Die kirchliche Vermittlung der Sündenvergebung nach Augustin' in ZKTh 45 (1921), pp. 208-28; 405-32; 497-526 (esp. 413-20).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

power of the bishop (and even less that they have transmitted it to him). Even though he has received it as a special power through the apostolic [140] succession, that is, from Christ through the apostles, he can exercise it nevertheless as a power within the Church, that is, as an authority which is only at all thinkable and meaningful because the holy community of the redeemed exists in Christ. Thus the application of this power involves a participation in that Spirit which is the essential life of the Church and which cannot be received apart from the Church. In this sense it can be said: the Church forgives as a whole. Naturally this is to be understood not in the terms of an active competence which resided initially with the whole Church and was only subsequently transmitted to the bishops by the faithful, but rather as a permanent ability to sanctify. When this is applied to a sinner by a representative of the Church deputed by Christ for this task, then it is communicated to him as the sanctifying reality of the Church. There is an analogy in the Eucharist: only the priest has the power to offer the Eucharist. Nevertheless, he offers it only as the offering of the Church. The community shares in the offering, therefore, and needs to express that it really is a question of its own offering. Similarly, when the bishop forgives in virtue of his unique power the Spirit of the Church is again communicated to the sinner. But in order to express that this Spirit is the Spirit of the Church which from the incarnation onwards and in Christ's crucifixion has bound itself indissolubly with the Church[33] the whole community prays together with the bishop for the forgiveness of sins. The customary form of the sacrament of penance today would correspond to a priest's private mass,[34] that is to say, the co-operation of the whole Church in the celebration of this sacrament is no longer discernible liturgically. But even today, during the mass and on other occasions, the whole Church prays for the forgiveness of its faithful's guilt and thus expresses the fact that all forgiveness is a gift of its own Holy Spirit. This reflection cannot be based on Tertullian's writings. But it does provide a plausible explanation as to why one meets everywhere in these writings the idea that the forgiveness of sins by the bishop and the readmission of a sinner into the Church is connected liturgically with such a prayer by the community. These elements of a reconciliation liturgy are not something which even today's dogmatic theology can treat lightly. The dogmatic theologian ought to be able to see something more beyond the doubtless correct observation that the exclusive power of bishops and priests in the celebration of the sacrament of penance even in the sense in which [141] this sacrament was understood in Tertullian's time was not contested. Without wishing simply to revive the ancient penitential liturgy with its community prayer, he will recognize in this liturgy a reality which still belongs to this sacrament today and which deserves to be brought to the attention of Christians: that he finds reconciliation with God only because he receives in and from the Church that Spirit which lives there in all its holy members.

There is no basis in Tertullian for the idea that a sacramental absolution from sins was granted either before reconciliation with the Church or apart from it. To hold this would be a purely gratuitous assumption. It is with one and the same act that the bishop, at the conclusion of the performance of penance, lifts both the excommunication and the sins. This excommunication is by no means a mere act of discipline on the part of an external church organization. It is the expression of the relationship which exists between the sinner and the mystical but visible body of Christ (non posse corpus unius membri vexatione laetum agere; De paen. 10,5).

[33] Thus it becomes the Spirit of the Church, which it was not previously, so that there was not yet an actual sacrament in the New Testament sense.

[34] Naturally there are in general more practically important reasons for this form in the case of the sacrament of penance than in the case of the Eucharist.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

III. THE EFFECT OF PAENITENTIA

When Tertullian speaks about the effects of penance he is referring to penance as a whole, that is, comprising all the parts which we have just described. There is no justification, from either the dogmatic or the historical viewpoint, for separating these elements and ascribing the effects of penance to just one of them while considering the others mere conditions or unnecessary elaborations. Certainly in De paen. the penitent's subjective penance is emphasized. The ianua ignoscentiae of baptism, that is, of simple α!φεσιφ (as one may say with some caution)[35] is closed, and the sinner has, therefore, to expiate his further sins through intensive penance: he must pro delictis supplicare (11,2), mitigare God (9,2), reconciliare (11,3), aeterna supplicia expungere by means of his temporalis afflictio (9,5). All this must not only take place interiorly, within the individual's conscience. It must also [35] Cf. De paen. 2,6. A man must be purified already before baptism. This penance before baptism is a satisfacere (De paen. 5,9; De pud. 9). It is pretium for the merces of the baptismal grace (De paen. 6,4); it is compensatio for the remission of the punishment due to sin (ibid.). Despite Poschmann's claim (p. 288 n.1), Galtier, L'église et la rémission des péchés (Paris 1932), p. 51 f., was right on this point. The penance which Tertullian demanded before baptism may certainly be identical in some respects with the renunciation of sin and the exercise of Christian virtue (De paen. 6,1), and to this extent it is essentially less in evidence than penance for sins after baptism. This difference may be explained simply by the fact that for Tertullian the sins of a baptized Christian are by far the more serious (De paen. 7,12). Nevertheless, the effect of penance before baptism on sins and their punishment is described in such a way that it is difficult to consider it as a mere condition for the remission of sins which occurs at baptism, and only at baptism. Indeed, in De paen. 2,6 the relationship seems to be presented in such a way that it is the penance that remits the sins, while baptism subsequently admits the Holy Spirit into the soul which has already been purified for its dwelling. Similarly in De bapt. 6: the ablutio delictorum is granted through faith, and thus the way is opened for the superventurus Spiritus sanctas. According to De bapt. 13 baptism appears almost as a mere form and external covering of faith, legally prescribed in the New Testament period. It is really faith that effects salvation, even if this is no longer without its legal form in which it must be professed. Likewise in De paen. 6,17: the neophytes must come to baptism corde iam loti. This idea contradicts the affirmation of De paen. 6,9, in so far as theme the unrepentant neophyte receives through baptism (if this happens to be administered to him) not only the Holy Spirit (which is conceivable in view of an obscure idea of the relationship between freedom from sin and possession of the Spirit) but also the abolitio delictorum. All this only shows that in Tertullian baptism does not evince a clear relationship between the subjective and the sacramental factors, and that it would be fatuous to attempt to clarify this obscurity at any cost. It is possible to discern a Montanistic way of thinking in this 'subjectivism' (cf. K. Adam, Der Kirchenbegriff Tertullians [Paderborn 1907], pp. 111 ff., 219 ff.). But, in the final analysis, such ideas have their origin in the biblical and Catholic understanding that the sacrament does not replace or supplement man's interior act which he makes in faith and penance, but that both – each in its own dimension – can and must contribute to the proper relationship between man and God in grace. This is not to deny that Tertullian expresses the teaching which was already at least intimated before him by Hermas and later clearly attested that in the paenitentia secunda subjective penance plays a more important role than in baptism. It appears also in a somewhat exaggerated form in De pud. 10 to be contradicted by Tertullian. But this difference is not so great and clear as totally to obscure the sacramental nature of the paenitentia secunda as opposed to baptism, as if, in Tertullian's view, the latter were only an opus operatum, while the former were only an opus operantis. In both cases the effect of grace is ascribed freely now to the one, now to the other of the two concurrent factors, in the case of baptism more often and more explicitly to the sacramental aspect, in the paenitentia secunda more to the subjective aspect. Later theology will have the task of uniting both aspects in such a way that they both make their full contribution, while, at the same time, preserving the traditional distinction between baptism and post-baptismal penance.

Finally, in the historical interpretation of the penitential teaching of this time (for example in Cyprian too) we have to reckon, more than we have previously done, with the fact that remission of sin through penance and re-acquisition of the Spirit were not, for the theology of that time, so obviously one and the same event, but could be understood as two distinct and temporally separate events. If, in these circumstances, the remission of sins occurs through subjective penance (alone), this does not mean that the communication of the Spirit as such cannot be envisaged, even according to this theology, as being made through the imposition of hands at reconciliation or through the baptism of water. Cf., with regard to Origen, the corresponding essay in this volume.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

issue in an actual performance of penance (9,1). This penance is essentially church penance. Thus it would be futile and meaningless to wish to do it only privately and without exhomologesis in the Church. According to Tertullian, subjective penance itself only has a meaning as church penance. It is true that [142] the publicatio sui is also an external penance, but this in itself does not explain why sins can only be expiated by the performance of church penance. Tertullian does not give any reason for it; he just takes it for granted. It could be that only the effective intercessory prayer of the Church makes personal penance fruitful (10,6); but the mere support of the individual's prayer for forgiveness could hardly explain why penance must always be in the Church. Or perhaps penance is only effective because of the subsequent reconciliation with the Church. Both of these reasons reflect the same idea and are hardly distinguishable in Tertullian's way of looking at penance. In any case, according to him subjective penance is effective only in the Church and only public exhomologesis extinguishes hell (12,1). Thus one can neither separate these two aspects of penance nor play one off against the other.

This observation receives further confirmation from Tertullian's theology of the Church in his Catholic period.[36] The Church is the 'mother' of our life (cf. De orat. 2; Ad mart. 1; De praesr. 42). It is the ark of salvation (De bapt. 6) and its judgement is, therefore, a summum futuri iudicii praeiudicium (Apol. 39). What then are the effects of this unrepeatable penance?

1. The Pax with the Church

From the mere fact that excommunication belongs to the performance of penance it can be deduced that the first effect is renewed access to the fellowship of the Church. This is what the penitent prays for at the doors of the Church (De pud. 1,21; 3,5). The performance of penance ends with the recipere in communicationem (De pud. 15,5), with the communicare Ecclesiae (De pud. 3), concorporari Ecclesiae (De pud. 15,6) and is an in castra Ecclesiae reverti (De pud. 14), with the consequence that the penitent becomes a Christian again in the fullest sense (De pud. 10). It is a question, therefore, of a restoration of peace with the Church: pax ab ecclesiis redditur (De pud. 12,11).

2. Reconciliation with God

The parallel with baptism already implies that penance also means the remission of sins before God. It is, therefore, the second plank of [143] salvation, alongside baptism (De paen. 12,9), the secunda paenitentia after the original admission into the Christian community (De paen. 7,10). Already in Tertullian it amounts to a secunda post naufragium tabula, as Jerome later will call it (Epist. 130,9). Thus penance effects an absolvi before God (De paen. 10,8), a venia (De pud. 2; 3; 4; 10; 12) and a reconciliari (De paen. 7,14). By his sin the Christian has lost the baptismal grace;[37] by penance he has recovered it. Like the prodigal son he returns naked to his father, but he is welcomed back into grace (De paen. 8,6-8). He is presented with the vestis prior, the indumentum Spiritus Sancti, the signaculum lavacri and the substantia. . . sacramenti (De pud. 9,8-11).

From a consideration of the controversy with the Montanists it is obvious that the bone of contention (De pud. 3 and 21) was whether the Church possessed the power to forgive guilt

[36] Cf. K. Adam, Der Kirchenbegriff Tertullians (Paderborn 1907).
[37] De cultu feminarum II,1; De pat. 15; Ad mart. 1; De paen, 6,12 f.; 7,11; De pud. 9; 22, etc.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

before God. Nevertheless, we should try to understand more clearly how Tertullian connects what we have seen to be the two component elements of the one penance with the reconciliation with God and the forgiveness of guilt before God.

From the subjective viewpoint, the penitent pleads with God with his prayer for forgiveness and makes expiation for his sins by his penitential practices. These include the humiliation which he experiences by making his exhomologesis in the Church. It is by making satisfactio (De paen. 7,14; 8,9) that the sinner receives divine forgiveness. Quite apart from the fact that, according to Tertullian, grace did not enter into the possibility to make satisfaction, the relationship between subjective penance and the divine forgiveness is clear and understandable.

But how is the act of forgiveness on the Church's part related with the pardon before God? This question evokes two ideas in Tertullian which, superficially, appear irreconcilable. For, at first sight, they are two different theories on how the efficacy of the Church's acts is related with the remission of guilt before God.

The first idea is based on the infallibly efficacious prayer of the Church. When the Church and Christ himself in the Church pray for the sinner, the prayer is sure to be heard (De paen. 10,6 f.). This idea is also found still in De pud. (5; 13; 18,l3).[38] This prayer (facile impetratur semper, quod filius postulat) is, therefore, not merely an additional support of the sinner's personal prayer which, even with this support, is still not assured of success. Rather, it is connected essentially with the forgiveness of sins, so that this ad remedium [144] conlaborare (De paen. 10,5) on the Church's part is necessary. For this reason it should not occur in those cases where the Church knows for certain that God will not forgive (De pud. 19,28). Granted that the necessary conditions on the penitent's part are fulfilled, therefore, this intercessory prayer works automatically, that is, in virtue of its value as the prayer of Christ active in the Church. This theory does full justice to the sacramental aspect of penance; ευ0ξη/, like that of the anointing of the sick in James 5:15, can constitute the sacrament. This idea is only a reflection of the Church's intercession for sinners, as actually practiced, and in its turn it influenced the liturgy of the Church's forgiveness of sins. But this liturgy must have originated from the same basic ideas and thus shows that the theory is not merely Tertullian's private view, but has clear roots in the faith-consciousness of his day. The 'deprecative' form of absolution must not only still be possible but evokes a state of affairs which theology has a positive duty to elaborate, without, however, obscuring what is expressed by the indicative form of absolution. The full Latin liturgy of absolution which even today still combines both formulas is worth maintaining.

But there is in Tertullian yet another idea about the effectiveness of the Church's act for the remission of guilt before God. This is the theory of absolution. Nevertheless, it is only in De pud. that it is discernible as a Catholic teaching. Since, however, Tertullian is not contesting an innovation but attempting to justify his own standpoint, this theory was possibly indeed elaborated in the polemic against the Montanists, but it was already traditional in its essence.[39] It may even have been the more strongly accentuated by Tertullian himself in order

[38] The members of the community are often implored, as in De paen., to join in an intercession. The Christ who is presented as exorator patris in De pud. 19 is doubtless meant to be the one who is praying to the Father through the Church. Thus if he does not pray in the case of certain sins (De pud. 19), neither can the Church pray for the sinners in question (De pud. 19; 2). But if the Church-Christ prays (cf. De paen. 10,6), then the prayer is heard.

[39] The bishop preaches on the occasion of the reconciliation of penitents (cf. De pud. 13). This would provide the opportunity not only for a repudiation of those who contest penance but also to provoke reflection upon what has just happened. Given this, why was more attention given to the parable of the lost sheep (De pud. 13) than to Matt. 16:18 (De pud. 21)? Neither of these texts says anything explicitly about the extent of the possibility of the forgiveness of sins by the Church. Thus Matt. 16:18 could hardly be adduced simply in view of this question. In fact a decision on the extent of possible sins which could be remitted by church penance need not to facilitate his polemic, it being easier to attack the emphasized claim to a potestas. According to this theory, the Church's act is considered as the forgiveness of sins in the name, and in the place, of God. The Church has a ius (2 1,9), it can delicta donare (21), it has a potestas delicta donandi (21) and a delictorum eiusmodi remittendorum potestas (21). The bishop explains: ego . . . delicta paenitentia functis dimitto (1), he has the potestas solvendi et alligandi (21) and the fructus paenitentiae, the venia. . . in sua potestate (3). It is possible that in one or other of the passages mentioned it may only be the right to grant the peace of the Church, the forgiveness of guilt before the Church as such that is intended. But in general it is a question of the forgiveness of guilt before God in the [145] name and in the place of God. This power of binding and loosing is paralleled with the forgiveness of sins, the solvere alligata retro delicta which Peter exercised in baptism. The discussion between the Catholics and the Montanists turned around the question as to whether the bishops possess that power which was the original and unique prerogative of the Lord himself and which, according to Tertullian, only the prophets inspired immediately by his Spirit are able to exercise in his name (21). For Tertullian this power belongs so exclusively to God that he puts it on the same level as the ability to perform wonders in God's name (21). It is participation in the potestas Christi (22). This view may derive from his polemical stance. Nevertheless, throughout De pud. it is possible to discern a Catholic notion of the forgiveness of sins, according to which the bishop forgives guilt before God by absolution in God's name and as his representative.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is impossible to distribute these two ideas neatly between Tertullian's two writings. They are not only present in both writings, but they have the same weight in both cases. We can only conclude from this that Tertullian at least did not see a contradiction between the two ideas. We can, however, only surmise how they arc inter-related, so long as we confine ourselves to Tertullian's thinking. It is certain that, according to the second view, the Church's declaration, made with authoritative power, refers explicitly immediately to the forgiveness of guilt before God. But this does not necessarily exclude the existence of an intermediary between the act of the Church and the venia which, without being explicitly mentioned, binds the two moments together. The second view is correct, especially if there exists between the authoritative act of the Church and the forgiveness of guilt an essential and effective connection which is clear and objective. This connection would be expressed simply by the fact that this act of the Church forgives guilt. On this assumption Tertullian's middle term would be God's 'hearing' of the Church. In so far as, in the final analysis, guilt is forgivable by God alone (only he can restore the lost baptismal grace and definitively re-bestow his purely gratuitous love on man), the act on the Church's part is never something which God needs or which renders his own action superfluous, but is related to God's 'hearing' of the Church's prayer. With regard to man, however, this action of the Church necessarily be reached in the Catholic sense only by stressing the potestas donandi delicta (the Catholics could just as easily have said: the Church can and ought to pray in the case of all sins). Thus it is not easy to see why this theory of absolution had its origin only in the Montanist controversy. Much less is it possible to hold, with Poschmann (p. 345), that Tertullian invented this theory 'in order to be able to challenge more effectively this "power" claimed by the officials of the Church'. Indeed, the Catholics themselves often appealed to Matt. 16. If they say, according to De pud. 21: sed habet potestatem ecclesia delicta donandi, and Tertullian 'expects' this objection 'as self-evident' (Poschmann), this objection being formulated precisely in the terms of the second theory, then Tertullian cannot be the inventor of this theory. He would have found it easier to contest the forgivable character of sins of impurity if he had not had to contend with this theory. Nevertheless, granted that it already existed and, therefore, had to be contested, it is quite possible that he, for his part, presented it in a very much accentuated form, so that he could contest it the more easily. Poschmann considers that this potestas is conceivable only if it coincides directly with forgiveness by God, which as such is possible only in a prophet who is immediately inspired by God. Accordingly, the whole notion must originate in Tertullian's spiritual view of the Church. But the power in question need not necessarily be viewed in this way; Tertullian's explanation could be a polemical artifice on his part. This does not mean, however, that the Catholics, for their part, did not claim that they could forgive sins 'in the name' or 'in the power' of God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which is heard by God is the word addressed authoritatively [146] to him in God's name.[40] It is this word which achieves forgiveness and gives man assurance of this forgiveness. Thus, in forgiving sins, the Church remains always in dependence upon God and his action. But the merit of the second view is that it does make clear that the Church really can do this in God's name. Both views express the same realities but in different terms. Both views finally make the same point. Thus for Tertullian they must have been connected and complemented each other. Certainly he must have had a more or less clear idea on this subject. In fact as much as, during his Montanist period, he contested the validity of the Church's power and prayer with regard to capital sins, he did not do so earlier, even though the second theory must have been known to him. And even as a Montanist he clearly allowed this power to the bishop in respect of the leviora delicta (De pud. 18,18). This would be illogical for a Montanist as such, since according to the fundamental conviction of this movement it is only individual, inspired prophets who arc able to forgive sins in God's name (De pud. 21). But for Tertullian, who developed even further this fundamental conviction, it shows that the theory of the bishop's power to forgive sins is no novelty, which he would certainly not have invented in this question. Thus he must have had some idea of how this view could be combined with the other theory of the infallibly efficacious prayer of the Church in Christ for the forgiveness of sins by God alone.

3. The Inter-Relationship between Both Effects of the Church's Act

With this 'harmonization' of the views on the way in which the act on the Church's part is related with the forgiveness of guilt before God all the relevant questions are still not yet solved. The Church's act of reconciliation achieves both pax with the Church and venia before God. But how are the pax cum ecclesia and the venia before God related with each other?

Obviously pax is only to be granted when God is ready to pardon. Tertullian bases his argument on this point: because God does not grant venia, neither must the Church give pax (De pud. 12). Thus the Church's judgement is only a praeiudicium of God's definitive judgement (Apol. 39), since the Church's decision can be erroneous.[41] Moreover, we have already noted that the Church's judgement [147] brings about the remission of guilt before God in association with the penitent's penance and is not a mere external act of church discipline which lifts the excommunication.

Nevertheless, it is precisely this 'power', considered as the authority to reconcile with the Church, that is questioned in De pud. For it is precisely in this work, where Tertullian as Montanist still holds out the absolute possibility of a forgiveness before God in the next life for those guilty of capital sins, that he contests the right of the Church to grant the pox of the Church and communicatio to such a sinner (3). At the same time, the Catholics take it for granted that this pax and communicatio include the pardon of sins before God, that is the actual fruit of penance, since they consider that penance without this pax is futile. According to the notions at that time, therefore, on the one hand, the pax cannot be identified simply with the forgiveness of guilt before God. Otherwise, Tertullian would have no cause to reject the granting of the pax while holding out the prospect of a venia before God, at least in the next life. On the other hand, both arc essentially related in such a way that the pax ought not to be considered a mere external formality of church law, since then the Catholics would not be able to hold that without pax penance has no effect. In so far as the Church's judgement is [40] God has in fact promised the Church that he will hear it.

[41] Cf. the analogy with baptism according to De paen. 6,10.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

considered as praeiudicium of God's judgement, the humana pax (De pud. 3) must, therefore, be the actual effective cause of reconciliation with God. Only as such does it precede this reconciliation as praeiudicium, is distinct from it (as the cause is from the effect) but is nevertheless indissolubly connected with it.

The act of reconciliation performed by the bishop brings about the forgiveness of sins by means of the reconciliation of the sinner with the mystical but visible body of Christ.[42] Only in this way is it possible to understand why what seems to pertain to mere 'church law and discipline', that is 'public penance', is presented as being so inextricably linked with the reality of the sacrament.

But there still remains the further question of how the notion of peace with the Church is to be understood more precisely as the middle point between the act of the Church and the forgiveness of guilt before God. Moreover, the view that the content of the Church's act is, first and foremost, the granting of peace with the community of the Church, has to be related with those two notions concerning the forgiveness of guilt by the Church which we have [148] distinguished and attempted to reconcile. The first question could be answered simply by saying that the peace with the Church is a condition that man's subjective penance will be met by God with the forgiveness of guilt. In this case this peace would be in no way causally related with the forgiveness of guilt. It would be merely the external condition for the possible effectiveness of man's subjective penance, as the unique cause on his side, and for the acceptance of the performed satisfactio for forgiveness on God's side. This is Poschmann's solution (p. 345). It commends itself by its clarity and does full justice to Tertullian's stress on subjective penance as the cause of the forgiveness of guilt before God. Nevertheless it neglects other aspects of his overall view. In fact, even when it is a question of the effects of baptism (the sacrament), he ascribes the same efficacy (at least in part) to man's subjective action, yet without in any way contesting that baptism itself is the real cause. Indeed, one ought to say rather that he has a too 'materialistic' view of the causality of the baptismal rite.[43] But this does not mean that, according to Tertullian, the subjective acts of the person being baptized arc merely the external condition for the effectiveness of baptism, simply because even as a ritual baptism possesses a causal efficacy with regard to baptismal grace. Similarly, with regard to penance, it does not follow that the peace with the Church is merely a condition, just because subjective penance affects the forgiveness of guilt.

What is more, Tertullian ascribes to the Church a potestas donandi delicta, an idea which would be meaningless if this activity were a mere precondition for the donare delicta which would never be performed by the Church. It seems, therefore, that in Tertullian, where it is a question of the paenitentia secunda, the same effects are ascribed to both the subjective and the church factors, with a particular stress on the former. The later theory which attempts to justify both factors as the cause of the effectiveness of penance ought also to be a valid and clear interpretation of Tertullian's teaching. In any case the peace with the Church cannot be construed as a mere external and juridical precondition and presupposition for the forgiveness of guilt. Such a view assumes a too external and juridical notion of the church community which obviously conflicts with Tertullian's own vision.[44] Only if the Church is understood as a purely external organization can belonging to it be considered a mere precondition for the possession of the Spirit which removes guilt. Now [149] for Tertullian the Church is more than a mere confessional organization. It is vera mater viventium (De anima 43), the corpus [42] Following de la Taille and Xiberta, this view is still defended in modern theology by B. Poschmann, 'Die innere Structur des Busssakraments' in: MThZ 1 (1950) no. 3, pp. 12-31.

[43] Cf. De bapt. 4: supervenit enim statim spiritas de coelis et aquis superest sanctificans eas de semetipso et ita sanctificatae vim sanctificandi combibunt.
[44] Cf. K. Adam, Den Kirchenbegriff Tertullians (Paderborn 1907), pp. 88-95; J. C. Plumpe, Mater Ecclesia. An Inquiry into the Church as Mother in Early Christianity (Washington 1943), pp. 45-62.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Christi (De bapt. 6), so that it is there where the Trinity is (De spect. 25; De bapt. 15; Adv. Marc. III 24). Nevertheless, in his Catholic period Tertullian does not place the Church on the same level as the Spirit itself (as he does almost in De pud. 21), but he considers it at the same time as the ecclesia quam . . . Apostoli struxerant (De bapt. 11; cf. De virg. vel. 2: the una ecclesia is the unity of the Churches quas et ipsi Apostoli vel apostolici viri condiderunt). If the Church is thus considered 'as a physical means of grace, like a secondary source of grace',[45] then Tertullian would hardly view belonging to it as a mere external precondition of grace. The fact that the peace with the Church granted by a church official is no guarantee for fellowship with God by grace does not contradict this notion. Such a possibility of a sacrament being valid but fruitless is verifiable in other instances. And this does not prevent Tertullian from having a very realistic view of the effect of baptism.

The second question is rather more difficult to answer. If insertion into the fellowship of the Church, itself being seen as a means of grace, is to some extent a middle member between the Church's act of the reconciliation of a penitent and the forgiveness of sin before God, how does this idea fit into the thought of an act of the Church as the forgiveness of guilt? Tertullian seems to suggest the second idea which we discussed above well before he expressed the idea of the role of an intermediary. But this idea, with its theory of 'absolution', does not exclude an 'intermediary' between the act of the Church and the remission of guilt, that is, God's hearing of the Church's prayer. In discussing the question of the meaning of the whole Church's intercessory prayer, we have already seen that this ought to be viewed as the expression of a profound reality, that is, of the fact that the Spirit which remits sins is the Spirit of this Church and can be received only in it and from it considered as a whole. Granted all these notions, we can bring all the elements of our question together: the bishop's official act receives the sinner back into the organism of grace that is the Church, and in this way the sinner again becomes a member, so that the Church, as the body of Christ, can concern itself about his salvation. Thus the Church both suffers and Prays for his salvation. And by suffering with and praying for the sinner in its Spirit the Church is 'heard by God'. It also allows this [150] Spirit to take possession of this, its member, once more and in this way reconciles him with God. It does not matter whether these images fit together harmoniously, as long as they show how the individual elements affect the whole reality. Each image represents only a part of this total reality and spotlights only one aspect of the whole event. Taken together, they present a more adequate view of the subject, than when, for the sake of greater clarity, attention is centred on one alone. In so far as it is the actual bearer of the Spirit, the Church is the indispensible mediator of grace. Thus reconciliation with God necessarily presupposes a reconciliation of the sinner with the Church, into which he has to be reincorporated. This is penance considered as reconciliation with the Church. Once he is again newly incorporated, the penitent experiences the Spirit in the Church. He benefits from the participation which the Church has had in his condition by its suffering and intercession. The Church gives him its Spirit, which always remains a grace (even with regard to the Church as a whole), even if it is inalienably its Spirit, in so far as the Church lives indissolubly united with Christ. This is church penance considered as the answered prayer of the church community for the sinner. It is through this prayer that he recovers, as his own possession, the Spirit, the indumentum Spiritus sancti, the signaculum lavacri (De pud. 9,11), and that his guilt is remitted. This is church penance considered as the absolution of guilt by the Church.

In conclusion, it may still be asked how the penitent's subjective penance is related to this whole procedure. Without a doubt, Tertullian considered the penance of personal satisfaction too exclusively as the work of man alone. But how is this subjective penance supported by [45] Cf. K. Adam, p. 89.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the Spirit of God, which is the Spirit of the Church? Tertullian seems to have conceived this aspect of penance too much like the Stoics or the Semi-Pelagians as the work of man himself.[46] Nevertheless, in De paen. 10,6 he does state that Christ himself operates also in the repentant sinner and not only in the community, for whose help he is pleading: non potest corpus de unius membri vexatione laetum agere . . . in uno et altero ecclesia est, ecclesia vero Christus.[47] Thus both the Church and Christ live already in the penitent and in his penance. If he seeks grace, returns to the Church and asks for its Spirit, then he is already influenced by the Spirit and considered a member of the Church who is asking for unity with the whole body of the Church and healing from his guilt. Tertullian [151] indicates here that even man's subjective penance, which appears to deserve forgiveness so independently, is to be understood as the work of Christ's body, accomplished by the Spirit. All that remains is for the whole of penance to be seen as one event, both personal and ecclesial, as the activity of man and the act of Church. But this enterprise was accomplished – and even then only for a short time – by Thomas Aquinas.[48]

[46] This is still the case with Cyprian, whereas with Origen it is different. In Origen subjective penance appears to be the expression of the grace of the interior, purifying fire of judgement. Cf. the author's relevant essay in this volume.

[47] Hans v. Campenhausen, p. 249 n. 2, interprets this passage differently, referring the in uno et altero to the members of the community who have 'remained holy'. But he does not justify this interpretation.

[48] According to Thomas the acts of the penitent are an interior part of the essential matter of the sacrament itself. Indeed, for him they arc the more self-evident part, so that all that he has actually to prove is that the priestly absolution as such contributes effectively to the remission of sins. On the whole, even where Thomistic terminology is maintained, the Scotist view has prevailed: the action of the penitent is still only a precondition and no longer an essential part of the sacrament.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation [152]

6

THE PENITENTIAL TEACHING OF CYPRIAN OF CARTHAGE[1]

So much has already been written about the penitential teaching of Cyprian of Carthage[2] that there is hardly any hope of saying something new on the subject in this present study. Nevertheless, even today a detailed and comprehensive treatment of this topic need not be entirely superfluous. There is a whole range of disputed points which it can discuss precisely and by showing their relevance. It can highlight certain forgotten themes (e.g. the question of the penitential liturgy), take a fresh look at questions which have been overlooked and attempt to give a bird's-eye view of the whole of Cyprian's penitential teaching. The scope given to the present study means, however, that no consideration will be allotted to the question which has been treated often and in detail, namely, whether in Cyprian's time, and because of his influence, there was a notable relaxation in the Church's penitential discipline. In the present essay the penitential discipline in Cyprian's time in North Africa and Rome is of less concern than is the penitential liturgy and his corresponding theology.

I. THE EXTERNAL FORM: THE PENITENTIAL LITURGY

Cyprian's writings do not present an essentially different picture of the form of penance from that which is already discernible in Tertullian. [153][3] It is usually possible to distinguish three stages[4] in the penitential process as a whole: the performance of penance (paenitentiam agere; delicta expiare), the 'exhomologesis' (exhomologesim facere; ad exhomologesim venire), the reconciliation by the imposition of hands on the part of the bishop (and of the clergy).[5] What appears to be most important is that these three stages always occur in this order.

---

[1] The original form of this revised essay appeared in ZKTh 74 (1952), pp. 257-76, 381-438.

[2] A list of the most important works up to 1940 will be found in B. Poschmann, Paenitentia Secunda (Bonn 1940), p. 369. Poschmann himself (pp. 368-424) provides the most precise presentation of the history of the penitential question during the persecution of Decius and in Cyprian's theology of penance up to that time. Later works: J. Köhne, 'Zur Frage der Busse im christlichen Altertum' in: ThGl 35 (1943), pp. 26-36; G. H. Joyce, 'Private Penance in the Early Church' in: JThS 42 (1941), pp. 18-42 (for Tertullian, Cyprian, Origen); J. H. Taylor, 'St. Cyprian and the Reconciliation of Apostates' in: ThSt 3 (1942), pp. 27-46; F. de Saint-Palais d'Aussac, La réconciliation des hérétiques dans l'Eglise latine (Paris 1943); J. Grotz, Die Entwicklang des Bussstufenwesens in der vornicänischen Kirche (Freiburg/Br. 1955), pp. 73-171; S. Hübner, 'Kirchenbusse und Excommunication bei Cyprian' in: ZKTh 84 (1962), pp. 49-84, 171-215; B. Altaner/A. Stuiber, Patrologie (Freiburg/Br. 1966), p.180; K. Baus, Von der Urgemeinde zur frühchristliche Grosskirche (HdKG I) (Freiburg/Br. 1962), pp. 373-6; J. Quasten, Patrology II (Utrecht 1953), pp. 380-1; H. von Campenhausen, Kirchliches Amt and geistliche Vollmacht in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten (Tübingen 1963), pp. 310-18.

[3] Cf. 'Tertullian's Theology of Penance' in this volume.

[4] These stages arc to be understood differently from those which J. Grotz describes with the expression 'stages of penance'. In his study J. Grotz draws a distinction between a purely canonical stage prior to the actual church penance, the so-called penance of satisfaction, which was to be performed outside the community of the Church, and the actual sacramental penance ('exhomologesis'), the 'actual church penance', which was to be performed essentially within the community. Between the two Grotz inserts the place of the communicatio, which is not the conclusion of church penance but the prerequisite for its beginning in the proper sense. Thus, according to Grotz, the communicatio is quite different from the pax which was granted only at the end of the penitential process. This thesis is contested above all by S. Hübner, who gives a precise analysis of the basic ideas in Cyprian's theology of penance.

[5] Cf. Epist. 15,1; 16,2; 17,2; 59,13; De lapsis 16.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

1. The Performance of Penance

It is easy to understand what is meant by paenitentiam agere. It is a matter of works of penance by which the sinner, on his part, attempts to reconcile himself with God. It is like satisfacere and satisfactio, which consists in prayer, fasting, wearing penitential garb, abstaining from baths, renouncing pleasures, carrying out vigils, sleeping on a hard bed, almsgiving, etc.[6] In so far as this penance is performed at the Church's instigation (cf. De lapsis 32), and to the extent that, of its very nature, it is observable publicly in the life of the Church and is accompanied and supported by the prayer of the Church, this penance is not only a purely subjective, 'private' penance of the sinner, but also a public act of the Church, even if it is considered as the activity of the sinner himself.[7] This also follows from the fact that, with regard both to its necessary duration and its sufficient intensity, this penance is subject to the Church's judgement. During the time of his penance the penitent is naturally excluded from the Eucharist. According to Cyprian this is obviously a direct effect of sin itself and does not require a specific act on the Church's part. In his view those sinners who have not been the subject of a specific act on the Church's part (cf. De lapsis 25 f.) receive the Eucharist unworthily.

2. The Exhomologesis

Cyprian always introduces exhomologesis as the second stage of the whole penitential process. He does indeed recognize a wider meaning of the word which, according to its etymology, signifies simply 'confession' in the widest sense (De test. III 114; De lapsis [154] 31.28). But the usage of the word in these passages makes it clear that it is not a question of the specific, technical sense of the term (exhomologesis conscientiae; exhomologesim Deo facere).[8] In its technical sense the word always signifies the second stage of the penitential process, and when he uses it Cyprian means neither the whole process nor an introductory confession in view of penance before the bishop.[9] When, in danger of death, the first stage, that is, the sinner's performance of penance, has perforce to be omitted, either totally or partially, the exhomologesis is obviously the first stage to occur. But this does not change its nature. Consequently, even in this context (Epist. 18,1; 19,2) the word cannot assume another meaning. It is easy to understand from Tertullian what exhomologesis is. According to him exhomologesis means the sinner's performance of penance, in so far as it is carried out publicly in the Church, that is, the 'liturgical' acts. This is because a 'confession' that one had sinned is necessarily connected with these 'liturgical' acts, even if the sins in question are not individually and explicitly made known to the community. Cyprian emphasizes the 'liturgical' character of exhomologesis more than does Tertullian. For him, therefore, exhomologesis is that part of the penitential process which takes place before the community. In every case it occurs immediately before the reconciliation by means of the imposition of [6] Cf. De lapsis 24.30.35 etc.

[7] This is not made sufficiently clear in J. Grotz, p. 73 if. On this cf. S. Hübner, p. 71ff.
[8] It is precisely this strict, technical sense of 'exhomologesis' that J. Grotz ought to have considered. Nevertheless, he derives (p. 132 ff.) his understanding only from the interpretation of this notion in the wide, general sense, as it is found in B. Poschmann and others.
[9] Contrary to the view of J. Grotz, according to which the original meaning of 'exhomologesis', 'confession', must have been that of today's confession. It is then only gradually that this notion developed to become church penance in the strict sense.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

hands. A clear idea of this can be gathered from Tertullian: the sinner prays for reconciliation on bended knee before the bishop, the clergy and the community. It is not clear, however, whether this happened frequently during the time of penance or whether it is just a matter of the unrepeatable beginning of the whole rite of reconciliation. The above-mentioned passages (cf. also Epist. 4,4) all give the impression that the exhomologesis occurs immediately before the reconciliation. Also, in the reconciliation of the sick, where the exhomologesis certainly occurs only once (Epist. 18,1; 19,2; 20,3), it is presented in exactly the same way as for the usual performance 01 penance in the Church. One must assume, therefore, that in fact it took place only at the end of the time of penance or that – to put it more precisely and cautiously – liturgical works of penance and blessings of the penitent during the time of penance were not called exhomologesis. It is possible to prove the existence of such acts before the actual exhomologesis from Tertullian's writings. Even in Cyprian's time they must have existed, at least in so far as the [155] penitent had his special place in vestibulo ecclesiae, and thus, because of his place, his dress and his non-participation in the Eucharist during the celebration of the liturgy was known as a penitent.[10]

If, therefore, the exhomologesis in Cyprian does not mean the confession before the bishop, there can still be no doubt (as even Koch[11] admits) that a confession of the sinner before the bishop precedes the introduction to the official performance of penance. In Epist. 55,29 there is a distinction made between confessio and exhomologesis. Unless this is a mere tautology, then the confessio must be understood as distinct from the exhomologesis, that is, as referring to that confession which is made before the bishop at the introduction of penance. In De lapsis 28 there is explicit mention of an apud sacerdotes Dei dolenter et simpliciter confiteri. Even if it is not sure here whether in fact an actual church penance ensued, other cases where there was such a penance must have involved a previous confession. This is evident from the fact that penance had to be done for secret sins[12] and that the examinare causas singulorum (Epist. 55,6) and the establishment of the iustum tempus for penance (Epist. 17,2; 64,1) was not possible without a confession of the precise guilt.

Of its very nature, therefore, the penitential process had to begin with an actual confessio before the bishop. In the case of a sin which was already known, this confessio may have been quite informal. But it is no way proven that the exhomologesis before the reconciliation included a detailed confession of guilt, even when this guilt was not publicly known. Nevertheless, at the time of reconciliation the people had to express its opinion and give its agreement (Epist. 64,1), and thus the duration of penance and the completed performance of penance was publicly established at the exhomologesis: exhomologesis fit inspecta vita eius, qui agit paenitentiam (Epist. 17,2). It is difficult to see precisely how the fulfilment of the conditions for reconciliation was established at the exhomologesis, whether on the basis of the penitent's own testimony or through the testimonies of others. The procedure may be imagined along the lines of the examinations before baptism, when the catechumen and witnesses are questioned by the bishop and his clergy about the life of the candidate during the time of preparation for baptism [13]

[10] Cf. also Epist. 30,8, where in the case of Rome a professa frequenter . . . detestatio factorum is presupposed in the penitent. This must refer to the time prior to his illness.
[11] H. Koch, Cyprianische Untersuchungen (Bonn 1926), p. 280.
[12] According to Epist. 4,4 and De lapsis 28, a secret sin of thought, by which a person toyed with the idea of renouncing his faith, was not necessarily exempted from church penance.
[13] Sponsors are already attested in Tertullian and certainly do not pertain primarily to the baptism of infants (cf. De bapt. 18). In any event, before Cyprian in the Paradosis of Hippolytus there is clear evidence of the custom that a Christian had to verify that the neophyte had led a life according to the principles of Christianity during the time of his catechumenate. Cf. E. Dick, 'Das Pateninstitut im altchristlichcn Katechumenat' in: ZKTh 63 (1939), pp. 1-49. In view of Cyprian's demand that the confessors should carefully examine penitents with regard to the kind and gravity of their guilt, their seriousness to do penance, the length of their penance, etc.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[156]

3. Reconciliation by the Imposition of Hands

The third stage is the reconciliation through the imposition of hands[14] by the bishop. Cyprian is the West's first witness to the fact that this reconciliation, the meaning and effect of which will be discussed later, occurs through an imposition of hands. The same rite occurs earlier in Origen (In Levit. horn. 2,4),[15] and the Didascalia Apostolorum (II 18,7; 41,2; 43,1) already in the first half of the third century recognizes such an imposition of hands as self-evident in Syria. Thus it could not have originated in Africa but is considerably older than Cyprian, even if 1 Timothy 5:22 is left out of consideration as a reasonable witness for it.[16] According to Cyprian the bishop and the clergy impose hands.[17] This counts as an imposition of hands in paenitentiam (Epist. 15,1, etc.). In the East this is accompanied by an anointing of the sinner.[18] But Cyprian shows no evidence of this for the West and it must have been totally missing there. Also at the time of Cyprian the imposition of hands was naturally accompanied by a prayer, as Tertullian already mentions – although not in close, connection with the concluding rite of reconciliation. This prayer is the intercession of the Church for the forgiveness of guilt and for the re-bestowal of the Holy Spirit which was lost through sin and which remits the guilt by its return. The last point becomes still more clear in Cyprian. In the Didascalia Apostolorum (II 41) there is also evidence for the intercession of the whole community on the occasion' of the imposition of hands.

A) THE ORIGIN OF THE RITE

What is the origin of the imposition of hands as a rite of reconciliation? This is a relevant question, regardless of whether this gesture was used already in the beginning (1 Tim. 5:22) or only later in reconciliation. It is a question which can be subdivided into two further questions, although historically they may coincide with each other. In the first place, is the imposition of hands intended as Confirmation? And then it should be asked: if it is not to be understood as an actual Confirmation, then what meaning does it have? It could at least be modelled on the administration of Confirmation, or it must have an entirely different origin. The usual imposition of hands in penance (that is, where it is not a matter of the reconciliation of heretics) is generally considered an independent rite which is comprehensible [157] in itself without further explanation. All that is normally asked is before recommending them to the bishop for reconciliation (Epist. 15,3), it is probable that competent witnesses like the confessors were employed at the exhomologesis to ascertain that the penance had actually been done (cf. Epist. 26). This would be analogous with the questioning of witnesses from the clergy and the people about the worthiness of a candidate for ordination (Epist. 38,1).

---

[14] The designation of the imposition of the hand as a 'rite of reconciliation' ought in no way to predetermine its meaning. It merely expresses the fact that after this last penitential act the penitent is once more allowed access to the Eucharist as a complete Christian. It is not yet decided whether the imposition of the hand is only the last penitential act or the solemn juridical granting of the pax. The manus impositio always had to be performed by the imposition of the right hand, since manus is always used in the singular. Cf. for example B. J. Bohm, Die Handauflegung im Urchristentum (Leipzig 1911), pp. 82, n.1; 87, n.; 98 f. J. A. Jungmann, Die lateinischen Bussriten (Innsbruck 1932), p. 36.

[15] Origen here inserts into the passage of Jas. 5:14 the phrase imponant ei manus and appears to refer the text not to the anointing of the sick but to the previously clearly described penance. Cf. J. Coppens, L'imposition des mains (Paris 1925), p. 41 f. Cf. also the relevant details in the essay in this volume on Origen's penitential teaching.

[16] Cf. P. Galtier, Aux origines du sacrement de la pénitence (Rome 1951), pp. 95-106.

[17] Cf. Epist. 15,1; 16,2; 17,2; 18,1; 19,2; 20,3; 71,2; De lapsis 16; Sent. episc. 8.22.

[18] Cf. J. Coppens, p. 377.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

whether the imposition of hands in the reconciliation of heretics is identical with the usual reconciliation or with Confirmation. Moreover, the question is posed in this way on the supposition of our modern theological awareness, according to which it is taken for granted that Confirmation cannot be repeated. Thus Confirmation can naturally have no relevance for the (usual) reconciliation of penitents. Apart from this presupposition, however, a simple glance at the rite suggests that the imposition of hands in the reconciliation of heretics cannot be so clearly distinguished from that used in the usual reconciliation of other penitents. At the same time, there exist close relationships between this imposition of hands and that used in Confirmation. The problem posed by these relationships is universally recognized. For these reasons, we consider it methodologically correct to pose our first question.

B) THE IMPOSITION OF HANDS AND CONFIRMATION?

This is the answer to this question:[19] At the time of Cyprian the imposition of hands in penance is not simply the imposition of hands used in Confirmation. These rites are to be distinguished clearly from each other. As proof of this assertion it should be observed first of all that the institution of penance existed long before the middle of the third century, without this reconciliation with the Church as a community of grace being in any way considered the repetition of a sacramental act of Christian initiation. Quite on the contrary, it needs to be underlined that in the early Church baptism and Confirmation are so tightly bound together[20] in the one rite of initiation that it is very difficult to distinguish within this rite two distinct sacraments. In this regard, it can be said that in Paul's baptismal theology (as distinct from that of the Acts of the Apostles),[21] which was stronger in the East than in the West, 'baptism' has the comprehensive meaning of the one Christian initiation which includes together both baptism and the bestowal of the Spirit associated with Confirmation in the modern senses. Now one of the basic principles of the theology of penance, as this is evinced already in Hermas and Tertullian, is that 'baptism', that is, precisely the whole rite of Christian initiation is unrepeatable and once-and-for-all. A later metanoia is, therefore, something quite different. Already, for this reason, it is quite unlikely that the conclusion of the Church's penitential process [158] should be conceived as the actual repetition of a part of Christian [19] Further literature on this question: P. Galtier, 'Absolution ou Confirmation? La réconciliation des hérétiques' in: RSR 5 (1914), pp. 201-35, 339-94 (on Cyprian: 342-51), 507-44. P. Galtier, 'Imposition des mains' in: DThC VII (Paris 1923), pp. 1397-408; A. d'Alès, La théologie de S. Cyprien (Paris 1922), pp. 237-48; J. Coppens, L'imposition des mains (Paris 1922), pp. 374-92; F. de Saint-Palais d'Aussac, La réconciliation des hérétiques dans l'Eglise latine (Paris 1943). Galtier and Coppens contain numerous references to previous literature.

[20] This connection, however, must have been much clearer in the East than in the West.

[21] On these differences in the theology of Christian initiation between Paul and the Acts of the Apostles, which represented the starting-point for the difference in the theology of Confirmation between the East and the West, cf.: P. Galtier, 'La consignation à Carthage et à Rome' in: RSR 2 (1911), pp. 350-83; id., 'La consignation dans les églises d'Occident' in: RHE 13 (1912), pp. 257-301; id., 'Onction et confirmation' in: RHE 13 (1912), pp.467-76; id., 'Imposition des mains' in: DThC VII (Paris 1923), pp. 1319-24; 1343-93; P. de Puniet, 'La liturgie baptismale en Gaule avant Charlemagne' in: RQH 28 (1902), pp. 382-423; id., 'Onction et confirmation' in: RHE 13 (1912), pp. 450-66; id., 'Confirmation' in: DACL III, pp. 2515-43; C. Ruch, 'Confirmation dans la sainte Ecriture' in: DThC III (Paris 1908), pp. 975-1026; G. Bareille, 'Confirmation d'après les Pères grecs et latins' in: DThC III (Paris 1908), pp. 1026-58; J. Coppens, L'imposition des mains (Paris 1925); J. B. Umberg, Die Schriftlehre vom Sakrament der Firmung (Freiburg/Br. 1920); J. B. Jugie, Theologia dogmatica christianorum orientalium III (Paris 1930), pp. 126-44; B. Welte, Die postbaptismale Salbung (Freiburg/Br. 1939); H. Elfers, Die Kirchenordnung Hippolyts von Rom (Paderborn 1938), pp. 101-60; id., 'Gehört die Salbung mit Chrisma im ältesten abendländischen Initiationsritus zur Taufe oder zum Firmung?' in: ThGl 34 (1942), pp. 334-41; D. van den Eynde, 'Notes sur les rites postbaptisnaux dans les églises d'occident' in: Antonianum 14 (1939), pp. 257-76; E. Dekkers, Tertullianus en de geschiednis der liturgie (Brussels/Amsterdam 1947), pp. 197-205.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

initiation. Although the second metanoia does indeed restore the (partial) loss of the effects of Christian initiation, this penance is, nevertheless, only a substitute for, and an addition to, baptism as a whole. It is, therefore, not a repetition of a part of Christian initiation and was in this sense conceived as a 'second' baptism by Hermas, Tertullian and the Didascalia Apostolorum.

Furthermore, in the very place where, apart from in Cyprian, the imposition of hands is clearly mentioned, namely, in the Didascalia Apostolorum,[22] this penitential rite is indubitably distinguished from Confirmation. Although in this passage Confirmation still appears to be administered by means of a simple imposition of hands without an anointing (II 32,3),[23] the author places the imposition of hands of penance in parallel not with the imposition of hands after baptism[24] but with baptism itself (II 41): quemadmodum igitur gentilem baptizas ac postea recipis, ita et huic (the penitent) manum impones, omnibus pro eo precantibus, ac deinde eum introduces et participem facies ecclesiae, et erit ei in loco baptistmi impositio manus; namque aut per impositionem manus aut per baptismum accipiunt participationem Spiritus Sancti. The bestowal of the Spirit as the effect of both rites (baptism and the penitential imposition of hands) is the same. It is indeed self-evident, then as today, that the forgiveness of sins is achieved through the communication of the Holy Spirit. But what is striking is that baptism and the penitential imposition of hands are compared with each other. Certainly it could be said that 'baptism' is a comprehensive notion which also includes the imposition of hands of Confirmation. But if the Didascalia Apostolorum really intended to draw attention to the identity of the imposition of hands of Confirmation with that of reconciliation, then it would surely have underlined the imposition of hands in baptism, just as in II 32,3, for example, it distinguishes baptism from the impositio manus episcoporum in the same initiation rite. Indeed, such a stress is all the more to be expected, in that the imposition of hands of confirmation in the Didascalia Apostolorum is not the only imposition of hands by the bishop in the whole initiation rite (there is already an imposition of hands at the anointing before baptism, III 12). If, therefore, one is looking for a close parallel to the penitential imposition of hands in the baptismal rite, it would not be completely impossible to consider the imposition of hands before baptism just as well as the imposition of hands [159] of Confirmation. In fine, therefore, according to the Didascalia Apostolorum, the penitential imposition of hands is a rite which, as a bestowal of the Spirit, takes the place of the whole of baptism and is not the repetition of a particular part of the initiation rite.

Cyprian's own position on this point is somewhat more difficult to ascertain, because he appears to consider the reconciliation of heretics parallel with, indeed a repetition of, the imposition of hands at Confirmation. What needs to be demonstrated first of all, therefore, is that, in his view, the reconciliation of heretics, at least in the practice which he represents, is identical with the usual penitential reconciliation through the imposition of hands. Such a conclusion would still be very important in itself, even if, thereby, our actual problem were not yet solved. The penitential imposition of hands is always administered to reconcile a sinner with the Church, to admitti ad Ecclesiam (Epist. 4,4; cf. 16,2), even in cases where there is no question of sins-against faith, as, for example, in the case of sins against purity. From the whole theology of the relationship between membership of the Church and the possession of the Spirit, as this is developed by Cyprian in the controversy over the baptism of heretics it is abundantly obvious that, in his view, even in the case of these sins such an [22] Which originates in the first half of the third century; on the date, cf. P. Galtier, Aux origines du sacrement de pénitence (Rome 1951), pp. 189-221.

[23] The anointing with the imposition of hands of III 12 is a pre-baptismal anointing; on this cf. 'Penitential Teaching and Practice According to the Didascalia Apostolorum' in this volume.
[24] Which would be expected if it were considered a second Confirmation.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

imposition of hands signifies the re-bestowal of the Holy Spirit.[25] Tertullian had also already proposed this as an effect of the paenitentia secunda, and the Didascalia Apostolorum mentions it explicitly with regard to the imposition of hands for sinners of every category. If, therefore, Cyprian, along with his contemporaries,[26] explains the imposition of hands at the reconciliation of heretics as a re-bestowal of church fellowship and a bestowal of the Spirit, then this, on its own, is neither completely surprising nor a proof that any other imposition of hands is involved than that of the usual penitential reconciliation.

The imposition of hands alone which Pope Stephen I wishes to be applied at every reconciliation of heretics must be done in paenitentiam.[27] This pope's denial of a (new) baptism of heretics is based on the fact that the mere imposition of hands in such cases is an ancient consuetudo (Epist. 74,1; cf. De rebaptismate 1.6), and this fact is not disputed by his adversaries (Epist. 71,2.3; 73,13.23; 74,2; 75,6; Sent. episc. 30.64.77). Even Cyprian dates his own contrary practice in Africa only from the time of Agrippina (Epist. 7 1,4; 73,3). This suggests that even in Africa the imposition of hands, which Cyprian [160] himself used for the reconciliation of heretics baptized in the Catholic Church, must have been the rite of reconciliation of all heretics at the beginning of the third century. Pope Stephen's appeal to traditional procedure shows, however, that the principle was not determined by theological considerations but by ancient practice.

C) THE IMPOSITION OF HANDS AND THE RECONCILIATION OF HERETICS

What, therefore, is the origin of this practice, if it is not based on radical theological considerations? The first point which must be made is that certainly those heretics who were baptized in the Catholic Church (and these were obviously the original cases) were reconciled through the imposition of hands. The ancient teaching concerning the unrepeatable character of baptism (as it is found already in Hermas) did not allow any other practice, in the form of a full or partial repetition of the rite of initiation, in their regard. This practice was then maintained and applied, without considerable theological reflection, where it was a question of the reconciliation (readmission and bestowal of the Spirit) of those new heretics who were baptized outside the Church. That is Cyprian's own explanation of this practice in Epist. 7 1,2, and we have no reason to doubt his word. In reality, therefore, every reconciliation of a heretic must originally, and even for Stephen, have been understood as a normal penitential reconciliation.[28] Thus Stephen's description of it as being performed in paenitentiam is, without a doubt, the most exact notion possible. This is confirmed by Cyprian's own description of the imposition of hands for heretics and apostates who were originally Catholics as in paenitentiam (Epist. 71,2; Sent. episc. 8; Epist. 15,1; 18,1; 19,2). Since Cyprian recognizes the notion,[29] at least for these sinners, his own terminology evidences both the original conception and Stephen's practice as a penitential imposition of hands. If, however, the reconciliation were originally intended as a new imposition of hands of Confirmation, then this must apply to every case of the penitential imposition of hands. But this is completely out of the question, both because of the awareness of the unity of baptism-

[25] The person who receives the pax receives the Holy Spirit; cf. Epist. 57,4: pace recepta recipere Spiritum Patris. This statement was made in respect of a reconciled sinner.
[26] For instance, Pope Stephen, the author of De rebaptismate, and the bishops of the synod held on the subject on the controversy over the baptism of heretics on 1 September A.D. 256.
[27] Cyprian, Epist. 74,1.2.3.
[28] This means a reconciliation as it was practised in the case of a validly baptized and confirmed person. Thus it cannot be understood as a new Confirmation, since at that early time the rite of initiation was considered to be unrepeatable.
[29] Cyprian himself does not know of a mere reconciling imposition of hands for those baptized outside the Church. Thus he can have no term to designate it.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Confirmation, on the one hand, and of the unrepeatable character of baptism, on the other. Such a theory has also to reckon with certain serious difficulties. It would render incomprehensible the fact that the ancient tradition (Hermas-Tertullian-Cyprian) a more considerable role is given to the performance of subjective penance in the [161] remission of sins committed after baptism than in baptism itself with regard to previous faults. This is because in the reconciliation of penance only an essential part of initiation in remissionem peccatorum was repeated.

What is more, there can be no doubt that, as far as Stephen I is concerned, the imposition of hands for heretics meant the usual penitential reconciliation. If indeed this were thought of as a renewal of Confirmation,[30] then obviously its characteristics and effect could be described only in terms of the latter, and this only in so far as Confirmation is considered distinct from baptism. Now the principal characteristic and the specific effect of the imposition of hands in penance is in general the pax cum ecclesia, the communicatio. But it can hardly be maintained that this is also the characteristic hallmark of the imposition of hands in Confirmation, as distinct from baptism in water.

After all this, it still remains to be shown that even in Cyprian no decisive arguments are to be found for the assumption that the meaning of the ancient and traditional imposition of hands in penance is a renewal of Confirmation.

Against the conclusion which we have just reached it might be objected that Cyprian supposes that Stephen, in imposing hands upon heretics, intends to confirm them. There can be no doubt that Cyprian does have this impression. Indeed he expounds Stephen's view (Epist. 73,6) accordingly, as if the imposition of hands offered by him to the heretics were a manum imponi ut spiritum sanctum consequatur et signetur,[31] while he himself is of the opinion that, in the reception of heretics, either both, that is, the baptizari in remissam peccatorum and the consequi Spiritum Sanctum through the imposition of hands should be given or neither.[32] In other words, if he says that the imposition of hands ad accipiendum Spiritum Sanctum is insufficient and the baptism must be administered as well (but not instead of the imposition of hands), it is clear that this observation implies the supposition mentioned above (Epist. 72,1). Otherwise, the prescription that sacramentum utrumque should be administered to the heretics would be superfluous (Epist. 73,21; Sent. episc. 5; cf. also 16). It also has to be admitted that even the rather clumsy defender of Stephen's position in De rebaptismate (cf., for example, 10. 12) considers the imposition of hands for heretics as Confirmation.

But is this interpretation of Stephen's view on the part of his [162] adversaries and indeed his unskillful theological friend the correct one? In other words, did he himself see clearly and consciously in this imposition of hands for heretics that previously valid ritual which belongs to Christian initiation? This question cannot be simplified by the suggestion that Stephen has in mind only the Novatians who had not administered Confirmation in their initiation ceremony. If this were the case, then Confirmation could be prescribed for these heretics with impunity and without the suggestion that a Confirmation actually administered [30] This cannot be excluded in principle, since in the early Church there is no explicit statement that the imposition of hands at Confirmation, considered in itself, cannot be repeated. Such a statement is still not found in Augustine. Augustine's frequently quoted word, from his Contra litteras Petiliani Donatistae II 104.239, is not a witness for the unrepeatable character of Confirmation, since the sacramentum chrismatis mentioned here is the post-baptismal anointing which is not identical with Confirmation as the communication of the Spirit by a mere imposition of hands. On this cf. W. Roetzer, Des heiligen Augustinus Schriften als liturgie-geschichtliche Quelle (Munich 1930), p. 172 f. Similarly H. Elfers, Die Kirchenordnung Hippolyts von Rom (Paderborn 1938), pp. 115-18, as opposed to J. Coppens, L'imposition des mains (Paris 1925), pp. 297-303.

[31] In Cyprian the term signari/signaculum is a typical expression for Confirmation; cf. Epist. 73,9.

[32] It still remains to be shown that Pope Stephen attributed the remissa peccatorum to baptism administered by heretics.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

by heretics was invalid (as d'Alès holds).[33] Without any doubt Stephen has in mind heretics in general, and all his adversaries presuppose that these possess an initiation which includes an imposition of hands. Nevertheless, the interpretation of Stephen's view on the part of his adversaries need not be exact in every respect. What is certainly correct is that Stephen presupposes that when the heretic comes to the Church he does not possess the Holy Spirit. It is for this reason that he receives the imposition of hands. Everything else is mere interpretation. As such it may perhaps even be relevant and not contradicted by Stephen himself. But it appears rather as a conclusion from his position than as a presentation of this view itself. Basically, this position consists in maintaining the traditional practice. But this practice does not indicate an imposition of hands in the sense of a new Confirmation. Thus it is really indifferent how Stephen himself would have interpreted this practice, had he been pressed to give a precise theological interpretation of it.

Obviously it is not only as a conclusion from Stephen's practice (cf., for example, Sent. episc. 5; Epist. 69,11; 70,3; 72,1) but also precisely as his own explicit teaching (Epist. 69,10; 74,5; 75,8) that Cyprian propounds that heretics do not possess the Holy Spirit and that they receive it only through the Catholic imposition of hands. This is tantamount to saying that, at least as far as the end-product is concerned, the heretics' imposition of hands is ineffective. Cyprian would not have received this view ready-made from out of the blue, and he is, therefore, undoubtedly correct when he constantly presupposes that the reconciling imposition of hands is, in Stephen's view, a rite ad accipiendum Spiritum (Epist 69,11 72,1 73,6 74,5) But is it thereby proven that Stephen considers the reconciliation of heretics and penitents as an imposition of hands of Confirmation which is either valid for the first time or repeated? This teaching [163] could be just as much the simple expression of Stephen's practice as the mere description of it. Stephen imposes hands on the heretic as on every other sinner because he does not in fact possess the Spirit as a result of his sins and, therefore, must receive it.[34] According to the theology of that time every serious sin entails man's loss of both the substantia baptismi and the Holy Spirit. It is understandable, therefore, that the imposition of hands which concludes the sin-remitting penance should be described as ad accipiendum Spiritum Sanctum. This designation is justified without any thought of Confirmation and without any clear previous reflection as to how this Spirit-bestowing imposition of hands administered to penitents and heretics is related with that other imposition of hands belonging to baptism. In paenitentiam and ad accipiendum Spiritum Sanctum are expressions which can indicate the same imposition of hands without thereby referring to Confirmation. Stephen certainly sees in the imposition of hands for penitents and heretics a communication of the Spirit. Nevertheless, Cyprian's interpretation of this view with reference to Confirmation says nothing as to whether Stephen would have agreed with this interpretation or whether he would have proposed another elaborated and clear idea of the communication of the Spirit through the imposition of hands for penitents which would have clearly distinguished it from that of Confirmation.

The critical point of our problem is reached, however, only when, according to the explicit statements of Cyprian and Firmilian, the baptism by heretics is not only held by Stephen to be valid, legitimate, that is, in the modern sense (as already recognized by Augustine), validum, but also when he ascribes to it an effect which – to use our terminology – is tantamount to the 'fruitfulness' of baptism. According to the account of his adversaries, baptism by the heretics in Stephen's opinion effects: gratia Christi, gratia baptismi regeneratio (caelestis) secundae nativitatis, remissa (remissio) peccatorum, an innovari et sanctificari (Epist.

[33] A. d'Alès, La théologie de saint Cyprien (Paris 1922), p. 246 f.
[34] Obviously we cannot expect him to provide a precise and profound explanation of why the sinner or the heretic does not possess the Spirit. He is only concerned with the simple fact that it is a question of a heretic or a sinner.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

73,4.16.17.18.20; 74,5.6.7; 75,8.9.12.14.16.17.18.22.23.25). This account cannot be simply false, since the view which it relates is even expressed – if only briefly – where Stephen is quoted verbatim (Epist. 75,18: gratia Christi). On the one hand, therefore, Stephen (contrary to Augustine) acknowledges in the baptism by heretics the production of grace, even if this is not also the possession of the Spirit.[35] On the other hand, he denies to the initiation by heretics the possibility of bestowing [164] the Holy Spirit in such a way that, as it were, it accompanies the heretics when they approach the Catholic Church, since it is only there that it is first bestowed. This position of Stephen may strike us as being somewhat strange, indeed completely illogical. This is certainly how it appears to his adversaries, since their arguments concentrate on the observation that the principle by which he ascribes the production of grace to baptism by heretics ought also to be applied to their imposition of hands. Their contention is that these effects which he ascribes to baptism by heretics are only conceivable if heretics who are about to be baptized or already baptized also receive the Holy Spirit. But this considerable logical difficulty in Stephen's view is not a sufficient reason to dispute it as a fact. In the light of the theology of that time, this view is not as inconceivable as it may appear at first sight, and this on two scores. Firstly, Tertullian (De bapt. 6-8) already conceived the effect of baptism and distinguished it from the effect of the post-baptismal imposition of hands in such a way that it was only the imposition of hands that bestowed the Holy Spirit. Baptism itself, however, has other effects which are all resumed in the remissio peccatorum considered as the mere preparation of man for the possession of the Spirit.[36] Stephen was able to follow this line, by ascribing even to the baptism by heretics the effects of baptism understood in this very restricted sense, while denying them the possession of the Spirit and, therefore, the efficacy of their post-baptismal imposition of hands. Moreover, Tertullian already teased out the question of the effectiveness of the baptism of a person who is unrepentant. He tried to answer this question by supposing that the actual administration was effective, but that the effect was immediately lost again (De paen. 6). If Stephen had thought of this case in a similar way he could hold that the baptism by heretics with the imposition of hands was a means of grace, while still allowing the heretics to come to the Church so that they could there receive the Spirit anew by the imposition of hands. If it was not only the interpretation of his adversaries but the actual opinion of Stephen himself that the heretics' imposition of hands was absolutely ineffective in the communication of the Spirit, then the first explanation of his position has the better chance of corresponding to his true opinion. The latter, however, was certainly not very consciously elaborated. In our present context, all that need be said is that Stephen holds the heretics' imposition of hands, as opposed to their baptism, as so absolutely ineffective, that in fact he considers it [165] to be invalid.[37] Thus the following interpretation of his teaching at least becomes probable for his adversaries and for the author of De rebaptismate: the imposition of hands with which, according to Stephen, heretics are received is the imposition of hands of Confirmation. In other words, if one considers an earlier imposition of hands ineffective and invalid, then one is compelled to think that the imposition of hands which is presently being administered is specifically identical with that of the heretics, the validity and effectiveness of which is being contested. Otherwise the imposition of hands of Confirmation would remain denied even to reconciled heretics.

[35] In his opinion heretics receive the Spirit only through the penitential imposition of hands.
[36] This idea of Tertullian is discernible, for example, in Cyprian too in this baptismal controversy, when he says, or his opponents present him implicitly as saying, that in baptism, as distinct from the imposition of hands, theme is a forgiveness of sins, a sanctification and a spiritual renewal, by which a man is ad accipiendum spiritum idoneus factus (Epist. 74,5; cf. also Epist. 74,7), that is, through the following imposition of hands.
[37] Even in the case of baptism he does not distinguish between an effective and a merely valid administration, but considers it to be effective because it is valid.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It also has to be admitted that in Stephen's private theology there are very considerable obscurities and even no less important contradictions, of which his opponents take full advantage in their theological arguments. Nevertheless, the content of this theology did not enter into his actual decision on the question which we are discussing. But this does not mean that the considerations of his opponents were always correct, since they were hardly able to make the distinction between a valid and a fruitful administration of the sacraments. As far as Stephen is concerned this fact shows only more. Clearly that this theological position cannot have been at the origin of the practice which he is defending, but is rather an unfortunate theory invented subsequently to justify an already existing practice. Indeed had it evolved from this theory it would not have succeeded, since without the pre-existing practice it would have been shown to be logically impracticable. This is clear in Cyprian and Firmilian. In other words, by logic alone it would be obvious that one cannot recognize that heretics have the one rite of initiation which is actually effective, while at the same time withholding the same recognition for the other rite of initiation. However, the practice could not have emanated from such a consideration, and heretics would even have had to be received without imposition of hands if this were in fact considered Confirmation. This last observation obliges us not to explain the practice in the same way that Stephen tried to do. Thus, despite the obscure theory of Cyprian's contemporaries, we maintain our own interpretation: the imposition of hands for heretics is the general imposition of hands for penitents. This was used first in the case of apostates who were baptized as Catholics and then, without much theological reflection, was extended to the reconciliation of those who had become Christians outside the Church.

The Church maintained this practice universally and without its [166] being questioned. Thus the consequences which ensued for the validity of the sacraments administered by heretics are legitimate and correct, even though both the first attempt at a theological justification of this practice and its implications were problematical. This penitential imposition of hands is a 'substitute' for baptism, that is, for Christian initiation as a whole, in so far as it restores the original effects of this initiation. Thus it can be described without hesitation as ad accipiendum Spiritum Sanctum and is in no way the repetition of just the last part of Christian initiation, that is, Confirmation. Originally, this initiation was practically always considered 'baptism' as a whole, and this was clearly unrepeatable.

It is, however, possible to discern in the middle of the third century the bases of a theological development which will bring about an association between Confirmation and the imposition of hands for heretics. The effects of these will become significant only later. They are of no concern for our present purpose.

Although these inquiries into the theological obscurities of the early Church may appear to be entirely negative, one positive result which they produce needs to be stressed. The fact that at this time the penitential liturgy had developed to such an extent that there was a danger of going beyond the evident ritual parallel and identifying it with a part of the sacramental rite of initiation shows that there must have been a strong awareness of the sacramental character of penance. If the theology at that time considered baptism as a whole to be a sacrament, then this must also have applied to penance and its imposition of hands.[38]

D) THE MEANING OF THE IMPOSITION OF HANDS

We must now turn to the second question mentioned above. If the imposition of hands used at the reconciliation of heretics and penitents is not identifiable with a (first or repeated) rite [38] Obviously this is not to deny that in the third century there was simultaneously a trend of thought which, taken on its own, deviated from a sacramental view of the institution of penance.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

belonging to Christian initiation, what meaning does it have and why precisely is it used in reconciliation? The first point which must be made in answer to this question is that reconciliation concerns the restoration of those lost interior gifts of grace which the Christian originally received in baptism (considered as a whole). This restoration is fittingly expressed through the imposition of hands, since this gesture always expresses the communication of that which the person imposing the hands possesses, and because the first bestowal of these [167] gifts was symbolized in this way. Now there were several different kinds of imposition of hands. Is, therefore, the imposition of hands in penance to be understood as a parallel to (but not as a repetition of) the imposition of hands in Confirmation, because it bestows the Spirit, or is it to be construed as one (or as the last) imposition of hands of those blessings of penitents which without any doubt at a later date often occurred during the time of penance?

In the latter case it would appear to be very similar to those impositions of hands of exorcism which already in Cyprian's day were applied to catechumens. The first hypothesis seems 'the more likely. Already in the Didascalia Apostolorum the imposition of hands of reconciliation is presented as a gesture signifying a communication of the Spirit, and thus it is seen in parallel to the bestowal of the Spirit at Confirmation. Even if Cyprian's erroneous interpretation of Stephen's view is rejected, namely, that the latter understands the imposition of hands for heretics simply as Confirmation, this interpretation is hardly conceivable if the imposition of hands in penance were not understood as being similar to Confirmation, that is, as a rite ad accipiendum Spiritum Sanctum. Later in the West and even more so in the East there was a strong tendency towards the identification of the imposition of hands for heretics, and partially even that of penitents, with Confirmation. After the Schism this identification became actual and clear for the Greek Church. This development is all the more easily comprehensible if, from the beginning, there was an affinity between both rites, that is, if already originally the imposition of hands of penance was modelled on that of Confirmation.

Nevertheless the second hypothesis mentioned above is not entirely unlikely. At least it must have had some influence on the elaboration of the imposition of hands of penance. The exercises undertaken during the time of penance (fasts, prostrations, exhortations) also show many similarities with elements of the catechumenate. Thus it is not unlikely that a considerable amount of this particular time of preparation served as a model for the organization of the time of penance. At the beginning of the third century, at least in the church order of Hippolytus (Dix, pp. 30-2) frequent impositions of hands used as exorcism for catechumens are already an established part of the catechumenate. In Cyprian such an exorcism is found at least immediately before baptism (Sent. episc. 1.8.37) and [168] similar impositions of hands seem to be attested by him elsewhere (Ad Demetr. 15; Tertullian, Apol. 23). Later in Africa sinners were frequently blessed during the time of penance by impositions of hands (Augustine, Sermo 232,8).[39] Such blessings must be understood as parallel to the repeated impositions of hands during the catechumenate, as indeed Augustine mentions.[40] Thus it is not completely unlikely that the imposition of hands at penance, as we find it in Cyprian and his contemporaries as the conclusion of the time of penance, is either one or perhaps even the last imposition of hands which was considered analogous to the exorcism of the catechumenate. An observation from the viewpoint of the history of the liturgy is relevant here. It is self-evident for Cyprian that in the imposition of hands at penance, given that the other acta paenitentia have been carried out, this can be performed by the presbyter, while the imposition of hands by a deacon counts in a case of necessity (Epist. 18,1). In the more 'normal' imposition of hands by the bishop the clergy also takes part (Epist. 17,2). On the other hand, it appears that at this time, at least in the West, Confirmation [39] Cf. J. A. Jungmann, Die lateinischen Bussriten (Innsbruck 1932), pp. 12 f., 34 f., 298 ff.

[40] Augustinus, De peccat.mer. et rem. 2,26; De fide et oper. 9; Sermo 227.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

was reserved absolutely to the bishop, so that it happened that a person could be baptized and die without Confirmation or a person could be baptized by a presbyter and finally confirmed by a bishop.[41] This striking difference seems to indicate that the imposition of hands at penance was seen rather as an exorcism than as a strict parallel to the imposition of hands of Confirmation, reserved exclusively to the bishop, which concluded initiation. An imposition of hands which, in certain circumstances, could be performed even by a deacon must have been considered at that time to have quite a different character from Confirmation, which was so exclusively reserved to the bishop and which was still administered by him even when a priest performed the baptism. The imposition of hands at penance is described as being performed in paenitentiam; whereas the exorcism before baptism is aimed at a 'purification' (cf. Hippolytus, Par; Dix, p. 31) which should give the bishop the assurance that the candidate is now truly 'pure'. Even on this score there is an inner connection between both rites. Augustine explains later that the imposition of hands is repeatable since it is nothing more than a prayer over a man. In this context he must have been thinking of the imposition of hands more as an exorcism applied to catechumens and penitents in the time of penance. Since, however, he could hardly have derived this principle [169] from the once-and-for-all imposition of Confirmation and the definitive reconciliation of penitents (De bapt. III 16,21) he must also have seen the concluding imposition of hands for penitents rather in the same category as the other impositions of hands during the time of penance. In any case the use of the imposition of hands for catechumens and sinners during the time of penance shows that already in Cyprian's day it was not necessary to relate the imposition of hands of penitential reconciliation only to Confirmation, but that this gesture was fairly indeterminate, enjoying fluidity and an applicability beyond the communication of the Spirit in Confirmation and Ordination. Its use for penitents and heretics, therefore, does not have to be seen necessarily in the light of Confirmation, although this is not to deny that already in the third century there exist the foundations of the later development.

As will be made clearer below, already at this time personal subjective penance is stressed in a way which does not make particularly easy its connection with the Church's objective activity in the reconciliation of man with God. Now would such an insistence on the personal-subjective performance in penance have been at all possible if the reconciling imposition of hands had been seen in a line with the bestowal of the Spirit in Christian initiation? Or is this phenomenon not easier to understand when the imposition of hands of penance is taken rather as one of the many impositions of hands in the sense of exorcisms or blessings as they also occur before baptism and which, despite the importance accorded to them, leave the decisive role to the catechumens' subjective conversion? This also, explains more satisfactorily why in the case of a hasty granting of communicatio by priests in the absence of their bishop, a practice which Cyprian condemns (Epist. 15,1; 17,2), the imposition of hands was omitted. Since in a case of necessity this imposition of hands can be performed even by a priest and a deacon (Epist. 18,1: 19,2) it is difficult to explain why it was omitted if it was considered to be the specific formal rite of reconciliation.[42] This fact is [41] Cf. Cyprian, Epist. 73,9; De rebaptismate 4; Council of Elvira, can. 38 and 77; DS 120 and 121; Hippolytus, Paradosis (Dix, p. 38).

[42] In Epist. 16,2 and likewise in Sent.episc. 8 and 22 there is indeed mention of a per manus impositionem . . . ius communicationis accipere. Nevertheless, it is questionable whether Cyprian wishes to state here that the imposition of hands as such designates the formal act of absolution. In De lapsis 16 the manus sacerdotis, like the sacrificium, is a means for the pugare conscientiam. Would the imposition of hands be designated by the terminus technicus manus impositio in paenitentiam (Epist. 15,1; 18,1; 19,2; 20,3; 71.1.2.3; Sent.episc. 8), if this were understood as the formal gesture of reconciliation? This does not appear as obvious as it is often thought. Moreover, full justice is not rendered to the per if the imposition of hands is viewed as a part of the whole rite of exhomologesis, that is, as an indispensable and sufficient condition of the access which itself occurs subsequently via facti without further formalities.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

more easily understood if the imposition of hands stands in the last place, along with the exhomologesis, as one act of penance beside others. Just as the lapsi were dispensed from the agere paenitentiam by these laxists, so they were dispensed from the exorcism which is the priest's support of the exhomologesis. In other words, they were dispensed from the Imposition of hands which is conceived more as a part of the [170] humiliating penance than as the formal act of reconciliation. The latter was seen, therefore, rather in the actual granting of communion, albeit expressed in words, and in the participation in the Eucharist.[43] This itself is supported by the symbol of the imposition of hands as prius before the venire ad communicationem (Epist. 17,2).

A radical solution to our question has been attempted by contesting its presuppositions, namely, that at that time in the West the imposition of hands was the decisive rite of Confirmation.[44] On the assumption that here at that time the anointing was the actual rite of Confirmation a great deal becomes clear. The two questions with which we began this essay are easily answered. The imposition of hands for heretics and indeed for usual penitents does not move at all in the 'dangerous' proximity to actual Confirmation, and the meaning of the imposition of hands in penance can be sought with impunity in another direction without so much as a glance at Confirmation. Nevertheless, such a solution for Africa of the third century and later is impracticable. At this time the episcopal imposition of hands and it alone is the actual rite of Confirmation and not the anointing. The attempt of Saint-Palais d'Aussac to demonstrate the opposite thesis cannot be recognized as convincing.[45]

A perfectly clear and unified explanation of the imposition of hands in the reconciliation of penitents and heretics in Cyprian's day on the basis of the available material is not possible today, and it probably did not exist even in the third century. This imposition of hands can indeed be sufficiently distinguished from Confirmation in so far as it cannot be intended as a repetition of Confirmation. But its positive meaning, that is, whether it was considered either as a gesture for the (re-)bestowal of the Spirit or as prayer in the sense of an exorcism, or whether at that time these two functions were not so clearly distinguished – all this cannot be clarified with certainty. It would appear that such a differentiation was unknown at that time. This observation tends to support the argument for the apostolic origin of the imposition of hands in penance. If it were a later, entirely new liturgical creation, and indeed by reflected, conscious analogy with a certain other imposition of hands, then its meaning would have been known as being precisely different from that of other, similar gestures. If, however, the rite of reconciliation is just as old and original as the other impositions of hands, then it is more easily explained that both for us and for the time which we have [171] been studying there appear analogies with all these other impositions of hands. Thus our final word on this

[43] In Dionysius of Alexandria, also about the middle of the third century, reconciliation was not necessarily connected with the imposition of hands. It could also come about via facti through simple access to the eucharistic community (Eus.Hist. Eccl. VI 42,5.6; 44,2-6). Cf. B. Poschmann, pp. 275-9.

[44] It is in this direction that Saint-Palais d'Aussac looks for a solution to the problem. We cannot here enter into an actual critical appraisal of his attempt, since we must confine our attention to Cyprian's time. Saint-Palais, however, includes the whole of the Latin Patristic literature in his research. What is more, such a discussion belongs necessarily to the study of Confirmation in the early Church from the viewpoint of the history of dogma, and thus goes beyond the bounds of a work on the history of penance. This is the decisive point: in Africa during the third century the actual rite of Confirmation is the episcopal imposition of hands and not an anointing. The literature which Saint-Palais d'Aussac did or could not use is sufficient evidence for this: H. Elfers, Die Kirchenordnung Hippolyts von Rom (Paderborn 1938), pp. 101-27, according to which even in Augustine's day the imposition of hands is still clearly the actual rite of Confirmation; H. Elfers, 'Gehört die Salbung mit Chrisma im ältesten abendländischen Initiationsritus zur Taufe oder zur Firmung?' in: ThG1 34 (1942), pp. 334-41; E. Dekkers, Tertullianus en de geschiednis den liturgie (Brussels/Amsterdam 1947), pp. 197-204. Cf. also W. Roetzer, Des heilgen Augustinus Schriften als liturgie-geschichtliche Quelle (Munich 1930), p. 171 ff.

[45] F. Saint-Palais d'Aussac, La réconciliation des hérétiques dans l'Eglise latine (Paris 1943).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

subject should be that the dilemma should not be posed in such a way that this imposition of hands of penance should be definitely, clearly and solely explained by one or other of the similar rites.

II. THE THEOLOGY OF PENANCE

1. The Sins of Daily Life and Their Private Remission

As much as Cyprian values the holiness, splendour and power of the man who, being newly born in baptism, is able to do everything through God's gratuitous and immense grace (Ad Donat. 4 f. 14 f.), he still knows that the sanctified Christian continually falls into daily faults: cotidie deesse non potest quod peccetur in conspectu Dei (De op. et eleem. 18); sine aliquo conscientiae vulnere esse non possumus (ibid., 3). This is because we have to fight with the devil, the flesh and the world (De mort. 4-5).[46] According to Cyprian the 'filth of daily sins' must be continually removed, even though he was reasonably clear that the sanctjficatio et vivificatio of the baptismal grace (which obviously must be protected) is not lost through such sins (De dom. or. 12). If he states non deesse sanatis (through baptism) quaedam postmodum vulnera (De op. et eleem. 3), this expresses the idea that even the justified person still sins, just as, by sinning, he does not cease to be a person who is sanctified in baptism. Already here in the struggle against sin in general[47] there is a clear distinction between the post-baptismal remission of sins and the remissa peccatorum in baptism. Sins committed before baptism are remitted Christi sanguine et sanctificatione, semel in baptismo, whereas sins committed after baptism find forgiveness through assidua et iugis operatio[48] of man himself (De op. et eleem. 2), therefore by prayer, fasting, almsgiving, etc. (ibid., 5.18, etc.). The remissa peccatorum is granted only once in baptism[49] (De op. et eleem. 2). Any sins

[46] Further evidence in Cyprian: cottidie delinquimus (De dom.or. 12); instraitur et docetur peccare se cottidie, dam cottidie pro peccatis iubetur orane (De dom.or. 22); cf. also Test. III 54.

[47] In his general exhortation on the subject of the remission of sins, De op. et eleem., Cyprian does not understand sin as serious in today's sense.

[48] The operatio, that is, the simple good 'work' as opposed to the 'words' of prayer, is, strictly speaking, a terminus technicus in Tertullian for fasting which is accompanied and supported by prayer. Cf. Tertullian, De or. 18; De ieiunio 4.8.9.13; on this see J. Schümmer, Die altchristliche Fastenpraxis (Münster 1933), pp. 78, 174, 224 n.82, 225. By operatio (opera, operari) Cyprian appears to understand principally almsgiving. Cf. De or. 32: fasting and almsgiving; De lapsis 35: largiter fiat operatio and the other passages (CSL 3,3; 440-1). Shortly after Cyprian the Church organized, on a great scale as it were, private penance for daily sins by means of fasting and prayer: the forty days' period of fasting. Originally, this was not an actual preparation for Easter and thus ought not to be confused with the more ancient Passover fast, even if it was placed in the period before Easter and before the actual Passover fast. With the fourth century the observation of Quadragesima becomes established as a penitential fast for all Christians. Thus when later actual church penance draws on this practice, this is fully in keeping with the earlier sense of this penitential fast for all Christians. Cf. Schümmer, op. cit., pp. 201-3. Obviously already in the second and third centuries theme were individual ecclesiastical fast days, more or less obligatory, which represented the early Church's 'confessions of devotion'. It was in this way that the Church took care of the iugis et assidua operatio of the private penance for the daily sins of Christians. Such occasions would be the partial fasts of the stations, the Friday fasts, fasting on Saturday.

[49] The semel (De op. et eleem. 2) can be referred not only to the in baptismo but must also apply to the remissa peccatorum, In other words it is intended as a fundamental contrast to iugis operatio and, therefore, should be rendered by 'only once'. Now stress on the once-and-for-all character of the actual baptismal rite would be out of place in this context. What is meaningful here, however, is the insistence that there is only one, single remissa, that is, a once and for all, gratuitous and complete forgiveness of sins, granted independently of personal penance. After this there is only a personal expiation of sins by means of the iugis operatio. This is clear from the fact that in the same context the necessity of a personal penance for sins committed after baptism is called for and inculcated and the scriptural texts cited (Prov. 16:6 = 15:27; Sir. 3:30) are referred to this penance and not to baptism.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation committed after baptism must be expiated by the sinner himself, so that the ensuing forgiveness, by reason of the sinner's own operatio, is not a remissa in Cyprian's sense. He is perfectly consistent in the terminology which he uses to describe this distinction between a purely [172] gratuitous forgiveness of the guilt of sins in baptism and the remission of serious and daily sins committed after baptism.[50] This is already abundantly clear from the way in which the notion of remissa(-io) peccatorum, remittere is reserved for baptism.[51] The exceptions to this restricted usage are only apparent.[52] The distinction between the forgiveness of sins in baptism and the remission of sins committed after baptism which Cyprian elaborates especially for serious sins also applies, therefore, to other sins committed after baptism.[53] All of these sins must be remitted through the sinner's own penance, since they are not forgiven simply by grace in view of Christ. This general penitential teaching of [50] As opposed to J. Grotz, who (p. 102 ff.) says that Cyprian designates the forgiveness of sins both in baptism and in penance as remissio. (For more details on the terminology involved see n.52.)

[51] The relevant text is in A. d'Alès, L'édit de Calliste (Paris 1914), pp. 233-4. Remissa(-io) is applied to baptism about thirty times.

[52] Epist. 59,16 (remitto omnia) does not belong to our present discussion. It is here a question of the 'permission' of the access of all men to church penance and of the fixing and curtailing of the periods of penance. It is, therefore, not a question of the 'remission' of sins as such. The delictis remittendis (ibid.) is, accordingly, to be understood in the same context. In De lapsis 18 a remissio peccatorum with praepopera festinatio, that is, without the demand for and the observance of a long period of penance on the sinner's part, is rejected twice. Thus it is doubtful whether the remission of sins which Cyprian promises to those who perform this penance can still be styled remissa. The text itself does not provide an answer to this question; and in the light of Cyprian's usual terminology it should be answered in the negative. The same applies to Epist. 27,3, where Cyprian says that an imprudent martyr is demanding for his clients a pacem dari et peccata dimitti, and this precisely without their having to do church penance. Here too it is doubtful whether the granting of the pax after a full church penance would be described as a remissa, In this case, the question is to be answered in the negative not only from Cyprian's general terminology but also by a consideration of the context of the text itself. In fact in the martyrs' letters of freedom all that is found is the request for the pacem dare; this is always demanded in the libelli (Epist. 19,2; 22,2; 23; 26; 27,3; 35). If Cyprian, interpreting this, inserts a peccata dimitti, this is only to emphasize the abuse of such a libelli pacis. For such a request refers to a peccata dimitti which is possible only in baptism. It includes necessarily a remission of sins without penance, as this occurs in baptism. Thus Cyprian implies that the remission of sins which he still considers possible is not a simple dimitti, is not a remissa. That is why he opposes the request of the martyr Paul to baptism. Only as a request for a remissa could it be said logically to occur in Pauli nomine, because it does not happen in the name of Christ, who achieves a full remissa only in baptism. It is obvious that such a remissa does not occur either by the sinner's personal penance. Thus the contrast with baptism is not only in the sense underlined by P. Galtier, L'église et la remission des péchés aux premiers siècles (Paris 1932), p. 38 f. In Epist. 21,3 theme is a mention of a remittere peccatum through the martyrs. Here, however, it is a question of their intercession in the next life, that is, at the last judgement (De lapsis 17). Thus this passage is not relevant to the question of a remittere in this life. The only text remaining then is De lapsis 29: satisfactio et remissio facta per sacerdotes. It will be shown later that the per sacerdotes Dei refers also to satisfactio. Thus this passage concerns only a post-baptismal remissio which occurs essentially on the basis of the satisfactio. With this clear stress that here we have a restricted meaning of a term which is generally used in another sense, Cyprian was able to use the notion of remissio once without being afraid of causing a misunderstanding about the specific and strict sense of this term. J. Grotz does not enter into considerations of this kind. For example (p. 106 if.) he does not see any essential difference between the forgiveness of sins in baptism and that of church penance. On this cf. S. Hübner, pp. 201-5.

[53] If it is a fact that Cyprian uses and can only use the notion of remissa (-io; remittere) in the sense of the actual forgiveness of sins only in the case of baptism, then this negative conclusion also has a positive aspect. Cyprian certainly recognizes a forgiveness of sins committed after baptism. If this forgiveness in his view is not a remissa then it must be distinguished from the remissa only in the way that Cyprian himself repeatedly stresses: the post-baptismal forgiveness is granted only to the assidua et iugis operatio (De op. et eleem. 2), the longa et continua satisfactio (Epist. 43,2). This is what makes it different from the forgiveness of sins in baptism. Thus if Cyprian (Firmilian) refuses to admit that a bishop can grant a remissio (remittere) of sins committed after baptism (Epist. 75,4; De lapsis 17), what is meant and rejected is the remissa without a longa continua satisfactio.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Cyprian on the necessary performance of penance by the sinner himself for sins committed after baptism already provides the basis for his idea of the remission of those sins which, as opposed to the sins of every day, entail the loss of the grace of baptism. The general difference between the pardon of sins in and after baptism is not obliterated by the fact that a satisfactio through paenitentia is necessary to obtain venia even for the catechumens (Ad. Demetr. 25). That the difference still maintains here is evident from the expectation of salvation sub ipso licet exitu, sub ipsa morte on Cyprian's part. This expectation does not apply to post-baptismal penance even on the death-bed (Epist. 55,23).[54] At the same time, it is not as obvious as Poschmann[55] thinks that the penance prescribed before baptism refers merely to the renunciation of previous sins and to the intention to lead a Christian life, considered as a precondition for baptism. This is not stated explicitly in the text, and it harmonizes neither with the notion of satisfacere nor with the theology of Tertullian, whom Cyprian must be considered to follow until the contrary is proven. All that can be said is that here is an obscure point in Cyprian which should not be exploited in favour of unwarranted harmonizations. On the one hand, the pure remissa that is baptism does indeed presuppose a real penance which is considered as a satisfaction. On the other hand, after baptism a remission of sins is possible only through penance which, as making satisfaction, expiates sins because there is no longer a simple remissio. Thus this notion of the post-baptismal forgiveness of sins acquires a certain semi-pelagian nuance,[56] despite the fact that it is based on scriptural expressions concerning the remission of sins through good works. This impression is not cancelled out by the fact that the forgiveness, despite the satisfactio, is seen as a [173] free act (venia) of the Lord acting as judge, qui peccata nostra portavit . . . quem Deus tradidit pro peccatis nostris (De lapsis 17). The fact that the satisfactio is itself the work of divine grace remains totally unexpressed and in the background, which explains why Cyprian is very anxious about the adequacy of this satisfactio in individual cases.

2. The Nature of Serious Sin

Apart from the everyday faults of those who have been justified, there are also, according to Cyprian, sins which in today's terminology have to be styled 'serious'. Although the terminology in Cyprian is not so elaborate, the fact is clear. Cyprian does not call everyday sins crimen, but applies this term (along with others) to 'serious' or 'mortal sins'. Certainly in his terminology even daily sins are peccata (De dom. or. 22; Test. III 54) and delicta (De op. et eleem. 2). The unusual expression mortale crimen is, nevertheless, obviously not yet an actual terminus technicus for mortal sins, just as in Cyprian there is still wanting an established special expression for daily sins. The expression peccata (delicta) minora is also used in comparison with the more serious sins of a kind which, as the object of church [54] Neither does Cyprian grant reconciliation on the death-bed to everyone who asks for it; cf. Epist. 30,8 and Epist. 18,1.

[55] Cf. ThRv 32 (1933), pp. 259-67 (esp. 262).
[56] H. Koch, Cyprianische Untersuchungen (Bonn 1926), p. 275, sees in the principle that sin is remitted only when the punishment incurred has been fully carried out an influence of Stoicism on Cyprian. This is probably not totally unjustified, since it is a Stoic notion that punishment should not be remitted but carried out (cf. the evidence in H. Koch, p. 274). Nevertheless, it must be borne in mind that in the case of a forgiveness of the aeterna supplicia (De lapsis 7) by God theme can be no question of a full performance of penance. Moreover, Cyprian speaks here about God's 'mercy' as a necessary condition of the venia, which directly contradicts the Stoic principle neminem misericordem esse nisi stultum et levem (Cicero, Pro Mumena 29,61). Nevertheless, it is not clear in the Bishop of Carthage that Christian penance itself, which expiates the punishments of sin, is actually a grace of God, and this in the sense that a simple 'remission' of 'punishment' (in the sense of a mere cancellation) would be no greater grace and, consequently, no more complete a venia.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

penance, obviously have considerable gravity (Epist, 16,2; 17,2). At the same time, the image of sin as a 'wound' is used for daily sins (De op. et eleem. 3), as well as for the serious sins which are subject to church penance (Epist. 30,3). The same applies to a purely relative category of expressions such as graviora peccata (Epist. 64,5). The notion of peccatum in Deum (an inheritance from Tertullian) does not concern the distinction which interests us at present and in itself remains vague, since it is used both for sins committed before baptism (Epist. 64,5) and, in practice, for all the faults which later jeopardize salvation in any way at all.[57] This expression, therefore, does not suppose any real counterpart, although Cyprian can explain on one occasion that even such sins quae non in Deum committuntur (Epist. 17,2)[58] have to be submitted to church penance. He does this probably to stress the seriousness of the apostates' sin.

Thus the terminology is very unclear, but in reality the distinction is obviously made by Cyprian. While daily sins do not destroy grace, [174] Cyprian recognizes alongside these faults on account of which God offensus sedem, quam inhabitat, derelinquat (De hab. virg. 2). Sinners are such, de quorum pectoribus excesserit Spiritus Sanctus (Epist. 66,2). The lapsi are dead (Epist. 15,2; 21,2; 33,1; De lapsis 8), they have lost their wedding-garment, they are naked and mortally wounded (Epist. 30,7; De lapsis 30.55), and they carry their own corpse around with them (De lapsis 30). Also the baptized person loses grace when he does not preserve his innocence (Test. III 26). This certainly means interior grace, since according to Epist. 70,2 the baptized person has in se gratiam Christi and according to Epist. 64,3 the baptismal grace is the Holy Spirit. But the sinner loses 'the grace of the life-dispensing bath' (De lapsis 24) and even children who were involved in the fall of their parents lose what they had received immediately after their birth (De lapsis 9). Cyprian's expression mortale crimen (De bono pat. 14), therefore, must be understood not only as 'sin which brings about the death of hell' but as 'sin which causes the death of the inner life of grace in the Holy Spirit'. Alongside this consideration of sin from the viewpoint of grace there are found in Cyprian obviously more ancient and already traditional viewpoints, that is, the moral and the eschatological, for determining the nature of sin. It is offensa . . . indignantis Domini (De lapsis 16.19), an abicere legem Dei (De lapsis 21) by which man exposes himself to the present and future judgement of God and to eternal punishment (De lapsis 7,23-6). From both of the last-mentioned viewpoints sin must almost inevitably appear above all as the object of [57] Also the misuse of temporal goods (De hab. virg. 11), deceit and fornication are sins against God (Epist. 55,27). Moechia is a more serious sin than that of the libellaticus (Epist. 55,26). Also insubordination with regard to the authority of the Church is apparently considered by Cyprian a sin against God, as his hesitation concerning the forgiveness of this sin shows (Epist. 66,9). The author of De aleatoribus (c. A.D. 300) also considers fornication a delictum in Deum (De aleator. 10). In practice it is not possible to distinguish between sins against God and other faults, nor is this seriously envisaged. What is stressed is the seriousness of the sin and not how it differs essentially from other sins.

[58] It is not legitimate to deduce from this distinction that there is an objective difference in the penitential process, as if Cyprian would have known that he could forgive authoritatively sins non in Deum differently from offences in Deum (contrary to B. Poschmann, p. 422). If the penitential process was completely identical and even the iustum tempus of penance was prescribed for the delicta quae non in Deum committuntur, if included among the sins remitted in this way there is, for example, moechia, which elsewhere is characterized as in Deum and is comparatively more serious than the sins of certain lapsi, then it can hardly be supposed that Cyprian was convinced that he remitted these sins 'of his own authority'. Epist. 17,2 (see also Epist. 59,1) describes some offences as non in Deum only by comparison with other sins, in the terms of an argumentum ad hominem. This is to show that the lapsi, more than any others, must do church penance. This argument is valid, even without the distinction in question (cf. Epist. 16,2). De lapsis 17 speaks about peccata in Deum commissa only to show that God alone can forgive them because (not: in so far as) they have been committed 'against God'. Both the notion and the use to which it is put in the argument preserve their meaning, even if there are no other sins besides those committed in Deum. What is more, there is no mention here either of another means of forgiveness nor of sins non in Deum.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

a judgement. This is important because in his theology of the forgiveness of sins Cyprian pays only scant attention to this interior nature of sin, that is, in so far as it concerns grace. Although he knows well that the reconciled sinner receives back the Holy Spirit (Epist. 57,4),[59] he does not exploit any further the theology of the nature of sin as a loss of grace in relation to the forgiveness of sins in the Church Rather, he considers sin almost exclusively from the moral and eschatological viewpoints. Through his fault the sinner" has become God's enemy and must expect a judgement; accordingly, the remission of sin is more of a reconciliation with God and an assurance that one will be able to withstand the judgement and not incur eternal punishment.[60]

Nevertheless, Cyprian does still consider serious sin from an ecclesial viewpoint. Sin 'separates' man from the fellowship of the [175] Church, from peace with the Church and from the central mystery of the Christian life, the Eucharist. In the case of apostasy from the faith, which in Cyprian's theology and polemic (because of the circumstances of his day) receives special prominence, these effects are obvious. These sins, however, separate the sinner from the Church not only in so far as they are an explicit denial of faith and of the gospel but also because they entail the loss of baptismal grace. And this is a characteristic of all serious sins. Only on this presupposition is it understandable that even the reconciliation of those guilty of sins of impurity is considered an accepta communicatione ad ecclesiam admitti (Epist. 4,4). The same is said of the other minora delicta/peccata which are obviously not sins against faith (Epist. 16,2; 17,2).[61] Naturally, although those guilty of such sins, unless through their own unrepentance they have broken off all connection with the Church, still have a relationship with it, that is, they have not simply 'left' the Church (Epist. 57,1.3; 65,5), they are, nevertheless, in a true sense separated from it as a community of grace. In Cyprian there are no precise statements about the exact limits and the actual relationship of a sinner's belonging (at limen Ecclesiae: Epist. 57,3; 30,6) and not belonging to the church community. Nevertheless, not belonging to the community should not be understood merely as the consequence of excommunication by the bishop,[62] as it was later expressed at the beginning of the penitential process. According to Cyprian this is evident from the automatic and immediate exclusion from the Eucharist, which follows from even secret sins (De lapsis 15.25 f; Epist. 16,2; cf. also Epist. 75,21).[63] There are no further considerations of the question why according to Cyprian every serious sin entails the loss of grace in some sense.

[59] If penance brings about a return to 'life', then this must certainly be understood from the point of view of grace and not only from the moral and eschatological viewpoints (Epist. 55,22). The return to life is seen as analogous to the liberation from death in baptism.

[60] Venia, with the sense of 'remission', is a very frequent expression in Cyprian. It means essentially 'remission of punishment', as Seneca had already defined it: venia est poenae meritae remissio (De clem. II 7,1). Hosius (Teubner 1914), p. 250.

[61] Contrary to J. Grotz, p. 106 f. There the 'exhomologesis' is only an act by which the Church pronounces its sacramental word of forgiveness, through which God forgives all guilt. The exhomologesis does not, however, have the mole of readmitting the sinner to the community of the Church.

[62] This would be logically impossible for Cyprian, since he rejects the notion of a baptism which is valid but fruitless from the point of view of grace.

[63] It could be said in the first place that Cyprian condemns the reception of the Eucharist after an unrepented sin as sacrilegious. Nevertheless, in the whole of his polemic against the presumption of the lapsi he presupposes as the only obvious 'sorrow' that which as church penance is finally confirmed by the pax and communicatio. Thus the sin which is not yet forgiven by the Church excludes from the Eucharist. Without pax with the Church, a person is, according to 1 Cor. 11:27, eo ipso unworthy of the Eucharist. This is Cyprian's basic and enduring idea. It applies explicitly also to sins which remain secret. This exclusion must derive, therefore, not from an official excommunication (ferendae sententiae) but only from the sin itself. It would be purely arbitrary to postulate here as it were the implicit remission of a general merely church excommunication latae sententiae. For Cyprian it is the law iuris divini that normally only the sinner who has been absolved by the Church should approach the Eucharist.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But it is easy to see the reason for this from his theology as a whole. The sinner received the Holy Spirit in baptism. Indeed it is the specific theme of the controversy with the heretics that the baptism which bestows the Spirit is valid. By sinning the Christian has lost this Spirit. Now the Church is the only place where this Spirit can be received, since in baptizing it is the mother of the divine life in the faithful. This too is a fundamental principle in the controversy with the heretics. Thus it is self-evident for Cyprian that an offense against the Spirit of the Church is also directed against the Church itself and that this means a separation both from the Spirit and from the Church. For the same reason reconciliation with the Church and [176] reception of the Spirit belong together (Epist. 57,4). Following the view of Hermas, Callistus and the author of the Didascalia Apostolorum the bishop of Carthage also knows that in the Church there is cockle along with wheat (Epist. 54,3-4; 55,25). It would be presumptuous to wish to distinguish the one from the other neatly at the present time. And the Lord's judgement will concern those quos in ea (Ecclesia) intus invenerit (Epist. 55,29). This means, however, that in the Church there are people of different moral standings. But this does not lead Cyprian to overlook the fact that sin does entail a change of relationship between the Church and the baptized. As is clear from the controversy with the heretics, his position forced him to understand the 'cockle' in the Church to be those who belonged to it purely formally. This view was not totally superseded later, even by Augustine.

Now which faults have these moral, theological and ecclesial effects of serious sin? In the first place, at least theoretically, the sins of Paul's catalogues of vices which exclude people from the kingdom of God (Gal. 5:19 ff.; 1 Cor. 6:9) are offences quae mortem pariant (Test. III 64 f.; Epist. 59,4). Naturally one cannot expect here a more precise consideration of the basic criterion by which these faults are distinguished from daily sins. Cyprian contents himself with passages from Scripture and common sense, everyday moral judgement. The sins which are included in this group are those which are in concreto submitted to church penance. This applies primarily obviously to all sins against faith (apostasy), and indeed even in those cases where Cyprian himself is aware that they must be treated very mildly and leniently.[64] This applies even to cases which have remained secret (De lapsis 25.26.27). But still other sins, such as concubinage and illicit living together, by those who are unmarried,[65] impurity (Epist. 55,20), adultery, frequentation of brothels, fraud (Epist. 55,26 f; 59,14 f.) etc. are subject to church penance. In general it seems that idolatria, adulterium and fraus formed a kind of triad for such sins, while murder is not explicitly mentioned (but cf. De bono pat. 14). Among sins against faith were also counted schism and insubordination to church authority (cf., for example, Epist. 59, 14. 15; 66,9; 69,6.7, etc.). On the one hand, therefore, serious sin and offence subjected to church penance coincide in theory, but, on the other hand, the circle of offences subjected to church penance is so much restricted in practice that it remains relatively small, and therefore the number of penitents is normally not very great.

[177]

3. The Necessity of Personal and Church Penance for Serious Sins

Before we consider the meaning and effect of the individual 'parts' of penance in Cyprian's view it is necessary to take a look at the necessity and the unity of the whole penitential process. For both sins against faith and for minora delicta the bishop of Carthage prescribes the one penance which we have described above. If, instead of allowing the immediate access of the lapsi merely on the basis of the letters of martyrs, he prescribes the legitima

[64] Cf. Epist. 55,14: the situation of the libellatici; Epist. 55,13; De lapsis 13: different cases of sacrificati; Epist. 52,2: Novatian is worse than a sacrificatus; De lapsis 25: the secret 'sin' of an infant; Epist. 55,26: a moechus is worse than a libellaticus.
[65] This applies particularly to virgins consecrated to God; cf. Epist. 4,4.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

paenitentia, then he bases this mostly on the need for a long-lasting personal penance for sins in order to move God to forgiveness (De lapsis 17). But even this penance is considered as being imposed by the Church. It is performed by the Church in the exhomologesis, controlled by it, supported by its prayer and sacrifice, and concluded by it in the granting of the pax. No other possibility of forgiveness is in any way considered. The struggle against the laxists is at the same time a demand for personally hard penance and an exhortation to submit oneself to the exhomologesis and to receive the communicatio from the bishop who alone is authorized to give it. Laxism undermines both of these points in the same way (Epist. 15,1; 16,2). The personal penance which Cyprian stresses so much is never in his view merely an individual, private, interior performance which has nothing to do with the Church. This would still not be the case even if, in his view, the concluding rite were only the solemn elaborate end of a personal penance.[66] It is impossible to say today exactly how the laxists justified their practice. It seems, however, to be derived from the understandable desire to participate again in the Eucharist as a complete Christian, from grounds for pardon which could be made applicable to the lapsi, from appeal to the intercession of the martyrs and perhaps also with reference to John 20 (cf. De cath. eccl. un. 4).[67] Indeed, even on the part of the laxists penance is considered an indivisible totality, and therefore both its personal side and its ecclesial side are neglected: ante actam paenitentiam, ante exomologesim . . . te manum ab episcopo . . . impositam (Epist. 15,1; 16,2; De lapsis 16). For his own part, in order to justify his requirement Cyprian argues that the person who has sinned 'against God' can receive pardon from God alone and must, therefore, merit it by a long penance (De lapsis 17). For us today this would imply simply that the sinner has to perform 'subjective' penance, whereas for Cyprian it entails the necessity of a penance which itself clearly has an ecclesial [178] aspect. He does not consider further, however, how his argument can justifiably cover this point. For him the ecclesial aspect of guilt was so evident that it obviously had to be considered in the remission of guilt. Although the sinner can separate himself from the Church by his own act alone, the new pax is the gift of the Church itself. It can, therefore, be granted only by the episcopal representative of this Church who alone can 'bind and loosen' (Epist. 57,1; 33,1) and who alone is ad tempus iudex vice Christi (Epist. 59,5). Since this pax is necessary for salvation,[68] penance for a sin which separates a person from the Church can reach its goal only when the penitent receives the peace with the Church from the bishop once more. Nec ad communicationem venire quis possit, nisi prius illi ab episcopo et clero manus fuerit imposita (Epist. 17,2).[69] Even in this case the general principle: habere non [66] This point is clearly stressed in recent publications; cf. K. Baus, p. 375; J. Quasten, p. 380 f.; H. von Campenausen, p. 310 f.

[67] Cf. in this chapter under II 5,b: 'The Effect of the Reconciliation by the Church'.

[68] Actual membership of the Church is so necessary for salvation that even a martyr who is an unreconciled lapsus coronari in morte non poterit (Epist. 55,17). This rigoristic viewpoint necessarily rejects the notion that baptism of desire and 'perfect contrition' are sufficient for salvation, even in a case of necessity. It is not clear how it is compatible with the possibility which Cyprian himself proclaims, namely, that even a person who is exteriorly separated from the Church cor tamen . . . semper in Ecclesia fuit (Epist. 49,2). The contention of A. d'Alès, La théologie de S. Cyprien (Paris 1922), that Cyprian recognized a baptism of desire is, however, incorrect. Although he is familiar with a baptism of blood for catechumens (Epist. 73,22), the only evidence for a baptism of desire is Epist. 73,23, where he dares not refuse salvation to heretics who are simpliciter admissi in Ecclesia without baptism, since they, contrary to his principle, have not been (re-)baptized. Similarly Firmilian, Epist. 75,21. But this is only a reluctant concession to practice which does not give rise to considerations of principle. He makes this concession, because otherwise the loss of salvation for such heretics by birth, who had been simply reconciled without baptism, would represent a very 'existential' argument against his own teaching in the controversy over the baptism of heretics.

[69] Contrary to J. Grotz, p. 156 ff., who makes a clear distinction between communicatio and pax, with regard both to their exterior position in the penitential process and their effects. In this view communicatio is a purely canonical act which introduces the 'actual church penance' (the exhomologesis). Pax, on the other hand, is a

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

potest Deum patrem, qui Ecclesiam non habet matrem (De cath. eccl. un. 6) is valid, since sin denies that God is father and the Church mother (De lapsis 9). Thus both of these aspects demand the one personal-ecclesial penance, and this necessary penance is personal-ecclesial. Moreover, as a support of this view Cyprian appeals to the scripturae caelestes (De lapsis 23), the Domini ac Dei lex (De lapsis 15), the Domini praecepta (De lapsis 18; Epist. 15,1), the gospel (De lapsis 20; Epist. 16,1), the evangelii lex (Epist. 15,1). The ecclesial aspect of this evangelical law is not explained in any detail. Cyprian did not even consider this necessary, since he knew that he had both tradition and private relations (Epist. 16,4) on his side.

4. The Effect of the Personal Act of Penance

The sinner must, therefore, do personal penance for the faults which he has committed after baptism. As we have seen, when Cyprian considers the remission of sins he views sin almost exclusively from the moral and eschatological viewpoints. God is graviter offensus (De lapsis 16), since sin is essentially in Deum. Thus the sinner has deserved aeterna supplicia (De lapsis 7; Epist. 30,7). In any case, it is only God who can forgive his sin: solus Deus misereri potest. Veniam peccatis, quae in ipsum commissa sunt, solus patest ille largiri qui peccata nostra portavit (De lapsis 17).[70] Now God does not forgive the sins committed after baptism in exactly the same way as he does [179] in baptism itself, quia semel in baptismo remissa peccatorum datur (De op. et eleem. 2). The sinner cannot expect and hope to receive the forgiveness of sins through the Church and its representatives in the manner of a simple baptismal remissa. This is the meaning of the following: homo Deo maior non potest esse[71] nec remittere aut donare indulgentia sua non potest, quod in Dominum delicto graviore commissum est (De lapsis 17). Thus what Firmilian writes about the activity of the bishops must also contradict Cyprian's view: non quasi a nobis remissionem peccatorurn (lapsi) consequantur, sed ut per nos ad intelligentiam delictorum suorum convertantur et Domino plenius satisfacere cogantur (Epist. 75,4).[72] The Church cannot simply forgive (donare) sins purely gratuitous interior event bringing about the forgiveness of sins at the conclusion of the whole penitential process. For details on this point see S.Hübner, pp. 195-201. This is obviously not to deny that the Church's mite of pax communicates the Spirit. However, it remains an act of the Church; cf. the further details on this point in this essay.

---

[70] This statement is not made in itself and directly of God's behaviour as opposed to his action in baptism. Quae in ipsum commissa sunt in this context can be very well translated: 'because (not: in so far as – somewhat in contrast to other sins) they are directed against God'. It should not be inferred from this statement, therefore, that theme are other actual sins which are to be forgiven either by the Church or by man more or less on their own authority, either in baptism, since they were committed before baptism, or afterwards, and this because they were not committed in Deum. All that this statement wishes to show is that a forgiveness of God is necessary for these sins. This leads to the idea that man must do something to obtain this pardon. This is the purpose of Cyprian's reasoning in De lapsis. Obviously this enterprise presupposes that theme is no longer a remissa peccatorum as in baptism. But, once this is granted, it is clear that man must propitiate God only through his own satisfactio if he wishes, despite the semel applying to baptism, to obtain forgiveness for his further sins.

[71] For the meaning of this expression, cf. Epist. 54,3: esse non potest maior domino suo servas; and yet that is precisely what the servant wished to be when he wanted to separate carefully the wheat from the cockle in the Church. Thus laxity can be presumption just as much as rigorism.

[72] At least the negative part of this statement agrees entirely with De lapsis 17, etc. The view that the positive part must describe fully and adequately the priestly activity would give too much importance to the text. For, leaving aside the activity of reconciliation as such, as it is attested by Cyprian, there is, in any case, no mention in the positive part of the statement of the priestly intercession for the penitents by prayer and sacrifice. Yet this figures explicitly and frequently in Cyprian. With regard to De lapsis 17, etc., P. Galtier, L'église et la remission des péchés (Paris 1932), p. 43 ff.; and in RHE 30 (1934), p. 532 ff., goes too far when he wishes to relate the text to general synodal regulations concerning penance, according to which obviously not every individual

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

committed after baptism as it does in baptism.[73] God has to be propitiated. And man has to do this himself by his penance. If this applies already to daily sins, it is even more appropriate for serious ones.

This assidua et iugis operatio (De op. et eleem. 2) of satisfactio[74] in a longa et plena paenitentia (De lapsis 16) means a Dominum promereri (Epist. 19,1; 26), a rogare, deprecari Dominum (De lapsis 16), a Deum (offensam . . . Domini) placare (De lapsis 16,29,35; Epist. 43,2) and thus a delicta redimere (De lapsis 35; Epist. 59,13; cf. De habitu virg. 11). The satisfaction that is penance is, therefore, directed towards God in order to change his attitude and it succeeds in this, as it were, by the payment of sins which are conceived as debita (De dom. or. 22). This exoneration of guilt lasts a long time and it can also be presented by the image of a long healing process[75] from wounds (Epist. 30,6; 3 1,6.7; De lapsis 35). And Cyprian is aware of the contrast between this process and the totally different event which occurs in baptism.(cf. Epist. 59,13: gratia quae de baptismi sanctificatione percipitur – paenitentia per quam culpa curatur). In some circumstances this exoneration of guilt can be continued in the next life (Epist. 55,20). Cyprian already has a place for this purpose, since even the just still seem to wait for the day of judgement and the arrival of the Kingdom of God in 'paradise', in refrigerium.[76] The only exception to this arc the martyrs who are immediately crowned, united with God and enter into possession of the regnum caelorum. In any case Cyprian considers that the payment of 'guilts' through satisfaction in order to propitiate God will be definitively effective only at the general judgement. After the destruction of this world and this age the people of Christ will stand before its judge (De lapsis 17). [180] Christ will 'examine' (recensere) this people and its enemies and pronounce judgement on everyone according to his deserts (Epist. 58,10). As opposed to the martyr who is crowned immediately after his death, the penitent has to wait ad sententiam Domini (Epist. 55,20). Although he certainly can hope for forgiveness, especially since he can at this moment count on the great help of the martyrum merita et opera iustorum (De lapsis 17), this assurance does not dispense with the actual and definitive decision. The final decision is made in the next life, considered spatially and, above all, temporally (Epist. 57,1), and everything which happens previously (personal penance and reconciliation with the Church) is, by comparison, only an interim (Epist 55,29) and reserves the sinner and his salvation sinner received the forgiveness of his sins through bishops.

---

[73] In Epist. 73,7, for example, the subject of the remissam peccatorum dare at baptism is explicitly the Church in its praepositi. This is confirmed by the explanation in Epist. 75,4 [74] Satisfactio (satisfacere) is undoubtedly the most characteristic notion which Cyprian uses to describe this operation. Alongside and after paenitentia it appears most frequently and describes in the best way possible the activity of the penitent and its effect. The actual requirements of satisfactio are comprehensively enumerated in De lapsis 35. For the recurrence of the word, cf. CSL 3,1: 227,11; 247,9; 248,1; 249,25; 258,16.19.22; 260,2.7.25; 262,7.8; 263,27; 264,6; CSL 3,2: 516,11; 518,15; 567,2; 592,4.18; 594,16; 597,1; 631,22,24; 632,5; 644,16; 646,4.10.11; 680,7.18; 681,15; 683,2.8; 686,11.21.24; 688,9; 717,10.14; 722,1; 725,13; 733,20; 812,28. Apart from making amends, that is, actual works of penance, satisfactio can also mean the result of these efforts. Cf. Epist. 15,4: paenitentia satisfactioni proxima, that is, a penance which has almost obtained reconciliation with God, so that the intercession of the martyrs is now really able to supply the rest.

[75] At least in Epist. 30,3; 3 1.6.7 this image shows that penance was not experienced merely as the removal of a punishment which had been imposed juridically from without, and that it cannot be expected to end without an interior healing and a restoration of complete moral health. This is an indication, therefore, that at that time satisfaction cannot have been the only and comprehensive means of removing guilt. In fact the two letters quoted are not both by Cyprian himself. The same image with the same conceptual background is found also in Tertullian, De paen. 7,13; Didascalia Apostolorum II 41,3-9.

[76] Cf. A. d'Alès, La théologie de S. Cyprien (Paris 1922), pp. 33-5. Nevertheless, this explanation of Cyprian's eschatology is not very clear, either terminologically or objectively. The question needs to be investigated afresh. Cyprian seems to distinguish between paradise and regnam coelorum, between the immediate fate of the martyrs and that of the rest of the righteous. But in Ad Fortunatum 13 even the martyr is offered only the prospect of paradise.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

always to God.[77] Certainly Cyprian knows that even in this life satisfactio, after a certain time determined by human standards, can have blotted out the guilt of sin (cf. Epist. 15,4; 56,1 f.),[78] that the penitent in this life already can be a curatus (Epist. 55,19) with a purgata conscientia (De lapsis 16), who has the Spirit of the Father (Epist. 57,4). Nevertheless, Cyprian always views the final effect of penance eschatologically.[79] Even in the place where he considers a three-year penance sufficient ad deprecandam clementiam Domini, he makes this point quite clear when he says: puto his indulgentiam Domini non defuturam (Epist. 56,2). Forgiveness is granted eschatologically as the actual goal of penance.[80] But the penitent can count on receiving it. Cyprian evinces no serious doubt about this future forgiveness, provided that full penance is done. Wherever there is any doubt expressed this concerns not God's readiness to forgive but the fulfilment of the conditions prescribed for it on the sinner's part. The frequent mention of a potest clementer ignoscere (misereri)[81] highlights precisely the future character[82] of the forgiveness together,' with the possibility [77] This domino reservari which is stated with regard to the repentant and reconciled sinner (Epist. 55,29; 55,19) means, on the one hand, the refusal of a praeiudicare Domino (Epist. 55,18) on the question of whether he will find the sinner's penance plena et iusta or revoke the sententia servorum. On the other hand, the phrase has the nuance of 'preservation' and 'protection'. The repentant and reconciled sinner is 'protected' by his penance and the community of grace that is the Church both from a further fall and from the condemning judgement of God. For this use of the term, cf. Epist. 55,22: . . . Dei . . . punientis ut corrigat et cum correxerit reservantis; Test. III 57: fidelem emendari et reservari (cf. further the biblical passages quoted as an explanation of the meaning: morti non tradere, misericordiam non avertere, emundare. Similarly De op. et eleem. I.

[78] At least in the ideal case reconciliation presupposes the conviction that the penance done has satisfied divine justice, that is, that the paenitentia can even be plena (De lapsis 16; Epist. 55,18). Nevertheless, in practice almost all cases of reconciliation, at least where the lapsi are concerned, arise out of other considerations which always militate to some extent against this principle. Illness, the necessitas temporum, the threat of another persecution, etc. mostly play a role. Practically the only case in which Cyprian sees evidence for the complete performance of penance is that of an erstwhile lapsus who becomes a martyr or even a confessor (cf. De lapsis 13; 36; Epist. 19,2; 24-5; 55,4.7; 60,2). The unique cautious exception is the case in Epist. 56,1-3.

[79] Contrary to J. Grotz, p. 106 ff. According to him, Cyprian holds that the forgiveness of sins takes place not only at the last judgement but immediately at reconciliation. Merely from the point of view of the language which Cyprian uses, this position does not appear to be tenable, cf. n.77, as well as S. Hübner, p. 206.

[80] Moreover, the paenitentiae fructus is always the peace with the Church (Epist. 55,29).

[81] Thus this word occurs five times in De lapsis 36; it is found once in Epist. 57,1. In De lapsis l7 potest has a present sense.

[82] This is clearly expressed in Epist. 57,1. When it is stated there: . . . et legem dederit ut ligata in terris et in coelis ligata essent, solvi autem possent, quae hic prius in Ecclesia solverentur, it is not a question of an 'audacieuse atténuation du texte biblique', cf. Capelle in: RThAM 7 (1935), p. 233. Since it must necessarily have been done consciously, it can hardly be ascribed to Cyprian without a precise proof. Rather it is here a question of a formulation which Cyprian was unable to avoid, since he introduces an element of time in the biblical statement (prius – illic). Thus he can hardly write: ut . . . solverentur autem, quae . . . in Ecclesia solverentur. What he wants to say is that the heavenly loosing will occur at the future judgement. The possent is only a substitute for the future tense which does not exist. Cf. habere with the infinitive as a substitute for the future in Cyprian: CSL 3,3:429; Bardenhewer II 457. For posse with the infinitive, particularly in the passive, as a circumlocution of the future passive in Latin, cf. Stolz-Schmalz, Lateinische Grammatik, newly rev. by M. Leumann and J. B. Hofmann (Munich 1928), p. 557, with examples and further bibliography. The last chapter of De lapsis obviously wishes to end on an optimistic note (. . . nec solam iam Dei veniam merebitur sed coronam). Thus, with its five-fold potest it surely wishes to inculcate not uncertainty of the divine forgiveness but its real possibility. This meaning is clearly underlined by reference to the biblical passages Isa. 30:15; Ezek. 33:11; Joel 2:13. That Cyprian reckons on a certain forgiveness in the next life, provided the necessary conditions have been fulfilled, as opposed to Tertullian as a Montanist, is clear, for example, from Epist. 16,2: . . . possunt agentes paenitentiam veram Deo qua patri et misericordi . . . satisfacere . . . erigere se possunt. It is certain that theme are confessors who have already expiated their fault throughout their life and have become free from omne delictum because of their confession. But this is not obvious from the theological viewpoint (Epist. 25). Cyprian's protest against the premature reconciliation of the priest Victor antequam paenitentiam plenam egisset et Domino . . . satisfecisset (Epist. 64,1) obviously presupposes an actual paenitentia plena which satisfies God. The statement of De lapsis 18: ante est ut sciamus illos (lapsos) de Domino impetrasse

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

that the conditions on man's side may not be fulfilled, but it in no way suggests that God may not be ready to pardon. The penance which Cyprian prescribes is totally orientated to man's position before God's judgement. In God's verdict it is revealed whether his penance, as well as the intercession of the martyrs and the Church, has been completely successful in absolving the guilt of his sin.

This conception is easily derivable from the actual form of the institution of penance. But it also coincides with the long duration of this penance and, in any case, is one of the fundamental views of the [181] Patristic age, as the distinction between baptism and penance already shows. It is for this reason that we will consider the dogmatic significance of this conception somewhat more closely in order to pinpoint its deficiencies and its advantages. Two points are particularly worthy of note: the notion of sin and its remission as the incurring of punishment and punitive expiation, respectively, and the opposition between the post-baptismal forgiveness of sins and that of baptism.

As has already been shown, a consideration of sin, its effects and its forgiveness from the viewpoint of the theology of grace is not entirely alien to Cyprian. He is also aware of the loss of baptismal grace, its recovery by reconciliation and the parallel between penance as satisfactio and baptism. Nevertheless, all of these points arc peripheral to his theology, as can be seen particularly from his theology of satisfactio and its particular effect. In general on this question the Bishop of Carthage passes over the consideration from the viewpoint of the theology of grace in order to focus on the eschatological judgement. This judgement is seen not as manifestation of the fact that a person has or has not grace, but as a decision on the question whether God is satisfied with the sinner's performance of penance and the co-operation of the Church therein and, for this reason, no longer insists on punishment. Since Poschmann it has often been said that Cyprian does not make a clear distinction between guilt and liability to punishment and, therefore, considers that sin is 'forgiven' only when the reatus poenae is totally remitted. This is correct in so far as even in Cyprian there are present only the bases of a consideration of sin and its forgiveness from the viewpoint of the theology of grace: To this extent he does not consider the reatus poenae exclusively as the essence of habitual sin. He also recognizes the existence of a profound assurance of salvation even before the guilt of sin is completely 'paid up'.[83] Thus he also provides a basis for the modern distinction between reatus culpae and reatus poenae as well as for the more recent notion of 'forgiveness' in anticipation of a remission of the punishment due to sin. Nevertheless, all these are no more than bases. Thus, simplifying somewhat, we may still say that for Cyprian habitual sin is liability to punishment and the remission of sin is the elimination of this liability by penance. In addition to what we have said explicitly on the subject, this follows from the way in which Cyprian considers the remission [182] of daily sins to be essentially identical to that of serious sins. In fact De op. et eleem. 2 is concerned primarily with the forgiveness of daily sins.

It would be wrong, however, to concentrate only on the lack of the said distinction in this view. Indeed this defect has a positive significance. Where the distinction between reatus culpae and reatus poenae is taken too much for granted, the view imposes itself in fact and quod postulant, tunc facere quod (martyres) mandant, presupposes a point of time when the request of the confessors that the lapsi should be granted peace with the Church is fulfilled. But this means that they have previously received this peace from God in forgiveness. This is not contradicted by the view that it is only at the last judgement that it will be clearly decided whether all this is really valid. Before this judgement there can be only a moral certainty whether the penance is adequate. In any event God's fundamental readiness to forgive is here taken for granted. This is demonstrated in Epist. 55,22-3: quod utique ad paenitentiam Dominas non hortaretur, nisi quia paenitentibus indulgentiam pollicetur. . . nec iram paenitentibus. . . sed veniam magis et indulgentiam pollicetur.

---

[83] This will be shown more clearly when we consider the meaning of church reconciliation.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

spontaneously – if perhaps not yet theoretically – that the remission of the reatus culpae is brought about as a more or less self-evident sacramental (ex opere operato) infusion of grace. The precondition of this infusion, namely, 'sorrow', as opposed to 'penance', is fairly easily attained. This entails that 'doing penance' is inevitably oriented to the remission of the 'punishment' due to sin and loses its meaning for sorrow and for the remission of guilt. And since, after all, once the guilt has been forgiven, the 'punishment' is not a radically existential question (of salvation), the remission of punishment is relegated to a position of second importance. Cyprian's own view, on the contrary, makes it easier for him to 'realize' that true sorrow is penance in action. In fact his theory of sin and the remission of sins presupposes as self-evident and supporting his whole view the idea that genuine sorrow is penance. This is true, however problematical and imperfect this view may be when considered in itself.

